["¶ The wonderful cures reported by Dr. Milner to have been wrought by the hand of Father Arrowsmith, find a parallel in those performed by the hands and arms of Oswald, as recorded by William of Malmsbury. This historian (see Sharp's Translation, p. 53. London edit., 1816) says, that 'those precious relics remain, according to the testimony of Bede, through the power of God, without corruption.' It must be observed, that Bede flourished within less than one century of Oswald's reign, and four centuries before William of Malmsbury lived. So that, taking for granted, that Bede's account of Oswald's hands, &c., being without corruption at the time he wrote, is correct; still, the miracle of their preservation is inferior to that related by Dr. Milner (Letter xxvi., p. 173) respecting Arrowsmith's hand, which is 'preserved to this day entire at Wigan,' after a lapse of nearly two centuries!

["* Mead, in his Medica Sacra, p. 70, says, 'Subitus terror multos interemit.'

["† The occurrence took place in the county of Clare, where a lad descended an eyry, which overhung the sea. The rope by which he was held becoming entangled, caused him to despair of safety; and before it was disengaged, the extraordinary change spoken of took place.

["Should I omit to mention the surprising effects of Haygarth's metallic tractors on rheumatic affections, or the no less surprising cures performed by the once noted Maineduc, of Cork? This person had wound up public credulity to such a pitch, that the patient who submitted to his treatment, as he called it, has, when placed by him in a certain position, from no other assignable cause than the mere force of imagination, and an ardent faith in the powers of the operator, derived the sought-for relief. The delusion seems to originate in this circumstance, that where there exists a predisposition to believe, no imposture will be too gross to be swallowed.

["‡ Letter xxvi., pp. 173—175. Eighth edit. London.

["§ Ibid.

["In the first place, then, the waters of St. Winifred's* well in Flintshire, to which Dr. Milner alludes, have been discovered to possess medicinal properties of the highest degree. 'Their green and sweet-scented moss,' says Dr. Linden, 'is frequently applied to ulcerated wounds, with signal success.'† This he ascribes to 'a vegetating spirit in the water, which is clear of all gross earth and mineral contents.' Hence, we may perceive, that had that Physician lived to see the cure of Mary Wood's arm, he would have said, that the application of the moss to the wound was attended with signal success, but would never have pronounced the cure itself miraculous.

["Again: when Dr. Linden speaks of those waters being 'a most powerful cold bath of the first rank, having in their favour a variety of authentic cures, worked upon the most stubborn and malignant diseases, such as leprosy, weakness of nerves,' &c., &c., does he not enable us to account for the recovery of Winifred White, also, on natural principles? In her case, we see every thing proceed according to the established laws of nature. We see a relaxed frame relieved, and finally cured, by an immersion in cold water; whence we may reasonably ascribe the recovery of the patient (which Dr. Milner says was effected in one instant of time; that is, miraculously) to the suddenness and violence of the shock on her frame. He remarks, it is true, that the Physicians gave 'no hope of a perfect cure' in either case. But will it be said, because the diseases baffled their skill, that they were, therefore, beyond remedy? If so, the argument will stand thus: The diseases were incurable; but they were instantaneously removed; therefore, the cures were supernatural! Or, to put the argument in another form, The cure was deemed impossible; but it was effected 'in one instant of time;' therefore, it was miraculous. Again: 'Winifred White had recourse to God, through St. Winifred, by a novena;'‡ but she had a strong faith in the saint's intercession; therefore, St. Winifred effected her cure! He must be an expert logician, that could discover the connexion between the conclusion and the premises. Such is Dr. Milner's reasoning on the point, which if it be not the most logical, will, at least, be allowed the merit of novelty.

["But, further, Dr. Milner seems to have forgotten, in 1819, what he admitted in 1805, when he published his observations on Winifred White's cure; namely, that she remained a fortnight at Holywell to bathe, by the advice of her friends. This single circumstance throws discredit on the reputed miracle; inasmuch as it shows their apprehensions of a relapse, which they would not have entertained, were they satisfied of her perfect restoration to health. We may, besides, collect from Dr. Milner's account, that she was grossly superstitious; when he speaks of her setting out for Holywell, 'with an humble confidence, that God was both able and willing to work a miracle in her behalf.'§ On her arrival there, we perceive her mind, which was prepared for this event, enlivened to the greatest degree. She goes through her stated rounds of devotion. She sees, or thinks she sees, her malady all but removed. As those, who associate spectres with darkness, are said never to be disappointed in their appearance; so it is with such as look for a miracle. We can easily conceive, therefore, what her imagination, excited as it was by superstition, cherished by ignorance, and stimulated by her spiritual directors, was capable of effecting on her enfeebled frame.

["And, lastly, when Dr. Milner confidently declares, that Winifred White's cure is supernatural, his decision is grounded on the strength and accuracy of his own judgment, in opposition to an Injunction of the Council of Trent, which desires, that 'Bishops shall not decide without calling a Council of the Clergy to determine whether the supposed miracles might not be the effect of natural causes.'* This collision between his dictum, and the rule prescribed by the Council, I merely allude to, for the purpose of showing how authoritatively he pronounces an opinion, to which the members of his own communion are in no respect bound to defer.

["We may further observe, that both Mary Wood and Winifred White were persons of lively imaginations, and had wrought themselves into a firm persuasion, that by praying to the tutelary saint of the well, their diseases would be removed; and, moreover, that their prayers had consequently excited in them a degree of enthusiasm. When, therefore, we connect with those circumstances the medicinal qualities of the waters, we should not be surprised that nature should be restored to its proper tone. The story of Madame de la Fosse's recovery, as told by Bishop Douglas, strongly resembles those related by Dr. Milner. Being a person of a warm, fanciful temper, her prayers produced in her, says the Bishop, 'such frenzy as that of a lunatic, or the wildness of a drunkard, so as to cause such a contraction of her blood-vessels, as led to her cure.'† He further adds, that 'the accelerated motions communicated to the nervous system by surprise and joy have removed the most obstinate maladies.' As, therefore, there can be no reason for doubting, that those excited in Dr. Milner's patients by the warmth of their devotion, might not, with other co-operating causes, such as the application of the moss, and the use of the cold bath, produce their respective cures also; we can feel no hesitation in pronouncing what he attempts to palm on the public as 'evident miracles,' to be, at best, but surprising cures, brought about by natural causes.

["The miraculous restoration of speech to a person at Killesandra, in the diocess of Kilmore, through the agency of his parish Priest, is so worthy of being associated with Dr. Milner's miracles, that I cannot forbear calling the reader's attention to it. While we admire the address of the impostor, in duping his superstitious neighbours, and of the Priest, who affected to exercise a supernatural power on the occasion; we cannot but applaud the talent with which the cheat and the artifices of its contrivers have been exposed. The modus operandi adopted by the Priest is not a little curious. He first 'read some prayers over the dumb man, and next gave him holy water to sup three times; on swallowing which he found something stirring in his stomach, which ascended by his throat, (risum teneatis?) and he instantly spoke!!'‡ It is scarcely necessary to add, that the man

["* The author of Columbanus denies the existence of such a saint as St. Winifred, and observes, that the Monks of Holywell applied in 1330 to Gilbert de Stone, to write the Life of St. Winifred. Stone asked for materials, which could not be procured. 'No matter,' said he, 'I shall compose her life without materials!'" See Letter iii., p. 79, and Warton's History of English Poetry, vol. ii., for a further account of this imaginary saint.

["† Linden on Chalybeate Waters, p. 126. London, 1748.

["‡ Certain prayers continued during nine days. See Dr. Milner's Authentic Documents, relative to the Cure of Winifred White, of Wolverhampton, &c., p. 34.

["§ Ibid.

["* Sess. xxv., De Invoc. SS.

["† Criterion of Miracles, p. 232.

["‡ See Inquiry into the reported miraculous Cure of Matthew Breslin, by the Rev. John Cousins, Curate to the Rev. Dr. Hales, evinced his gratitude to his benefactor by ceasing to be a heretic, and adopting the creed of his Popish wife."*]

[The Roman Breviary, which is crowded with tales equally superstitious and false, relates several pertaining to Xavier, called the Apostle of the Indies. The miracles ascribed to him have been gravely adopted by Bishop Milner in his End of Controversy; which proceeding affords a brilliant exhibition of the devices employed by the Papacy to deceive the credulous, in imposing such fabulous and puerile statements upon the world.

["Francis was born of noble parents at Xavier,† in the diocess of Pampelona; joined himself at Paris to St. Ignatius, as his companion and disciple; and shortly made so much progress under this master, that, when absorbed in the contemplation of divine things, he was sometimes raised aloft from the ground. This occasionally happened to him when he was performing mass; but he purchased these spiritual delights at the price of great bodily torture. For he denied himself the use, not only of flesh and wine, but also of wheaten bread; and accustomed himself to the meanest aliments; and occasionally abstained from all kinds of nourishment for two or three days together. He lashed himself so severely with iron scourges, that the blood often flowed copiously from him, and allowed himself a very small portion of sleep on the bare ground. Being already qualified for the office of an Apostle, by the sanctity and austerity of his life, when John III., King of Portugal, requested Pope Paul III. to allow him some members of the newly-created Society (of Jesuits) to send to the Indies, he was appointed by the Pontiff to this important office, at the recommendation of St. Ignatius, with the authority of an Apostolical Nuncio. Upon his arrival thither, he immediately appeared to be divinely endowed with the faculty of speaking a variety of extremely difficult languages; nay, sometimes when he was preaching to people of different nations in one language, they each heard him, as it were, speaking in his own respective tongue. He travelled over innumerable provinces, always on foot, and frequently barefoot. He introduced the faith into Japan, and six other countries. He converted many hundred thousands of persons to Christ in the Indies, and administered the rite of baptism to several great Princes and Kings; yet, while he was doing such great things for God, his humility was so deep, that he wrote to St. Ignatius, who was then his Superior, upon his bended knees. The Lord strengthened this zeal of his in spreading the Gospel with the multitude and excellence of his miracles. He restored sight to a blind man; and, with nothing but the sign of the cross, turned as much sea-water into fresh as supplied for a long time the wants of a crew of five hundred persons, who were in danger of perishing from thirst; which water being carried into various regions, many sick people were immediately cured by it. He restored several dead persons to life; among them was one who had been buried the day before, whom he ordered to be dug up, and then raised him to life; and when two others were carried to the place of sepulture, he took hold of their hands, and restored them from the bier alive to their parents. He was continually endowed with the spirit of prophecy, and told many circumstances which happened at very distant places, and in very remote times. At length, on the second day of December, he rose to heavenly glory, in the Chinese island of Sancian. His dead body was twice buried, in quick lime, for many months; but it remained free from corruption, and emitted blood and a sweet odour; and when it was brought to Malacca, it delivered that city from a most cruel pestilence. At length, having become illustrious by repeated and most wonderful miracles in every part of the world, he was enrolled among the saints by Gregory XV. Thus far the Breviary.

["Almost every smatterer in Romish controversy knows that the miracles of Xavier have been repeatedly appealed to both by Roman Catholics and Protestants; by the former, to establish the reality of the miraculous powers claimed by their Church; and by the latter, to show the falsehood and futility of that claim. We shall, on account of the disputes excited by those opposite views, fairly weigh the evidence on both sides, and give a fuller discussion of the subject than it appears to have hitherto received. The fraternity of Jesuits being only able to boast of two very eminent saints, Ignatius Loyola and Xavier, were apparently resolved to make the best of them; and accordingly, there is scarcely a miracle performed by our Saviour, or his Apostles, or attributed to any of the giants of the Romish hagiology, which they are not ready to match by some similar exploit of one of those two champions. With respect to Xavier, they had great facilities for making out a plausible case. His zeal, diligence, and success, as a Missionary, had excited a strong interest in his favour in almost every part of Europe; the great distance of the theatre of his operations magnified his real exploits, and favoured the fabrication of imaginary ones; and when the process of his canonization was going on, his brethren, who seem never to have been very scrupulous when the credit or advancement of their own order was concerned, had the chief hand in getting up the testimony produced. As it is not such an easy matter for those who live in Europe to scrutinize the proceedings of people in the uttermost parts of Asia, the good fathers had the game in their own hands; and if they had adhered to Captain Absolute's prudent rule of 'never telling more lies than are absolutely necessary,' or paid some little attention to the probability and consistency of their stories, we might have found it more easy to suspect their statements, than to disprove them; but, fortunately for the cause of truth and rational religion, they have, with a blind eagerness, accumulated such a mass of falsehood as defeats its own purpose, like an excessive dose of poison, and renders their conviction as easy as that of any pickpocket who was ever taken in flagranti delicto. We speak advisedly when we say this; and we trust to throw some light upon the manner in which Jesuitical miracles are manufactured, and to show, that, except in the case of the miracles of Loyola, there never was a more impudent experiment upon the credulity of mankind, than was made by those worthy personages who set forth the miracles of St. Francis Xavier. In undertaking this, we shall not only relinquish a good deal of the ground formerly taken up by the Protestant adversary, but shall charitably help the Romanists to make their case stronger than they have ever yet made it for themselves. We admit the inaccuracy of the assertion of Middleton, Douglas, and several others, that 'Xavier's miracles were never heard of for more than thirty years after his death.' We allow that the authority of Francis de Victoria, Divinity Professor at Salawith the affidavits of credible witnesses annexed, that Breslin spoke within the five days, during which, it was said, he had lost the faculty of speech."]

[* Grier's Reply to the End of religious Controversy, pp. 361—379.]

["† A castle in Navarre, at the foot of the Pyrenees.

manca, who says, that 'he heard of no miracles wrought among the Indians,' is by no means conclusive, as he died six years before Xavier; and, moreover, spoke not of the East Indies, but of Spanish South America. We not only admit that Joseph Acosta, who has often been produced as an authority by the opposite party, does appeal to Xavier's miracles, but that they are also mentioned by Bellarmine; by Emanuel Acosta, whose Commentaries, or account of the transactions in the East, appeared in 1571; by Antonio de Quadros, in an Epistle, dated 1555; by Melchior Nunez, in another Epistle, dated 1554, only two years after Xavier's death; and, finally, that the celebrated traveller, Ferdinand Mendez Pinto, who accompanied the saint in one of his voyages, and whose veracity is almost as proverbial as Lemuel Gulliver's, expressly affirms that he wrought many miracles, 'of which he saw some and heard of others.' We are, nevertheless, not a whit alarmed by this formidable array of witnesses, and despair not of showing that plain truth is more than a match for them all.

["In the remarks we are about to make, we mean to cast no imputation upon Xavier himself. We respect him so highly for his zeal, diligence, intrepidity, and devotional fervency, that we are not disposed to be very severe upon his occasional displays of fanaticism and superstition. We are willing to suppose that his zealous applications for a great batch of plenary indulgences,* and his exertions to persuade the Portuguese colonists to turn away their black concubines, and marry their white ones,† were all well meant; and we regard his petition ‡ that the Pope would, for the love of God, put off Lent till June or July, and a few other matters of the like sort, as more ludicrous than reprehensible. In short, they who contemplate his character, where it is seen to the greatest advantage, (namely, in his own Epistles,) will find a little to disapprove, rather more to smile at, and a great deal to admire and commend; but they will be wofully disappointed if they look there for any of those miraculous exploits so liberally attributed to him by his mendacious biographers. Like all enthusiasts, he is apt to resolve his own inclinations into immediate divine impulses; § and, like all superstitious Romanists, he performs, or thinks he performs, surprising things by virtue of the prayers and rites of his Church. But of the portentous things placed to his credit by his brethren, we find not the smallest trace in his Epistles, nor the least notice of circumstances said to be connected with them, which, if real, were much more worthy of attention than many other particulars which he describes with sufficient minuteness. Sometimes his statements are absolutely irreconcilable with those of his biographers; and in many more his profound and unaccountable silence is fully equivalent to a direct contradiction. In short, the true Xavier is no more like their caricature of him, than the Virgil of the Augustan age resembles the Virgil who figures so conspicuously as a magician in the old romances; and were all the exploits for which we have his own authority multiplied tenfold, they would not, as miracles, be sufficient to constitute a saint of the tenth order.

["This negative argument is ably and forcibly urged by the acute and learned author of the Criterion: indeed, according to the ordinary rules of evidence, it is quite sufficient to set the matter at rest. Bishop Milner, however, makes a bold and dexterous attempt to get rid of it. After ingeniously premising, 'that the last things which true saints choose to speak of, are their own supernatural favours,' he proceeds to say, with respect to St. Xavier's, he not only mentions, in those very letters which Dr. Douglas appeals to, a miraculous cure which he wrought upon a dying woman, in the neighbourhood of Travancore, but he expressly calls it 'a miracle,' and affirms that it caused the conversion of the whole village in which she resided.*

["As Dr. Milner does not think proper to give us the ["* Xaverii Epistolæ, lib. i., Epist. iii., to Ignatius Loyola.

["† Tursellinus, after describing his address in setting about this, adds: 'Nec sinebat Franciscus, quantum in ipso erat, nigras ancillas a Lusitanis in matrimonium duci, sed albas minimeque deformes.'—De Vita Fr. Xav., lib. ii., cap. iii., p. 113. Edit., 1596. Compare Bouhour's Life of Xavier, p. 99 of Dryden's translation.

["‡ Epistle to Ignatius, ubi supra.

["§ For example: he finds himself so clearly instructed by God to go to Macassar, that to neglect this impulse would be a downright striving with Heaven, and would leave him without hope either here or hereafter.—Lib. i., Epist. xii. In spite of all this, he did not go to Macassar, but changed his mind on the way, and went to the Moluccas.

["* End of Controversy, Letter xxvii., p. 178. A few more samples of the titular's fairness and accuracy, from the same letter which we have already quoted, and to which we could easily add hundreds more of the like quality, will help our readers to form an idea of the methods used by some distinguished Divines of the Roman Catholic persuasion to acquire a great reputation as writers of controversy. 'The late learned Bishop of Salisbury, Dr. J. Douglas, has borrowed from the infidel Gibbon what he calls a most satisfying proof,' &c., p. 177. This is strange, indeed, if it be true, and quite as great a miracle as any attributed to Xavier. Gibbon's Decline and Fall, which Dr. Milner quotes, was first published in 1776, whereas Douglas's Criterion appeared in 1754, when the historian was at Lausanne, undergoing the process of re-conversion from Popery!! We do not hesitate to express a firm belief, that this baseless charge against the Bishop of Salisbury did not originate in ignorance, but in downright malice. Dr. Milner was contemporary with both Douglas and Gibbon, and could not but know that the Criterion had been many years in the hands of the public before Gibbon was ever heard of as an author. But he knew that the accusation of 'borrowing from an infidel' would render Douglas and his book odious in the estimation of the ignorant and bigoted members of his own communion, who pin their faith upon his sleeve; and that was sufficient for his purpose. This specimen of his trust-worthiness, with respect to a matter which happened in his own time, will give us some idea how far he is to be relied upon in points of remote and obscure antiquity. Again: 'St. Pachomius, though he never learned the Greek or Latin languages, yet sometimes miraculously spoke them, as his disciple and biographer reports.' This biographer, the writer of the Life of the saint published by the Bollandists, was so far from being the disciple of Pachomius, that he expressly declares that he never saw him; and this is plainly mentioned by Tillemont, the very authority appealed to by Dr. Milner. Again: 'The renowned Preacher, St. Vincent Ferrer, who, having the gift of tongues, preached indifferently to Jews, Moors, and Christians, in their respective languages.' What? to the Jews in Hebrew, and the Moors in Arabic? No, gentle reader, they were all the saint's own countrymen, Spanish Moors and Jews, who would have no more difficulty in comprehending a sermon in Spanish, than a Scotchman or an Irishman has in understanding an English one. For our further conviction, he says in a note, 'See his Life by Lanzano, Bishop of Lucca.' Had Dr. Milner seen this Life himself, he would have known that it is by Rauzano, or Ranzano, Bishop of Lucera; and every intelligent reader who has seen it, will acknowledge that it contains more lies than pages. Lastly, in order to get rid of Douglas's assertion, that the Jesuit Acosta himself admits that the Missionaries had no power of working miracles, (which, in fact, Acosta does say more than twenty times, though he somewhat inconsistently professes to credit the miracles of Xavier,) he has the effrontery to give the following turn to the passage quoted by Douglas: ('Altera causa in nobis est cur apostolica prædicatio institui omnino non possit apostolice, quod miraculorum nulla facultas sit, quæ Apostoli plurima perpetrarunt:')—'But what will the admirers of this Detector say, if it should appear that Acosta barely says that there was not the same faculty or facility of working miracles among the Missionaries which there was among the Apostles?'!!! Head of Priscian! we are to be told by a grave Romish Doctor of Divinity that nulla facultas barely means 'not the same faculty or facility!' The Doctor was pleased on one memorable occasion to designate himself by the name of the enchanter Merlin; and if juggling with words and facts constitute an accomplished magician, it must be allowed that he beats his ancient namesake hollow particulars of this miracle, the only one which he had to produce, we shall supply the deficiency, and give our readers an opportunity of judging of its nature.

["When Xavier was at Travancore, he visited a native village, where the inhabitants refused to be converted because their Chief would not allow it.* 'In this place,' he tells us, 'a certain woman, near her delivery, had been suffering for more than two days under a difficulty of parturition, so that many persons despaired of her safety. And, as the prayer of the wicked is hateful to God, because all the gods of the Heathen are devils, their entreaties were not attended to in the least. I betook myself, with one of my companions, to the lying-in woman's house; and there I began to call confidently on the name of the Lord, forgetting that I was in a strange land; but this occurred to my mind, that the earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof, the round world and all they that dwell therein. I therefore undertook to explain the chief articles of our faith to her by means of an interpreter; and she, by the grace of God, believed those things which we told her. Being at length asked if she would become a Christian, she answered that she would, truly and willingly. I then repeated the Gospel, (which, as I think, had never been heard in that place,) and baptized the woman according to due order; and, to be short, she was straightway delivered!'†

["We think the dullest of our readers will now comprehend why Dr. Milner kept the particulars of this miraculous cure so carefully in the back-ground. Instead of making any comments upon it, which would be a mere waste of time, we shall beg leave to produce a similar exploit of a layman, by way of illustration.

["'John Baptist Porta had at Naples the reputation of being a great philosopher, and of possessing great skill in medicine, although he did not follow that profession. It happened one night, at a very late hour, that one of the principal ladies of the city, who had been suffering severely in the pangs of childbirth for many hours, and had tried many remedies to no purpose, sent a servant to ask Porta for something more efficacious. He was then asleep; but being awakened by the repeated knockings of the messenger, and hearing what he came for, he bid him, in no very good humour, to be gone, for he was no Physician. As the servant continued to importune him, he at last took a small piece of paper, and prescribed some sort of water for the lady, and having to throw the prescription out of the window to the servant, who was waiting for it in the street, in order that the wind might not blow it away, he wrapped up in it a little dust or dirt which he scraped from the floor of his apartment. When the paper was taken to the lady, she, as well as her attendants, concluded, that the dust enclosed in it was the remedy sent by Porta to facilitate her delivery. She therefore swallowed down this dose of dirt, and took it at such a lucky time, that she was delivered almost immediately after. Porta, on going out of his house in the morning, found himself surrounded by several of the lady's servants, loaded with presents, which they delivered to him as tokens of her gratitude for the effectual relief she had received from his divine powders. Porta kept his own counsel, and replied, he was happy to hear of the favourable result of the case, and that he would go in the evening to congratulate her Excellency in person.'*

["And now we defy any of Dr. Milner's partisans to give us any thing like a proof, that Xavier's Indian exploit was a whit more miraculous than the Neapolitan one of John Baptist Porta. We cheerfully give the saint all the credit and glory to which it fairly entitles him; and we think most of our readers will be of opinion, that his power of working miracles, and the ingenuousness of Dr. Milner, are nearly on a par.

["Having seen what sort of confirmation of Xavier's miracles is afforded by the saint himself, we now proceed to examine the evidence of his contemporaries. Some of the fabulous legends of the dark ages were brought to perfection at once in the creative brain of the Monk who first invented them, like those poisonous fungi produced in rank and rotten ground, which attain their full growth in a single night, nobody knows how, or from what origin. Others may be traced backwards to some small distortion of the truth, which has gradually and slowly increased to an enormous mass of falsehood, like those pernicious weeds, which, if neglected in their early growth, spread their roots and their branches, and scatter their seeds in every direction, till the whole field or garden is overspread with their gross and mischievous luxuriance. The fictitious portion of Xavier's life is a romance of the latter description. The fable may be traced from a weakly birth, through a long and precarious childhood; at forty years of age it was pretty vigorous, and at sixty it was a monstrous giant, audacious enough to scale truth and heaven.

> 'Parva metu primo; mox sese attollit in auras, > Ingrediturque solo, et caput inter nubila condit.'
> VIRG.

["We shall, with Horace's leave, begin ab ovo, and introduce our readers to the monster in its cradle.

["Xavier died in the island of Sancian, on the 2d of December, 1552, and his body was interred on the spot by his companions in a hasty and slovenly manner, in a box filled with lime. The following spring it was removed to Malacca, and there, with still less ceremony, thrown into a grave in the burial-ground appropriated to the meanest of the people. In this place, as his biographers confess, it remained undistinguished and unhonoured, till August, 1553, about which time the happy idea seems to have struck his brethren that it was possible to turn it to a better account.† They therefore made arrangements for a solemn translation of it to Goa, where it was conveyed with great pomp and ceremony in the ensuing spring. We have an account of its reception there in a pretty long epistle of Melchior Nunhez, then Provincial of the Jesuits, dated 1554. After a flaming description of the processions that were made, the masses that were sung, and the enthusiastic devotion of the

["* The yellow stick of the Laird of Ronin would have been a valuable auxiliary to Xavier on this and many other occasions.—Vide Johnson's Tour to the Hebrides.

["† Xaverii Epist., lib. i., Ep. iv. This seems to have furnished a useful hint to the saint's coadjutors and successors. In the Jesuits' Epistles from Japan, and other parts of the East, we have several pompous accounts of the virtues of holy water, and the water used in baptizing, in promoting the delivery of pregnant women. It is, indeed, a very safe and easy miracle; and, in nine hundred and ninety-nine cases out of a thousand, will succeed as well in the hands of a heretic as those of any Jesuit in the universe. Had those good fathers, with their holy water, &c., postponed the delivery of their patients for another month, or, as St. Vincent Ferrer is reported to have done, charitably taken their sufferings upon themselves, the miracle would have been somewhat less equivocal.

["* Zahn. Mund. Mirab., ap. Feyjoo Theatro Critico, tom. ix., p. 97.

["† This was by no means a novel idea; for it had been known by long experience, that a dead saint was much more profitable than a living one, and frequently as good as an Archbishop's revenue to the church or monastery that had the luck to possess him.

people, he proceeds to give some account of the saint's miracles, which is the first specific record of them that we have been able to discover. We solicit the particular attention of our readers to his words, which are pregnant with instruction, and furnish a sufficient clue to the whole matter.

["'MANY THINGS BECAME KNOWN AFTER HIS DEATH, WHICH WERE NOT KNOWN DURING HIS LIFE.' A Franciscan Friar, a very devout person, who had been for a time Father Francis's companion previous to his entering upon the monastic state, and whose name was John Deyro, when he saw the body in this condition, said, 'that since God manifested the sanctity of Father Francis, he would also, for the glory of God, disclose a circumstance which he had never told to any body, namely, that Father Francis had the gift of prophecy; for that he himself, once upon a time, having had a revelation which he kept a close secret, the Father told him of it, and repeated all the particulars in such a manner, that he was not able to deny it; and this the said Friar related to us weeping.' The Vicar of St. Thomas's, of Meliapore, where Father Francis had resided a winter, told me, and all persons in Goa who chose to hear him, that he knew for a certainty that Francis was a virgin, which knowledge he had obtained as his Father Confessor. Many persons affirmed, that, at Cape Comorin, he had raised a dead person. In Japan, brother Pablo de Santa Fè, a Japanese, who accompanied the Father, assured us that he restored sight to a blind man. 'There are many other things which I do not write, because the Viceroy has declared to-day, that he would cause an attestation and public record of them to be drawn up, and send it to the King.' *

["In the above short passage, the nascent germ of the whole portentous legend may be discovered as distinctly as the gigantic oak can be traced back to the diminutive acorn. Various attempts to get up miracles have been made in our days, and we can all remember how loudly they were trumpeted forth at the very time they were said to have happened. When the pictures of the Virgin Mary opened and shut their eyes at Rome and Ancona, all Italy was in a ferment; and all England, Wales, and Ireland were inundated with the 'Official Memoirs of the Juridical Examinations' into those prodigies. When the great spiritual quack, Prince Hohenlohe, began to vend his miraculous wares, the fame of their virtues quickly overspread Europe, and even America. Protestants were every where insulted because they could produce nothing like them, and the Irish titular Bishops wrote flaming books to prove that Prince Hohenlohe had subverted Protestantism from its very foundation.† If those flimsy and abortive attempts made such a commotion, it is natural to suppose that a similar sensation would be caused by the prodigious miracles of Xavier during the saint's life-time. The appetite for miracles, and the disposition to believe them, were much greater then than they are now; there was plenty of time to gain information respecting them, for he carried on his marvellous operations for more than ten years. Supposing that he himself was too humble to boast of his supernatural favours, there were many other channels to communicate them to the world. They were witnessed, if we are to believe the posthumous relations, by thousands of his converts: the East was full of Spaniards and Portuguese, lay and secular; some of whom saw the miracles, and others heard of them, like the worthy Ferdinand Mendez Pinto. He was generally accompanied in his expeditions by one or more of his brother Jesuits, who kept up a regular correspondence with the Society in Europe; and the colonial Governors and naval and military officers were perpetually sending despatches to the Government at home. Yet, for nearly twelve long years, a dead silence is preserved respecting those very things which were most calculated to make a noise, and not a single document has been produced,* published during Xavier's life-time, in which one specific miracle, great or small, is attributed to him. But when he had been dead fifteen months, and at that favourable moment when people's minds are excited to a pitch of devotional frenzy by the pomp and parade of religious processions, and pageantries of all sorts, a new light suddenly dawns upon certain worthy friends and companions of Xavier; circumstances which they had hitherto unaccountably forgotten to communicate, are brought to their recollection; and the miracles of the dead saint, like the virtues of a deceased hen-pecked husband, are duly blazoned forth by the weeping survivers. And what is most important to keep in mind, we have the irrefragable testimony of Xavier's successor in authority, that the things then talked of had not been known during his life. That intellect must be truly obtuse that cannot see grounds of suspicion, and more than suspicion, in all this; and we will not affront the penetration of our readers, by overloading so plain a text with any further commentaries of our own.

["A French Ecclesiastic, after relating St. Dionysius's two miles' walk with his head in his hand, gravely observed, that the saint had found some difficulty in his first setting off. 'I can easily believe that,' replied a gentleman, who was present; 'for in such cases it is only the first step that costs any trouble.' So it was with Xavier's reputation as a worker of miracles: a little management was required for the first setting it on foot; but when such a persuasion was once introduced, no matter how, the rest of the process was sufficiently easy. We have seen that Melchior Nunhez bears witness, in the spring of 1554, to three particular miracles, declaring in general terms, that there were many more, of which an authenticated account would shortly be published. At the commencement of the year following, we have an epistle from Balthasar Diez, Rector of the Jesuits' College, in which we find the following passage:—'As for the death of our Father Francis, there were many persons in this city, who have been in his company in various places, and have seen him do, and heard him say, things among the infidels, evidently supernatural, and not inferior to those which we read of the ancient saints. Persons of great respectability came to me, demanding ["* Diversi Avvisi dall' Indie. Venice, 1565.

["† The catastrophe of these two dramas is not unworthy of notice. The pictures lost their faculty of winking when the French troops invaded the Papal dominions; and Prince Hohenlohe's miracles ceased all at once when the Magistrates of Bamberg forbade any more to be wrought, except in the presence of some skilful Physician.

["* There is an abstract of a letter from Balthasar Nunhez, professedly dated 1548, but not published till after Xavier's death, which says, that wonderful things are related which the Lord works by him, 'which it is not lawful to commit to a letter.'—Diversi Avvisi, fol. 61. This lame and vague, as well as suspicious, testimony, is the nearest approach to a contemporary evidence that I can meet with. Why it should be unlawful to tell things honourable to Xavier and the Catholic religion, supposing them to be true, I cannot imagine. There are many other epistles written by the saint's coadjutors during his life-time, describing his labours, commending his virtues, &c., &c., but totally silent on the chapter of 'miracles,' though dated from the very place where his most amazing miracles are said to have been wrought!!

why we did not institute an inquiry, and receive evidence of those things, in order that he might be canonized; but because this ought to be done by a person duly authorized, as well as for other considerations of propriety, I did not choose to be the promoter of such a step: ..... in due time, our Lord God will do what will be most for his own glory.' *

[" Here we find the same vague generalities as in brother Melchior's communication; and it is worthy of remark, that after a lapse of nine months, no attempt had been made to draw up a regularly authenticated account of the saint's exploits. It was the policy of the Jesuits to allow them to float some time longer at random on the wide ocean of popular report, with the full assurance that the number of them was more likely to be increased than diminished.

[" A little after this time, our witnesses seem to have become rather more communicative; for towards the end of the year, Antonio de Quadros, Provincial of the Jesuits in Ethiopia, is able to specify nine miracles, reported by good men and true, besides many sick persons healed, and many devils expelled from the bodies of possessed persons.† We shall examine several of those in the sequel, and then our readers will perhaps know what to think of the remainder.

[" The next step, and a very important one, was a letter from John III., King of Portugal, to his Viceroy Barreto, dated A. D. 1556, in which, after premising that he had heard of Xavier's actions, sanctity of morals, continual toils, persecutions, sufferings, &c., both during his life-time, and much more especially after his death, he directs Barreto to cause authentic accounts of all the miracles wrought by him, either alive or dead, to be drawn up and transmitted to Portugal the first opportunity. When a powerful Catholic King advertised publicly for miracles, in a colony filled with his own dependents, and with Jesuits who well knew of what inestimable value a saint of renown would prove to their rising order, as yet without a saint of any sort, we may be pretty sure that no pains would be spared to gratify his wishes, and that people would draw largely upon imagination, when memory was exhausted.

[" But though the foundation was thus happily laid and consolidated, the superstructure, for a long time, made little visible progress, and the next thirty years scarcely added any thing to the published catalogue of the saint's miracles. Emanuel Acosta, who brought out his account of the transactions in the East in 1571, deals somewhat more largely in general assertions, but adds nothing worth mentioning to the particulars previously communicated by Nunhez and Quadros; and it is observable that the annual epistles of the Jesuits,‡ who might have been supposed eager to communicate circumstantial accounts of their late associate's marvellous deeds, are singularly barren of information on this point. This reserve may be easily accounted for: if minute narratives of miracles, accompanied with all the circumstances of names, dates, and places, had been prematurely given to the world, persons still living might have been able to contradict them. However, the sons of Ignatius were far from being idle, but kept diligently, though silently, laying up magazines of prodigies, ready to be introduced when opportunity might serve.

[" The first detailed account we find of Xavier's proceedings, is in Maffeius's Historica Indica, published about 1588. In this we have a pretty complete outline of the saint's real history, but wofully deficient in those marvellous embellishments, which were afterwards added with so profuse a hand. He enumerates about a dozen circumstances which he affects to represent as miraculous, most of them of a very easy and equivocal description. If a violent storm cease, or a ship be got off a shoal, or a Portuguese Creole or Missionary recover from a fever, all is duly ascribed to the merits of Xavier. *

[" We have, indeed, a repetition of the old chorus, that he wrought many more prodigies, which the historian was in too great a hurry to relate; and so, by way of regaling his readers with the cream of the narrative, Maffeius gives them, not the most extraordinary and prominent particulars, but precisely the most equivocal and unimportant, such as in the more finished legends cut no figure at all, and are hardly equal to Prince Hohenlohe's exploits in the hospital at Bamberg.

[" All this time we hear nothing of King John III.'s authenticated reports, except that they were duly forwarded to Rome, where, for aught appearing to the contrary, they were locked up in the Pope's bureau, and lay undisturbed for upwards of thirty years. At the expiration of this period, the crop of miracles, of which the Jesuits had sown the seed so long before, began to show tokens of approaching maturity. In 1594, Tursellinus published at Rome a Life of Xavier, in four books; which is a wonderful improvement upon the meager narratives of his predecessors, particularly in the marvellous part of the story. He had access to King John's documents, and to all the information which the Society of Jesuits were then able to furnish; and, altogether, he contrived to make his hero into a saint of very decent dimensions. However, shortly after the publication of this important piece of biography, such abundance of new light flowed in upon him from various quarters, that, in 1596, he found it necessary to publish another Life, in six books, considerably enlarged and revised. In his address to the reader, after pithily remarking that second operations are generally the best, as well as second thoughts, he apologizes for the scantiness of his former narrative, which he attributes to the defective and confined nature of the King of Portugal's documents, in which it appears that, though the commissioners diligently collected every thing then known, many important matters had been totally omitted; and more especially the saint's memorable and illustrious deeds in China and Japan, had nearly all been involved in silence and obscurity. How grateful ought we to be to those [" * Diversi Avvisi, fol. 188.

[" † Idem, fol. 205, 210. One of those prodigies simply consists in Xavier's telling some of the brethren, that in the ensuing year, they would have bad news from Portugal. This is exactly in the style of an almanac prediction, and may be safely hazarded any given year, respecting any kingdom in Europe.

[" ‡ In an epistle dated January, 1558, Melchior Nunhez, then in Japan, gives several instances of Xavier's intrepidity and self-denial; and adds, 'This magnanimity and unconcern for life were so admired by the Japanese, that many of them still entertain a great opinion of his sanctity.' We might have expected him to add, 'This persuasion was greatly strengthened by such and such miracles which he wrought;' but of those we hear not one word; though, according to the full-grown legends, prodigious ones were wrought by him in Japan, seven or eight years before.

[" * We have an early instance, during Xavier's journey from Rome to Lisbon, of the rescue of a gentleman from drowning. This was effected, as Maffeius cautiously expresses it, 'by the pious intercession, as people affirm, of Xavier.' According to Bouhours, Xavier, with becoming modesty, disclaimed all sorts of merit in the matter, and attributed all to the prayers and merits of the Ambassador Mascarenhas! We Protestants are unenlightened enough to think that Divine Providence was quite able to accomplish such a thing without the help of either.

who so happily brought them to light, after an interment of almost fifty years, and thus enabled Tursellinus to devote two additional books to the honour of his hero!

[" By the above publications, and the persevering efforts of the Jesuits, the faithful were written and talked into such a persuasion of Xavier's sanctity, that in ten or twelve years regular steps were taken to get him canonized in due form. Philip III., King of Spain, kindly took him under his protection, and memorialized Pope Paul on the subject; who deputed a number of Cardinals, skilled in such matters, to make a due examination, and report accordingly. They therefore set about collecting information from Spain, Portugal, and the Indies, and examining witnesses at Rome; and, finally, after long deliberation, pronounced Xavier quite worthy of a seat in the celestial senate. We might suppose that this were enough to set the matter at rest; but a process of canonization is much more tedious than a Chancery-suit, and more expensive than a contested county election; and when Kings and Emperors are the petitioners, the good people at Rome understand their business too well to let them off as cheaply as plebeians.*

[" Paul V. got no farther than beatifying the candidate, a step which puts him indeed out of all danger of purgatory, but gives him no particular power or influence in heaven; and the ulterior proceedings were spun out till the Pope and King of Spain were both dead. When Philip IV. came to the throne, he lost no time in beseeching Gregory XV. to expedite an affair which he had greatly at heart; and he was powerfully seconded by the joint intercession of many other Princes and Prelates, and of the whole Clergy of India. Gregory, proceeding warily in a matter of so great weight, ordered the whole affair to be rigidly re-examined by a congregation of his Cardinals; for why should not Philip IV. have the gratification of contributing some of his superfluous treasure towards promoting the exaltation of Xavier, and improving the revenues of the Court of Rome? His officers having made their examination, and reported progress, a formal motion was made in a public Consistory, to have the matter brought to an issue. The cautious Gregory made answer, that 'he would consult the matter once more, with all the Cardinals and Bishops of the Roman Court;' and accordingly, Consistories, public, half-public, and secret, were held in abundance, with the detail of which we shall not trouble our readers, but shall hasten at once to the dénouement of the drama.* When all preliminary conditions had been duly complied with, the ceremonies of canonization were performed in a most splendid manner in St. Peter's church at Rome, on the 12th day of March, 1622; and thus, after seventy years' toil and anxiety, the affair was brought to the desired termination.

'Tantæ molis erat Romanum condere Sanctum!'

[" At the same time was canonized the great father of the Society, Ignatius Loyola, nearly sixty-six years after his death. We do not learn that the bells of Madrid rung that day of their own accord, like those of Lisbon on the apotheosis of St. Anthony of Padua; but, to make amends for this, the Jesuits hailed those glorious events with a joy almost frantic; and it would occupy a volume to give an abridged account of the processions which they made, and the pageants which they exhibited, and the sermons which they preached; some, as absurd as if they had been written to burlesque the whole proceeding. Gregory XV. dying soon after, the Bull of Xavier's canonization was published by his successor, Urban VIII.

[" This document, and the Life by Tursellinus, have served as the basis of the subsequent narratives by Garcia, Lucena, Bouhours, Alban Butler, and others: some of them more, and some less, extravagant and fabulous; but all of them bearing much the same proportion to any contemporary account of him, as Turpin's or Ariosto's grotesque caricature of Charlemagne does to the simple and unadorned portrait of the faithful Eginhard." †]

[" * Dr. Milner, by way of proving the trust-worthiness of those Roman saint-makers, tells us that 'so far from being precipitate, it employs them whole years, to come to a decision on a few cases, respecting each saint.'—End of Controversy.

[" He might have added, that the slowness of the process is in the exact ratio of the wealth and rank of the suitors; and that at every postponement or revision of it, the Dataries, Notaries, Secretaries, Auditors, et hoc genus omne, require ample fees by way of refreshers. The discussions respecting the sanctity of Maria a Jesu de Agreda were spun out for nearly eighty years, during the pontificate of nine different Popes. They cost the King of Spain, who made a state affair of it, as much as would have equipped several large fleets and armies, and came to nothing at last!

[" In looking over the Roman martyrology, it is impossible not to be struck with the prodigious number of saints promoted by John XXII.; and when we consider that he publicly taught that there was no beatific vision till after the general resurrection, we may think it extremely preposterous that he should make any saints at all. But when we learn that twenty-five millions of florins were found in his coffers at his decease, we must confess, in that felicitous phrase with which Mr. Charles Butler smooths over the 'fantastic claims' of the Popes to universal monarchy, that worldly wisdom cannot condemn him. The fees of all sorts have been considerably raised since the days of Pope John, and were so exorbitant in the seventeenth century, that a relation of Cardinal Borromeo, a saint of Paul V.'s manufacture, pathetically entreated his children, that they would content themselves with being honest men, and never think of becoming saints; as the canonization of their cousin had proved a most ruinous concern, and his rage for working miracles, instead of being any benefit to his kindred, had well-nigh reduced them all to beggary.

[" * The happy fruits of this redoubled diligence may be seen in Tursellinus's third Life of the saint. He found, good man! that his curæ posteriores, or 'second operations,' had still left the matter short; and so he now comes out with another edition, augmented with a lengthy 'Appendix of Miracles from the Report made in the secret Consistory before Gregory XV.,' and, therefore, doubtless, worthy of all acceptation and belief. A careful comparison of the three Lives will be found very instructive to those who have curiosity and leisure enough to make it.

[† The Protestant Guardian, vol. i., pp. 69, et seq.

[" We have nothing to do," the Rev. Joseph Mendham justly observes, " with the personal character of the propagators of the heresies under consideration. Whether their apparent piety may be real or null, how far, and in what manner, the sound part of their doctrine may be affected or not by the unsound, is the province of the Searcher of hearts to determine. The enemy of human souls is sagacious and careful enough not to injure his cause by the choice of discreditable and repulsive instruments. For common and the best use we are concerned, not with the formal but the material, not with the form but with the substance. The person, if saved, is saved as by fire. Various professed Papists possessed some qualities apparently religious; but of the man who scatters bread with one hand, and poison with the other, it is difficult, if not impossible, to form a correct estimate; and we might reverence even the adulterated devotion of a Xavier, if we did not know that by his particular and earnest entreaty to the King of Portugal, the Inquisition was introduced into Goa. (See Aphorismi Inquis., &c., ab Ant. de Sousa, p. 31, and Sacchini Hist. Soc. Jesu, pars ii., lib. i., sect. 151.) I refer," proceeds Mr. Mendham, " precisely to these authorities for so important a fact, because the first has been strangely disfigured. Poor Xavier might well pray to be preserved from his friends; for they have so encrusted him with successive miracles, as the opportunity of detection receded, that were he to revisit this world, he would not know himself as his biographers have caricatured him; and if he did, I trust he would be ashamed. New Papal temples in Great Britain have been dedicated to this manufactured saint, whose patronage of the Inquisition would strongly recommend him to a Church which, if she had the power, would establish it in that country, according to the well-known proposal of Father Parsons, in his Memorial for the Reformation of England. It may be as well to give the account of [Dr. Southey remarks, "that the miracles of the Papal Church are indeed foretold in Scripture by the Apostle, when he forewarned us of 'that wicked one, whose Sousa more minutely. In the place cited he writes, that the Judaic perfidy prevailed in the parts of the East Indies subject to Portugal, which was attested by Xavier in a letter addressed to John III., King of Portugal, dated November 10th, 1545, in which he earnestly requested the King, that, for the remedy of such perfidy, he would see that the Inquisition should be established in that kingdom: Instanter ab eodem Rege postulabat, ut in tantæ perfidiæ remedium Inquisitionis officium in illam regionem mittendum curaret. This was done in 1560; the Inquisition was established at Goa, and our author gives the first three inquisitions. Sacchini, as referred to under the year 1557, shortly attests the same fact, but with no mention of Xavier or his letter. It is remarkable, that in four books of the letters of this saint by Tursellinus, between the dates of 1542 and 1552, this interesting letter does not appear. In a rodomontade Life of Xavier by Bouhours, to the English translation of which Dryden gave his mercenary name, at the beginning of the third book in the Dublin edition, p. 81, we have a garbled letter of the saint to the King of Portugal, which I doubt not is the same, although the next date after in the volume is March, 1545. There is given in the extracts a good deal of what would be good advice in a good cause, but nothing transpires of the Inquisition! However, the matter was so well negotiated by the bearer of the letter, pursuant to the instructions of Father Xavier, that the King sent orders 'in a manner the same which the Father had desired.' These orders contained, that 'no toleration should be granted for the superstitions of the infidels in the isle of Goa, nor in that of Salseta,' &c. Here is no mention of the Inquisition; and yet no doubt something was said about it. I wonder that Mr. Hough, in his valuable History of Christianity in India, in the lengthened detail which he has inserted of the performances of Xavier, had made no mention of this important and characteristic fact. It has been the custom of some Christians, in the plenitude of their charity, to talk of some estimable Romanists in far too wholesale a manner; allowing, indeed, that their peculiar religion should be a little abatement. To dismiss Xavier, who must have taught his own religion, assisted by means not very distant from the Inquisition which he sought, though he did not live to hail its advent, how often do we hear the high praises of the profound Pascal, without a word about his intolerance towards the Protestants, who are out of the bounds of charity, he says, because out of the bounds of unity; or about the censure passed upon him, not only by his own Church, (which might be esteemed an honour, as it truly was,) but by the seraphic Fenelon himself, who warned a correspondent against the 'hidden poison' of his Provincial Letters. (C. Butler's Hist. Mem. of the English Catholics, vol. iii., p. 251. Third edit. London, 1822.) Then there is Fenelon, exalted to the skies, with no notice, if knowledge, of his official pandering to the Papal jubilee, and fixing the price for the purchase of its blessings;—his letter to the Bishop of Arras against the free circulation of the Scriptures, translated into Italian and English as the most effectual antidote to the labours of the Bible Society;—he, likewise, to his honour, certainly, condemned by his own Church, and by Bossuet. The amiable Flechier comes in for his share of the vague charity of some Protestants, who think little of his peculiar faith, and know less of the persecuting part which he actively took against the misguided Camisards. See the excellent Histoire des Troubles des Cevennes, &c., par M. Court, Alais, 1819, where the letters of the Bishop of Nismes are copiously referred to, and particularly at the beginning of the second volume, his Pastoral Letter, which turns all upon that subject, is given nearly at length with suitable notes. The Bishop's Mandemens et Lettres Pastorales, where it is found entire, were first published at Paris in 1712. In the complete edition of his Works in 1782, where his correspondence with Baville, Intendant of Languedoc, was promised, the Preface of the last volume announces, that there were des raisons supérieures for omitting it. Some will even stand up for the inflated episcopal courtier and persecutor Bossuet, after having solemnly asserted a Papal approbation of his exposition, when he well knew that the very term was evaded, and that it was necessary for him to supply it in the French translation; after saying of the worship of the Virgin, 'We only pray to her to pray for us;' and after hypocritically declaring, that the conversions on the revocation of the Edict of Nantes were effected without force. True, the douceurs for conversion out of the national fund were of a different quality; but the booted Apostles were found necessary to complete the work; and they well proved that Papal charity can exercise, when occasion requires, a wholesome mordacity. In reference to the individuals mentioned before the last, it may be alleged, in extenuation of the faults specified, that they were the faults of their religion; and it is true,—their perverse faith, or, as peculiar, their superstition, in the degree in which it prevailed, poisoned and blasted, not only what was spiritual in them, but even the coming is after the working of Satan, with all power and signs and lying wonders;' (2 Thess. ii. 8, 9;) and by our Lord and Saviour, when he said to his disciples, 'that there shall arise false Christs and false prophets, and shall show great signs and wonders, insomuch that, if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect.' (Matt. xxiv. 24; Mark xiii. 22.) If it were necessary to admit that the succession of the Romish miracles is proved, then upon bringing 'to the law and to the testimony' the doctrines and practices which they must have been performed to confirm and approve,* this would be the true and sufficient explanation. This, however, is not a knot which cannot be unloosed without the devil's interposition. There was no occasion why he should work real prodigies to extend a system of delusion, when false ones were represented every where with complete success, to the same end, even when not with the same direct intent.

["If it be impossible to determine at what time those miracles ceased which were necessary for the first propagation of Christianity, it is certain that whenever they ceased, there were many persons who continued to expect them, and that there must have been others who pretended to possess a power which might so easily be rendered gainful. At the very beginning there were false brethren. We see in our own days continual examples that, however obscure and despised a sect may be, there are always people who find their interest in joining it. Such worldly motives were as little wanting then as now; nor was there any danger in this: for the professors who made a trade of their religion in safe seasons, could always in time of persecution secure themselves by renouncing it. Some of these unworthy men may have been in a state of half-belief, like Simon when he would have purchased the apostolic power; and sometimes it must have happened that they became the dupes of their own success. The knave as well as the enthusiast is liable to this consequence; and this is one process whereby that compound of roguery and fanaticism is produced, of which so many instances may be called to mind.

["It is not necessary to suppose any unusual proportion either of craft or credulity in the first centuries for understanding wherefore a very general delusion concerning this matter should have prevailed: men were prepared for it by all existing systems and opinions. The very fables which were held for facts in natural history were so marvellous, that nothing could appear incredible to those who received them; and they were received even by the learned and the wise. Without entering into the question whether the illusions of heathen superstition may be explained wholly by human artifice, or must sometimes be ascribed to the agency of evil spirits, it is less corrupted remains of simple nature."—Modern Evasions of Christianity: a Sermon, by the Rev. Joseph Mendham, M. A., pp. 20—22. 8vo. London, 1840.]

["* 'We shall find them,' says Middleton, 'always the most numerous, and the most confidently attested, in proportion to the absurdity of the doctrine, or practice, in whose favour they are alleged: as in the case of transubstantiation, purgatory, the worship of images, relics, crucifixes, indulgences, and all the tricks of monkery; as if miracles were of no other use but to subvert the reason and senses of mankind, and confound all the distinctions between right and wrong. But if there be any rule of judging of their reality, or any power in man to discern truth from falsehood, we must necessarily conclude from the nature and end of the Popish miracles, that whatever testimonies may be brought to support them, they were all, without exception, either wrought by wicked spirits, or forged by wicked men.'—Prefatory Discourse to the Letter from Rome Misc. Works, vol. v., p. 74. Edit. 1755.

certain that the Heathens believed miracles were performed by their deities; the primitive Christians admitted that such wonders were wrought, but imputed them to the devil; and thus the converts brought with them a habit of credulity, which was changed only in its direction. They expected no more from the martyrs than they used to expect from the demigods; and it would have been strange indeed if they should have rejected as incredible such tales of their living teachers as they found recorded by the gravest and best historians of the Emperor Vespasian.

[" It has sometimes been said concerning the Romish miracles, that of such relations some are miraculous but not true, and the others true but not miraculous. This, however, ought to be observed, that in the latter division there are many which must have seemed miraculous to all the parties concerned. And here it may suffice, without noticing other natural phenomena, to instance only those effects, whether sanative or injurious, which the mind when deeply excited is capable of producing upon the body. I do not doubt that in this manner bodily diseases have frequently been cured, and more frequently for a time suspended. And this has taken place not in the Romish Church alone, but in all other religious communities where such curative means have been practised, Mahommedan and Heathen as well as Christian, the effects which seem and are believed to be prodigious being merely natural. Whether such effects are produced by faith in a saint or in a quack, by relics or tractors, by exorcism or animal magnetism, the same principle in human nature is appealed to, the same unconscious power is put in action. I have no more difficulty therefore in crediting the cases of this description, than in believing the cures which Valentine Gretrakes * and his predecessor Coker are said to have performed, or those which are recorded as having been effected by the royal touch." †]

3. Some of the miracles said to be performed by the Church of Rome are false and lying, having been invented by the worst of men.

[As frequent reference has been and will be made to the Roman Breviary, it is necessary that our readers should be acquainted with the authority and importance of that singular document. " No person who has trod the mazes of Popish controversy can fail to perceive a marked difference between the tone of those Romish Divines who speak dogmatically for the instruction or edification of the members of their own communion, and that of those who attempt to answer the objections and repel the accusations of their polemical antagonists. With the former, all is matter of downright certainty; with the latter, all is doubt, difficulty, subterfuge, and evasion. When the faithful are to be instructed, every ordinary Priest or Monk becomes the sure depositary of the infallible decisions of an infallible Church; but when Protestant controvertists are to be confuted, the declarations of the most illustrious men, or bodies of men, are found to be of no authority whatever. Councils are discovered to have been only partly approved, or to have died a natural death: Popes did not speak ex cathedra, Cardinals and Bishops are only private Doctors,—and who cares for the opinion of an obscure Priest or Friar? Thus nothing is so difficult as to know what the belief of Roman Catholics really is, or at least what they will choose to acknowledge as such; and when the Protestant animadverts upon the doctrines and practices of their Church, countenanced and recommended, as he thinks, by the most competent authorities, he is immediately accused of being a misinterpreter, and gravely told that he has all along been fighting with a phantom of his own creation. There is, however, one class of authorities to which we may appeal without fear of exception or contradiction; namely, the publicly accredited devotions of the Romish Church, as set forth in her Missals, Breviaries, Rituals, and Pontificals. The most hardened controvertist will scarcely venture to assert, that there is any thing repugnant to the faith and practice of Roman Catholics in compositions, solemnly sanctioned by their spiritual rulers, and received with implicit submission by every member of their communion, especially if he acknowledge the truth of Bellarmine's declaration, that 'the Universal Church (that is, as the phrase signifies in his vocabulary, the Church of Rome) cannot err, either in faith or practice, especially in ceremonies and divine worship.' *

[" Of the above-mentioned compositions, the most important are the Breviary and the Missal; the former of which we may define as being the Book of Common-Prayer of the Roman Catholic Clergy, and the latter, the Romish order of administering the sacrament of the Lord's supper. Our present business being with the Breviary, as reformed according to the direction of the Council of Trent, we shall wave all inquiries into its supposed origin under Gelasius I., and enlargement by Gregory the Great, respecting which much has been said, and little is known; as well as into the alterations which were made in it under Gregory VII., Gregory IX., and Nicholas III., which last-mentioned Pontiff brought it nearly into the form in which it existed at the period of the Reformation. This ancient Roman Breviary was such a mass of absurdity and falsehood, that after the revival of letters in the sixteenth century, almost every man of sense and learning was ashamed of it, and many urgent requests were made to the Fathers of the Council of Trent, that they would purge away this disgrace, and give the Breviary, and other offices of the Church, a thorough reform. Some time indeed before this period, Clement VII. had directed Cardinal Quignon to compile a new experimental Breviary, the first edition of which was published in 1536, under the auspices of Paul III.; and it was afterwards successively approved by Julius III., Paul IV., and the King of France. This Cardinal, who was a man of learning, candour, and piety, and fully alive to the defects of the Breviary then in use, treated it with no unsparing hand. He omitted most of the versicles and responses, discarded the office of the Blessed Virgin Mary in toto, cut off a considerable portion of the proper lessons for saints' festivals, substituting lessons from Scripture in their stead, and, in short, drew up a Breviary in form and matter not very unlike our English Liturgy. Though applauded by many distinguished individuals, and even used by some of the Clergy in the place of the old one, it was never formally received by the Church, but continued, like some of Bellarmine's Councils, 'neither approved nor disapproved,' until the pontificate of Pius V. The Council of Trent, having left the whole business of correcting the holy offices to the Roman Pontiff, in spite of the opposition of the French and Spanish Divines, Pius V. commissioned Francis Forero, a Portuguese theologian, Leonardo Marino, Archbishop of Lanciano, and Egidio Foscari, Bishop of Modena, to execute this important undertaking. The first edition of their reformed Breviary was published in 1568, prefaced by the Bull, commonly called 'Quod a nobis,' in which the Pope, after praising the care and accuracy of his correctors, declaring, among other things, that they had 'discarded every thing unsuitable and uncertain,' proceeds to forbid Cardinal Quignon's Breviary, and all others which could not plead a prescription of two hundred years, to enforce the use of the reformed one under the usual canonical penalties, and to prohibit all departures from it, under pain of excommunication. It continued in general use until the time of Clement VIII., who seems to have discovered that Pius's boast of having discarded every thing unsuitable and uncertain, was not quite correct. He therefore, in spite of the penalties denounced by his predecessor against all who should presume to add to, diminish from, or otherwise change, his Breviary, set a fresh committee of correctors to work upon it; but in order to save appearances, in his Bull 'Cum in Ecclesia,' dated May, 1602, he lays all the blame of the gross errors by which it was disfigured upon the poor printers, and asserts most falsely, that his correctors were only commissioned to restore it to the state of purity, in which Pius V. first gave it to the Church. This doubly-refined composition continued in force nearly thirty years, when Urban VIII., who was an amateur poet himself, and by no means destitute of skill in the mechanical branch of the art, being offended, as every man of taste long had been, with the barbarous hymns used in the ecclesiastical offices, nearly all of which were evidently the work of the darkest ages, undertook a third revision of the Breviary, the first edition of which was published in 1631. Though the reformation of the poetry was his great object, he occasionally contributed a little towards the amendment of the prose, especially of the rubrics and homilies; and in some few instances undid what Clement VIII. had done by way of improving upon the labours of Pius V. This is the Breviary now generally used by Roman Catholics, no alteration having taken place in it since the time of Urban, except the insertion of additional services for a few saints, who have since been canonized, or have had offices allotted to them.

["* For an account of this person, see Henry More's Brief Discourses of Enthusiasm, sect. viii., with the Scholia thereon."]

[† Southey's Vindiciæ Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ, pp. 125—129. London, 1826.]

[" * Bellarm. Opera, tom. i., De Verbo Dei, lib. iv., cap. ix., col 193, B. Coloniæ, 1620.

[" 'The value,' observes Mr. Blanco White, in his inestimable Practical and Internal Evidence against Catholicism, 'which the Church of Rome sets upon the Breviary, may be known from the strictness with which she demands the perusal of it. Whoever enjoys any ecclesiastical revenue; all persons of both sexes who have professed in any of the regular orders; all Sub-Deacons, Deacons, and Priests; are bound to repeat, either in public or private, the whole service of the day out of the Breviary. The omission of any one of the eight portions of which that service consists, is declared to be a mortal sin; that is, a sin that, unrepented, would be sufficient to exclude from salvation. The person guilty of such an omission loses all legal right to whatever portion of his clerical emoluments is due for the day or days wherein he neglected that duty, and cannot be absolved till he has given the forfeited sums to the poor; or, in Spain, redeemed the greatest part by a certain donation to the crusade.....The Breviary, therefore, must be reckoned the true standard to which the Church of Rome wishes to reduce the minds and hearts of her Clergy, from the highest Dignitary to the most obscure Priest. It is in the Breviary that we may be sure to find the full extent of the pious belief, to which she trains the Pastors of her flock; and the true stamp of those virtues which she boasts of in her models of Christian perfection. By making the daily repetition of the Breviary a paramount duty of the Clergy, Rome evidently gives it the preference over all other works; and as far as she is concerned, provided the appointed Teachers of her laity read her own book, they may trouble themselves very little about others. Nay, should a Roman Catholic Clergyman, as is often the case, be unable to devote more than an hour and a half a day to reading, his Church places him under the necessity of deriving his whole knowledge from the Breviary.' "*]

The liquefaction of the blood of St. Januarius is received as a true miracle by the Church of Rome, because it is gravely narrated and professed to be such in the Breviary on the 19th of September.† The story in the Breviary is, that Januarius and others were put to death in a cruel manner by Timotheus, the President of Campania. "Each of the neighbouring cities selected one of these saints as their patron, and took care to bury their bodies. The Neapolitans, by divine instruction, took away the body of Januarius, and at first brought it to Beneventum, then to the Monastery of the Virgin; lastly, it was brought to the city of Naples, and placed in the great church, and was distinguished by many miracles. It is particularly to be remembered that it extinguished the globes of fire which broke forth from Vesuvius, which threatened ruin on the places not only near but far off. This also is notable, that his blood, which was preserved by being collected in a glass vial, when brought into the presence of the martyr's body, liquefies and bubbles in a wonderful manner, just as if recently shed, which is also seen to this day." Thus far the Breviary.

The following is an account of the liquefaction of the blood of St. Januarius, as described by a traveller in 1825: —"I was present at Naples in 1825, at the performance of the reputed miracle of St. Januarius's blood. It was exhibited for three days, and on the last, I think, the blood was reported liquefied, and the bells rang in honour of it. On entering the church, my friends and myself penetrated a mass of many hundred of the lower orders; and on arriving at the low balustrade, which separates the chapel of Januarius from the church, we were admitted. This chapel, which was richly ornamented, hung with silks, and lighted with many wax candles, was thronged with well-dressed people. A shrine was brought in with a procession, and from it a silver bust of the natural size produced. This bust, said to contain the saint's head, was placed on the altar, dressed with robes and mitre; and the service began. After a little time the precious blood was brought in. It is contained in a crystal vase of the form of a compressed globe, about four inches in diameter, and the cavity within seemed to be about two. This vase is set in a broad rim, having two large handles, and looks very much like an old-fashioned circular coach lamp. The (supposed) blood was presented to the head of the saint, and then to the people, the Priest holding the vase by its handles, at arms' length, and gently turning it, while an assistant held a taper between the Priest's body and the vase. As the flame came immediately behind the cavity, it showed whether the clot of matter on one side liquefied and moved round, or remained adhering to the side of the cavity. When I saw it, it did not move. During the exhibition, the service continued with incense and music. The Priest slowly passed along the line of beholders, giving each individual time to ascertain if the liquefaction had taken place. They occupied themselves in cries and prayers; and when some time had elapsed, the lower orders along the balustrade, and those behind them in the church, became very vociferous, crying out aloud (and at last even furiously) on the saint, in tones of entreaty, anger, and despair. After the wailing had continued for some time, the service terminated, and the blood was borne away, the saint unrobed, and carried off in his shrine, and the candles extinguished; but it was long ere the sobs of the women died away, and one old Countess, who was near me the whole time, had continued hysterically weeping and shrieking so long, that she was too much exhausted to retire without assistance." *

[* The Protestant Guardian, conducted by Clergymen of the Church of England, vol. i., p. 7, et seq. London, 1828.]

† Brev. Rom., Pars Autumnalis, die xix. Septembris, tom. iv., p. 439, et seq. Mechlin., 1836.

In the Offices of Patron Saints, (Officia Sanctorum Patronorum,) which are recited in the diocess of Naples, it is stated, "St. Januarius, an illustrious Bishop and Martyr, extinguished the violence of fire, stopped the mouths of wild beasts; and being put to death with the sword, received the crown of (his) lawful conflict. Alleluia." The following prayer is used:—

"PRAYER.—O God, who, in the translation of thy martyr and Pontiff, Januarius, hast enriched us with the precious pledge of thine aid, we beseech thee, through his intercession, to deliver thy people from all dangers; and that, out of thy treasures, thou wouldst graciously pour upon us the treasures of ineffable mercy, through," &c.

The sixth lesson in this office is subjoined on account of the profane parallel between the blood of Christ and that of a frail mortal. "The devil saw that blood, and trembled with horror; for he remembered that other blood—the Lord's. In consequence of that blood this flows. For from the time that the Lord's side was opened, you beheld six hundred sides opened. For who would not, with the utmost alacrity of joy, gird himself to enter those lists, as being (thereby) about to share in the sufferings of the Lord, and become conformed to the death of Christ? For it is a sufficient retribution, and a more abundant compensation, and a reward exceeding the labours of the contest, even as it is enjoyed before we gain an entrance into the kingdom of heaven." †

Although the Church of Rome has officially received this as a true miracle, her members are divided on the subject. Dr. Weedall, formerly President of the Popish College at Oscott, near Birmingham, professes to have derived both "edification and consolation," on witnessing the liquefaction. Mr. Eustace, in his Classical Tour, thus speaks of the blood of St. Januarius: "His supposed blood is kept in a vial in the tesoro, (treasury,) and is considered as the most valuable of its deposits; and, indeed, as the glory and the ornament of the cathedral and of the city itself. Into the truth of the supposition little inquiry is made; and in this respect the Neapolitans seem to have adopted the maxim of the ancient Germans, Sanctius ac reverentius de Diis credere quam scire." * In a note to a subsequent edition, he adds: "The author has been accused of a want of candour, in not having expressed in a more explicit manner his opinion of the miracle alluded to. Few readers, he conceives, will be at a loss to discover it; but if a more open declaration can give any satisfaction, he now declares, that he does not believe the liquefying substance to be the blood of St. Januarius." Here are two distinguished Romanists who entertain opposite sentiments respecting this pseudo miracle, though pronounced to be true by the official recognition of the Church of Rome in her authorized Breviary.

When General Champion, on the invasion of Naples by the French republicans, entered Italy, with his enbosed enfans de la patrie, his curiosity, or rather his infidelity, prompted him, according to Michele's statement, to direct the Priests forthwith to perform the ceremony before him and his companions. The Priests humbly represented to the General the impossibility of complying with this command, without the presence of some of the saint's relatives. The General replied, "The miracle must be exhibited this instant, or else I will smash your vials and all your nonsense into a thousand pieces." To avoid the execution of the menace, the Priests attempted to work the miracle, and failed. Nothing therefore remained to be done but to send for some of the relatives of Januarius, on whose arrival, as the story goes, the miracle succeeded.†

In an official and authorized Roman Catholic publication, printed in 1831, we are told that not less than twenty-six pictures of the Virgin Mary opened and shut their eyes at Rome during the years 1796 and 1797, which was supposed to be an indication of her peculiar favour to the inhabitants of that city for the opposition which they presented to the French. Among the sub-

[* "The trick is so gross, that there is not a Priest, or a man of common sense at Naples, that is not convinced, that the red clot is a certain composition, which melts with a very little heat—the heat that the hands of a Priest, and a crowded church, will produce. Sometimes it is a longer period in being brought about, and the populace, for whom the juggle is performed, are in a state of great fear and discontent. On one of these occasions, an excellent friend of mine, an English officer, was near the Priests; but the melting being delayed, he was advised by one of them to retire, for the mob would have torn him to pieces, from a notion that the miracle was delayed on account of his being a Protestant. When the French, during the Revolution war, were in possession of Naples, the Priests wished to raise a tumult against them, and on the day of St. Januarius the blood would not melt. The mob were ready to take up arms, when the French General sent word to the Archbishop, that if the miracle was not performed instantly, he would play the artillery upon his palace. This broad hint had its desired effect: the blood began to drop, and all was quiet."—Blanco White's Poor Man's Preservative against Popery, second edition, p. 90. London, 1826.]

[† "Beatus Januarius, Præsul et Martyr inclytus, extinxit impetum ignis, obturavit ora ferarum, et in occisione gladii pro Christo mortuus, legitimi certaminis coronam accepit. Alleluia.

["Oratio.—Deus, qui in translatione B. Januarii, Martyris tui atque Pontificis, pretioso nos præsidii tui pignore locupletasti; quæsumus, ut, ipso intercedente, populum tuum ab omnibus periculis eruas, ac de thesauris tuis divitias in nos ineffabilis misericordiæ benignus effundas. Per, &c.

["Vidit hunc sanguinem, horruitque diabolus, recordatus est quippe alterius sanguinis Dominici. Propter illum sanguinem, hic effluxit. Ex quo enim Domini latus apertum est, sexcenta deinde latera effossa contueris. Quis enim non summa cum alacritate gaudiorum, sese ad agones istos ineundos, Dominicis passionibus communicaturus, et Christi morti conformis futurus, accinget? Est enim sufficiens hæc retributio, et amplior merces, et quod certamina excedit præmium, vel illud etiam quod ante ingressum in cœlorum regnum consequimur."—Officia Sanctorum Patronorum, quæ recitanda sunt in Civitate et Diocesi Neapolitana. Neapoli, 1721. Ex Typographia Abatiana.]

* A Classical Tour through Italy in 1802. By the Rev. John Chetwode Eustace, vol. ii., pp. 337, 338, sixth edition. London, 1821.

[† "In the vicinity of Naples there are a few individuals, common peasants, whose genealogy is deduced without interruption from the saint himself, or his contemporary relations, and who, therefore, are considered as having Januarian blood flowing in their veins. It is, of course, extremely natural, that without the presence, at least, of one of these descendants of the family of the holy Martyr, the miracle will not take place; and that it succeeds the more speedily in proportion to the number of Januar*ides* that can be assembled to assist at the ceremony."—Naples and the Campagna Felice, pp. 256—258. 8vo. London, 1815.]

scribers to this work are the four Archbishops and eleven Bishops of Ireland.

["An officer in the British army described to me," says Mr. Hughes, "an extraordinary scene which he witnessed in Messina in 1811, occasioned by a picture of the Virgin, in a church much venerated by the populace. An inhabitant going in, according to custom, to offer up his adoration to the Madonna, suddenly ran out again, exclaiming, 'that the Virgin was weeping for calamity impending over the city.' The people rushed in crowds to the church; when, lo! to their astonishment and dismay, the tears were, as reported, trickling over the cheeks of their beloved Patroness; upon which the whole multitude began to weep, and howl, and beat their breasts, expecting nothing less than an earthquake, or a French invasion. At length one, more acute than the rest, observing that some water was passing through the roof of the church, and dripping upon the canvas, pointed out the circumstance; but he nearly fell a victim to his want of judgment, for the people were determined to have a miracle; nor could they be persuaded to disperse, till the Archbishop, a venerable old man, mounted a ladder, and wiped the lady's eyes with a napkin; after this, he drew the picture into a more perpendicular situation, telling his audience, that, as the cause was luckily removed, THEIR PATRONESS had promised to weep no more." *

["The Rev. James Richardson, in his Answer to Priest Baddeley, notices the miraculous events, as they are called, which are said to have occurred at Rome in the years 1796 and 1797; 'when the pictures of the Virgin, on canvas or on wood, and kept in churches, in the streets, or in private houses, are affirmed to have moved their eyes, and looked about them, sometimes toward heaven, and at others casting a look of tenderness upon a prostrate multitude of devout worshippers.' Of the many cases there recorded, I extract one or two, as a proof that I am not libelling Popery or the Papist. I select a picture of the BLESSED VIRGIN MARY OF MOUNT CARMEL, placed in the interior chapel of St. Martin di Monti. The painting is in oil-colours, on wood; it is about four feet and a half in height, and serves as the altar-piece in the interior chapel of the Novitiate. The Virgin is painted sitting, with the infant Jesus in her arms, in the act of presenting the scapular to St. Simon Stoch, General of the Carmelites. The miracle began on the 12th of July, during the Novena of Mount Carmel. Almost the whole of the community witnessed the miracle. 'They all beheld the eyelids, which before were nearly closed, wide open, and the ball of the eye entirely visible; they afterwards closed together, not unlike the natural eye of a living person. Whilst the eyelids remained opened, the pupils were observed to pass from one side to the other, and to give such expressive, such sentimental, looks, that a general cry of acclamation filled the church, and tears of joy were seen running down the cheeks of every spectator. These changes were rather quick, they were repeated three or four times in about two minutes. THE BLESSED VIRGIN so graciously corresponded with the desires and prayers of the assistant, that, to see THE PRODIGY RENEWED, NOTHING MORE WAS NECESSARY THAN TO INVOKE HER UNDER THE TITLE OF MOTHER OF MOUNT CARMEL.'†

[* Hughes's Travels, vol. i., p. 125. 4to. London, 1820.

[" † Official Memoirs, &c., of Miraculous Events, first published in Italian, then in French, and translated into English by the Rev. B. Rayment, p. 103."]

The translator of this precious piece of superstition, Priest Rayment, tells us, that he considers himself amply compensated, if by making known these stupendous prodigies, &c., he may prove an instrument under God, in promoting his honour, and that respect and confidence due to their blessed Patroness his Virgin Mother; verifying at the same time the prediction of that blessed lady. 'My soul doth magnify the Lord.' (Luke i. 46.) The original author, Marchetti, says, 'That it was a most edifying spectacle, to see the lively and simple faith of these good Christians, who, as soon as the miracle ceased, would begin to invoke the most tender of Mothers in these terms,—MOST HOLY MOTHER, permit us to see the prodigy once; and the Virgin, full of goodness and condescension, would hear their prayers, and grant them this consolation, by again opening and shutting her eyes!!'"*]

We proceed to illustrate this subject farther by one of the most strange specimens of religious imposture of which the world ever heard. We allude to the "Life of Veronica," of Milan.† The following is an extract:—"Veronica, who excelled in patience so, that to offend her always gave a new title to her love, had that grace exercised in her by extraordinary trials, but chiefly by the cruel war she was engaged in with the devil, whom she called by the fantastical name of Malatasca. This war lasted three long years, with very short cessations; and though in the end Veronica was victorious, yet she was so mauled and bruised, in several battles, that she had certainly died of her wounds, if she had not been taken up into heaven and cured of them there. This happened frequently; and when Veronica was missing in the convent, it was commonly said she was gone to heaven to her surgeon."‡ Take another extract: "In the year 1494 Veronica was sent Ambassador from heaven to the Pope (Alexander VI.). But it was full a twelvemonth before her spouse, Christ, would let her know that it was to the Pope she was to go. He only told her she was to go to a very far region, on purpose to raise her curiosity, or to teaze her a little, as lovers are used to do now and then to one another. At the year's end he told her she must hasten away, but did not say whither. Veronica guessed it was to Rome; nor was she mistaken, for their hearts had spoken to each other. Her spouse bade her take along with her Thaddæa, § a Nun, whom he recommended to her for a confidant of all her secrets. When they were come to Rome, the Pope, through the secret influence of heaven, gave her audience as soon as she asked it, to the amazement of the whole court. She threw herself at His Holiness's feet, and kissed them, and then privately delivered her message. His Holiness received her with the greatest civility, because he perceived she was a most holy woman. She obtained OF HIM a full remission of sins for her convent, and after eight days departed from Rome, where she had been resorted to by people of all conditions,

[* Gilly's Narrative of an Excursion to the Mountains of Piedmont, &c., p. 258. 4to. London, 1824.]

[† The "Life of Veronica, of Milan, certified by the heads of the University of Conimbra, in Portugal, to be revised by angels, and approved of by God; begun to be translated by Dr. Geddes, and finished by Mr. Ozell." 8vo. London, 1716. The original of this horrid trash is preserved in the Archiepiscopal library at Lambeth. It was also printed at Lisbon in the year 1761, being dedicated to the Princes of Portugal, and was ushered into the world by four licences and recommendations; the first of which states, that a reason why it ought to be printed was, that "it had been already viewed and reviewed by the angels, and approved of by God!!"]

[‡ Page 14.]

[§ A Nun. She and an angel caught in a wooden bowl as many tears of Veronica as weighed two Milan pounds! Page 16.]

though much against her will. She was received with the same honours at Florence and Parma, and on the river Po miraculously saved from drowning a boat full of passengers."* Such is the kind of food with which the Spanish and Portuguese are fed.† What wonder is it that these nations have become grossly ignorant and wicked, and have almost abandoned the Christian religion in disgust!

Multitudes of similar instances might be produced, in which the grossest false miracles are recognised as acts of the power of God. The Legenda Aurea, or Golden Legend, contains monstrous fictions, of which many of the Papists are ashamed; and the Breviary abounds with the recital of fables of a similar character; to say nothing of such stories as that related of St. Dionysius, or Denis, who, it is said, after he was beheaded, took up his own head in his hands, and walked two miles.‡ We could adduce a great variety of narratives, equally incredible, taken from the Roman Breviary alone.

4. Some of the miracles of the Church of Rome are absurd and puerile, entirely unworthy of the Most High.

Bellarmine, with others, relate the following with considerable gravity. St. Anthony of Padua had once an encounter with a heretic, an Albigensian, touching the change of the wafer into the blood and flesh of Christ. "I have a horse," says the heretic, "to which I shall give nothing for three days. On the third do you come with the host; and I will come with the horse. I will pour out some corn to him; but if he forsake the corn, and go and venerate the host, then shall I believe." On the day appointed, all the parties came; and St. Anthony, in a truly saint-like manner, addressed a suitable and eloquent exhortation to the horse, as follows:—"In the virtue and in the name of thy Creator, whom I truly hold in my hand, I command and enjoin thee, O horse, to come, and, with all humility, revere him." No sooner were the words uttered, than the horse, unmindful of his corn, hastens toward the host, in the Priest's hand; inclining his head, and devoutly kneeling on his fore-feet, adored his Lord in the best manner he could, and confounded the heretic.§

[Dr. Brownlee adverts to others on the same authority; in the celebration of the eucharist, "instead of bread, real flesh was seen; that is to say, the loaf, or wafers, were converted, not invisibly, as now-a-days, by half a miracle, but visibly, and really, into true flesh!"* He does not say whether human or bestial flesh. In another instance, says Bellarmine, instead of a wafer, Christ was seen, bona fide, in the form of a child.† But why a child, it is impossible even to conjecture. He cannot mean our glorified Lord. Roman Priests only can explain this mystery of Popery."‡]

St. Nicholas, Bishop of Myra, in the fourth century, was a saint of great virtue, and so disposed to conform to ecclesiastical rule, that, when an infant at the breast, he fasted on Wednesday and Friday, and derived nourishment from that source but once on each of those days, and that toward night.§ "An Asiatic gentleman, sending his two sons to Athens for education, ordered them to call upon the Bishop for his benediction; arriving at Myra late in the day, they thought proper to defer their visit till the morrow, and took up their lodgings at an inn, when the landlord, to secure their baggage and effects to himself, murdered them in their sleep, and then cut them into pieces, salting them, and putting them into a pickling-tub with some pork which was there already, meaning to sell the whole as such. The Bishop, however, having had a vision of this impious transaction, immediately resorted to the inn, and, calling the host to him, reproached him for his horrid villany. The man, perceiving that he was discovered, confessed his crime, and entreated the Bishop to intercede on his behalf to the Almighty for his pardon: the Prelate, being moved with compassion at his contrite behaviour, confession, and thorough repentance, besought Almighty God, not only to pardon the murderer, but also, for the glory of his name, to restore life to the poor innocents who had been so inhumanly put to death. The saint had hardly finished his prayer, when the mangled and detached pieces of the two youths were, by divine power, reunited; and, perceiving themselves alive, fell at the feet of the holy man to kiss and embrace them. But the Bishop, not suffering their humiliation, raised them up, exhorting them to return thanks to God alone, for this mark of his mercy, and gave them good advice for the future conduct of their lives; and

[* Page 20.]

[† "This highly honoured lady, after all, the reader will be surprised to learn, like the old cloak of St. Alban, manufactured into a saint and martyr, was nothing more than a picture of himself, said to be impressed by our Saviour upon a handkerchief lent him by one of the women who attended his crucifixion, and which afterwards bore his VERA ICON, or true image. But this ridiculous legend served Pope Urban VIII. to concoct a holy saint, to whom he erected a statue."—Middleton's Letter from Rome.]

‡ "De quo, (Dionysio,) illud memoriæ proditum est, abscissum suum caput sustulisse, et progressum ad duo millia passuum in manibus gestasse."—Brev. Rom. Pars Autumnalis. Festa die ix Octob., sectio vi., tom. iv. Mechlin., 1836.

[§ "Quintum (miraculum) est S. Antonii de Padua, quod insigne est, nec tamen a Joanne Garetio, vel Tilmanno Bredenbachio annotatum. Describitur in ejus vita apud Surium, tom. iii., et a S. Antonino in summa historiali, p. iii., tit. xxiv., cap. iii., sect. 2. Disputante S. Antonio de veritate corporis Domini in eucharistia cum hæretico quodam in partibus Tolosanis, (siquidem eo tempore Albigenses vexabant ecclesiam, qui cum aliis plurimis hoc etiam errore infecti erant,) petiit hæreticus ab Antonio, quem noverat dono miraculorum præditum esse, ejusmodi signum: 'Habeo,' inquit, 'jumentum, cui per integrum triduum cibum non dabo. Exacto triduo adsis tu cum sacramento, ego adero cum jumento, atque ante illum hordeum effundam: si jumentum hordeo derelicto ad sacramenti venerationem accesserit, credam.' Factum est, ut ille voluit, et triduo exacto S. Antonius, turbis fidelium comitatus, et venerabile sacramentum manu tenens, sic ad jumentum loquutus est: 'In virtute et nomine Creatoris tui, quem in manibus, licet indignus, veraciter teneo, tibi dico, animal, et præcipio, ut confestim venias humiliter modo tuo, et ei reverentiam exhibeas: ut ex hoc cognoscat hæretica pravitas, quod omnis creatura suo subditur Creatori, quem sacerdotalis dignitas jugiter tractat in altari.' His verbis prolatis, jumentum, hordei ante se effusi et famis oblitum, ad sanctum accurrit, et capite inclinato, ac genibus curvatis, eo modo, quo potuit, Dominum adoravit, et hæreticum confutavit."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. iii., De Sacram. Euch., lib. iii., cap. viii., col. 597, A. B. Coloniæ, 1619.]

["* 'Dico secundo, responsionem Petri Martyris utcumque aptari posse ad miracula, quæ fiunt cum exterius in eucharistia apparet caro, vel aliquid ejusmodi, at nullo modo aptari posse ad ea miracula, quæ consistunt in interitu hominum, ut est tertium et septimum a nobis recitatum; illæ enim vere mortes fuerunt, non simulatæ, ac fictæ.'—Bellarm. Opera, tom. iii., De Sac. Euch., lib. iii., cap. viii., col. 563, B. Colon., 1619.

["† 'Alterum miraculum extat apud Paschasium in libro de corpore Domini, cap. xiv., ubi refert Presbyterum quemdam valde pium, et sanctam optasse aliquando videre corporalibus oculis speciem ejus, quem certa fide credebat sub speciebus panis et vini latere; et tandem quod petebat obtinuisse, ac vidisse Christi corpus in forma humana, sed puerili, quod etiam ipse petierat. Ut enim eo loco idem Paschasius refert, duplici de caussa Deus hæc miracula facere solet, vel ad dubitantes in fide confirmandos, vel ad consolandos eos, a quibus ardenter amatur.'—Idem, col. 596, B. Colon., 1619."]

[‡ Letters in the Roman Catholic Controversy. By W. C. Brownlee, D.D., of the Collegiate Protestant Reformed Dutch Church, New-York. Letter ix., p. 115. Second edit. 1834.]

§ Ribadeneira's Lives of the Saints, vol. ii., p. 503. Edit. 1730.

then, giving them his blessing, he sent them with great joy to prosecute their studies at Athens."*

5. Some of their miracles are quoted to confirm idolatry, superstition, and false worship, and tend to an ungodly end.

The following narrative shows that the greatest criminals, according to the views of many Romanists, may be saved without either faith or works, provided they will only fast on Saturday in honour of the Virgin. "St. Anselm records, that a certain robber entered one morning into the cottage of a poor widow, with an intention of robbing her; but, judging her unworthy of his rapine, he began to accost her in a familiar and merry strain:—'And have you breakfasted yet, my good woman?' 'I breakfast, Sir!' said she: 'God forbid that I should so violate the vow I have made to fast every Saturday of the year!' 'Every Saturday! and why that?' replied he. 'Because,' answered the widow, 'I have heard from a Preacher, very famous in doctrine, and still more so from the sanctity of his life, that whoever fasts on Saturday, in honour of our Lady, cannot die without confession.' The robber at these words felt compunction, fell down on his knees, and promised and swore to the Queen of angels to fast every Saturday too; which promise he kept inviolably ever after. But as he still continued his robberies, he was one day surprised by some travellers, who, by a stroke of a sword, separated his head from his body. His executioners, thinking they had done the business effectually, withdrew from him a few steps, when, lo! a voice from the head of him that was killed, cried, 'Confession, masters! I beg that I may have confession.' After they had recovered from the astonishment and panic which such a prodigy occasioned, they ran to the next village to advertise the Curate, who immediately came, accompanied by a number of his parishioners, desirous of beholding the miracle; and having joined the head of the robber to his body, confession was given as he desired. That being done, the penitent thanked him for his good office, and said, with a voice so distinct and loud as to be heard by all present, 'Masters, I never did any good thing in all my life-time, except having fasted every Saturday, in honour of the mother of God. In the very instant I received the deadly blow, a frightful troop of devils surrounded me, to seize my soul; but the blessed Virgin coming to my aid, she drove these forthwith far from me by her divine presence, and would not suffer my soul to leave my body till I should be sufficiently contrite, and make confession of my sins.' He spoke thus, and having entreated the attendants to pray for him, he passed from this life into one more happy and glorious."*

The second Nicene Council, which was held in 787, decreed, that images should be worshipped, and brought in many fables to ratify such a doctrine: for instance, a narrative is introduced, stating that a certain Monk was tempted with a spirit of uncleanness, who, appearing unto him, said, "If thou wilt be rid of me, do not worship this image," alluding to the picture of the Virgin.

6. That a few miracles were performed in the Church in Rome, at some remote period, may perhaps be safely admitted, without conceding to them the testimony of true miracles in favour of false doctrines and immoral practices. Miracles may have been performed in support of that which was sound and proper in their Church; but by no means in confirmation of that which is depraved and corrupt, or opposed to Scripture. Bellarmine makes the same remark concerning miracles which the Novatians claimed as genuine, and which were wrought, it was said, in favour of their doctrines.

If miracles alone were a mark of the true church, and the Romanists could point to many as having been performed among them, they would still have no pre-eminence above the oriental churches, which challenge miraculous interference in their behalf; although it is acknowledged by all Christendom that they hold many and grievous errors.

7. Romanists have objected to the mission of Protestants, that it wants the attestation of miracles. To this we reply, that the doctrines of Protestants are not new, and therefore miracles are unnecessary. Those of Christ and of his Apostles are our miracles, inasmuch as we profess the same doctrines as those which these miracles confirmed. Instances of such supernatural interference are not for those who believe, but for those who believe not. So says Chrysostom: "Now seeing there are no infidels, there is no necessity to work miracles; and therefore, he who now goeth about to make one, which is an unprofitable thing, and out of time, is a false prophet."

8. We adduce the testimony of Roman Catholics to show that numerous miracles in their Church, professedly true, were certainly false.

Peter, Abbot of Cluny, who lived nearly six hundred years ago, says, "You know how much these Church sonnets grieve me."† He mentions one of Benedict, which contained not less than twenty-four lies. Ludovicus Vives, speaking of the Legenda Aurea, observes: "How unworthy both of God and man is the story of their saints, which, I do not know why, was called the Golden Legend, it having been written by one who had an iron mouth and a leaden heart."‡ Espenceus declares, "No stable is fuller of dung, than their legends are of fables."§ And Canus asserts, "To this day I could never see one story which I could allow."

These authorities might be multiplied to a great extent. And though Dr. Milner contends for the existence of miracles in the Church of Rome down to the present day,

[* See a paper from the Rev. W. Cole, of Milton, near Cambridge, in the Gent. Mag. for April, 1777, vol. xlvii., p. 158, who mentions having in his possession an Italian Life of St. Nicholas, third edit. 4to. Naples, 1645, from which the above is translated. Mr. Cole supposes that this story explains the naked children and the tub, the well-known emblems of St. Nicholas. Brand's Observations on popular Antiquities, vol. i., p. 325. 4to. London, 1813. It is remarkable that this same story is told in a metrical Li e of St. Nicholas, by Maitre Wace, a Priest of Jersey, and Chaplain to King Henry II., of which only one manuscript is known to be extant. The Salisbury Missal of 1534, fol. xxvii, contains a prayer to St. Nicholas, before which is an engraving on wood of the Bishop, with the children rising from the tub; but, better than all, by a licence that artists formerly assumed of representing successive scenes in the same print, the landlord himself is shown in the act of reducing a limb into sizes suitable for his mercenary purpose: to be sure, there are only two children in the story, and there are three in the tub; but it is fairly to be conjectured that the story was thought so good, as to be worth making a little better.—Hone's Ancient Mysteries described, p. 194. 8vo. London, 1823.]

* The Glasgow Protestant, vol. i., part ii., p. 24. 8vo. Tenth edit., 1837.

† "Nosti quantum me pigeant falsa in ecclesia Dei Cantica," &c. —Petrus Cluniacensis, lib. v., epist. xxix.

‡ Ludov. Vives, lib. ii., de Corrupt. Artib., in fine. "Quam indigna divis et hominibus sanctorum historia, quam nescio cur Auream Legendam appellent, cum scripta sit ab homine ferrei oris, plumbei cordis." See a large extract in Gerhardi Locis Theolog., de Ecclesia, sec. 283. 4to. Jenæ, 1617.

§ Espenceus in 2 Tim. iv., digress. 21.

he, nevertheless, makes the following concession, which virtually amounts to the abandonment of his cause so far as they are concerned. "I admit," says he, "that a vast number of incredible and false miracles, as well as other fables, have been forged by some, and believed by other Catholics in every age of the Church, including that of the Apostles. I agree with him and you in rejecting the Legenda Aurea of Jacobus de Voragine, the Speculum of Vincentius Belluacensis, the Saints' Lives of the Patrician Metaphrastes, and scores of similar legends, stuffed as they are with relations of miracles of every description." *

XV. There are several other notes of the church which Romanists adduce in favour of their own; such as "Prophetic light," "Confession of adversaries," "The unhappy end of persecutors," and "Temporal prosperity;" upon which a few brief remarks will suffice.

As it regards "the gift of prophecy," this is claimed by the Papacy, because the Apostles and some early Christians exercised it; or because some of her members are said to have possessed that power. But the Church of Rome has no right to claim a testimony arising from the gift of prophecy bestowed on the Apostles and some of the early Christians; because it was bestowed in attestation of our common Christianity, and not in behalf of Romish doctrines, morals, or institutions. Allowing also that there were true Prophets among them, and that some are found to exist at this day, we can, with more reason, claim the testimony of their Prophets in favour of common Christianity or Protestantism, than in behalf of the errors of Popery.

In reference to "the confession of the adversaries" of the Christian name, there is more reason to claim it on behalf of Protestant principles, such as the primitive Christians espoused and taught, and which even Romanists in part profess, than on account of the peculiarities of Romanism.

That wicked men have been punished because they have persecuted the Church of Rome, we do not hesitate to admit, because, 1. The spirit and practice of persecutors are offensive to God, whether they oppress the righteous or wicked. 2. The manifestation of God's providence, in punishing them, may be viewed as an interference for what truth and righteousness existed in the Church of Rome at the time; but not on behalf of its errors and sins.

With regard to "temporal prosperity," this is, after all, a very uncertain mark; and of late Romanists have been glad to leave it out of the catalogue; because the manifest displeasure of God, and its consequent effects, seem to rest on every Roman Catholic country under heaven. France, Spain, Portugal, Italy, Ireland, South America, &c., are fearful examples of this. Indeed, the superior temporal prosperity of Protestants, connected with pure religion, is manifest, on a comparison between Great Britain and Popish countries.

XVI. Of the AUTHORITY of the church.

1. Papists maintain that the church has authority to ordain articles of faith, and to impose doctrines to be received, which are not contained in the holy Scriptures. Thus, in the Council of Constance, it was decreed as necessary to salvation, to believe that the Pope was the head of the church. In the Council of Basil it was constituted an article of faith, that the Council was above the Pope; and therefore, Eugenius, in refusing to obey the Council, was condemned as a heretic. The following are some of the arguments in favour of this doctrine, and the principal objections which were raised by the opponents:—

From the words, "The Spirit shall testify of me, and ye shall also bear witness," (John xv. 26, 27,) they conclude that the testimony of the truth consists jointly in the evidence of the Holy Ghost, and of the Prelates of the church. We answer, The witness of the Spirit and of the Apostles is one: for the former first testified the truth to the latter inwardly; who, being inspired by the Holy Spirit, testified openly. So the Pastors of the church, witnessing with the Spirit, who does not communicate new revelations, but witnesses to those only which are found in Scripture; but if the Spirit testify one thing in the word, and the Prelates testify another, which is different from the word, their testimony must be rejected.

The Papists argue, "The church erreth not; therefore we must hear her in all things." Answer. We have proved that the Church of Rome hath erred, because she followeth not Scripture. They say, "All heretics allege Scripture; therefore we must have a living expositor for them." We reply, that supposing heretics have alleged Scripture to be in their favour; they have been confuted by Scripture, and not by any living expositor.

They maintain also, "that the word cannot be judged of the word; therefore another judge is necessary." Our Saviour furnishes the reply here: "The word which I have spoken shall judge at the last day." If his word shall judge at the last day, how much more shall it judge us in the present life!

[The Popish doctrine respecting the extent to which the authority of the Church reaches, will be sufficiently plain from the following quotations:—

["In order to restrain petulant minds, the Council (of Trent) further decrees, that in matters of faith and morals, and whatever relates to the maintenance of Christian doctrine, no one, confiding in his own judgment, shall dare to wrest the sacred Scriptures to his own sense of them, contrary to that which hath been held, and still is held, by Holy Mother Church, whose right it is to judge of the true meaning and interpretation of the sacred writings; or contrary to the unanimous consent of the Fathers; even though such interpretation should never be published. If any disobey, let them be denounced by the Ordinaries, and punished according to law." *

[The annexed is the third article of the Creed of Pope Pius IV., to which, as well as to the decrees of the Council of Trent, every Popish Priest swears adherence, and which every Papist is bound to receive:—"I admit the sacred Scriptures, according to the sense in which the Holy Mother Church has held, and does hold, to whom it belongs to judge of the true sense and interpretation of the holy Scriptures; nor will I ever take and interpret them otherwise than according to the unanimous consent of the Fathers." †

[Cardinal Bellarmine has admitted the authority of the Church to such a degree, that he declares expressly, "If the Pope, through mistake, should command vice,

* End of Controversy, lett. xxvii., pp. 175, 176. Eighth edition.

[* Can. et Decret. Conc. Trid., sess. iv., cap. ii. Decretum de editione et usu sacrorum librorum. Fol. Romæ, 1564. Vide supra, p. 9.

[† "Item sacram Scripturam, juxta eum sensum quem tenuit et tenet Sancta Mater Ecclesia, cujus est judicare de vero sensu et interpretatione sacrarum Scripturarum, admitto; nec eam unquam, nisi juxta unanimem consensum Patrum, accipiam, et interpretabor."—Creed of Pope Pius IV.

and forbid virtue, the Church would be bound to believe, that vice is good and virtue evil; unless she would sin against conscience." * The same author elsewhere asserts, that "if you take away the authority of the existing Church, the whole Christian faith becomes doubtful;" and again he says, "The stability of Christian doctrines depends on the authority of that Church." † Pighius says, that "all the authority which we attribute to the Scripture, necessarily depends upon the authority of the Church." ‡ Eccius declares, that "as the Church is more ancient than the Scripture, so the Scriptures were not authentic, save by the authority of the Church." § Prierias, in his Dialogue against Luther, writes, "that the authority of the Pope is greater than that of the Scripture." Pope Gregory VII. says, "that no book, no, not so much as any one chapter in the Bible, would be canonical, if it were not for his authority to make it so." ‖ Cardinal Baronius says, "It depends upon the mere will and pleasure of the Bishop of Rome to have what he lists sacred, or of authority in the whole Church." ¶

[The Papist is also taught, "in all hard, obscure, and disputable points, to refer all to the arbitration of the Church, to the judgment of those whom God hath appointed Pastors and Doctors (Teachers); never presuming to contend, control, teach, or talk of their own sense and fancy, in deep questions of divinity, and high mysteries of faith; but expecting the sense of those from the lips of the Priest who shall keep knowledge, and from whose mouth they shall require the law."  Hence are we informed that the proof of the inspiration of the holy Scriptures rests ultimately on the testimony of the Church of Rome; and the infallibility of the Church is involved in the admission, that the canonical books of Scripture are the word of God. For, the Papists vauntingly inquire, "Who declared these books to be canonical? Was it not the testimony of the church that established their authority?" Hence they infer, that there previously existed a living, oracular, and authoritative tribunal, to which all must appeal in order to ascertain the sense of Scripture.]

2. That the church hath no such power as is here contended for, we prove by the following arguments; being assured that the true church of Christ will never challenge a prerogative of that description:—

First. All scriptural truths are not so necessary to salvation, that the ignorance of some should prove perilous to it. Much less are doctrines, not contained in Scripture, of any such necessity. The consequence is, that truths, not discovered there, are unnecessary. Wherefore we infer, there is no need that the church should be endowed with unnecessary power.

Secondly. The church possesses no more authority than the Apostles, nor indeed so much. But they had no power to make articles of faith. St. Paul delivered that which he received, both with regard to the eucharist in particular, and in reference to the Gospel in general. The church may explain articles of faith out of Scripture; but she cannot make any. Timothy is thus instructed: "O Timothy, keep that which is committed to thy trust." (1 Tim. vi. 20.) If Timothy were to introduce nothing new, but only to explain and preserve the old, how much more the Pastors of the church in the present day?

Thirdly. The confession of our adversaries proves our position. The Fathers of Basil, who concluded that it was an article of the Christian faith to believe in the supremacy of the Council, defended themselves on the saying of Christ, "Tell it to the church." Hence we gather that they believed the church could establish no new article of faith without the concurrence of Scripture. Bellarmine says, "that the church is not governed by new revelations, but by those which have been received from the Apostles." *

Fourthly. We have already shown that the Scriptures contain all things necessary to salvation; therefore, all articles of faith must be derived thence.

[The Rev. Joseph Fletcher, D. D., justly observes:—

["First, That it was not the Church of Rome, nor a Council convened by the authority of the Church of Rome, that first ascertained and determined the canon of Scripture. The facts of the case, as far as they can be discovered from the historic records and traditionary fragments of the first and second centuries, directly support this assertion. The writings of the New, like those of the Old, Testament were composed 'at sundry times;' and local circumstances, affecting individual churches, frequently occasioned their publication. Those of general interest, such as the Gospels and the catholic Epistles, would be immediately and universally circulated; while the letters directed to particular churches would naturally require a longer portion of time to secure the same extent of circulation and authority in the Christian world. It is not difficult to ascertain the principle on which the primitive churches proceeded, in their admission of writings which were to be considered authoritative in all matters of religion. At an early period they were exposed to the intrusion of fictitious and unauthenticated accounts of the life of Christ, and the labours of his Apostles. This is evident from the introduction to the Gospel of St. Luke. (Luke i. 1—4.) The great inquiry, in order to determine what was apocryphal, and what might be entitled to the authority of a canon or rule in sacred affairs, would invariably respect the proof of the document in question being the composition of an inspired writer. If on this point its genuineness could be established, its divine authority would be immediately acknowledged. For, according to the declaration of St. Paul, 'God had appointed the Apostles, first in the church.' (1 Cor. xii. 28.) They possessed a peculiar and exclusive authority; and the manner in which their writings are referred to by the earliest Fathers, clearly indicates the universal sentiment which prevailed in the primitive churches on this subject.† It is, in fact, by a minute investigation of such

[* "Nam fides Catholica docet, omnem virtutem esse bonam, omne vitium esse malum; si autem Papa erraret præcipiendo vitia, vel prohibendo virtutes, teneretur Ecclesia credere vitia esse bona, et virtutes malas, nisi vellet contra conscientiam peccare."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. i., De Rom. Pont., lib. iv., cap. v., col. 815, B. Colon., 1620.

[† "Nam si tollamus auctoritatem præsentis Ecclesiæ, et præsentis Concilii, in dubium revocari poterunt omnium aliorum Conciliorum decreta, et tota fides Christiana. Et præterea omnium Conciliorum veterum, et omnium dogmatum firmitas pendet ab auctoritate præsentis Ecclesiæ."—Idem, tom. iii., De Effectu Sacram., lib. ii., cap. xxv., col. 202, B. Coloniæ, 1619.

[‡ Pighius de Hierar. Eccles., lib. i., cap. ii.

[§ Eccius, Enchirid. de Auctor. Eccles. Seventh edit., Antv., 1547.

[‖ Greg., dictat. xvii., in Conc. Rom., apud Labbe, tom. x., col. iii.

[¶ Ad Ann. 553, n. 224.

[ A Papist Misrepresented and Represented; or a Twofold Character of Popery. By J. L., (John Gother,) sect. x., p. 11. 4to. London, 1685.]

* Bellarm. Opera, tom. i., De Verbo Dei non Scripto, lib. iv., cap. iv., col. 176, B. Coloniæ, 1620.

[" † 'Besides our Gospels, and the Acts of the Apostles, no Christian history, claiming to be written by an Apostle, or apostolical man, is quoted within three hundred years after the birth of Christ, by any writer now extant or known; or, if quoted, is not quoted without marks of censure and rejection.'—Paley's Evidences, vol. i., p. 294.

references, and an accurate collation of them with the apostolic records, that the actual state of early opinions respecting the sacred canon has been so satisfactorily ascertained.

[" There is one decisive proof, that neither the Church of Rome, nor a Council convoked by its authority, nor any other Council whatever, in the first instance, determined what were the canonical books; and that proof is the singular fact, that we do not find any catalogue of such books in the decrees of the early General Councils. How then, it may be inquired, was the canon of the New Testament determined? 'Determined,' says Dr. Lardner, who was well qualified, by his extensive researches into the earliest records of Christian antiquity, to ascertain the fact, 'not by the authority of Councils; but the books of which it consists, were known to be the writings of the Apostles and Evangelists, in the same way and manner that we know the works of Cæsar, Cicero, Virgil, Horace, Tacitus, to be theirs; and the canon was formed upon the ground of an unanimous or generally concurring testimony and tradition.'* Hence I remark,— [" Secondly, That whatever church or Council might publish a declaration concerning the canon of the New Testament, the authority of that canon could not arise from the declaration itself, but from the antecedent evidence on which it was founded.† This is too obvious to need either proof or illustration. All that a Council, whether provincial or general, could do in such circumstances, would be, to ascertain what was generally acknowledged by the churches they represented. Long before any such declaration was made, Origen, as cited by Eusebius, referred to the Gospels, and Epistles of Paul, one of Peter, and one of John, as universally received by the church.‡ 'Before the middle of the second century,' says Mosheim, 'the greatest part of the books of the New Testament were read in every Christian society throughout the world, and received as a divine rule of faith and manners. These sacred writings were carefully separated from several human compositions upon the same subject, either by some of the Apostles themselves, who lived so long, or by their disciples and successors, who were spread abroad through all nations. We are well assured, (on the testimony of Eusebius,) that the four Gospels were collected during the life of St. John, and that the three first received the approbation of this divine Apostle. And why may we not suppose that the other books of the New Testament were gathered together at the same time?'§

[" The only advantage that could be secured by a declaration concerning the canon of the New Testament, would be to condemn what was spurious and false. The evidence of the genuineness and authenticity of the acknowledged writings would be concentrated and arranged; and what had previously depended on traditional authority, and the general concurrence of accredited testimonies, would be embodied in one specific declaration, as the universal belief of the Christian world. But this was not the formation of the rule, it was only its promulgation. It was not the creation of an authority unknown before, but a legal provision for the perpetuity of a record; and was evidently designed to preserve the sacred writings entire and uncorrupted. But I observe,—

[" Thirdly, That unless the antecedent authority of the New Testament, prior to all such declarations of it, be acknowledged, it will be impossible to prove the divinity of the Christian religion. For the fact that certain writings were invariably regarded as indisputable and authoritative, by those who had it in their power to ascertain the truth of what they contained; who were under the strongest of all motives to make this inquiry; who gave the most convincing proofs that they had made it, and were prepared to undergo every trial that might be requisite, to attest the sincerity of their convictions;—the fact, that such men, in such circumstances, acknowledged the truth and authority of such writings, is precisely the historic proof of their genuineness and authenticity, and, consequently, the basis of their divine authority. Let it for a moment be granted, that we have no evidence of the genuineness and authenticity of the New Testament, till the Church of Rome assures us of the fact,—let it be assumed that there are no documents of prior date to that ecclesiastical enactment on which we can depend, and that the authority of that said enactment is our only, or our ultimate, reason for believing in the Christian records at all,—and the whole fabric of Christianity is, by that very assumption, overthrown. Suppose the Church of Rome had never existed, and that to this very day there had been no formal declaration respecting the canon by any church or churches upon earth; if the ordinary methods of transmission had been possessed, by which the genuineness and authenticity of the Greek and Roman authors have been established, the divine authority of the Christian revelation would have been as clear, as independent, and as satisfactory as it was in the first age of its promulgation. Manuscripts of various parts of the New Testament have successively existed from the beginning of the Christian era, though the original copies have been long since lost; those manuscripts have been translated into various languages, and preserved in ancient versions; citations and references are to be found in ecclesiastical and theological writings, from the commencement of Christianity to the present time; the laws of historic credibility, and the principles of philological criticism, which apply to secular facts and classic authors, are capable of a similar application to the records of Christian truth; and if all these sources of information and means of inquiry be combined, the result will be precisely what we are prepared to expect, (την ασφαλειαν λογων,) 'the certainty of the things in which we have been instructed.'

[" It is not requisite, indeed, that every individual reader of the New Testament should go through this process of laborious inquiry, for the same reason that it is not necessary he should go through all the proof that Cicero and Cæsar wrote the books which bear their names, in order to understand their writings. It is quite sufficient if the matter be capable of proof; and if it be as capable of proof now, at this remote period, as it was when the declaration of an ecclesiastical Council announced it to the world. Now this, I contend, is the case in reference to the Christian Scriptures. Documents and proofs altogether independent of synodical or conventional authority, establish those facts which constitute the basis of the Christian system; and such seems to have been the wisdom of its divine Founder, that whatever be our interpretation of the doctrines, or whatever [" * Credibility of the Gospel History, &c.

[" † These reasonings are confined to the canon of the New Testament, because the canon of the Old Testament was settled long before the hierarchy of Rome existed. The reader will find some interesting details on this subject in Prideaux's Connexions, vol. ii., pp. 394—405, 665—667.

[" ‡ He calls them αναντιῤῥητα and ὁμολογουμενα, 'undisputed' and 'acknowledged.'—Euseb., Eccl. Hist.

[" § Mosheim's Eccl. Hist.

our views of the institutions, of Christianity, the evidence of the facts remains unalterably the same. But to make the truth or authority of those facts dependent on the declaration of an opinion concerning them, is a total inversion of all the laws of just reasoning, and a virtual abandonment of the divinity of our religion. But in opposition to this self-contradictory argument, I observe,— [" Fourthly, That if the authority of the sacred canon rest on the supposed prior authority of the Church of Rome, it will be impossible to prove the authority of that Church from the sacred canon. The assumption involves in it the point to be proved; for, according to the Romanists, we have no reason to believe that the New Testament is a divine revelation, independently of the declaration of the Church on the subject. But a derived and dependent authority can never be the source of that authority from which it is derived; and, therefore, to appeal to that derived authority in defence of it, is obviously futile and absurd. Were the advocates of Popery consistent, they would never introduce citations from the New Testament to confirm either their principles or practices. They might employ them for the sake of convenient illustration, when capable of supporting an ingenious construction in their favour; but they should indulge an equally convenient forgetfulness of their declarations, when not sufficiently flexible for their purpose. And indeed some views of their conduct and policy prove that this hypothetical deduction is correctly drawn. Many defences and pleadings of Catholic writers refer to the Fathers, with as implicit a submission as to the Scriptures; and the qualifications which they connect with their admission of the right of the laity to read the Scriptures, by which that right can be enlarged and contracted at pleasure, clearly indicate their views of its insufficiency.

[" It is natural, then, to inquire, what is the basis of that authority which the Church of Rome assumes as her peculiar and exclusive prerogative? an authority which determines the canon of Scripture, which gives to that canon all its sacredness and its claims, and which, having thus created the rule, determines, by the same authority, its meaning and its obligations. For this spiritual power still exists, and revels in its despotism. The understandings and consciences of millions are still in a state of unhallowed and quiescent prostration. Its tremendous pressure is still incumbent on the energies of free inquiry; and, investing itself with the attributes of divinity, it still demands unresisting, implicit, and universal subjection. The penetrating genius of Pascal, and the gentle, ethereal spirit of Fenelon, were alike awed by its mysterious power; and in opposition to the conclusions to which their own vigorous and manly reasonings might have led them, they exhibited the melancholy spectacle of spiritual submission to an intangible, an irresponsible, an earthly tribunal! Whence, then, originated this authority, and on what is it founded? Prescriptive right, immemorial usage, and general consent, are all insufficient to support this tremendous claim. Such a domination must have higher credentials, if it pretend to an origin that is divine. In the sober estimate of a rational inquirer, these, either separately or combined, can never justify the claim of infallibility; for, when minutely examined, they amount to nothing more than an acknowledgment of the fact, that such an authority has existed in former times, and is still exercised over the faith and consciences of men. The utmost, therefore, that tradition can do is, to prove the antiquity of the claim, not to support it.

[" Are the Scriptures referred to? It has already been made to appear that this reference involves in it a principle, which at once undermines the foundation of that authority for which they contend. For such an appeal admits the right of inquiry as belonging to those with whom they contend. It also concedes the existence of a standard, by which to guide and regulate their respective inquiries. But if there be such a standard, then that concerning which the inquiry is instituted cannot be itself the standard; and the antecedent all-sufficiency of the Church must be abandoned, as an indefensible claim. Instead, however, of taking any further advantage of the fatal concession implied in an appeal to the Scriptures on this subject, I shall attempt to prove,

[" Fifthly, That the authority claimed by the Church of Rome is totally unsupported by the New Testament.

[" (1.) The explanation of the word 'church,' as set forth by Roman Catholic writers, and assumed in all their reasonings on the subject as an accurate interpretation of the term, is altogether gratuitous and anti-scriptural. The Greek word, εκκλησια, has only two senses attached to it in the New Testament. It is applied either to a particular congregation of professing Christians, assembling in one place for the purpose of Christian fellowship; or to the whole collective body of Christians, who have existed or ever shall exist in the world. In no other sense does the word occur in any part of the New Testament. It is never applied to a clerical Synod, or an episcopal Convocation; nor to Pastors separate from their congregations. 'In any intermediate sense,' says an able and most impartial critic on the language of the New Testament, 'between a single congregation, and the whole community of Christians, not one instance can be brought of the application of the word in sacred writ. We speak now, indeed, (and this has been the manner for ages,) of the Gallican Church, the Greek Church, the Church of England, the Church of Scotland, as of societies independent and complete in themselves. Such a phraseology was never adopted in the days of the Apostles. They did not say, the Church of Asia, or the Church of Macedonia, or the Church of Achaia; but the churches of God in Asia, the churches in Macedonia, the churches in Achaia. The plural number is invariably used when more congregations than one are spoken of, unless the subject be of the whole commonwealth of Christ. Nor is this the manner of the penmen of sacred writ only. It is the constant usage of the term in the writings of ecclesiastical authors for the first two centuries.'*

[" Every organized society assumes some principle as its basis; and in an inquiry respecting the constitution of a religious society, special importance must attach to right views on this subject. A church of Christ, according to scriptural testimony, is not a mere assembly or aggregation of people combined by political arrangements, and dependent on the will and authority of a civil government. It is not the accidental association of a number of individuals and families, who may happen to live within the artificial boundaries of a parish. It is not a

[" * Dr. Campbell's Lectures on Ecclesiastical History, vol. i., pp. 204, 205.

[" He adds, in immediate connexion with the above-cited passage, 'The only instance to the contrary that I remember to have observed, is in the Epistles of Ignatius, on which I have already remarked.' In a preceding part of the lecture he shows that there are sufficient reasons for calling in question the genuineness, or 'at least the integrity,' of these Epistles.

promiscuous crowd of various and opposite characters, who meet together once or twice a week, because of the local convenience of the place, or the conceived attractions of a Preacher. In all these reasons or grounds of union, we can recognise no scriptural principle. We can perceive only the authority of power, the influence of custom, or the effect of accident; and though, under the control of divine agency, their ultimate operation may be beneficial, yet in their immediate action we trace nothing at all amounting to religious conviction; so that when their force is suspended or counteracted, the union is dissolved! The principle of scriptural union appears to be, the knowledge and influence of divine truth, leading to a voluntary association of believers for the purposes of mutual edification, in the observance of all divine institutions. Thus the first churches were constituted in the apostolic age. The truth of the glorious Gospel, attested by 'infallible proofs,' was proclaimed to men for 'the obedience of faith.' Wherever it was cordially received, it became, through the power of the Holy Spirit, the principle of obedience; it constrained those who had 'given themselves to the Lord, to give themselves to one another according to the will of God.' It led those whom the providence of God had stationed near each other, to 'meet in one place,' and to submit to all the laws and ordinances which Christ had enjoined, either by his own authority, or the delegated authority of his Apostles. Here we witness the result of personal conviction, the effect of enlightened principle; and in all succeeding ages, those have most nearly resembled the primitive churches who have formed their union on the basis of evangelical truth, and have regarded that truth as the ground of their hope, the support of their holiness, and the firm bond of their mutual attachment, and zealous co-operation. In the constitution of a scriptural church, we recognise the authority of Christ as its warrant, the truth of Christ as its foundation, and agreement respecting that truth as the principle of fellowship.*

["(2.) The scriptural passages adduced to prove the authority and infallibility of the Church are inapplicable and insufficient. They rest the theory of their claim on several prophetic descriptions of the Gospel church, promises made to it, and declarations of Christ to his disciples. The following are amongst those on which most stress is laid:—'My Spirit which is upon thee, and my words which I have put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed, nor out of the mouth of thy seed's seed, from henceforth and for ever.' 'I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts: they shall all know me, from the least of them, unto the greatest of them.' 'The Spirit of truth will teach you all things, and will guide you into all truth.' 'Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world.' (Isai. lix. 21; Jer. xxxi. 33; John xiv. 15, 16, 26; Matt. xxviii. 20. Also, Isai. ii. 2—5; xxxv. 8; liv. 13; lx., lxii.; Matt. xvi. 18; Luke x. 16; Eph. iv. 11—13, &c., &c.)

["'Those persons must be deplorably ignorant of the language and connexion of the Scriptures, or they must already have put their understandings in fetters of other men's imposing, who can discover this conclusion in these premisses. Some of the passages predict the calling of the Gentiles; some, the conversion of the Jews; others, the diffusion and influence of evangelical truth: some assure us of the inspiration which was necessary to enable the Apostles to fulfil their mission, and others declare the perpetual presence and power of Christ, in the preservation of his church, in giving the means of knowledge and grace, in the conversion and sanctification of individuals, and in the ultimate prevalence of pure and practical religion: but there is not a single passage of them all, on which an unbiassed man, of plain good sense, and moderate biblical knowledge, could ever hang the monstrous dogma, that infallibility in religious doctrines should be the certain, exclusive, and hereditary possession of the Church of Rome.'"*]†

3. With regard to ceremonies, the Papists maintain that the church has power to institute such as she may deem necessary.

We allow, that though there should be great moderation used in the rites of the church, and much limitation in ordaining them; yet she possesses greater liberty in the rites which are appointed for order, than in doctrines of faith, or rules of morals. The latter must of necessity be always the same, and cannot be changed; but rites and ceremonies are external, and instituted for the sake of decency and order. The church cannot appoint ceremonies, but only according to the following rules and conditions:—

First. All things ought to be done to the glory of God, even in civil actions, much more in things appertaining to the service of God. (1 Cor. x. 31.) Our adversaries offend against this rule, applying and annexing remission of sins to their own inventions and superstitious ceremonies, as unto penance and extreme unction. Secondly. They ought to be done decently and in order. (1 Cor. xiv. 40.) Wherefore all ridiculous ceremonies are to be abolished; such as bowing to the cross, lighting candles at noon, counting beads, &c. Thirdly. They ought to be done without offence. (1 Cor. x. 32.) Fourthly. And also to edification. (1 Cor. xiv. 12.) But the Popish ceremonies are not edifying, as the hallowed fire, water, bread, ashes, oil, wax, flowers, branches, clay, spittle, salt, incense, balm, chalices, &c., &c.

["From the above we perceive that the Roman Church assumes that she is, and that she alone is, the church of Christ; she claims to inherit all the authority and power of the primitive church, and that she is the divinely-commissioned instructress of men in the doctrines of religion. Now, here it is an inquiry of vital and fundamental importance, what was the degree of authority with which the primitive church was invested? Christ commanded the Apostles to publish the Gospel to the world; and, in addition to the Apostles, we know that it belonged to the Pastors and Teachers of the church to discharge the same exalted office, and to make known the doctrines of Christianity. But that the smallest authority attached to the statements of any Pastor or Teacher in the primitive church, except in so far as they might be found agreeable to what was taught by the inspired Apostles, that these statements either were received, or were required to be received, without question, and without examination, we deny; and we ask in vain for a shadow of evidence to support the position. There was a teaching authority in the church; that is, there were persons besides the Apos-

["* 'The visible church of Christ is a congregation of faithful men, in which the pure word of God is preached, and the sacraments are duly administered, according to Christ's ordinance, in all those things that of necessity are requisite to the same.'—Article XIX. of the Church of England.

["* The Reasons of the Protestant Religion: a Sermon lately published by the Rev. John Pye Smith, D.D., pp. 13—15."]

[† Fletcher's Lectures on the Principles and Institutions of the Roman Catholic Religion, pp. 5—18.]

tles who had authority to teach; but what they taught, instead of being implicitly received, was to be examined and judged, and only received when it was proved to be the word of God. Thence we find the Bereans commended as more noble than the Jews at Thessalonica, not only because they received the word with all readiness of mind, while the Thessalonians rejected it, but because they 'searched the Scriptures daily whether those things were so.' Authority to teach is one thing, the infallible truth of what was taught is quite another thing. The Pastors and Teachers of the primitive church were authorized and commissioned to teach; but infallibility and inspiration were confined to the Apostles and the sacred writers. If it be said, that the instructions of every Pastor were to be implicitly received without question, and without examination, we reply, that it can have been only on one ground,—that they were the infallible word of God; and this they can have been only on the supposition that every such Pastor was divinely inspired. Had this been the case, had every Pastor been divinely inspired, we should admit at once that then he was not only authorized to teach, but that what he taught was infallibly true; and being so, admitted of no question, no hesitation, but was to be at once received with implicit faith. This, in brief, is the point at which we would arrive, that it was the fact of inspiration, no matter at present whether this were possessed by the Apostles alone, or by more or fewer besides the Apostles, which gave to the primitive church any claim to have her instructions implicitly received and looked upon as infallible. So far as inspiration extended, that claim was admissible: where inspiration terminated, that claim was at an end. Suppose, then, the Roman Church to be the church of Christ, which she is not, and which it is unpardonably presumptuous for her ever to have claimed to be; supposing that she inherits all the authority and power of the primitive apostolic church, which she does not; we should still deny that it is her province to pronounce authoritatively upon the meaning of the word of God, and to command men to abide by her decision; and upon this obvious ground, that no such authority belonged even to the primitive Christian church, but only to the men who were immediately inspired by the Holy Ghost. Whenever God speaks, his creatures are bound to hear; whatever God declares, his creatures are bound to believe implicitly and at once; and should he be pleased to speak to us through the instrumentality of our fellow-men, their declarations, also, being God's declarations, being inspired by God, we should, in like manner, be bound to receive. Whether, then, there be a teaching authority in the Church of Rome, (as Papists speak,) whether her Pastors and Clergy be authorized to teach, is not the question. In so far as they may be true Ministers of Jesus Christ, we admit that they, in common with all other Ministers of Christ, are thus authorized and appointed to teach: this is their peculiar office in the church. But whether the instructions which they deliver are infallibly true, (and it is only on the supposition that they are infallibly true, that they can claim to be implicitly received,) depends, just as it did in the primitive church, on this one circumstance, whether they are inspired or not, whether they are merely the words of man, or whether they are the words of the living God. If, then, the Roman Church be inspired, as the Apostles of the Lord were; if her Pastors and Clergy have not only received the Holy Ghost, in the same sense in which every disciple of Jesus has, as a Sanctifier, and as an inward Monitor and Instructor, but are endued with his miraculous influences, infallibly preserving them from all error, and infallibly leading them into all truth; if we have not only the one volume of inspiration, but if all the decrees and canons of the Roman Church, and all the discourses of her Clergy, are equally marked by infallible truth; then, but not till then, shall we allow that she is invested with supreme authority to pronounce upon the meaning of revelation, and that all who own subjection to Christ must implicitly bow to her deliverances. But if the Church of Rome be not inspired, if no one of her Priests be gifted with inspiration,—and what belongs to no one individual, cannot belong to the body collectively,—then we hold, that her declarations are but the declarations of men; and, like all the declarations of men, are to be examined and scrutinized, and not implicitly admitted; and that the claim of supreme authority, in matters of religion, which she puts forth, is unfounded, as it is presumptuous; an outrage upon ordinary decency, and upon common sense; an assault upon the spiritual freedom of man; and darkened, withal, by the mark of impiety." *]

XVII. Of the INFALLIBILITY of the church.

The following is a condensed view of the infallibility of the Church of Rome, as collected from her own authors:—

Dens affirms, "That the Church, in matters of faith and manners, can by no means err, is an article of belief. Moreover, infallibility in the Church may be considered in a twofold point of view; the one active and authoritative, which is called infallibility in teaching and defining; the other passive or submissive, (obedientialis,) which is called infallibility in learning and believing.

"Infallibility considered in the first sense refers to the Church, with respect to the head or chief Pontiff and the Prelates of the Church; although this infallibility would not regard the laity or inferior Pastors: for as a man is said to see, although his vision does not apply to all his members, but to his eyes only, so the Church, in like manner, is said to be infallible, although this infallibility refers only to the Prelates.

"But if the Church is not considered with regard to its head, but as it embraces all the faithful, or laics, under the obedience of the Pope, it is not proper to say it is infallible in teaching and defining; because its gift in this respect is not to teach, but to learn and believe: wherefore the Church, in this view, is said to be 'passively infallible,' or infallible in learning, believing, practising, &c.

"Therefore it is impossible that the whole Church, obedient to the Pope, should believe any thing as revealed, or practise any thing as good, which is not such: hence it can be said, that the sense of the universal church is always true, and its practice or usage always good." †

[* Lectures on the chief Points in Controversy between Protestants and Roman Catholics, by the Rev. John Young, M. A., pp. 90—95. 8vo. London, 1836.]

[† "An Ecclesia est infallibilis?—R. Ecclesiam in rebus fidei et morum nullatenus errare posse, de fide est. Porro dup'ex considerari potest in Ecclesia infallibilitas: una activa et authoritativa, quæ dicitur infallibilitas in docendo et definiendo; altera passiva sive obedientialis, quæ dicitur infallibilitas in discendo et credendo.

["Infallibilitas priori modo considerata competit Ecclesiæ ratione capitis seu Summi Pontificis et Prelatorum Ecclesiæ, licet hæc infallibilitas non competat ratione laicorum vel inferiorum Pastorum: sicut enim homo dicitur videre, etsi visus non competat ipsi ratione omnium membrorum, sed tantum ratione oculorum; ita Ecclesia dicitur hoc modo infallibilis, licet hæc infallibilitas tantum ipsi competat ratione Prælatorum.

["Si vero Ecclesia spectetur non ratione capitis, sed ut complectitur fideles omnes etiam laicos, sub obedientia Summi Pontificis; sic non debet proprie dici infallibilis in docendo, et definiendo, quia

Our author also affirms, that "the Church is an infallible judge of controversies of faith; that this authority is vested in the Bishops only, especially in the Pope; and that lay persons, Priests, Doctors, or others, have no part in making infallible decisions in the Church." He says the government of the Church is a monarchy with regard to its head; but, at the same time, tempered with an aristocracy. An unanimous consent is not necessary to make a decision infallible: a majority is sufficient for this purpose.* He also says, that a tacit consent is sufficient to make a decision infallible; for to be silent is to consent. Hence he concludes that "when the Pope defines any thing, and the majority of Bishops do not object, it is impossible that this definition should embrace error." † Other Romanists are of a different opinion.

The extent of the infallibility of the Romish Church has often been warmly debated. The subtle and sophistical disputes and distinctions concerning questions of right and of fact, present the doctrine in a light which constitutes it a subject of greater perplexity than any controversy which has agitated the churches of Protestantism.‡

As we have devoted an entire chapter to the discussion of this question, the reader is referred to it for a full exposition and confutation.

CHAPTER III.

GENERAL COUNCILS.

I. A COUNCIL DEFINED.—Different kinds of Councils.—II. MEMBERS OF COUNCILS. 1. Who are members? 2. An error in this: 3. Practice of the Roman and primitive churches different: 4. Character of primitive Bishops: 5. Variety of opinions on this subject. Roman Prelates not Bishops.—III. WHO MAY CONVENE A COUNCIL? 1. The Pope only in ordinary cases. Popes Pelagius II., Leo IX., Pius II., Leo X. Dens and Aquinas cited: 2. Their arguments answered: 3. Six reasons against their doctrine.—IV. PRESIDENTS OF COUNCILS. 1. It is said that Popes, of right, preside. Falsity of this: 2. They did not preside in the first Councils. Reasons why, on some occasions, they declined: 3. History is contradicted in attaching the presidency to the Pope.—V. THE NUMBER AND REQUISITES OF GENERAL COUNCILS. 1. Nice I., in 325: 2. Constantinople I., in 381: 3 Ephesus, in 431: 4. Chalcedon, in 451: 5. Constantinople II., in 453: 6. Constantinople III., in 680: 7. Nice II., in 787: 8. Constantinople IV., in 869: 9. Lateran I., in 1123: 10. Lateran II., in 1139: 11. Lateran III., in 1179: 12. Lateran IV., in 1215: 13. Lyons I., in 1245: 14. Lyons II., in 1274: 15. Vienne, in 1311: 16. Constance, in 1414: 17. Basil, in 1431: 18. Ferrara, in 1438: 19. Lateran V., in 1512: 20. Trent, from Dec. 13th, 1545, to Dec. 4th, 1563: 21. Character of General Councils. Six objections to them: 22. Council of Trent particularly considered. Nine exceptions against it: 23. Diversity of opinion on the number and character of General Councils.—VI. OF THE AUTHORITY AND INFALLIBILITY OF A GENERAL COUNCIL. 1. Their doctrine stated. Some ascribe infallibility to the Council without the Pope. Others require the confirmation of the Pope: 2. Arguments against their infallibility. The uncertainty of their decisions arising from the superiority of the Pope and Council over each other. The confirmation of the Pope, deciding conciliariter, doctrine of intention, proceeding lawfully, meaning of the decrees, rules of determining true from false Councils. The questions are endless: 3. Disagreement among themselves respecting the characters of inerrancy: 4. Violence and disorder, the craft and artifice in managing some: 5. It is not asserted by Councils, recorded in history, or taught in Scripture: 6. Their discordant views of the confirmation of the Pope. Absurdity of such confirmation: 7. Some Councils have been corrupted, and others pretended: 8. The consent of Bishops, as they hold it, overturns the infallibility of Councils. Decision of the majority not necessary. Tacit consent. Romanist doctrines on this head are resolved into the infallibility of the Pope. It is the sentiment of their greatest and most recent Divines. Bellarmine and Pighius cited: 9. Infallibility inconsistent with the representative character of a Council: 10. It requires as immediate an inspiration and revelation as the Apostles had: 11. Councils have contradicted one another. Augustine cited, Dens's evasion: 12. Some Councils have positively erred: 13. Others have decided contrary to Scripture: 14. No Council has sat for nearly three hundred years.—VII. THEIR ORIGIN AND USE. 1. Not of divine origin. Matt. xviii. 17, 20, and Acts xv. 28, considered: 2. They are of human origin. Did not exist in the primitive church. Their origin: 3. Do not prevent controversies: 4. Nor restore peace to the church: 5. Nazianzen's opinion. Conclusion.

I. A COUNCIL is an assembly of individuals professing Christianity, met to deliberate on ecclesiastical matters, whether of faith, morals, or discipline. The Latins have given to such an assembly the name of Concilium or "Council," while the Greeks called it by the name of συνοδος, or "Synod." Both terms are synonymous, and signify an assembly of any kind. We adopt the ecclesiastical sense only. In church history five kinds of Councils are mentioned; namely, congregational, diocesan, provincial, national, and general.

The most simple and ancient form of ecclesiastical Council is the congregational, or, a collection of Christians and Ministers of the same place, meeting together to transact business pertaining to that church with which they were associated. Of this description, probably, was the assembly which met on occasion of the Gentiles conforming to certain Jewish ceremonies, (Acts xv.,) and also for the choice of Deacons, mentioned Acts vi.

["Under the Mosaic economy, ecclesiastical convocations were frequently held. The first was convened by Joshua, Eleazer being High Priest, in order to extirpate idolatry, 'by putting away strange gods,' and to bury Joseph's bones, as commanded by himself. On this occasion, the Elders, Judges, and officers of Israel were 'gathered together' at Shechem. (Joshua xxiv. 1, 23, 32.)

eatenus munus ejus non est docere, sed discere et credere: quapropter Ecclesia vel hoc modo considerata dicitur infallibilis 'passive,' sive in discendo, credendo, practicando, &c.

["Proinde fieri non potest, ut universa ecclesia Pontifici obediens credat aliquid tanquam revelatum, vel aliquid practicet tanquam bonum, quod tale non est: unde dici solet, quod sensus universalis ecclesiæ sit semper verus, et praxis sive usus semper bonus."—Dens Theol., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, No. 80, De Infallibilitate Ecclesiæ.]

[* "An Ecclesia est judex controversiarum fidei?—R. Ecclesia sive congregata sive dispersa est controversiarum fidei judex infallibilis. Quibusnam authoritas judicii de fidei controversiis in Ecclesia competit?—R. Ecclesiæ Prelatis, nimirum Episcopis, et præ omnibus Summo Pontifici. An hoc judicium in rebus fidei etiam non spectat ad Doctores theologos, aliosve Ecclesiasticos?—R. Negative: unde in Conc. Generalibus votum decisivum non habent, sed in iis dumtaxat admittuntur ad examen materiarum et consultationem: multo igitur minus laici in rebus fidei judices sunt. Ex his observa, regimen Ecclesiæ quidem esse monarchicum ratione capitis Summi Pontificis, sed simul aristocratia temperatum; et quia simul Ministrorum Ecclesiæ inter se est subordinatio, hinc etiam est hierarchicum. An ad inconcussam et infallibilem definitionis authoritatem necessarium est, ut omnes plane totius orbis Episcopi sint unius et ejusdem sententiæ?—R. Negative: sed sufficit unanimitas moralis Episcoporum, seu major eorum pars suo capiti Summo Pontifici consentientium."—Idem, No. 81, De Authoritate Ecclesiæ.]

[† "An ad infallibilem latæ decisionis authoritatem seu universalis ecclesiæ definitionem requiritur consensus expressus Episcoporum?—R. Negative: sed sufficit consensus tacitus in silentio et non reclamatione positus post definitionem latam, quæ sufficienter ad Episcoporum notitiam pervenit; nam tacere in hoc casu est consentire. Observa independenter a quæstione de infallibilitate Pontificis certum esse, quod, dum Summus Pontifex aliquid definit, et Episcoporum pluralitas non reclamat, fieri non possit definitionem illam errorem continere."—Idem, No. 82, Qualis esse debeat Consensus Episcoporum.]

‡ Dens Theolog., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, No. 84, De Authoritate Ecclesiæ circa Quæstiones Facti.

Bailly, Theolog., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, cap. xiii., De Objecto Infallibilitatis et Auctoritatis Ecclesiæ.

The second assembly of the Princes, Priests, and Levites of Israel, took place at Jerusalem, where the Levites were numbered, the Priests distributed into twenty-four classes, and their offices regulated. Although David is alone spoken of (1 Chron. xxiii.) as being engaged in this business; yet it appears, from the history of Hezekiah's reign, who flourished two hundred and eighty-nine years subsequently, (2 Chron. xxix. 25,) that he was assisted in it by GAD, the King's Seer, and NATHAN the Prophet. Thirdly. Ahab and ELIJAH 'gathered the Prophets together unto Mount Carmel;' that the worship of Baal might be suppressed, and that of Jehovah established. (1 Kings xviii. 20.) Fourthly. The Priests and Levites were convened by King Hezekiah at Jerusalem; that the temple might be purified, the true worship of God set up, and a transcript made of the Proverbs of Solomon.* Fifthly. Josiah the King, and Hilkiah the High Priest, called another assembly at Jerusalem, for the purpose of re-purifying the temple, extirpating the worship of Baal, and renewing the covenant with the Lord. (2 Kings xxiii. 1, 4.) Sixthly. Under Zerubbabel, Ezra and the Rulers of the Jews met together after their return from Babylon, and settled on the canonicity of the Scriptures. 'For this fact,' says Bishop Tomline, 'there remains an uncontradicted tradition in the Jewish church.'† Seventhly. John Hyrcanus, the High Priest, and the Elders, about sixty-five years before Christ, assembled in order to admit the Pharisees into communion, and to condemn the Sadducees for their denial of the immortality of the soul.

["Other assemblies may with propriety be termed 'apostolic,' one for the election of a successor to the apostleship in place of Judas; (Acts i. 26;) another was convened in Jerusalem, according to some, A. D. 47, according to others, A. D. 51, that is, at the latest, eighteen years after Christ's ascension. It originated in the attempt made to oblige the Gentile converts at Antioch to submit to the rite of circumcision. At the same time that Paul and Barnabas opposed such an attempt, (and it was after 'no small dissension and disputation' that they did so,) they determined that the question should be referred to the judgment of the Apostolic College at Jerusalem. Accordingly some of the Apostles and several of the 'Elders came together,' to deliberate on the propriety of dispensing with the ceremonial law. The result of their deliberation was, that the Mosaic ordinances, as being too rigorous, should be abrogated, and that their decision should be communicated to 'the brethren which were of the Gentiles.' This assembly of Christians was the first that obtained the appellation of a CHURCH, and seems to have served as a model for all subsequent ones; so far, at least, as the assumption of their being under the same divine superintendence with it, could extend. Here, more than on any other opportunity which offered during his apostolic labours, might St. Peter have asserted his right to the exalted rank, which is said to have belonged to him; yet he lays claim to no superior authority, no pre-eminence above the rest; nor do the other Apostles ascribe to him any. He simply gives his opinion on the subject under deliberation; while St. James, who presided, and to whom, as Bishop of Jerusalem, the government was intrusted, authoritatively says, 'Wherefore my sentence is,' &c.

["Mention is also made of another assembly, (Acts xxi. 18,) which had reference to the toleration of legal and ceremonial observances. Ecclesiastical history adverts to other three Apostolical Synods: one which related to the formation of a rule of faith; another which referred to the eighty-five canons which were obtruded on the Church, as if on the authority of the Apostles; the third was held at Antioch, by the eighth canon of which the idols of the heathen were decreed to be put away, and representations of Christ substituted. All these three are apocryphal, and are grounded on no other authority than eminent names and tradition.

["Of the above, that which is recorded Acts xv. 1—6, strictly speaking, was the only Synod, before or since, on which the Holy Spirit may be said to have shed his heavenly influence. 'It seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us,' was the language with which the Apostles prefaced their address to the Gentile converts. It was the language, too, in which the Councils held in after-ages, but without any such pretensions to inspiration, drew up the preamble to their decrees. Beyond this assembly we must not pass," observes Dr. Grier; "since, if we admit the infallibility of one meeting, why not that of another? They, indeed, who disclaim private judgment, and believe in the infallibility of fallible tribunals, may do so consistently; but Protestants who ground their faith on Scripture alone, must qualify the belief which they repose in such conventions."*]

The diocesan Council consisted of those who held ecclesiastical offices within the precincts of the diocess or parish of a primitive Pastor or Bishop. Of this description are the assemblies of which mention is made by the apostolic Fathers, Clement, Polycarp, &c. But diocesan Councils, or Synods, held in the third, fourth, and subsequent centuries, were very different from those diocesan or parochial assemblies which were held immediately after the decease of the Apostles.†

Provincial Synods, or Councils, were those which took place in a particular province, having their commencement in the second century, and assumed their peculiar form at a later date. The Metropolitan usually presided.‡

A national Council was composed of delegates from an entire nation, where the Patriarch or Primate presided.§

["* Tomline's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. i., part i., chap. ii., pp. 102, 103. 8vo. Fifteenth edit. London, 1823.

["† Idem, chap. i., p. 8.

[* An Epitome of the General Councils of the Church, from the Council of Nice A. D. 325, to the conclusion of the Roman Council of Trent in the Year 1563; with incidental Notices of other Councils, &c. By the Rev. Richard Grier, D.D., &c. Pp. 1—6. 8vo. Dublin, 1828.]

[† "Concilium Episcopale (seu Synodus Diœcesana) est illud, quod ob idem motivum et finem ac Provinciale congregatur auctoritate Episcopi Diœcesani."—Ferraris, Biblioth. Prompt. Concilium, art. i., sect. vi.]

[‡ "Concilium Provinciale est illud, quod congregatur ex Suffraganeis certæ provinciæ auctoritate Metropolitani, ad definiendas causas spirituales illius provinciæ, quæ non sunt ex majoribus, Summoque Pontifici reservatis; et nomine Concilii Provincialis venit etiam Concilium nationale, in quo videlicet omnes Archiepiscopi et Episcopi certæ nationis sub uno Primate vel Patriarcha conveniunt."—Idem, sect. v.]

[§ "Quomodo dividuntur Concilia Ecclesiastica?—R. Communiter dividuntur in quatuor genera, scilicet in Diœcesana, Provincialia, Nationalia, et Generalia. (1.) Concilium Diœcesanum est, quod celebrat Episcopus cum Clero suæ diœcesis. (2.) Provinciale est, quod celebratur ab Episcopis alicujus provinciæ ecclesiasticæ, præsidente eorum Archiepiscopo seu Metropolitano. (3.) Nationale dicitur, ad quod convocantur Archiepiscopi et Episcopi unius regni vel nationis, præsidente ejusdem nationis Patriarcha vel Primate. (4.) Concilium Generale est, ad quod totius orbis Episcopi convocantur, et cui præsidet ipse Papa per se, vel per suos Legatos; vocatur etiam universale, œcumenicum, et aliquando plenarium."—Dens Theol., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, No. 86. De Conciliis Ecclesiasticis.]

These Councils, in their origin, had no other legislative authority than that which arose from the mutual agreement of the members.

After Christianity had become the established religion of the Roman empire, in the commencement of the fourth century, the Emperors convened Councils, which were called Œcumenical, Universal, or General. It must not, however, be forgotten, that among the ancients a National or Provincial Council was occasionally called General, inasmuch as it was composed of representatives from an entire province or nation.*

In the present controversy we dismiss any particular inquiries concerning all Councils, except those which are designated General, and which the Church of Rome considers infallible. There are several points connected with these, in which Protestants and Romanists differ, and which may be discussed in connexion with the following heads:—1. Who are members of such assemblies? 2. By whom may they be convened? 3. Who preside? 4. Their authority. 5. Their infallibility. 6. Their number. 7. Their origin and use.

II. Who are MEMBERS of General Councils?

1. The following qualifications of membership are taken from Ferraris, who supports his statements by ample testimonies. He affirms it to be the doctrine of the Church of Rome, that Bishops alone, and the higher Prelates, as Archbishops, Primates, and Patriarchs, have decisive votes in Councils. Titular Bishops also, who have no other than nominal diocesses, are members of General Councils. So, also, are Cardinals, though they may not be Bishops, Abbots, and Generals of Orders.

Theologians, and Doctors of the canon law, are called to General Councils; not for the purpose of voting, but for consultation, on account of their skill in divinity and law.

Princes are invited for protection, but not to vote or decide. No class of laymen is admitted to take part in Councils.†

In a Council it is not necessary, says Dens, that all Bishops should be present. It is enough that a sufficient number from various countries be there to represent members who are absent. Hence some Councils, not termed General, had more members than many which had received that appellation.‡

That the first General Council was composed of both Bishops and Presbyters, none can deny; and what is called by some a General Council, of which an account is given in the fifteenth of the Acts of the Apostles, was composed of Elders (or Presbyters) and Apostles. That Prelates, to the rejection of the legitimate Pastors of the flock, should be the only members of General Councils, is contrary to the usage of the apostolic and primitive churches, at variance with Scripture, injurious to the people, and productive of a vexatious tyranny.

2. Romanists argue, "that to teach and feed are proper to Pastors only, and to decide in Councils is nothing else but to feed and teach; therefore Pastors only must rule in Councils; and none others of the Clergy are the Pastors but Bishops; for to them is applicable, 'Take heed to yourselves, and the flock over which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers.' (Acts xx. 28.)"

To this we reply, that it is absurd to call a Popish Bishop a Pastor, much less the only Pastor in his diocess; because, as Bishop, he never, or very rarely, preaches to the people. It is therefore ludicrous to call them Pastors or Teachers, inasmuch as the majority of them neither preach nor teach. The Pastors of the flock are those who live among them, instruct and watch over them, and know them by name: such only are the proper representatives of the Churches, whether in General Councils or in any other ecclesiastical Synod or assembly.

Besides, it is obvious that those who are called Overseers or Bishops in Acts xx. 28, are called in verse 17 Presbyters or Elders; both names being applied to the Pastors of the flock in the primitive church. That Diocesan Bishops could not be intended, is evident from the consideration, that there were many Presbyters or Bishops at Ephesus. That these were all Pastors in that city, is clear from this, that only one flock is ascribed to them. St. Jerome, in his epistle to Evagrius, interprets the passage thus; and in this sense it must be interpreted by all who soberly consider it. That these Overseers were not delegates from other churches, appears from the fact, that we have no account of such delegated assembly, and that the usage of the apostolic churches was to have several Pastors feeding the same flock, and he that was in special charge of it obtained, in after-times, the name of Bishop, having associated with him several fellow-Presbyters, among whom he lived and exercised his ministry as primus inter pares, "first among his equals." Therefore that Popish Bishops, who never feed the flock, should pretend to be the only Pastors, is contradictory to Scripture and antiquity, and opposed to all sound reason and experience.

3. The practice of the first ages of the church is against that of the Church of Rome in this matter. In the Council of Nice, where there were three hundred and twenty-two Bishops, Athanasius, who was only a Presbyter, withstood the Arians with success. In the Synod of Chalcedon there were present six hundred Priests; but at that time the term Priests included many who were Bishops. Indeed the primitive application of the office

[* "Concilium Generale, seu Œcumenicum, est illud, ad quod a Summo Pontifice convocantur omnes Episcopi totius orbis, ut singuli competenter conveniant, nisi canonico impedimento fuerint præpediti."—Ferraris, Biblioth. Prompt. Concilium, art. i., sect. iv.]

[† "Ad Concilia Generalia vocandi sunt de jure solum Episcopi, et majores Prelati, scilicet Patriarchæ, Primates, et Archiepiscopi. Ad omnes istos spectare de jure et officio in Conciliis Generalibus jus suffragii decisivi, communis Catholicorum sententia est."—Idem, sect. xxvii., xxviii.

["Immo eodem suffragii decisivi jure gaudent etiam Episcopi Titulares, et ideo etiam ipsi sunt de jure vocandi ad Generalia Concilia."—Idem, sect. xxix.

["Ex privilegio, autem, et consuetudine vocandi sunt ad Concilia Generalia cum suffragio decisivo Cardinales etiam non Episcopi, Abbates, et ordinum Regularium Generales."—Idem, sect. xxx.

["Ad Concilia Generalia solent vocari etiam aliqui insignes Theologi, et sacrorum canonum Doctores; non quidem pro suffragio decisivo, sed solummodo pro voto consultivo. Principes etiam ad Concilia Generalia solent invitari, ut per se, vel per suos oratores intersint, tum ut Concilium defendant, et scandala seu novitates novatorum compescant. Ipsi autem Principes, sive imperiali, sive regali, sive alia quacumque dignitate præfulgeant, et quicumque alii laici, quacumque scientia, doctrina, et juris utriusque peritia conspicui, in Conciliis Generalibus suffragium decisivum non habent. Laici enim semper sunt ab ecclesiasticis negotiis ut judices excludendi."—Idem, sect. xxxi.—xxxiii.]

[‡ "An igitur ad Concilium Generale requiritur, ut omnes omnino Episcopi congregentur?—R. Negative, cum id nunquam factum sit, nec fieri possit; semper enim aliqui Episcopi ob certas causas adesse non possunt; imo contigit quandoque numerosiorem fuisse cœtum Concilii Nationalis quam Generalis; sic Generali Concilio Constantinopolitano primo non plures interfuere quam 150 Episcopi, ubi nationalis Carthaginensis Synodus, cui interfuit S. Augustinus, constitit 217 Episcopis. Sufficit itaque legitime ex omni Christiano orbe convocatum esse, sic ut ex omnibus Christianis provinciis, vel ex majoribus aliqui conveniant, qui absentium Ecclesias repræsentent; sicque censetur universalis Ecclesia congregata repræsentative."—Dens Theol., tom. ii.; De Ecclesia, No. 86; De Conciliis Ecclesiasticis.]

of Bishop, as distinguished from Presbyter, was, that the former was the chief Pastor or Minister in charge over the same flock with sundry Presbyters, who were his assistants. In the Council of Antioch, assembled against Samosatenus, the whole Synod writes thus: "The Bishops, Presbyters, and Deacons, to our beloved brethren in the Lord, greeting."

4. It can be proved from indisputable records, that the primitive Bishops were Shepherds of the flock, or those who resided among them, who knew them by name, and who preached the word, and administered discipline unto them, by the assistance of fellow-Presbyters and Deacons. These primitive Bishops were very different from the Pastores Pastorum, "Pastors of Pastors," or more recent Bishops, who were not in charge of the church of Christ in any scriptural sense.

5. Though we have adduced the general opinion of Romanists, as it regards the members of General Councils, different sentiments have obtained among them on this subject. We refer our readers to Bailly, who professes to give the views entertained by the Church of Rome in the present day. After declaring that the principles of Brentius and the English were heterodox, he says the second error is that of Antonius de Dominis, who asserts, that "the consent of the whole Church is to be understood not less of the laity, than of the Presbyters and Prelates." The third, says our author, is the error of certain innovators of our time; namely, the defenders of the Jansenists, who, in various writings, assert that the Clergy of the second rank, or Presbyters, as well as Bishops, are judges of controversies of faith; but they do not understand the subject in the same sense. Some, for instance, suppose Presbyters to have, by divine right, the power of judging concerning ecclesiastical matters. Others say, that Presbyters enjoy this right, but with proper subjection to Bishops. Others confess that Ministers of the second rank are not judges or legislators, but necessary counsellors. Others yet concede to the Bishops the power of governing in a provincial, national, or the universal church.*

In the same chapter Bailly proceeds to establish the two following propositions:—"The Clergy of the second order, or simple Presbyters, whether in a Council or out of one, have not the power of judging in matters of faith, making laws, or governing the Church. This privilege, by divine right, is peculiar to Bishops alone."† His other proposition is the following:—"The opinion is not to be admitted, (1.) Of those who say that the power of sitting and deciding in Councils belongs to Presbyters, in due subjection to Bishops. (2.) Nor of those who suppose that Presbyters are the necessary counsellors of Bishops. (3.) Nor of those who suppose that a Bishop can do nothing in his diocess in those things which concern faith, without the consent of his Clergy. (4.) Nor of those who contend that a Bishop can make no laws to bind the Clergy, unless the Clergy consent to or accept them."* Thus the Prelates of the Church of Rome claim and exercise supreme authority, to the entire exclusion of the regular Pastors. Those who do not feed the flock, or watch over them, govern them; and those who exercise the office of the ministry by feeding and watching, are not permitted to govern those of their own peculiar charge. It is a misnomer to call these Lords of the flock either Bishops or Pastors, inasmuch as they neither oversee nor feed the sheep. These are more properly called "Prelates," a præferendo, because they are eminently raised above, and are independent of, the Pastors and their flocks. They are not primitive Bishops: they are modern Prelates, Lords over the heritage of God.

III. Who may CONVENE General Councils?

1. The following quotations will show to whom the power of convening Councils is attributed. Pope Pelagius II. says, that "a General Council, by a particular privilege bestowed on St. Peter, must be convened by the authority of the apostolical seat." Leo IX. declares, "I would not have you ignorant that a universal Council cannot be celebrated without the decision of the Roman Pontiff." Pius II. says, "Among Councils, we find no one was ever ratified which was convened without the authority of the Pope, when an undoubted Pope existed; because there can be no body of the Church without a head; and all power flows from the head into the members." The Constitution of Leo X. expresses itself thus: "It is sufficiently manifest, that the Roman Pontiff alone, for the time being, as having authority over all Councils, hath the plenary right and power of convoking, transferring, and dissolving Councils, not only from the testimony of Scripture, the sayings of the Fathers, but of our other pontifical predecessors, the decrees of the sacred canons, and the proper confession of Councils themselves."†

The principal Divines of the Papacy ascribe this power to the Popes, as Dens, and also Thomas Aquinas, who says, "A new edition of the Creed belongs to the sole authority of the Pope, as well as all those things which

[* "Secundus error est Antonii de Dominis, qui, lib. i., cap. xii., n. xlii., scribit 'consensum totius Ecclesiæ non minus intelligi in laicis quam in Presbyteris et Prælatis.' Tertius error est quorumdam nostri temporis novatorum, videlicet Jansenii defensorum, qui variis in scriptis asserunt Clerum secundi ordinis, seu Presbyteros, non secus ac Episcopos, esse fidei controversiarum judices; sed non eodem sensu rem intelligunt. Alii nimirum existimant Presbyteros, jure divino, jus habere de negotiis ecclesiasticis judicandi. Alii dicunt Presbyteros his juribus frui, sed cum debita subjectione. Alii fatentur Ministros secundi ordinis non esse judices aut legislatores, sed consiliarios necessarios. Alii ecclesiam universalem, nationalem, aut etiam provincialem regendi potestatem Episcopis concedunt."—Bailly, Theol., tom. ii.; De Ecclesia, cap. ix.; De Subjecto Auctoritatis Ecclesiasticæ, seu de iis quibus competit Jus Fidei Controversias judicandi, sive in Concilio, sive extra Concilium.]

[† "Clero se undi ordinis seu simplicibus Presbyteris, sive in Concilio, sive extra Concilium, jus non convenit fidei causas judicandi, leges condendi, Ecclesiam regendi; hoc vero privilegium solis Episcopis jure divino competit."—Idem, prop. iii.]

[* "Nec admittenda est sententia, 1. Eorum qui jus sedendi ac judicandi in Conciliis, Presbyteris competere dicunt cum debita Episcopis subjectione. 2. Nec eorum qui putant Presbyteros esse Episcoporum Consiliarios necessarios. 3. Nec eorum qui sentiunt Episcopum nihil in sua diœcesi, in iis quæ spectant ad fidem, posse sine concursu Cleri. 4. Nec eorum qui contendunt Episcopum non posse ferre leges Clerum suum obligandi vim habentes, nisi Clerus consenserit vel acceptaverit."—Idem, prop. iv.]

[† "Concilium Generale absque auctoritate Romani Pontificis celebrari non potest; cap. Synodum i., cap. Regula ii., et cap. Multis v., dist. xvii., cum similibus; et Constitut. Pelagii II. incip. Manifesto, ibi; Generalem Synodum convocandi auctoritas Apostolicæ Sedi beati Petri singulari privilegio est tradita. Constitut. Leonis IX. incip., Cum ex eo, ibi; Nolo vos latere non debere præter sententiam Romani Pontificis universale Concilium celebrari. Constitut. Pii II. incip., In minoribus, ibi; Inter Concilia nullum invenimus unquam fuisse ratum, quod, stante Romano indubitato Præsule, absque ipsius auctoritate convenerit; quia non est corpus Ecclesiæ sine capite, et omnis ex capite defluit in membra potestas. Constitut. Leonis X. incip., Pastor æternus, in Concil. Lateran, sess. xi., tom. iv., Concil. pars ii., p. 120, ibi; Solum Romanum Pontificem pro tempore existentem tamquam auctoritatem super omnia Concilia habentem, Conciliorum indicendorum, et transferendorum, ac dissolvendorum plenum jus et potestatem habere, nedum ex sacræ Scripturæ testimonio, dictis SS. Patrum, ac aliorum pontificum prædecessorum nostrorum, sacrorumque canonum decretis, sed propria etiam eorumdem Conciliorum confessione manifeste constat; et ibi Pontifex aliqua talia Concilia recenset."—Ferraris, Biblioth. Prompta, Concilium, art. i., sect. vii.]

belong to the whole Church, such as to convene a General Synod, and other things of this sort." *

It is commonly held, that in time of schism, when two or more Popes are contending for St. Peter's chair, the Cardinals can call a Council, and command the contending Popes to renounce their pretensions; and should they refuse so to do, they may be deposed, and the faithful absolved from all obedience to them.†

Many are of opinion, that Councils may be convened by others beside the Popes and Cardinals; for instance, by Patriarchs, Primates, and Bishops, and even by inferior orders.

2. We proceed to examine the arguments by which the Romanists support these pretensions.

They say that "Councils ought to be collected in the name of Christ, (Matt. xviii. 20,) or, in other words, by him who has authority from Christ to assemble them."‡ This exposition of that passage is absurd, inasmuch as to assemble in the name of Christ is considered synonymous with being assembled by the authority of the Pope. The folly of such interpretation must strike every discerning person with a full conviction of its utter fallaciousness.

They further say, that "the Pope enjoys this right as a part of his jurisdiction." Of this, however, they have never yet, and we do not hesitate to affirm they never can, bring proof from Scripture, although Pope Leo X. asserts, that Scripture testimony is in favour of the exercise of such power.

They also maintain, that "as Primates and Metropolitans assemble their respective Synods, so the Pope ought to convene a General Council."§ To this it may be answered, (1.) There is no divine authority which can be quoted for the actions of the one, any more than for those of the others. (2.) Emperors and Princes have convened both General and Particular Councils. (3.) Each should provide for his own assembly, and decide in it himself, or place it in the hands of others. (4.) General Councils have one of the marks of an acephalous body, inasmuch as they have no regular provision made for their convocation.

3. In opposition to the sentiments of the Romanists, respecting the convocation of General Councils, we observe, that,—

(1.) As far as can be collected from Scripture analogy, it is against the primitive practice of the Church. On the appointment of Deacons, the twelve Apostles called together the multitude of the disciples to decide. (Acts vi. 6.) Those who were assembled at the appointment of an Apostle in the place of Judas, appear to have been directed to the subject by the disciples at one of their customary meetings. The convention mentioned in Acts xv. seems to have been the result of a general inspiration.

(2.) The first General Councils were summoned by the Emperors, and not by the Popes. Ample proof of this our readers will find in the chapter on SUPREMACY.

(3.) If Popes only were enabled to call Councils, how could a profligate and abandoned Pope be deposed? Vicious Pontiffs, though there were many such, never called a Council for their own correction or deposition.

(4.) Popes cannot have greater power than Peter; and he never assumed this dignity to himself.

(5.) Two Councils decided this point against them. That of Constance (sess. 1) decreed, that the departure of the supreme head presented no reason why the business of the assembly should not be prosecuted. That of Basil cited Eugenius to appear before it, whom they tried and condemned.

(6.) General Councils have much more of an acephalous and disorderly character than any other Synods which have been held. They are not convened at regular periods of time, great contentions have always existed respecting the mode of proceeding, and their decisions were far from giving general satisfaction.

IV. Who may PRESIDE in General Councils?

1. Romanists inform us that the Pope, either in person or by his Legates, is the President of all General Councils. This is the common opinion among modern Doctors and controvertists.*

It is notorious, that the Popes of Rome did not preside in any of the first three, and probably in none of the first eight, General Councils. Either the Emperors themselves, or the Bishops, were Presidents.

[Dr. Isaac Barrow observes, that "it is very clear that for some ages the Popes did not assume or exercise such a power, and that it was not taken for their due. Nothing can be more evident, and it were extreme impudence to deny, that the Emperors, at their pleasure, and by their authority, did congregate all the first General Synods; for so the oldest historians in most express terms do report, so those Princes in their edicts did aver, so the Synods themselves did declare. The most just and pious Emperors, who did bear greatest love to the Clergy, and

[* "Quæstio non est de Conciliis Diœcesanis, Provincialibus, vel Nationalibus; quia, illa respective ab Episcopo, Archi-Episcopo, Primate, vel Patriarcha convocanda esse, apud omnes in confesso est: sed quæstio est de Concilio Generali cum hæreticis, qui jus illud convocandi imperatori adscribunt. Contra quos Catholici docent, jus illud ad Summum Pontificem pertinere, quia est totius Ecclesiæ caput; et hinc dicit S. Thom. 2, 2, quæst. i., art. x., in corp. 'Ad solam authoritatem Summi Pontificis pertinet nova editio Symboli, sicut et omnia alia, quæ pertinent ad totam Ecclesiam, ut congregare Synodum Generalem et alia hujusmodi.'"—Dens Theol., tom. ii.; De Ecclesia, No. 87; Cujus sit convocare Concilium Generale.]

[† "In casu schismatis, existentibus pluribus dubiis Pontificibus, possunt Cardinales Concilium convocare, et præcipere, ut Pontifices contendentes pontificatu se abdicent, quod ni fecerint, possunt eos sententia lata a pontificatu dejicere, omnesque Christi fideles ab eorum obedientia absolvere."—Ferraris, Biblioth. Prompt., Concilium, art. i., sect. xxii.]

[‡ "Concilium Ecclesiæ non est legitimum, nisi congregetur in nomine Christi, ut dicitur Matt. xviii."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii.; De Conciliis et Ecclesia, lib. i., cap. xii., col. 20, C. Coloniæ, 1619.]

[§ "Concilia Provincialia indicuntur a Metropolitano, et Nationalia a Primate, vel Patriarcha, ut supra ostendimus, etiam testimonio adversariorum; igitur Concilia Generalia non ab Imperatore, sed a Summo Pontifice indicenda sunt."—Idem, col. 21, D. Colon., 1619.]

[* "Soli Romano Pontifici competit jus auctoritative præsidendi, vel per se, vel per suos Legatos, in Conciliis Generalibus."—Ferraris, Biblioth. Prompt., Concilium, art. i., sect. xlv., et seq.

["Cujus est præsidere Conciliis Generalibus?—R. Summi Pontificis, vel per se, vel per suos Legatos, quia est Summus Rector et Caput Ecclesiæ; deinde illius est præsidere, cujus est convocare, ut patet in Conciliis Diœcesanis, Nationalibus, &c.; atqui Pontificis est convocare; ergo, &c.: accedit perpetuus usus ac praxis Conciliorum Generalium."—Dens Theol., tom. ii.; De Ecclesia, No. 87; Cujus sit convocare Concilium Generale.

["Statuimus, IV. cum omnibus Catholicis contra Protestantes, jus ordinarium Conciliis Generalibus præsidendi, præsidentia auctoritatis ac jurisdictionis quæ secum infert potestatem judicandi, causas proponendi, suffragia colligendi, aliorum sententias confirmandi, ad S. Pontificem pertinere, non vero ad Principes seculares ad quos pertinet tantum præsidentia honoris ac præsidii. Id constat, (1.) Quia S. Petrus, cui successerunt Romani Pontifices, præfuit ac primus locutus est in Concilio Hierosol., quod fuit aliorum Conciliorum exemplar. (2.) Quia in omni societate bene constituta illius est conventibus præsidere, qui primatum ac præcipuam auctoritatem habet. (3.) Quia Romani Pontifices omnibus Conciliis Œcumenicis, sive per se, sive per Legatos, præfuerunt, ut constat annalibus ecclesiasticis. (4.) Principes seculares potestatem non habent in rebus fidei judicium ferendi; ergo, præsidentia jurisdictionis ipsis competere non potest, sed tantum honoris præsidentia."—Bailly, Theol., tom. ii.; De Ecclesia, cap. viii.; De Ecclesia congregata, seu de Conciliis.] had much respect for the Pope, did call them without scruple; it was deemed their right to do it, none did remonstrate against their practice; the Fathers in each Synod did refer thereto, with allowance, and commonly with applause; Popes themselves did not contest their right, yea, commonly did petition them to exercise it."*]

2. It being manifest, therefore, that in the first three General Councils the Pope sat not as President, either by himself or his Legates, it is sufficiently evident that his presidency is not absolutely necessary to the existence of a General Council; and if so, it is unreasonable he should demand it. It is not required that we should deny that he ever sat in any other Council as President; for, being Bishop of a principal see, he may have presided in his turn, without assuming any superior privilege on that account. In the first Council of Constantinople, though present, he declined the presidency by a variety of frivolous excuses, and Eutychius, Bishop of Constantinople, filled the chair. The reason of his declining was, an apprehension that the authority which he expected would not be awarded. Such was the policy of the Popes, when they began to encroach upon the liberties of the people, that they did not venture in the presence of a General Council, for the dread of opposition; and by their absence they reserved to themselves a liberty to dissent, when any acts were passed which were not pleasing to them. Leo pursued this scheme in the Council of Chalcedon. It is evident, therefore, from the fifth General Council, the Pope's presidency was not thought material. What might have been done in following Councils is not needful to our purpose, because the presidency of the Pope was not requisite to the constitution of a General Council.

3. Exceedingly destitute of foundation are the assertions of modern Romanists, who maintain that the Pope is the only lawful President of General Councils: such as Dens, who says, that "it is the perpetual use and practice of General Councils;" or Bailly, who asserts, that "the Roman Pontiffs, either by themselves or their Legates, presided in all General Councils, as is manifest from ecclesiastical annals." With what facility and effrontery will some Papists contradict all ancient history and records! Du Pin, a man of truth and candour, affirms, concerning the first of these Synods, that "it is more probable that Hosius presided there in his own name, and not in that of the Pope. For he nowhere assumes the title of Legate of the Holy See; and none of the ancients say that he presided in this Council in the Pope's name. Gelasius Cyzicenus, who first affirmed it, did so without any proof or authority."†

V. How many General Councils were there, and what is required to constitute a true one?

As it regards the exact number of what are called General Councils, it is not easy to decide, because the Romanists themselves are not agreed on this point. Papists of the present day, however, seem to fix upon the number eighteen, of which the following is a list, according to Dens:—Nicene I., held 325; of Constantinople I., in 381; of Ephesus, in 431; of Chalcedon, in 451; of Constantinople II., in 553; of Constantinople III., in 680; of Nice II., in 787; of Constantinople IV., in 869; Lateran I., in 1123; Lateran II., in 1139; Lateran III., in 1170; Lateran IV., in 1215; Lyons I., in 1245; Lyons II., in 1274; Vienne, in 1311; Constance, in 1414; of Florence, in 1438; Lateran V., in 1512; of Trent, from 1545 to 1563.* We shall give a brief account of these in their chronological order.

1. The first is the Council of Nice, of which Du Pin speaks as follows:—"This Council was assembled by the order of the Emperor at Nice, a city of Bithynia, about the month of July, in the year 325, in the second year of Constantine's reign. St. Sylvester was then Bishop of Rome, who sent thither Victor and Vicentius, his Legates. It is commonly held that this Council consisted of three hundred and eighteen Bishops; but those who were present at it do not precisely determine this number, but say only that there were about three hundred Bishops. It is not certainly known who presided in this Council, but it is very probable that it was Hosius, who held the chief place there in his own name, because he had already taken cognizance of this affair, and was much esteemed by the Emperor, who was there present. The assembly was held in a hall in his palace. It is said that the Bishops presented petitions to him, wherein they accused one another, and that he burned them all without reading them."† The heresy of Arius was the occasion of calling the Council. The introduction of the "word 'consubstantial' was the subject of great dispute among the Bishops, which was allayed by the prudence of the Emperor, who made them all agree in the sense of this word."‡ The three written monuments of this Council were, the Rule of Faith, twenty canons, and the Synodical Epistle addressed to the Churches on its dissolution. The sentiments of Arius were rejected, the time of celebrating Easter was fixed,§ the troubles of Novatian were composed, the Meletian schism was condemned, the jurisdiction of the greater Bishops was defined and determined. Nevertheless, these decisions did not restore peace to the Church.

A Council of western Bishops was held in Sardica in the year 347.

["The Emperors Constans and Constantius, being anxious to restore that peace to the Church of which it was deprived by the continuance of Arius's heresy, agreed to convene an ecclesiastical assembly in Sardica, a city of Mæsia, on the verge of their respective empires. About one hundred western, and seventy eastern, Bishops attended; but altercation and not debate ensued. The smaller party, apprehensive for their personal safety, withdrew to a town in Thrace; a circumstance that disclosed the first symptoms of discord and schism between the Greek and Latin churches. Before this period the right of appeal from all other churches to the See of Rome had not been claimed; but from it we date the first aspirations of the Roman Pontiffs to lordly preeminence, and their restlessness until they had established a spiritual tyranny over all the nations of the earth. Ecclesiastics, excommunicated by the Oriental or the African churches, fled to Rome for refuge, one after

[* A Treatise of the Pope's Supremacy; Barrow's Works, vol. vii., pp. 395, 396. 8vo. edit. Oxford, 1830. See also Willet's Synopsis Papismi, p. 111, et seq., fol. London, 1600; Stillingfleet's Grounds of the Christian Religion, pp. 482, et seq. Fol. London, 1665.]

† Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., cent. iv., vol. i., p. 599, note e, fol. Dublin, 1723.

* Dens Theol., tom. ii.; De Ecclesia, No. 88; De Conciliis Generalibus approbatis.

† Du Pin's Eccles. Hist., vol. i., p. 598.

‡ Idem, p. 599.

[§ "Primum est Concilium Nicænum, celebratum anno 325, juxta Baronium, cui interfuerunt 318 Patres, in quo contra Arium ejusque sequaces, negantes Divinitatem Filii, definitum est, Filium in Divinis esse Patri consubstantialem; pariter definitum est contra quarto-decimanos, Pascha celebrandum esse Dominica post lunam quatuordecim mensis Martii."—Dens Theol., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, No. 88, De Conciliis Generalibus approbatis.]

another; and as the Bishop of that city afforded them his protection, gratified as he was at the occasion which made it necessary, they, in order to testify their gratitude, unwittingly compromised the rights of the Clergy, when, to the extent of their individual sanction, they invested him with the appellant jurisdiction." *]

Du Pin, when adverting to this Council, declares, in conclusion, "The canons of the Council of Sardica were never received by the catholic church as general laws. They were never put into the code of the canons of the universal church, approved by the Council of Chalcedon. The East never received them, neither would the Bishops of Africa own them. The Popes only used them, and cited them under the name of the Council of Nice, to give them the greater weight and authority." †

2. The second General Council, according to many, was held at Constantinople, in 381, at which there were one hundred and fifty Bishops present, for the most part from the east.‡ "For the better understanding the history of the Council of Constantinople, which is called the second General Council, we must distinguish three assemblies of Bishops, held in that city at three several times. The first was convened in the month of May, 381. It was composed of all the Bishops of the eastern empire, with the exception of those of Egypt. Meletius of Antioch presided." § The eastern Bishops met again in Constantinople, in the beginning of the year 382. To this Synod the creed and canon of the General Council of Constantinople are attributed. The western Bishops assembled in Aquileia, and petitioned those met at Constantinople to meet at Alexandria, which was refused. The western Bishops were dissatisfied, and wrote to a Synod assembled at Constantinople in 383, where Nectarius was President. The Bishops of this Council declined attending in the west. "It was a long time before the canons of this Council were approved by the western Bishops. Not only St. Leo rejected them in his fifty-third epistle, (now the eightieth,) but also Gelasius, in his epistle to Dardanus, and St. Gregory, in his twenty-fifth epistle, (lib. vi.,) reject them, as not being received in the west. But, however, they have been received in the east, and are put in the code of the canons of the universal church." ‖ Modern Romanists recognise the decisions of this Council as general, though some of their Popes refused them. These Councils were called and controlled by Theodosius the Emperor.

["No fewer than eighty-one Synods were assembled throughout the universal church in this century. The principal subjects, which engaged their attention, related to Arianism, which was generally rejected by the western Church; but experienced various vicissitudes in the east, according to the view taken of it by the reigning power. Unfortunately for the peace of the church, this heresy gave birth to numerous others. Marcellus, Photinus, Macedonius, and Priscillian, were severally betrayed by their violence into systems no less revolting to reason and common sense, than the Arian impieties." *]

3. The third General Council was held at Ephesus, in the year 431. It was called by Theodosius the younger; and Cyril, Bishop of Alexandria, presided, in which more than two hundred Bishops were present.† This Council condemned Nestorius, Bishop of Constantinople.

["The Nestorian heresy was but the revival of one broached in the third century by Paul of Samosata, and consisted in denying the union of the WORD with the humanity in Jesus Christ; and likewise, in describing the manhood of Christ, as the Robe or Tabernacle of the Godhead; and in calling Christ a man-carrying God, thus separating his humanity from his divinity. In other words, Nestorius taught,‡ that there were two persons in Christ; and, therefore, that the Virgin Mary was not Θεοτοκος, although the mother of Christ.

["Against this heresy, Cyril, Bishop of Alexandria, strongly protested; affirming, on the principles laid down by the Nicene Council, 'that the word of God was incarnate, and was made man; that it was hypostatically united to the manhood, so that Jesus Christ was both Son of God and son of man, without confusion of natures; that from the moment of his conception, the Godhead was united to the manhood without any change of the flesh into the Godhead, or of the divine nature into the manhood; and that thus God was born according to the flesh; that he suffered, because the body which he assumed had suffered; and, lastly, that in this sense the Virgin Mary is said to be the mother of God, she having brought into the world the body of Christ, to which the Godhead is hypostatically united.'" §]

Cyril was a man of a haughty, turbulent, and imperious temper, and jealous of the rising power of Nestorius. Cyril, the avowed enemy of Nestorius, whom he had condemned in a former Council at Alexandria, in 430, proposed examining and determining the subject in debate before John of Antioch and the eastern Bishops had arrived. Nestorius objected against this as being irregular and unjust. But his remonstrances proved to be unavailing, and he refused to comply with the summons which called him before the Council. Cyril pushed on the affair. Nestorius was judged without even being heard, during the absence of a great number of Bishops who belonged to the Council. He was compared with the traitor Judas, charged with blasphemy against the Divine Majesty, deprived of his Episcopal dignity, and sent into exile, where he finished his days.

This meeting was truly tumultuous. The first burst of condemnation was expressed by the Fathers in the following execration:—"Anathema to him who does not anathematize Nestorius; the orthodox faith anathematizes him; the holy Council anathematizes him. We all anathematize the heretic Nestorius; we anathematize all who communicate with him and his impious belief. All the earth anathematizes the unholy religion of Nestorius.

[* The Epitome of the General Councils of the Church, from the Council of Nice A. D. 325, to the Conclusion of the Roman Council of Trent, in the Year 1563; with incidental Notices of other Councils, &c. By the Rev. Richard Grier, D.D. Pp. 51, 52. 8vo. Dublin, 1828.]

† Du Pin's Eccles. Hist., vol. i., p. 607.

[‡ "Secundum est Constantinopolitanum I., anno 381 congregatum, cui interfuerunt 150 Episcopi. In eo Nicæna fides firmata fuit, Gregorius Nazianzenus, Ecclesiæ Constantinopolitanæ præfectus, partim præsedit, partim etiam Nectarius, Gregorii in sede Constant. successor, et hæresis Macedonii negantis Divinitatem Spiritus Sancti damnata; unde symbolo Nicæno addita sunt in hoc Concilio, quæ ad Divinitatem Spiritus Sancti pertinent."—Dens Theol., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, No. 88, De Conciliis Generalibus approbatis.]

§ Du Pin's Eccles. Hist., vol. i., p. 615.

‖ Idem, p. 616.

[* Grier's Epitome of Councils, &c., p. 65.]

[† "Tertium est Ephesinum, anno 431 habitum, in quo numerantur Episcopi plus quam 200, et damnatus est Nestorius Episcopus Constantinopolitanus, asserens duas in Christo personas, divinam et humanam, et consequenter negans D. V. esse Matrem Dei."—Dens Theol., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, No. 88, De Conciliis, &c.]

["‡ Du Pin gives a circumstantial detail of the rise and progress of Nestorianism, by way of introduction to the acts of the Ephesine Council. It will be read with great advantage by those who seek for fuller information on the subject.—Eccles. Hist., vol. i., p 640."]

[§ Grier's Epitome of Councils, &c., pp. 72, 73.]

Anathema to him who does not anathematize Nestorius."* After this collection of curses, and causing, through its own dissensions, a sanguinary tumult throughout the city, the third General Council was dismissed in these words by Theodosius: "God is my witness that I am not the author of this confusion. His providence will discern and punish the guilty. Return to your provinces; and may your private virtues repair the mischief and scandal of your meeting." Mosheim expresses himself in the following words respecting the actions of this assembly:— "The transactions of this Council will appear, to the candid and equitable reader, in the most unfavourable light, as full of low artifice, contrary to all the rules of justice, and even destitute of the least air of common decency." † The arguments of those who approve of, and of those who censure, this Council, may be seen by a reference to Du Pin,‡ who states them on both sides. The history of this Synod gives no very favourable opinion of its infallibility. Nevertheless, the leading sentiments concerning Christ which were inculcated, apart from the phraseology of Nestorius, were those which have always been acknowledged and adopted by the majority of Christians; namely, "That Christ was one divine person, in whom two natures were intimately united, but without being mixed or confounded together."

[There were twenty-two Synods convened on Church affairs, between the great Councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon; but as they resembled the minor ones that preceded them, so far as regarded their rules of local discipline, we may at once proceed to,]

4. The fourth General Council, which was held in Chalcedon, in 451, consisting of six hundred and thirty Bishops. § This Council was, by the Emperor's summons, first convened at Nice, but afterward removed to Chalcedon, that the Emperor, who, on account of the irruptions of the northern barbarians, was unwilling to go far from Constantinople, might assist in person.

["At this city, situated near the Thracian Bosphorus, did the fourth General Council of the Church assemble. Historians seem to have exhausted all their descriptive powers in their representation of this numerous and august meeting of six hundred and thirty Bishops. In the foreground were to be seen the principal ones of the east and west, arranged in the usual order of precedence to the right and left of the chancel, in the church of St. Euphemia. The legatine Bishops held a prominent, though not the chief, place among them. That post of honour was reserved for twenty lay Commissioners of Consular and Senatorial rank appointed by the Emperor; and to give solemnity to the scene, the HOLY GOSPELS, which as yet regulated Christian faith and practice, were exhibited in a conspicuous situation to the view of the reverend assembly." *]

The Legates of Leo presided in this meeting. The doctrine of Eutyches was condemned. Dioscorus was censured, deposed, and banished to Paphlagonia. Here it was enacted that "the church of the city of Constantinople, which is called New Rome, should have the same privileges with old Rome, because that city was the second in the world." The meaning is, that the two Sees were to be independent in power, and equal in privilege; but that in rank and precedence the superiority was due to the more ancient city. This canon gave birth to voluminous controversies.†

["The result of the acts and deliberations of the fourth Œcumenical Council," says Dr. Grier, "consisted in conceding to the Bishop of Rome the order of rank and precedence, and to the Bishop of Constantinople the same prerogatives with him, together with an uncontrolled power to ordain Bishops. The latter part of the ordinance, the Legates resisted; observing, that the Roman See should not be so much degraded in their presence. But notwithstanding their opposition, the Commissioners declared the determination of the Council fixed and irrevocable. The Fathers, it is true, addressed a letter to the Roman Pontiff on the subject of what had taken place in the Council; a token of respect usually shown to absent Prelates. But in order to prevent any further opposition, the Emperor confirmed by his edict all the decrees of the Council; a measure which, as it was assented to by the assembled Bishops, convincingly proves, that neither they, nor the Emperor, nor his Commissioners, looked upon the Bishop of Rome as possessing a supreme control over their proceedings, or as entitled to more than the courtesies which they showed him. But in addition to his confirmatory edict, the Emperor did an act of justice to the memory of Flavian, which was denied to that unfortunate Bishop when alive: he reversed every thing that was done against him, and expunged from the archives of the Byzantine church, the unjust sentence of his deposition and excommunication.

["There were many Synods held in this age, some eastern, and others western, but none of them of peculiar interest. They referred simply to the regularity of ordinations, and other subjects of discipline." ‡]

The remedy applied by this Council to heal the divisions of the church, proved worse than the disease; for many of the Oriental Doctors, though of various characters and different opinions in other respects, opposed the decisions of the assembly: hence arose deplorable discords and civil wars, which were carried to excessive lengths.

5. The fifth General Council was held at Constantinople, in the year 553, and was convened by the Emperor Justinian. There were very few Bishops present from the west. The whole number was two hundred and fifty-five. § The Emperor gained his point here; for, besides

[* "Celui qui n'anathématise pas Nestorius, soit anathème. La foi orthodoxe l'anathématise; le sainte Concile l'anathématise. Qui communique à Nestorius, soit anathème. Nous anathématisons tous la lettre et les dogmes de Nestorius. Nous anathématisons tous l'hérétique Nestorius. Nous anathématisons tous ceux qui communiquent à Nestorius. Nous anathématisons la foi impie de Nestorius. Toute la terre anathématise sa religion impie. Qui ne l'anathématise pas, soit anathème."—Fleury, Histoire Ecclesiastique, tom. vi., liv. xxv., sect. xxxix., p. 79. 4to. Paris, 1750.]

See also History of the Church from the earliest Ages to the Reformation, by the Rev. George Waddington, vol. i., part i., chap. xi., p. 350. Second edit. London, 1835.

† Mosheim's Eccles. Hist., cent. v., part ii., chap. v., sect. viii., vol. ii., p. 69. 8vo edit. London, 1825.

‡ Du Pin's Eccles. Hist., vol. i., pp. 657—660.

[§ "Quartum est Chalcedonense 630 Episcoporum, et anno 451 collectum, in quo damnatus fuit Eutyches, docens, unam tantum in Christo naturam, mixtam ex natura divina et humana."—Dens Theol., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, No. 88, De Conciliis, &c.

[* Grier's Epitome of Councils, p. 91.]

† Fleury, Hist. Eccles., tom. vi., liv. xxviii., sect. xxx. 4to. Pp. 444, et seq. Paris, 1750.

Baron. Annal., ann. 451, sect. 148, tom. vi., p. 156. Fol. Romæ, 1607.

Mosheim's Eccles. Hist., cent. v., part i., chap. v., sect. xv., xvi.

Du Pin's Eccles. Hist, vol. i., pp. 660—679.

[‡ Grier's Epitome of Councils, pp. 97, 98.]

[§ "Quintum est Constantinopolitanum II., anno 553 a 255 Episcopis celebratum, in quo Nestoriana et Eutychiana hæreses iterum damnatæ sunt, cum tribus famosis capitulis, et errores Origenis rejecti."—Dens Theol., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, No. 88, De Conciliis, &c.]

the condemnation of the three chapters, or the works of Theodore of Mopsuesta, Theodoret of Cyprus, and Elias of Edessa, the peculiar doctrines of Origen were condemned. Pope Vigilius, who was present, refused his assent to the decrees of this Council; for which, after receiving various affronts, he was sent into exile, whence he was not permitted to return before he had acquiesced in the decisions of the assembly. Surely it cannot be said that he confirmed the decisions of the Council in any manner which would add to their authority.

Here we perceive a Council of Bishops contending about a frivolous distinction; and in the place of throwing light on it so as to convince, they uttered a mere authoritative decision, which left all the difficulties of the case untouched. In this light the Roman Catholic historian, Du Pin, views the acts of this Council.*

["The Synods, which were held during the remainder of the sixth century, were confined to France and Spain. They amount to twenty-six in number, and, like those of the minor class of Councils which preceded them, are interspersed with canons, having in view the security of Church property, and the rights, privileges, and powers of the different ranks of the Clergy. The remaining canons relate to discipline, with the exception of the few which were occasionally ordained for the suppression of heretical opinions, the regulation of both the married and celibate Clergy, and of the fees, to which they should be entitled on the performance of certain duties. In none of them do we find authority for the distinguishing tenets of the modern Church of Rome, since, to the very close of the sixth age, it was orthodox, pure, and uncorrupt. Whatever deference it might claim as an elder branch of the church of Christ, there were no pretensions set up for it to a lordly pre-eminence over the rights and privileges of other churches. Its jurisdiction was circumscribed by its own limits. Beyond those limits, none was demanded; no other was granted. After the commencement of the seventh century, however, a complete change took place in this respect; so that, if a comparison be instituted between the tenets which it held in the first ages, and those it subsequently professed, the precise periods at which the novelties commenced, which now distinguish it from its former self, might be easily ascertained. How sensibly alive to this distinction, that main pillar of the Church of England, the illustrious Jewel, was, may be seen in his Challenge to the Popish Clergy, which to this day remains unanswered; a proud and triumphal monument of sound theological learning." †]

6. The sixth General Council was held in 680, at Constantinople, and was convened by the Emperor Constantinus Pogonatus.‡ The heresy of the Monothelites was here condemned. In the beginning of the Council there were between thirty and forty Bishops present; but they increased in number to above one hundred and sixty, according to Du Pin.§ Very little importance is attached to the proceedings of this Council. Pope Marcellus was condemned as a heretic, because he was a Monothelite.

[At the conclusion of this century, "in the spirit of peace and concord, the Fathers of the eastern Church met at Constantinople, by order of the Emperor Justinian II., to draw up canons of discipline, as none were made either by the fifth or sixth General Councils. This Synod took place A. D. 692; and is, from the peculiar circumstances of its being supplementary to those two, called the QUINISEXT Council.

["In addition to the Quinisextine Council, five other Synods of the eastern, and forty-six of the western, church, among which are included five held in different parts of England, were celebrated in the seventh century. Their canons of discipline and local observances are too multifarious to detail. But one thing is worthy of observation, that not one of the novelties of the modern Church of Rome is to be discovered among them; namely, the supremacy of the Pope, infallibility of the Church, half-communion, transubstantiation, adoration of the host, worship of images, invocation of angels and saints, sale of indulgences, purgatory, masses, prayers in an unknown tongue, celibacy of the Clergy, and exorcism in baptism. So far from it, that the continental churches did not as yet appear to depart from the faith and practice of the primitive ages. Celibacy was not by any means a general law; while communion in one kind seems not to have been acknowledged, as appears from the eighteenth canon of the fourth Council of Toledo, held in 633, where it was ruled, that the bread and wine should be mingled in the cup before they were distributed among the people. But least of all was the supremacy of the Pope then either known or acknowledged." *]

An assembly which the Greeks regard as the seventh General Council was called by Constantine, in 754, at Constantinople, to whom the furious tribe of image worshippers in derision had given the name of Copronymus. It was composed of eastern Bishops. It condemned the worship and use of images. The authority of this Council is not acknowledged by the Roman Catholics, any more than the obligation of the second commandment, who say, that this Council was spurious, inasmuch as it had not received the sanction of the See of Rome.

7. The profligate Irene, the Jezebel of that day, having accomplished the death of her husband by poison, during the minority of her son Constantine VI., in order to establish her authority, entered into an alliance with Adrian, Bishop of Rome, and summoned a Council to meet at Nice in 787, which ranks as the seventh General Council.† In this assembly the imperial laws respecting the new idolatry were abrogated, the decrees of the Council of Constantinople were reversed, the worship of images and of the cross restored, and severe punishments denounced against those who maintained that God was the only object of adoration. The Bishops founded their decisions on the most trifling and ridiculous arguments. The Latins received, and the Greeks rejected, this Council. The French, Britons, and Germans, opposed its decisions. The modern Church of Rome places it, however, among the General Councils, whose authority they acknowledge.

8. The Council which was held at Constantinople under Photius, in the year 869,‡ and which is reckoned by the

* Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., vol. i., p. 710.

[† Grier's Epitome of Councils, pp. 107, 108.]

[‡ "Sextum est Constantinopolitanum III. Episcoporum 299, inchoatum anno 680; in hoc damnata fuit hæresis Monothelitarum, unam tantum in Christo voluntatem ac operationem profitentium, atque ita hæresim Eutychetis iterum instaurantium."—Dens Theol., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, No. 88, De Conciliis, &c.]

§ Eccles. Hist., vol. ii., p. 11.

[* Grier's Epitome of Councils, pp. 111, 112.]

[† "Septimum est Nicænum II. Episcoporum 350, anno 787 celebratum contra Iconomachos, seu Iconoclastas, id est, Christi et Sanctorum imaginum impugnatores."—Dens Theol., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, No. 88, De Conciliis, &c.]

[‡ "Octavum est Constantinopolitanum IV., anno 869 habitum; ad quod convenerunt 383 Episcopi: in hoc imaginibus sacris suus honor et cultus redditus est, ac Photius homo vaferrimus, et in Patriarchatum Constantinopolitanum intrusus, depositus est; cujus suasu et opera Græci cœperunt oppugnare Primatum Summi Pon-

Greeks the eighth General Council, gave a farther degree of force and vigour to idolatry, maintained the sanctity of images, and approved, confirmed, and renewed the Nicene decrees, and pronounced also an anathema on such as did not adore the images of the Saviour, and honour those of the Virgin Mary and the saints.

["Synods without number were called together in the course of this century; eleven sat at Constantinople, and upwards of one hundred in different places among the western churches. Their canons related to morals and discipline." *]

After this Council, no other was celebrated in the east: the others were held in the west. The former are called Greek, the latter Latin, Councils.

9. The Council of Lateran, held in 1123, is called the ninth General Council.† Upward of three hundred Latin or western Bishops were present. It approved of the treaty about "investiture" made between Pope Calixtus II. and the Emperor Henry, and sanctioned the indulgence of a plenary remission of sin to those who should repair to Jerusalem, for the purpose of assisting the Christians against the infidels; with the special promise, that their estates should be in holy keeping until their return.

10. Pope Innocent II., having obtained possession of the See of Rome by the death of Peter of Leon, convened, in the month of April, 1139, a Council in the palace of Lateran, called the second Lateran or tenth General Council; which, as they say, was composed of about one thousand Bishops.‡

["It ordained thirty canons, principally on subjects relating to morals and discipline. Its twenty-third canon alone was of a different description, being levelled against those who were infected with the Arian or Manichæan heresies. Different causes are assigned for assembling this Council; but the common opinion is, that it was convened against Guibert and Burdin, the anti-Popes of the day." §] It condemned the opinions of the aforenamed Peter, and those of Arnoldus.

11. Pope Alexander III. convened, in the year 1179, a great Council at Rome, composed of about three hundred Bishops, which is called the eleventh General, or third Council of Lateran.‖ The following decrees among others were passed by the advice and authority of Innocent:—(1.) To prevent the schisms of the Church of Rome, in electing its Popes, the first canon ordains: "That if all the Cardinals cannot agree to choose the same person, he shall be esteemed lawful Pope who has two-thirds of their suffrages in his favour." This law is still in force. (2.) A spiritual war was declared against the Waldenses and others, who were reputed heretics. (3.) The right of recommending and nominating to the saintly order was taken from Councils and Bishops; and the canonization of saints was ranked among the greater causes, the cognizance of which was vested in the Pope alone.

["The Lateran Council which, under Alexander III., directed the thunder of the Vatican against the Albigenses, drew up twenty-seven Capitular Acts; some, like those of former Councils, relating to morals and discipline; others for suppressing abuses in the Church, and for regulating the election of the Popes, and enlarging their authority. One decree was directed against the three anti-Popes, who were at this period contending for the Papal chair. And, as if to prove that infallibility could interest itself about the most trifling matters, they proportioned the number of horses to be kept for equipage by Bishops, and other dignitaries of the Church! In fact, all the canons were of a harmless nature, except the last, which breathed a demoniac spirit against the peaceable Albigenses; for all were so denominated who were enemies to the Roman Pontiff. After enumerating the titles by which these heretics were called, the twenty-seventh canon subjects to 'a curse, both themselves, their protectors, or harbourers, and all persons who admit them into their houses or lands;' that 'their houses and goods should be confiscated, and themselves reduced to slavery by their Princes.' 'Further, we take off two years' penance from such of the faithful as shall, by the counsel of their Bishops, take up arms against them for the purpose of subduing them,' &c.*

["This exterminating statute having been confirmed by the reigning Pontiff, and subsequently ratified by the Council of Trent, it consequently stands as part of the unaltered and unalterable law of the Church of Rome. In the course of this century different religious orders were instituted; the most distinguished of which were the Knights Teutonic and Templar, the Knights Hospitallers; also the orders of St. James, of Calatrava, and of the Holy Trinity, and the fraternity of Mount Carmel. Each and all of them were calculated to give stability to Papal domination." †]

12. Innocent III., two years and a half before its session, summoned the fourth Lateran Council to meet on the 1st of November, 1215. In his letters of Indiction, he gives his reasons why he thought the Council necessary; namely, the recovery of the Holy Land, and the reformation of the Church. The Council met at Rome, in the church of St. Saviour, and consisted of four hundred and twelve Bishops in person, near eight hundred Abbots and Friars, and a great many Deputies of the tificis, et Latinos odio capitali prosequi, multa his crimini vertentes, ac præcipue quod docerent Spiritum Sanctum a Patre Filioque procedere, et Constantinopolitano Symbolo particulam 'Filioque' addidissent; ac inde tetrum illud schisma Græcorum initium sumpsit. Nulla Concilia Generalia deinceps in Oriente sunt celebrata; cætera in occidente celebrata sunt."—Dens Theol., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, No. 88, De Conciliis.]

[* Grier's Epitome of Councils, p. 148.]

[† "Nonum Generale Concilium est Lateranense I., anno 1123 celebratum ad tollendum grave dissidium Pontifices inter et Imperatores circa jus 'investituræ,' quod concernebat institutiones Episcoporum, aliorumque præsulum et beneficiorum; hoc jus Imperatores sibi arrogabant, Pontifices vero id Ecclesiæ reservatum volebant: in eodem Concilio provisum fuit de ferendis suppetiis Terræ Sanctæ et Hispaniæ contra Saracenos. Adfuerunt 300 et amplius Episcopi."—Dens Theol., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, No. 88, De Conciliis.]

[‡ "Decimum est Lateranense II., anno 1139 habitum a 1000 circiter Episcopis, occasione schismatis Petri Leonis, anti-Papæ, item contra errores Petri de Brues et Arnoldi de Brixia, atque ad disciplinam Ecclesiasticam restaurandam. Errarunt autem Petrus iste et Arnoldus circa præsentiam realem Christi in eucharistia, docueruntque templa et cruces destruendas, defunctos non juvari precibus."—Idem.]

[§ Grier's Epitome of Councils, p. 173.]

[‖ "Undecimum est Lateranense III., anno 1179 per 300 Episcopos celebratum contra schismaticos ordinatos a Victore IV., anti-Papa, item contra Waldenses, docentes, non esse obediendum Summo Pontifici, illicitum esse juramentum, omnes esse Sacerdotes, fures occidi non posse, &c."—Dens Theol., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, No. 88, De Conciliis.]

["* 'Eos, et defensores eorum et receptores, anathemati decernimus subjacere: et sub anathemate prohibemus, ne quis eos in domibus vel in terra sua tenere, vel fovere, vel negociationem cum eis exercere præsumat; confiscenturque eorum bona, et liberum sit Principibus, hujusmodi homines subjicere servituti:—et qui contra arma susceperint, et ad Episcoporum seu aliorum Prælatorum consilium, ad eos decertando expugnandos, biennium de pœnitentia injuncta relaxamus.'—Conc. Labb., tom. x., Conc. Lat III., can. xxvii., De Hæreticis, col. 1522. Paris, 1671."]

[† Grier's Epitome of Councils, pp. 176, 178.]

absent Prelates or of their Chapters.* The ambassadors of the Christian Princes were present. Seventy chapters or canons, all drawn up beforehand by Innocent, were passed by the Council without debate or examination. Indeed, there was little time for deliberation; for this unwieldy Council broke up in less than a month. The Prelates, weary with staying at Rome, begged leave to depart. "The war between those of Pisa and the Genoese, and the troubles of Italy, immediately obliged the Pope to put an end to the Council, and to quit his care for the affairs of the Church to put in order those of Italy." † Thus the imperious Pontiff, without deigning to consult any individual, published no less than seventy laws or decrees, by which the power of the Popes and Clergy was not only confirmed and extended, but new doctrines or articles of faith were imposed on Christendom.

At this Council the Pope introduced and established the doctrine of transubstantiation; in the twenty-first chapter or canon, auricular confession was established; in the third, all heretics and their favourers were excommunicated; ‡ and it was made the duty of all Romanists to persecute them to the confiscation of goods, to banishment, and death.

[Numerous as were the canons which were published by this Council, only one possesses much interest at the present; namely, "the third canon of the fourth Lateran Council, which denounces heretics with even more precision than the corresponding canon (namely, twenty-seventh) of the preceding Council. It goes even to the extent of compelling secular powers to extirpate all heretics marked by the Church of Rome, from their respective territories under pain of excommunication; § and that should they persist for one year in refusing to fulfil their obligations, the Pope may declare their vassals absolved from their allegiance, and bestow their lands on the faithful children of the Church; and, lastly, that such persons should incur the penalty of excommunication as afforded sustenance, protection, or asylum, to those lying under the anathema! !

["This tremendous canon would root out, with fire and sword, whatever the Church of Rome pronounces to be heresy. The Romish advocates, aware of its unsuitableness to the taste of the present times, betray great uneasiness at its antichristian character; and therefore leave no effort unemployed to evade the conclusions which are derivable from it. Thus, they say, the term 'heretics' does not apply to the members of the Church of England, inasmuch as Protestantism had not then a name. But, how vain is the effort; since in no part of the canon are heretics specified; all, of every sort and description, are included without exception, or limitation:—universos hæreticos quibuscunque nominibus censeantur. The canon even goes to the dethronement of Princes, and to the releasing of their subjects from their ties of allegiance. It is very true, that the canon is now quite as harmless as gunpowder; it lies inoperative, and as a dead letter, within the walls of the Vatican: as, however, it has not been repealed by any of the six succeeding General Councils, but has rather been confirmed by that last and greatest of them, the Council of Trent, it may be revived and acted on by the Church which gave it birth, should a proper opportunity present itself, or the power to enforce its provisions ever belong to it. If ever an occasion favourable for exciting the spark arrives, the explosion is sure to take place. But, to proceed:

["The Romish hierarchy admit it as incontrovertible doctrine, that the laws, relating to faith and morals, which are enacted by a General Council, ratified by the Pope, and received without reclamation by the Clergy at large, are as obligatory as the word of God itself; inasmuch as they proceed from an infallible authority. The canon before us, and the twenty-seventh of the third Lateran, are of this character; and, having never been repealed, are deemed, by every genuine son of the Church of Rome, to lay them under an obligation of the most imperative nature: witness one of the last articles of Pope Pius's Profession of Faith according to the Council of Trent, the entire of which, every Romish Ecclesiastic binds himself, by his oath, to preserve inviolate, *usque ad extremum vitæ spiritum. Although this is an undisputed fact, an attempt has been made within the last few years to deny the genuineness of the obnoxious canon of the fourth Lateran; and when that failed, it was pronounced to be an obsolete law of the Church. As the Parliamentary Record containing the examination of the Right Rev. Dr. Doyle before the Lords' Committee, in 1825, may not be within the reach of the young student, a concise account of the affair may be the more pleasing to him.

["The gentleman, just spoken of, remarks, on the authority of Collier, respecting the offensive canon, that 'this canon is not found in the Mazarine copy, which is co-eval with the fourth Lateran Council; but is transcribed from a later record, that of Labbe and Cossart.' The fact turns out to be, that only a part, and not the whole, of the canon, is wanting in the Mazarine MS. For, in the first place, Labbe, who follows that manuscript, gives the entire of the canon in the Latin; and where he omits the Greek, he observes, in a marginal note, Deest hic FOLIUM in Codice Mazarino: 'The folium, or leaf,' and consequently the matter which it contains, 'is deficient in the Mazarine Codex.' This matter happens to be only the middle part of the canon, as both its beginning and end are preserved: so that, strictly speaking, this particular act forms a constituent part of the fourth Lateran Council. It is, therefore, clear, that if the Mazarine copy did not contain the whole, it contained the exterminating part of the canon; which circumstance, as it is suppressed by Collier, so is it glossed over by Dr. Doyle.† And, in the next place, the second paragraph of the third canon, as taken from the Mazarine MS., points out the punishment to be inflicted on those convicted of heresy; and concludes with declaring,

[* "Duodecimum est Lateranense IV., celebratum anno 1215, contra Abbatem Joachim, Almaricum, et Albigenses, errores Manichæorum renovantes. Adfuerunt Episcopi 412, Abbates et Priores ultra 800, absentium Procuratores plurimi, et plurimorum Principum Legati, quapropter vocari solet magnum Concilium Lateranense."—Dens Theol., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, No. 88, De Conciliis.]

† Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., vol. ii., p. 454.

‡ Idem, vol. ii., p. 449.

["§ 'Et si necesse fuerit, per censuram ecclesiasticam compellantur sæculares potestates, quibuscumque fungantur officiis—quod de terris suæ jurisdictioni subjectis universos hæreticos ab Ecclesia denotatos bona fide pro viribus exterminare studebunt. Et si satisfacere contempserit infra annum, significetur hoc Summo Pontifici; ut ex tunc ipse vasallos ab ejus fidelitate denunciet absolutos, et terram exponat Catholicis occupandam, qui eam, exterminatis hæreticis, sine ulla contradictione possideant, et in fidei puritate conservent.'—Concil. Labb., tom. xi., col. 143; Concil. Later. IV., can. iii., De Hæreticis. Fol. Paris, 1671.

["* 'Cætera item omnia a sacris canonibus, et Œcumenicis Conciliis, ac præcipue a sacrosancta Tridentina Synodo tradita, definita, et declarata, indubitanter recipio.'—Professio Fidei Catholicæ secundum Concil. Trident. ex Bulla Pii Papæ IV.

["† See Report of Lords' Committee, pp. 503, 743.

that should Popes and Bishops be remiss in driving this contagion of heretical pravity from their respective dioceses, they shall be degraded. Hence it appears that the canon in question is a regular ecclesiastical one, which the Pope might, or might not, act upon, according to circumstances; or, to come nearer to our own concerns, which the Irish hierarchy, that living, speaking authority of the Church of Rome in this country, might at any time reduce to practice, suo motu. But Dr. Doyle knows as well as the writer of this article, that it is of little consequence whether the canon in question be spurious, or obsolete, or not; so long as the Bull, IN CŒNA DOMINI, exists, which enjoins the excommunication of heretics on Maundy-Thursday each year; which, in compliance with the injunction, is read in the Pope's presence on that particular day, and which would be as obligatory on Dr. Doyle to read, and to enforce, within his jurisdiction, as it is on the Pontiff himself, did circumstances afford him the opportunity of doing what, I doubt not, he could honestly say, was performed on a principle of conscience. Now, as we have ascertained the value of Dr. Doyle's evidence on the subject of the extirpating canon, supported as it is by 'that excellent historian,'* as he calls the non-juring Collier; let us turn to that of Dr. Crotty, the President of Maynooth College. He speaks to this effect before the Commissioners of Education Inquiry:† 'I acknowledge, that, in the Councils of Lateran and Constance, laws were enacted inflicting severe temporal punishments on persons, who, at those periods, were labouring to subvert the Catholic faith in Europe. That temporal Lords, who connived at or favoured the heresy, should be excommunicated; and if, within a year, they did not give a satisfactory account of their conduct, they should, in addition, forfeit the allegiance and duty of their vassals.' Here is Crotty versus Doyle: the latter denying on oath, the former on oath acknowledging, although with some misgivings, because of the Council being of a mixed nature,—that it gave birth to the odious principle which would dissever the tie that bound the subject to his Prince.

["But, further, it was the most popular opinion, until Protestantism became too strong for persecution, that the third canon of this Council was genuine. From that instant most Popish writers considered it spurious. Their successors of the present day hold an intermediate opinion, that this third canon is not a law of the Church, but a resolution of the temporal powers on temporal affairs. It is certain that the Council was a mixed one; but, if it were, the Monarchs who appeared at it in person, or by proxy, were vassals of the Pope, and attended rather to receive his orders, and to confirm his decrees for the extirpation of heresy, than for the purpose of deliberating. This is evident from the concluding part of Pope Innocent's decree for the suppression of heresy:—'We strictly command all Potentates, &c., not to take judgment of heresy; or, if they shall act contrariwise, let them know, that they are struck with the edge of excommunication.' Here, I say, we perceive it to be clearly laid down, that the civil government had no deliberative power, and that it was nothing more than the executioner of the Church. This Council, having the essentials of a General Council, and its acts ratified by the Pope, promulges a law of equal obligation on Romish votaries, as the twenty-seventh canon of the third Lateran: particularly when they regard it as flowing from a high and holy source, and bearing on its front the impress of infallibility! These laws stand unrepealed to this day on the Papal statute-book; and must, therefore, be looked upon as part and parcel of the code by which the inerrant Church of Rome is now governed.

["It must strike the reader, as he glides over these pages, that all persons, dissentient from the Church of Rome, are here stigmatized as heretics. The charge against the Albigenses* was, that they were Manichæans. But to rank as the followers of Manes, in those times, was to hold, that the temporal power was independent of the Roman Pontiff! a principle which betrays itself in the End of Controversy; although its author had the policy not to avow it.

["It now only remains for notice, how modern Doctors of the Church of Rome endeavour to explain away the meaning of that part of the canon which relates to the reciprocal duty which should exist between Lord and vassal. They assert, that 'the words of the canon only imply the obligations by which the subjects of petty Princes were bound to obey their Lords.'† But, even with such a limitation, the canon carries on the face of it its own disgrace. The subject swore an unreserved, not a conditional, allegiance to his Lord. He did not swear that he would obey him, only so long as he obeyed the Church. But according to the interpretation now given to the decree, the subject might, notwithstanding his oath to the contrary, withdraw his allegiance without a crime, on the ground that the petty Prince himself was subject to a higher power!!! Thus is a Council, which professed to be under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, made to authorize a disregard to the law of God, and to violate one of its most solemn obligations."‡]

["In the course of his examination," says the Rev. John Evans, in his invaluable work, entitled, The Statutes of the Fourth General Council of Lateran, recognised and established by subsequent Councils and Synods, down to the Council of Trent; a work which, in this day of Popish blasphemy and intrigue, ought to be universally known and studied,—"In the course of his examination of the Sacred Canons and Œcumenical Councils, the reader will find many things which will strike him as

["* 'The excellent historian,' as Dr. Doyle calls Collier, does not reject the third canon; he barely states the fact of its mutilation in the Mazarine copy, which was co-eval with the Council; while Crabbe, a Franciscan Friar, published three editions of the Councils, in 1538, 1551, and 1558; in each of which it is inserted. In the edition of 1538, an acknowledgment is made to Cochlæus for his contribution to the learning of the age, by the recent discovery of the Acts of the fourth Council of Lateran. Crabbe published an edition of some Councils in 1530, but the fourth Lateran Council was not of the number; consequently, its third canon could not find a place in such a publication. Dupin, so far from throwing out even a suspicion that this canon was spurious, gives it at full length, and even quotes Matthew Paris, who lived in the century in which the Council was held, as adverting to the different views taken of the canons in general: 'Aliis placabilia, aliis videbantur onerosa.'—Du Pin, vol. ii., p. 449.

["Mabillon, a Benedictine, says, 'Le III. canon prononce anathème contre tous les hérésies contraires à l'exposition de foi précédente, quelque nom qu'elles portent.'—Sommes de Conciles, p. 272. But the strongest testimony of all, to its genuineness, is the Council of Trent, which, by citing the canon of confession, has constituted all the canons of the fourth of Lateran, as part and parcel of the immutable law of the Latin Church.

["† Eighth Report, Note to p. 87.

["* The term 'Albigenses' is not to be met with in any of the canons framed by the fourth Lateran Council. This innocent people specifically, and the Waldenses, under the general appellation of heretics, had been previously condemned by the third Lateran Council, under Pope Alexander III.

["† Appendix to the Report of the Commissioners of Education Inquiry, p. 794."]

[‡ Grier's Epitome of Councils, pp. 186—195.]

highly important; and, among others, his attention will be arrested by the third canon of the Fourth General Council of Lateran. Of the importance of this canon not only Protestants, but also the champions of Rome, seem to have been equally aware; and, consequently, attempts have been made of late years to invalidate the authenticity and genuineness of the said canon,—with how much success, the reader will presently be enabled to judge. Indeed, so little confidence do Romanists appear to have placed in the proofs, adduced by their party, against the genuineness of the canon in question, that, as drowning men will catch at straws, they have ventured upon the desperate step of denying the genuineness of the whole of the seventy canons passed by the Fourth General Council of Lateran, and this in the face of no less an authority than that of the Council of Trent, which treats the decrees of the Fourth Lateran Council as the voice of the Church; 'for neither did the Church decree by the Lateran Council, that the faithful should confess, which she understood to be necessary, and appointed jure divino; but, that the precept of confession, saltem semel in anno, should be fulfilled by all and each, when they had arrived at years of discretion.'* The præceptum confessionis is afterwards spoken of in language that cannot be mistaken: 'If any one shall say, that the confession of all sins, such as the Church observes, is impossible, and a human tradition, to be abolished by the pious; or, that all and singular the faithful of both sexes are not bound to it, according to the constitution of the great Lateran Council, semel in anno, and that therefore the faithful should be persuaded not to confess in Lent; let him be accursed.'†

["In the Decretum de Reformatione Matrimonii, (cap. i.,) we read, 'Therefore, adhering to the steps of the Sacred Lateran Council, celebrated under Innocent III.'‡ Again, in cap. v., De Reformatione, we find, 'And the constitution of Innocent III. in the General Council, which begins, Qualiter et quando;' § and in cap. viii. of the following session, De Regularibus et Monialibus, 'According to the form of the constitution of Innocent III. in the General Council, which begins, In singulis.'*

["The above extracts are amply sufficient to show, that the statutes of the Fourth General Council of Lateran are most clearly and distinctly recognised by the Council of Trent, and that, too, as speaking the sense of the Church; although we are told by Dr. Doyle that the Council of Trent made no particular reference to the statutes in question!†

["As the third canon must necessarily share the fate of the other sixty-nine, should they not appear to be genuine, or, in other words, if the Council passed no acts at all, it will be necessary to examine the evidence adduced in support of this view of the subject, and then to contrast it with the proofs which may be brought forward on the other side; so that the reader may be able to determine to which side the weight of evidence inclines.

["That such documents existed, there is no attempt to deny; but it is contended that they were merely constitutions of Innocent III., and not properly statutes of Lateran; and it is most worthy of attention, that the individuals who acknowledge them as constitutions of Innocent III., also acknowledge the genuineness of the third canon as a constitution of Innocent III.: this is most important to bear in mind, because it will necessarily follow as a consequence, that if, whilst they admit the whole of these documents to have existed as constitutions of Innocent III., good evidence can be adduced to show that they were really passed in the Fourth General Council of Lateran, then the third canon will be equally established with the other sixty-nine; and even Dr. Doyle does not deny that it so existed. It will also follow, that the attempt to deny its existence in the Mazarine copy was not only injudicious, but disgraceful; for the denial of the genuineness of one canon out of seventy, when the whole seventy could be shown to be in the same predicament, was needless. The whole, as constitutions of Innocent III., are admitted to be in existence; why, if the writer of the Mazarine copy, recorded the other canons as those of Lateran, though mistakenly, should he omit the third canon? The writer committed no such blunder, as we shall presently see.

["Let us, however, first examine the validity of the objections to the genuineness and authenticity of the ["* 'Manifeste refellitur inanis eorum calumnia, qui eam a divino mandato alienam, et inventum humanum esse, atque a patribus, in Concilio Lateranensi congregatis, initium habuisse, docere non verentur; neque enim per Lateranense Concilium Ecclesia statuit, ut Christi fideles confiterentur, quod jure divino necessarium et institutum esse intellexerat, sed ut præceptum confessionis, saltem semel in anno, ab omnibus et singulis, cum ad annos discretionis pervenissent, impleretur.' (Sessio xiv., cap. v.) The 'præceptum confessionis' alluded to, is the celebrated twenty-first canon of the Fourth General Council of Lateran, 'Omnis utriusque sexus fidelis, postquam ad annos discretionis pervenerit, omnia sua solus peccata confiteatur fideliter, saltem semel in anno,' &c.

["† 'Si quis dixerit, confessionem omnium peccatorum qualem Ecclesia servat, esse impossibilem, et traditionem humanam, a piis abolendam; aut ad eam non teneri omnes et singulos utriusque sexus Christi fideles, juxta magni Concilii Lateranensis constitutionem, semel in anno, et ob id suadendum esse Christi fidelibus, ut non confiteantur tempore Quadragesimæ; anathema sit.'—Sessio xiv., canon viii., De Pœnitentia.

["The twenty-first canon of the Fourth General Council of Lateran is also alluded to in very remarkable language in the ninth canon, (sessio xiii.,) De Eucharistia. 'Si quis negaverit, omnes et singulos Christi fideles utriusque sexus, cum ad annos discretionis pervenerint, teneri singulis annis, saltem in Paschate, ad communicandum, juxta præceptum sanctæ matris Ecclesiæ; anathema sit.' The 'præceptum sanctæ matris Ecclesiæ' is found in the twenty-first canon of the Fourth Lateran Council, 'Suscipiens reverenter ad minus in Pascha eucharistiæ sacramentum.'

["‡ 'Idcirco sacri Lateranensis Concilii, sub Innocentio III. celebrati, vestigiis inhærendo.'—Sessio xxiv., cap. i., Decretum De Ref. Mat.

["§ 'Necnon et constitutio sub Innocentio III. in Concilio Generali, quæ incipit, Qualiter et quando.'—Sessio xxiv., cap. v., De Reformatione.

["* 'Juxta formam constitutionis Innocentii III. in Concilio Generali, quæ incipit, In singulis.'—Sessio xxv., cap. viii., De Reg et Mon.

["† 'As it happened, however, that there was no special reference made in the Council of Trent to the Council of Lateran, more than to the Gospels, to the writings of Chrysostom, or Augustine, or to the Councils of Orange or of Florence, or to any other, some of whose doctrines or decrees might have been there quoted, or referred to, or confirmed; and, above all, as there was no mention made at Trent of the decree in question, the noble Lord who took the trouble of interrogating the Most Rev. Prelate, afforded to him, by a new question, an opportunity of escaping from this inconvenience, in which a want of information on these subjects would otherwise seem to have involved His Grace.'—Essay on the Catholic Claims, addressed to the Right Honourable the Earl of Liverpool, K.G., &c. By the Right Rev. James Doyle, &c. P. 95. 12mo. Dublin, 1826.]

["The above extract from Dr. Doyle's Essay refers to the reply made by the Archbishop of Dublin to a question proposed to him by one of the Lords:—'I think the reference to the Council of Lateran in the Council of Trent, makes the decrees of that Council binding down to the Council of Trent, and, consequently, still binding.' His Grace was perfectly right, and there is something remarkably Jesuitical in Dr. Doyle's observation: he does not say that there was 'no special reference,' but qualifies it with 'more than to the Gospels,' &c. Did the Doctor mean to say, that there was no special reference made in the Council of Trent to the Gospels? or that, from such reference as was made, they were not recognised by that Council?

seventy canons which pass under the name of The Canons of the Fourth General Lateran Council.

["In an essay by Dr. Doyle, we read, 'The truth is, that the acts of this Council, or at least a great portion of them, were ascribed rather to Pope Innocent than to the Council itself. Platina ascribes them to him, so does Rigordus: his nephew, Gregory IX., does so, whilst he inserts them in his book of decretals.' Most true, his nephew Gregory does so, 'and with an addition which Dr. Doyle has thought prudent to omit;' for his nephew Gregory adds the following most important words:—'Innocent III. in Concilio Generali.'* (Lib. v., tit. vii., cap. 13.) It is a pity that Dr. Doyle has not informed us what 'portion of them' was ascribed to Innocent, and what to the Council; for by admitting that a great portion of them was ascribed to Innocent, he, at the same time, necessarily admits that some portion of them was ascribed to the Council; and this admission by no means tends to make the matter clear, but brings the Doctor into collision with the Honourable and Rev. A. P. Perceval, who, in his Roman Schism,† tells us that Matthew Paris, Platina, and Nauclerus, as cited by Bishop Taylor,‡ and Du Pin, as quoted by Collier, all agree that the seventy canons which pass by the name of the Canons of the Fourth Lateran Council, were not passed at it; that they were all drawn up by the Pope, who read them to the Council, which determined nothing concerning them. Bishop Taylor says, that the first who published them under the name of the Lateran Council, was Johannes Cochlæus, A. D. 1538.'

["Bishop Taylor assuredly did not mean to deceive; but it is to be regretted that he had not examined the matter more carefully before he gave an opinion which is not borne out by his witnesses, as we shall perceive by an inspection of the words of the writers to whom he refers. The words of Matthew Paris are, Facto prius ab ipso Papa exhortationis sermone, recitata sunt in pleno Concilio capitula septuaginta, quæ aliis placabilia, aliis videbantur onerosa.

["'An hortatory discourse having been first made by the Pope himself, seventy chapters were recited in full Council, which seemed gratifying to some, to others burdensome.'

["There is nothing in the words of Matthew Paris to lead to the conclusion that the seventy chapters, or canons, were not passed by the Council, nor that they were received in silence; for had that been the case, on what grounds could the historian state that aliis placabilia, aliis videbantur onerosa? How, if no opinion were expressed, could he state that a difference of opinion existed? The fact of the decrees being prepared beforehand, either by the Pope or by any other individual, does not militate against their becoming the decrees of the Council, after they were recited in a full sitting: neither does the supposed rapidity with which they were passed. That some liked them, and that others disliked them, is very probable: and the same may be said of many Bills which come before the British Parliament, under similar circumstances, too, as far as previous preparation is concerned, and which, nevertheless, become the law of the land, without being thought the worse of for having passed through the Lords and Commons with little or no opposition. How common, too, is it to name a law after the person who has introduced it! In the case of the Council, its canons would not carry with them the less authority because they were previously concocted by the Pope, and by him also proposed, after a solemn exhortation, to the Fathers then assembled. Let us now turn to Du Pin, and we shall find, that he has been as hastily dealt with as Matthew Paris seems to have been, and who, in fact, furnishes Du Pin with the authority on which his own remarks are founded, in the very passage which has been just cited. 'Afterwards he orders the reading in a full Council the chapters or canons upon the discipline of the Church, which were already drawn up. Matthew Paris says, that those canons seemed tolerable to some of the Fathers, but grievous to others. His words are these: Facto prius ab ipso Papa exhortationis sermone, recitata sunt in pleno Concilio capitula septuaginta, quæ aliis placabilia, aliis videbantur onerosa. Let the case be how it will, it is certain, that these canons were not made by the Council, but by Innocent III., who presented them to the Council ready drawn up, and ordered them to be read, and that the Prelates did not enter into any debate upon them, but their silence was taken for an approbation.'* The words of Matthew Paris, as was observed before, would rather lead us to infer that an opinion was expressed, and that Du Pin is not altogether correct in concluding that the Prelates entered into no debate upon them; and still more erroneous would be the supposition, that Du Pin himself intended, by the above remark, to deny that the Council adopted the said canons: when Du Pin allowed himself to assume, that 'the Prelates did not enter into any debate upon them, but their silence was taken for an approbation,' he knew well that, even if the case were so, the silence † of the Fathers, assembled in Council, was a sufficient recognition of the canons proposed to them by the Pope, and that the said canons became thenceforth, to all intents and purposes, the acts of the Lateran Council: this is evident from what follows. After giving the first ["* Decret. Greg. Papæ IX., tom. ii., p. 240. Parisiis, 1687.

["† The Roman Schism illustrated from the Records of the Catholic Church. By the Hon. and Rev. A. P. Perceval, B. C. L. P. 85. 8vo. London, 1835.

["‡ 'The word (transubstantiation) did so please Innocentius III., that he inserted it into one of the seventy canons which he proposed to the Lateran Council, A. D. 1215, which canons they heard read, but determined nothing concerning them, as Matthew Paris, Platina, and Nauclerus witness. But they got reputation by being inserted by Gregory IX. into his Decretals, which yet he did not in the name of the Council, but of Innocentius to the Council. But the first that ever published these canons under the name of the Lateran Council was Johannes Cochlæus, A. D. 1538.'—Of the Real Presence of Christ in the Holy Sacrament. Bishop Taylor's Works, vol. x., p. 99. Heber's edit. London, 1822.

["The good Bishop was anxious to prove the novelty of the doctrine of transubstantiation; but he needed not, for that purpose, to doubt the genuineness of the Lateran statutes, and might, without any detriment to his object, have made a present of them to the champions of Rome: he does not seem to have been aware, that it was not unusual to quote the canon of a Council under the name of the Pope with whom it originated, and that, in fact, by being cited in such a form, it acquires the highest degree of authority which can possibly be attached to it, that of Pope and Council.

["* Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., vol. ii., p. 449. Fol. Dublin edit. Vol. xi., p. 95. London edit.

["† In vol. ii. of Dens's Theology, (Appendix ad Tractatum de Fide, N. 82,) the sufficiency of a tacit consent, to establish the infallible authority of matters proposed by the Pope, is fully proved; so that the evidence which shows the canons in question to have been made by the Pope, and by him proposed to the Bishops, goes also to prove that these same canons, by the silence of the Bishops, became the laws of the Roman Catholic Church. 'An ad infallibilem latæ decisionis authoritatem seu universalis Ecclesiæ definitionem requiritur consensus expressus Episcoporum?

["'R. Negative, sed sufficit consensus tacitus, in silentio et non reclamatione positus, post definitionem latam, quæ sufficienter ad Episcoporum notitiam pervenit; nam tacere in hoc casu est consentire,' &c.

canon, Du Pin thus proceeds: 'In consequence of this, the Council condemns, in the second chapter, the treatise,' &c. 'In the third canon, they excommunicated and anathematized the heretics.' This is not the language of an historian who doubted the propriety of ascribing the canons, thus cited, to the Council! We have also the clearest evidence that Du Pin did not use this language inadvertently, nor unadvisedly; for we afterwards find him speaking in terms equally decisive of his view of their claim to be canons of Lateran. He tells us that 'John Baussanus, Archbishop of Arles, held a provincial Council in the year 1233, wherein he made twenty-four constitutions. In the first he orders that the canons of the Fourth General Lateran Council shall be put in execution.'* And again: 'In the year 1246 William de Broa, Archbishop of Narbonne, held a Council of the Bishops of his province in the town of Beziers, wherein he made a collection of forty-six canons extracted out of the preceding Councils; namely, the Fourth General Lateran Council,' &c.† It is very clear that Du Pin intended nothing more, by his remark respecting the canons, than that they were previously made by the Pope, and not, in the remotest degree, to deny the adoption of them by the Council, or he would not afterwards have referred to them as statutes of Lateran.

["No one, who has examined Collier's account of this Council, can for a moment suppose that he intended to throw a doubt upon the authenticity and genuineness of the canons which pass under its name. 'This year,' (1215,) says that historian, 'the General Council of Lateran was held under Pope Innocent III.; it was opened in November, the Pope having some time before sent a general summons to all Prelates in Christendom: under this denomination, Matthew Paris reckons Patriarchs, Archbishops, Bishops, Archdeacons, Deans, Abbots, Priors, Templars, and Hospitallers. There were four hundred and twelve Bishops at this Council, of which number Langton, Archbishop of Canterbury, was one: whether there were any more of the English Prelates there, is not mentioned by historians; though it is probable there might be four in all, it being not unusual to send that number to the Roman Synods.'

["'The great design of this meeting was to encourage the Crusade, and send succours to the Christians in Palestine.

["'The English Church being represented at this Council, I shall lay two or three of the most remarkable canons before the reader.'‡

["This is not the language of an historian who doubts the genuineness of the canons he is about to 'lay before the reader,' but rather of one who thinks that an English reader will necessarily feel some interest in the perusal of decrees which had received the sanction of English Prelates. It is, however, possible, that Collier's meaning may have been mistaken in the passage in which he cites the remark of Du Pin, and which it is, therefore, necessary to give in the author's own words:—'There were seventy of these canons in all, which being read in full Council, were disliked by several of the Fathers, as Matthew Paris reports: his words are these: Facto prius ab ipso Papa exhortationis sermone, recitata sunt in pleno Concilio capitula septuaginta, quæ aliis placabilia, aliis videbantur onerosa.'*"†

[The testimony of the witnesses adduced by those who would cast a doubt upon the genuineness and authenticity of the Lateran canons by no means leads to the conclusion, that no canons at all were passed by the Council; on the contrary, it rather leads to the conclusion that the said canons were adopted, with little or no opposition on the part of the Council. Matthew Paris tells us, that some liked, and some disliked, them; but says not a word about their rejection. Platina only asserts, that "nothing could be openly done;" and Nauclerus, that "nothing could be fitly determined;" and Du Pin, whilst, from the words of Matthew Paris, he infers that the canons were made by the Pope, and received in silence by the Council, is so far from doubting their adoption by the Council, that he afterwards mentions them distinctly as statutes of Lateran; Collier lays "two or three of the most remarkable before the reader," because English Prelates were present at the Council, and bears the most decided testimony in their favour, by describing the Mazarine manuscript in which they are found as co-eval with the Council.

[In direct opposition to the bold but reckless attempt to throw discredit upon the genuineness of the whole of the canons of the fourth General Council of Lateran, those statutes were well-known, and recognised as such by successive Councils and Synods, from the year 1223 down to the Council of Trent, which commenced its sessions in the year 1545; which, as we have seen, recognises the statutes in question. To them direct reference is made in Constitutiones Bonæ Memoriæ Richardi Poore, Sarum Episcopi, A. D. 1223. Concilium Arelatense, a Joanne Archiepiscopo et Suffraganeis celebratum, Gregorio Papa IX. Pont. Max., Imp. Fred. II., Regnante in Gallia S. Ludovico, ex MS. Codice Eminentissimi Card. Chisii nunc primum prodit. Concilium Domini Joannis, celebratum A. D. 1234. Constitutiones Johannis Abbatis S. Albani, A. D. 1235; S. Edmundi Archiepiscopi Cantuariensis, A. D. 1236; and Nicosiensis, A. D. 1252, and A. D. 1255. Concilia Senonense, A. D. 1269, and apud Pontem Audomari, A. D. 1279. Constitutiones Domini Johannis Peckham, Cantuar. Archiepiscopi, A. D. 1279 and 1281. In Epist. i. Martini Papæ ad Fratres Minores, A. D. 1281. Concilia Saltzburgense, A. D. 1281, and Biturícense, A. D. 1286. Synodi Exoniensis, A. D. 1287, and Baiocensis, A. D. 1300. Constitutiones Synodales per H. Woodloke, Winton. Episc., A. D. 1308. Concilia Palent., A. D. 1322; Avenionense, A. D. 1337; Biterense, A. D. 1351. Articuli concernentes Reformationem universalis Ecclesiæ, editi per Universitatem Oxon. ex MS. Coll. Corp. Christi, Oxon. N. 115, Collat. cum MS. Cott. Faust., cap. vii., fol. 218, seq., A. D. 1414. Concilium Constantiense, A. D. 1415. The Lateran Council adverted to, in the nineteenth session of the Council of Constance, is the fourth General Council of Lateran, as appears from the confirmation of the Constitutions of Frederic II., put forth by the Council of Constance; and thus the Council of Trent is deprived of the honour of being 'the first reputed General Council which lent its weight to this fiction.' Concilia Dertusanum, A. D. 1429; and Frisingense, A. D. 1440. Such is the powerful array of evidence against

["* Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., vol. ii., p. 457. Vol. xi., p. 109. London edit.

["† Idem, vol. ii., p. 461. Vol. xi., p. 115. London edit.

[‡ Collier's Eccles. Hist., vol. ii., p. 443, et seq. 8vo. London, 1840. Straker's edit.

[* Idem, vol. ii., p. 445.

[† The Statutes of the Fourth General Council of Lateran, recognised and established by subsequent Councils and Synods, down to the Council of Trent. By the Rev. John Evans, M. A. Pp. 4—14.

the desperate assertion of the Romish hierarchy, that the fourth General Council of Lateran is of dubious authority. In connexion with each of the assemblies and authorities above quoted, documents are extant, which we have carefully examined, that fully and indisputably recognise the legitimate character of the Council in question. In opposition to this evidence, if the illegitimacy of the fourth General Council of Lateran be still asserted, we shall be brought to the inevitable conclusion, that shame and the Papacy have shaken hands and parted.

[With regard to the persecuting canon of the Council now under consideration, Dr. Crotty, then President of the College of Maynooth, and afterwards Romish Bishop of Cloyne, when before the Commissioners of Education, Oct. 20th, 1826, observed, that "the canon of the Council of Lateran, so often alluded to, could have no force, but from the recognition of it by the states of Europe: their sanction having long since been withdrawn, the canon is, at present, a dead letter." Dr. Doyle, Roman Catholic Bishop, when before a Committee of the House of Lords, April 21st, 1825, was asked :—

["Was the fourth Council of Lateran a General Council?

["It is accounted amongst the General Councils.

["By the third canon of that General Council, the doctrine of extermination of heretics is declared, is it not?

["Very far from it. The Fourth Council of Lateran, as well as I recollect, was held under Innocent III.; and the canon which is called the third, and which seems to hold the doctrine which is now mentioned, is not found in the acts of that Council at all; and is supposed, by most historians, to have been attached to them: this is supposed, amongst others, by the very excellent historian, Collier. Those acts were not mentioned, or that declaration, to which allusion has been made, was not mentioned, as a part of the Council, by any writer for nearly three hundred years after the Council itself was held; and there are several historians, as well as Collier, who think that the declaration, of which mention has been made, never did form any part of the Council. This is an observation which I felt anxious to make, before I would mention further, that the declaration now alluded to is not proposed by the Council, in any way, as an article of faith to be believed by the Church. The heresies which then prevailed, and which went to overturn all sound doctrine, were condemned in, I believe, the very first canon; and this, which is now mentioned, was a kind of vote of the Council, that is said to have been adopted afterwards by the Bishops, and by the powers of Europe, which were then assembled in a kind of congress; for in that Council, as Matthew Paris and various other historians tell us, (but him I name, as he is one connected with this country, and of very high authority,) there were assembled two Emperors, the one of the east, and the other of the west, the King of France, the King of Arragon, the King of England, the King of Hungary, the King, I think, of Bohemia: those I recollect, and I believe there were others. The heresies that were broached at that time were such as went to upturn the foundations of society; for they introduced Manicheism, they went to favour unnatural crimes, and to forbid marriage as damnable. The Princes, therefore, in union with the Church, and most of the Bishops, of whom four hundred and twenty, I believe, assisted, (and they were at that time Barons, and held Baronies as well as the others who were present,) they all thought it necessary to extirpate this abomination from Europe; and therefore they passed that vote, as is supposed by some, in the Council, by others after the Council had been closed; so that, admitting that the decree to which your Lordship has alluded, formed part of the Council, which, I believe, it did not, yet it was not an act of that assembly in its religious or ecclesiastical capacity, but it was an act of the assembly as constituting, really and substantially, a congress of all the powers then existing in Europe, or, I might say, in the Christian world. But your Lordships will, I hope, particularly observe, that the decree, to which reference is made, is not proposed to any Catholic as a point of faith to be believed, which is the only way for such a matter to be proposed, so as to render it binding on our conscience; but that which has been mentioned is a vote of the Council adopted by those Sovereigns, and by those Bishops, for the purpose of doing away a great nuisance from the bosom of the Christian world."

[Dr. Murray, when examined before the Select Committee on the state of Ireland, said, that "the third canon of the fourth Lateran Council has no authority whatever in any part of Christendom; it never had any authority in those countries; and it was made for a particular purpose, which has long since ceased. I should premise, that it is exceedingly doubtful whether or not that canon was ever enacted in the Council of Lateran; for no ancient manuscript records it: but, allowing it to have been enacted, it was done by the civil authorities of Christendom, who were there assembled, either by themselves, or by their representatives. There were present, at the Council, either personally, or by their Ambassadors, the two Emperors of the east and the west, the Kings of France, and of England, Arragon, Hungary, Jerusalem, (at that time a kingdom,) and Cyprus, and many other inferior Potentates. This law was enacted to repress the errors of the Albigenses, which for some time before had been productive of extreme mischief in the south of France, particularly in Languedoc; and which, if not suppressed, threatened the very existence of society itself. Their errors aimed at the extirpation of the human race; and, of course, society, for its own protection, thought it necessary to have recourse to the strongest possible measures, in order to stop the mischief before it could spread. On that account this decree was made, either after the Council, or, as some say, in the Council itself, but under the sanction of the civil authorities, the temporal Magistrates of Christendom, who were there assembled; and it is not to be considered so much the act of the Church as of the States-General of Christendom. Even the Bishops at that time were, for the greater part, Barons, and had temporal dominions themselves. At this general congress, as it may be termed, an agreement was entered into to declare war against the Albigenses, and against those who protected them, particularly the Counts of Toulouse and Foix, and some others; and it was decreed that those who would oppose this coalition should forfeit their temporalities to the Lords in fee, or the other members of the coalition. But that Council never issued a decree on the subject, addressed to all Christians, to be received as a decree of faith. This was merely a regulation which regarded temporal matters, and was at no time considered binding by any persons, beyond the limits of the jurisdiction of the civil powers there assembled. It is a decree that had so little authority, that though the same system was adopted in this country, at the time when the statute De Hæretico Comburendo was unfortunately enacted, there was no reference whatever made to the authority of the Lateran decrees; a proof that it was considered a matter in which this country was not concerned." *

[How individuals, sustaining the sacred office of the episcopate, and professing a religion which "is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy," can be guilty of duplicity so barefaced and desperate as that which is recorded in the above paragraph, we are not able to say! The general decree of the Council of Sens—a Synod with which every Popish Prelate is supposed to be conversant—not only recognises the statutes of the fourth General Council of Lateran as such, but particularly the third canon of that Council, in a manner which does not admit of the shadow of a doubt; namely,—

["General decree containing the species of heresies which are now sprouting forth, the execration of them, the method of judging and discerning heretics and relapsed persons, the form and order of proceeding against the same, also the bitter punishments of the same; and, lastly, an exhortation to the chief secular powers concerning dispersing and exterminating them." †

[Council of Lateran. "We excommunicate and anathematize every heresy which exalteth itself against the holy, orthodox, and catholic faith, which we have set forth above, condemning all heretics, by whatsoever names they may be reckoned, who have indeed divers faces, but their tails are bound together, for they make agreement in the same folly." ‡

[Council of Sens.—"Hence it is, that in this provincial Council, which was gathered together to correct excesses, and to extirpate heresies, according to the Councils of Chalcedon and Lateran, to the honour of God, the exaltation of the orthodox faith, and the peace, increase, and tranquillity of our subjects, we have thought it good, with the consent of our Suffragans, and the advice of many interpreters of divine and human law, that, wholesomely and quickly against these so great dangers, provision should be made; to wit, either declaring or renewing the ancient canons, (of which, indeed, we are constituted the guardians and executors,) or, by the power conceded to us, sometimes fortifying them by the addition of punishment. In the first place: according to the Lateran Council, we excommunicate and anathematize every heresy exalting itself against the orthodox and Catholic Church. Moreover, by the authority of the same Council, we declare, as heretics, both obstinate and separated from the communion of the faithful, all who attempt to believe, and obstinately to assert, otherwise than the Roman Church believes and teaches." §

[Council of Lateran.—"But we decree, also, to subject to excommunication, the believers, the receivers, the defenders, the abettors, of heretics." ¶

[Council of Sens.—"By the authority of the same Council, we decree, that believers, receivers, defenders, and abettors of heretics, are subject to excommunication." ††

[Council of Lateran.—"Let such persons, when condemned, be left to the secular powers who may be present, or to their officers, to be punished in a fitting manner." ‡‡

[Council of Sens.—"Let those condemned for heresy, if they will not return to the unity of the Catholic faith, remain out of the pale of the Church, and be adjudged to perpetual imprisonment, that they may perpetually do penance in the bread of pain, and the water of sorrow. Those condemned for heresy, (if they be unwilling to abjure it,) if they are laymen, are straightway to be left to secular judgment. Moreover, those who have been guilty of one species of heresy, or have erred in one article of faith, and afterwards have simply or generally abjured heresy, if then they are guilty of another species of heresy, we decree to be judged as relapsed into heresy." §§

[Council of Lateran.—"But because some, under the semblance of godliness, but denying the power thereof, as the Apostle says, assume to themselves the authority of preaching; when the same Apostle says, 'How shall they preach, except they be sent?' all who, being prohibited, or not sent, shall dare, publicly or privately, to usurp the office of preaching, shall be bound with the chain of excommunication; and unless they immediately repent, shall be smitten with other suitable punishment." ¶¶

[* The Nullity of the Government of Queen Victoria in Ireland; or, the Pope, the virtual Ruler of the Land. Being an Exhibition of the Laws of the Papacy, set up by the Romish Bishops to subvert the Authority of their lawful Sovereign in 1832. By the Rev. Robert J. M'Ghee, A.M. Pp. 105—107. 12mo. Second edition. London, 1841.

[† "Generale decretum continens hæresion, quæ nunc pullulant, species, earum detestationem, modum judicandi ac discernendi hæreticos ac relapsos, formam et ordinem procedendi contra eosdem, eorundem etiam acerbas pœnas, ac demum exhortationem ad principes potestates sæculares dei illis profligandis et exterminandis."—Concil. Labbe, tom. xiv., col. 440. Paris, 1672.

[‡ "Excommunicamus et anathematizamus omnem hæresim extollentem se adversus hanc sanctam, orthodoxam, catholicam fidem, quam superius exposuimus: condemnantes universos hæreticos quibuscumque nominibus censeantur, facies quidem habentes diversas, sed caudas ad invicem colligatas, quia de vanitate conveniunt in idipsum."—Idem, tom. xi., pars i., col. 148, B. Paris, 1671.

[* "Hinc est quod in hoc nostro provinciali Concilio, quod ad corrigendos excessus et extirpandas hæreses, juxta Chalcedonense ac Lateranense Concilia, adunatum est, ad Dei honorem, fidei orthodoxæ exaltationem, ac subditorum nostrorum pacem, augmentum, et tranquillitatem; duximus, habito suffraganeorum nostrorum consensu, ac multorum divini et humani juris interpretum consilio, his tantis periculis salubriter ac celeriter providendum: antiquos scilicet canones (quorum utique custodes et executores constituimur) aut declarantes, aut renovantes, seu ex potestate nobis concessa, interdum adjectione pœnæ communientes. In primis juxta Lateranense Concilium excommunicamus et anathematizamus omnem hæresim extollentem se adversus orthodoxam et Catholicam Ecclesiam. Universos insuper qui aliter quam Romana credit et prædicat Ecclesia credere et pertinaciter asserere attentant, ejusmodi Concilii autoritate, velut hæreticos et pertinaces et a communione fidelium separatos declaramus."—Idem, tom. xiv., col. 441, A, B. Paris, 1672.

[† "Credentes vero præterea, receptatores, defensores, et fautores hæreticorum excommunicationi decernimus subjacere."—Idem., tom. ix., pars i., col. 150, C.

[‡ "Ejusdem Concilii autoritate credentes, receptatores, defensores, et fautores hæreticorum, excommunicationi subjacere decernimus."—Idem, tom. xiv., col. 441, C.

[§ "Damnati vero sæculariburs potestatibus præsentibus, aut eorum bailivis, relinquantur animadversione debita puniendi."—Idem, tom. xi., pars i., col. 148, C.

[¶ "Damnati de hæresi, si ad unionem fidei catholicæ redire noluerint, maneant de foro Ecclesiæ, et ad agendam perpetuam pœnitentiam in pane doloris et aqua tristitiæ, perpetuo carceri deputentur. Damnati de hæresi, (si eam abjurare noluerint,) si laici sunt, statim sunt judicio sæculari relinquendi," &c.

[†† "Insuper eos qui in una specie hæresis commiserunt, aut in uno fidei articulo erraverunt, et post simpliciter, vel generaliter hæresim abjuraverunt, si tunc in aliam speciem hæresis committunt, velut relapsos in hæresim decernimus judicandos."—Idem, tom. xiv., col. 442, A.

[‡‡ "Quia vero nonnulli sub specie pietatis, virtutem ejus juxta quod ait Apostolus abnegantes, autoritatem sibi vendicant prædicandi, cum idem Apostolus dicat: 'Quomodo prædicabunt nisi mit-

[COUNCIL OF SENS.—"Hence it is, that most strictly, according to the sacred General Council of Lateran, we prohibit its being lawful for any one every where to usurp the office of preaching; nor let them go forth to preach, unless to whom, either by right, or by the Pope, or by licence of the Bishop of the place, it be conceded." *

[COUNCIL OF LATERAN.—"We add, moreover, that every Archbishop or Bishop shall, either by himself or his Archdeacon, or other honest and suitable persons, twice, or at least once, every year, go round his own parish, (diocess,) in which there shall be a report that heretics inhabit; —— and there shall compel three or more men of credible testimony, or, if it shall seem expedient, the whole neighbourhood, to swear, that if they shall know any heretics there, or any holding secret conventicles, or differing from the ordinary conversation, life, and morals of the faithful, they shall endeavour to give intimation of it to the Bishop." †

[COUNCIL OF SENS.—"Moreover, we ordain that our Suffragans, if they shall perceive that any places are suspected of heresy, by themselves or others, as quickly as possible visit those places, and exact from those of the neighbourhood, an oath to betray heretics of this kind, and conventicles doing unlawful things. And if, in the expurgation of such sort of leaven, they shall be remiss or negligent, let them understand that they will incur the penalties which are contained in the sacred General Council of Lateran."‡

[COUNCIL OF LATERAN.—"If any Bishop shall have been negligent or remiss in purifying his diocess from the leaven of heretical pravity, when this shall be made to appear, by certain proofs, he shall be deposed from his episcopal office." §

[COUNCIL OF SENS.—"Lastly, we ordain that Governors and Consuls of cities, according to the sacred General Council of Lateran, personally make oath that they will faithfully and effectually assist the Church in the matter of such sort of heresy, and put forth helping hands." ‖

[Having perused the above confutation of the pestiferous and flagrant equivocation and falsehood of the Romish Prelates, our readers will be prepared for the information, that, whilst these mitred heads of the Papacy were endeavouring to conciliate the good opinion of their Protestant fellow-subjects, by denying that they held certain intolerant, treacherous, and seditious principles, which Protestants apprehended they maintained, and that the third canon of the fourth General Lateran Council had any force or authority, not only in Ireland, but in Christendom, and endeavouring to make it appear doubtful that this canon had ever been enacted at the fourth Lateran Council, they had been long and secretly training their Priests in a standard of theology by Peter Dens, which contained the very principles they were denying on oath, which standard was read in all the Roman Catholic colleges except Maynooth, where it was not openly adopted; that, in the same standard, the fourth Lateran Council is enumerated among those whose authority they declare to be infallible; and that, while they were pretending to deny that this third canon was enacted in this Council, its existence in numerical order, as the third canon, is proved both by Dr. Murray's Statutes of 1831, a book by which the Priests of his diocess were to direct the consciences of the people committed to their charge, and also by the very Catechism which Dr. Murray and Dr. Doyle were teaching the children in their diocesses; and, consequently, it is among those canons which these Prelates have sworn themselves, and which they make their beneficed Priests swear, to obey.

[This deplorable instance of hypocrisy and deceit was publicly noticed by the Rev. Robert J. M'Ghee in the following letter, addressed to Dr. Murray, which appeared in the Dublin Evening Mail, Oct. 5th, 1840:—

["THE THIRD CANON OF THE FOURTH LATERAN COUNCIL, SET UP BY DR. MURRAY AND THE ROMISH BISHOPS, AS THE LAW FOR EXTERMINATING THE PROTESTANTS OF IRELAND OUT OF THEIR RESPECTIVE DIOCESSES. 1832.

["DUBLIN, September 28th, 1840.

["SIR,

["Indisposition and consequent absence from home have prevented the more speedy redemption of my promise. But it is well that the nation should see the crimes of the Papacy substantiated with slow and calm deliberation. It is well that men should have time to think over the case, and to see that no opportunity afforded you to recur to every resource of self-defence can enable you to urge one syllable in your vindication, or allow you any result from the denial of your guilt, beyond the mortifying additional exposure of your folly and audacity in attempting to deny it.

["I now proceed to examine your statement as to the third canon of the Fourth Lateran Council. You say in your letter, read in London by Mr. O'Connell, that it is utterly false that this canon is contained in the eighth volume of Dens.

["My reply is,—

["That your statement is thoroughly destitute of all truth, for that it is contained in that volume. That you know it to be thoroughly destitute of truth, for that you know it is contained in that volume. That this canon is cited in that volume as the authority, for yourself and tantur?' omnes qui prohibiti, vel non missi, præter autoritatem ab apostolica sede, vel Catholico Episcopo loci susceptam, publice vel privatim prædicationis officium usurpare præsumpserint, excommunicationis vinculo innodentur: et nisi quantocyus resipuerint alia competenti pœna plectantur."—Idem, tom. xi., pars i., col. 149, D, E.

[* "Hinc est quod districte juxta sacrum Generale Lateranense Concilium prohibemus, ne passim liceat cuivis prædicationis officium usurpare: neque ad prædicandum prodeant, nisi quibus aut a jure, aut a Papa, aut Episcopo loci licentia concedatur. Quomodo enim prædicabunt nisi mittantur?"—Idem, tom. xiv., col. 143, A.

[† "Adjicimus insuper ut quilibet Archiepiscopus vel Episcopus, per se, aut per Archidiaconum suum, vel idoneas personas honestas, bis aut saltem semel in anno propriam parochiam, in qua fama fuerit hæreticos habitare, circumeat: et ibi tres vel plures boni testimonii viros, vel etiam, si expedire videbitur, totam viciniam jurare compellat, quod si quis ibidem hæreticos sciverit vel aliquos occulta conventicula celebrantes, seu a communi conversatione fidelium, vita, et moribus dissidentes, eos Episcopo studeat indicare."—Idem, tom. xi., pars i., col. 152, A, B.

[‡ "Ordinamus insuper, quod suffraganei nostri, si viderint aliqua loca esse de hæresi suspecta, per se aut alios idoneos quam citius ad illa accedant, et ab illis de vicinia exigant sacramentum de prodendis hujusmodi hæreticis, ac de conventiculis illicita facientibus.

["Et si in expurgando hujusmodi fermento fuerint remissi aut negligentes, intelligant se pœnas incursuros quæ in sacro Generali Lateranensi Concilio continentur."—Idem, tom. xiv., col. 443, A, B.

[§ "Si quis enim Episcopus super expurgando de sua diœcesi hæreticæ pravitatis fermento negligens fuerit vel remissus: cum id certis indiciis apparuerit, ab episcopali officio deponatur."—Idem, tom. xi., pars i., col. 152, C.

[‖ "Novissime ordinamus quod Rectores et Consules civitatum, juxta sacrum Generale Lateranense Concilium, corporaliter præstent sacramentum, quod fideliter et efficaciter Ecclesiam in hujusmodi negotio hæresis (cum fuerint requisiti) juxta suum officium pro viribus adjuvabunt, manusque porrigent adjutrices."—Idem, tom. xiv., col. 443, C.

your brother Bishops, to exterminate the Protestants of Ireland from your dioceses. That this is in flat violation of the evidence and the oaths of yourself and your brother Bishops, before the Committees of the Houses of Parliament, and the Commissioners of Education, in 1825 and 1826, and no less in utter violation of the confederated oath of yourself and every Popish Archbishop and Bishop in this country. I shall confine myself strictly to facts.

[" The proofs of the falsehood of your letter, read by Mr. O'Connell, lie in the compass of three short questions :—

[" First, Did you authorize the code of Papal laws, added as an eighth volume to Dens's Theology in 1832 ?

[" This is a point confessed : you have yourself declared, in your Pastoral to your Priests in October, 1836, that you did authorize its publication, and that it was in much repute in your Church.

[" The second question is, Does the publication of these laws, under your sanction, when the majority of the other Papal Bishops do not reclaim against them, put them in force as being of infallible authority and obligation on the consciences of the Roman Catholics of Ireland ?

[" This is settled on still higher authority : you have yourself sworn that this is a principle of your Church, corroborating the evidence of your predecessor, Dr. Troy ; and such is the evidence, too, of all your books, Bishops, and Professors ; so that any further proof is superfluous on the point.

[" The last and only question, then, to be settled is, Does this eighth volume, so sanctioned, and with its laws so enforced, contain this third canon of the Fourth Council of Lateran ? This is a mere question of fact, and only requires to make two or three remarks, and then to transcribe the extract.

[" The remarks are these : that the quibbling equivocation of your letter to O'Connell does not shield you, as you expect, from the direct charge of falsehood, although this canon is not actually transcribed in this volume ; because, when a law is expressly cited as an authority for any purpose, to assert that the law is not to be found where it is cited, because it is not actually transcribed there, is so utterly false and futile, that it were a waste of time to refute it. Every digest of law that ever was published, would be totally useless and absurd, if this were true. For just as it were a proof of the grossest ignorance in any writer to cite a law that had been repealed, so the citation of a law by any competent authority, evinces that that law is both in being and in force ; and you have not only said, but sworn, that the publication of a law by episcopal authority puts it into force. Now, you have laid down in this book a certain line of duty for yourself and your brother Bishops, to which you are bound by law ; and you have cited the law by the authority of which you are bound to it.

[" The duty you have laid down for yourself and your brethren, is the extermination of heretics out of your dioceses. The law which you cite to enforce this duty of your religion, is the third canon of the Fourth Lateran Council, as laid down by the infallible authority of your Pope, speaking ex cathedra, in his diocesan Synod. I shall quote the very words of your episcopal obligation, literally translated ; and then I shall quote the law by which you enforce it.

[" 1. ' The episcopal duty of Dr. Murray and his brother Bishops in Ireland, as laid down in his avowed and authorized code of laws, which, he informs us, is in much repute in his Church.'—Dens, vol. viii., p. 82.

[" Title ' Hæreticl.'—' The Bishop is bound, even in places where the office of the Holy Inquisition is in force, sedulously to take care that he may purge the diocess intrusted to him from heretics ; and, if he shall find any, he ought to punish him with the canonical punishments.'—Diocesan Synod of Pope Benedict XIV., lib. vii., cap. xxxii., n. 3, t. ii., p. 329. Nov. edit.*

[" These are, as your standard informs us, ' excommunication, confiscation, exile, imprisonment, and death.' You graciously add, to do you justice, that when we are brought before your tribunal, and renounce our errors, you can give us absolution, and reconcile us to the Church. Thanks, mitius id sane.

[" 2. ' The law cited by Dr. Murray for the enforcement of this the episcopal duty of himself and his brother Bishops.'

[" The first part of this citation I need not here transcribe, for the sake of brevity. It is found at length in my book on the Laws of the Papacy, first edition, pp. 97—99 ; second ditto, pp. 137—139. It is only necessary to state, that there is first quoted a letter of Isidorus to Pope Lucius, pressing on Bishops the duty of punishing heretics ; then, as this is considered doubtful, there is a citation, declared to be indubitable, from the Council of Rheims to the same effect. Then you proceed as follows :—

[" ' And that we may not waste our time in illustrating a subject which is undoubted amongst all, it will be abundantly sufficient to allege one sanction of Innocent III. in the Fourth General Council of Lateran, a. d. 1215, in the third canon of which, De Hæreticis, the Bishops are ordered every year, either by themselves or by their Archdeacons, to go round their own diocesses, and sedulously to investigate if any one infected with heretical contagion lies concealed in it. But it is decreed in the same place, that those who are slothful and negligent in expurging the diocess committed to them, from this heretical plague, as being guilty of a weighty crime, be deposed from their office as unworthy the pastoral ministry, and the same is decreed, tom. v., col. 22. Hardwin's Collections. We will, therefore, and command, and strictly enjoin, in virtue of your obedience, that the Bishops diligently watch, through their diocess, that they may efficiently perform their duty, if they would wish to escape canonical vengeance ; for if any Bishop shall have been negligent in purging from his diocess the leaven of heretical pravity, or be remiss when that shall have appeared on certain proofs, he shall both be deposed from the episcopal office, and another be appointed in his place, a fit person, who shall be both willing and able to confound heretical pravity.'

[" This is your citation of your Church's law for the discharge of your episcopal duty, which you have published as the law for this country in 1832 ; this is your citation in this eighth volume of Dens, of which you have the daring audacity to write to Mr. O'Connell in London, and assert that it is an impudent fabrication that it is set forth in that book.

[" Now, Sir, if this quotation is true, my answer is

[* " Tenetur Episcopus etiam in locis ubi officium S. Inquisitionis viget, sedulo curare ut creditam sibi diœcesim ab hæreticis purget ; et si quem repererit, pœnis canonicis punire debet."—Dens Theol., tom. viii., p. 82.]

irrefragable; namely, that your letter to Mr. O'Connell is utterly destitute of all truth; that you know it to be utterly destitute of truth; that this canon is set forth in this book; and that this is in flat violation of all the most solemn oaths given by you and your brother Bishops to blind and delude the nation.

["Your evidence remains upon the records of the British Parliament. I have made sufficient extracts from it in my book on the Laws of the Papacy to preclude the necessity of loading with it the columns of a newspaper. But the facts of the case ought to be published to the ends of the world.

["(1.) You swore that 'it was exceedingly doubtful whether or not that canon was ever enacted in the Council of Lateran.' (Page 106.)

["But while you were swearing this, you knew that it had not only been enacted, but while you pretended to quote Collier, that is, a Protestant historian, as a witness against an infallible Popish canon, you knew that there was not a single authority in the Church of Rome that had ever dreamed of calling it into question, but that it is cited by almost every Canonist in your Church.

["(2.) You pretended, as a reason for your evidence, that 'no ancient manuscript records it.' (Page 106.)

["But while you were making this pretence, you knew not only that it was placed on record in manuscript, but in print; that your Pope Gregory IX. had actually embodied this identical canon verbatim into your canon law; that he did so fifteen years after the canon was enacted in the Council; that he recorded it as the canon passed in the Council in the time of his predecessor, Innocent III. You knew that it remains embodied in that canon law which you acknowledge as the canon law of your Church, from fifteen years after it was enacted, when mistake was utterly impossible as to its enactment, till the very hour you were pretending to deny its antiquity and authenticity on your oath.

["(3.) You swore that, 'allowing it to have been enacted, it was done by the civil authorities of Christendom who were there assembled.' (Page 107.)

["But, while you were making this statement, you knew, as well as you know your existence, that it is a principle of your Church, that no secular powers whatever, though they be present in an ecclesiastical Council, have any share or voice in one single enactment passed in that Council. You knew that this was a principle taught in Delahogue, the Class-Book of Maynooth. You knew that, while you were giving this evidence to the Parliamentary Committee, the very opposite principles were thus taught in your College; and, when you gained emancipation, you set up the code of Papal law, from the very Works of Benedict XIV., which proved that your evidence had been deliberately false, and that no secular power was ever permitted to give a vote in your Councils. I have quoted the authority verbatim in my book on the Laws of the Papacy; and so I omit it here.

["(4.) You swore that 'this law was enacted to repress the errors of the Albigenses;' that 'these errors threatened the very existence of society itself;' that 'these errors aimed at the extirpation of the human race, and that, therefore, society, for its own protection, thought it necessary to have recourse to the strongest possible measures, in order to stop the mischief.' (Page 107.)

["Though your evidence in this was false as to the Albigenses, as you well know,—for you know they were men whose only guilt consisted in their hostility to Romish superstition,—but, granting your evidence true, see what the truth of your testimony demonstrates.

["This law, which you say was enacted against those who 'threatened the very existence of society,' you have set into force against the unoffending Protestants of Ireland.

["This law, which you swore society was justified in enacting against monsters, who 'aimed at the extirpation of the human race,' you have dared to set up as the law by which you and your brethren, on the Papal bench, are bound to purge your dioceses of heretics. Your pretence of the enormity of the guilt of the Albigenses enhances, in proportion, the dark atrocity of your own; for when, to palliate the bitter cruelty of the law, you attempt to blacken the character of the men against whom you say it was necessary to enact such a statute, you acknowledge the full ferocity of that law. Dr. Doyle confesses and dilates on it; he tells us it is a law to 'drench our streets and our fields in blood;' and you do this to lull the nation into full security, that it was impossible you could hold principles, which you confessed to be of such deep and unrelenting persecution. But, the moment you attain the end of your impostures and your oaths, you put the identical law of persecution into operation, and set it up as a standard of episcopal duty, for yourself and your brethren, to exterminate out of your dioceses your Protestant fellow-subjects.

["What had the Protestants committed against you? They had received your evidence; they had believed your oaths; they had granted you power on the faith of your veracity in abjuring the laws of your intolerant and persecuting superstition: but the first use you make of their confidence and their concession, is to put in force for their extermination the very laws you had forsworn. If other Papal Bishops had done it, if you had been merely like the Bishops of the other provinces, a passive partner in the deed, there had been a shade less dark in the complexion of your guilt; but that you and Dr. Doyle,—the very men who had abjured these laws,—evading, renouncing, denying even their existence on your oaths; that you should be the very men to set them up in your dioceses as the authority on which you are to exterminate the Protestants of Ireland, leaves nothing for human imagination to deepen the colour of such deliberate, black, ingrained, infernal perfidy."*]

13. The thirteenth General Council, or the first of Lyons, was held by Innocent IV., in the year 1245.† Innocent, in consequence of the difficulties existing between him and the Emperor,‡ Frederick, not thinking himself safe in any part of Italy, went to Lyons, in 1244, and called a Council in 1245, composed of one hundred and forty Bishops. The Gallic Church refused to acknowledge this as a General Council; though the true sons of the Church place it in the list, where it remains. The Pope declared Frederick deprived of the imperial crown, with all its honours and privileges, and of all his estates; he released his subjects from their oath of allegiance; forbade their farther obedience, on pain of excommunication; commanded the electors of the empire to choose a successor, and recommended to that dignity

[* M'Ghee's Laws of the Papacy, pp. 239—246.]

[† "Decimum tertium est Lugdunense I. Episcoporum 140, anno 1245 congregatum contra Fredericum Imperatorem tyrannice imperantem, qui et depositus fuit; varia etiam circa morum reformationem constituta sunt."—Dens Theol., tom. ii.; De Ecclesia, No. 88; De Conciliis.]

‡ Mosheim's Eccles. Hist., cent. xiii., part ii., chap. ii., sect. xi.

Henry, Landgrave of Thuringia.* The Bishops who were present had little or nothing to do in the acts of this Council. Indeed, it was merely a packed political meeting, in which every thing was accomplished by the Pope, or according to his dictation. Seventeen decrees passed at this Synod.

14. The second Council of Lyons was held in 1274, in which the relief of the Holy Land, the re-union of the Greek and Latin Churches, and the reformation of the Clergy, were the principal points of deliberation.† It was also determined, that on the choice of a Pope the Cardinals should be confined to the conclave until the election was decided.

[" This Council published thirty-one ordinances, principally relating to discipline. The first only treats of a point of faith, since it determines the procession of the Holy Ghost to be from the FATHER and the SON, as from one single principle; and not from two principles.

[" Among the Synods of which this century was so fruitful, one in particular, that of Toulouse, held A. D. 1229, deserves to be spoken of with detestation, in consequence of the rigorous decrees which it enacted, not only against heretics, but against those Princes who did not extirpate them from their territories. It took on itself to regulate the reading of the Scriptures; thus bequeathing for imitation a fit model for the Romish Clergy to follow. Du Pin, by way of apology, observes, that this restriction was made in consequence of the frequent perversion of the word of God at that time in France.‡ The decree alluded to, strictly prohibits laics from even having in their possession either the Old or New Testament; or from translating them into the vulgar tongue. A Psalter, Breviary, or Rosary, is recommended, likewise the Hours of the Virgin Mary." §] ||

15. The Council of Vienne, of France, was held October 1st, 1311, under Clement V.¶ Its professed objects were to examine the charges against the Templars, and to preserve the purity of the Catholic faith; to consult for the relief of the Holy Land; and to reform the manners of the Clergy, and the system of the Church.

[" The result of its deliberations on the accusations which were brought against the Knights Templar, was the publication of a Bull for their suppression, and for the transfer of their property to the Knights Hospitallers. The feast of Corpus Christi was confirmed, and the famous Rule of St. Francis established by the same Bull. And no doubt but the means and the end were worthy of a convocation like this, which the Church of Rome has dubbed with the title of 'General;' with but few Bishops in attendance at it, and even those few deprived of the liberty of speaking, judging, or voting.

[" The Council likewise determined on a crusade, and formally condemned the errors of the Minorites, another name given to the followers of Peter de Oliva, if errors they should be called; to hold in detestation the corruptions of the Church of Rome, and the vices of its Pontiffs; and fearlessly to teach, that that Church was not the catholic church of Christ; that Princes were not subject to the Pope in temporals; that the host ought not to be adored, &c. Their real errors cannot be justified.

[" Like Innocent III., Clement framed divers constitutions, which, after his name, pass under the title of 'Clementines.' Besides the condemnation of the errors spoken of above, the adjustment of the privileges of the Mendicant Friars,* and the approbation of the Inquisition, no other business was transacted in this Council." †]

The Council is said to have been controlled by Philip the Fair, King of France, to whom the Pope was entirely submissive. At any rate, the Council, though consisting of about three hundred Bishops, left almost every thing to the decision of the Pontiff. Indeed, many things which are attributed to the Council were made either before or after its session. Du Pin, in concluding his history of this assembly, says, "All these constitutions were not made in the Council of Vienne, but some before, and some after; and of those which were published during the session of that Council, none but such as concern the faith, and the condemnation of the errors of the Begards and Beguins, the constitution concerning the privileges of the Mendicant Friars, the study of tongues in the Universities, and the Inquisition, were approved in it." ‡

At the commencement of the fifteenth century the Latin Church was divided into two great factions, and governed by two contending Pontiffs; namely, Benedict XII., who resided at Avignon, and Angeli Corrario, a Venetian Cardinal, under the title of Gregory XII. A plan of reconciliation, however, was formed, and both Pontiffs bound themselves by oath to make a voluntary renunciation of the Papal chair, if that step were necessary to promote the peace and welfare of the Church; but both afterward violated that oath. Some of the Cardinals of each forsook their leaders, and formed themselves into a separate body, who were designated the "Cardinals of the two obediences." In the year 1408 three Councils were appointed concerning the schism which then disturbed the Church. The first at Perpignan, by the Bull of Benedict XIII., dated June 15th. The second, in the province of Aquileia, by the Bull of Gregory XII., dated July 2d, which was to meet on Whit-Sunday, the next year. And the third at Pisa, by the letters of the Cardinals of the two obediences, assembled at Leghorn, dated July 14th, 1408, which was to meet on the 25th of March, in the following year. At this Council there were present twenty-two Cardinals; sixty-seven Ambassadors, composed of Ecclesiastics and laymen, sent by Kings or sovereign Princes; four Patriarchs; two Prothonotaries; twelve Archbishops; sixty-seven Bishops in person, and eighty-five by deputies; a great number of Abbots, Generals, Ministers, and Proctors of Orders, and Convent Priors; of deputies from the Universities of Paris, of Angiers and Montpelier; and of

* Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., vol. ii., p. 460.

[† "Decimum quartum est Lugdunense II., anno 1274 habitum pro recuperatione Terræ Sanctæ, et ut Græci ad fidem communionemque Ecclesiæ Romanæ revocarentur; inita est pax a Latinis cum Græcis; sed ab his non diu servata."—Dens Theol., tom. ii.; De Ecclesia, No. 88; De Conciliis.]

[" ‡ Du Pin's Eccles. Hist., vol. ii., p. 456.

[" § 'Prohibemus etiam, ne libros Veteris Testamenti aut Novi laici permittantur habere, nisi forte Psalterium, vel Breviarium pro Divinis Officiis, aut Horas beatæ Mariæ; sed ne præmissos libros habeant in vulgari translatos, arctissime inhibemus.'—Concilia Labbe, Tolos., tom. xi., pars i., col. 430."]

[‖ Grier's Epitome of Councils, p. 204.]

[¶ "Decimum quintum est Viennense in Gallia, anno 1311, Episcoporum circiter 300, contra errores Beguardorum, et Beguinarum, ac Fratricellorum, docentium hominem in hac vita posse pertingere ad summam perfectionem, ita ut fiat impeccabilis et amplius proficere non possit; ideoque tunc nec orare nec jejunare debeat, nec ullis legibus amplius subjiciatur. In eo etiam definitum est, quod anima rationalis seu intellectiva sit forma corporis humani per se et essentialiter; item ordo Templariorum extinctus fuit."—Dens Theol., tom. ii.; De Ecclesia, No. 88; De Conciliis.]

[" * Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., vol. ii., p. 546."]

[† Grier's Epitome of Councils, pp. 211, 212.]

‡ Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., vol. ii., p. 546.

Proctors of an infinite number of Abbeys and Monasteries; of Chapters, cities, provinces, and other communities. Alexander V. confirmed the acts of this Council by his Bull, dated the last day of January, 1410.* The authority of the Council of Pisa was acknowledged by all the national churches of Europe, except those of Arragon, Castile, Bavaria, and Scotland; and Rome itself, by placing Alexander in the list of its genuine Popes, has vouchsafed unto it the same acknowledgment.

In this Council it was asserted, that the Church or a Council was superior to the Pope, and that this was the opinion of the Universities of Paris, Angiers, Toulouse, and three hundred Doctors of the University of Bavaria. The assembly declared, that the union of the two Colleges was lawful and just, that the Cardinals had power to appoint the General Council, that the city of Pisa was a fit place for holding it, and that Popes could be called to an account by a Council.

On the fifth day of June the definitive sentence was pronounced against the two contending Popes; namely, "That this Holy General Council, representing the whole Church, to whom belonged the cognizance and decision of this cause, having examined all matters relating to the union of the Church, and the schism between Peter de Luna, called Benedict XIII., and Angelus Corrarius, otherwise called Gregory XII., upon mature deliberation, have declared with a unanimous consent, that all the facts alleged against them by the Proctors of the Council are true and notorious, and that the two competitors are manifestly schismatics, favourers of schism, heretics, guilty of perjury and of the violation of their oaths; that they give a scandal to the whole Church by their manifest obstinacy and contumacy; that they are unworthy of all honour and dignity, and particularly of the pontifical; and that they are fallen from it, deprived of it, and separate from the Church, ipso facto; that, nevertheless, the Church does now deprive them by this definitive sentence, and forbid them to use the titles of sovereign Pontiffs; declares that the Church of Rome is vacant, absolves all Christians from the obedience which they may have promised them, and forbids any person to obey them, to help or conceal them for the future; ordains, that those who shall not obey this sentence shall be punished by the secular powers; declares all the judgments or sentences which they have given, or shall give, to be null and void, as well as the nominations of Cardinals which have been made by them." †

The Cardinals promised, that whosoever of them should be chosen Pope should continue the Council, and not dissolve it until the Church should be reformed in its head and members; that is, the Pope and Clergy. Peter Philaret, of Candy, was chosen, who assumed the name of Alexander V. At this time there were three Popes in the Church of Rome. Modern Romanism does not place this in the list of General Councils, though it has as good a claim to that name as others which are acknowledged as such.

["At the period of the celebration of the Synod at Pisa, there was a rational and well-grounded hope formed, that the Church, which was not only overspread with corruption, but torn asunder by schism, would endeavour to restore peace and tranquillity to its own bosom. Nor was the hope disappointed to the extent to which it could be realized; since this very assembly laid down for its guidance what has been deemed an outline of the Reformation. Its fixed determination, in the outset, was to purify the Church; and, accordingly, it deposed both the aspirants to the Papal tiara. Benedict XIII. and Gregory XII. had solemnly sworn, that they would severally relinquish their claims to the Papal chair, should it appear conducive to the peace and welfare of the Church. With the violation of their oaths to this effect, the Synod publicly accused them, and on it laid the grounds of their deposition; at the same time, that it declared them guilty of heresy, schism, and contumacy. The next step of the Synod was to elect a successor to the Papacy. Although these acts were calculated to give satisfaction, they produced no salutary effect whatever; the new Pope, Alexander V., being as refractory a character as either of the others. He refused to perform his engagements; while Benedict and Gregory, supported by the reigning Emperor, protested altogether against the authority of the Synod. The mischief which ensued to the well-being of the Church cannot easily be conceived. Here its direction under an unerring guide might be wished for; but vain would be the expectation of its existence, during the long period of fifty years, in which the schism prevailed." *]

16. The Council of Constance was summoned to meet at a city of that name, in Switzerland, in the year 1414, by John XXIII., who was engaged in this measure by the entreaties of Sigismund, from the expectation that the decrees of the Council would be favourable to his interests.† It was numerously attended. Nine-and-twenty Cardinals, and three hundred Bishops and Archbishops, were present at the second session. It was professedly held in continuation of that of Pisa, being bound by its decisions, and resting on its validity. The decisions of Pisa were confirmed, and the Council proceeded to carry them into effect. It was decreed in the fourth, and confirmed in the fifth, session, that the Pope was inferior and subject to a General Council. Their decree is: "That the Synod being lawfully assembled in the name of the Holy Ghost, which constituted the General Council, and represented the whole Catholic Church militant, had its power immediately from Jesus Christ; and that every person, of whatsoever state or dignity, even the Pope himself, is obliged to obey it in what concerns the faith, the extirpation of schism, and the general reformation of the Church in its head and members." ‡ The Council deposed the three Popes who contended for St. Peter's chair, and elected Martin V., who became the sole possessor. John Huss was condemned by this Council. A few months after the election of Martin the assembly was dismissed, or rather adjourned.

In the thirty-ninth session, held October 9th, 1417, it was enacted as a perpetual law of the Church, that General Councils should be held every tenth year from the termination of the preceding, in such places as the Pope, with the consent of the Council sitting, should appoint. But in order to meet the present exigencies of the Church, another Synod was to be assembled five years

* Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., vol. iii., p. 6.

† Idem, p. 5.

[* Grier's Epitome of Councils, pp. 218, 219.]

[† "Secutum est Concilium Constantiense anno 1414, ad abolendum schisma, quod jamdiu Ecclesiam turbaverat, pluribus se pro Pontifice gerentibus; item contra errores Wiclef et Joannis Huss, docentium omnia fato evenire, Ecclesiam constare ex solis prædestinatis, nullum esse Dominum, Prælatum, aut Episcopum dum est in peccato mortali, &c. Galli hoc Concilium inter Œcumenica recensent, verum alii illud tantum admittunt, quoad ultimas sessiones, et quoad illa, quæ approbavit Martinus V., gesta contra errores Wiclef et aliorum."—Dens Theol., tom. ii.; De Ecclesia, No. 88; De Conciliis.] after that of Constance, and a third, seven years after the second.

‡ Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., vol. iii., pp. 11, 12.

The principal object which the Council of Constance had in view, was the reformation of the Church, by setting bounds to the despotism and corruption of the Roman Pontiffs, and to the luxury and immorality of the Clergy. Nor did the Fathers deny that this was the principal end of their meeting. Nevertheless, this salutary work had insuperable obstacles in the passions and interests of those who were concerned. The Cardinals and dignified Clergy used all their eloquence and art to prevent reformation; and the new Pontiff, Martin V., was no sooner made Pope, than he employed his authority to elude and frustrate all reformation; showing by his administration, that nothing was more foreign to his intention than the amendment of the Clergy, and the restoration of the Church to its primitive state. Thus this famous Council, after sitting three years and six months, was dissolved on the second day of April, 1418, without effecting the chief purpose for which they were assembled, which was postponed to a future convocation, to be summoned within five years. Romanists consider the meeting at Constance, as the sixteenth General Council.

[" Concurrent with the proceedings of the Council of Constance against John XXIII., were the initiatory steps taken against the unfortunate Bohemian, with whose name many are familiar. A fouler blot does not stain the page of history than the treatment which he received at the hands of the Constantian Fathers. For their base, hypocritical, and treacherous conduct, no palliation can be offered, no excuse alleged. It forms a standing memorial of Popish intolerance, which sophistry cannot obliterate, nor casuistry efface. His, to be sure, was the crime to object to 'half-communion,' by which the cup was sacrilegiously withheld from the laity; his, too, was the heinous crime to say, that innocence of life was more important than outward observances; but, above all, his was the unpardonable crime to think for himself! That he entertained some erroneous and superstitious notions, is quite natural to suppose, from the habits of the age in which he lived; but what genuine son of the Church of England is there existing, who would not participate in criminality such as his; who would not respect his name and reverence his memory? To him belongs the glory of pursuing the path, which was traced out and illumined by the MORNING STAR of the Reformation, and of transmitting a bright pattern for imitation to those who afterwards perished in the achievement of that ever-blessed work.

[" The melancholy fate of John Huss, who was burned in violation of the safe-conduct granted him by the Emperor Sigismund, is an imperishable monument of disgrace to the character of the Council of Constance. Whatever faults may be attributed to this eminent Ecclesiastic, if manly independence in maintaining his opinions, and ardent zeal in exposing the vices which disgraced the conduct of the Clergy, can be considered faults, they vanish before the recollection of the death to which he was consigned. He was deemed a disobedient son of the Church by refusing to renounce his eyesight, and to submit both his will and judgment, without reservation, to the will and judgment of that Holy Mother. In a word, he refused to yield a servile obedience to ecclesiastical despotism; and therefore his doom was sealed.

[" The leading charge against him was, his requiring that the laity, as well as the Clergy, should partake of communion in both kinds.* This it was which led him to the stake, where his friend, Jerome of Prague, shortly after perished, for having maintained the same principle. In the endurance of suffering, these unfortunate Bohemians evinced the same pious fortitude, and the same constancy of mind. 'They went,' says the historian, 'to the stake as if it were to a banquet, without uttering a complaint that could betray weakness of mind. When they began to burn, they sang a hymn, which even the crackling of the flames could not interrupt. Never did any philosopher suffer death with so much courage as they endured the fire.'† The firmness and Christian temper which they displayed at the hour of trial, were of the description that won a crown of martyrdom for the aged Polycarp, and have no parallel in history, if we except the conduct of the venerable Fathers of the Reformation, Cranmer, Latimer, and Ridley, when placed in similar circumstances. We are not informed how the ashes of Jerome were disposed of; but we may suppose, that the Council carried its tender mercies so far, as to order them to be cast into the Rhine, with the ashes of Huss. With a kindred feeling, they had previously ordered the bones of Wickliffe to be disinterred, could they be distinguished from the bones of the faithful, and thrown into the river of Lutterworth; a mandate, which its compassionate agents in England punctually executed!

[" Although both Huss and Jerome suffered on the same grounds of accusation, the injustice was of a deeper dye in the case of one than of the other. As the subject which relates to the safe-conduct of the former will presently come under consideration, more needs not be said of it at present, than that it was of the most unqualified description. Jerome's was not so; and, therefore, he had comparatively less cause of complaint; although this can never justify the cruel punishment to which he was subjected. The pretended safe-conduct, which the Council sent him, was so loosely worded, that the Fathers could not be charged with a direct violation of faith:—'That no violence may be done to you, we give you by these presents a plenary safe-conduct, saving, nevertheless, justice as far as it is incumbent on us, and as the orthodox faith requires.'‡ Relying, however, on the principle of faith, so insidiously pledged by them, he inconsiderately repaired to Constance, where he soon paid the forfeit of his rashness in the tragical exhibition spoken of above.§

[" The affair of Huss has been of late rendered interesting, inasmuch as it has elicited a species of defence for

[" * There were other minor charges:—

[" 1. That he pronounced it presumption to define, that the children of the faithful, dying without baptism, could not be saved.

[" 2. That those Doctors, who affirm, that if a man will not reform by the correction of Church discipline, he should be delivered up to the secular power; follow in this the Scribes and Pharisees, who handed over Christ to secular judgment, saying, 'It is not lawful for us to put any man to death.'

[" 3. That grace was the foundation of power; and, therefore, that a King in a state of mortal sin, is not a King before the Lord.

[" 4. He opposed the worship of images.

[" † 'Ambo constanti animo, necnon et quasi ad epulas invitati, ad incendium properarunt; nullam emittentes vocem quæ miseri animi posset facere indicium. Ubi ardere cœperunt, hymnum cecinere, quem vix flamma et fragor ignis intercipere potuit.'—Æneas Sylvius, Hist. Bohem., p. 67.

[" ‡ L'Enfant, Hist. of the Council of Constance, vol. i., pp. 188, 189. 4to. London, 1730.

[" § Delahogue, in his Tract, p. 324, admits in a manner the ambiguity of the passport; yet, at the same time, justifies the conduct of the Council. The defence he sets up for it is this, that Jerome having relapsed into the heresy, which he had abjured, 'exeidit ab omni salvi conductus privilegio.'

Sigismund, of an opposite description to that set up by former writers. Spondanus, who had been raised to a bishopric for his apostasy from Protestantism, observes, 'that the Emperor could not compel the ecclesiastical power to respect the faith he had pledged, as it was beyond his jurisdiction.'* Cochlæus, the J. K. L. (the Prelate of Kildare and Leighlin) of his day, says, 'The protection of a heretic should be conditional; that the King was not greater than God, than justice, or than a Council.' But in the Parliamentary Report of 1825, Dr. Murray stated before the House of Commons, 'that the safe-conduct granted to Huss was a mere travelling passport, which promised him no other protection than that he should not be interrupted in his journey to Constance; that Constance was a free town;† and, therefore, that Sigismund could have had no control over its laws; and that as he had done all that was in his power to do, he had been guilty of no violation of promise!'‡

["Now that this gloss is at variance with the very act of the Council, with written evidence on the subject, and with the fact itself, is proved on the following grounds:—

["1. Because the decree of the Council, which was passed in consequence of the public outcry against Sigismund for a breach of faith, is to be regarded as a justification of his conduct.

["'The holy Synod declares, that no obstruction ought to be offered to ecclesiastical jurisdiction, so as that it may not be lawful, notwithstanding the said safe-conduct, to examine and judge persons who hold errors, and to punish them as justice shall require, if they refuse to renounce their errors, although they may have come to the place of judgment, relying on a safe-conduct, and otherwise would not have come,' &c.§ Here is the flagitious principle recognised in its solemn decree, and acted on by this celebrated assembly; in which it declares, that Huss was unworthy, through his obstinate adherence to heresy, of any indulgence; and that neither the divine nor the human law warranted their observance of any promise made to him, to the prejudice of the Catholic religion.

["2. The testimony of no less a personage than Æneas Silvius himself, afterwards Pius II., contradicts Dr. Murray, and proves, that what he calls 'handing Huss over to the civil power,' was a mere form, such as is observed in our law courts; when, after the criminal has been tried and condemned, he is handed over to the executioner. The very words of this writer are: 'Lata est in consessu patrum adversus contumaces (Huss and Jerome of Prague) sententia, cremandos esse, qui doctrinam Ecclesiæ respuerint. Prior igitur Johannes combustus est. Hieronymus diu postea in vinculis habitus, quum resipiscere nollet, pari supplicio affectus.'*

["Simanca, a learned Spaniard, defends part of the proceedings at Constance against Huss, and stoutly maintains, 'that faith given to heretics is not to be kept; for, if faith is not to be kept with tyrants, pirates, and other public robbers, who slay the body, much less is it to be kept with obstinate heretics who slay the soul.'

["'Rightly, therefore, were certain heretics consigned to lawful flames by the judgment of the grave Council of Constance, although their safety had been promised to them; and blessed Thomas (the angelic Doctor!) likewise holds, that an intractable heretic is to be delivered up to the Judges, notwithstanding the faith and oath by which he may have bound a Catholic.'† The existence of such a person as Simanca was first denied, then doubted by the Rev. Dr. Slevin in his examination; but when he found that this person had been an eminent Bishop in Badajos, in the sixteenth century, he labours to explain away his meaning; ineffectually, it appears, as his explanation is liable to the very objections raised against Simanca's own language. What Dr. Slevin says, is, that the principle on which that author 'supports that faith, in certain circumstances, is not to be kept with heretics, is, that an unlawful promise is not to be fulfilled, and that an oath cannot bind to do what is iniquitous.'‡ Now what authority, or what power, is competent to pronounce on the illegality or iniquity of a promise made to heretics, but the Church of Rome, which has unequivocally declared her sentiments on the very point in the sixth canon of the Council of Constance? This question is proposed to Doctors Slevin and Murray: if they be able, let them give a solution of the difficulty. But, in the mean time, let them particularly attend to what Bellarmine says of this Council: 'Hoc Concilium quantum ad primas sessiones, ubi definit Concilium esse supra Papam, reprobatum est in Concil. Flor. et Lat. IV.; reliqua probata sunt:' and they will see, that the authority of a Council above the Pope, the only point specified, is rejected. There is no allusion even to the principle, ["* Annal. Compend., cap. xiv., 15—43.

["† There are several proofs extant, that Constance was in subjection to the Emperor, and not free, so as to be independent of his authority. 'In Constance we (Sigismund speaking of himself) shall be able, according to our Imperial office, to protect all and every one in full liberty.'—Labb., tom. xvi., p. 793. At page 798, in virtue of his royal Majesty, he commands the Syndics to take an oath, which the Pope required. In the same page, the Preacher before the Council, addressing Sigismund, says, 'To thee, above all, it belongs, to whom is given the primacy of justice:' justitiæ primatus, &c.

["‡ It is quite amusing to see the wretched attempts made by the Popish Doctors to rescue Sigismund and the Council from the foul disgrace, in which their treatment of Huss involved them. Dacher says, 'that the Emperor yielded to persuasion in the affair,' 'Multis verbis persuasus, Husso et Bohemis salvi conductus fidem fregit:' while Nauclerus endeavours to vindicate the Council by another excuse equally frivolous, 'Argui non posse de fide mentita, quia Concilium non dederat ei Husso salvum conductum, et Concilium majus est Imperatore.'

["See L'Enfant's History, &c., vol. i., pp. 85, 89.

["Cochlæus, in the same style of special pleading in behalf of the Council, asserts, that the safe-conduct was conditional, and that if Sigismund had not used sufficient caution, yet that the Council declared he was wrong in not doing so; adding, that no man should be accounted of such consequence, 'ut debeat plus ei concedi publica Principis fide, quam sinat justitia, et orthodoxæ fidei ratio.'

["Historia Hussitarum, pp. 72, 81—87.

["§ The decree is entitled, 'Quod non obstantibus salvis conductibus Imperatoris,' &c.

["After the preamble, it proceeds to state: 'Nullum fidei Catholicæ, vel jurisdictioni ecclesiasticæ præjudicium generari, quo minus, dicto salvo conductu non obstante, liceat judici competenti et ecclesiastico, de hujusmodi personarum erroribus inquirere, eosdemque punire, quantum justitia suadebit, si suos errores revocare pertinaciter recusaverint, etiamsi de salvo conductu confisi, ad locum venerint judicii, alias non venturi; nec sic promittentem, cum fecerit quod in ipso est, ex hoc in aliquo remansisse obligatum.'—Labb. Sacrosanct. Concil., tom. xii., p. 169.

["* Æneas Silvius, ut supra.

["† 'Ad pœnam quoque pertinet, et hæreticorum odium, quod fides illis data servanda non est. Nam si tyrannis, piratis, et cæteris publicis prædonibus, quia corpus occidunt, fides servanda non est, longe minus hæreticis pertinacibus, quia occidunt animas.' Again: 'Jure igitur hæretici quidam gravissimi Concilii Constantiensis judicio legitima flamma concremati sunt, quamvis promissa illis securitas fuisset. Beatus quoque Thomas censet hæreticum indocilem prodendum esse judicibus, non obstante fide et juramento quibus Catholicum astrinxerit.'—Simanca, De Catholicis Institutionibus, 1560.

["‡ Appendix to the Eighth Report of the Commissioners of Irish Education Inquiry, pp. 259, 260.

that faith should not be kept with heretics. The inference then is palpable.

["3. The very fact disproves Dr. Murray's assertion; as the wording of the safe-conduct fully shows.* Sigismund takes this honourable master, as he calls Huss, under his special protection, and directs that he shall be safely escorted, and shall everywhere be permitted freely, and securely, to pass, sojourn, remain, and return, without violence or injury: transire, stare, morari, et redire. Here is no limitation, such as, if he should be acquitted. The permission granted is unqualified in its nature and object. And besides, it would appear as if the Council had pledged itself to a safe-conduct of some description or other; since Dubravius, another writer of the Bohemian history of that period, says, 'that Huss repaired to Constance, relying on the public assurance given him by the Council: fide publica a Concilio accepta.' † From all which it is evident, that the Council deceived Huss, and that Sigismund was the unconscious instrument of the deception; and that, therefore, the attempt to explain away the perfidy of the Council, or the persecuting principles by which it was governed, is perfectly futile. In short, the Council takes no pains to disguise its sentiments. It decrees, that Sigismund had no power to grant protection to Huss, as heresy was not cognizable by the temporal authorities. It pronounces the spiritual sentence, and then hands the victim over to the secular power for immolation." ‡]

Five years and upwards elapsed before another Synod was convened. Remonstrances at length prevailed over the pretexts and stratagems that were employed to evade the meeting by Martin V., who summoned a Council to meet at Pavia, whence it was removed to Sienne, and thence to Basil. ["The Synod of Sienne had for its object the union of the Greek and Latin Churches, and the Reformation of the Church, both in its head and members. One of the few decrees made by this Synod was directed against the Hussites, Wickliffites, and other dissentients from the Church of Rome, inasmuch as it granted indulgences to such as extirpated heretics; § all exemptions and safe-conducts, by whatsoever persons vouchsafed, nothwithstanding." ‖] The Pontiff died in 1431, on the 21st of February, about the period when the Council was to meet. He was immediately succeeded by Eugenius IV., who approved of the proceedings of his predecessor in reference to the assembling a Council in that city.

17. The Council of Basil was accordingly opened on July 23d, 1431. Julian Cessarini performed the duties of President, under Eugenius. The purposes for which the Council was convened were, the reunion of the Greek and Latin Churches; the reformation of the Church, in its head and members; and the reconciliation of the Hussites. The Pope opposed any reformation, which the Council was determined to effect. Hence a sharp contest arose, which finally led to an open rupture, so that the Pope excommunicated the Council, and the Council, in return, anathematized the Pope. The latter, however, after the first contest was over, again confirmed the proceedings of the Council; but, on being deposed, he excommunicated it anew.

In the course of this contest the Synod published and republished the decrees of Constance, which proclaimed the superior prerogatives of the Council. They reiterated the assertions that a General Synod represents the Church, and is, in fact, the Church; that, as such, it derives its attributes immediately from Jesus Christ; that it is infallible; and that on these grounds the Pope was subject to the Council in all things regarding the faith, the extirpation of schism, and the reformation of the Church; that he was only her ministerial head, and inferior to her; and that he possessed no power whatever, either to dissolve or transfer the assembly. The Pope took the opposite side of the question.

The legitimacy of the Council of Basil has been a subject of dispute among Roman Catholics, who have differed according to the diversity of their opinions on the extent and nature of Papal supremacy. Some have maintained that its authority expired as early as the tenth session. But even Bellarmine allows that its decrees were binding on the Church, until it commenced its deliberations on the deposition of the Pope. This last is the common opinion, even among transalpine Divines; as none can dispute its canonical convocation and origin. If it be admitted that during those few sessions which it devoted to reform, it was a true and infallible Council, the controversy respecting the succeeding sessions can have but little weight, since they were consumed in a contest with a perverse Pontiff, without producing any lasting alteration, either in the principles or administration of the government of the Church. The controversy between the Pope and Council continued till the dissolution of the latter in May, 1443, when it celebrated its last and forty-fifth session. It transferred, however, its nominal sittings to Lyons, or Lausanne, while the rival assembly, which was still sitting at Florence, withdrew, by a simultaneous secession, to Rome.

18. The Pope, in the exercise of that power which he had assumed, transferred the Council of Basil to Ferrara, on the 1st of January, 1438, to meet on the 8th, so that the first session was held on the 10th. Eugenius opened the assembly, and at the second session thundered out an excommunication against the Fathers assembled at Basil. The principal business done was concerning the proposed reconciliation between the Greeks and Latins. Here were two Councils now in session, mutually excommunicating each other.

The Council of Ferrara was transferred to Florence on February 26th, 1439, on account of the plague which had broken out at the former place. In this Council the Greeks and Latins came to some temporary agreement concerning the use of leavened or unleavened bread in the blessed sacrament, the procession of the Holy Spirit, purgatory, the supremacy of the Pope, and other affairs of less note.* The members anathematized the ["* 'Sigismond—à tous Princes, ecclésiastiques et séculiers, &c. Nous vous recommendons d'une pleine affection—Jean Huss, porteur des presentes, allant de Bohème au Concile de Constance, lequel nous avons pris sous notre protection et sauve-garde, et sous celle de l' Empire, désirans que lorsqu'il arrivera chez vous, vous le receviez bien, et le traitiez favorablement; et de laisser librement et surement passer, demeurer, s'arrêter, et retourner,' &c.—L'Enfant Hist. du Concile de Constance, tom. i., pp. 39, 52.

["† Hist. et Monumenta Bohemica. p. 102. In O'Sullivan and Phelan's elaborate Digest of Evidence on the State of Ireland, before the Parliamentary Committees in 1824-25, Huss's affair is treated of with conciseness and perspicuity."]

[‡ Grier's Epitome of Councils, pp. 223—235.]

["§ Concil. Labb., tom xiv., Concilium Senonense, col. 440, et seq. Fol. Paris, 1672."]

[‖ Grier's Epitome of Councils, pp. 237, 233.]

["Decimum sextum est Florentinum, inchoatum Ferrariæ anno 1438, sed ob pestem translatum Florentiam, ibique anno 1439 absolutum: in eo Græci convenerunt cum Latinis de processione Spiritus Sancti a Patre et Filio, de purgatorio, de primatu Romani Pontificis in universum orbem, de eucharistia, quod azymo æque

Council of Basil, and maintained the supremacy of the Pope, with unequivocal precision. This assembly is ranked among General Councils by the greater number of modern Roman Catholics, while as such the Councils of Basil and Ferrara are rejected.

[" The commencement of the sixteenth century was disgraced by the vices and enormities of one of the most profligate characters that history has ever recorded: Pope Alexander VI., whom humanity disowns, and whose deeds are without a name, was rioting in the full gratification of every sensual appetite, when a poisoned draught, which he had prepared for some of his Cardinals, cut short his flagitious life, A. D. 1503. After a short month's occupancy of the Papal chair by Pius III., it became vacant for the reception of another monster, the infamous Julius II. The propensity for war and bloodshed by which the Pontifical General was distinguished, fully bespeaks the savage ferocity of his nature. Military tactics had so engrossed his time and thoughts, that his whole Pontificate may be said to have been one continued scene of warlike bustle. Under such a head the wretched state of the Church may be easily conceived; deluded as it must have been, when it acquiesced in the ordinances of a man who, instead of preaching 'peace on earth,' breathed nothing but war and desolation. The depravation of morals, and the loss of discipline among the Clergy, eventually followed: consequences which were accompanied by the entire decay of true religion. At the moment that Christianity was thus depressed and degraded, circumstances arose which seemed to indicate a change; and that that Reformation which was so much wanted and universally desired would soon ensue.

[" The Emperor Maximilian, and Louis XII. of France, undertook to check the tyrannical spirit of Julius, as well as to reform the errors of a corrupt Church, by a Council which they assembled at Pisa. At the very opening of this Synod, they summoned Julius to appear before them, accusing him, at the same time, of perfidy and violated honour; and, finally, decreeing his suspension from the Papal dignity. This hostile movement, although it appeared at first only to have excited Julius's ridicule and contempt, yet was not altogether unheeded by him, as he issued his mandate, A. D. 1512, for holding a Council, by which he intended, after annulling the acts of the other, and condemning them as heretical, to consign their authors to perdition. This Council, which reckons as the fifth of Lateran, is esteemed by the Romish Church as the seventeenth General Council." *]

19. The fifth Lateran Council thus convened by Julius II., in April, 1512, was opened by him in person on the 3d of May.† This Council was called through the fear which the Pope entertained respecting another convened by Cardinals at Pisa, and not for the purpose of benefiting the Church. Some acts of external reformation were decreed: the doctrine of the immortality of the soul was confirmed. Fifteen Cardinals and about eighty Archbishops and Bishops were present; Dens says, one hundred and fourteen, almost all of whom were Italians of the very worst description, vilissima sedis Romanæ mancipia. Little was done in the Council to benefit Christendom; and it was adjourned in 1517, the same year in which Luther began to preach against indulgences.

20. The Council of Trent. This Council met on the 13th of December, 1545, under the direction of Paul III., Julius III., and Pius IV., and was continued to the 4th of December, 1563, a space of eighteen years.* The chief points that came under consideration were concerning the Scriptures, original sin, justification, the sacraments, the eucharist, penance, extreme unction, purgatory, and indulgences. Subsequently to the rising of this Council, the Creed of Pius IV. was formed, and published by a Bull, which contains an addition of twelve new articles to the Nicene faith; a Catechism was also written by its authority, termed Catechismus ad Parochos.

21. A difficulty is presented respecting the number of General Councils. Modern Romanists affirm there were only eighteen: those of former ages acknowledged more than this number, while others maintained there were even fewer. The first seven were Greek Councils, scarcely any Latins attending them; while the concluding eleven which are received by the modern Church of Rome were properly Latin, very few Greeks being present. The authority of some Councils is controverted; namely, that of Constantinople IV., Sardis, Smyrna, Quinisext, Frankfort, Constance, and Basil; others are rejected, as those of Antioch, Milan, Seleucia, Ephesus II., and those which were held at Pisa.

If we consider the character of Councils, taking into view what are the properties of the true, the eighteen Councils commonly reputed General will be considerably reduced in number. To constitute a true Synod, the following qualifications, in the estimation of Romanists, are requisite; namely, (1.) That the Pope convene them, and preside. (2.) That he confirm their decrees. (3.) That the members act freely, without constraint. (4.) That their decisions be received by the greater number of the Christian world. (5.) That such a time and place may be appointed, that the Bishops may meet with convenience and without restriction.

(1.) As it regards the presidency of the Pope and his assumed power of convening Councils, it is notorious, that the first four General Synods were convened by the Emperors; and the Popes neither personally nor by their Legates presided. Besides, as the Popes were occasionally the persons to be judged, it is contrary to all right that they should convene and preside over assemblies which might sit in judgment on themselves. If it be necessary in order to constitute a General Council, that the Pope should call and preside over it, then the first four reputed General, must be struck off the list.

(2.) Other Councils never received the Pope's confirmation in any manner different from that of other Bishops. The first were confirmed by the Emperors, and their respective Presidents.

(3.) Some were coerced into measures. Most of the Greek Synods were controlled by the Emperors. The Western were principally managed and directed by the Popes. In very few was there any thing like ac fermentato pane conficiatur, et de variis ritibus. Reconciliatam Græcorum cum Latinis pacem (sed quæ diu non stetit) subsecuta est Armenorum cum Ecclesia Romana unio, quia ab Eugenio IV. receperunt literas unionis compendio continentes doctrinam Catholicam."—Dens Theol., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, No. 88, De Conciliis.] free discussion. Clement V. and Philip the Fair completely swayed that of Vienne. The decrees said to be passed by the Fourth Lateran Council were confessedly the acts of Innocent III.

[* Grier's Epitome of Councils, pp. 255—257.]

[† "Decimum septimum est Lateranense V., 114 Episcoporum, inchoatum anno 1512, adversus Conciliabulum Pisanum, et ad mores reformandos; in eo definitum est, animam rationalem esse immortalem."—Dens Theol., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, No. 88, De Conciliis.]

[* "Decimum octavum est Tridentinum, inchoatum xiii. Decembris, anno 1545, propter contagionem urbem Tridentinam affligentem, Bononiam translatum, deinde Tridentum reductum, propter ingruentia bella iterum interruptum, demum die iv. Decembris, anno 1563, absolutum fuit; subscripsere Patres 255: celebratum fuit hoc Concilium, præsertim contra Lutheranorum, Calvinistarum, aliorumque hæreticorum errores tunc grassantes."—Idem.]

(4.) It is but reasonable that every thing in Councils relating to doctrines and morals should be decided by the Scripture; but in several which we have considered the word of God had little to do with their decisions.

(5.) The time and place, when and where some Councils met, were so managed by the Popes, that their decisions, in consequence, were dictated by them.

(6.) Finally, the decisions of many Synods were rejected by numerous churches and nations. France never received those of the Council of Trent. Others were treated in the same manner by other nations. The want of reception will therefore subtract more than one from the eighteen now acknowledged by the Church of Rome as General.

If the properties of a General Council now required by the Church of Rome be insisted on, there is not one of them that will escape proscription. The Greek Councils must be rejected, because the Pope did not convene or preside in them, or confirm their decrees, in their sense of a confirmation. The Latin must all be rejected, because the place and time of calling controlled them; or there was no free discussion; or their decrees were made by others besides themselves; or their decisions were rejected by a great proportion of the Christian world.

[The venerable Richard Baxter observes, that "the existence of a General Council is both naturally and morally impossible. Such a Synod ought to consist of all the Pastors or Bishops of the whole world; or so many as may, in a qualified sense, be called all. A General Council of Delegates from all the churches must consist of so many proportionably chosen as may signify the sense and consent of all; or else it is a mere name and shadow.

["(1.) From the distance of their habitations. Some dwell in Mesopotamia; some in Armenia; some in Ethiopia; some in Mexico; the Philippines, or other parts of the East and West Indies; some at St. Thomas's; some dispersed through most of the Turk's dominions. Now, how long must it be before all these have tidings of a General Council, and summons to appear, or send their Delegates? Who will be at the cost to send messengers to all these? Will the Pope? Not if he be no richer than Peter was. How many hundred thousand pounds will it cost before all can have a lawful summons? And when that is done, it will be long before they can all in their several nations meet and agree upon their Delegates, and their instructions. And when that is done, who shall bear their charges in their journey? Alas! the best of the Church's Pastors have had so little gold and silver, they are themselves unable to defray it. A few Bishops out of each of these distant countries will consume, in their journey, a great deal of money and provision. To provide them shipping by sea, and horses, and all other necessaries by land, for so many thousand miles, will require no small allowance.

["And then consider, that it must be voluntary contribution which must maintain them. And most love their money so well, and know so little of the need of such journeys and Councils, that, doubtless, they will not be very forward to so great a contribution.

["And it is not to be expected that infidel Princes will give way to the transporting of so much money from their countries on the Church's occasions, which they hate.

["But suppose them furnished with all necessaries, and setting forward; how long will they be in their journey? Shipping cannot always be had: many of them must go by land: it cannot be expected that some of them should come in less than three or four, if not seven, years' time to the Council. And will ever a General Council be held upon these terms?

["(2.) Moreover, the persons, for the most part, are not able to perform such journeys. Bishops are Elders; most of them are aged persons. The wisest are they who are best fit to be trusted in so great a business by all the rest; and few attain that maturity but the aged; especially in most of the eastern and southern churches, who want the helps of learning which we have. And will the churches be so barbarous, as to turn out their aged, faithful Pastors, upon the jaws of death? Some of them are not likely to live out so long time as the journey, if they were at home. They must pass through raging and tempestuous seas, through deserts and enemies, and many thousand miles where they must daily conflict with distress.

["It were a fond conceit, to think that (without unusual providences) ten Bishops of a thousand should come alive to the Council, through all these labours and difficulties.

["And moreover, it is known how few bodies will bear the seas, and so great change of air; how many of our soldiers in the Indies die, for one who survives! And can ancient Bishops, spent with studies and labours, endure all this? Most studious, painful Preachers here with us are very sickly, and scarcely able to endure the small incommodities of their habitations; and could they endure this?

["(3.) Moreover, abundance of the Pastors of the churches live under Mahometans and other infidels, who will not give them leave to travel so far into the countries of Christian Princes on such occasions. They hate us and our religion. They are often at war with us; and then would bow-string those Bishops as intelligencers who should offer to come among us.

["(4.) And they must, many of them, pass through the countries of other Princes who are infidels, and often in war with the parts which they come from or go to. And it cannot be expected that in such cases they should allow them passage through their countries. If one do, all will not: when poor Lithgow had travelled nineteen years, he was tortured, strappadoed, and disjointed, and made a cripple at Malaga, in the Spanish Inquisition; and thanked God and the English Ambassador, that he sped no worse.

["(5.) Even at home in Europe, the Princes are so commonly in wars, (as are France, Spain, Venice, Sweden, Denmark, Poland, the Emperor, Brandenburgh, Holland, Portugal, England, Transylvania, &c., at this very day,) that there is not the least probability that they should all or half consent to have so many of their subjects pass into their enemies' countries to reside so long. Jealousies, raised by particular interests, would make it treason.

["(6.) Moreover, many Princes understand that the Pope has no power to call such Councils, nor any man else; and they know the design of the Pope to subject the world to himself. And therefore they will dread and oppose their subjects travelling so far at his call who has such designs, or at another man's who nas no authority to call them. This has made the Emperor of Abyssinia so resolutely resist the Pope's pretensions, as Godignus, Maffæus, and others declare. Few Princes will endure to have their subjects brought under a foreign power.

["(7.) And if you suppose all the Bishops come to the Council, the very number out of all the Christian world (to make any thing like a General Council) would be so great, as would be unfit for one, or two, or ten, or twenty Council-houses or assemblies.

["(8.) And they would be incapable of conferring, through diversity of languages. Few of the Abyssinians, Egyptians, Syrians, Armenians, or most of the world, understand and speak any language that would commonly be understood and used in a Council. Nor is it possible to do it by interpreters. For so many interpreters cannot be used to tell all who understand not, what every man says, and to expound their minds to others. This would waste an age in a Council; so that it would be a very Babel.

["(9.) And Councils are generally so long, that it cannot be expected, after so many years' journeying, that old men should live to see the issue, or effect any great matters there. Eighteen years at Trent would consume a great many of the Bishops. How many even of the Pope's own Legates died before that Council could be finished!

["(10.) And if they should live to see the end, can you dream that they should live to perform the like tedious, dangerous journeys and voyages to bring back the decrees of the Council to their churches? Judge now whether such Councils are not naturally impossible.

["I will add but this. No men can be compelled. And to make all the world at once agree to so difficult a task, and consent to the time and place, must be a miracle. One will be for it, and another against it. One for one time and place, and another for another, through most of the world. We see how hardly any two Princes can agree upon times, places, and all circumstances, in their treaties." *]

22. The Council of Trent particularly considered.

We make the following exceptions to this celebrated Synod:—

(1.) The Pope, in calling and presiding over the Council, absolutely controlled its decisions: he rejected all proposals of the Emperor for calling it, till necessity compelled him to comply. It was resolved at Rome not to venture any more General Councils in Germany, though much desired by the Emperor, and German Princes and Bishops, because that country breathed too much freedom for the interest of the Pope. When a Synod must be called, the Pontiff summoned it first at Mantua, then at Vicenza; and when none would go thither, he at last agreed it should be at Trent, a most inconvenient place. Though all possible restraint was used to prevent the mention of reformation; yet some free expressions were occasionally uttered, which troubled the Legates, who sent notice of it immediately to Rome, from whence they received instructions how to act. Nevertheless, this did not prevent their fears lest something might be done affecting the Pope's interest. To make all sure, His Holiness translated the Council to Bononia, and left the Emperor's Bishops at Trent. And when, upon the protestations of the Emperor and the King of France, he found it necessary to remove it back again to Trent, though any fair pretence would have been taken to dissolve it; but as that could not be done, the greatest care was used to prolong the time, in hope that some occurrence might furnish a plausible pretext for breaking up the assembly. Nothing passed in the Council but what had been prepared at the Vatican; which gave occasion to the common and sarcastic remark, that "the Holy Ghost came in a portmanteau once or twice a week from Rome."

But when, notwithstanding all this, the residence and power of Bishops were so freely maintained by the Spanish Prelates, what arts were employed to prevent discussion! When those would not do, what private cabals were kept up by the Legates! What despatches to, and instructions from, Rome! What a multitude of Italians were made Bishops, and sent to Trent to outvote them! When the French Bishops came, they were watched by spies, and means were employed by the Court of Rome to divide them and the Spanish Prelates. All that bribery could invent was used to bring the Cardinal of Lorraine over to the Court of the Pope. When any spoke freely, checks, and frowns, and disgrace were adopted to correct them. It is no wonder that the whole conclave rejoiced when they found that the decisions of the Council, which were intended to place a check upon them, proved in the issue favourable to their interests. This was truly the head presiding over the members; for all the life and influence they had proceeded from the Pope. Call you this presiding in a Council? It is rather controlling and coercing it to do according to the will of the Pontiff. And such is the history which the Roman Catholic Sarpi, and Du Pin, give of the proceedings of this assembly.

As the Pope himself was the chief person to be reformed, it was contrary to all human and divine law that he should preside in the Council, and control and overrule its decisions. We know it is said, that "the Pope, not being justly accusable of any crime, but such as must involve the whole Church and Council as well as himself, there was no just cause why he should not preside." To this we answer, that, according to such a plea, it is impossible that the errors and corruptions of a Church should be reformed, when the governors of the Church abet and maintain such delinquencies. If it be said, "It is impossible the governors of the Church should do so;" we answer, that this is contradicted by experience. When, therefore, the superiors of the Church utterly oppose reformation and correction, what is to be done? Must the Church continue as it was before, merely because the superiors make themselves parties to the evils which are complained of? To say, that "the head must preside over the members," is an excellent argument to defend all usurpations both in the Church and State. If they call themselves alone "the head," this will screen them from all censure, although they may be guilty of heresy, blasphemy, idolatry, or any other crime. If, as Romanists say, "the head must be over the members;" and "it will bring confusion into the Church if any shall protest against their superiors as parties;" it is the same as to assert that it is impossible the superiors in the Church can be guilty of any error or corruption; or that, if they be, they must never be called to an account for it; otherwise it may be right in some cases to object to their conduct, and refuse to be present in the Council. If the Popes had exercised the same power over the Councils of Constance and Basil, none of the Anti-Popes of the day would have been deposed. But when the Popes became wiser by such examples, they resolved never to allow another General Council; which they accomplished; for all subsequent assemblies were the veriest slaves of the Pope, by whom they were completely controlled. Hence, for nearly three hundred years, no General Council has been called, and it is unlikely that another will ever sit.

[* A Key for Catholics to open the Juggling of the Jesuits, &c. By Richard Baxter. A new Edition, revised and corrected, with Notes, &c. By the Rev. Josiah Allport. 8vo. Pp. 477—480. London, 1839.]

(2.) The place where the Tridentine Council was held was inconvenient of itself, and completely under the influence of His Holiness. This was an important consideration, and by this means the Council was subject to the surveillance and direction of the Pontiff.

(3.) We object to the members who composed this assembly: they were few in number, and principally Italians, some of whom had no diocesses, they were under the control of the Pope, were enemies to the Protestants, many of them were of scandalous lives, and totally unskilled in divinity.

First. The assembly of Bishops at the Council of Trent was small, compared with the number of Bishops throughout the world. There were only a few Greek Prelates, and these acted as private individuals, for they were not sent as representatives of the Greek Church. In some sessions there were scarcely ten Archbishops, or forty or fifty Bishops, present. In all the sittings under Paul III., there were but two Frenchmen, and sometimes not one; as in the sixth session, under Julius III., when Henry II., of France, protested against the Synod.

Secondly. The acting Bishops were chiefly Italians. Italy abounds with Bishops, who are true subjects of the Pope; and, consequently, what was effected by the Prelates who were present, must be ascribed to the Italians. On any emergency their number was increased, by the Pope ordaining new ones; for, when there was any fear that business would not go right at the Council, nothing more was necessary than for the Legates to defer its decision by some artifice, and a fresh supply of Italian Bishops would be sent from Rome to their relief. Thus forty Bishops were made at once, and sent to Trent, when the institution and residence of this order came under examination.

Thirdly. Some Prelates had no diocesses, and were, therefore, improper representatives.

Fourthly. They were the sworn vassals of the Pope, and on that account were entirely under his direction; and consequently unfit persons to decide in cases where the authority, privileges, or royalties of the Pontiff were concerned. This is manifest from the oath itself: "I will take care to preserve, defend, increase, and promote the rights, honours, privileges, and authority of the Roman Church, and of our Lord the Pope, and his successors aforesaid." But lest this should not be full enough, there follows another clause: "I will not be in any council, action, or debate, in which they shall plot or contrive any thing to the prejudice of our Lord the Pope, or the Roman Church; or of any persons, right, honour, state, or power belonging to them." Was this a fit oath for members of a free Council, where the chief thing to be debated was the usurped power of the Pope and Church of Rome? He that can believe a Council made up of persons who take this oath, and judge it lawful to be a free Council, may think those at liberty to rebel against civil authorities who had just taken the oath of allegiance thereto. The Pope knew what he was doing when he refused to absolve Bishops from this oath, to which the states of the empire urged him, as necessary to the freedom of the Council. "No," said the Pope, "I do not mean to have my hands bound so." He knew how much his interest was at stake, if the Bishops were released from that oath; and was resolved to hold them fast to its obligation. What restrictions and limitations are in this oath, whereby persons taking it might freely debate the power and authority of the Bishop of Rome? They that swear, "not to be in any council or debate against the Pope," are not proper members of a free Synod. Protestants had just cause to repudiate this, where all the Prelates were sworn beforehand to maintain and defend that which was the principal subject of complaint. Were there nothing else but this oath, which was unheard-of in all ancient Councils, and so contrary to the ends of justice, it were enough to prevent them from ever submitting to the judgment of such an assembly as that of Trent.

In justification of this adjuration, it is said, that "it is no new thing for Bishops to take an oath of canonical obedience to the Pope; for St. Gregory mentions it as an ancient custom of his time; and, therefore, this objection would hold as much against ancient Councils as against that of Trent." To this we answer, that no instance can be produced of an oath taken to the Pope by any of those who composed the first General Councils. It was in later times that the promise of canonical obedience from Bishops to their Metropolitans was introduced; and when it was, none made it but those who were under the metropolitical jurisdiction of the supreme Pontiff. The oath or promise mentioned by Gregory, in his Epistle,* is not that of canonical obedience taken or made by a Bishop at his consecration, but only a form of renouncing heresy by one who had abandoned his errors, and had come over to the Catholic Church. Accordingly, the title of it is, Promissio cujusdam Episcopi hæresin suam anathematizantis: "The promise of any Bishop who renounces his heresy." What is this to the oath taken by every Roman Bishop at his consecration, where he swears to defend and maintain the Roman Papacy and royalties of St. Peter against all men? So their new Pontifical has it; whereas, in the old one, it was regulas sanctorum Patrum, "the rules of the holy Fathers." Their present engagement is much more than a bare oath of canonical obedience. The first mention that we have of a promise of that kind, entered into by persons in orders, is in the tenth canon of the eleventh Council of Toledo, held in 675: it is termed a matter of expediency, that "those in orders should bind themselves under their hand, to observe the Catholic faith, and to be obedient to their superiors." But here is nothing concerning an oath to be taken by all Bishops to the Pope; for this was much later than the time of this Council, as it dates its origin from the contests which existed between the Popes and Princes respecting investiture. At that time the Pope, to secure as many as he could in his own interest, bound them, not by an oath of canonical obedience, but by one of fealty and allegiance, by which the Bishops were made his slaves and vassals. Thus the engagement, which was at first only a promise of renouncing heresy and receiving the true faith, and of canonical obedience when Metropolitans or Patriarchs came into being, was afterwards converted by the Pontiffs into an oath of absolute and servile obedience to themselves, so that no Bishop can be ordained without coming under its obligations.

They also apologize for this form of adjuration by telling us, "that, notwithstanding the oath, they may proceed and vote against the Pope himself." Certainly Pope Pius II. was of another opinion, when, in an epistle to the chapter of Mentz, he said, that even "to speak the truth against the Pope was to break the oath." But the reader needs only to consult the engagement itself, given in another part of this work, and he will at once perceive the inconsistency of such a plea. We mean the oath, not as it exists in the old Roman Pontifical, but as it was taken in the time of Julius III., and in use when the Council of Trent sat; in which there is contained a vow of obedience to the Pope and his successors, and also a promise to conceal whatever instructions he might communicate.

* Greg. Epist., lib. x., cap 31.

Fifthly. A great proportion of the Bishops, who composed the Council of Trent, were unlearned in divinity. Hence, as Stella informs us, they actually brought skilful Divines to illuminate them. He adds also, that it would have been better for the Bishops, had they given their diocesses to those Divines. What sober scriptural decisions could be expected from men who were so utterly unacquainted with the points which they were called to discuss and decide upon?

(4.) The scandalous lives and unchristian conduct of many of the Bishops of the Council, give no great assurance that the proceedings were directed by the Spirit of truth.

(5.) The authority of the Council is much diminished, inasmuch as it maintained publicly, that it was lawful for them to decide controversies, and make articles of faith, independent of the sacred Scripture. They decided on the supposed authority of unwritten tradition, or on that of their own, because they assumed that they were under the direct influence of the Holy Spirit of God for this express purpose. How opposed was this to the course pursued by the first General Councils, which decided all things by the inspired, though written, word of divine truth!

(6.) The decisions of the Council of Trent are open to numerous objections; such as the following:—

First. Many of the opinions of the scholastic Doctors on intricate points which had formerly been left undecided, and had been wisely tolerated as topics of open and free debate, were, by this Council, absurdly adopted as articles of faith, recommended, nay, imposed with violence upon the consciences of the people, and that under pain of excommunication.

Secondly. Ambiguity reigns in the decrees and decisions of this Council, by which disputes and dissensions that had formerly torn the church in pieces, instead of being removed by clear and wise decisions, and charitable interpretations, were rendered still more perplexing and intricate, and were, in reality, propagated and multiplied, instead of being suppressed or diminished. Vague and doubtful decisions were absolutely necessary, on account of the intestine divisions and warm debates that then prevailed. In the decrees of the Council, and in the Catechism drawn up by its authority, doctrines and rules of worship are inculcated in a much more rational and decent manner, than that in which they appear in the daily service of the Church, and in the public practice of its members. This is true in relation to the doctrine of purgatory, the invocation of saints, the worship of images and relics. The terms employed in the canons relating to those subjects are artfully chosen, so as to avoid the imputation of idolatry, in the philosophical sense of that word; although in the Scripture meaning of the term it cannot be avoided, as all use of images in religious worship is expressly forbidden in the inspired volume. Hence we conclude that the most just notion of the doctrine of Rome is not to be derived so much from the terms made use of in the decrees of the Council of Trent, as from their real signification, which must be drawn from the customs, institutions, and observances, which are almost in universal use in the Church of Rome. Add to this, in the Bulls which have issued from the Papal throne in later times, doctrines, which were but obscurely proposed in the Tridentine Council, have been explained with considerable perspicuity, and avowed without either hesitation or reserve. Of this, Clement XI. gave a notable example by his famous Bull called "Unigenitus," which was an enterprise as audacious as it happily proved unsuccessful.

Thirdly. Tenets are omitted in the Catechism and decisions of the Council of Trent, which no Roman Catholic is allowed to deny, or even to call in question.

Fourthly. Various doctrines and usages are added to the faith of the Gospel by this Council. In what ancient Synod can they show us the twelve new articles in the Creed of Pope Pius IV., the supremacy of the Pope, the infallibility of the Church of Rome, the index of prohibited books? &c. Can they mention the General Councils in which these were decreed, the Divines who taught them, or the individuals and churches which maintained them?

Fifthly. Subsequently to the Reformation, the Popes, perceiving the injury which their authority had sustained from translations, accurate interpretation, together with the promiscuous reading of Scripture, left no means unemployed to counteract the general diffusion of religious knowledge. While the tide of their resentment ran high, they so far forgot themselves, as to act most indiscreetly. They permitted the champions of the Papacy to indulge openly in reflections which were injurious to the word of God, and, by an excess of blasphemy almost incredible, to declare publicly that the edicts of Pontiffs, and those records of oral tradition, recognised by the Papal authority, were superior to the express language of holy writ. But as it was impossible to bring the sacred writings entirely into disrepute, they took effectual methods to render them obscure and useless. For this purpose the Latin Vulgate was pronounced the authentic standard, to the great disparagement and almost rejection of the Greek and Hebrew originals. A severe and intolerable law was enacted with respect to all interpreters of Scripture, by which they were forbidden to explain its meaning on subjects relating to faith and practice, so as to make it speak a language different from that of the Church and the ancient Doctors.* The same law farther declared, that the Church alone, that is, the Pope, had the sole right of determining the true sense of the word of God; and, as if to complete the destruction of Scripture influence and authority, it was forbidden to be read by the people; a decree which was carried into execution in all places where the Pope was allowed to enforce such laws against reading the Bible.

Sixthly. The closing acts of the Council furnish presumptive evidence against the correctness of its proceedings. It was decreed that all the decisions at which they arrived respecting the reformation of manners and ecclesiastical discipline, should be so understood and interpreted, as to "preserve always and in all things the authority of the apostolic See." The "acclamations of the Fathers," in concluding the Council, will enable the reader to discern what sentiments they entertained, and what spirit they were of. The Cardinal of Lorraine, after having called on the assembly to declare their best wishes and prayers for the Pope, the Emperor, and other European Monarchs, (including the souls of those who had died since the commencement of the Council,) the Legates, the Cardinals, the Ambassadors, and the Bishops, gave utterance to the following expressions:—

* Concil. Trid., sess. iv. Decretum de Canon. Scripturis. Ad decretum de editione et usu sacrorum librorum.

"Cardinal. The most Holy and Œcumenical Council of Trent: may we ever confess its faith, ever observe its decrees.

"Fathers. Ever may we confess, ever observe them.

"C. Thus we all believe; we are all of the same mind; with hearty assent we all subscribe. This is the faith of blessed Peter and the Apostles; this is the faith of the Fathers; this is the faith of the orthodox.

"F. Thus we believe; thus we think; thus we subscribe.

"C. Abiding by these decrees, may we be found worthy of the mercy of the chief and great High Priest, Jesus Christ our God, by the intercession of our Holy Lady, the Mother of God, ever a virgin, and all the saints.

"F. Be it so, be it so: Amen, amen.

"C. Accursed be all heretics.

"F. Accursed, accursed." *

In the foregoing, it will be perceived that the intercession of the Virgin Mary is put in the place of our Redeemer; and the Council, instead of concluding their sitting by blessing and words of peace, utter the deepest maledictions against Protestants. Thus, in their last expressions, they contradict and reject the instructions of Jesus Christ, the great Head of the church, who said, "Bless, and curse not."

(7.) The Council was not free.

This is manifest from the manner in which it was called, from the control which was exercised by the Pope over its members, and from the absolute and sworn submission of the members to the Pontiff, &c. Hence the frequent protestations of the French and Spanish Ambassadors, in which they declared, that, as affairs were conducted, the Council could not be free. The Emperor Ferdinand, in his letters to the Legates and Pope, says, "that the liberty of the Council was impeached chiefly by three causes: first, every thing was determined beforehand at Rome; secondly, the Legates had assumed to themselves the liberty of proposing, which ought to be common to all; thirdly, the conduct of some of the Prelates who were devoted to the interests of the Roman Court." Such is the account which the most authentic Roman Catholic historians give of the Council of Trent.

(8.) Several presumptions against the decision of the Council will be found in the reception and execution of its decrees.

As it regards the reception of its decisions, some Doctors, instead of submitting to them as an ultimate rule of faith, maintain that they are to be explained by Scripture and tradition. Some countries, such as Germany, Poland, and Italy, have adopted them implicitly and absolutely. In other places they have been received with various modifications, which considerably affect their authority. The Spaniards for a long time disputed the power of this Synod, which they at length acknowledged only so far as they could be adopted "without prejudice to the rights and prerogatives of the Kings of Spain." * In France and Hungary it never has been solemnly received and publicly acknowledged. In the former, however, the decrees that relate to doctrines have been tacitly recognised, and, through custom, have acquired the force and authority of a rule of faith. But those which regard external discipline and ecclesiastical government have been constantly rejected, both in a public and private manner, as being inconsistent with the prerogatives of the throne, and prejudicial to the rights of the Gallican Church. †

The new articles of the Council of Trent were enforced with the utmost vigour, while the few pious and wise regulations were never inculcated to any effect. They were not supported by the authority of the Church, but suffered to degenerate into the shadow of law, which was treated with indifference and transgressed with impunity. In brief, the Council was more intent upon maintaining the despotic authority of the Pope, purgatory, indulgences, &c., than solicitous about entering into any measures that were necessary to promote the spiritual welfare of the Church.

The whole reformation, as it was called, decreed by the Council, was so framed and constituted as to be inoperative and useless. The greatest evils were left untouched. If a few of the abuses were corrected, others were introduced. The Papal power, that great source of evil, was left unscathed; and, on the contrary, the Pope assumed the sole right to expound, administer, or even dispense with the decrees of the Council, and actually obtained, by its last decree, an apparently legal sanction for such usurpations. Some of the Fathers of Trent, when all their endeavours to procure reform proved unavailing, expressed their discontent in satirical verses, as the following:—

> "Concilii quæ prima fuit, si quæris, origo, > Quo medium dicam, quo quoque finis erat?
> A nihilo incepit, medium finisque recedet
> In nihil. Ex nihilo nascitur, ecce, nihil."

"Do you ask me how the Council was begun, conducted, and terminated? I will tell. It began in nothing, and was conducted and finished in the same manner. Thus nothing sprang from nothing." ‡ Such were the sentiments that were entertained respecting the salutary character of the proceedings of this Council.

But though nothing was done efficiently to accomplish good, or correct what was wrong, the actions of the Council prepared the way for, and gave rise to, new enormities. They resulted in introducing a Jesuitism into the Church of Rome, from which it will never recover until Popery is blotted out of existence.

* "Cardinalis. Sacro-sancta Œcumenica Tridentina Synodus: ejus fidem confiteamur, ejus decreta semper servemus.

"Responsio Patrum. Semper confiteamur, semper servemus.

"Card. Omnes ita credimus; omnes id ipsum sentimus; omnes consentientes et amplectentes subscribimus. Hæc est fides beati Petri, et Apostolorum; hæc est fides Patrum; hæc est fides orthodoxorum.

"Resp. Ita credimus; ita sentimus; ita subscribimus.

"Card. His decretis inhærentes, digni reddamur misericordiis et gratia primi et magni supremi Sacerdotis Jesu Christi Dei, intercedente simul inviolata nostra sancta Deipara, et omnibus sanctis.

"Resp. Fiat, fiat: Amen, amen.

"Card. Anathema cunctis hæreticis.

"Resp. Anathema, anathema."—Acclamationes Patrum in fine Concilii.

* Mosheim's Eccles. Hist., cent. xvi., chap. i., sect. iii., part i., § xxiii., vol. iv., p. 195.

† Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., vol. iii., p. 647.

‡ Le Plat, Monumentorum ad Historiam Concilii Tridentini, tom. vii., part ii., p. 389. 4to. Lovanii, 1787.

(9.) Finally, the confirmation of the Council by the Pope, considering the way in which it was done, gives no high idea of conciliar infallibility.

Of the four Legates who attended the Council, none gave a personal account to the Pope of what had passed during its sessions, except Morone and Simoneta. The Pope admitted them to several audiences, and caused it to be debated, whether he should confirm the decisions of the Council or not. The officers of the Court of Rome opposed their confirmation; some of the Cardinals were of opinion, that the Pontiff should only confirm the decrees of faith, without even alluding to those of reformation. In this dilemma the Pope chose eight Cardinals to advise him what to do, to whom he afterward joined other two. One gave his opinion, that he should confirm all the decrees of the Council without restriction. Another was of the same sentiments, who was followed by several more. His Holiness next called together the Cardinals, and declared to them his approbation of the decrees on reformation; and finally resolved to confirm the whole, and that without any reserve; which was accordingly done, not at Trent, where the Council was held, but at Rome, in the Consistory, on the 26th of January, 1564.*

In the Bull of Confirmation the Pope declares that the design for calling the Council was, "to extinguish heresies, correct manners, restore ecclesiastical discipline, and procure the peace and unity of Christian people; that he, on coming to the Pontificate, had continued that holy work begun by his predecessors, and that by his constant care he had at last brought it to perfection; that his Legates left the Council so much at liberty, that by his leave they had treated of things reserved to the Holy See, and had made several decrees concerning the sacraments and other matters, to extirpate heresies, remove abuses, and reform manners; that every thing passed so unanimously in the Council, that it was plain this was the Lord's doings. He commanded all Prelates to cause the decrees of the Council to be observed inviolably; he conjured the Emperor, Kings, Princes, and republics, to assist the Prelates in the execution and observation of these decrees, and not to permit opinions contrary to the holy doctrine of the Council to get admittance into their states. He also forbade the publication or interpretation of the decrees by any one but himself, and appointed a congregation of Cardinals to examine points of small importance, but to bring all matters of moment to the decision of the Pope himself."† Who can wonder that the edict of Nantz was revoked, when Roman Catholic Kings are instructed not to permit doctrines contrary to the decisions of the Council to obtain admittance into their respective states? Surely this confirmation possesses characteristics very unfavourable to an infallible decision.

23. To conclude what we have to say on this point, it must be remarked that great diversity of opinion exists respecting the number of General Councils. The Nestorians believe in the first two, because the third condemned them. The Greeks allow of the first six or seven. The Church of England and other Protestants consent to the first four Councils; the Church of Rome generally approves of the eighteen already mentioned; but even she is divided respecting the œcumenical character of several. Our inference is, that amidst such diversity of sentiment, the character of General Councils cannot stand high in its claims to secure universal reception in Christendom.

If the preceding observations on Councils be taken into consideration, and the rules of Roman Catholics concerning their œcumenical character be examined and applied, few indeed will be their number. Bailly* lays down the following rules:—"(1.) That all the Bishops of the Christian world should be called to the Council. (2.) That so many should be present as would be necessary to represent the various churches of the Christian world. (3.) That the Council should act freely, without constraint." Some assert that the confirmation of the Pope is necessary; others are of a different opinion. Amidst such a variety of sentiment, what firm foundation can there be for resting the truth of doctrines on decisions of Councils termed General?

VI. Of the AUTHORITY and INFALLIBILITY of General Councils.

1. The authoritative decision of the Creed of Pope Pius IV., received by all Romanists, is the following:—"I likewise undoubtedly receive and profess all other things delivered, defined, and declared, by the sacred canons and General Councils; and particularly by the holy Council of Trent. And I condemn, reject, and anathematize all things contrary thereto, and all heresies which the Church has condemned, rejected, and anathematized."†

That General Councils are infallible, is maintained in the foregoing article of Pius's Creed, and believed by Romanists generally. Some, however, maintain that the confirmation of the Pope is necessary to constitute infallibility; and others, that the decisions of Councils are infallible, whether confirmed by the Pope or not.

We quote the sentiments of some who contend that the decrees of a General Council with the confirmation of the Pope are infallible. Ferraris says, "The definitions of a General Council legitimately assembled, issued in the absence of the Pope, are not infallible without his confirmation."‡ Cardinal Cusanus, as quoted by the former writer, declares that "the Pope gives authority to the Council."§ Dens teaches, that "General Councils without the approbation of the Pope are fallible, and often err; that the confirmation of the Pope to any particular decrees of a Council, impart to these decrees plenary authority; that General Councils approved by the Pope cannot err in defining matters of faith and morals, is an article of faith: hence they are to be considered as manifest heretics who presume to call in question what is decreed by such Councils." He also believes, that the decisions of particular Councils, confirmed by the Pope, are also infallible, and that this is founded on the infallibility of the Pope.‖ But Benedict XIV., to whom

* Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., vol. iii., p. 647.
† Idem, pp. 647, 648.

[* "Statuimus necessario requiri ad Concilii œcumenicitatem, (i.) Ut omnes orbis Christiani Episcopi ad illud appellentur. (ii.) Requiritur ut in Concilio œcumenico præsens adsit magnus Episcoporum numerus, qui varias orbis Christiani ecclesias representet. (iii.) Requiritur ut Episcopi in Concilio congregati libertate gaudeant."—Bailly, Theol., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, cap. viii., De Ecclesia Congregata, seu de Conciliis.]

[† Vide supra, p. 3.]

‡ "Definitiones universalis Concilii etiam legitime congregati editæ absente Romano Pontifice, non sunt infallibiles sine ipsius Papæ confirmatione."—Ferraris, Biblioth. Prompt. in Concilium, art. i., sect. 66.

§ "Summus Pontifex confirmat, tamquam auctoritatem præbens Concilio."—Cusanus, lib. iii., cap. xv., De Concord. Cathol. Idem, sect. 65.

[‖ "Concilia Generalia absque Romani Pontificis confirmatione vel approbatione fallibilia sunt ac sæpius errarunt. Si vero Pontificis assensus et confirmatio aliquibus tantum Concilii decretis Dens refers, thinks that the decisions of such Councils are binding only in their own provinces or diocesses.

Many Romanists, however, maintain strongly that the decisions of General Councils are infallible, without the Pope's confirmation. It would be an endless task to quote the authorities on both sides. They are, for the most part, however, agreed that what they call General Councils are infallible: some believe them infallible because they are General Councils; while others, believing the same, consider the confirmation of the Pope as necessary to the authoritative character of the assembly.

Against the infallibility of these Synods we produce the following arguments:—

2. There are so many questions to be answered, and difficulties to be obviated, respecting General Councils, that the greatest uncertainty is connected with their decisions; and therefore their infallibility is strikingly doubtful. There are numerous points to be settled concerning the efficiency, the form, and the matter of General Councils, the manner of proceeding, and the final issue, so that, after a question is determined by a Conciliar assembly, there are perhaps twenty more to be solved before we can receive the decisions of the body.

How easy is it to elude the pressure of an argument that is drawn from the question of the Pope's or Council's superiority! Although it has been decided for the Council against the Pope in the five General Councils of Florence, Constance, Basil, Pisa, and one of Lateran; yet the Jesuits to this day consider the question unsettled, and furnish various pleas in behalf of their opinion; for instance, when they acknowledge that a Council is above the Pontiff, when there is no Pope, or when it is uncertain whom the Pope is; which is the answer of Bellarmine, forgetting that the Council of Basil deposed Eugenius, who was a true Pope, and acknowledged as such.

Romanists say that the Popes did not always confirm the decrees of Basil. But this exception the Fathers never thought of, when they were pressed with the authority of the Council of Ariminum, or Sirmium, or any other Arian Synod. Yet that of Basil was convened by Pope Martin V.; then, in its sixteenth session, it was declared by Eugenius IV. to be lawfully continued, and was expressly confirmed in some of its decrees by Pope Nicholas; and so it stood, till it was finally rejected by Leo X., many years after. Now if one Pope confirm it and another reject it, as it happened in this case, and also in many more, does it not destroy the competency of the authority?

Another evasion is on the word conciliariter, "in a Council-like manner." The decrees of the Council of Constance were confirmed by Martin V. But Bellarmine tells us he only confirmed those things "which were done in a conciliar manner, the thing being diligently examined." Quæ facta fuerant conciliariter, re diligenter examinata. And as there was no fixed and certain rule to judge of this affair, what was done conciliariter may have been effected in almost any manner the performer thought fit. Some Councils, as one of the Laterans, is made General or not, to suit their convenience. The Council of Pisa is neither approved nor condemned.

The Romish doctrine of intention presents another source of uncertainty; because it is doubtful whether the Bishops and Pope were lawfully baptized and ordained, that is, whether the intention of the administrator was such as to confer the sacraments.

Unless the Council proceeded lawfully, it may not be infallible. So Bellarmine says, "that a lawful Council may err, in case it doth not proceed lawfully."* If one person or many sway the rest, can it be said that the Spirit of God governed the assembly? Especially if one preside and control the others, whom they are bound implicitly to obey; who can expect the exercise of that freedom which is requisite to a General Council? The Synods of Ariminum and Seleucia are condemned, because some controlled the others, and by their subtlety persuaded them to sign that confession of faith which Pope Liberius subscribed. And if so great a Council as this be reprobated on that account, why may not others where similar arts have been used?

Again: should we have the assurance that the proceedings of the Council were lawful, another difficulty arises from the meaning of the decrees. They are liable to as many interpretations as other written documents. If the Scripture cannot put an end to controversies on that account, how can General Councils effect that object, when their decrees are equally liable to a private sense and a wrong interpretation as the word of God? Nay, the interpretation of the Scriptures has the advantage; for we may compare spiritual things with spiritual, obtain the help of original tongues, and consult the writings of the primitive church; but the decrees of Councils are purposely framed in general terms, and with ambiguous expressions, to suit some party in the Church and in the assembly. Disputes have been raised concerning the decrees of the Council of Trent, respecting which the several parties neither are, nor indeed are ever likely to be, agreed. And although the Pope appointed a committee or congregation to explain the decrees of this Council, ambiguity still remains.

If we consider the rules by which the true and uncertain Councils are distinguished, and what part of the decisions of one Synod is to be received and what rejected, additional uncertainty is presented. Dens adopts the following from Estius:—"All things which are expressed in any manner in the decrees of Councils are not to be received as definitions, but those things only to which the intention of the ordainers or definers was properly directed. But this is known only from the circumstances of things, and the causes or occasions of making the decrees."† Dens also adopts the following rules of Melchior Canus, by which, he says, the definitions of a Council pertaining to faith may easily be distinguished:—

"(1.) If those who assert the contrary are judged as heretics. (2.) When the Synod expresses its decisions according to this form: 'If any one shall assert this or that, let him be accursed.' (3.) If the sentence of exaccedat, tunc illa dumtaxat plenariam authoritatem habebunt. Concilia Generalia a Summo Pontifice approbata, in rebus fidei et morum definiendis errare non posse, fide certum est: unde statim tanquam hæretici manifesti habentur, qui a talibus Conciliis definita in dubium revocare præsumunt. Si Concilium particulare, in quo damnantur hæreses, a Summo Pontifice approbetur pro tota Ecclesia, tunc obtinet authoritatem in fide infallibilem, fundatam nempe in ipsius Pontificis infallibilitate."—Dens Theol., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, No. 89, De Authoritate Conciliorum.] communication is rightly pronounced against those who contradict the decree."*

[* "Concilium legitimum posse errare in his quæ non legitime agit."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. iii., De Conciliorum Auctoritate, lib. ii., cap. vii., col. 62, D. Colon., 1619.]

[† "Non enim omnia quæ quomodocunque dicuntur in decretis Conciliorum pro definitis habenda sunt, sed ea solum ad quæ proprie fertur intentio statuentium ac definientium. Id autem cognoscitur ex circumstantiis rerum, et causis vel occasionibus condendi decreta."—Estii Sent. Comment., tom. i., lib. ii., dist. xvii., sect. vi., p. 167, F. Fol. Duaci, 1615.]

The application of the preceding regulations in judging of true and false Councils, and also of the true and false decisions of the same Synods, will present insuperable difficulties to the mind of sober and unprejudiced individuals; and yet these are the rules which those celebrated Divines, Estius, Canus, Dens, and others, furnish, in order to ascertain the proper character of Councils and their decrees.

It would be endless to go through all the questions which a candid inquirer might make respecting these assemblies. He must first examine what constitutes a General Council; whether all the Bishops ought to be present in person or by proxy; what share the Princes and laity may take in the proceedings. It should be inquired, whether a general citation is enough to make the Council General, supposing the number of Bishops to be ever so small at the commencement. It must then be considered, whether deputies may have seats there; or if the votes are to be reckoned according to the number of Bishops, or those who send them. Whether nations should vote apart, or every Bishop individually. Whether the decisions of Councils must be unanimous, before they can be recognised as infallible. These are but a few of the questions which affect the infallibility of a Council.

3. The discordant sentiments of Romanists respecting those characteristics which are necessary to constitute infallibility, furnish a strong argument against the inerrancy of Councils. The four following opinions have been strongly held by the Church of Rome:—

(1.) Some have asserted, that the diffusive, and not the representative, body of the Church possessed infallibility. Occam, Petrus de Aliaco, Cusanus, Antoninus of Florence, Panormitan, Nicholas de Clemangis, Franciscus Mirandula, and others, were of this opinion.

(2.) Some say, that Councils are no farther infallible than as they adhere to Scripture and universal tradition.

(3.) Others, that Councils are of themselves infallible, whether the Pope confirm them or not. This was the common opinion before the Council of Lateran, under Leo X., as appears from the Councils of Basil and Constance.

(4.) Many make the confirmation of the Pope necessary to the infallibility of a General Council.†

There is an irreconcilable difference between the last two opinions. For those who suppose Councils to be infallible without the confirmation of the Pope, believe them to be above him, and that he is fallible; while those who are of opinion, that the confirmation of His Holiness is absolutely necessary to the infallibility of the Council, believe him to be infallible and superior to a Council.

4. The violence and disorder which were notorious in the management of some Councils, and the craft and artifice which were associated with the proceedings of others, furnish slender grounds for infallibility.

Numerous factious and furious Monks came to some of these assemblies, and carried their point by mere clamour. Thus it was at Ephesus. We discover gross fraud at the second Council of Nice, both in the persons who were appointed to represent absent Patriarchs, and in the books and authorities which were vouched for the worship of images. The intrigues of the Council of Trent, even as exhibited by Cardinal Pallavicini, were more subtle, but neither less apparent, nor less scandalous. Nothing was trusted in a session till it was first canvassed in a congregation, or rather a cabinet of the Pope, so that the vote of every man was known beforehand. This alone, if there had been nothing else, showed that they must have known they were not guided by the Spirit of God, or by infallibility; since a session was not thought safe, without long and previous preparation of decisions according to the will of the Pontiff.

5. No General Council has determined that such an assembly is infallible, no scripture has recorded it, nor has history transmitted to us any such account. That their decrees should be considered infallible, is strange, when it is not ascertained that the Councils themselves are infallible. If a General Council had been the body to whom Christ bequeathed infallibility, it cannot be imagined but that some definition or description of such a grant would have been recorded in Scripture; so that the profound silence on this subject in the inspired volume gives just occasion for us to judge, that however wise and good such a constitution might have been if well employed, it is not of divine institution; otherwise something concerning so important a topic would have been there mentioned and defined.

6. Another argument against the infallibility of Councils is found in the discordant views of Romanists respecting the confirmation of the Pontiff. Some consider this necessary to make the Council infallible, while others maintain that a Synod is so without such confirmation. Let us examine the true value of this act of the Pope.

Is it after the decree, or before it? It cannot be supposed to be before; for then there would be nothing to confirm. But if it be after, the decree is either true or false before the confirmation of the Pope is granted, and cannot be altered by his confirmation, which is posterior. The confirmation might be necessary to constitute the decree canonical or lawful, but it cannot make it true. That is, it may possibly, by such an act, become a law, but not a truth. This is advanced on the supposition that the confirmation of the Pope is necessary to legalize the decrees of a Council.

Suppose a heresy should invade and occupy the chair of Peter, what remedy can the Church have in such a case, if a General Council be of no authority unless the Pope confirm its proceedings? Will he confirm the acts of a Council which censure and condemn him? Will he sit in judgment upon, and repudiate, his own heresy? That the Pope may be a heretic, is evident from the canon law, which says, he may be deposed, and that by a Council, which in this case had plenary authority independent of the Pontiff. In the Synod of Rome, held under Pope Adrian II., the censure of the sixth General Synod against Honorius, who was guilty of heresy, was approved, and this opinion was expressed, that in the case of heresy, minores possint de majoribus judicare, "the less may judge the greater;" consequently, if the Pope were above a Council, nevertheless, when the question is concerning heresy, the case is altered, the Pope may be tried by his inferiors, who in such a case become his superiors. In the sixth General Council, where Honorius was condemned, the members of that body did not wait for the confirmation of the Pope before they issued the decree. They did not conceive it needful; otherwise they would have suspended its publication, had the Pope refused to confirm it. Independent of the condemnation of Honorius for heresy, the thirteenth and fifty-fifth canons of that Council are decidedly against the customs of the Church of Rome.

[* "Nonne igitur dixerit quis, Erit aliqua nota qua Conciliorum de fide judicia internosci queant? Erit plane. Prima, et ea quidem manifesta, si contrarium asserentes pro hæreticis judicentur. Secunda, Altera nota est, cum in hanc formam Synodus decreta præscribit, Si quis hoc aut illud senserit, anathema sit. Tertia est, si in eos, qui contra dixerint, excommunicationis sententia ipso jure feratur."—Melch. Cani, De Locis. Theol., lib. v., De Auct. Concil., cap. v., quæst. iv., p. 272. 12mo. Colon., 1605.]

† Stillingfleet's Rational Account of the Grounds of Protestant Religion, p. 509, et seq. Fol. London, 1665.

It is little better than impudence to pretend, that all Councils were confirmed by the Pope, or that there exists a necessity in respect of divine obligation that they should be confirmed by him, any more than by another member of the Synod. The Council of Chalcedon, as Bellarmine acknowledges, was rejected by Pope Leo, who, in his fifty-third epistle to Anatolius, in his fifty-fourth to Martian, and also in his fifty-fifth to Pulcheria, accuses it of ambition and inconsiderate temerity, and speaks of it as not a fit assembly for the habitation of the Spirit.* The Council of Chalcedon is one of those four which Pope Gregory professed to revere next to the four Evangelists. Gelasius, in his work De Vinculo Anathematis, affirms, that the Synod is in part to be rejected, and compares it to heretical books of a mixed character, showing the propriety of his assertion from the words of St. Paul: "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good." Of the same opinion was Bellarmine.† And although this assembly, by an ex post facto consent of after-ages, obtained great reputation, yet those who lived immediately subsequent to it, and observed all the circumstances, including the disabilities of the persons, and the uncertainty of the infallibility of its decrees, thought differently. An old author said, "The condition of the Council of Chalcedon, at the time of the Emperor Anastasius, was, that it was not openly acknowledged in the holy Churches, nor yet rejected by all; but each Bishop acted upon it according to his own judgment." ‡ Thus did all unprejudiced men in the world: they judged from evidence which they both saw and believed, not allowing themselves to be bound by the dictates of others, who were so uncertain in their judgment on questions of such importance. There is much reason for suspicion, when the decrees of a Council possess little or no authority in the estimation of those who composed it, not so much from the reasonableness of the decision, as from the accidental and precarious approbation of posterity. If posterity had pleased, according to this position, Origen had believed well, and was orthodox. Papias was right for two centuries, but wrong ever since. Just so was it with regard to General Councils, particularly this of Chalcedon, which changed according to the varying opinions of men; all which prove incontestably, that the dogma of infallibility is a later device, and that it was introduced to serve such ends as cannot be maintained by just and true reasons; and the necessity of the confirmation of the Pope is only advancing the error farther. *

The confirmation of the Council by the Pope involves another question; namely, whether he be above a Council. This point has plunged the Romanists in constant controversy. Since it was first contested, there never was a free and legitimate Council that determined in favour of the Pope; and it is not probable that he would confirm an assembly which decreed, that a Council was superior to the Pontiff: the Council of Basil was condemned by the last Lateran, an assembly which was convened in the Vatican. The Council of Constance is variously estimated by individuals on each side of the question. Augustine decides it against the Pope, in his one hundred and sixty-second epistle to Glorius: "If we think that those Bishops who administered law in Rome were not fit or competent judges, a plenary Council remains for the universal Church, where the cause may be discussed with the judges themselves; so that if they are convicted of having decided erroneously, their decisions may be annulled." † As Popes may be partisans, simoniacs, schismatics, heretics, it would be unreasonable that in their own causes they should be judges, or that in any cause in which they are implicated they should be superior to the individual presiding. As it is against reason, so also is it against experience: various Councils were held in Rome, to give judgment in the causes of Damasus, Sixtus III., Symmachus, and Leo III. and IV., as may be seen in Platina and in the various records of the Councils. It is, therefore, no answer to this and similar allegations, to assert, that in matters of fact the Pope may be judged by a Council, but in matters of faith all the world must bow to the decision of the Pope. For if the Pontiff assume any power, it is a supreme authority in ecclesiastical affairs and also in those of fact; and if he fail here, he must fail in every thing else. The ancient Bishops derived their faith from Christ, their fountain and head. But because Rome was the imperial city, it became the principal See, partly by the concession of others, and partly by the accidental advantages of His Holiness; and yet, even in these things, although he was major singulis, "greater than other individuals," yet he was minor universis, "less than the whole." ‡

Not only have Councils made decrees without the confirmation of the Pope, but, having such confirmation, they have not been more legitimate or obligatory, but have been known to be heretical. The canons of the sixth General Council were confirmed by a Pontiff; nevertheless those canons are impious and heterodox in the estimation of the Church of Rome, as well as in that of the Protestants. We refer to the second canon, which approves of the Council of Carthage, under Cyprian, rebaptizing heretics, and the seventy-second canon, dissolving marriage between persons of different religious sentiments; and yet these canons were approved by Pope Adrian I., who, in his epistle to Therasius, which appears in the second act of the seventh General Council, calls them,

[* "Nam Leo in epist. lix. ad Concilium Chalcedonense scribit, se Concilium illud approbasse, solum quantum ad explicationem fidei."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. i., De Rom. Pontif., lib. ii., cap. xxii., col. 675, C. Colon., 1620.]

[† "Ad hoc ultimum respondeo, exemplum Gelasii in eo consistere, quod sicut in Concilio Chalcedonensi quædam erant bona, quædam mala, et quædam recipienda, quædam rejicienda, ita et in libris hæreticorum; non tamen vult dicere, posse recipi libros ipsos hæreticorum propter vera admixta, sicut recipitur Concilium Chalcedonense, nam alia ratio est Concilii sanctorum Patrum, alia librorum hæreticorum, ut diximus, quamquam veritas ipsa inserta libris hæreticorum bona sit, et recipienda, si tamen alibi reperiatur."—Idem, tom. ii., De Laicis, lib. iii., cap. xx., col. 554, D. Coloniæ, 1619.]

[‡ "Quod autem ad Concilium Chalcedonense attinet, illud id temporis (viz., Anastasii Imp.) neque palam in ecclesiis sanctissimis prædicatum fuit, neque ab omnibus rejectum; nam singuli ecclesiarum præsides pro suo arbitratu in ea re egerunt."—Evag. Hist. Eccles., lib. iii., cap. xxx.

* See Bishop Taylor's Works, vol. viii.; Liberty of Prophesying, sect. vi., p. 35, et seq. 8vo. Heber's edit. London, 1822.

† "Ecce, putemus illos Episcopos, qui Romæ judicaverunt, non bonos judices fuisse, restabat adhuc plenarium Ecclesiæ universæ Concilium, ubi etiam cum ipsis judicibus causa posset agitari, ut si male judicasse convicti essent, eorum sententiæ solverentur."—August. Opera, tom. ii., Epist. ad Glor. xliii., alias clxii., col. 97, A. Fol. Edit. Benedict. Paris, 1679.

[‡ See Bishop Taylor, ut supra.]

canones divine et legaliter prædicatos: "canons divinely and lawfully enacted." These canons were used by Pope Nicholas I., in his epistle to Michaelis, and by Innocent III. So that now there are seven General Councils, which by the Church of Rome have been condemned for error. The Council of Antioch,* in 345, in which Athanasius was condemned; of Milan, in 354, of about three hundred Bishops; of Ariminum, consisting of six hundred Bishops; the second of Ephesus, in 449, in which the Eutychean heresy was condemned, and the Patriarch Flavianus killed by the faction of Dioscorus; that of Constantinople, under Leo Isaurus, in 730; another at the same place, in 765; and, finally, the Council of Pisa. The fact that these General Councils were condemned, is proof that they may err. It is no answer to assert, they were not confirmed by the Pope, inasmuch as the Pope's confirmation was shown to be unnecessary; or if it were otherwise, even then General Councils may become invalid, either by their own fault or by some other circumstance; and whether all that is considered necessary toward the legitimacy of such a Synod was actually observed in the assembly, is so difficult to be determined, that no man can ascertain with certainty whether the meeting is authentic or otherwise.

7. Because some of these Synods have been corrupted, and others pretended, considerable doubt exists respecting the genuineness of their decisions.†

[With regard to the corruptions of the Councils, &c., Dr. Thomas James has entered at large on this subject in his elaborate work, entitled, "A Treatise on the Corruptions of Scripture, Councils," &c., from which we shall extract a few paragraphs illustrative of our present position.

[The learned author refers to the thirty-fifth canon of the Council of Laodicea, where it is decreed, that "Christians ought not to forsake the church of God, and (invocate, or) name angels, and make private conventicles, which are forbidden."‡ Dr. James observes, that "the Papists, to obscure their angelolatry, directly impugned by this canon, have put the word angulos for angelos, in the side of Dionysius's translation, (in the MSS. the abbreviation of both words is indeed alike,) but in the text of the translation, that is placed in the middle; which if they knew to be a true translation, why do not they follow it? If in their judgment it be false, impertinent, absurd, and untrue, (as it is,) why do they not correct it? But the best is, the reading of angelos is warranted by Bellarmine,§ and before him, long ago, by Theodoret; for angelolatria is plainly here forbidden; and then sprang the heretics, called angelici, for worshipping of saints. It would make a man laugh heartily, to see how poor Binius is tormented and troubled in his observations upon this Council, to make good Bellarmine's distinction, and Baronius's subtle observation."‖

[Dr. Thomas Comber, adverting to the charge of corruption brought against the Papacy, observes, that "the thirty-fifth canon expressly forbids leaving the church of God, and calling upon angels, which they say is a hidden kind of idolatry, and forsaking Christ the Son of God to go after idolatry. And Theodoret, who lived soon after the true time of this Council, saith, 'Those who were for Moses's law, which was given by angels, brought in the worship of them, which error reigned long in Phrygia and Pisidia; and therefore the Council of Laodicea, in Phrygia, did, by a law, forbid the praying to angels. Which canon doth so evidently condemn the Roman Churches praying to the angels as idolatry, that the former editors of the Councils impudently corrupted the text of this canon, and put in angulos for angelos, as if the Council had only forbidden praying in private corners; whereas not only the Greek, but the oldest Latin, copies, and Theodoret, have angels.'"*

[These dishonest practices of the Papacy have been attempted upon the sixth "canon of the Apostles," which is: "Let not a Bishop, or Priest, in any sort, upon pretence of religion, forsake his own wife. But if he chance to do so, let him be excommunicated; or if he continue (in his error), let him be degraded."†

["Bellarmine," says Dr. James, "would fain shift off this place, by translating the word ευλαβειας, cautionis; but Bellarmine is deceived. Thus it is found in the oldest Latin, the best translation of all others, which was done by Dionysius Exiguus. You may see the book, if you please, of great antiquity, in the public library at Oxford, with this title going before the sixth canon: Ut Episcopus aut Presbyter uxorem suam, quam debet caste regere, non relinquat."‡

["The sixth canon," observes Dr. Comber, "forbids a Bishop, Priest, or Deacon, to put away, or be divorced from, his wife on pretence of religion. The notes of Binius and others pervert the sense of this canon, as if they only forbade Clergymen to cast off the care of providing for their wives; and prove this sense by a false title, which Dionysius Exiguus put to this canon in his version many centuries after, and by an epistle of Pope Clement I., which all men own now to be spurious, and also by another epistle of Pope Gregory, who lived A. D. 600; as if the opinion of Dionysius and of Gregory, when single life was superstitiously pressed upon the Clergy, were good proof, that Clergymen did not live with their wives many ages before that superstitious practice was heard of. It is certain that the Greek Clergy were married, and cohabited with their wives, according to this apostolical canon, and the fifteenth of the sixth General Council; and it is not unpleasant to observe, that these notes cite the second Council of Nice, to prove there were no canons made in the sixth General Council; yet that very Nicene Council often quotes, and highly approves, the eighty-second canon of the sixth

* Socrat. Hist. Eccles., lib. ii., cap. v.; Sozom. Hist. Eccles., lib. iii., cap. v.; Bishop Taylor's Works, vol. viii., p. 40. 8vo. edit.

† Bishop Taylor's Works, vol. viii., p. 44, et seq.]

[‡ "Quod non oporteat ecclesiam Dei relinquere et abire, atque angelos (angulos in marg.) nominare, et congregationes facere, quæ interdictæ noscuntur."—Conc. Labb., tom. i., Concil. Laodicen., can. xxxv., col. 1513, A. Paris, 1671.

[§ Bellarmine thus quotes the thirty-fifth canon of the Council of Laodicea: "Sic enim ait Concilium Laodicenum, capite xxxv., Non oportet Christianos derelicta Ecclesia abire, et ad angelos idololatriæ abominandæ congregationes facere, quæ omnia interdicta sunt," &c.—Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii., De Sanct. Beat., lib. i., cap. xx., col. 753, C. Colon., 1619.

[‖ A Treatise of the Corruptions of Scripture, Councils, and Fathers, by the Prelates, Pastors, and Pillars of the Church of Rome, for the Maintenance of Popery. By Thomas James, Student in Divinity, &c. Revised and corrected by the Rev. John Edmund Cox, M. A. P. 155, 8vo. edit. Cambridge, 1843. 4to. edit., p. 87. London, 1611.

[* Roman Forgeries in the Councils, during the first four Centuries. Together with an Appendix concerning the Forgeries and Errors in the Annals of Baronius. By Thomas Comber, D.D. Pp. 76, 77. 4to. London, 1689.

[† "Episcopus aut Presbyter uxorem propriam nequaquam sub obtentu religionis abjiciat. Si vero rejecerit, excommunicetur. Sed si perseveraverit, dejiciatur."—Conc. Labb., tom. i., Canones Apost., col. 48, A. Paris, 1671.

[‡ James's Corruptions, 4to. edit., p. 86. London. 8vo. edit., p. 154. Cambridge.

General Council, as giving some countenance to their image worship. So that their wresting this apostolical canon from its genuine meaning, upon such slight and false evidence, is in effect rejecting it." *

[The thirty-second canon of the Council of Agde has been corrupted, and made to convey a meaning utterly foreign to that which was originally intended. We read in the spurious copy of these canons, "Let no man presume to sue a Clerk before a secular or temporal Judge, without the Bishop's leave."

["To establish, as hath been well observed by a diligent observer of the corruptions of Gratian," says Dr. James, "the exemption of Clergymen from secular justice, he cites this out of a canon, now a thousand years past: Clericum nullus præsumat apud sæcularem judicem, Episcopo non permittente, pulsare: 'Let no man presume to sue a Clergyman,' &c. Whereas these words are, Clericus nequaquam præsumat apud sæcularem judicem, Episcopo non permittente, pulsare: 'Let no Clergyman presume to sue any man in a temporal court without leave of his Bishop.' † And so the Church layeth a commandment upon the Clergy. But Gratian layeth it upon the laity. Binius cites both right and wrong. Bellarmine, who sometimes takes upon himself to correct Gratian when he hath no need of mending, cites the words falsely and corruptly, as Gratian did before; although in his answer to Barclay he goeth about to excuse the matter, as well as he may. But no excuse will serve; for in the written copy of that Council you shall find the word Clericus, and not Clericum." ‡

[The above, which are selected from the works of Dr. James and Dr. Comber, out of a mass of impostures of a similar description, will serve to show the devices which have been, and still are, in operation to deceive mankind, and to exalt the Papacy. These corruptions are not confined to the Councils: they extend also to the writings of the Fathers of the Church, as Junius, Rivet, and Daillé, on the Continent, and Perkins, Cook, James, Comber, and, of more recent date, the Rev. Richard T. P. Pope, at home, have abundantly testified.]

8. If we also consider the consent of Bishops in deciding in Councils, and the manner in which this act is held by Romish Divines, we can have no very exalted opinion of their infallibility.

Bailly maintains the following doctrines concerning "the requisite unanimity of Bishops, that the decision with regard to faith should be full and decretory; or, whether the majority of the Bishops can err in matters of faith." After defining physical unanimity to mean a universal consent, without exception, and a moral one to consist of the consent of nearly all the Bishops, he lays down the following propositions:—"(1.) A number of Bishops joined with the Pope, though a few object, cannot err in decisions of faith; that is a rule of truth, even in time of persecution. (2.) A moral unanimity, and not a physical or absolute one, is necessary to a full and decretory decision of the Church." §

Respecting the tacit consent of Bishops, he lays down the following proposition:—"A dogmatic constitution of the Pope, sent to all the churches of Catholic name expressly, or by pastoral mandates or other writings received by the Bishops where the controversy arose, though other Bishops of the world are silent, is the irrevocable judgment of the Church; the silence of Bishops, in this case, is a proof of tacit consent and a true approbation." * While this system would associate infallibility with the majority, it is not, strictly speaking, the majority with which the infallibility is associated, but the Pope, who carries it with him; so that without him there can be no infallibility. Hence the Pontiff alone, according to the system of Bailly, which is adopted by almost all modern Romanists, possesses that gift.

Accordingly, the latest oracle of the Church of Rome places it in the Pope; so that whether the majority be with him or not, the prerogative of infallibility belongs to him, and those with whom he can agree, although these may be the minority. Such is the doctrine of Peter Dens, who observes, "That the Pope is not bound to follow the majority of Bishops in making a decree; for though the Bishops are true judges, yet the supreme authority is bestowed by Christ upon his Vicar on earth, and intrusted to him, so that he may confirm and direct his brethren. In like manner a King is not bound to follow the majority of his Judges." †

This is resolving the power of Synods into that of the Pope, and vesting him with infallibility, denying it to Bishops and Councils. When the latter make decrees, are they authoritative immediately on being made, or must they wait for confirmatory Bulls? If so, then the infallibility is not in the Council, but in the Pontiff. If they are infallible before such confirmation, then the infallibility is in the Council; and the subsequent Bull, instead of confirming the decrees, is derogatory to them. To attempt their confirmation, implies that they want additional authority, which destroys the supposition of their infallibility, since what is infallible cannot be made more strong or authoritative. To pretend, therefore, to add power, implies that they are not infallible. Human institutions are indeed so modelled, that there is a joint concurrence of opinion before a law can be made; and although it is the last consent that fixes the mandate, nevertheless previous consent is necessary to give to it the authority of law. So in the Church. In her, however, this takes place only in matters of order and government, which are to be modified by the Church, and not in decisions respecting matters of faith. If there be infallibility in the Church, it must be by a special grant made by Christ, which must be exercised according to the conditions on which such grant is made, unless it can be proved that there is a provision, empowering the Council or Pope to dispose of the Church, and model it at pleasure. If there be no such power, and it is plain there is not, then the grant of Christ is either to a single

[* Comber's Roman Forgeries, p. 3.

[† Conc. Labb., tom. iv., Conc. Agathen., can. xxxii., col. 1388, D. Paris, 1671."

[‡ James on Corruptions, &c., 4to. edit., p. 95. London. 8vo. edit., pp. 162, 163. Camb.]

[§ "De unanimitate Episcoporum requisita, ut judicium in fide plenum sit ac decretorium, seu utrum major pars Episcoporum in rebus fidei errare possit.

["1. Multitudo Episcoporum juncta cum S. Pontifice, paucis ex adverso reclamantibus, in judiciis fidei errare non potest; ea est regula veritatis, etiam tempore persecutionis. 2. Ad plenum ac decretorium Ecclesiæ judicium unanimitas moralis, nec physica seu absoluta, requiritur."—Bailly Theol., tom. ii., De Eccles., cap. x.]

[* "Constitutio Romani Pontificis dogmatica, ad omnes Catholici nominis Ecclesias missa expresse, aut mandatis pastoralibus aut aliis scriptis acceptata ab Episcopis ubi nata est controversia, tacentibus aliis per orbem Episcopis, irrevocabile est Ecclesiæ judicium; seu, quod idem est, silentium Episcoporum in eo casu indicium est consensus taciti, ac vera approbatio."—Idem, cap. xi.]

[† "Observa tamen, Summum Pontificem non teneri sequi in ferenda sententia majorem Episcoporum partem; quamvis enim Episcopi sint veri judices, supremum tamen judicium a Christo commissum est ejus in terris Vicario, eique demandatum, ut confirmet et dirigat fratres suos; sic nec Rex majorem partem Judicum sequi tenetur."—Dens Theol., tom. ii.; De Ecclesia, No. 86; De Conciliis Ecclesiast.]

person or to the whole community. If to a single person, then the infallibility is solely in him, which he may manage as he thinks most fit. If he call a Council, it is merely an act of humility, prudence, or courtesy: the infallibility is only with him, if Christ has placed it there. Whereas, on the other hand, if the infallibility is granted to the whole community, or to their representatives, it rests in their decision, and belongs entirely to that: any other confirmation that they desire, unless restrained to the execution of their decrees, is a wound given to their own prerogative, if not a direct disclaimer.

Thus infallibility must be transferred to the Pope from the Council, when his confirmation is made an indispensable part of their decisions, whether he decide in favour of the minority or majority. In this light the Jesuits, and with them the greater part of modern Romanists, view the subject. So Bellarmine saith, "It cannot be answered that these Councils erred because they were not lawful; for to most of them there was nothing wanting but the Pope's assent. The second at Ephesus was altogether like that of Basil; for both were called by the Pope; in both of them the Pope's Legate shortly after went away; in both of them the Pope was excommunicated; and yet, that the Council of Ephesus erred, the adversaries will not deny." Hence he concludes, that "the chief power ecclesiastical is neither in the Church, nor in the Councils, should the Pope be removed." * Bellarmine in the same chapter also declares: We must know that the Pope is accustomed to send Legates, who are instructed concerning the judgment of the Apostolical Seat, implying, that if the Council consent to the judgment of the Apostolic See, it shall be formed into a decree; but if not, the formation of the decree shall be deferred until the Pope of Rome shall return an answer. In the Council of Basil, it was determined by unanimous consent, together with that of the Pope's Legate, that a Council is above the Pope: this is now judged erroneous. Pighius says, "The Councils of Constance and Basil went about, by a new trick and pernicious example, to destroy the ecclesiastical hierarchy, and instead of it, to bring in the domination of a promiscuous, confused, popular assembly; that is, to raise again Babylon itself, to subject to themselves or to the community of the Church, which they falsely pretend that they represent, the very Prince and head of the whole Church, even him that is the Vicar of Christ himself in his kingdom; and this against order and nature, against the clearest light of the Gospel verity, and against the undoubted faith and judgment of the orthodox Church itself." † Thus the creatures of the Papacy refer all the infallibility of the Church to the person of the Pontiff.

9. The representative character of a Council is a powerful argument against its infallibility.

Because all the power an œcumenical Council hath, is from the universal church, whose representative it is. This principle is inviolable, because the government of the Church is monarchical only, as Christ is her head. Every collective representative assembly receives its power from the body which it represents. There is, therefore, no power in the Council, but what it receives from the Church. The body representing cannot be as free from error as the whole Church, because in all such assemblies many able men may be left out. Hence the representative body is more liable to err than the represented; inasmuch as those left out of the representation possess part of that wisdom and piety which are preservatives against error. In a General Council, as the representative of the whole Church, we must have the divine institution of it as such, and the promises made to it in that character; else we may still say that all the power it has, is by virtue of the body which is represented.

Although the decree which is decided by the many, other things being equal, may be more perfect than that which is decided by one or few; it cannot be infallible, except by the special and promised aid of the Holy Ghost. This consideration leads us to those portions of Scripture which are adduced to prove the infallibility of General Councils; namely, "When he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth." (John xvi. 13.) He shall "abide with you for ever." (John xiv. 16.) "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." (Matt. xxviii. 20.) "Upon this rock I will build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." (Matt. xvi. 18.) Christ said to Peter, "I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not." (Luke xxii. 32.) "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." (Matt. xviii. 20.) "It seemed good to the Holy Ghost, and to us." (Acts xv. 28.)

From these texts Romanists attempt to prove that the Church is infallible, and consequently Councils. Supposing we grant that infallibility was promised to the Church, it does not follow that General Councils were so favoured; unless it can be proved that in the infallibility of the Church is included the church representative, and not the church diffusive; which can never be done. It is not enough to say, that the members of the community are bound to believe the doctrines which are taught by the representatives, and therefore they must be infallible: it must first be shown that there is necessity for such an infallible representative body. This none of the texts quoted infers, much less do any prove the infallibility of General Councils. All these passages, taken together, speak of the church as including the Apostles; and then all may safely grant, that the voice of such a church was infallible; otherwise they are applicable to private assemblies as well as to œcumenical Synods, which none allow to be infallible. Or, if they granted infallibility, yet they granted it not to every General Council, but to the body of the church of Christ; and if such an assembly depart from the institutions and standards of the church, it must be destitute of the truth held by that Church. On the foregoing passages, we offer the following:—

First. Nothing can be drawn from promises made to the diffusive body, for the benefit of the representative, unless he who uttered them instituted such representation. Supposing, therefore, that infallibility by these promises was bestowed on the universal church, it cannot be inferred that it belonged to a General Council, unless it is proved that such a body represents the church, and in that representation is infallible. This infallibility, coming merely by promise, belongs only to those to whom the promise is made, and in that capacity in which it is made. Spiritual gifts are not transmitted to heirs, or made over to assignees; and if the Church be possessed of infallibility, she cannot impart it to a General Council, unless that power of devolution be contained in the original grant. On this point the Roman Catholic Pighius argues conclusively:—It cannot be demonstrated on theological grounds, that a General Council, which is so far from being the whole Church, that it is not the thousandth part of it, should represent the whole Church. For either it has this from Christ or from the Church: but they cannot produce one tittle from Scripture, where Christ has conveyed over the power and authority of the whole Church to a hundred or two hundred Bishops. If they say it is from the Church, "it is by no means sufficient for them to assert this: it is incumbent on them to show that this power has been actually delegated to them, and that it has been done in a lawful and proper manner."* It cannot be shown that such was ever done by the universal church: if it were, it must have been by some formal act of the Church, or by tacit consent.

* Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii., De Concil., lib. ii., cap. xi.

[† "Adeo nuper in Constantiensi Basiliensique Conciliis novo more, perniciosoque (ut mihi quidem videtur) exemplo, ecclesiasticam hierarchiam, ut ad illius cœlestis exemplar decentissime ordinatam constitutamque a Christo supra demonstravimus, evertere, et pro ea popularem quandam promiscuæ et confusæ multitudinis dominationem inducere, hoc est, Babylonem ipsam resuscitare, conati sunt; sibi ipsis aut communitati ecclesiasticæ (quam se representare qui falso prætendebant) ipsum totius Ecclesiæ caput et principem, et qui ipsius Christi in hoc ejus regno inter nos agit Vicarium, subjicientes, adversus rerum ordinem et naturam, contra clarissimam evangelicæ veritatis lucem, contra omnem antiquitatis authoritatem, atque adeo ipsius orthodoxæ Ecclesiæ (quod post intelliges) indubitatam fidem et sententiam."—Pighii Hierarch. Eccles., lib. vi., cap. ii., p. 213, F. Colon., 1538.]

It could not be by any formal act of the Church; for then there must have been such preceding the existence of any General Council; for by that they receive their commission to appear in behalf of the universal church. This could not be done in a General Synod, because that is not pretended to be the whole Church, but only a representation of it. Now, that the universal church did ever agree in any such act, is utterly impossible to be demonstrated. Yet such a delegation of an œcumenical Synod must have been supposed, in order to its being considered a representation of the whole church; and this must have been anterior to the first General Council, and, for aught we know to the contrary, before any assembly of that character. For how can the Church, by her act in one age, bind herself in future ages to the acts of those several Councils which may subsequently be held?

If it be said, that such a formal deed is not necessary, and that the tacit consent of the whole Church is sufficient, then such a consent of the Church must be manifest, by which they transferred the power of the whole to such a representative body. It cannot be sufficient to say, that those who choose Bishops to sit in the Council do this; as their number falls far short of the whole Church. But supposing this were done by the whole community, we must farther inquire by what right is this effected; for the authority of the Church having been bestowed by Christ, it cannot be disposed of without his appointment. The utmost, then, that can be conjectured in a case like this is, that portions of the Church may voluntarily consent to accept the decrees of such a Council; and by such an act, these decrees become obligatory. But what is this to an infallibility in the Council because it represents the whole Church?

Secondly. That which may pertain to the representative body of the Church by virtue of a promise made to the diffusive, can in no other sense be understood of the former than as it belongs to the latter. Therefore, supposing that a promise of infallibility is made to the Church, it is necessary to know in what way and manner that promise has been given; for in none other can it belong to the Council which represents it. If the Church's infallibility do not imply, that all the Church, or a majority of it, should be infallible; then it is not true of a General Council, that the whole, or the greater part, should also be infallible.

Melchior Canus, one of the acutest opponents of Protestantism, was sensible of this, and grants, that the majority in a General Council may err, and the minority may hold the truth; but then the Pope is not bound to follow the majority.* Dens, as we have seen, maintains the same. Now this takes away all infallibility from the decrees of a Council, and places it in the Pontiff. Hence, as many or most of them now teach, the Pope and a Provincial Council, or a congregation of Cardinals, may be as infallible as the Pope and a minority of a General Council.

Bellarmine dislikes this answer, and offers another which is equally destructive of the Council's infallibility. He says, "In case the majority resist the better part in a General Council, as in that of Ariminum, and the second at Ephesus, yet it cannot conquer it; for these decrees are afterward made void by him to whom it belongs to confirm his brethren."† Here it might be asked, Who reversed the decrees of the Council of Sirmium, to which the Pope subscribed? Hilary did more to reverse the decrees of the Councils of Ariminum and Seleucia, than ever His Holiness did.

Some say, that it is in the power of the Church to make void the decrees of General Councils, as was done to those of the Arian Synods. If so, the infallibility does not lie in the representative, but in the diffusive, body of the Church. Then all the decrees of Councils are merely probationary, and depend for confirmation on the diffusive body; and consequently the decisions of a Provincial Synod being accepted by the Church, are as infallible as those of a General Council.

Thirdly. If those passages which contain a promise of infallibility to the Church, imply the infallibility of General Councils, as the representative of the Church, it must follow that the decrees of a Council are infallible, whether His Holiness confirm them or not. For if they be infallible in representing the Church, they are infallible whether there be any Pontiff or not.

10. The infallibility which Romanists challenge for General Councils implies an inspiration and revelation as immediate as that possessed by the Apostles.

Though the Church of Rome does not formally lay claim to immediate revelation, nevertheless the manner in which she professes infallibility brings upon her the guilt of such a claim. Indeed, that prerogative, which she professes by virtue of divine assistance and direction, cannot exist without some immediate revelation. It requires a higher discovery of truth than nature or ordinary grace can attain; and it is such as demands the assent of all, when declared. Now what difference is there between this and the inspiration which the Apostles had when writing the books of the sacred Scripture? If they say the one was immediate and the other not, they only beg the question; for what they profess implies that it is as immediate as that which the Apostles had. Nay, it is as immediate as that which they had in Council. For when they said, "It seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us," can anything more be understood, than that the Spirit of God did so assist them that they should not err in their decisions? It is true, they assert their infallibility was bestowed by virtue of the promise of Christ, which does not suppose immediate revelation. But what the Apostles possessed came also by promise; and therefore, being promised does not prevent it being received by revelation. They say, that "neither Church nor Council publishes immediate revelations, nor creates any new articles of faith, but only declares, by their definitions, the doctrine which Christ and his Apostles in some manner revealed at first." This does not alter the state of the question: the Council's infallibility must imply an immediate revelation. Has the Synod greater certainty and higher assistance than an ordinary believer? If not, it can be no more infallible than he. If it has, it must be immediate; for it enjoys a higher degree of certainty than can possibly be attained by the use of ordinary means. To say that the Council is fallible in the use of means, but infallible in the conclusion or in its decisions, is a contradiction. It is to assert a certainty beyond and above the use of means, and yet not immediate. The mistake lies here, that nothing can be an immediate revelation, but that which pertains to some doctrine never before revealed; whereas, if there be a farther explanation of that doctrine in as infallible a manner as the Apostles at first revealed it, that explanation is by a revelation as immediate as the first discovery of it. The non-obligation of the ceremonial law was revealed to the Apostles before the Council or meeting of Jerusalem; yet they had an immediate revelation as to what was decreed in that assembly. When, therefore, Romanists say, "General Councils neither have erred nor can err in their definitions," they assume as great a privilege as the Apostles, and, in order thereto, they must have as immediate a revelation. Inspiration was no permanent gift with Prophets or Apostles, it was but temporary; and when removed, or even previous to it being bestowed, they were as liable to error as others in similar circumstances, and possessing the same acquirements. Hence it follows, that where revelations were most immediate, they did no more than what Roman Catholics ascribe to their Church; namely, to preserve them from actual error in declaring God's will. Nothing therefore can be more evident than that they challenge to themselves as great an infallibility and as immediate assistance of the Spirit of God in their Councils as ever the Prophets and Apostles possessed.

[* "Nam cum certum sit œcumenicum Concilium adeo non esse universalem Ecclesiam, quæ millies fortassis millena millia toto orbe complectitur hominum, ut vix fit aliquanta ejus particula; (nam in secundo universali Concilio, Constantinopolitano primo, centum quinquaginta tantum interfuisse traduntur Episcopi;) quæro unde habeat quod representet universalem Ecclesiam, ejusque authoritatem potestatemque (quam tamen nullam demonstrarunt) exerceat. Aut enim obtinet hoc a Christo, aut ab ipsa universali Ecclesia: a Christo hoc sibi datum esse, ut centum aut ducenti Episcopi totius, quanta est, Ecclesiæ authoritatem habeant, nec iota ullum proferent. Ab ipsa ergo universali Ecclesia hanc in se transfusam authoritatem et velut delegatam sibi necesse habent dicere. Sed dicere haud quaquam satis est, factum demonstrasse oportuit, et jure riteque factum."—Idem, cap. iv., p. 219, E.]

[* Canus, Melch., Loc. Theol., lib. v., cap. 5. 12mo. Colon., 1605.]

[† "Nam etiamsi major pars resistat meliori, ut factum est in Concilio Ariminensi, et Ephesino II., tamen numquam vincit: mox enim irritantur ejusmodi Conciliorum acta ab eo, cui convenit ex officio fratres confirmare."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii., De Concil., lib. ii., cap. ix., col. 79, D. Colon., 1619.]

That divine therefore was in the right, of whom Canus speaks, who asserted, "that since General Councils were infallible, their definitions ought to be equal to the Scriptures themselves."* And though Canus and others may profess to dislike this doctrine, it is rather because of the odium which follows it, than for any just reason they can give against it. For they not only suppose an equal certainty in the decrees of both, but an equal obligation to internal assent from those to whom they are declared.

* Canus, Melch., Loc. Theol., lib. v., cap. v. 12mo. Colon., 1605.

Now as Romanists generally disclaim an immediate inspiration in as plenary a manner as it was possessed by Prophets and Apostles; and as the decisions of General Councils, to be infallible, must be under the influence of such an inspiration; then the consequence is, that as the inspiration is disavowed, the infallibility of such assemblies must also be rejected.

If it be said, that the infallibility depends on a full discussion, then we must examine what constitutes a full discussion, and whether it has been adopted. If we find opinions falsely represented; if spurious books have been credited; if passages of the Scriptures, or of the Fathers, on which the decision has turned, have been manifestly misunderstood and wrested, so that in a more enlightened age no individual pretends to justify the authorities that determined them; can we imagine there should be more truth in the conclusions than in the premisses from which they have been drawn? It must, therefore, either be said that they act by an immediate inspiration, or all persons cannot be bound to submit to their judgment, till they have examined their mode of proceeding, and the foundation on which such conclusions have been formed.

11. As an indubitable proof that Councils may err, we adduce the contradictions of one Council to another. In this case both cannot be true; and which of them is so, is, in many instances, difficult to decide, as far as Romanists have determined. Of such contradictions we have numerous examples.

It is notorious how differently Councils decreed in the Arian controversy; and what a variety of them Constantius set up against that of Nice. The Eutychian heresy was approved in the second Council at Ephesus, and afterward condemned at Chalcedon. The authority of General Councils was asserted at Constance and Basil; but condemned in the Lateran, and left undecided at Trent.

["The Council of Trent," says Bishop Taylor, "allows picturing of God the Father.* The Council of Nice altogether disallows it. The same Nicene Council, which was the seventh General, allows of picturing Christ in the form of a lamb; but the sixth will by no means endure it, as Caranza affirms. The Council of Niocæsarea, confirmed by Leo IV.,† and approved in the first Nicene Synod, as it is said in the seventh session of the Council of Florence,‡ forbids second marriages, and imposes penances on them that are married the second time, forbidding Priests to be present at such nuptial feasts: besides that this is expressly against the doctrine of St. Paul, it is also against that of the Council of Laodicea, which took off such penances, and pronounced second marriages to be free and lawful. Nothing is more discrepant than the third Council of Carthage and the Council of Laodicea, about assignation of the canon of Scripture; and yet the sixth General Synod approves both. And I would fain know, if all General Councils are of the same mind with the Fathers of the Council of Carthage, who reckon into the canon five books of Solomon. I am sure St. Augustine reckoned but three; and I think all Christendom beside are of the same opinion. And if we look into the title of the law, 'De Conciliis,' called, 'Concordantia Discordantiarum,' we shall find instances enough to confirm, that the decrees of some Councils are contradictory to others; and that no wit can reconcile them. And whether they did or no, that they might disagree, and former Councils be corrected by later, was the belief of the Doctors in those ages, in which the best and most famous Councils were convened; as appears in that famous saying of St. Augustine, speaking concerning the rebaptizing of heretics, and how much the Africans were deceived in that question, he answers the allegation of the Bishops' letters, and those national Councils which confirmed St. Cyprian's opinion, by saying, that they were no final determination. For 'Episcoporum literæ emendari possunt a Conciliis Nationalibus, Concilia Nationalia a plenariis, ipsaque plenaria priora a posterioribus emendari.' Not only the occasion of the question being a matter not of fact, but of faith, as being instanced in the question of rebaptization, but also the very fabric and economy of the words, put by all the answers of all those men who think themselves pressed with the authority of St. Augustine. For as National Councils may correct the Bishops' letters, and General Councils may correct National, so the latter General may correct the former; that is, have contrary and better decrees of manner, and better determinations in matters of faith. And from hence hath risen a question, whether is to be received, the former or the latter Councils, in case they contradict each other? The former are nearer the fountains apostolical, the latter are of greater consideration; the first have more authority, the latter more reason; the first are more venerable, the latter more inquisitive and seeing. And now what rule shall we have to determine our belief? whether to authority or reason, the reason and the authority of both, not being the highest in their kind, both of them being repudiable, and at most but probable? And here it is that this great uncertainty is such as not to determine any body, but fit to serve every body; and it is sport to see that Bellarmine will by all means have the Council of Carthage preferred before the Council of Laodicea, because it is later; and yet he prefers the second Nicene Council before the Council of Frankfort, because it is elder.* St. Augustine would have the former Generals, to be mended by the later; but Isidore, in Gratian, says, when Councils do differ, standum esse antiquioribus, 'the elder must carry it.'† And indeed these probables are buskins to serve every foot, and they are like 'magnum et parvum,' they have nothing of their own, all that they have is in comparison of others; so these topics have nothing of resolute and dogmatical truth, but in relation to such ends as an interested person hath a mind to serve upon them." ‡]

["* Can. et Decret. Conc. Trident., sess. xxv.

["† Corp. Jur. Can. a Pithœo, tom. i., Dist. xx., sect. i., De Libellis, &c. Fol. Paris, 1695.

["‡ Conc. Labb., tom. x., Conc. Florent., can. lxxxii. Paris. 1671.

The passage from St. Augustine so often quoted, is as follows:—"For who is ignorant that holy canonical Scripture is contained in the defined limits of the Old and New Testaments, and is so to be preferred to the more recent letters of Bishops, that concerning any thing which stands written in it there can be no doubt or controversy, whether it be true or right? But the letters of Bishops, which have been written, or are written, since the confirmation of the canon, may be corrected by the wiser decision of any one more skilled in this particular point, by the more weighty authority of other Bishops, the wisdom of more learned persons, and by General Councils; even should they by chance have deviated from truth. And, without doubt, Councils themselves, which are held in single regions or provinces, must yield to the authority of plenary Councils, which are held by the whole Christian world. And these former plenary Councils themselves are to be amended by later Councils; when, by some experiment of events, that which was shut is opened, and that which was hid is made known. And all this can be done without any tinge of pride, without arrogance, contention, or envy. But, on the other hand, it can be done with holy humility, with catholic peace, with Christian charity." *

[On no point do the Councils so palpably contradict each other, as on the subject of image-worship; a discrepancy which Mr. Faber† has exhibited in terms so plain and truth-telling, as to call forth the bitterest invectives from various modern champions of the Papacy, among whom is to be found the name "F. C. Husenbeth," a Popish Priest, resident at Cossey, near Norwich, whose defence of the Roman faith, in a volume entitled, "Faberism exposed and refuted, and the Apostolicity of Catholic Doctrine vindicated," is a melancholy and awful instance how far an erroneous and superstitious creed is calculated to blind the eye and stultify the understanding; a pitiful and contemptible exhibition of delusive sophistry and childish argument, and a satisfactory and happy display of the zealous, but futile, attempts of the author to shake the position which Mr. Faber had taken,—the position of infallible truth, found in the unadulterated word of God, which, like the celebrated, though fabulous, spear of Ithuriel, has the power to show not only what is right, but also to detect and repel whatever is wrong. The arguments of Mr. Faber are still triumphant.

[The Council of Constantinople, convoked in the year 754, unanimously decreed the removal of images, and the abolition of image-worship; but the second Council of Nice, convoked in the year 787, decreed the re-establishment of image-worship, and anathematized all who had concurred in its abolition.

["I simply state," says Mr. Faber, "a mere historical fact; but the result from it is abundantly manifest. Two discordant Councils cannot both be in the right; and if a single Council be pronounced by the counter-decision of another Council to have erred, the phantom of infallibility forthwith vanishes.

["The variations of the Church, relative to the single point of image-worship, are so extraordinary, that they well deserve the attention of those who contend for her infallibility. (1.) The ancient Council of Elvira, which

* "Quis autem nesciat sanctam Scripturam canonicam, tam Veteris quam Novi Testamenti, certis suis terminis contineri, eamque omnibus posterioribus Episcoporum literis ita præponi, ut de illa omnino dubitari et disceptari non possit, utrum verum, vel utrum rectum sit, quidquid in ea scriptum esse constiterit? Episcoporum autem literas quæ post confirmatum canonem vel scriptæ sunt vel scribuntur, et per sermonem forte sapientiorem cujuslibet in ea re peritioris, et per aliorum Episcoporum graviorem autoritatem, doctiorumque prudentiam, et per Concilia licere reprehendi, si quid in eis forte a veritate deviatum est. Et ipsa Concilia quæ per singulas regiones vel provincias fiunt, plenariorum Conciliorum autoritati, quæ fiunt ex universo orbe Christiano, sine ullis ambagibus cedere, ipsaque plenaria sæpe priora posterioribus emendari, cum aliquo experimento rerum aperitur quod clausum erat, et cognoscitur quod latebat, sine ullo typho sacrilegæ superbiæ, sine ulla inflata cervice arrogantiæ, sine ulla contentione lividæ invidiæ, cum sancta humilitate, cum pace catholica, cum charitate Christiana."—August. Opera, tom. ix.; De Baptism., Contra Donat., lib. ii., cap. iii., col. 98, A. B. C. Paris, 1694.

[" * Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii.; De Concil. Auctoritate, lib. ii., cap. viii., col. 70, A. Colon., 1619.

[" † Vide Corp. Juris Canon. a Pithœo, tom. i., Distinct. I., sect. xxviii. Fol. Paris, 1695."]

[‡ Bishop Taylor's Works, vol. viii.; Liberty of Prophesying, sect. vi., pp. 42—44. 8vo. edit. London, 1822.]

[† The Difficulties of Romanism. By George Stanley Faber, B.D. P. 10, et seq. 8vo. London, 1826.

sat during the reign of Constantine, and therefore in the early part of the fourth century, strictly enjoined, that neither paintings nor images, representing the person whom we adore, should be introduced into churches. For this striking and undoubted fact the Romish Bishop of Aire would account on the principle, that the Elviran Fathers dreaded lest the new converts from Paganism should unfortunately mistake Christian image-worship for pagan idolatry.* Let his solution avail; the fact he fully acknowledges.

["(2.) In the early ages then of Christianity, not only was the worship of images and pictures unknown, but their very introduction into churches was expressly disallowed. Matters, however, did not long remain in this state. Images and pictures, in direct opposition to the Council of Elvira, having at length been unadvisedly admitted on the plea that they were a sort of books for the unlearned, the idolatrous worship of them soon followed. About the end of the sixth century, a transaction of this nature took place at Marseilles, and in consequence of it, Serenus the Bishop wisely removed and destroyed the images. Wretchedly injudicious as was the latter part of this decision, Gregory, at least, speaks fully and expressly against any adoration either of pictures or of images. 'Omne manufactum adorari non licet. Adorari imagines omnibus modis veta.' †

["(3.) Thus stood the question at the close of the sixth century; but, as might easily have been anticipated from the idolatry of the Massilians, the introduction of images soon led to their adoration. This gross abuse was strenuously opposed by the Emperor Leo, the Isaurian; but, as it still continued to increase, his son Constantine assembled a Council at Constantinople in the year 754, which formally condemned and forbade it.

["(4.) The Council of Constantinople, though it agreed in its condemnation of image-worship both with the decision of Pope Gregory the Great, and with the yet more ancient decision of the Council of Elvira, was, on that very account, disowned as a legitimate Council by the innovating successors of Gregory; and the cause of idolatry rapidly acquired such a degree of strength, that the second Council of Nice, which sat in the year 787, reversed the decree of the Council of Constantinople, pronounced it to be an illegitimate Council, and ordained the adoration of images in language which strikingly contrasts with the express prohibition of Pope Gregory. 'I confess, and agree, and receive, and salute, and adore the unpolluted image of our Lord Jesus Christ, our true God, and the holy image of the holy Mother of God, who bore him without conception of seed.' ‡

["(5.) Having thus wholly departed from her former self, the Church, speaking through the mouth of a General Council, had now decreed the orthodoxy and legality of image-worship; but this decree was not long suffered to remain undisputed either in the west or in the east. In the year 794 Charlemagne assembled at Frankfort a Council of three hundred Bishops, who reversed the decision of the second Nicene Council, and who with one voice condemned the worship of images. Such was the solemn judgment of the west, and that of the east speedily followed it. For in the year 814, the Emperor Leo, imitating the conduct of Charlemagne, assembled another Council at Constantinople, which, like that of Frankfort, rescinded and abolished the decrees of the second Nicene Council relative to the worship of images.

["(6.) Thus as both the east and the west had concurred in establishing image-worship, through the medium of the second Council of Nice, so did the west and the east concur in condemning image-worship, through the medium of the Councils of Frankfort and Constantinople. But we have not yet reached the end of this strange eventful history of multiplied variations; we must prepare ourselves for yet additional changes of opinion on the part of a professedly unchangeable and infallible Church. In the year 842, the Empress Theodora, during the minority of her son, convened yet another Council at Constantinople; and this assembly, differing entirely from its immediate predecessor, re-instated the decrees of the second Nicene Synod, and thus re-established image-worship.

["(7.) Meanwhile the Church of the western patriarchate continued to maintain, that the second Nicene Council had erred in its decision; for in the year 824, Louis the Meek assembled a Synod at Paris, which confirmed the decrees of that of Frankfort, and which strictly prohibited the payment of any, even the smallest, religious worship to images.

["(8.) The Church, however, of the eastern patriarchate, subsequent to the year 842, persevered in declaring, that the decision of the second Nicene Council was an orthodox decision, and that images ought to be devoutly worshipped by all good Christians. To establish this point, therefore, an additional Synod was held at Constantinople in the year 879; and the Fathers of that assembly decreed the undoubted obligation of image-worship, and confirmed and renewed the decrees of the second Council of Nice. Their decision gave such entire satisfaction to the Greeks, that they ascribed it to the peculiar interposition of heaven, and commemorated it by a yearly festival, which they appropriately called 'the feast of orthodoxy.'

["(9.) Nor did the Latins long withhold their assent. The decisions of the Councils of Frankfort and Paris have been consigned to the owls and the bats; and the second Council of Nice, which enjoins the adoration of images, is now universally acknowledged to have set forth the true faith and practice of the Gospel.

["(10.) Such have been the multiplied variations of the Church with regard to the single point of image-worship; and yet, says the learned Bishop of Meaux, 'the Church which professes to declare and to teach nothing, save what she has received, never varies; but heresy, on the contrary, which began by innovation, perpetually innovates and never changes its nature." ! ! *]

We meet with a remarkable instance of Jesuitical evasion in the answer which Dens gives to the foregoing quotation from Augustine, and which is in substance as follows:—"Many answers can be given to this place of Augustine. (1.) He speaks of plenary Councils generally, as well those not approved as those approved. (2.) He does not seem to speak of General Councils properly, but improperly, as National Councils are sometimes called General. (3.) If he is to be understood of true General Councils, it may be said, that he only wished ["* Discussion Amicale sur l'Eglise Anglicane et en général sur la Réformation, dédiée au Clergé de toutes les Communions Protestantes, et rédigée en forme de Lettres, par Monseigneur L'Evêque d'Aire. A Paris, chez Potey, Rue de Bac, No. 46.

["† Greg. Magn. Epist., lib. xi., epist. xiii., aliter ix.

["‡ 'Confiteor, et polliceor, et recipio, amplector, atque adoro principaliter intemeratam iconem Domini nostri Jesu Christi, veri Dei nostri, et iconem Dei genitricis, quæ illum sine semine peperit,' &c.—Concilia Labb., tom. vii., Conc. Nicen. II., col. 59, B. Paris, 1671.

["* Bossuet, His. des Variat., pref., sect. v."]

that the former might be amended by the latter in pure matters of fact, and in those things which pertain to discipline, ceremonies, and other ecclesiastical usages. Some later Councils may more clearly define some things not yet sufficiently defined in former Councils, and thus the former may be elucidated by the latter."* The reader who examines the passage of Augustine, quoted above, will not fail to perceive that the explanation of this authority in the Church of Rome is both evasive and sophistical.

12. It is notorious that General and National Councils (that is, such as were either General originally, or were recognised a such by the universal church) did err and were deceived.

The first Council of Toledo admits to the communion him that hath a concubine, provided he hath no wife. This Council is approved by St. Leo, in his ninety-second Epistle to Rusticus, Bishop of Narbona. The Jews may distinguish wives from concubines by dowry and legal solemnities ; but Christianity rejects all such distinctions. Adultery was so common in the time of the Council, that it chose rather to endure simple fornication, that by permitting a less they might check a greater sin ; just as, at Rome, stews are permitted in order to prevent crimes which are unnatural. That habitual and notorious fornicators should be publicly admitted to the holy communion, was an act that admits of no excuse.

[But who needs be surprised? We are assured, on competent authority, that the licentious profligacy of the Fathers who attended the sittings of these assemblies beggars all description. "The General Council of Constance," as Edgar informs us, "imitated the incontinence practised at that of Lyons, which demoralized the city in which it was convened. Seven hundred public or common women followed in the train of the Constantian Fathers. The Viennese manuscript augments the number of these female attendants, whom it calls 'vagrant strumpets,' to fifteen hundred. This was a reasonable supply for the thousand learned Divines that composed the infallible (!) assembly. The procuring of these ladies, who no doubt were trained to their profession, showed the sacred Synod's provident foresight, as well as their good taste. Constance might not have afforded a competent supply ; and therefore the thoughtful theologians, mindful of their own comfort, imported a few hundreds of the sex. The sacerdotal fornicators, it seems, were very liberal to these professional ladies. One courtezan, it is said, gained eight hundred florins ; an immense sum in those days. She was treated very differently from John Huss. The reverend debauchees enriched the prostitute, and burned the Reformer. These fair companions evinced the holy men's relish for spiritual enjoyments, and refreshed the infallible Doctors at night, after being exhausted during the day, by making speeches in the Council, and burning the heretics Huss and Jerome."*]

The sixth General Council † separates persons lawfully married, upon an accusation and crime of heresy.

The Roman Council, under Pope Nicholas II., defined, that not only the sacrament of Christ's body, but the very body itself of our blessed Saviour, is handled and broken by the hands of the Priest, and chewed by the teeth of the communicants ; which is a manifest error, opposed to the resurrection of Christ and his glorification in heaven, and disavowed by the Church of Rome herself. We allude to the form of abjuration signed by Berenger at the instigation of the Pontiff.‡ But Bellarmine,§ who answers all arguments in the world, whether possible, probable, or impossible, says the decree means that the body is broken, not in itself, but in the sign ; and yet

[* "Plures hujus loci dari possunt responsiones : 1. Augustinum loqui de Conciliis plenariis in communi, tam de non approbatis quam approbatis ; et sic fieri potest, quod priora, quæ non erant approbata et errores continebant, per posteriora approbata emendentur. 2. S. Aug. non videtur loqui de Conciliis Generalibus proprie, sed improprie, secundum quod Concilia nationalia dicuntur Generalia, quomodo et Synodum Hipponensem vocat plenariam. 3. Si de Conciliis vere œcumenicis intelligatur, dicendum, quod S. Aug. solum velit priora emendari posse per posteriora in puris factis, et in iis, quæ ad disciplinam, ceremonias, aliasque consuetudines ecclesiasticas pertinent ; unde subdit eodem loco : 'Cum aliquo experimento rerum aperitur, quod clausum erat, et cognoscitur, quod latebat ;' ea autem, quæ sunt fidei, non rerum experimento, sed verbo Dei scripto vel tradito noscuntur. Tandem Concilia posteriora quædam, in prioribus nondum satis definita, clarius definiunt ; et ita priora Concilia posterioribus magis elucidantur."—Dens Theol., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, No. 89, De Authoritate Conciliorum.]

[† "Non licere virum orthodoxum cum muliere hæretica conjungi, neque vero orthodoxam cum viro hæretico copulari. Sed et si quid ejusmodi ab ullo ex omnibus factum apparuerit, irritas nuptias existimari, et nefarium conjugium dissolvi. Neque enim ea quæ non sunt miscenda misceri, nec ovem cum lupo, nec peccatorum sortem cum Christi parte conjungi oportet. Si quis autem ea, quæ a nobis decreta sunt, transgressus fuerit, segregetur. Si autem aliqui qui adhuc sunt infideles, et in orthodoxorum gregem nondum relati sunt, sunt inter se legitimo matrimonio conjuncti ; deinde hic quidem, eo quod est honestum electo, ad lucem veritatis accurrerit, ille vero erroris vinculo detentus fuerit, nolens divinos radios fixis oculis intueri, fideli vero homini placeat cum infideli cohabitare, vel e contra, ne a se invicem separentur. Ex divini enim Pauli sententia, sanctificatus est vir infidelis in mulieri, et sanctificata est mulier infidelis in viro."—Labb., Concilia, tom. vi., Conc. Quinisext., can. lxxii., col. 1173, D. Paris, 1671.]

[‡ "Ego Berengarius, indignus Diaconus Ecclesiæ Sancti Mauritii Andegavensis, cognoscens veram et apostolicam fidem, anathematizo omnem hæresim ; præcipue, de qua hactenus infamatus sum : quæ astruere conatur, panem et vinum, quæ in altari ponuntur, post consecrationem solummodo sacramentum, et non verum corpus et sanguinem Domini nostri Jesu Christi esse ; nec posse sensualiter, nisi in solo sacramento, manibus Sacerdotum tractari, vel frangi, vel fidelium dentibus atteri. Consentio autem sanctæ Romanæ Ecclesiæ et Apostolicæ sedi, et ore et corde profiteor de sacramento Dominicæ mensæ eam fidem me tenere, quam dominus et venerabilis Papa Nicolaus et hæc sancta Synodus autoritate evangelica et Apostolica tenendam tradidit, mihique firmavit : (formavit in marg. :) scilicet, panem et vinum, quæ in altari ponuntur, post consecrationem non solum sacramentum, sed etiam verum corpus et sanguinem Domini nostri Jesu Christi esse ; et sensualiter, non solum sacramento, sed in veritate manibus Sacerdotum tractari, et frangi, et fidelium dentibus atteri ; jurans per sanctam et homousion Trinitatem, et per hæc sacrosancta Christi evangelia. Eos vero, qui contra hanc fidem venerint, cum dogmatibus, et sectatoribus suis, æterno anathemate dignos esse pronuntio. Quod si ego ipse aliquando aliquid contra hæc sentire ac prædicare præsumpsero, subjaceam canonum severitati. Lecto, et perlecto, sponte subscripsi."—Idem, tom. ix., Conc. Romanum, col. 1101, D, E. Paris, 1671.]

[§ "Decimo sexto, proferunt Concilium Romanum sub Nicolao II., in quo definitum est, non solum sacramentum corporis Christi, sed et ipsum verum Christi corpus tractari et frangi manibus Sacerdotum, et fidelium dentibus atteri, ut patet ex can. Ego Berengarius, de Consecrat. dist. ii. At hic est error manifestus contra resurrectionem gloriosam Christi, de qua dicit Apostolus : Christus resurgens a mortuis, jam non moritur. Si enim corpus Christi verum frangitur, et teritur, certe corrumpitur, et moritur.

["Respondeo, numquam fuisse questionem, an Christi corpus vere, ut est in se, frangeretur manibus, et dentibus tereretur ; certum enim est et semper fuit, Christi corpus incorruptibile nunc existens non posse frangi et teri, nisi in signo, sive sacramento, ita ut dicatur frangi, ac teri, cum signum ejus, id est, species panis, frangitur et teritur. At quæstio fuit, an signum, quod frangitur et teritur sit nudum signum ; an vero contineat Christi corpus revera : et quia Berengarius docuerat esse nudum signum ideo Concilium, constituens formam adjurationis hujus erroris, voluit eum dicere, non solum sacramentum, sed etiam verum Christi corpus frangi et teri ; quorum verborum hic est sensus, Non teritur et frangitur nudum signum, sed etiam verum Christi corpus, id est, sed signum habens realiter conjunctum Christi corpus : sive, sed etiam verum Christi corpus ibi præsens existens frangitur, et teritur ; non tamen in se, sed in signo."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii., De Concil. Auctoritate, lib. ii., cap. viii., col. 78, C, D. Colon., 1619.]

the decree says, that not only the sacrament, but the very body of Christ itself, is broken and masticated with hands and teeth respectively.

13. Some Councils have decided contrary to the infallible word of inspired truth, and therefore have egregiously erred. For example :—

The thirteenth session of the Council of Constance decided in favour of communion in one kind, in utter defiance of the institution of Christ, and of numerous passages of holy Scripture. For in the preface the decree of Christ's ordinance, and the practice of the primitive church, are expressed and acknowledged ; and then, notwithstanding, communion in one kind is with blasphemous effrontery established. Can any individual reconcile the decree of the Council of Trent, which enjoins, that the public offices of the Church should be performed in Latin, with 1 Cor. xiv. ?

The Pope erred by teaching in and by the Council of Lateran, which was confirmed by Innocent III., that Christ is present in the sacrament by way of transubstantiation ; a dogma which was never heard of in the church until the fourth bearing that name, and which cannot be proved from the sacred Scripture. This is confessed by numerous Romanists, several of whom Stillingfleet* has quoted, who acknowledge that transubstantiation was not adequately proved, either from the Scripture or from the Fathers, until it was defined by the Church in the General Council of Lateran.

[" We are repeatedly assured, by the voice of inspiration, that an oath is most imperiously binding upon the conscience ; that those who love false oaths are hated by the Lord ; that whatever goes forth from a person's lips under the obligation of an oath, must be kept and performed ; and that an oath must be religiously observed, even though the observation of it may be disadvantageous to the interest of the juror. (Num. xxx. 2 ; Lev. xix. 12 ; Deut. xxiii. 23 ; Zech. viii. 17 ; Psalm xv. 4 ; Rev. xxi. 8.)

[" Yet, in defiance of language thus clear and explicit, the third Council of Lateran, which is acknowledged as the eleventh œcumenical Synod, has ventured to decree, that all oaths which are adverse to the utility of the Church must in no wise be performed ; but, on the contrary, with whatever solemnity and apparent good faith they may have been taken, they must be unscrupulously violated, inasmuch as they are to be deemed perjuries rather than oaths.†

[" Thus while God, who has been invoked as a witness, and while holy Scripture, which solemnly declares the inviolable sacredness of an oath, even though it be to a person's own damage, are alike disregarded when placed in competition with the power and aggrandizement of ambitious Ecclesiastics ; the obligation or non-obligation of an oath is made, by the third Council of Lateran, to depend solely upon its utility or non-utility to the interests of the Church, as those interests shall be understood and explained by the governors of the Church for the time being.‡

[" So, again, we are distinctly taught by an inspired Apostle, that 'marriage is honourable in all,' whether the married individuals be Clerks or laics ; and, in strict accordance with this decision, the marriage of the Clergy, whatever may be their special order, is expressly mentioned by the same Apostle with full and entire approbation. (Heb. xiii. 4 ; 1 Tim. iii. 2, 4, 11, 12.)

[" Yet the second Council of Lateran, which is acknowledged as the tenth œcumenical, strictly prohibits the marriage of Ecclesiastics, down to the rank of the Sub-Diaconate inclusive ; and, by way of making the prohibition more effectual, it forbids the laity to hear mass performed by any Priest who shall have dared to violate this enactment.*

[" In excuse for such a determined opposition to God's own word, it is commonly said, by the modern Romanists, that the enforced celibacy of the priesthood is only a point of discipline, that it stands upon the same footing as the observance of any mere rite or ceremony, and that it may be enjoined or remitted at the good pleasure of the Church.†

[" Thus may the Romanists apologize for the infatuated rashness of the Council ; but such an apology, even to say nothing of its glaring insufficiency, upon their own showing, is itself founded upon a gross mis-statement. The second Council of Lateran prohibits the marriage of Ecclesiastics, not on the simple ground of mutable and temporary expediency, but on the lofty ground of immutable and eternal and inherent unholiness. Ecclesiastics are forbidden to marry, not because such prohibition, under certain circumstances of the Church, may be convenient as a point of discipline, but because, as the Council assures us, it is an UNWORTHY DEED, that those persons who ought to be the holy vessels of the Lord, should debase themselves so far as to become the vile slaves of CHAMBERING and UNCLEANNESS.‡

[" Thus speaks and thus argues the second Council of Lateran, with respect to the marriage of Ecclesiastics. The case, therefore, between the Scripture and the Council, stands in manner following :—Scripture both allows and recommends the marriage of the Clergy ; but the Council disallows and prohibits it. Scripture declares that marriage is HONOURABLE in ALL men, whether they be Clerks or laics ; but the Council pronounces, that the marriage of the Clergy is an UNWORTHY DEED, being in truth no better than a state of base thraldom to CHAMBERING and UNCLEANNESS.

[" Hence it is evident, that, in each of the above two cases, the decisions of the œcumenical Councils have directly contradicted the decisions of Scripture ; and hence, also, it is evident, that by the indisputable fact of this direct contradictoriness we are irresistibly driven to the following very unpleasant alternative :—

[" If the Church, speaking through an œcumenical Council, be infallible, then the decisions of holy Scripture are erroneous ; and, conversely, if the decisions of holy Scripture be essential truth, then the Church, speaking through an œcumenical Council, is undoubtedly fallible.

[" From this alternative there is no possibility of evasion. Holy Scripture says one thing, and the second and third Councils of Lateran say another thing ; therefore

* Rational Account of the Grounds of Protestant Religion, p. 568, et seq. Folio. London, 1665.

[† " Non enim dicenda sunt juramenta, sed potius perjuria, quæ contra utilitatem ecclesiasticam et sanctorum Patrum veniunt instituta."—Labb., Concilia, tom. x., Conc. Lat. III., can. xvi., col. 1517. Paris, 1671.

[‡ The exemplification of this extraordinary principle, in the case of John Huss, has been noticed at large, vide supra, pp. 571—573.

[" * Labb., Concilia, tom. x., Conc. Later. II., can. vi., vii., col. 1003, 1004. Paris, 1671.

[" † Discuss. Amicale, vol. ii., p. 403, note.

[" ‡ 'Cum enim ipsi templum Dei, vasa Domini, sacrarium Spiritus Sancti, debeant et esse et dici ; INDIGNUM est eos CUBILIBUS et IMMUNDITIIS deservire.'—Labb., Concilia, tom. x., Conc. Lat. II., can. vi., col. 1003, D. Paris, 1671."] holy Scripture cannot stand with the second and third Councils of Lateran." *]

14. Finally, to conclude this series of arguments, if infallibility is supposed to be in Councils, the Church of Rome may safely conclude she has lost it. For as there has been no General Council since that of Trent, so there is no probability of another being assembled. The disorders and chicanery of Trent have taught the world to expect no good from such Synods. Men cannot fail to discover that the Pope and the Court of Rome carry every thing, so that neither Princes, people, nor Bishops desire to see another.

The claim set up and enforced at Rome for infallibility not only makes a Council useless, but implies that the Pope is not infallible, a dogma which will always be unacceptable to those who assume infallibility, and act as if they did indeed possess it. Nor can it be supposed that the Pontiffs and their dependants would desire a Council to reform those abuses in discipline which have been occasioned by the exercise of that absolute and universal authority which the Popes demand.

So that from all that can be gathered from the state of things, the interests of men, and the management of the Tridentine Synod, we may, without the spirit of prophecy, conclude, that unless Christendom assume a different aspect, œcumenical assemblies are no more.

VII. The origin and use of General Councils.

1. That they are of divine origin, we cannot admit, as the Scriptures do not clearly teach this notion. We shall, however, consider those passages of sacred writ on which their divine institution is said to be founded. Some general reasons we have already given against such assumption, in our remarks on texts which have been quoted for this purpose. In our article on INFALLIBILITY several are considered at length. Two others (namely, Matt. xviii. 17—20; Acts xv. 28) will now be adduced.

To prove that all are bound to hear General Councils, Romanists advance the following;—"Tell it unto the church; but if he neglect to hear the church, let him be unto thee as an heathen man and a publican." (Matt. xviii. 17.) When the occasion upon which these words were spoken, and the subject of which they treat, are considered, nothing can be plainer than that our Saviour is speaking of such private differences as may arise among men, and of the practice of forgiving injuries, and composing such disputes. "If thy brother sin against thee," first private attempts were to be made; then the interposition of friends was to be sought; and, finally, if these measures proved ineffectual to the restoration of peace, the matter was to be referred to the body or assembly of religious people to which the parties belonged: and those who would not be reproved or corrected by such methods, were no more to be considered as brethren, but were to be viewed as bad men, like unto Heathens.

Closely connected with this portion of sacred truth, which is quoted to prove the divine authority of Councils, is this: "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." (Matt. xviii. 20.) On this they argue: "If two or three gathered in the name of Christ obtain what they ask; how much more shall all the Bishops gathered together in Council obtain what is necessary for the direction of the Church!" To this we answer: (1.) Infallibility does not belong to the less assembly; therefore it does not belong to the greater. (2.) Because it depends upon conditions here expressed, being gathered in the name of Christ; these conditions must exist before infallibility can be anticipated, even allowing it is promised. (3.) The assurance of God's presence in the midst of them, is to grant what is needful for them, and not what they may capriciously see fit to ask. (4.) The phrase, "there am I in the midst of them," and the like, such as, "being with them," "walking with them," "never leaving nor forsaking them," are expressions often used in Scripture to signify, not infallibility, but the guidance, support, and protection of God which do not confer that gift; otherwise all true Christians would be infallible.

The argument of the Romanists on this and kindred texts depends on a false supposition; namely, that there is a necessity for infallibility to continue in the Church, and that all are bound to receive the decrees of Councils as the unerring oracles of truth: but we maintain, that neither of these is necessary, and therefore there is no reason for extending the promise to the infallibility of Councils. If we argue according to human prudence in favour of their exemption from error, the same would lead us to extend it to every individual and to every congregation of Christians. For it would seem to be far more for the peace and unity of the Church, if every congregation had this infallibility, than if it were confined to General Councils; because, by that means, many disputes about the calling, authority, proceedings, confirmation, reception, &c., of such meetings would be prevented. Nay, from the argument drawn from the goodness, wisdom, and power of Christ, it might be inferred that every true Christian should be infallible, and then Councils would be useless.

If it be asserted, that experience shows that Christ never contemplated the promise extending to individuals or small companies of men, we answer, that experience also shows that Bishops met in Council have been grossly deceived, as they themselves allow, especially in the Arian Councils; and in all Popish Synods, from the first Lateran down to the Council of Trent. Should it be said, that "the Arian Councils erred because they did not observe the conditions requisite in order to Christ's hearing them;" the same answer will apply to the assemblies of Trent and Lateran. Until it can be proved that a General Council has observed all these conditions, nothing can be inferred in their favour from this passage.

From the words, "It seemed good to the Holy Ghost, and to us," (Acts xv. 28,) Papists infer, that he is present in Councils, and that what seems good to them, also is approved by the Holy Ghost. It will not, however, be easy to prove, that this Council was the prototype of such as succeeded. Here both laymen and Presbyters were associated with the Apostles. Here was no formal citation, no time fixed for all the churches to send Bishops or proxies. It was an occasional meeting of such of the Apostles as were at Jerusalem at that time, and of the Presbyters and Christians of the city. Here is no precedent of a General Council; and a decision was made which has little relation to the judgment of other Synods.

We must, therefore, conclude, that General Councils were not constituted by divine authority; since we have no direction given by the Great Head of the church, from which we may ascertain what they are, and what is necessary to their constitution: for we cannot suppose, that God has granted any privilege, much less that of infallibility, which is the greatest of all prerogatives, to a body of men assembled in Council, of whom, or of the constitution of such Council, he has said nothing. Suppose we grant that God has lodged infallibility somewhere in the church diffusive, that the church in some part or other might be preserved from error; nevertheless, confining its exercise to the majority of Bishops who may come to a Council, independent of a divine authority for so doing, is unauthorized and presumptuous.

[* Faber's Difficulties of Romanism, pp. 22—28.]

2. General Councils are of human origin, and not of divine institution.

During the first century of Christianity, we find no trace of any assemblies corresponding with what were afterward called General Councils. The meeting at Jerusalem was only of one church; but a Council is an assembly of deputies from several churches, associated in one general body, and united by certain bonds.

Christian churches in the first, and throughout a great part of the second, century, were independent of each other; and were not joined together by association, confederacy, or any other bonds but those of charity. A Bishop, during this period, was one who had the care of a single Christian assembly. In it he acted, not with the authority of a Master, but with the assiduity of a Teacher. He instructed the people, performed the several parts of divine worship, visited the sick, and inquired into the circumstances of each who was under his pastoral care. In process of time, all the Christian churches of a province were formed into one large ecclesiastical body, which assembled at certain periods to deliberate upon the common interests of the whole. This institution had its origin among the Greeks, with whom nothing was more common than a confederacy of independent states. These associations became universal, and were called by the Greeks, "Synods;" and by the Latins, "Councils;" and the laws enacted were termed "canons," or "rules."

These Councils, of which we find no mark till the middle of the second century, changed the appearance of the church, and gave it a new form; by them the privileges of the people and of the Presbyters were diminished, and the authority of the Bishops enlarged. The Prelates imperceptibly extended their authority, turned their influence into dominion, and their precepts into law; and, at length, openly asserted, that Christ had empowered them to prescribe to his people authoritative rules of faith and practice.

Another effect of these Councils was, the gradual abolition of that perfect equality which reigned among all Bishops, or rather Pastors, of the primitive times. The order and decency of these assemblies required that some one of the provincial Bishops met in Council should be invested with a superior degree of authority; and hence the office of Metropolitan derived its origin. To the lesser Synods, which were composed of the authorities of one or more provinces, were afterwards added Œcumenical or Universal Councils, consisting of representatives from all the churches of the Christian world. These were established by the authority of the Emperor, who assembled the first at Nice, A. D. 325. There never were any Councils held which could properly be called "Universal:" those, however, whose laws were extensively received have been designated "Œcumenical" or "General."*

* Mosheim's Eccles. Hist., cent. i., part ii., chap. ii., sect. 11—13; cent. ii., part ii., chap. ii., sect. 1—3; cent. iv., part ii., chap. ii., sect. 1—3, vol. i. 8vo. edit. London, 1825. A History of the Church from the Earliest Ages to the Reformation. By the Rev. George Waddington. Vol. i., p. 41. Second edit. London, 1835. Bingham's Antiquities of the Christian Church, vol. i., book iv., chap. ii., sect. ii.—iv., pp. 440—442. Straker's edit. London, 1840.

General Councils themselves are but novelties, though they are the foundation of the faith of the Church of Rome. Pighius affirms that they are not of divine origin: "General Councils," says he, "have not a divine, supernatural, but merely a human, origin, and are the invention of Constantine; profitable, indeed, sometimes to find out in controversy which is the orthodox catholic truth; though to this they are not necessary, seeing it is a readier way to advise with the Apostolical Seat."* Indeed, many of those Romanists who advocate the infallibility of the Pope, deem Councils superfluous, for the same reason that Pighius gives; namely, "It is a readier way to advise with the Apostolical Seat."

3. These Synods do not prevent controversies; inasmuch as it cannot be expected that men will yield their judgment to the decrees of any combination of men calling itself a General Council, unless it can be proved that it is impossible they should err in their decisions. Nothing but truth can end controversy; and the more men pretend to unreasonable modes of decision, instead of ending one, they create others. Indeed, the history of Councils and of the Church proves that little has been done in these assemblies to promote the cause of truth.

4. General Councils do not restore peace to the Church.

The accompanying extract from Du Pin will express this clearly, as history testifies:—"It rarely happens that General Councils held about matters of faith restore peace to the Church by their decrees. Men have so great inclination to their own sentiments, and do so hardly endure the affront of a condemnation, that instead of yielding to the decision given against them, they become more obstinate. They begin to look upon their judges as parties, and try all manner of ways, either to prove that they were not condemned, or that their opinion was not rightly understood, nor their reasons fairly heard; or, lastly, to weaken the authority of the decision given against them. The Council of Nice had condemned the Arians; yet how many disputes followed this decree! How was the Church tossed with many commotions! The Council of Ephesus, by proscribing Nestorius and the Orientalists, seems rather to have inflamed than appeased the difference. The seeming peace that followed was only feigned; for the fire of division still raged in men's minds, which broke forth in a little time after, and set the whole east in combustion. The Council of Chalcedon having treated of these things with much moderation, and explained them in very intelligible terms, should have reconciled men's minds: Marcianus caused it to be received almost everywhere; yet this Emperor was no sooner dead, but the troubles of the Church revived again with greater violence than before."†

5. The following declaration of Gregory Nazianzen, though sufficiently severe, contains much truth:—"I, if permitted to write the truth, am so affected in my mind, that I would fly from all Councils of Bishops, since I never saw a happy or prosperous end of one Council; for each terminated not so much to the expulsion of evil as to its accession and increase."* The first four General Councils are recognised as such by Protestantism, because they teach doctrines which are contained in Scripture. We reverence them on that account; but do not receive the doctrine on their authority. But since then, so much has appeared of that which was earthly and sensual in the proceedings of Councils, that we refuse to place implicit confidence in their decrees.

[* "Vides itaque quam institutionem, quam originem habeant Universalia Concilia, non equidem divinam aut supernaturalem, sed prorsus humanam. Sunt enim Constantini Principis inventum, utile quidem nonnunquam ad inveniendum in subortis dubitationibus quæ sit orthodoxa et catholica veritas, quamvis ad hoc minime necessarium, cum magis in expedito ac promptu sit apostolicam de his sedem consulere."—Pighii Hierarch. Eccles., lib. vi., cap. i. Fol. Colon., 1538.]

† Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., vol. i., p. 699. Fol. Dublin, 1723.

CHAPTER IV.

SUPREMACY OF THE POPE—STATEMENT OF THE DOCTRINE.

I. DIFFICULTY OF ASCERTAINING THE SENTIMENTS OF THE ROMANISTS; particularly on supremacy, which was not permitted to be agitated in the Council of Trent.—II. SOME TEACH THAT THE POPE HAS ABSOLUTE POWER, BY DIVINE RIGHT, OVER ALL PERSONS, IN ALL MATTERS, BOTH SPIRITUAL AND TEMPORAL. 1. Explanation of this: 2. Bellarmine cited: 3. Aquinas: 4. Ferraris: 5. Baronius: 6. Antoninus: 7. Charles Butler, Esq., on Transalpine opinions: 8. Benedict XIV.: 9. Dens quoted: 10. Bellarmine: "The common opinion," or the indirect power of the Pope the same.—III. THIS UNIVERSAL AND ABSOLUTE POWER HAS BEEN CLAIMED BY SEVERAL POPES SUCCESSIVELY FOR MANY AGES. 1. The first Bishops of Rome did not hold this opinion or practice. P. Symmachus I., P. Gelasius I., Felix III., cited: 2. The deposition of Kings and absolving subjects from their oath of allegiance, taught and practised first by Gregory II., in 730: 3. By Gregory VII., in 1075: 4. Urban II., in 1088: 5. Paschal II., in 1099: 6. Innocent III., in 1212: 7. Gregory IX., in 1239: 8. Innocent IV., in the Council of Lyons: 9. Pope Boniface VIII., cited: 10. Paul III., in 1535 and 1538, deposed Henry VIII.: 11. Pius V., in 1570, deposed Elizabeth: 12. Gregory XIII. and Sixtus V. renewed the deposition: 13. Sixtus V., in 1585, deposed Henry of Navarre and the Prince of Conde.—IV. SOME ROMAN CATHOLICS ASCRIBE TO THE POPE VERY LIMITED POWERS, ESPECIALLY IN TEMPORAL OR CIVIL AFFAIRS. 1. Bishop Milner: 2. Bishop Hay: 3. Declaration of the English Roman Bishops: 4. Cisalpine sentiments: 5. Those of the Universities of Sorbonne, Louvain, Douay, Alcala, and Salamanca.—V. ABSOLUTE POWER MAY BE CONSIDERED AS HAVING BEEN THE DOCTRINE OF ALL POPES FOR MORE THAN EIGHT HUNDRED YEARS. 1. Pontiffs have declared for it: 2. None have condemned it: 3. Controvertists have maintained and defined it: 4. Councils have taught it: 5. Popes insist upon it: 6. And have practised it: 7. Bishops swear to uphold it, and to persecute and oppose all impugners of it: 8. Grows out of the doctrine of supremacy.—VI. ROMANISTS ARE, CONSISTENTLY WITH THEIR TRUE PRINCIPLES, BOUND TO HOLD THE ABSOLUTE POWER OF THE POPES IN SPIRITUALS AND TEMPORALS. 1. Councils have declared for it: 2. Pontiffs have, ex cathedra, asserted and defined it: 3. Great Divines of the Papacy have maintained it: 4. Papists affect unchangeableness in their doctrine. C. Butler and Pope Gregory XVI., in 1832, cited. Heretical character of the doctrine: 5. Those who deny it are called heretics.—VII. DIVERSITY OF SENTIMENT AMONG THEM ON THIS POINT. 1. Opinions of the Gallic Church. Butler quoted: 2. Enumeration of their views. Eight varieties given. Council of Pisa in 1409. Of Constance. Of Basil. Declaration of the Faculty of Divinity of Paris, in 1663: 3. Popes have shifted their pretences: 4. Reason of this variety of opinion: 5. Difficulty of stating the question fairly.—VIII. THE DOCTRINE DISCUSSED WILL BE THAT IN WHICH THE SONS OF THE ROMISH CHURCH ARE AGREED. 1. Mode of ascertaining their true doctrine: 2. Council of Florence and Mr. Butler quoted. Lateran Council. Council of Trent: 3. The episcopal oath defines it: 4. All the Clergy profess the same.—IX. THE ABSOLUTE POWER OF THE POPE FORMS THE TRUE DOCTRINE OF THE CHURCH OF ROME, AS FAR AS IT CAN BE DEFINED. 1. No regard had to semi-Romanists: 2. Enumeration of principles: 3. Papists should give full proof of their doctrine: 4. Division of the subject, and order of discussion.

I. It is not easy to ascertain the real sentiments of the Church of Rome concerning the supremacy of the Pope.

Romanists maintain that controversies should be decided, and boast of their unity and certainty of doctrine, as being peculiar to themselves, and which others have not the means of obtaining: nevertheless, controversies of considerable importance remain unsettled. This is no more than what might have been expected; indeed, it is impossible it should be otherwise, as Papists are governed by principles discordant in themselves, and derived from sources uncertain and opposite. Some dogmas are supported by Councils; others are founded on tradition, custom, or common agreement; some depend on the opinion of eminent Divines or Schoolmen; and others are sustained by the Court of Rome and her zealous dependents. Hence it is often difficult to know the real sentiments of the Papacy on points of great and vital importance.

Members of the Church of Rome are remarkably confused in their creed respecting the supremacy of the Pope, though a subject on which unanimity is of the utmost importance. The nature and extent of prerogative is yet controverted; and no question has caused so many disputes as this, even among Romanists. This disagreement of Doctors, Councils, Synods, Bishops, and Pontiffs, respecting the supremacy, is presumptive evidence against it. If a man sue for a piece of land, when neither himself nor his advocates can tell where it lies, how it is bounded, and from whom it was conveyed to him, his title must rest on a very slender foundation. Yet Romanists cannot decide with any accuracy concerning the nature or extent of the Pope's supremacy. It has baffled all their infallible modes of deciding controversies. Scripture is silent on this doctrine; tradition leaves it uncertain; Councils contradict each other; Divines are continually wrangling; and the most serious members of their communion are in a state of painful hesitation and anxiety.

In consequence of this uncertainty, and diversity of opinion, the Pope and his partisans, in modern times, have studiously avoided any decisive course which might involve controversy. Hence the anathematizing Council of Trent, which was not backward to decide upon disputed topics, waived this. The Legates of the Pontiff were enjoined to advertise the Council, that "they should not, on any cause whatsoever, dispute respecting the Pope's authority." The influence of the Pontiff and Council was not sufficient to decide the controversy, as appears from what took place on another subject. The Council having incidentally enacted, that a Prince should be excommunicated, and deprived of the dominion of that city or place where he might permit a duel to be fought;* the Prelates of France, in the Convention of Orders, A. D. 1595, declared against such decree, as well as others, as an infringement on the King's authority.† The opinions, therefore, concerning the authority of the Pope are very contradictory, and are likely so to continue.

II. Some Roman Catholics ascribe to the Pope an absolute, universal, and boundless authority over all persons, and in all matters, both spiritual and temporal, conferred upon him by divine right; so that all are obliged, in conscience, to believe whatsoever he doth authoritatively dictate, and to obey whatsoever he commands.

1. If Princes or Magistrates refuse obedience to the will of the Pope, he may excommunicate, depose, and extirpate them. If he require subjects to hold no communion with their Sovereign, to renounce allegiance, abandon, oppose, and persecute him, even to death, he must be obeyed, under pain of anathema or damnation. If he forbid whole nations worshipping God, they must submit. So that, according to the doctrines of many Papists, the Pope is Sovereign Lord over the whole world; and superior, even in temporal or civil affairs, to all Kings, Princes, legislatures, constitutions, and law.

* "Ego, si vera scribere oportet, hoc animo affectus sum, ut omnia Episcoporum Concilia fugiam, quoniam nullius Concilii finem lætum faustumque vidi, nec quod depulsionem malorum potius quam accessionem et incrementum habuerit."—Greg. Nazian. Opera, tom. i., Epist. ad Procopium, p. 315. Fol. Antverpiæ, 1612.

* Canones et Decret. Conc. Trident., sess. xxv.; Decretum de Reformatione, cap. xix.; Detestabilis Duellorum Usus, &c. Fol. Romæ, 1564.

† Du Pin, Eccl. Hist., vol. iii., p. 650.

2. Numerous Canonists and many Divines maintain such doctrine. Bellarmine, in enumerating the several notions which they entertained on the supremacy, says, "The first opinion is, that the Pope, by divine right, hath supreme power over the whole world, both in ecclesiastical and civil affairs. This is the opinion of Augustinus Triumphus, Alvarus Pelagius, Panormitanus, Hostiensis, Silvester, and many others."* Augustine Triumphus, a native of Ancona, who flourished in 1290, wrote on ecclesiastical power; and in the preface of that work, which he dedicated to Pope John XXII., he observes, that "it is an error not to believe that the Roman Pontiff is Pastor of the universal church, the successor of Peter, the lawful Vicar of Christ, and that he hath not universal supremacy over temporal and spiritual affairs. Into this error many fall, through ignorance of this power, which is infinite, because 'great is the Lord, and great is his power, and of his greatness there is no end;' for every created intellect is found deficient in his sight."†

3. The leading theologian of the Papacy, the angelical Doctor, Thomas Aquinas, says, "In the Pope is the summit of each power."—"When any Prince is denounced excommunicate on account of apostasy, by his decision his subjects are immediately freed from their subjection and oath of allegiance to him."‡ The same Divine, on the Rule of Princes,§ affirms, that "the Pope, by divine right, hath spiritual and temporal power, as supreme King of the world; so that he can impose taxes on all Christians, and destroy towns and castles for the preservation of Christianity."‖

4. Ferraris, in his Bibliotheca Prompta, which is adopted as a standard of Roman Catholic divinity, and whose authorities are deduced from the writings of the acknowledged champions of the Church of Rome, recognises the following traits of Papal power under the word Papa:—"The Pope is of such dignity and highness, that he is not simply man, but, as it were, God, and the Vicar of God. Hence the Pope is of such supreme and sovereign dignity that, properly speaking, he is not merely constituted in dignity, but is rather placed on the very summit of dignities. Hence also the Pope is 'Father of Fathers;' and he alone can use this name, because he only can be called 'Father of Fathers,' since he possesses the primacy over all, is truly greater than all, and the greatest of all. He is called 'most holy,' because he is presumed to be such. On account of the excellency of his supreme dignity, he is called 'Bishop of Bishops, Ordinary of Ordinaries, universal Bishop of the Church, Bishop or Diocesan of the whole world, divine Monarch, supreme Emperor and King of Kings.' Hence the Pope is crowned with a triple crown, as King of heaven, of earth, and of hell. Nay, the Pope's excellence and power is not only about heavenly, terrestrial, and infernal things, but he is also above angels, and is their superior; so that if it were possible that angels could err from the faith, or entertain sentiments contrary thereto, they could be judged and excommunicated by the Pope. He is of such great dignity and power, that he occupies one and the same tribunal with Christ; so that whatsoever the Pope does, seems to proceed from the mouth of God, as is proved from many Doctors. The Pope is, as it were, God on earth, the only Prince of the faithful of Christ, the greatest King of all Kings, possessing the plenitude of power, to whom the government of the earthly and heavenly kingdom is intrusted. Hence the common doctrine teacheth, that the Pope hath the power of the two swords; namely, the spiritual and temporal, which jurisdiction and power Christ himself committed to Peter and his successors: 'To thee will I give the keys of the kingdom of heaven,' &c.: (Matt. xvi.:) where Doctors note that he did not say 'key,' but 'keys,' and by this comprehending the temporal and spiritual power: which opinion is abundantly confirmed by the authority of the holy Fathers, the decision of the canon and civil law, and by the apostolic constitutions; so that those who hold to the contrary, seem to adhere to the opinion of the heretics reprobated by Boniface VIII., in his Extravagant, entitled, Unam Sanctam. Hence infidel Princes and Kings, by the decision of the Pope, may be deprived, in certain cases, of that dominion which they have over the faithful; as, if they have occupied the country of the Christians by violence, or endeavour to draw away their faithful Roman Catholic subjects from the faith, or any such thing, as Bellarmine, Suarez, Baros, Gonzalez, Cardinal Petra, &c., very fully demonstrate. And hence the Pope may cede those provinces, which formerly belonged to Christians, that were subsequently occupied by infidels, to any Christian Princes to be redeemed. And if a King become heretic, he can be removed from his kingdom by the Pope, to whom the right of appointing his successor belongs, if his sons and nearest relatives are heretics. Nay, in cases in which, on account of the heresy of the King, the religion of his kingdom, and the faith of others, seem to be in danger, if he can in no other way prevent this loss, the Pope may not only deprive him of his kingdom, but he may also concede it to a Christian Prince and his successors, if this Prince will fight for and conquer it. Hence it is not wonderful, if to the Roman Pontiff, as the Vicar of Him whose is the earth, and its fulness, the world, and all they who dwell therein, be attributed supreme authority and power, not only the spiritual, but also the unsheathed material,

* "Prima sententia est, summum Pontificem jure divino habere plenissimam potestatem in universum orbem terrarum, tum in rebus ecclesiasticis tum in politicis et civilibus. Ita docent Aug. Triumphus, Alvarus Pelagius, Panormitanus, Hostiensis, Silvester, et alii non pauci."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. i.; De Rom. Pont., lib. v., cap. i., col. 887, B. Colon., 1619.

† "Error est, non credere Pontificem Rom. universalis ecclesiæ Pastorem, Petri successorem, et Christi legitimum Vicarium, supra temporalia et spiritualia universalem non habere primatum; in quem quandoque multi labuntur, dictæ potestatis ignorantia; quæ cum sit infinita, eo quod 'magnus est Dominus, et magna virtus ejus, et magnitudinis ejus non est finis,' omnis creatus intellectus in ejus perscrutatione invenitur deficere."—Aug. Triumph. de Potest. Eccles. in præfat., ad P. Joh. XXII. Fol. Romæ, 1584.

‡ "In Papa esse apicem utriusque potestatis."—"Quum quis per sententiam denunciatur propter apostasiam excommunicatus, ipso facto ejus subditi a dominio et juramento fidelitatis ejus liberati sunt."—Thom. Sum. Theol., pars ii., qu. 12, art. 2. Fol. Venet., 1594.

§ "S. Thomas affirmat summum Pontificem jure divino habere spiritualem et temporalem potestatem, ut supremum totius mundi Regem, adeo ut etiam taleas omnibus Christianis possit imponere, et civitates ac castra destruere pro conservatione Christianitatis."—Thom. Aquin. Opera, tom. xvii.; De Regim. Princip., lib. iii., cap. 10, 19. Venet., 1595.

‖ Barrow's Treatise of the Pope's Supremacy, Works, vol. vii., pp. 5, 6. 8vo. edit. Oxford, 1830.

sword, just cause being assigned for transferring empires, breaking sceptres, and taking away crowns. Which plenitude of power, not only once, but often, the Popes used, whenever it was necessary, by binding, most courageously, the sword on their thigh, as is sufficiently manifest, not only from the most ample testimonies of theologians, the teachers of the right of the Pontiff and of Cæsar, but also of innumerable historians of undoubted credibility, profane as well as sacred, Greek as well as Latin."*

5. The same doctrine is asserted by Baronius, the distinguished annalist, and acknowledged defender of the Church of Rome. He says, that "there can be no doubt but that the civil principality is subject to the sacerdotal."† And again: "God hath made the political government subject to the dominion of the spiritual church."

6. Antoninus, Archbishop of Florence, who is counted a sound Roman Catholic Divine, inculcates, as strongly as Ferraris and the Popes themselves, the sovereign authority of the Bishop of Rome in all matters, both spiritual and temporal. After applying Psalm viii. to the Pope, "Thou hast made him a little lower than the angels," and saying, that "all power in heaven and earth" was given to him, he proceeds: "For the Pope is greater than man, as saith Hostensius, but less than an angel, because he is mortal; but greater in authority and power. For an angel cannot consecrate the body and blood of Christ, nor absolve or bind, the jurisdiction of which exists in a plenary manner in the Pope; nor can an angel ordain, grant indulgences, or any such thing. He is crowned with glory and honour; the glory of commendation, because he is not only called blessed, but most blessed, as saith the canon law. 'Who can doubt that he is holy, whom the summit of such great dignity hath exalted?' He is crowned with the honour of veneration, that the faithful may kiss his feet; for greater honour cannot exist than that mentioned by the Psalmist: 'Adore his footstool.' (Psalm xcix.) 'He is crowned also with the greatness of authority, because he judges all persons, and is judged of none, unless he is found an apostate from the faith.' Hence, also, he is crowned with a triple crown. And is constituted over all the works of his hands, to regulate concerning all inferiors; he opens heaven, sends the guilty to hell, confirms empire, ordains the clerical orders."* The foregoing is only a specimen of what is taught by Antoninus, Archbishop of Florence, who wrote with the approbation of the contemporary and succeeding Popes. Volumes might be filled from his titulus, or tract, on the power of the Pope; but our limits do not allow us to enlarge.

7. Charles Butler, Esq., adduces the following outlines of the doctrines of that class of Divines called transalpine, who dwell in or near Rome, who are distinguished from the cisalpine, who reside on the French side of the Alps. The transalpine are those who are under the immediate direction of the Pope, and compose his court, who are considered sounder in the faith concerning the supremacy than the French, or those who live at a distance from Rome. He says: "Transalpine Divines attributed to the Pope a divine right to the exercise, indirect, at least, of temporal power, for effecting a spiritual good; and, in consequence of it, maintained that the supreme power of every state was so far subject to the Pope, that, when he deemed that the bad conduct of the Sovereign rendered it essential to the good of the Church that he should reign no longer, the Pope was then autho-

* "Papa tantæ est dignitatis et celsitudinis, ut non sit simplex homo, sed quasi Deus, et Vicarius Dei.—Unde Papa adeo summæ et supremæ dignitatis est, ut proprie loquendo non sit in dignitate constitutus, sed potius in ipso culmine dignitatum positus.—Hinc Papa idem est ac 'Pater Patrum.' Et hoc nomine uti potest solus summus Pontifex; quia vere solus ipse dici potest 'Pater Patrum,' cum contineat primatum omnium, omnibusque sit vere major, omniumque maximus.—Papa 'sanctissimus' appellatur; quia talis vere præsumitur.—Papa præ excellentia suæ supremæ dignitatis vocatur 'Episcopus Episcoporum, Ordinarius Ordinariorum, Episcopus universalis ecclesiæ, Episcopus seu Diœcesanus totius orbis.' Item 'divinus Monarcha, ac Imperator supremus, et Rex Regum.' Hinc Papa triplici corona coronatur, tamquam Rex cœli, et terræ, et infernorum.—Immo Romani Pontificis excellentia et potestas nedum est circa cœlestia, terrestria, et infernalia, sed etiam super angelos, quorum ipse major est. Ita, ut si foret possibile, quod angeli errarent in fide, vel contra fidem sentirent, per Papam judicari, et excommunicari possent.—Tantæ enim est dignitatis, et potestatis, ut facit unum et idem tribunal cum Christo. Adeo, ut quidquid facit Papa, ab ore Dei videatur procedere, ut post plurimos Doctores ratiocinatur.—Papa est quasi Deus in terra, unicus Christi fidelium Princeps, Regum omnium Rex maximus, plenitudinem potestatis continens, cui terreni simul ac cœlestis imperii gubernacula ab omnipotenti Deo credita sunt.—Hinc jam communis docet opinio, quod Papa utriusque gladii habeat potestatem, spiritualem scilicet et temporalem, quam jurisdictionem et potestatem Christus ipse commisit Petro et ejus successoribus: 'Tibi dabo claves regni cœlorum,' &c.: (Matt. xvi.:) ubi notant Doctores, quod non dixit 'clavem,' sed 'claves,' per hoc comprehendens temporalem ac spiritualem potestatem. Quæ opinio auctoritate SS. Patrum, juris canonici et civilis dispositione, ac apostolicis constitutionibus latissime confirmatur;—adeo, ut contrarium affirmantes videantur adhærere fere illi opinioni hæreticorum reprobatæ per Bonifacium VIII. in Extravagant., 'Unam Sanctam.'—Unde Principes et Reges infideles possunt per sententiam Papæ privari in certis casibus dominio, quod habent super fideles, ut si terras Christianorum vi occupaverint, vel subditos fideles a fide avertere satagant, et hujusmodi, ut satis aperte demonstrant Card. Bellarm., &c.—Et inde Papa provincias, quæ olim Christianorum erant, ab infidelibus occupatas alicui ex Principibus Christianis emendas concedit. Regem effectum hæreticum posse per Papam amoveri a regno, et ad eum spectare jus eligendi, si ejus filii et propinquiores sint quoque hæretici.—Immo, Papa in casibus, quibus propter hæresim Regis videat periclitari religionem illius regni, fidemque aliorum, nec aliter tanto damno succurri possit, tunc potest non solum a rege regnum, sed etiam ab ejus successoribus in totum auferre, et Principi Christiano, suisque successoribus, si illud debellaverit, concedere.—Unde nil mirum, si Romano Pontifici, tamquam Vicario ejus, cujus est terra, et plenitudo ejus, orbis terrarum, et universi qui habitant in eo, &c., non solum spirituali, sed etiam gladio materiali evaginato, attributa sit, justa suadente causa, plenissima auctoritas, atque potestas transferendi imperia, sceptra frangendi, coronas auferendi. Qua plenitudinis potestate non semel, sed sæpius, Romani Pontifices usi sunt, toties quoties opus fuit, accingendo gladium suum super femur suum potentissime, ut satis superque palam est, atque de hoc amplissimum testimonium faciunt tam theologi, quam juris Pontificii ac Cæsarei professores, atque innumeri inculpatæ fidei historici, tam profani, quam sacri, tam Græci, quam Latini."—Ferraris, Biblioth. Prompt., verb. Papa, art. ii., sect. 1—29. 4to. Francof., 1783.

† "Politicum principatum sacerdotali esse subjectum nulla potest esse dubitatio."—"Sic igitur, etsi non abstulit Christus politicum imperium, ut rem a Deo optime institutam; subjecit tamen illud spiritualis Ecclesiæ dominio"—Baronii Annal. Eccles. 57, sect. 32, 33, tom. i., p. 453, C. Antv., 1612.

* "Est enim Papa, ut ait Hostensius, major homine, sed minor angelo, quia mortalis homo, major tamen auctoritate et potestate. Neque enim angelus potest consecrare corpus et sanguinem Christi, neque absolvere, vel ligare, cujus rei jurisdictio plenarie est in Papa, nec ordinare, vel indulgentias dare, et hujusmodi. Est gloria et honore coronatus; gloria commendationis, quia non solum beatus dicitur, sed et beatissimus. 'Quis eum sanctum dubitet, quem apex tantæ dignitatis attollit?' Dist. 40. Non nos. Honore coronatur venerationis, ut osculentur fideles pedes ejus: major veneratio fieri non potest, 'Adorate scabellum pedum ejus.' (Psalm. xcix.) 'Coronatur et magnitudine auctoritatis, quia cunctos ipse judicaturus, a nemine est judicandus, nisi deprehendatur a fide devius.' Dist. 40. Sic Papa. Unde triplici corona aurea coronatur. Et est constitutus super omnia opera manuum suarum ad disponendum de omnibus inferioribus; ipse aperit cœlum, mittit reos ad infernum, confirmat imperium, ordinat totum clerum."—Anton. Archiepis. Floren., pars ii., tit. xxii., cap. i., sect. 1. Fol. Romæ, 1485.

[This passage has been verified by the Editor from a splendid copy of the works of Antoninus, formerly in the possession of the celebrated Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury. It contains the autograph of that martyr, and is deposited in the British Museum.]

rized, by his divine commission, to deprive him of his sovereignty, and absolve his subjects from their obligation of allegiance; and that even on ordinary occasions he might enforce obedience to his spiritual legislation and jurisdiction by civil penalties.....In spiritual concerns the transalpine opinions ascribe to the Pope a superiority and controlling power over the whole Church, should she chance to oppose his decrees, and consequently over a General Council, her representative; and the same superiority and controlling power, even in the ordinary course of business, over the canons of the universal church. They describe the Pope as the fountain of all ecclesiastical order, jurisdiction, and dignity. They assign to him the power of judging all persons in spiritual concerns; of calling all spiritual causes to his cognizance; of constituting, suspending, and deposing Bishops; of conferring all ecclesiastical dignities and benefices, in or out of his dominions, by paramount authority; of exempting individuals and communities from the jurisdiction of their Prelates; of evoking to himself, or to judges appointed by him, any cause actually pending in an ecclesiastical court; and of receiving immediately appeals from all sentences of ecclesiastical courts, though they be inferior, from which there is a regular appeal to an intermediate superior court. They farther ascribe to the Pope the extraordinary prerogative of personal infallibility, when he undertakes to issue a solemn decision on any point of faith." *

8. The following sentiments are perfectly in keeping with the foregoing, from which they may be consistently deduced. Benedict XIV., in his book on synodical affairs, has the following:—"The Pope is the Head of all heads, and the Prince, Moderator, and Pastor of the whole church of Christ which is under heaven. He is also the Patriarch of the west, the Primate of Italy, the Archbishop and Metropolitan of the Roman province, and Bishop of the city of Rome." †

9. Peter Dens says, "The Roman Pontiff is called by this name, not only because he has the supreme honour and dignity in the Church, but especially, because he hath the supreme and universal authority, power, and jurisdiction over all Bishops and the universal church."‡ Again: "The Pope hath the plenitude of power, so that his power extends itself to all who are in the Church, and to all things which pertain to the government of the Church. Hence it follows that all the faithful, also Bishops and Patriarchs, are bound to obey the Roman Pontiff; he is, moreover, to be obeyed in all those things which concern the Christian religion, as well in faith and morals, in rites, ecclesiastical discipline, &c. The Pope hath also not only a directive, but also a coactive, power over all the faithful." §

10. What Bellarmine lays down as the common opinion of Romanists, will necessarily involve the same amount of power for which the transalpine Divines contend. He says, that "by reason of the spiritual power, the Pope, at least indirectly, hath a certain supreme power in temporal matters." * This "common opinion," as he calls it, does not differ from that expressed by the transalpine Divines, except that the phraseology is more guarded; for the qualifying expressions, "by reason of the spiritual power," and "at least indirectly," are illusive in regard to practice. Every subject can easily be referred to some spiritual account; as the Pope is judge in affairs of this description. How easy is it to infer the supreme spiritual and temporal power of the Pope, from the guarded expressions of Benedict XIV., of Dens, and of Bellarmine; inasmuch as a legitimate inference will lead to the conclusion, that the power allowed by them will necessarily embrace all for which the most bigoted transalpine Divines contend!

["Your claims," observes Dr. Hopkins, in addressing the Roman hierarchy, "on this head consist in the allegation, that our great Redeemer constituted St. Peter the Prince of the Apostles, and gave him a right of government and authority over the rest, which right he bequeathed to his successor, the Bishop or Pope of Rome, who thereby became the Vicar of Christ, and the head of the whole Christian church throughout the world.†

["This position you undertake to establish, first, from St. John xxi., where Christ, as you state in your Douay Catechism, 'gave St. Peter absolute power to feed and govern his whole flock, saying, Feed my lambs, feed my sheep: therefore the rest of the Apostles were his sheep, and he their head or Pastor.'

["Secondly. According to this Catechism, 'out of St. Matthew, when Christ saith, Thou art Peter, and upon this rock will I build my church. Therefore the rest of the Apostles were built on him.'

["Thirdly. 'Because,' as saith the same Catechism, 'since the translation of St. Peter's chair from Antioch to Rome, the particular Roman Church has been head of all the churches, and to her the primacy has been affixed.'

["Hence, in defining the essential parts of the Church, the same Catechism declares, that the Church consists of 'a Pope, or supreme head, Bishops, Pastors, and laity;' and in full consistency with this, we read, in the next page, that 'he who is not in due connexion and subordination to the Pope and General Councils, must needs be dead, and cannot be accounted a member of the Church, since from the Pope and General Councils, under Christ, we have our spiritual life and motion, as Christians.'

["I attach importance to this Catechism, not because of its intrinsic dignity, but because it is the text-book from which, throughout Great Britain and the United States, you instruct your flocks. Beside which, it gives the latest statement of your doctrine, and therefore, it is

* C. Butler, The Book of the Roman Catholic Church, pp. 121, 122. 8vo. London, 1825.

† "Romanus Pontifex est omnium capitum caput, atque universæ, quæ sub cœlo est, Christi ecclesiæ Princeps, Moderator, et Pastor; est etiam Patriarcha occidentis, Primas Italiæ, Archiepiscopus et Metropolitanus Romanæ provinciæ, atque Episcopus urbis Romæ."—Benedict. XIV., De Synodo, lib. ii., cap. i.

‡ "Pontifex Romanus, non tantum quia supremum honorem et dignitatem obtinet in Ecclesia, sed præcipue quia summam et universalem habet auctoritatem, potestatem, et jurisdictionem in omnes Episcopos et universam Ecclesiam."—Dens Theol., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, No. 90, De Summo Pontifice.

§ "Papa in Ecclesia habet plenitudinem potestatis; adeo ut ejus potestas sese extendat ad omnes qui sunt in Ecclesia, et ad omnia quæ ad Ecclesiæ regimen spectant. Hinc sequitur, quod omnes fideles, etiam Episcopi et Patriarchæ, Romano Pontifici obedire teneantur, item quod ei obediendum sit in omnibus quæ religionem Christianam concernunt, ac ideo in fide et moribus, ritibus, ecclesiastica disciplina, &c. Summus Pontifex habet potestatem non solum directivam, sed etiam coactivam, super omnes fideles.'—Idem, No. 94. Quæ et quanta sit summi Pontificis potestas.

* "Tertia sententia media et Catholicorum theologorum communis, Pontificem ut Pontificem non habere directe et immediate ullam temporalem potestatem, sed solum spiritualem, tamen ratione spiritualis habere saltem indirecte potestatem quamdam eamque summam in temporalibus."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. i., De Rom. Pontif., lib. v., cap. i., col. 888, A. Colon., 1619.

["† Thus the Douay Catechism, p. 20, declares, that 'the Church is the congregation of all the faithful under Jesus Christ, their invisible head, and his Vicar upon earth, the Pope.'

to be presumed, the most moderate and least offensive in your own opinion. Let me next proceed, however, to make some stronger extracts from your canon law.

["'The Pope,' says your canon, 'by the Lord's appointment, is the successor of the blessed Apostle Peter, and holds the place of the Redeemer himself upon the earth.' 'The Roman Church, by the appointment of our Lord, is the Mother and Mistress of all the faithful.' 'The Roman Pontiff bears the authority, not of a mere man, but of the true God, upon the earth.' 'The Pope holds the place of God in the earth, that he may confer ecclesiastical benefices without diminution.'*

["'Christ, the King of kings, and Lord of lords, gave to the Roman Pontiff, in the person of Peter, the plenitude of power.'† 'To the holy Roman Church, as to the mother and head, all the greater causes of the Church may recur, and receive their decision according to her sentence; nor ought any thing to be decreed in these without the Roman Pontiff.'‡ 'The greater causes of the Church, especially those which concern the articles of faith, are to be referred to the seat of Peter.' § 'The translation, the deposition, or resignation of a Bishop, is reserved to the Roman Pontiff alone, not so much by any canonical constitution, as by the divine institution.' ‖

["'As the translation, the deposition, and resignation of Bishops, so likewise the confirmation of the elected after the election, is reserved to the Roman Pontiff alone, by reason of the spiritual bond.' ¶ 'Although miracles may have been performed by any one, yet it is not lawful to venerate him as a saint, without the authority of the Roman Church.' 'Whenever there is any question concerning the privileges of the apostolic chair, they are not to be judged by others. The Pope alone knows how to determine doubts concerning the privileges of the chief apostolic seat.'†† 'To make one episcopal seat subject to another, or to place one before another, or to unite two dioceses into one, or divide one into two, are things reserved for the chief Pontiff alone.' ‡‡ 'It was becoming, since the chief Pontiff represents the person of Christ, that as during Christ's earthly ministry the Apostles stood round him, so the assembly of the Cardinals, representing the apostolic college, should stand before the Pope; but the rest of the Bishops, scattered abroad every where, represent the Apostles sent forth to preach the Gospel.'"*]+

III. That a universal and absolute power in things temporal and spiritual has been claimed by several Popes successively for many ages.

This will appear manifest from their solemn declarations, and most notorious practices.

1. As a preliminary remark to what we have to say on this point, we observe, that the early Popes, or, speaking more correctly, the first Bishops of Rome, did not hold these opinions. There were numerous instances in which such excommunication could be practised; but there were none where it actually took place. Why did not Pope Felix, Gelasius, Symmachus, or Hormisdas, excommunicate the Emperor Anastasius for countenancing the oriental Bishops in their opposition to Papal authority? They disagreed with the Emperor, but expressly deny that they excommunicated him. "We," says Pope Symmachus, "did not, O Emperor, excommunicate thee, but Acacius. If thou mingle thyself, thou art not excommunicated by us, but by thyself." ‡ Gelasius saith, "If the Emperor pleaseth to join himself with those condemned, this cannot be imputed to us."§ Baronius mistakes in affirming that Pope Symmachus anathematized Anastasius; a subject which Symmachus plainly denies in the following words:—"Thou sayest, that I excommunicated thee by the joint consent of the senate. This I deny; but I undoubtedly follow what was done with good reason by my predecessors." ‖ The words of Symmachus are corrupted by Baronius and Binius; for instance, ego is put for nego, which is agreeable to what other Popes of the same age have affirmed concerning such matters. We do not read that, in consequence of the rejection of images, Popes excommunicated Emperors. An illustrious Bishop, Otho, of Frisinghen, who flourished in 1184, asserted, concerning the early Bishops of Rome, as follows:—"I read and read again the records of the Roman Kings and Emperors; and I nowhere find that any of them before this was excommunicated or deprived of his kingdom by the Roman Pontiff." ¶

The single passage of Felix III., in the year 483, does not amount in importance to the doctrines taught by Gregory II. and his successors. "It is certain that, in ["* 'Beati Petri Apostoli, disponente Domino, Papa est successor, et ipsius Redemptoris locum in terris tenet.' 'Romana Ecclesia, disponente Domino, cunctorum fidellum Mater est, et Magistra.' 'Romanus Pontifex non puri hominis, sed veri Dei vicem gerit in terris.' 'Papa locum Dei tenet in terris, ut ecclesiastica beneficia sine diminutione conferat.'—Corp. Jur. Can. Joan. Gib., tom. ii., pp. 6, 8, 9.

["† 'Plenitudinem potestatis Christus, Rex regum et Dominus dominantium, Romano Pontifici in persona Petri concessit.'—Idem, ibid., p. 10.

["‡ 'Ad sanctam Romanam Ecclesiam, quasi ad matrem atque apicem, omnes majores Ecclesiæ causæ recurrant, et juxta ejus sententiam terminum sumant; nec extra Romanum quidquam ex his debeat decerni Pontificem.'—Idem, ibid., p. 12.

["§ 'Majores Ecclesiæ causas, præsertim articulos fidei contingentes, ad Petri sedem referendas.'—Idem, ibid.

["‖ 'Translatio, depositio, aut cessio Episcopi, non tam constitutione canonica, quam institutione divina, soli sunt Romano Pontifici reservata.'—Idem, ibid., p. 13.

["¶ 'Sicut Episcoporum translatio, depositio, et cessio, sic et electorum post electionem confirmatio, spiritualis ratione conjugii, soli est Romano Pontifici reservata.'—Idem, ibid.

[" 'Etiamsi per aliquem miracula fierent, non liceret ipsum pro sancto, absque autoritate Ecclesiæ Romanæ, venerari.'—Idem, ibid.

["†† 'Cum super privilegiis sedis apostolicæ causa vertitur, de ipsis per alios non judicatur. Solus Papa cognoscit de dubiis privilegiorum sedis apostolicæ summæ.'—Idem, ibid.

["‡‡ 'Sunt tantum Summo Pontifici reservata: unam episcopalem ecclesiam subjicere alteri, et illam præficere isti, concesso sibi privilegio primatiæ, atque duos episcopatus unire, vel unum dividere.' Idem, ibid.

["* 'Decuit, cum Summus Pontifex Christi repræsentet personam, ut quemadmodum Christo conversanti in terris assistebant Apostoli, ita etiam Cardinalium cœtus, apostolicum collegium repræsentans, coram Papa assisteret; reliqui vero Episcopi, ubique diffusi, Apostolos repræsentant ad prædicandum per orbem missos.'—Idem, ibid., p. 19."]

[† Hopkins on the Church of Rome, &c., pp. 17—20. 8vo. London, 1839.]

‡ "Nos non te excommunicavimus, Imperator, sed Acacium: tu recede ab Acacio, et ab illius excommunicatione recedis. Tu te noli miscere excommunicationi ejus, et non es excommunicatus a nobis. Si te misces, non a nobis, sed a teipso excommunicatus es."—Labb. Conc., tom. iv.; Symmachi Papæ epist. vi., col. 1298, 1299, E, A. Paris, 1671.

§ "Si placet miscere damnatis, nobis non potest imputari."—Concil. Labb., tom. iv.; P. Gelas. I. epist., col. 1168, B. Paris, 1671.

‖ "Dicis quod, mecum conspirante senatu, excommunicaverim te. Ista quidem nego, sed rationabiliter factum a decessoribus meis sine dubio subsequor."—Idem, P. Symmach. I. epist. vi., col. 1298. Paris, 1671.

¶ "Lego et relego Romanorum Regum et Imperatorum gesta, et nusquam invenio quenquam eorum ante hunc a Romano Pontifice excommunicatum, vel regno privatum."—Ottonis Frising. Chron., lib. vi., cap. xxxv., p. 127. Fol. Basil., 1569.

causes relating to God, it is the safest course for you, that, according to his institution, you endeavour to submit the will of the King to the Priests." * While the Emperors retained any considerable authority in Italy, the Popes did not pretend to exercise such supreme power as they afterward assumed. In early times the Bishops of Rome had too much piety to entertain such sentiments.

2. The exercise of the supremacy, in deposing Kings and absolving subjects from their allegiance, was maintained extensively by Gregory II. and his successors.

Gregory II., A. D. 730, excommunicated the Emperor Leo Isaurus, because he was opposed to the worship of images. The Italians were absolved from their oath of allegiance to him. Baronius saith, that "he effectually caused both Romans and Italians to recede from obedience to the Emperor;" and "left to posterity a worthy example, that heretical Princes should not be suffered to reign in the church of Christ, if, being warned, they were found pertinacious in error." † This is the highest source to which this extravagant doctrine can be traced.

3. Hildebrand, or Gregory VII., who was created Pope in 1073, deposed Henry IV., in the year 1075, and repeats the excommunication in 1080. The following is his language:—"For the dignity and defence of God's holy Church, in the name of Almighty God, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, I depose from imperial and royal administration, King Henry, son of Henry, some time Emperor, who too boldly and rashly hath laid hands on thy Church; and I absolve all Christians, subject to the empire, from that oath whereby they were wont to plight their faith unto true Kings; for it is right that he should be deprived of dignity, who endeavours to diminish the majesty of the Church." ‡

"Go, therefore, most holy Princes of the Apostles, and what I have said, by interposing your authority, confirm; that all men may now at length understand, if you can bind and loose in heaven, that you also can upon earth take away and give empires, kingdoms, and whatsoever mortals can have: for if you can judge things belonging to God, what may be considered concerning these inferior and profane things? And if it is your part to judge angels, who govern proud Princes, what becometh it you to do toward their servants? Let Kings now, and all secular Princes, learn by this man's example, what you can do in heaven, and in what esteem you are with God; and let them thenceforth fear to slight the commands of holy Church: but put forth suddenly this judgment, that all men may understand, that not casually, but by your means, this son of iniquity doth fall from his kingdom." *

This Pope was by many supposed to be the inventor of that doctrine, and was, in consequence, called the author of the new schism or heresy, by the Papists of his day. But Gregory disclaims the invention or introduction of it, and professes to have followed the opinion and example of his predecessors.†

4. In 1088, Urban II. inculcated the deposition of Emperors; recommending in his decrees, that "subjects are by no authority constrained to pay the fidelity which they have sworn to a Christian Prince, to one who opposeth God and his saints, and violateth their precepts." ‡

5. Pope Paschal II., A. D. 1099, deprived Henry IV., and excited his enemies to persecute him, informing them, that they could not "offer a more acceptable sacrifice to God, than by impugning him who endeavoured to take the kingdom from God's Church." §

6. Innocent III., A. D. 1212, affirmed, "that the Pontifical authority so much exceeded the royal power, as the sun doth the moon." ‖ He applied to the former the words of the Prophet Jeremiah: "See, I have set thee over the nations and over the kingdoms, to root out, and to pull down, and to destroy, and to throw down," &c. This Pope deposed the Emperor Otho IV. The doctrine of the deposition of Princes, and the absolving of subjects from their allegiance, was maintained by this Pope and the fourth Council of Lateran. They ordained, "that if a temporal Lord, being required and admonished by the Church, should neglect to purge his territory from heretical filth, he should, by the Metropolitan and other comprovincial Bishops, be bound in the bands of excommunication; and if he should neglect to make satisfaction within a year, it should be signified to the Pope, that he might from that time pronounce his subjects absolved from their allegiance to him, and expose the territory to be seized on by Catholics," &c. ¶

7. In the year 1239, Gregory IX. excommunicated the Emperor Frederick II., absolved his subjects from their oaths of allegiance, laid an interdict on all his cities, castles, and villages, excommunicated all who favoured him, or in any way assisted or obeyed him, commanded the German Bishops, upon pain of excommunication, solemnly to publish the Bull, with all the usual ceremonies, as ringing of bells, lighting and extinguishing candles, &c.

* "Certum est, rebus vestris hoc esse salutare, ut, cum de causis Dei agitur, juxta ipsius constitutionem, regiam voluntatem Sacerdotibus Christi studeatis subdere."—Corpus Juris Canonici a Petro Pithœo et Francisco. Fol., tom. i.; P. Felix III., dist. x., cap. iii., p. 8. Paris, 1695.

[† "Sane Gregorius sanctissimus Præsul Romanus (quemadmodum prædixi) Anastasium una cum libellis abjecit, Leonem per Epistolas tamquam inique agentem redarguens, et Romam cum tota Italia ab illius imperio recedere faciens.—Sic dignum posteris idem Gregorius reliquit exemplum, ne in Ecclesia Christi regnare sinerentur hæretici Principes, si sæpe moniti in errore persistere obstinato animo invenirentur."—Baronii Annal. Eccles., A. D. 730, tom. ix., pp. 107, 108, E, D. Antverp., 1601.]

‡ "Hac itaque fiducia fretus, pro dignitate et tutela Ecclesiæ suæ sanctæ, omnipotentis Dei nomine, Patris, Filii, et Spiritus Sancti, Henricum Regem, Henrici quondam Imperatoris filium, qui audacter nimium et temerarie in ecclesiam tuam manus injecit, imperatoria administratione regiaque dejicio; et Christianos omnes imperio subjectos juramento illo absolvo, quo fidem veris regibus præstare consueverunt; dignum enim est, ut is honore careat, qui majestatem Ecclesiæ imminuere causatur."—Plat. in Greg. VII.; Conc. apud Binium, tom. xxvi.; Conc. Roman. III., p. 574. Fol. Paris, 1644. Barrow on the Supremacy, Works, vol. vii., p. 17. 8vo. edit. Oxford, 1830.

* Plat. in Greg. VII.; Concilia apud Binium, tom. xxvi., Conc. Rom. VII., p. 597. Fol. Paris, 1644.

† Corpus Juris Canon., a Petro Pithœo et Francisco. Caus. xv., qu. vi., cap. iv., tom. i. Fol. Paris, 1695.

‡ "Fidelitatem enim quam Christiano Principi jurarunt, Deo ejusque sanctis adversanti, eorumque præcepta calcanti, nulla cohibentur auctoritate persolvere."—Idem, Caus. xv., qu. vi., cap. v.

§ "Nam in hac non tantum parte, sed ubique, cum poteris, Henricum, hereticorum caput, et ejus fautores pro viribus persequaris. Nullum profecto gratius Deo sacrificium offerre poteris, quam si eum impugnes, qui se contra Deum erexit, qui Ecclesiæ regnum auferre conatur."—P. Paschal. II., epist. vii., ad Rob. Fland. Com., Conc. Labb., tom. x., col. 629, E. Paris, 1671.

‖ "Ut quanta est inter solem et lunam, tanta inter Pontifices et Reges differentia cognoscatur."—P. Innocent. III., in Decret. Greg., lib. i., tit. xxxiii., De Majoritate et Obedientia, cap. vi. Fol. Paris, 1512.

¶ "Si vero dominus temporalis requisitus et monitus," &c.—Concil. Lat. IV., can. iii., Conc. Labb., tom. xi., pars i., col. 148, D. Paris, 1671. In Decret. Greg. IX., lib. v., tit. vii., cap. xiii. Fol. Paris, 1512.

 Cherubini Bullarium, tom. i., p. 59. Fol. Romæ, 1617.

8. Innocent IV. held and practised the same doctrine, declaring Frederick II. to be his vassal, and pronouncing, in the General Council of Lyons, sentence of deprivation against him in the following terms:—"We having had before a careful deliberation with our brethren and the holy Council, respecting the foregoing, and many other, his wicked miscarriages, and seeing that we, although unworthy, do hold the place of Jesus Christ on earth, and that it was said unto us in the person of St. Peter the Apostle, 'Whatever thou shalt bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven,' the said Prince (who had rendered himself unworthy of empire and kingdoms, and of all honour and dignity, and who for his iniquities is cast away by God; that he should not reign or command, being bound by his sins and cast away, and deprived by the Lord of all honour and dignity) we do show, denounce, and accordingly, by sentence, deprive; absolving all who are held bound by oath of allegiance from such oath for ever; by apostolic authority firmly prohibiting, that no man henceforth do obey or regard him as Emperor or King; and decreeing, that whoever hereafter yield advice, or aid, or favour, to him, as Emperor or King, shall immediately lie under the ban of excommunication." *

9. Boniface VIII. has a decree in the canon law to this effect: "We declare, say, define, pronounce, it to be necessary to salvation, for every human creature to be subject to the Roman Pontiff." † This subjection, according to him, extends to all affairs. "One sword," saith he, "must be under another, and the temporal authority must be subject to spiritual power; whence, if the earthly power go astray, it must be judged by the spiritual." ‡ This definition is expressly confirmed by one of their General Councils, the Lateran, under Leo X. "We," say the Council, "do renew and approve that holy constitution, with approbation of the present holy Council." § Accordingly Melchior Canus declares: "The Lateran Council did renew and approve the Extravagant of Boniface." ‖ Baronius, referring to it, says, that "all do assent to it, so that none dissenteth who doth not fall from the Church." ¶ Boniface, however, did not invent the doctrine, but borrowed it from the Schoolmen; Aquinas, in his work against the Greeks, attempted to prove, that "it is necessary for salvation to be subject to the Roman Pontiff."

10. Paul III., in 1535 and 1538, excommunicated, cursed, deposed, and damned Henry VIII. of England, and all who adhere to, favour, or obey him; absolved his subjects from all oaths of allegiance; commanded them all, under pain of similar excommunication, not to obey him, or "any Magistrate or officer under him; nor to acknowledge the King, or any of his Judges or officers, as their superiors." The same Bull farther declared Henry, his accomplices, and favourers, with their children and descendants, to be infamous, incapable of being witnesses to wills, or heirs to any; unable to perform any legal act, and that "in any cause of debt, or any others, whether civil or criminal, none should be bound to answer them, and yet they should be compelled to answer every body." Omitting other things in this Bull, he commanded the Ecclesiastics, secular and regular, "to quit the kingdom, and not to return till the persons excommunicated, deprived, cursed, and damned, should be absolved from their censures." * This document was drawn up and ready to be published in 1535, but the execution of it was suspended for three years, and it was published in 1538, the fifth year of this Pontificate.

11. Pius V., in the year 1570, in his Bull against Elizabeth, entitled, "The damnation and excommunication of Elizabeth, Queen of England, and her adherents, with an addition of other punishments," declares: "He that reigneth on high, to whom is given all power in heaven and in earth, committed one holy, catholic, and apostolic Church (out of which there is no salvation) to one alone upon earth, namely, to Peter, the Prince of the Apostles, and to Peter's successor, the Bishop of Rome, to be governed in fulness of power. Him alone he made Prince over all people and all kingdoms, to pluck up, destroy, scatter, consume, plant, and build."—"We do, out of the fulness of our apostolic power, declare the aforesaid Elizabeth, being a heretic and a favourer of heretics, and her adherents in the matters aforesaid, to have incurred the sentence of anathema, and to be cut off from the unity of the body of Christ."—"And, moreover, we do declare her to be deprived of her pretended title to the kingdom aforesaid, and of all dominion, dignity, and privilege whatsoever."—"And also the nobility, subjects, and people of the said kingdom, and all others which have in any sort sworn to her, to be for ever absolved from any such oath, and all manner of duty, dominion, allegiance, and obedience; as we also do, by the authority of these presents, absolve them, and deprive the same Elizabeth of her pretended title to the kingdom and all other things above said. And we do command and interdict all and every the noblemen, subjects, people, and others aforesaid, that they presume not to obey her, or her monitions, mandates, and laws. And those who shall act contrary, we involve in the same sentence of anathema." †

* "Nos itaque super præmissis," &c.—P. Innoc. IV. in Concil. Lug. I., Conc. Labb., tom. xi., pars i., col. 640, C. Paris, 1671.

† "Subesse Romano Pontifici omni humanæ creaturæ declaramus, dicimus, definimus, et pronunciamus omnino esse de necessitate salutis."—Corp. Jur. Can. a Pithœo, tom. ii., Extrav., lib. i., tit. viii., cap. i. Fol. Paris, 1695.

‡ "Oportet gladium esse sub gladio, et temporalem authoritatem spirituali subjici potestati. Ergo, si deviat terrena potestas, judicabitur a potestate spirituali."—Ibid.

§ "Constitutionem ipsam, sacro præsenti Concilio approbante, innovamus et approbamus."—Conc. Labb., tom. xiv., Concil. Later. V., sess. xi. Paris, 1671.

‖ "Quam Extravagantem renovavit et approbavit Concilium Lateranense sub Leone X."—Melch. Cani Loc. Theol., lib. vi., cap. iv., p. 316. 12mo. Colon., 1605.

¶ "Hæc Bonifacius, cui assentiuntur omnes, ut nullus discrepet, nisi qui dissidio ab Ecclesia excidit."—Baron., ann. 1053, sect. xiv., tom. xi. Romæ, 1605.

* "Mandantes, ut ab Henrici Regis, suorumque officialium, Judicum, et Magistratuum quorumcunque obedientia penitus et omnino recedant, nec illos in superiores recognoscant, neque illorum mandatis obtemperent."—"Et nulli ipsis, sed ipsi aliis, super quocunque debito et negotio, tam civili, quam criminali, de jure respondere teneantur."—"Prælatis quoque et cæteris personis Ecclesiasticis mandat sub pœnis in Bulla contentis, quatenus de regno Angliæ discedant, nec revertantur, donec dicti excommunicati, privati, maledicti, et damnati meruerint absolutionis beneficium."—Vide Bullam vii. Pauli III., dat. Romæ, 3 calend. Sept., anno 1535, in Bullario Romano, tom. i., sect. x., xi., xiii., p. 514. Edit. Romæ, 1638. Magn. Bull. Rom., tom. i. Fol. Anno 1535, p. 705. Luxemb., 1727.

See also Burnet's History of the Reformation, vol. i.; Collection of Records, vol. i., book iii., No. ix., p. 211.

† "Regnans in excelsis, cui data est omnis in cœlo et in terra potestas, unam sanctam, catholicam, et apostolicam Ecclesiam (extra quam nulla est salus) uni soli in terris, videlicet, Apostolorum principi Petro, Petrique successori Romano Pontifici, in potestatis plenitudine tradidit gubernandam. Hunc unum super omnes gentes, et omnia regna Principem constituit, qui evellat, destruat, dissipet, disperdat, plantet, et ædificet."—"Qui Nos in hoc supremo justitiæ throno, licet tanto oneri impares, voluit collocare; de apostolicæ

12. Gregory XIII., who succeeded Pius V., renewed and confirmed the Bull for deposing Elizabeth, and absolving her subjects from their allegiance. Sixtus V. confirmed the damnatory sentences of his two predecessors, and also published a crusade against England, giving a plenary indulgence to all who assisted in the war.*

13. In the year 1585, the Bull of Sixtus V. against "the two sons of wrath," Henry, King of Navarre, and the Prince of Condé, declares: "The authority given to St. Peter and his successors, by the immense power of the Eternal King, excels all the powers of earthly Kings and Princes. It passeth uncontrollable sentence upon them all. And if it find any of them resisting God's ordinance, it takes more severe vengeance on them, casting them from their thrones, however powerful they may be, and tumbling them down to the lowest parts of the earth, as the ministers of aspiring Lucifer."—"We deprive them and their posterity for ever of their dominions and kingdoms."—"By the authority of these presents, we do absolve and set free all persons, as well jointly as severally, from any such oath, and from all duty whatsoever in regard of dominion, fealty, and obedience; and do charge and forbid all and every of them, that they do not dare to obey them, or any of their admonitions, laws, and commands." †

IV. Some Romanists ascribe to the Pope very limited powers, especially in temporal or civil affairs.

1. Bishop Milner, in his End of Controversy, says, "It is not, then, the faith of this Church that the Pope has any civil or temporal supremacy, by virtue of which he can depose Princes, or give or take away the property of other persons out of his own domain: for even the incarnate Son of God, from whom he derives the supremacy which he possesses, did not claim, here upon earth, any right of the above-mentioned kind: on the contrary, he positively declared that his kingdom is not of this world. Hence the (Roman) Catholics of both our islands have, without impeachment even from Rome, denied upon oath that the Pope has any civil jurisdiction, power, superiority, or pre-eminence, directly or indirectly, within this realm.* But it is undeniable that different Popes, in former ages, have pronounced sentence of deposition against certain contemporary Princes, and great numbers of theologians have held (though not as a matter of faith) that they had a right to do so." †

2. Bishop Hay observes, that "the Pope is the supreme head and Pastor of the Church under Christ, the spiritual Father and Teacher of all Christians, with full power to feed and govern the whole flock; therefore he is the supreme Judge and Lawgiver in all things relating to religion, whether as to faith, manners, or discipline. And all the members of the Church are obliged to pay the greatest respect, veneration, and obedience to his decrees and orders in all things belonging to religion." ‡ This declaration gives a guarded view of the supremacy; yet it virtually contains all the elements of the spiritual and temporal authority of the Pontiff.

3. From the "Declaration of the Catholic Bishops, the Vicars Apostolic, and their coadjutors in Great Britain," we give the following on allegiance to the King and obedience to the Pope:—"They acknowledge in the Sovereign, and in the constituted Government of these realms, a supreme civil and temporal authority, which is entirely distinct from, and totally independent of, the spiritual and ecclesiastical authority of the Pope and of the Catholic Church. They declare that neither the Pope nor any other Prelate or ecclesiastical person of the Roman Catholic Church has, in virtue of his spiritual or ecclesiastical character, any right, directly or indirectly, to any civil or temporal jurisdiction, power, superiority, pre-eminence, or authority within this realm; nor has any right to interfere, directly or indirectly, in the civil government of the United Kingdom, or any part thereof; nor to oppose in any manner the performance of the civil duties which are due to His Majesty, his heirs and successors, from all or any of His Majesty's subjects; nor to enforce the performance of any spiritual or ecclesiastical duty, by any civil or temporal means. They hold themselves bound in conscience to obey the civil Government of this realm, in all things of a temporal and civil nature, notwithstanding any dispensation or order to the contrary had or to be had from the Pope, or any authority of the Church of Rome.

"Hence we declare, that by rendering obedience in spiritual matters to the Pope, Catholics do not withhold any portion of their allegiance to their King, and that their allegiance is entire and undivided; the civil power of the State and the spiritual authority of the Catholic Church being absolutely distinct, and being never intended, by their divine Author, to interfere or clash with each other." §

4. Charles Butler, Esq., says, "The cisalpine Divines affirmed, that the Pope had no right either to interfere in temporal concerns, or to enforce obedience to his spiritual legislation or jurisdiction by temporal power; and, consequently, had no right to deprive a Sovereign of his sovereignty, to absolve his subjects from their allegiance, or to enforce his spiritual authority over either by civil penalties." ‖

potestatis plenitudine declaramus prædictam Elizabeth hæreticam, hæreticorumque fautricem, eique adhærentes in prædictis, anathematis sententiam incurrisse, esseque a Christi corporis unitate præcisos."—"Quinetiam ipsam prætenso regni prædicti jure, necnon omni et quocunque dominio, dignitate, privilegioque privatam."—"Et etiam proceres, subditos, et populos dicti regni, ac cæteros omnes qui illi quomodocumque juraverint, a juramento hujusmodi, ac omni prorsus dominii, fidelitatis, et obsequii debito, perpetuo absolutos, prout nos illos præsentium auctoritate absolvimus; et privamus eamdem Elizabeth prætenso jure regni, aliisque omnibus supradictis. Præcipimusque et interdicimus universis et singulis proceribus, subditis, populis, et aliis prædictis, ne illi ejusve monitis, mandatis, et legibus audeant obedire. Qui secus egerint, eos simili anathematis sententia innodamus."—P. Pius V. in Bull. contra R. Eliz., sect. iii.—v., Magn. Bullar. Rom. tom. ii., pp. 324, 325. Luxemb., 1727.

[* Some Animadversions and Observations upon the impious Damnation and Excommunication of Queen Elizabeth, by Pius V., A. D. 1570, p. 14. By Thomas Barlow, Bishop of Lincoln. 4to.]

† "Ab immensa æterni Regis potentia B. Petro ejusque successoribus tradita auctoritas omnes terrenorum Regum et Principum supereminet potestates. Inconcussa profert in omnes judicia. Et si quos ordinationi Dei resistentes invenit, severiore has vindicta ulciscitur, et quamvis potentiores, de solio dejiciens, veluti superbientis Luciferi ministros, ad infima terræ deturbatos prosternit."—"Dominiis, regnis, &c., nos illos illorumque posteros privamus in perpetuum."—"A juramento hujusmodi, ac omni prorsus dominii, fidelitatis, et obsequii debito, illos omnes tam universe quam singulatim auctoritate præsentium absolvimus et liberamus; præcipimusque et interdicimus eis universis et singulis, ne illis eorumque monitis, legibus, et mandatis audeant obedire."—Bulla Sixti V. contra Henr. Navarr., &c.

* 31 Geo. III., cap. 32.

[† End of Controversy, Letter xlvi., pp. 397, 398. Eighth edit. 12mo. London.]

‡ Sincere Christian Instructed, vol. i., p. 183. 12mo. Dublin, 1822.

[§ Declaration of the (Roman) Catholic Bishops, &c., p. 14. Forming No. I. of a series of Tracts, published under the Superintendence of the (Roman) Catholic Institute of Great Britain. 8vo. London.]

‖ Book of the Roman Catholic Church, pp. 121, 122. 8vo. edit. London, 1825.

5. The following are the opinions of the Universities of the Sorbonne, of Louvain, Douay, Alcala, and Salamanca, on the temporal power of the Pope, which were furnished to the English Roman Catholics at their request:—

"(1.) That the Pope or Cardinals, or any body of men, or any individual of the Church of Rome, has not nor have any civil authority, power, jurisdiction, or pre-eminence whatsoever within the realm of England.

"(2.) That the Pope or Cardinals, or any body of men, or any individual of the Church of Rome, cannot absolve or dispense with His Majesty's subjects from their oath of allegiance, upon any pretext whatever.

"(3.) That there is no principle in the tenets of the Catholic faith by which Catholics are justified in not keeping faith with heretics, or other persons differing from them in religious opinions, in any transactions, either of a public or private nature."*

It is gratifying to find such liberal and Christian sentiments expressed and avowed: nevertheless, they are at variance with the standard doctrines of the Church of Rome, as defined by her highest ecclesiastical authority; and they have not received the sanction of the supreme power, nor have the opposing doctrines been disavowed. They are only the sentiments of modern Roman Catholics, adapted for circulation in a Protestant country; and are so modified as to leave out of sight the most forbidding parts of the supremacy, yet are so expressed as to retain its fundamental principles, which may be asserted at a future time, when circumstances may render it necessary or safe.

V. The doctrine of the supreme and universal power of the Pope in all affairs, and over all persons, may reasonably be supposed to be the sentiment of all Pontiffs, from the time of Gregory II., in 730, or at any rate from Gregory VII., in 1080, to the present day.

1. No Popes openly disclaim, condemn, or refute the doctrine. If it be false, it is a great error, and of dangerous consequence. It involves arrogance and impiety, and produces much wrong and mischief. If any Pope believe it to be false, he ought publicly to oppose it, lest his connivance and the authority of his predecessors should lead others into error. But all, since the time specified, have either openly declared in favour of it, or have tacitly consented to it. Therefore the doctrine may safely be charged upon all.

2. Every Pontiff disapproving of such a tenet, was bound to renounce communion with those who held it, or at least to check and discountenance the error. On the contrary, they have suffered it to be maintained in their presence; they have patronized those who upheld it; and have frowned on such as have shown opposition to it.

3. The chief authors and most zealous defenders of this doctrine, whether among Popes, Synods, Doctors, Bishops, &c., have retained great authority and influence in the Church.

4. The decrees containing it stand in the canon law, and in the decretals, without any mark of disapprobation; which is a sufficient indication of their adherence to this dogma.

5. The general style of Papal edicts or Bulls declares their sense, which is binding on all without exception. They imperatively say, "Let no man presume to infringe on this our will and command."

6. Popes of every disposition and genius have been ready to practise according to these principles when occasion permitted; interdicting Princes, absolving subjects from their allegiance, raising or encouraging insurrections; all which show that the See of Rome is thoroughly imbued with the absurd and unscriptural notion.

7. The head of the Popish hierarchy obliges all Bishops solemnly to avow this doctrine, and to practise it accordingly. In the oath which is prescribed to Bishops, they are required to avow, that "they will observe the apostolic commands with all their power, and cause them to be observed by others; that they will aid and defend the Roman Papacy and the royalties of St. Peter against every man; that they will to their utmost persecute and oppose heretics, schismatics, and rebels to the Pope or his successors," without any exceptions, together with other points, all of which refer to the acknowledgment of and abetting the Pope's tyrannical and unscriptural claims.

8. It is the offspring of the doctrine of the supremacy. This challenges for the Pope the exercise of the fulness of authority, and the delegation of power from above, corresponding with that possessed by Christ, to whom was committed all power in heaven and earth. Hence a favourite text often quoted by the Popes and their defenders, and applied to the former for the purpose of maintaining their prerogative to erect and overturn kingdoms, is the following:—"See, I have this day set thee over the nations and over the kingdoms, to root out, and to pull down, and to destroy, and to throw down, to build, and to plant." (Jer. i. 10.)

VI. All Romanists, in consistency with their principles, are obliged to hold this opinion concerning the universal power of the Pontiff.

1. The most celebrated Councils, which Papists hold to be universal, and which the Council of Trent alleges as such, as that of Lateran IV. under Innocent III., that of Lyons under Innocent IV., and that of Lateran V. under Leo X., have asserted this doctrine of universal supremacy.

2. The Pontiffs, the perpetual judges of controversy, have expressly, and ex cathedra, declared and defined it, all of whom for ages have consented to and have countenanced it, without signifying any dissent or dislike. For if on any point they may deserve credence, it is on this, which concerns the nature and emoluments of their office. How, we ask, can a Pope be admitted an authorized judge of controversies, or master of Christian doctrine, if he have erred so egregiously, in seducing the Christian world?

3. The principal controvertists of the Papacy have asserted and defined this doctrine. They have done so for a long period, with somewhat of general concurrence and approbation, that it might be said it was confirmed by tradition or prescription. Why, then, should it not be admitted as a doctrine of the holy Roman Catholic Church, the mother and mistress of all churches? How can they who disavow this doctrine be true sons of this mother, or diligent scholars in her school?

4. As Papists assert that their doctrine is unchangeable, how can they have the boldness to contradict the General Councils, Popes, and Divines, who have maintained the universal power of the Pope? How can Mr. Charles Butler declare, "The Roman Catholics believe the doctrines of their Church to be unchangeable, and that it is a tenet of their creed, that what their faith ever has been, such it was from the beginning, such it now is, and such it ever will be?"*

* Book of the Roman Catholic Church, pp. 343, 344. A translation of the answers, in full, from the above-named Universities, and also from that of Valladolid, may be seen in Butler's Historical Memoirs of the English, Irish, and Scottish Catholics, vol. i. Appendix, Note II. Third edit. London, 1822.

If the Church of Rome do not now claim the right of deposing Princes, and absolving subjects from allegiance to them, how could Pope Gregory XVI., in the year 1832, in his Encyclical Letter, declare: "Ever bearing in mind, that 'the universal Church suffers from every novelty,' as well as the admonition of Pope St. Agatho, that 'from what has been regularly defined, nothing can be taken away, no innovation introduced there, no addition made; but that it must be preserved untouched as to words and meaning:' it is no less absurd than injurious to her, that any thing by way of restoration or regeneration should be forced upon her as necessary for her soundness or increase, as if she could be thought obnoxious to decay, or to obscurities, or any other such inconvenience."+

If, then, the Church of Rome have taught by her most accredited authorities the dogma in question, and if it be equally true that her doctrines are immutable, then is the inference plain, that the objectionable principle is retained, although, for prudential reasons, or want of power, she dares not practise it.

Besides, if such preposterous notions are held, a further and legitimate inference is adduced, that the Roman Pontiffs and all their adherents are teachers and abettors of the most gross violations of divine command, and of enormous sin; such as usurpation, tyranny, imposture, perjury, rebellion, murder, rapine, and innumerable others. For if he who would teach that adultery, incest, simony, theft, murder, or similar crimes, were lawful, would be a heretic,—how much more would he be esteemed such, who recommends perjury, rebellion, regicide, as imperative duties!

5. Those who have presumed to deny the supreme power of the Pope over all persons and in all things, have been stigmatized as heretics by the true sons of Rome. Baronius, their great historian, and Bellarmine, their acknowledged defender and controvertist, have, without hesitation, termed those heretics who refuse to maintain such authority as the prerogative of the Pontiff. The French, in former times, were considered unsound members of the Papal communion, because they contended against the exercise of such power in political matters, and even in many Church affairs; and though modern Romanists, when interrogated, may denounce the civil or temporal power which is claimed by the Pope, nevertheless, they hold in high esteem those who have maintained it, and this assumed authority the Court of Rome has never renounced. Consequently, to deny it in the estimation of a Papist would be heretical.

Since the Hildebrandine age, there have been in every nation, Italy not excepted, historians, Divines, and Lawyers, who, in elaborate treatises, have maintained the civil sovereignty in opposition to the pontifical. This description of heretics has increased so much of late, that the doctrine of Hildebrand is generally exploded. Such heresies may be tolerated, but not approved; and this shows, that Romanists, as well as others, are liable to change their sentiments, when time and circumstances favour such a movement.

VII. There is great diversity of opinion among Roman Catholics concerning the supreme power of the Pope.

It has been observed, that the exercise of this power over all persons and things, has been strongly maintained by the Pontiffs and their leading Divines. It may, therefore, be proper to state even more particularly the various notions which exist among those who have rejected such temporal authority.

1. The sentiments of the Gallic Church on this topic deserve special attention. The Faculty of Divinity at Paris, in their declaration in 1631, maintain, that the Pope has no power over the temporalities of the King, and cannot depose Bishops against the rules of the canons; that he is not above a General Council; and that he is not infallible, unless he have the concurrent consent of the whole Church.*

The power of the Pope in spiritual matters, as held by the cisalpine or French Divines, is stated by Mr. Butler as follows:—"The Cisalpines affirm, that in spirituals the Pope is subject in doctrine and discipline to the Church, and to a General Council representing her; that he is subject to the canons of the Church, and cannot, except in an extreme case, dispense with them; that even in such a case his dispensation is subject to the judgment of the Church; that the Bishops derive their jurisdiction from God himself immediately, and not derivatively through the Pope; that he has no right to confer bishoprics, or other spiritual benefices of any kind, the patronage of which, by common right, prescription, concordat, or any other general rule of the Church, is vested in another. They admit that an appeal lies to the Pope from the sentence of the Metropolitan; but assert, that no appeal lies to the Pope, and that he can evoke no cause to himself, during the intermediate process. They affirm, that a General Council may, without, and even against, the Pope's consent, reform the Church. They deny his personal infallibility, and hold that he may be deposed by the Church or a General Council, for heresy or schism; and they admit, that, in an extreme case, where there is a great division of opinion, an appeal lies from the Pope to a future General Council."+

2. We give an account of the more prominent sentiments of the Romanist Divines who have rejected not only the temporal, but also certain portions of the spiritual, power of the Pontiff: they are divided on the subject of his authority in spiritual affairs, as well as on those which are temporal.

(1.) The extent of the spiritual power of the Pope is a topic of dispute. For though the Pontiffs claim an absolute supremacy over the Church, and a number of Divines have favoured their pretensions; though, according to their principles, (if they chance to have any that are clear and fixed on such a point,) this seems to be the doctrine of the Papacy; yet there is among them a party which does not allow him such supremacy, but lays numerous and great restraints upon him. As the other party

[* Book of the Roman Catholic Church, p. 9.]

† "Illud assidue revolventes animo, 'universalem Ecclesiam quacumque novitate pulsari,' atque ex S. Agathonis Pontificis monitu, 'nihil de iis, quæ sunt regulariter definita, minui debere, nihil mutari, nihil adjici, sed ea et verbis et sensibus illibata esse custodienda.' Absurdum plane est, ac maxime in eam injuriosum, restaurationem quamdam obtrudi, quasi necessariam, ut ejus incolumitati et incremento consulatur, perinde ac si censeri ipsa possit vel defectui, vel obscurationi, vel aliis hujuscemodi incommodis obnoxia."—P. Greg. XVI., Epistola Encyclica, ad omnes Patriarchas, Primates, Archiepiscopos, et Episcopos, anno 1832.

A translation of this Bull appeared in the Laity's Directory for 1833, whence it was transcribed into the London Protestant, vol. iii., p. 66. The original may be seen in Affaires de Rome, par M. F. De la Mennais, Bruxelles, 1837, p. 6, des Pièces Justificatives.

* Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., cent. xvii., p. 149. Fol. Oxford, 1725.

† Book of the Roman Catholic Church, pp. 123, 124.

charges this with heresy, this also returns the compliment.

(2.) Some affirm, that the Pope, in doctrine and discipline, is subject to the Church, or to a General Synod representing it. The sixth declaration of the French Church, expressed in 1631, by their Faculty of Divinity, is, "that it is not the doctrine of the Faculty that the Pope is above a General Council." But Bellarmine, a faithful son of the Pope and the Church, says: "The Pope is simply and absolutely above the universal Church: this proposition is almost an article of faith." Cardinal Lorraine, on the contrary, affirms: "I cannot deny but that I am a Frenchman, and bred up in the Church of Paris, which teaches, that the Roman Pontiff is subject to a Council, and those who teach the contrary are there branded as heretics."* In reference to the sentiments of Bellarmine, the Popes, and the Court of Rome, the French Church, in the year 1631, as a confirmation of the "Six Propositions," held the following language:—"Nobody is ignorant of the efforts and artifices practised by the partisans of the Court of Rome above thirty years to advance the power of the Pope, by fictitious prerogatives, and to introduce into these parts of the world the new opinions of the Ultra-Montanes. The Six Propositions contain not only the condemnation of every thing that could establish any superiority of the Pope in temporals, but also whatever could be brought to support the chimera of infallibility, and also of an imaginary dependence of a Council upon the Pope; it being certain that if the Faculty does not believe that the Pope is infallible, it must, by a necessary consequence, believe that he may fall, or be seduced into error, and corrected by a superior power, which can be no other than that of a Council and the universal Church."†

(3.) Some believe that the Popes, unassisted by a Council, may teach heresy; and consequently Christians are not, at all times, bound to believe their doctrines or observe their injunctions. Bellarmine says, "This opinion closely borders on heresy."

(4.) Others, that the Pope himself is subject to the canons, as well as the Bishops, being bound to obey the constitutions of the hierarchy. This is taught by the fourth declaration of the Gallic Church; which implies, that the Pope is not to infringe, overrule, or dispense with the canons; and if he attempt to do so, he is neither to be believed nor obeyed.

(5.) Some maintain that the Pope cannot subvert or violate the liberty and rights of particular communities, to which they are entitled by the ancient canons of the universal Church.

(6.) Others ascribe to General Councils the power of reforming the Church, with or without the consent of the Pontiff.

(7.) Many believe that he is merely President of the Church, and therefore has but a limited and subordinate power.

(8.) Consequently some believe that the supreme Pontiff, either for heresy or misconduct, may be called to an account, judged, corrected, or deposed by an Œcumenical Synod.

Sentiments, such as the foregoing, have prevailed throughout a great part of the Roman communion, and were maintained by most Divines in the French Church; they are the common opinion in most places where there is liberty of judgment, and where the Inquisition is not established. They have even obtained so far as to be defined by General Councils for Catholic truths. In the first Synod of Pisa, in 1409, it was declared, "that Councils may reform the Church sufficiently, both in head and members."* Accordingly the Council sat in judgment upon two Popes, Gregory XII. and Benedict XIII., who were contending for the Papacy, deposed them both, and elected Alexander V.

The Council of Constance declared, that "the Synod lawfully assembled in the Holy Ghost, making a General Council representing the Catholic Church militant, had power immediately from Christ; to which every one, of whatever state or dignity he be, although Papal, is bound to obey in those things which belong to faith, and the extirpation of (the said) schism, and the general reformation of the church of God in head and members."† The Council put their doctrine into practice, deposing, on account of heresy, misdemeanour, contumacy, &c., three Popes, and elected another, who afterward was accounted a true Pope, and confirmed the acts of the Council. Of him the Synod says: "Our most holy Lord the Pope said, in answer to the foregoing, that he would maintain and inviolably observe all and every of those things that were decided by the Council in matters of faith."‡

The Council of Basil expressed itself in favour of the same sentiments: "That Councils are superior to Popes is a truth of Catholic faith, which whoever doth pertinaciously deny, is to be accounted a heretic."§ Again: "Nor did any wise man ever doubt the Pope to be subject to the judgment of General Councils in things concerning faith."‖ And that, "by virtue of such doctrine, and also by its irresistible authority,"¶ the Council pronounced Eugenius to be criminal, heretical, and contumacious.

These assemblies, although reprobated by Popes and counter-Synods, are by many Roman Catholic Divines retained in great veneration; and their doctrine was so current in France among the Doctors of the Sorbonne, that to hold the contrary, according to the Cardinal

* "Ego vero negare non possum quin Gallus sim, et Parisiensis Ecclesiæ alumnus, in qua Romanum Pontificem subesse Concilio tenetur, et qui docent ibi contrarium, ii tanquam hæretici notantur."—Card. Loth. apud Laun., ep. i., 1 (as quoted by Dr. Barrow).

† Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., cent. xvii., book iii., chap. ix., p. 150. Fol. Oxford, 1725.

[* "Et quod non pateretur aut permitteret Concilium dissolvi, donec de Concilio esset facta bona reformatio Ecclesiæ, tam in capite, quam in membris."—Conc. Labb., tom. xi., pars ii., Conc. Pisan., sess. xvi., col. 2128, C. Paris, 1671.

["Præsens Concilium continuabit, nec dissolvet, nec dissolvi permittet, quantum in eo erit, usque quo per consilium ejusdem Concilii sit facta debita, rationabilis, et sufficiens reformatio universalis Ecclesiæ et status ejus, tam in capite, quam in membris."—Idem, sess. xvii., D.]

[† "Et primo, quod ipsa Synodus in Spiritu sancto congregata legitime, Generale Concilium faciens, Ecclesiam Catholicam militantem representans, potestatem a Christo immediate habet, cui quilibet cujuscumque status vel dignitatis, etiam si Papalis existat, obedire tenetur in his quæ pertinent ad fidem et extirpationem dicti schismatis, et reformationem generalem Ecclesiæ Dei in capite et in membris."—Conc. Labb., tom. xii.; Conc. Constant., sess. iv., col. 19, B. Vide etiam sess. v., col. 22, C. Paris, 1671.]

‡ "Sanctissimus dominus noster Papa dixit, respondendo ad prædicta, quod omnia et singula determinata, conclusa, et decreta in materiis fidei per presens Concilium conciliariter, tenere et inviolabiliter observare volebat."—Idem, sess. xlv., col. 258, D.

§ "Veritas de potestate Concilii supra Papam, est veritas fidei Catholicæ, cui pertinaciter repugnans est censendus hæreticus."—Conc. Labb., tom. xii., Concil. Basil., sess. xxxiii., col. 619, B. Paris, 1671.

‖ "Nec unquam aliquis peritorum dubitavit, summum Pontificem in his quæ fidem concernunt judicio eorundem Generalium Synodorum esse subjectum."—Idem, sess. xlv., col. 657, B.

¶ "Vigore cujus, ac ineffabili et inexpugnabili authoritate."—Idem, sess. xxxviii., col. 629.

of Lorraine, was accounted heretical. The declaration which the Faculty of Divinity in Paris, made to the King on the 3d of May, 1663, shows the sentiments of the Gallic Church at the period when they were delivered. This declaration embraces the six following propositions :—

"(1.) That it is not the doctrine of the Faculty that the Pope has any authority over the temporalities of the King; but, on the contrary, she has always resisted even those who would only ascribe an indirect power to him. (2.) That it is the doctrine of the Faculty that the King doth not acknowledge, and hath no other superior in temporals than God alone; and that this is her ancient doctrine, from which she will never depart. (3.) That it is the doctrine of the same Faculty, that his subjects owe the most Christian King such fidelity and obedience, that they cannot, upon any pretence whatsoever, be dispensed with from paying them to him. (4.) That the same Faculty does not approve, and that it has never approved, any propositions contrary to the authority of the King, or the true liberties of the Gallican Church, or the canons received in the kingdom; for example, that the Pope may depose Bishops against the rules of the said canons. (5.) That it is not the doctrine of the Faculty that the Pope is above a General Council. (6.) That it is not the doctrine or opinion of the Faculty, that the Pope is infallible, when he has not the concurrent consent of the Church." *

3. The Roman Pontiffs have changed the nature of their pretensions and claims again and again, and have varied their opinions, in order to suit the circumstances of the times, their own designs and interests.

In days of external prosperity, and when the experiment could be safely made, Popes assumed much to themselves; but when they stood in dread of contradiction or powerful opposition, their tone was lowered, and the boldest spoke with submission and moderation. We allude to Leo I., who, after the second Ephesine Council, when opposed by Theodosius II., became suppliant to the Emperor; but after the Synod of Chalcedon, when the Emperor and most of the Bishops became favourable to him, his language and conduct were changed; to Gregory VII., who treated with such insolent arrogance the Emperor Henry, but was calm and submissive toward William the Conqueror, King of England, who was beyond his reach, and of a spirit as high as the Pontiff himself. Popes of arrogant temper, and presumptuous bearing, such as Leo I., Nicholas I., Gregory II., Gregory VII., Innocent III., Boniface VIII., Julius II., Paul IV., Sixtus V., Paul V., with others also, as they attempted to screw Papal authority to the highest point, spoke in commendation of the Roman See in the strongest terms. A few who were of a more meek and tranquil disposition, as Julius I., Anastasius II., Gregory I., Leo II., Adrian VI., &c., were content to allow things to remain as they found them.

The pretensions of Popes varied according to different periods of time. In the first ages, when the Emperors were Pagans, their claims were suited to their condition. The division of the empire, the Sardican canons, the fall of the western empire, the usurpation of Phocas, the spurious decretals, and the untameable spirit of Gregory VI., presented favourable opportunities of extending the power of the Roman See.

4. [We cannot be surprised that the doctrines of the Papacy are so varied and uncertain, when we take into consideration the vague and antiscriptural principles on which they have been founded, together with the numerous and opposing interests of those individuals who have been implicated in their formation. It is not difficult to account for the dissensions which have so often agitated the Popedom, when their schools, Divines, and Synods, both General and Provincial, have contested with each other almost every disputable point within the range of theology or the canon law.]

Opposing influences have not allowed topics to be decided, nor indeed freely discussed. The Pope will not allow the subject of his prerogatives to be disputed, according to that maxim of Innocent III.: "When there is a question concerning the privileges of the Apostolical See, we are unwilling that others should judge about them." * Hence His Holiness peremptorily commanded his Legates at Trent in no case to allow any dispute concerning his authority; while, on the other hand, the French would not permit the supremacy of their King in temporals to be contested. The following is the language of the Gallic Church in 1663, in defence of the above Six Propositions :—"That all persons shall be prohibited to maintain and dispute, to read and teach, directly or indirectly, in the public schools or elsewhere, any propositions contrary to the ancient doctrine of the Church, the canons of General Councils, the liberties of the Gallican Church, and the ancient decrees of the Faculty of Divinity, under pain of exemplary punishment." †

5. On account of the variety of opinion concerning the nature and extent of the power of the Pope, there is difficulty, not only in stating the question, but in ascertaining at what point to commence the discussion. His pretensions to the temporal sword are so palpably vain, many Romanists rejecting, and others confuting, them, we shall dismiss that subject in the general discussion, and confine our remarks to the spiritual power which he claims. This is no less groundless and injurious than the other. We shall therefore attempt to show, that the spiritual power claimed by the Pope is not of divine institution, or of immutable right.

VIII. The subject discussed will be that in which the most cordial partisans of the Romish Church are agreed.

1. The doctrine contested is that which is taught in their Creeds and Catechisms; which their ecclesiastical bodies, as General Councils, have authoritatively defined; which their Popes have published as a standing law or rule of jurisdiction; which their subordinate Synods or Councils have received; which the general tenor of their discipline and practice holds forth for general observance; which their principal theological schools embrace, applaud, and teach; which their chief theologians maintain; which their Clergy, by solemn professions and engagements, are bound to recognise, retain, and inculcate; which all the true followers of Rome profess; and which no man can disclaim without being a heretic, or an enemy to the Apostolic See. Such is the doctrine, and the only one, on the supremacy, which we ascribe to the Church of Rome, and systematically oppose.

2. The views of the Papacy are defined by the Council of Florence and Eugenius IV. to be as follows :—"The apostolical chair and the Roman Pontiff hold a primacy over the whole world; and that the Roman Pontiff is the successor of St. Peter, the Prince of the Apostles, the true Vicar of Christ, and the head of the Church; and that he is the Father and Teacher of all Christians; and to him in Peter full power is committed, by our Lord Jesus Christ, to feed, direct, and govern the universal church, according as it is contained in the acts of General Councils and in the holy canons."* Charles Butler, Esq., speaking on the decree of this Council, says: "This is the doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church on the authority of the Pope, and beyond it no Roman Catholic is required to believe." † Benedict XIV., in his Bull dated 1742, recites this, and ranks it among his articles of Catholic faith.‡ The Lateran Council, with Leo X., asserts, that "Christ, before his departure, did, in solidity of the rock, institute Peter and his successors Vicars, whom it is so necessary to obey, that whosoever does not obey must die the death."§ The Council of Trent, also, without hesitation, affirms, that the supreme power in the Church was delivered to the Popes.‖

[* Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., cent. xvii., book iii., chap. ix., pp. 149, 150. Fol. Oxford, 1725.]

* "Cum super privilegiis sedis apostolicæ causa vertatur, nolumus de ipsis per alios judicari."—Corpus Juris Canonici, a Petro Pithœo et Francisco, tom. ii., Greg. Decret., lib. ii., tit. i., cap. xii., p. 72. Fol. Paris, 1695.

† Du Pin's Eccles. Hist., cent. xvii., book iii., chap. ix., p. 151. Fol. Oxford, 1725.

3. How far the Papal authority, as interpreted by the Pope, and according to the spirit of the Church, extends, is more explicitly defined in the oath which Bishops at their consecration, and Metropolitans at their installation, are required to take. This oath has already been given, and needs not now be quoted, as the reader may refer to it as it is contained in the introductory chapter of this work.

4. All beneficed Clergymen avow this supremacy, when they take the oath prescribed to them by Papal appointment. This is designed in the profession ordained by Pius IV., where every Priest is enjoined to say, "I do promise and swear true obedience to the Roman Pontiff, the successor of St. Peter, and the Vicar of Jesus Christ," which was drawn up in accordance with the authority of the Council of Trent, that all such persons "should vow and swear to abide in submission to the Roman Church." ¶

IX. The absolute power of the Pope in spiritual affairs forms the true doctrine of the Church of Rome.

1. The opinions of those semi-Papists who entertain views opposed to the possession and exercise of absolute power will be considered but incidentally. We shall acknowledge and confirm whatever truth they may hold, while we confute the errors which they may have embraced. Our arguments will be principally levelled against such pretensions of the Pope as his firm adherents and the laws and constitution of the Church of Rome ascribe to him.

2. To the Pontiff, as sovereign Monarch of the universal Church, appertain regalia Petri, "royalties of Peter," or "royal prerogatives," as they are called in the Episcopal oath; such as the following:—to be superior to the whole Church, and to its representative, a General Council; to call General Councils at his pleasure, all Bishops being obliged to attend his summons; to preside in General Synods, so as to propose matter for discussion; to promote, obstruct, or overrule the debates; to confirm or invalidate their decisions; to define points of doctrine; to decide controversies authoritatively, so that none may contest or dissent from his judgment; to enact, establish, abrogate, suspend, or dispense with ecclesiastical laws and canons; to relax or do away with ecclesiastical censures, by indulgences, pardons, &c.; to dispense with the obligations of promises, vows, oaths, legal obligations, &c.; to be the fountain of all pastoral jurisdiction and dignity; to constitute, confirm, judge, censure, suspend, depose, remove, restore, and reconcile Bishops; to exempt Colleges and monasteries from the jurisdiction of their Bishops and ordinary Superiors; to judge all persons in spiritual causes, by calling them to his presence, delegating judges, and reserving to himself a final and irrevocable judgment; to receive appeals from all ecclesiastical judicatories, and reverse or confirm their sentences; to be accountable to no one for his acts; to erect, transfer, and abolish episcopal sees; to exact oaths of obedience from the Clergy; to found religious orders; to summon and commission soldiers by crusade to fight against infidels or persecute heretics. That the Pope has claimed and exercised such prerogatives, is manifest from experience, and declared in the canon law.

3. Whosoever challenges these powers should be able to make out a clear commission: "No man taketh this honour unto himself, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron." (Heb. v. 4.) Such prerogatives cannot be conceded as the right of any mortal without clear and undoubted Scripture authority. The liberty of the Church ought not to be surrendered to the will of mere pretenders. It is no excuse to say, that such a power has been claimed, and for a long time usurped or exercised. Confident assumptions, subtle distinctions, blind traditions, or loose conjectures, furnish no proof. Papists therefore cannot evade the demand which Protestants make in answer to their pretensions. They must show clear and direct scriptural warrant.

4. The following is the order in which we propose to discuss this subject:—(1.) That Peter did not possess or exercise a primacy of superiority, in power, command, or jurisdiction, over the other Apostles; or that Peter had not, by our Lord's appointment, or by divine right, any supremacy over his colleagues. (2.) That the primacy of Peter, of whatever kind it might have been, could not be transferred to others. (3.) That Peter was not Bishop of Rome. (4.) That the Bishops of Rome do not wield a universal supremacy over the whole Church by divine institution. (5.) That all ecclesiastical presidencies, or superiority of some Bishops or Pastors over others in spiritual affairs, were introduced by human ordinances, and established by law and custom, for prudential reasons, according to the exigencies of times and circumstances, and not by divine appointment. (6.) That the supremacy of the Pope is a usurpation, as will be proved by tracing out its origin, progress, and establishment. (7.) That the Popes of Rome, since the time

* "Sanctam apostolicam sedem et Romanum Pontificem in universum orbem tenere primatum, et ipsum Pontificem Romanum successorem esse beati Petri Principis Apostolorum, et verum Christi Vicarium, totiusque Ecclesiæ caput, et omnium Christianorum Patrem et Doctorem existere, et ipsi in beato Petro pascendi, regendi, et gubernandi universalem Ecclesiam a Domino nostro Jesu Christo plenam potestatem traditam esse, quemadmodum etiam in actis œcumenicorum Conciliorum, et in sacris canonibus continetur."—Conc. Labb., tom. xiii., Conc. Florent., sess. x., col. 154, et seq. Paris, 1671.

[† Book of the Roman Catholic Church, p. 119. 8vo. London, 1835.]

‡ Bened. XIV. Bullar. tom. i., No. 1, de Dog. et Ritib., sect. i., De Fide Cathol., p. 345. Mechl., 1826.

§ "Christus, migraturus ex mundo ad Patrem, in soliditate petræ Petrum ejusque successores Vicarios suos instituit, quibus ex Libri Regum testimonio ita obedire necesse est, ut qui non obedierit, morte moriatur."—Labb. Conc., tom. xiv., Conc. Lat. V., sess. xi., col. i., et seq. Paris, 1671.

‖ Canon. et Dec. Concilii Trid., sess. xiv., De Pœniten., cap. vii. Fol. Romæ, 1564.

¶ "Provisi de beneficiis, in Romanæ Ecclesiæ obedientia se permansuros spondeant ac jurent."—Idem, sess. xxiv., cap 12.

of Peter, have not possessed or exercised the several prerogatives or branches of power embraced in the supremacy of the Pontiff.

CHAPTER V.

SUPREMACY—SUBJECT CONTINUED.

Peter had not, by our Lord's appointment, supremacy over the rest of the Apostles. Order of discussion.—I. Of different kinds of precedence or excellence. 1. Enumeration of them: 2. Peter may have possessed an excellence of personal worth or merit. Incidents to illustrate this: 3. Of external reputation: 4. Of honour or dignity. Probable reasons of this: 5. He did not possess a primacy of command or jurisdiction over the other Apostles.—II. The arguments adduced to prove it are insufficient. 1. An express Scripture warrant necessary. Romanists can adduce none without wresting Scripture: 2. "Thou art Peter," considered. Ten arguments on this point: 3. The power of the keys considered. Twelve reasons against the Popish gloss: 4. "Feed my sheep," &c., answered. Seven reasons against the view entertained by the Papacy: 5. Peter is called primus, "first." This answered: 6. The prerogatives ascribed to him, noticed.—III. The titles given to him by the Fathers considered. 1. Enumeration of them. Their impertinence as arguments: 2. First. A rigid interpretation of these titles is absurd: 3. Secondly. The turgid eulogies are not found in many of the ancient Fathers: 4. Thirdly. These titles are ambiguous: 5. Fourthly. They are applicable to others: 6. Fifthly. Paul is joined with Peter: 7. The title "Head:" 8. "Apostolic:" 9. "Apostolic seat:" 10. "Successor of Peter:" 11. "Prince:" 12. "Vicar of Christ:" 13. "Pope:" 14. "Chief Priest," or Pontifex Maximus: 15. Arrogance of these terms: 16. The Fathers are brought to testify, by having been corrupted.—IV. Arguments against the supremacy of Peter. 1. For it there ought to be a clear institution of Christ: 2. No express mention of it in Scripture: 3. No time assigned for its institution: 4. No title or name given to it: 5. No office above that of Apostle: 6. Our Lord declared against it: 7. All the Apostles were equal in authority: (1.) All were Ambassadors; (2.) Rocks; (3.) Builders; (4.) All had the keys; (5.) All fed the flock; (6.) Their commission universal; (7.) All had extraordinary gifts; (8.) Common prerogatives; (9.) Councils recognise this; (10.) Were all co-ordinate in power: 8. No intimation of such supremacy in the Epistles of Peter: 9. Nor in the Acts or apostolic Epistles: 10. No appeal to Peter in any controversies mentioned in Scripture: 11. He did not act as judge of controversy: 12. He was not the source of power: 13. The proceedings of the Apostles at variance with the supremacy: 14. The Apostles acted independently: 15. Behaviour of Paul to Peter is against it. Nine circumstances given: 16. If Peter were Pope, he should outlive his colleagues: 17. Other Apostles might assume the supremacy on grounds similar to those on which it is claimed for Peter.

Peter did not possess or exercise a primacy of superiority, in power, command, or jurisdiction, over the rest of the Apostles; or, Peter had not, by our Lord's appointment, or by divine right, supremacy over the other Apostles.

In establishing the foregoing proposition, we shall, I. Give an enumeration of the different kinds of primacy or precedence which may belong to a person in respect of others. II. Show that the arguments brought to prove that Peter did possess a superiority of power, command, or jurisdiction over the other Apostles, are insufficient. III. Adduce the testimony of the Fathers concerning it. IV. Present the arguments against it.

I. Let us, in the first place, enumerate the different kinds of supremacy or precedence which one person may have with regard to others.

1. There are several kinds of primacy, precedence, excellence, &c., which any person may possess. There is a primacy or excellence of personal worth; of external reputation, or esteem; of honour or priority for the sake of order; and also of power or jurisdiction.

We shall examine what right Peter had to any of these, and endeavour to ascertain whether he possessed such supremacy over the rest of the Apostles as the Church of Rome would ascribe to him.

2. As to the first, whether a primacy or excellence of personal worth or merit may be granted to Peter? Now, it is probable he excelled all or most of the other Apostles in personal endowments and capacity, both natural and moral, qualifying him for the discharge of the apostolic office in an eminent degree. He was a man of quick apprehension, a bold spirit, active, and industrious; he was zealous; he loved his Lord much. The following are instances in which some of the foregoing traits were manifested.

When our Lord, referring to the different opinions of men concerning him, asked the Apostles, "Whom say ye that I am?" Peter προπηδᾳ και προλαμβανεται, "rose up first and anticipated" the others, as Chrysostom observes, saying, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." (Matt. xvi. 15, 16.) The others were not ignorant of this point; for at their conversion they confessed Christ. (John i. 41, 49; Matt. xiv. 33, &c.; xxvi. 63.) Nathaniel acknowledged him; and the remainder, when they saw Christ walk on the sea, believed in him. St. Peter, even previous to this, in the name of them all, had said, Ἡμεις πεπιστευκαμεν και εγνωκαμεν, "We have believed and have known that thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." (John vi. 69.) The others, therefore, had the same faith; but he was more forward to declare it. As Gregory Nazianzen justly observes, "He was more ardent than the others in acknowledging Christ." *

When our Lord walked on the sea, Peter alone had the courage and faith to commit himself to the waters.—At the transfiguration, he proposed to erect a tabernacle for their abode, not knowing what he said.—When our Lord spoke of his sufferings, Peter besought him to spare himself.—When our Lord predicted the desertion of his disciples, such was the natural courage of Peter, that he exclaimed, "Though all men shall be offended because of thee, yet will I never be offended." And, "Though I should die with thee, yet will I not deny thee." (Matt. xxvi. 33, 35; John xiii. 37.)—When our Lord was apprehended by the soldiers, Peter courageously drew the sword in his defence.—And when the report reached him that our Lord was risen from the dead, he was the first who ran to the sepulchre.

From the foregoing particulars, as well as others, we may admit that Peter had a primacy of worth, or personal accomplishments, which rendered him eminent among the Apostles. Although, in after-times, there arose one who said, that "he was not behind the very chief Apostles;" of whom St. Ambrose observed, "Neither was Paul inferior to Peter, being easily compared with the first, but second to none." † This is the primacy which Eusebius attributes to Peter, when he calls him "the excellent and great Apostle, who for his virtue was the prolocutor of the rest."

3. With regard to a primacy of external reputation, or repute, it may also be ascribed to Peter. St. Paul intended this, when he spoke of the οι δοκουντες, "those who had a special reputation," who "seemed to be pillars," and were ὑπερ λιαν Αποστολοι, "super-eminent" or "chief Apostles." From which we learn, that there were some who, on account of their worth, were held in higher reputation than others. To this class Peter belonged, on account of his eminent qualities and zealous labours.

[* "Quod eo quoque mirabilius videri debet, quod idem ad Christi agnitionem animi ardore alios anteibat, eoque nomine beatus prædicatus est, resque maximas in fidem accepit."—Greg. Naz. Opera, oratio xxxiv., p. 207. Fol. Antverp., 1612.]

† "Nec Paulus inferior Petro, cum primo quoque facile conferendus, et nulli secundus."—Ambros. Opera, tom. iv., De Spiritu Sancto, lib. ii., cap. xii., col. 254, B. Paris, 1661.

4. With respect to a primacy of order, or mere dignity or honour, this may be allowed, without ascribing to Peter Papal supremacy.

That the other Apostles gave him precedence in conducting the affairs of the church, may be safely questioned. This appears to be a privilege which does not suit the gravity of Apostles, who would not stand on such ceremonies. Our Lord's rules seem also to exclude all kinds of inequality among them. Yet some precedence may be granted as probable: for instance, it might be useful to preserve order and expedite business; to promote union and prevent ambition.

As all could not speak or act the first, or guide affairs, it was necessary that some one should be appointed, either permanently or occasionally, for that purpose. So Chrysostom, in commenting on Acts ii., where Peter appears for the rest, says: "See the concord of the Apostles: they yield unto him the right of speech, for they need not all speak." * Jerome gives his opinion in the following words:—"One is chosen among the twelve, that, a head being appointed, an occasion of schism might be removed." † Cyprian ascribes a preference to Peter for the sake of unity. ‡ Other African Doctors, as Optatus and Augustine, speak in a similar manner. § There is little solidity in their sentiments, and as little harm.

Although the Fathers countenance such precedence in favour of Peter, they do not extend it so far as to involve supremacy, nor do they found it on divine right. Augustine says: "Peter was by nature one man, by grace one Christian, by more abundant grace one and the same prime Apostle." ‖ Again: "For Peter himself, being the first in the order of the Apostles, the most forward in the love of Christ, he alone often answers for all." ¶

Several reasons may be shown why precedence was granted to Peter. First. It is probable he was primarily called to the apostleship, or first named or appointed by our Lord, when he chose twelve, and named them Apostles: "Simon, whom he also named Peter; and Andrew his brother." (Luke vi. 14; Matt. iv. 18; Mark i. 16.) Theophylact observes, "He first appointed Peter and Andrew, because they were first called." * Epiphanius says, that our Lord, "knowing who was worthy to be appointed among the first, chose Peter to be the leader." † Hilary asserts, that "he did first believe, and his apostleship is chief or first;" ‡ and Cyprian says, that "he was the first chosen by our Lord." § He therefore may have enjoyed a certain primacy, because he was first appointed to the apostleship.

Secondly. Peter also might have some pre-eminence on account of age. So Jerome thought, who speaks thus: "Why was not John elected, being unmarried? It was reserved for age, because Peter was older; for a youth, and one almost a boy, ought not to be preferred to men of mature age." ‖ Epiphanius, however, says, that "Peter was younger than Andrew." ¶ There is but little stress to be placed on statements concerning the age of the Apostles, as they are grounded on tradition only; nevertheless, the sentiment of Jerome seems probable.

Thirdly. In consequence of the eminent talents and qualifications of Peter, the first place appears to have been frequently awarded to him by his colleagues. It is observable, that on many occasions our Lord paid him particular respect. He directed his discourse to him more frequently than to the others. He promised to him those gifts which he intended to confer upon all. Other marks of respect were also paid to Peter, which intimate that he was considered first among the Apostles.

Fourthly. The Fathers have ascribed his priority to his faith, in which he excelled. Hilary saith: "He obtained super-eminent glory by the confession of his blessed faith."  And Ambrose states: "Because he alone of all the rest professed his love, therefore he is preferred above all." ††

Fifthly. In all enumerations of the Apostles, Peter stands first; and in actions in which he was jointly concerned with others he is usually first named, which would argue special design. On this account a primacy, for the sake of order, may be safely assigned him; such, for instance, as the Moderator or President of ecclesiastical bodies, or Speaker in legislative assemblies.

5. But as to a primacy implying superiority in power, command, and jurisdiction, such as Romanists ascribe to the Pope, we reject it, for the following reasons:—

II. The arguments which are produced to prove such supremacy are insufficient.

1. It is necessary that a commission from God, in clear

* "Σκοπει των Αποστολων την δμονοιαν, αυτοι παραχωρουσιν αυτῳ της δημηγοριας, ου γαρ εδει παντας φθεγγεσθαι."—Chrysost. Opera, tom. ix., in Acta Apost., hom. iv., p. 44, B. Ed. Ben. Paris, 1837.

† "Inter duodecim unus eligitur, ut, capite constituto, schismatis tollatur occasio."—Hieron. Opera, tom. iv., adversus Jovin., lib. i., cap. xiv., col. 168. Edit. Bened. Paris, 1706.

[‡ "Nam Petro primum Dominus, super quem ædificavit Ecclesiam, et unde unitatis originem instituit et ostendit, potestatem istam dedit, ut id solveretur in cœlis quod ille solvisset in terris."—Cyprian. Opera, epist. lxxii., Ad Jubaianum, p. 115. 8vo. Paris, 1836.]

[§ "Nam quod in typo unitatis Petro Dominus dedit potestatem, ut id solveretur in terris quod ille solvisset, manifestum est quod illa unitas etiam una columna perfecta sit dicta."—August. Opera, tom. ix., De Baptismo contra Donatistas, lib. iii., cap. xvii., col. 117, C. Ed. Bened. Paris, 1694.]

‖ "Petrus—natura unus homo erat, gratia unus Christianus, abundantiore gratia unus idemque primus Apostolus."—Idem, tom. ii., pars ii., in Joh. Evang., tract. cxxiv., col. 822, C. Ed. Bened. Paris, 1694.

¶ "Ipse enim Petrus, in Apostolorum ordine primus, in Christi amore promptissimus, sæpe unus respondet pro omnibus."—Idem, De Verbis Dom.

[* "Enumerat autem Apostolorum nomina propter pseudo-apostolos. Præponit autem Petrum et Andream, quoniam et primum erant vocati."—Theophylacti Comment. Quat. Evangel., in Matt. x., De Ordine Apostolorum, p. 51, D. Fol. Paris, 1631.]

† "Γινωσκων τις εν πρωτοις αξιος ταττεσθαι, εξελεξατο Πετρον αρχηγον ειναι."—Epiphan. Hær., 51.

‡ "Primus credidit, et apostolatus est princeps."—Hilarii Pictavor. Opera, Comment. in Matthæum, cap. vii., sect. vi., col. 642, B. Ed. Bened. Paris, 1693.

§ "Quem primum Dominus elegit."—Cypriani Opera, epist. lxx., Ad Quintum, p. 111. Paris, 1836.

‖ "Sed cur non Joannes electus est virgo? Ætati delatum est, quia Petrus senior erat; ne adhuc adolescens et pene puer progressæ ætatis hominibus præferretur."—Hieron. Opera, tom. iv., Adv. Jovin., col. 168. Edit. Bened. Paris, 1706.

¶ "Μικροτερου οντος του Πετρου τῳ χρονῳ της ἡλικιας."—Epiphan. Hær., 51.

 "Super-eminentem beatæ fidei suæ confessione gloriam promeruit."—Hilar. Opera, de Trinitate, lib. vi., cap. xxxvii., col. 904, C. Ed. Bened. Paris, 1693.

[†† "Bene conscius sui, non ad tempus assumptum, sed jamdudum Deo cognitum Petrus testificatur affectum. Quis est enim alius, qui de se hoc facile profiteri possit? Et ideo quia solus profitetur ex omnibus, omnibus antefertur."—Ambros. Opera, tom. iii., Comment. in Luc., cap. xxiv., col. 233, A. Paris, 1661.]

and direct terms, should be produced, that no person might entertain any doubt in believing, or any excuse for not submitting to it. This was necessary, not only for the Apostles, but for us also; because it is made the foundation of duty, which we cannot perform without being assured of our obligation by clear precept in holy Scripture. No such commission is found in that book; but, on the contrary, many passages are against it.

It is true, texts of Scripture are adduced by the Papists for the purpose of establishing the supremacy of the Pope; but, on careful examination, they will be found unavailing. The portions which they allege do not contain the doctrine, either by express declaration, by plain implication, or fair inference.

2. Romanists bring forward those words of our Saviour, which he uttered on the occasion of Peter confessing him to be the Son of God: "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church." (Matt. xvi. 18.) Peter, it is said, is called the foundation, which implies that he is the sole supreme Governor of the church. On this text Dens remarks: "Although the name of the primacy may not be expressed, yet it is manifestly promised under two metaphors: the first metaphor is taken from the nature of a foundation and edifice; and what the foundation of an edifice is, the same in the community is a King in his kingdom, &c. The other is taken from the delivery of keys; for he to whom the keys of a city are delivered is constituted or declared to be the King or Governor of the city."* On this interpretation we observe, that,

(1.) All that is said on this subject is gratuitous, and without any shadow of proof. The words of the text are metaphorical, and capable of various interpretations, none of which is sufficient to justify the Papal hypothesis. No legitimate rendering, founded on the philology of language, the analogy of Scripture truths, and the sober sense of grave expositors, supports it. Hence a bare denial is a sufficient answer to the assertion.

(2.) Theologians, both ancient and modern, have differed materially in their exposition of these words. Some say that this rock is Peter; others, that it is Christ; and some, that it is the confession of faith which Peter made.

Some interpret "this rock" to be Christ, of whom Paul says, "Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Christ Jesus." (1 Cor. iii. 11.) Augustine, in his Retractations, thus expounds the words, though he did not reject the interpretation which made Peter the rock, leaving it to his readers to choose the more probable.

The most eminent among the Fathers have taken the rock to signify St. Peter's faith or confession. Of this opinion was Chrysostom.† Theodoret says, "Our Lord did permit the first of the Apostles to be shaken, whose confession he fixed as a prop or foundation of the Church."‡ Hence Origen declares, that "every disciple of Christ is the rock,"* in virtue of his agreement with Peter in that holy confession. Hilary says, "This, therefore, is the one immovable foundation; this is the one happy rock of faith confessed by the mouth of Peter, 'Thou art the Son of the living God.'"† Erasmus, in his Annotations, placed the following note in the margin: —Petram interpretatur ipsam fidei professionem: "He interprets the rock to be the very profession of faith;" and, on Matt. xvi. 18, cited Augustine, who is of the same opinion as Hilary, and inserted in the margin, Ecclesia non est fundata super Petrum, "The Church is not founded on Peter." The Spanish Inquisitors ordered this to be expunged from Erasmus's exposition, although Hilary and Augustine, and others, affirmed the same.‡ Several Popes held the opinion, that the rock on which the Church was built was not Peter's person, but his faith, or confession of it.§ Some of the most learned maintained the exposition of Chrysostom. Among these were John Semeca, in his gloss upon Gratian, and Nicholaus Lyranus, and Anselm.

The Church of Rome appears to be at variance with herself in interpreting the passage under consideration. The Fathers of the Council of Trent say, "The Creed or profession of faith which the Church of Rome useth is the firm and only foundation against which the gates of hell shall never prevail."‖ Such is the declaration of the Tridentine Synod, which is opposed to the exposition given by many of their Divines, and other authorities.

(3.) The holy Apostles did not understand these words as promising to Peter a supremacy over them. Would they have contended for the chief place, had they understood that it had been bestowed upon Peter? (Luke xxii. 24.) Would they have disputed about a question which, to their knowledge, had been decided by their

[* "Quamvis nomen Primatus non exprimatur, manifeste tamen promittitur sub duabus metaphoris: prior metaphora desumitur a ratione fundamenti et ædificii: quod autem in ædificio fundamentum, hoc in communitate Superior, in regno Rex, &c. Altera desumitur a traditione clavium: cui enim traduntur claves civitatis, is constituitur aut declaratur civitatis Rex aut Gubernator."—Dens Theol., tom. ii.; De Ecclesia, No. 91; De Primatu Petri.]

† Chrysost. Oper., tom. vii., Hom. in Matt. xvi. 13, et seq., p. 616, A. Edit. Bened. Paris, 1836.

[‡ "Quin hac etiam de causa Christus Dominus noster Apostolorum principem, cujus confessionem velut basim quandam et fundamentum Ecclesiæ defixerat, fluctuare ac errare permisit; duo eadem opera docens, nec fidere seipsis, et fluctuantes firmare."—Theodoreti Episc. Cyri. Opera, tom. iii. Epist. lxxvii., p. 947, A. Fol., Paris, 1642.]

[* "Petra enim est omnis discipulus Christi, de quo bibebant qui bibebant de spirituali consequente petra: et super quamlibet ejusmodi petram ædificatur omnis sermo ecclesiasticus, et vitæ juxta ipsum instituta ratio."—Origenis Opera, tom. iii.; Comment. in Matt. xvi., p. 524, A. Edit. Bened. Fol. Paris, 1740.]

† "Unum igitur hoc est immobile fundamentum, una hæc felix fidei petra Petri ore confessa, 'Tu es Filius Dei vivi.'"—Hilar. Pictav. de Trinit., lib. ii., cap. xxiii., col. 800, A. Edit. Bened. Paris, 1693.

[‡ "Proinde miror esse, qui locum hunc detorqueant ad Romanum Pontificem in quem haud dubie competunt in primum velut in Christianæ fidei principem. At non in hunc unum, sed in omnes Christianos, quod eleganter indicat Origenes homilia prima harum quas habemus. Verum sunt quibus nihil satis est, nisi quod sit immodicum. Ita quidam prodigiosis efferunt laudibus, quem exprimere magis oportebat, quam in immensum attollere. Nam deiparæ virgini et Christo fortasse non potest ascribi minimum. Quanquam hic quoque optarim omnes tam ad imitandi studium inflammatos, quam quosdam videmus sedulos in exaggerandis laudibus." (In marg., "Ecclesia non est fundata super Petrum.")—Desid. Erasmi in Nov. Test. Annotationes. In Matt. cap. xvi., fol., p. 75. Basil, 1542.

["Expunge notam marginis, 'Ecclesia non est fundata super Petrum.'"—Indices Librorum Prohibitorum et Expurgandorum Novissimi Hispanicus et Romanus, fol., p. 289, col. 1. Madriti, 1667.]

[§ "In vera fide persistite, et vitam vestram in petra Ecclesiæ, hoc est, in confessione B. Petri Apostolorum Principis, solidate."—Greg. Mag., Epist. iii. 33. "Persist in the true faith, and establish and fix your life upon the rock of the Church; that is, upon the confession of blessed Peter, the Prince of the Apostles." "Super ista confessione, ædificabo Ecclesiam meam. Felix III., Epist. v. Vide Nicol. I., Epist. ii 6; John VIII., Epist. lxxvi."—Barrow's Works, vol. vii., p. 126 (note). 8vo. edit. Oxford, 1830.]

‖ "Synodus statuit, præmittendum esse confessionem fidei—symbolum fidei, quo Romana Ecclesia utitur, tamquam principium—ac fundamentum firmum et unicum, contra quod portæ inferni nunquam prævalebunt."—Conc. Trid., sess. iii.; Decretum de Symbolo Fidei. Fol. Romæ, 1564.

Master? (Mark ix. 34.) Would they have troubled our Lord by inquiring who should be the greatest, had they known that this had already been decided? (Matt. xviii. 1.) Would the sons of Zebedee have been so foolish as to ask for themselves a place which they knew had been given to Peter? (Matt. xx. 24.) Now, if none of the Apostles understood the words as the Roman Catholic understands them, who is obliged to receive them in that sense? Certainly they had as many opportunities of knowing the mind of Christ as any: their ignorance, therefore, of the Popish interpretation of the words, "Thou art Peter," &c., is a strong argument against it.

(4.) This rendering of the passage is at variance with the answers which our Lord gave to the inquiries of his disciples concerning the point of superiority. For if the Roman interpretation be good, our Lord appears not only to dissemble, but also to disavow, his promise. Can we suppose that he would hesitate to deliver clear instructions on what is now claimed to be an article of the Christian faith, and necessary to salvation?

(5.) The word "rock" does not mean government, even allowing Peter was the rock. For what resemblance exists between a rock and a Governor?

(6.) Admitting, however, that being such a rock implies government; the other Apostles were individually the foundation as well as Peter.

(7.) It is not stated that the Apostles or apostolic office should be built upon Peter; for the former were appointed, and their office was instituted, previous to the promise being made to the latter. The words, therefore, can only mean, that in some sense or other he was a rock, upon which the Church should afterward be built.

(8.) If we take Peter himself to be the rock, then the best exposition of the passage is, that our Lord designed him to be an important instrument in preaching Christ by supporting his truth, and converting men to his dominion. In this sense the other Apostles are designated foundations. The church is a "spiritual house," (1 Peter ii. 5,) "built upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone." (Eph. ii. 20.) St. John, speaking of the church, the New Jerusalem, says, "And the wall of the city had twelve foundations, and in them the names of the twelve Apostles of the Lamb." (Rev. xxi. 14.) The Apostles were thus termed foundations, because upon their testimony concerning the person, life, death, and resurrection of Christ, the faith of Christians was grounded; which doctrines were maintained and propagated by their preaching, their holy practice, and their miraculous works; in all which Peter, in the commencement of Christianity, was most eminent. This interpretation agrees with matter of fact, which is, after all, the best expositor of right and privilege in cases such as these. We may reasonably understand our Saviour to have promised that which in effect was realized. Hence Tertullian says, "For so the effect showeth, the Church was built on him; that is, by him."* But this does not imply a superiority of power that was granted to Peter above his brethren, but rather one of worth and privilege.

(9.) The import of the words used in the text under consideration, namely, the words "Peter" and "rock," must be noticed.

First. The Greek word Πετρος, Petros, or "Peter," does not mean a rock, though it has a relative meaning to the word πετρα, petra, "a rock:" it signifies a "stone," or little piece of a rock; whereby the dignity of the real foundation, expressed by the figure of petra, or "rock," is superior in dignity to the preceding word petros, or "stone;" as petra, a real "rock," is superior to a mere "stone," or a piece from the rock. A rock is a figurative expression in Scripture used to denote the Almighty: "The Lord is my Rock." (2 Sam. xxii. 2; Psalm xviii. 2.) Again: "God only is my Rock;" (Psalm lxii. 2;) and, "Who is a Rock save our God?" (2 Sam. xxii. 32.) Many other examples might be adduced to show that, by the expression used by our Lord on the occasion, nothing less was understood than our Lord's divine dignity, as declared by Peter in the context, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God."

That our Lord referred to this declaration of Peter, relating to his own character, as being the true "rock" on which he would build his church, is established by the clear distinction which he made between the "stone," πετρος, petros, and the "rock," πετρα, petra, in the accurate grammatical manner in which both terms are expressed. Whatever may have been the language in which they were spoken, whether Chaldee or Syriac, in this point the Greek is an authoritative instructer. The first word, petros, πετρος, being a masculine noun, signifies merely a "stone;" and the second word, πετρα, petra, a feminine noun, signifies a "rock." The true meaning of the name petros was declared by our Lord to be Cephas, "a stone;" and petros doth always signify a stone, but very rarely a rock.

With respect, then, to the word petros, when applied figuratively to Peter, it can represent only one out of the many believers who, as stones, form the spiritual building of the church, and not the foundation on which that church rests; because in this sense that refers either to God, or to Christ: and although Christ himself is occasionally called a "Stone," (λιθος, lithos, not πετρος, petros,) yet, whenever this expression is applied to him, it is always with such a clear distinction of superiority over all other stones, as will not admit of any vicarial stone in his place. For instance, he is called "the Headstone of the corner;" (Psalm cxviii. 22;) a "precious corner-stone." (Isai. xxviii. 16.) And Peter declares, "Ye also, as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house, an holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ." (1 Peter ii. 5.) He here plainly acknowledges the true foundation on which the other living stones of the primitive catholic church were built. He then proceeds: "Wherefore also it is contained in the Scripture, Behold, I lay in Sion a chief corner-stone, elect, precious: and he that believeth on him shall not be confounded. Unto you therefore which believe he is precious: but unto them which be disobedient, the stone which the builders disallowed, the same is made the head of the corner." (1 Peter ii. 6, 7.)

["The closest version of the Greek in English," observes Dr. Hopkins, Protestant Bishop of Vermont, "would be, 'Thou art a stone, and on this rock I will build my church.' But to preserve at the same time the true idea of the original, and also the play upon the name, is not possible in any modern language. To make the Greek and the Latin accord with your commentary," addressing the Papal hierarchy, "you know perfectly well that an alteration of the phraseology would be necessary. Thus, in the Greek our Lord does not say, Επι τουτῳ τῳ πετρῳ, but, Επι ταυτῃ τῃ πετρᾳ, recurring to the radical word, which is of a different gender. Πετρα is the root, signifying a 'rock,' which Rock was Christ. Πετραιος is the adjective, signifying 'rocky' or 'stony.' And Πετρος, the name given to Peter, signifies a 'stone,' and sometimes a 'rock,' in a diminutive sense, being derived from πετρα. Therefore the Fathers held that Peter received his name from the rock, just as the believer is called Christian from Christ. In like manner your Latin Vulgate stands opposed to your Douay Commentary, and would require an alteration in its language, before it could be made to correspond with your doctrine. Instead of Tu es Petrus, it would be necessary to write it, Tu es Petra, et super hanc Petram, &c. So that in both these authoritative records, Peter is one word, of the masculine gender; and the rock is a different word, of the feminine gender; and yet you ask us to believe that they are both the same!"*]

* "Sic enim exitus docet, in ipso Ecclesia exstructa est; id est, per ipsum."—Tertull. Opera, tom. ii.; De Pudicit., cap. xxi. 8vo. Wirceb., 1781.

From this argument, it is manifest there can be no other head of the church than Christ himself; so that a vicarial head is not only contrary to the instructions of Peter to the Eastern churches, long subsequent to the resurrection of Christ, but contrary to our Lord's advice to his disciples, when he said, "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." The appointment of any Vicar upon earth, to represent that Rock, or eternal Head of the church, whose continual presence is expressly promised, even to the smallest congregation, is therefore presumptuous and vain.

(10.) Secondly. A due consideration of the second noun, πετρα, petra, "a rock," will lead to the same result; that is, it will show that the name "rock," which in other texts is applied to Jehovah or God alone, our Lord never intended should be applied to Peter, but only to that testimony which that Apostle had given concerning the divinity of Christ: "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God."

It has been noticed, that petra, "a rock," was a feminine noun; and that a clear distinction is made between it and the masculine, petros, by the grammatical terms in which petra, in its relatives and articles, is expressed, which are feminine throughout the whole sentence. This proves that our Lord did not intend that the appellation of petros, "a stone," which he had previously given to Simon, should be applied to the character of which he spoke in the following part of the sentence. For if he had contemplated such a construction, the masculine noun petros would have been repeated in the subsequent part of the sentence with a masculine pronoun; namely, επι τουτῳ τῳ πετρῳ, instead of επι ταυτῃ τῃ πετρᾳ; where, as it now stands, the gender is not only changed from the masculine to the feminine, but also the figurative character itself. The term petros cannot signify more than a "stone;" so that the Popish application of that word to Peter as the foundation of the church is not only inconsistent with the proper meaning of the name which Christ conferred upon him, and also with its grammatical construction; but with the figurative sense of the other word petra, the "rock;" επι ταυτῃ τῃ πετρᾳ, "upon this rock," the declared foundation of the church, a title of dignity which can be applicable only to God or to Christ.

Again: the application of the term "rock" to Peter is inconsistent with the reference which is made to the preceding context by our Lord in the commencement of this verse: "And I also say unto thee," which evidently points to our Lord's divine dignity therein mentioned, "Thou art the Christ," the true foundation or rock on which alone the church is built; because our faith in him, as "the Son of the living God," is the only security or rock of our salvation. And hence true faith builds on a foundation against which the gates of hell shall never prevail; and he who hears the sayings of Christ, and doeth them, builds his house upon a rock. (Matt. vii. 24, 25.) John also assures us that such faith is victorious. (1 John v. 4, 5.)

Christ was the Rock of the ancient Jewish church. St. Paul says, "They did all drink of that spiritual drink: for they drank of that spiritual Rock that followed them; and that Rock was Christ." (1 Cor. x. 4.) And again: "Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ." (1 Cor. iii. 11.) The conclusion, therefore, at which we arrive is, that an attempt to place any mere man as the rock or foundation of the true catholic church must be attributed either to shameful ignorance of the holy Scriptures, or to wilful apostasy and extreme wickedness.

3. Papists refer to the latter part of the verse: "To thee will I give the keys of the kingdom of heaven." On this passage Dens says: "That Peter did not receive the keys as a private person, but as supreme Pastor, and for the benefit of the Church; and from him, by ordinary right, the power of the keys is derived to other superiors, Bishops, and Pastors of the Church." *

To this we answer:—

(1.) The words are figurative, and therefore not sufficiently clear to prove the point in debate.

(2.) Romanists have admitted and received various interpretations of the passage.

(3.) The Apostles did not understand it as conveying to Peter a supremacy over them: he himself did not affix this sense to it: the Saviour, on an occasion which would have required it, did not refer to any promise concerning the supremacy.

(4.) Our Lord speaks in the future tense, δωσω, "I will give," not, "I have given," or "do give;" and therefore the Papists must show some other place in Scripture where the power was actually given to Peter, and to him alone. Otherwise it will be impossible to prove his supremacy.

(5.) The keys were given to the other Apostles as well as to Peter.

Our Lord, in treating on this very subject, is represented as bestowing the keys on the rest of the Apostles: "Verily I say unto you, Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven, and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven:" (Matt. xviii. 18:) a power precisely the same as that which was imparted to all. "Then said Jesus to them again, Peace be unto you: as my Father hath sent me, even so send I you. And when he had said this, he breathed on them, and saith unto them, Receive ye the Holy Ghost. Whose soever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whose soever sins ye retain, they are retained." (John xx. 21—23.) Here no supremacy is vouchsafed to Peter.

[* The Church of Rome in her primitive Purity compared with the Church of Rome at the present Day: being a candid Examination of her Claims to universal Dominion, addressed to the Roman Hierarchy. By J. H. Hopkins, D.D., Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocess of Vermont, U. S. 8vo., pp. 24, 25. London, 1833.]

[* "Quod Petrus non acceperit claves ut persona privata, sed sub ratione supremi Pastoris, et pro utilitate Ecclesiæ, a quo jure ordinario potestas clavium in alios Ecclesiæ Superiores, Episcopos, et Pastores, erat derivanda."—Dens Theol., tom. ii., No. 91, De primatu Petri.]

In the context we are informed, that our "Lord THEN charged his disciples that they should tell no man that he was Jesus the Christ;" manifestly referring to the declaration of Peter, "Thou art the Christ," in answer to his question to all of them, "Whom say ye that I am?" Christ no more promised the keys exclusively to Peter than he engaged to bless him exclusively, when he declared, "Blessed art thou, Simon Barjona; for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father, which is in heaven." Christ put a question to all the Apostles, "Whom say ye that I am?" Peter answered, in behalf of all, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." We might as well say that Christ blessed Peter exclusively, as that he promised the keys to him alone.

It is absurd to hold that Peter should exercise the power of the keys in reference to the other Apostles; because he did not open the kingdom of heaven to them, inasmuch as they had been admitted into it by our Lord himself.

On another occasion our Lord said to Peter first, "Fear not, from henceforth thou shalt catch men." (Luke v. 10; Matt. iv. 19.) Is it, then, to be inferred that he alone was thus authorized? Numerous instances of this kind might be given. But the matter is placed beyond all doubt by the declared purpose for which these keys were intrusted. They refer to the authority which Christ conferred on his Apostles with regard to doctrine, worship, government, and discipline in the church; which was conferred on them all.

(6.) The Fathers generally ascribe to all the Apostles the power of the keys.*

(7.) Their own authentic offices testify that the other Apostles as well as Peter possessed the power of the keys.

The Roman Processional has the following prayer:—"Pray for him, all ye holy Apostles, to whom the power of binding and loosing is given by the Lord."† The Roman Catechism, on the tenth article of the Creed, assures us, that "every Bishop and Priest has the power of the keys given him by our blessed Saviour." In the Roman Pontifical, in the consecration of a Bishop, there is a prayer, beseeching that the power of the keys, of remitting and retaining sins, might be given to every one ordained to that office, in the very words which our Saviour used when he conferred this power on Peter and the Apostles.‡ The Council of Trent, also, confirms this by their decision: "That Christ, when he was about to ascend from earth to heaven, left all Priests his Vicars, as Presidents and judges, to whom all mortal sins were referred into which the faithful might fall; so that, by the power of the keys, they could pronounce remission or retention of sins."§ The Synod attempts to prove this from Matt. xvi. 19, the very place from which Romanists endeavour to establish the supremacy of the Pope.

(8.) Should it be granted that something peculiar belonged to Peter by virtue of these words, it can only be this, that he was the first and principal agent in propagating the Gospel, which is the same as opening the kingdom of heaven. Tertullian says: "So the event teacheth, the Church was built in him, that is, by him; he did first use the key; which see, 'Ye men of Israel, hear these words; Jesus of Nazareth, a man approved of God among you,' &c. He, in fine, in the baptism of Christ, did unlock the entrance to the kingdom of heaven."*

(9.) Christ exercises the power of the keys in the church by his Apostles and the inspired writings. There it was first placed in its plenary fulness, and there it remains. Christ is Lord and King in his own church. He hath the key of David. This symbol of authority is laid on his shoulder. "He openeth, and no man can shut; he shutteth, and no man can open." "The Father hath given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as he hath given him." What the Apostles did and taught under the agency of the Holy Ghost was divine teaching, accompanied with a divine operation. They committed to writing all that the Holy Ghost dictated for the government, instruction, and edification of the church in future ages. Christ gave authority to them, and they only of the human race have been honoured to carry the keys of the kingdom of God, in the primary and strict sense of the promise.

(10.) What has been said does not interfere with the power of the keys as exercised by church rulers in the due administration of scriptural discipline. In every church, whether great or small, there must be the power of binding and loosing; of receiving and excluding members; of administering divine ordinances, whether of doctrine, worship, or government; but whether this be lodged in the hands of many or few, it is only ministerial. This is using the keys which Christ gave his Apostles. But the written word is the only rule by which the power of Christ is to be administered in the church. There are many who despise such authority; and certainly the usurpations of the Papal hierarchy are calculated to make men dread and despise it; but all lawful authority in the church is the authority of Christ, and he who despises the former rejects the latter.

(11.) Christ himself hath the key of David. This prerogative he claimed after Peter had suffered martyrdom, (Rev. iii. 7,) and he still holds it. He has the entire disposal of the treasures of eternal life. "It pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell;" and this fulness is dispensed, according to the testimony of his Apostles, to all who apply to him. "Out of his fulness have we all received, and grace for grace." But were the key of such treasure transferred to the Pope, the church would depend upon a broken reed, that would afford no help, and disappoint all who should lean upon it.

(12.) As a proof of the error of the Church of Rome, in her exposition of Matt. xvi. 18, we adduce some of her interpretations of the passage; from which it will appear, that the most inconsistent and absurd views are

* See Barrow on the Supremacy. Works, vol. vii., p. 134, et seq. 8vo. edit. Oxford, 1830.

† "Orate pro eo, omnes sancti Apostoli, quibus a Domino data est potestas ligandi et solvendi."—Processionale Rom. in Commendatione Animæ.

[‡ "Da ei, Domine, claves regni cœlorum, ut utatur, non glorietur, potestate quam tribuis in ædificationem, non in destructionem. Quodcumque ligaverit super terram, sit ligatum et in cœlis, et quodcumque solverit super terram, sit solutum et in cœlis. Quorum retinuerit peccata, retenta sint; et quorum remiserit, remittantur."—Pontif. Roman. Clem. VIII. Pont. Max., De Consecrat. Elect. in Episc., p. 99. Fol. Romæ, 1595.]

§ "Dominus noster Jesus Christus, terris ascensurus ad cœlos, Sacerdotes sui ipsius Vicarios reliquit, tamquam præsides ac judices, ad quos omnia mortalia crimina deferantur in quæ Christi fideles ceciderint, quo, pro potestate clavium, remissionis aut retentionis sententiam pronuncient."—Decret. et Canon. Concil. Trid., sess. xiv., De Pœn., cap. v. Fol. Romæ, 1564.

* "Sic enim exitus docet, in ipso Ecclesia exstructa est, id est, per ipsum; ipse clavem imbuit; vide quam, 'Viri Israelitæ, auribus mandate quæ dico, Jesum Nazarenum virum a Deo vobis destinatum,' &c. Ipse denique primus in Christi baptismo reseravit aditum cœlestis regni," &c.—Tert. Opera, tom. ii., De Pudicitia, cap. xxi. 8vo. Wurceb., 1781.

entertained by her advocates. Innocent III. cites the passage to show that the Emperor is subject to the Pope. Boniface VIII. produces it for the same purpose in his impious Extravagant, which Bellarmine approves, and which Leo X. renews and confirms. Innocent X. pronounced the proposition to be heresy, which ascribed to Paul as well as Peter a superior power in the church. In short, from that text Papists attempt to prove the supremacy of the Pope in all matters, spiritual and temporal, not even omitting the power of deposing Kings, absolving subjects, conferring spiritual gifts, and governing in all things the Church. From the same passage, also, every Bishop and Priest is invested with power to remit sins authoritatively, not ministerially or as an instructer, but as a judge. In short, from it the Roman Clergy, of all grades, take warrant to rule the church of God in all things, and to extend their jurisdiction to infidels, Protestants, or heretics, so as to establish a complete despotism over the mind, soul, body, property, and liberties of mankind.

4. For the supremacy of Peter, Romanists allege the following words of Christ addressed to that Apostle:—"Feed my sheep; feed my lambs."

(1.) Our Lord says no more to Peter than what he requires of every Minister of Christ, or Pastor of a flock. St. Paul charges the Presbyters or Bishops of Ephesus: "Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock, over the which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feed the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood." (Acts xx. 28.) St. Peter exhorts the Pastors to "feed the flock of God which was among them." (1 Peter v. 2.) Here the duty of feeding, a word which implies to govern, as well as to feed, &c., belongs to every person having the care of souls. Even the Catechism of the Council of Trent says, that "all Bishops are Pastors, to rule as well as feed the flock and sheep of Jesus Christ." Popes, who profess to be the successors of Peter, do not perform the part of Pastors of the flock, either in governing or feeding; for they are principally taken up with ruling the Clergy, and never, or very rarely, feed the people by the word and sacraments, or the exercise of a salutary discipline.

(2.) The words, "Feed my sheep," cannot bear the arbitrary gloss of the Papacy; for it is not said, "Do thou alone feed all my sheep;" and without such a meaning the supremacy of Peter could not be inferred. When St. Paul instructed the Presbyters or Bishops of Ephesus "to feed the church of God," it cannot be inferred that each of them was a universal Governor of the whole church "which Christ had purchased with his blood."

(3.) The Apostles had previously such warrant; and therefore no additional powers were granted to Peter by the words in question. For our Lord had expressly commissioned all, when he said, "As the Father hath sent me, so send I you." Therefore the words, "Feed my sheep," did not add to, or take from, their commission.

(4.) The following appears to be the proper exposition of the passage. Peter had thrice denied his Master: the last time was a declaration upon a solemn oath, that he knew nothing of him. From that period he ceased to be an Apostle. And as Peter had thrice denied, our Lord thrice requires him to confess his love to him; and so often does he renew his commission, "Feed my sheep." As Judas fell from his apostleship by transgression, Peter as certainly fell from his by denying his Master. The commission, "Feed my sheep," restored him to his apostleship, but nothing further.

(5.) The same office pertained to all the Apostles. At their original vocation they were commanded "to say unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel, that were scattered abroad like sheep having no shepherd." (Matt. x. 6; ix. 36.) Anterior to our Lord's ascension, they were enjoined "to teach all nations" the doctrines and precepts of Christ; to receive them into his fold; to feed them with good instruction; to guide and govern them with wholesome discipline.

(6.) Hence the sheep which our Saviour instructs Peter to feed were not the Apostles, who were his fellow-shepherds, but believers in general, or the people of God, whom Peter calls the "flock:" "Feed," says he, "the flock of God which is among you." Such a duty is never performed by Roman Pontiffs.

(7.) The Papistical interpretation, which extends the government and instruction embraced in the words, "Feed my sheep," to all Pastors and to all lay-persons, is absurd; because it requires that which is impossible, inasmuch as there were many thousands of the followers of our Saviour whom Peter never did or could see. But we know, say the Romanists, that Peter did this partly by himself, and partly by others; without advancing any proof. The Apostles did not account themselves the Vicars of Peter, but the Ministers, Stewards, or Ambassadors of Christ; from him they received their commission, in his name they acted, to him they constantly referred their authority, without taking notice of Peter, or acknowledging any dependence upon him. Our Saviour is to his church the only "High-Priest;" (Heb. iv. 14;) "the Prince of all the Pastors;" (1 Peter v. 4;) "the great Shepherd of the sheep." (Heb. xiii. 20.) The interpretation of Papists is also contradicted by the practice of their Church, according to which it appears that Peter never exercised such a power: consequently our Lord conferred it not upon him.

5. Romanists plead for the supremacy of Peter, on the ground, that in the enumeration of the Apostles' names, and in various narratives, the name of Peter invariably stands the first: "The first, Simon, who is called Peter." (Matt. x. 2.) To this we reply:—(1.) This order is not strictly observed; but it admits of exceptions, as appears from the following passages:—"And when James, Cephas, and John, who seemed to be pillars," &c. (Gal. ii. 9.) "Whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world," &c. (1 Cor. iii. 22.) "Have we not power to lead about a sister, a wife, as well as other Apostles, and as the brethren of the Lord and Cephas?" (1 Cor. ix. 5.) "Now Philip was of Bethsaida, the city of Andrew and Peter." (John i. 44.) Erasmus informs us, from Jerome, that the Apostles, in the other Evangelists, are not enumerated in the same order as they are by Matthew; lest any should imagine that Peter was pre-eminent, because his name is first mentioned. Matthew places Thomas before himself; Mark stations him after. Matthew puts Andrew before James and John; Mark gives him a place after them. St. Paul inserts the name of James before Peter and John, although Matthew gives precedence to Peter. Also in the Apostolic Constitutions we meet with the following:—"I, Paul, and I, Peter, do appoint." *

(2.) Although Peter, in the Gospel, may be called πρωτος, protos, and in Latin, primus, "first," and in ancient Latin authors, Princeps Apostolorum, "Prince of the Apostles," these furnish too slight a foundation on which to construct a supremacy. All that can be legitimately inferred from the use of the word "first," is mere precedence,—but no primacy, much less a supremacy of authority, dominion, or jurisdiction over the rest of his brethren in the Apostolate. For as the word πρωτος, protos, or primus, so Princeps, or "Prince," among the best Latin authors usually signifies order only, without any authority or jurisdiction over those in reference to whom they may be so called. Homer and Virgil are called poetarum Principes, "Princes of poets." Cicero terms eminent advocates patroni Principes. Plato and Aristotle are designated philosophorum Principes: nevertheless no dominion or jurisdiction is implied by these titles. The Roman Breviary, in the feast of Peter and Paul, recognises these Apostles, Apostolorum Principes, "Princes of the Apostles."* Having already shown what kind of primacy Peter, or any other Apostle, Bishop, or Minister, may have, without involving supremacy over his brethren, we are not unwilling to ascribe such to him.

* "Εγω Παυλος και εγω Πετρος διατασσομεθα."—Apost. Constit., lib. viii., cap. xxxiii., Conc. Labb., tom. i., col. 498, D. Paris, 1671.

6. Romanists give a variety of prerogatives to Peter, drawn from different portions of Scripture history, from which also they infer supremacy. Almost every incident of his life, illustrated by an expositor of a fertile imagination, is made to furnish proof of the dignity of this Apostle. The following enumeration of special privileges is given by Dens to Peter, for which he represents him as superior to his colleagues:—"From the change of his name; tribute was paid for Christ and Peter; Peter alone walked with Christ on the waters; Christ prayed for him, and he was instructed to strengthen his brethren; he proposed that a new Apostle should be chosen in the place of Judas; he first preached the Gospel after the reception of the Holy Spirit; he performed the first miracle in testimony of the faith; he first preached to the Gentiles; the church prayed for him without intermission; in the Council of Jerusalem he presided, first uttered his opinion, and all the others follow his opinion."† Dens also observes, that "the heretics" (that is, the Protestants) "make several objections to these arguments." Others cite in favour of the supremacy of Peter, "Here are two swords." So Boniface VIII. Bellarmine gives a long detail of such kind of proof.‡

From these and similar passages Papists gravely attempt to establish the high authority of Peter. What cause may not be supported by such arguments? Who would not suspect the weakness of any point which needs such assistance? And may we not seriously ask, Is it honest thus to wrest the words of Scripture, in order to deduce from them principles which they do not contain?

Nay, further, might we not, with equal certainty, infer the supremacy of St. John from similar declarations of holy Scripture? He was the beloved disciple; he leaned on our Saviour's bosom; Peter applied to him to ask our Lord a question, on account of this intimacy; St. John performed even higher services to the church, by writing not only more epistles than Peter, but also the Gospel which bears his name, and the Revelation which contains a sublime prophecy concerning the church; he outran Peter, and came first to the sepulchre, &c. (John xx. 4.) With trifling of this character we might, by attempting to prove the supremacy of John, throw that of Peter completely into the shade.

III. From the TITLES given by the Fathers of the ancient Church to Peter, it has been inferred that he was endowed with supremacy over the other Apostles.

1. The honorary distinctions which have been given to the Bishop of Rome and to his see, together with certain privileges which are ascribed to him, are, with others, the following:—Prince, Apostolic, Apostolic See, Successor of Peter, Vicar of Christ, Chief Pontiff, Pope, Universal Father, &c., &c. These have been urged by Popes in their Bulls, decretal constitutions, and epistles: they have also been maintained by the Clergy, whose interest it is to support the Papal supremacy; for if that should fall, all must go with it.

In by-gone days, when gross ignorance benighted, and tyranny overawed, the greater part of Europe, such arguments had full sway: few had learning sufficient to reply, and others lacked the boldness necessary to resist. After Luther arose, and learning had revived, wise and impartial men acknowledged, that arguments drawn from these sources were not only inconsequent, but absolutely impertinent and ridiculous. We shall attempt to show, by plain details, that such titles or privileges afford no ground for Pontifical supremacy; briefly observing,—

2. First. That a rigid and strictly literal intepretation of the Fathers cannot be given in declarations on this subject. The hyperbolical flourishes and encomiastic speeches with which they abound, as orators, must not be construed too closely, so as to give them the exact import which might be attached to language more precise. What will the Papists say to the following declaration of Leo I.? namely, "That Peter was by our Lord received into a participation of his undivided unity;" and that "nothing was bestowed upon any one from God, the Fountain of good things, without the participation of Peter."* In truth, the only and best arguments of the Papists on this and several other points, are the careless effusions of men who spoke heedlessly and hyperbolically.

3. Secondly. Turgid eulogies of Peter are not discovered in the Fathers of the apostolic age, as Irenæus,

[* "Decora lux æternitatis auream
Diem beatis irrigavit ignibus,
Apostolorum quæ coronat Principes,
Reisque in astra liberam pandit viam."
Brev. Rom. In Festo Apost. Petri et Pauli.]

[† "Prima prærogativa est mutatio nominis: 'Tu vocaberis Cephas.' (Joan. cap. i.) Secunda. Quod in ordine enumerationis Apostolorum semper Petrus primo loco nominetur ab Evangelistis, non obstante mutatione ordinis aliorum. Sic expresse dicitur, 'Primus, Simon, qui dicitur Petrus.' (Matt. cap. x.) Tertia. Pro Christo et Petro tributum solvitur. (Matt. cap. xvii.) Quarta. Petrus solus cum Christo ambulat super aquas. (Matt. xiv.) Quinta. Specialiter Petro dicit Christus, 'Rogavi pro te, ut non deficiat fides tua; et tu aliquando conversus confirma fratres tuos.' (Lucæ cap. xxii.) Sexta. Petrus proponit et docet, eligendum esse novum Apostolum loco Judæ; (Act. cap. i.;) post acceptum Spiritum Sanctum primus promulgat Evangelium; (Act. cap. ii.;) primum facit miraculum in testimonium fidei; (Act. cap. iii.;) primus incipit prædicare Gentilibus; (Act. cap. x.;) pro Petro fiebat oratio sine intermissione ab Ecclesia; (Act. cap. xii.;) tanquam præses Concilii Jerosolymitani primus loquitur, ejusque sententiam omnes sequuntur. (Act. cap. xv.) Hisce iterum objiciunt hæretici."—Dens Theol., tom. ii.; De Ecclesia, No. 91; De Primatu Petri.]

‡ Bellarm. Opera, tom. i., De Rom. Pontif., lib. i., cap. x.—xxiv. Fol. Colon., 1619.

* "Hunc enim in consortium individuæ unitatis assumptum id quod ipse erat voluit nominari."—Leo. Magni Opera, Epist. Decret., lxxxix., p. 160. Fol. Paris, 1662.

["Cum multo utilius multoque sit dignius, ad beatissimi Petri Apostoli gloriam contemplandum, aciem mentis attollere, et hunc diem in illius potissimum veneratione celebrare, qui ab ipso omnium charismatum Fonte tam copiosis est irrigationibus inundatus, ut cum multa solus acceperit, nihil in quemquam sine illius participatione transierit."—Idem, Sermones. In die assump. ejus ad Summi Pontif. Rom. culmen et onus. No. 3, p. 3.]

Clemens of Alexandria, Tertullian, Origen, Cyprian, Firmilian, &c. When any of these mention Peter, they employ respectful, not fulsome, language. The latter is found in Fathers of more recent date, who gave greater latitude to their inventive genius than their predecessors. Hence we infer, that the silence of the first class demands our attention more than the eulogistic strains of the second. Indeed, if we consult the testimonies alleged by the Romanists, who have ransacked all ancient writings to find them, it is strange that they cannot discover any of very remote date; and those upon which they have laid their hands are either commendations of his apostolical office, or his personal merits.

4. Thirdly. These titles are ambiguous, and applicable to any sort of primacy or pre-eminency: so that nothing can be inferred from them that is advantageous to the cause of the Papacy. Cicero terms Socrates "the Prince of philosophers," and Sulpitius, "the Prince of lawyers." Would it not be ridiculous to infer from this that Socrates was a Sovereign among the philosophers, and Sulpitius a King among the lawyers? Tertullus designated Paul πρωτοστατην, "a ringleader or chief of the sect of the Nazarenes." (Acts xxiv. 5.) Did the orator mean that Paul had universal jurisdiction over all Christians? Certainly not. So neither did "Prince of the Apostles," or any equivalent term, in the sense in which it was used by those who assigned it to Peter, import authority over the Apostles, but merely eminence among them in worth, merit, apostolic performances, or, at most, in mere precedence. Such words are to be interpreted by the existing state of things, and not the state of things to be inferred from them.

5. Fourthly. Those who have given these titles to Peter affirm that other Apostles are equal to him. Chrysostom believed that the Apostles were all equal in dignity. The same may be said of Jerome, Cyril,* Cyprian, Augustine, &c. If Leo I., or any ancient Pope, meant any thing more, we may view their opinion as being singular, and proceeding from undue attachment to the See of Rome. Nay, further, should we rigorously interpret the declarations of the Fathers, when they indulge in eulogizing individual Apostles, we might present others as having equal claims to the supremacy, and if not excelling, at least equalling, Peter. The Epistle of Clemens Romanus, an apocryphal but ancient writing, terms James, our Lord's brother, "the Bishop of Bishops."† The Clementine Recognitions designate him "the Prince of Bishops;" Ruffinus, in his translation of Eusebius, "the Bishop of the Apostles." Chrysostom says of him that "he presided over all the Jewish believers." Hesychius,‡ Presbyter of Jerusalem, styles him "the chief Captain of the New Jerusalem, the Captain of the Priests, the Prince of the Apostles, the top among the heads," &c.§

Hesychius calls Andrew "the first-born of the apostolic chair, the first-settled pillar of the church, the Peter before Peter, the foundation of the foundation, the first-fruits of the beginning," &c.* Chrysostom says of John, that "he was a pillar of the churches through the world, he that had the keys of the kingdom of heaven." The patristic eulogies of Paul are still more numerous and hyperbolical: hence the following from Chrysostom:— "Paul was the ringleader and guardian of the choir of all the saints." "He was the tongue, the Teacher, the Apostle, of the world." "He had the whole world committed into his hands, and took care thereof, and had committed to him all men dwelling upon the earth." "He was the light of the churches, the foundation of faith, the pillar and ground of truth." "He had the patronage of the world committed into his hands." "He was better than all men, greater than the Apostles, and surpassing them all." "Nothing was more bright, nothing more illustrious, than he. None was greater than he; yea, none equal to him."† We leave Papists to reconcile this language in reference to Paul with that which they adopt when exhibiting the claims of Peter to the supremacy.

6. Fifthly. Paul is joined with Peter by the Fathers, as possessing the same character, to whom they apply the same titles. Paul, however, possessed no supremacy over the Apostles: if he did, it would destroy that of Peter. Cyril calls Peter and Paul Οι της εκκλησιας προσταται.‡ Augustine, Ambrose, or Maximus, term them "Princes of the churches."§ The Popes Adrian and Agatho, also, in their General Synods, style them "the ringleading Apostles."‖ We proceed to examine the more prominent titles from which Romanists infer the supremacy of Peter.

7. The first that we shall mention is the term "head of the Church," a title which they uniformly ascribe to the Pope. To this we reply, that the epithet belongs only to Christ, and to him alone the Scriptures apply it. (Eph. i. 22; iv. 15.)

8. Pontiffs have assumed to themselves the character "apostolic," and certain flatterers render it. The Rhemist commentators do not hesitate to say (note on Eph. iv. 11) that the Papal dignity is one "continual apostleship."

The terms "Bishop" and "Presbyter" in the apostolic age were common to all Ministers, and that of Apostle was confined to those who were peculiarly such. There are traces, however, o the use of the word in designating those who held the first place among their equals, whether in rank, merit, or esteem. We collect this from Theodoret, who says, "The same persons were anciently called promiscuously both Bishops and Presbyters, whilst those who are now termed Bishops were designated Apostles. But shortly after, the latter was appropriated to such only as were Apostles indeed; and then the name Bishop was given to those who before were

[* Cyril. Opera, Catech. vi., cap. xv. Fol. Edit. Ben., p. 96. Paris, 1720.]

[† "Episcopo Episcoporum."—Concil. Labb., tom. i., epist. i. Clement. Papæ I., ad Jacobum Fratrem Domini, col. 82, E. Paris, 1671.]

[‡ "Novæ Hierusalem summum ducem, Sacerdotum Principem, Apostolorum caput, in capitibus verticem, in lampadibus supersplendentem, et inter astra maxime illustrem."—Photii Bibliotheca, Hesych. Hieros. Presb. in Jacobum., cod. cclxxv., col. 1526. Fol. Rothom., 1653.]

[§ Barrow on the Supremacy. Works, vol. vii., pp. 152, 155. 8vo. edit. Oxford, 1830.

[* "Sacra illa tuba Andreas, primus Apostolorum fœtus, prima Ecclesiæ columna, ante Petrum petra, fundamenti fundamentum, initii primitiæ, vocans antequam vocaretur, adducens antequam adduceretur, nos ad conventum hunc solemniter agendum incitavit."—Photii Bibliotheca, Hesych. in B. Thom., cod. cclxix., col. 1487. Fol. Rothom., 1653.]

[† "Εκει Παυλον οψομεθα μετα Πετρου, και του των ἁγιων χορου κορυφαιον οντα και προστατην."—Chrys. in Rom. xvi. 24. "Ὁ της οικουμενης Αποστολος."—Idem in 1 Cor. ix. 2. "Ἡ γλωττα της οικουμενης, το φως των εκκλησιων, ὁ θεμελιος της πιστεως, ὁ στυλος και ἑδραιωμα της αληθειας."—Idem, &c. See Barrow, Works, vol. vii., p. 156.

[‡ Cyr. Opera, Cat. 6, cap. xv., p. 96. Fol. Paris, 1720.

[§ "Ecclesiarum Principes."—Aug. de Sanct. 27.

[‖ "Κορυφαιος των Αποστολων."—Agathonis P. Epist. ad Const., Concil. Labb., tom. vi., Concil. Const. III., actio iv., col. 632, C. Paris, 1671. Hadrian. P. Conc. Nic. II., actio ii. Conc. Labb., tom. vii., col. 101, B. Paris, 1671.

called Apostles." * Thus he says, "Epaphroditus was the Apostle of the Philippians, and Titus the Apostle of the Cretans, and Timothy the Apostle of the Asiatics." † And this is repeated in several other places of his writings. Theodoret flourished A. D. 424.

The author bearing the name of Ambrose asserts, that all Bishops were called Apostles at first.‡ Amalarius cites the following passage out of the same author:—"They who are now called Bishops were originally called Apostles; but the holy Apostles being dead, they who were ordained after them to govern the churches could not arrive to the excellence of those first; nor had they the testimony of miracles, but were in many other respects inferior to them. Therefore they thought it not decent to assume to themselves the name of Apostles; but dividing them, they left to Presbyters the name of the Presbytery, and they themselves were called Bishops." § Ambrose flourished A. D. 374.

All Metropolitans were anciently called apostolici, "apostolic," which was then no peculiar title of the Church of Rome. So Alcuin tells us, "When the Bishop of a city dies, another is chosen by the Clergy or people: they draw up an instrument, and come to the 'Apostolic' with the elected person, that he may consecrate him their Bishop." ‖ By the Apostolic he means not the Pope, but the Primate or Metropolitan of every province, who had the right of consecration put into his hands by the ecclesiastical usage which obtained in the fourth century. And Petrus de Marca, the learned Archbishop of Paris, allows that this was the use of the word in the sixth century, in the time of Gregorius Imonensis, who was made Bishop about the year 572.* This title was afterward appropriated to the Pope. The use of it, however, proves nothing in favour of his supremacy, more than for that of any other Archbishop.

Those churches are properly apostolic which hold the apostolic faith, and imitate the example of the Apostles. So an ancient Bishop of Rome said, "Woe is me, if I preach not the truth of the Lord which the Apostles preached." † How can the Pope be an Apostle, or have apostolic authority, seeing he preaches none? He cannot show his calling from Christ, as the Apostles, because he challenges the apostolic office by tradition or succession from Peter, and not by command from Christ: he cannot, therefore, be counted an Apostle, or his office an apostleship. For the Apostles ordained only Evangelists and Pastors; and had no authority to constitute new Apostles.

9. Roman Catholics maintain that the Pope is Bishop of the Apostolic See, called, in ecclesiastical style, Sedes Apostolica, and Cathedra Apostolica. To this we reply, that all the great sees, such as Jerusalem, Antioch, Alexandria, Ephesus, Ancyra, Corinth, Thessalonica, Philippi, &c., were called sedes apostolicæ, "apostolic seats." The Bishops of these respective diocesses pretended to no supremacy. Indeed, the title seems to be attached to the sees in general, as deriving their origin and counting their succession from the Apostles. "The Catholic Church," says Augustine, "is propagated and diffused over all the world by the apostolical sees, and the succession of Bishops in them."‡ Sidonius Apollinaris uses the same expression in speaking of a private French Bishop, who sat forty-five years in his apostolical chair.§ The second Nicene Council speaks of those who "occupy the room of the apostolic thrones of the eastern diocess." ‖ Siricius, Bishop of Rome, decrees: "Without the knowledge of the Apostolic See, that is, of the Primate, let no one dare to ordain." ¶ Tertullian, also, in his Pre-

[* "Hic autem Episcopum appellat Presbyterum, sicut epistolam ad Philippenses interpretando ostendimus. Hoc autem ex hoc etiam loco intelligi facile potest. Post leges enim Episcopales, eas scribit quæ Diaconis conveniunt, prætermissis Presbyteris. Sed, ut dixi, eosdem olim vocabant Presbyteros et Episcopos; eos autem qui nunc vocantur Episcopi, Apostolos nominabant. Procedente autem tempore, apostolatus nomen reliquerunt iis qui vere erant Apostoli; Episcopatus autem appellationem imposuerunt iis qui olim appellabantur Apostoli. Ita Philippensium Apostolus erat Epaphroditus. Ita Cretensium Titus, et Asianorum Timotheus Apostoli."—Theodoreti Opera, tom. iii., in Epist. 1 Timoth. cap. iii., pp. 473, 474. Fol. Paris, 1642.]

[† "Episcopos vero appellat Presbyteros. Utrumque enim nomen habebant illo tempore. Idque nos etiam docet Actuum historia. Cum enim dixisset beatus Lucas, divinum Apostolum Ephesiorum Presbyteros accersivisse Miletum, exponit etiam quæ illis dicta fuerant. Attendite, &c.—Eosdemque nominavit Presbyteros et Episcopos. Ita etiam in epistola ad beatum Titum. Ideo reliqui, &c.—Atque hoc etiam loco id manifestum fecit. Episcopis enim conjunxerit Diaconos, nulla de Presbyteris facta mentione. Præsertim cum fieri non posset ut multi Episcopi essent unius civitatis Pastores: ut liquido pateat Presbyteros eos fuisse quos nominavit Episcopos."—Idem, Phil. i. 1.]

["Multa de hoc præclara dixit, qui non solum fratrem, sed etiam co-operatorem et commilitonem appellavit. Eum autem ipsorum Apostolum vocavit, ut cui esset illorum cura concredita. Ut clarum sit sub eo fuisse eos qui in principio dicti sunt Episcopi, Presbyterorum scilicet in ordine constituti. Ministrum vero ipsum dixit necessitatis, quia pecunias ab his missas attulerat. Innuit autem hanc illos debere subventionem, non secus ac ministri publici illationes."—Idem, Phil. ii. 25.]

[‡ "Apostoli Episcopi sunt."—Ambros. Opera, tom. iii., Comment. in Epist. ad Ephes., cap. iv., v. 11, p. 504, H. Fol. Paris, 1661.]

[§ "Illa enim quæ de Episcopo in anterioribus dixit etiam et de illis dicit, qui nunc nominantur Presbyteri, eo quod antiquis temporibus utrisque nominibus vocabantur Presbyteri.—Et in sequentibus, beatis vero Apostolis decedentibus, illi qui post illos ordinati sunt ut præessent ecclesiis illis primis exæquari non poterant, neque miraculorum testimonium par illis habere, sed et in multis aliis inferiores illis esse videbantur: grave existimaverunt Apostolorum sibi vendicare nuncupationem; diviserunt ergo nomina ipsa, et ab eisdem Presbyteris Presbyterii nomen reliquerunt. Alii vero Episcopi sunt nuncupati."—Amalarii Fortun. Episc. Treuerens. De Offic. Eccles., lib. ii., cap. xiii., De Presbyt. Magn. Biblioth. Vet. Patr., tom. ix., p. 337, G. Fol. Colon., 1618.]

[‖ "Cum Episcopus civitatis fuerit defunctus, eligitur alius a Clero seu populo, fitque decretum ab illis, et veniunt ad Apostolicum cum suo electo, ut eis consecret Episcopum."—Beati Flacci Albini seu Alcuini Opera, tom. ii., De Div. Officiis, cap. xxxvii., p. 492. Fol. 1777.

[* "Sub Karolo dein Magno et Ludovico Pio, forma eadem observata est. Quippe tum post electionem Cleri et populi, ut docet Alcuinus, decretum electionis ad Metropolitanum deferebatur, ut electum consecraret. 'Cum Episcopus civitatis,' inquit Alcuinus, 'fuerit defunctus, eligitur alius a Clero seu populo, fitque decretum ab illis; et veniunt ad APOSTOLICUM cum suo electo deferente secum suggestionem, hoc est, rogatorias literas, ut eis consecret Episcopum.' Ceterum heic observandus est modus loquendi illarum tempestatum, quibus licebat Metropolitano tribuere titulum Apostolici; cujus moris initia referenda sunt ad tempora Gregorii Turonensis. Sequens ætas abstinuit ab illa simplicitate, et deinceps Apostolici titulus soli Romano Pontifici tributus est ab autoribus."—Petri de Marca Dissert. de Concord. Sacerdot. et Imperii, lib. vi., cap. iii., sect. iii., p. 181. Paris, 1669.]

[† "Væ mihi est, si veritatem Domini mei, quam Apostoli prædicarunt, prædicare neglexero."—P. Agatho ad Constant., Concil. Labb., tom. vi., col. 630, et seq. Paris, 1671.

[‡ "Videtis certe multos præcisos a radice Christianæ societatis, quæ per sedes Apostolorum et successiones Episcoporum certa per orbem propagatione diffunditur."—August. Opera, tom. ii., ad Madaurenses, epist. ccxxxii. alias xlii., col. 843, E. Edit. Bened. Paris, 1679.]

§ Sidonii Apollin. Opera, Epist., lib. vi., ep. 1. Fol. Mediol., 1498.

‖ "Retinent locum apostolicorum thronorum orientalis diœceseos."—Conc. Labb., tom. vii., Concil. Nicæn. ii., Act i., col. 39, et seq. Paris, 1671.

¶ "Extra conscientiam sedis apostolicæ, hoc est, primatis, nemo audeat ordinare."—P. Siricius, Ep. 4, cap. 1, Concil. Labb., tom. ii. col. 1029, C. Paris, 1671.

scriptions, speaks of the seats of the Apostles, as existing at Corinth, Philippi, &c.* The Bishop of Rome, therefore, in the early ages, was no more apostolic than other Bishops of that period.

10. Papists say that the Bishop of Rome is Peter's successor, and on this they ground his supremacy. All Bishops were styled successors of the Apostles in the times immediately succeeding the apostolic age. So Cyprian, Firmilian, and the Bishops in the Council of Carthage, call themselves.† Jerome speaks in the same style: "Wheresoever a Bishop is, whether at Rome or Eugubium, at Constantinople or at Rhegium, at Alexandria or at Tanis, they are all of equal merit; their priesthood is the same; they are all successors to the Apostles."‡ And both he and Augustine apply Psalm xliv. to the Bishops, as sons of the Apostles, and Princes and Fathers of the Church.§

11. At an early period of the Church, the titles given to the chief Ministers began to savour much of that worldly spirit which terminated in giving the name Lords, to Bishops, and finally in applying the title "Prince," or "supreme," to the Prelate of Rome: we know not what terms can express it more strongly. So Optatus calls "Bishops, the very heads and Princes of all."‖ And there are several passages in Jerome, which, to distinguish them from secular Princes, recognise them as Principes Ecclesiæ, "Princes of the Church;" applying to them that prophecy of Isaiah lx. 17, which, according to his translation, is, "I will make thy Princes peace, and thy Bishops righteousness."¶ Upon this last, he has this observation: "That the majesty of the holy Scripture is to be admired; it terms those who were to be Bishops in future ages 'Princes.'" In the Greek writers they are occasionally called αρχοντες εκκλησιων, "Governors" or "Princes of the churches." Thus the name of "Prince" was formerly common to all the principal Pastors: in process of time, it was applied solely to the Pope, who is called "Prince of the Apostles," a title as unfounded in antiquity, as it is unscriptural in its application to the Pope or any other Ecclesiastic.

12. All Bishops and Pastors may properly be styled Vicars of Christ. St. Paul claimed this dignity. (2 Cor. ii. 10; v. 20.) Pastors and Ministers in the ancient church were called the Vicars of Christ. The author of the Questions, under the name of Augustin, says, "Every Bishop, or principal Pastor, is the Vicar of God."† Cyprian utters the same sentiment in several of his epistles. "That Priest properly fills the place of Christ, who imitates that which Christ did."‡ This language of Cyprian applies to every Pastor in the world, as Rigaltius, his annotator, candidly acknowledges. The Fathers of Trent, also, who say they were inspired by the Holy Ghost,§ inform us, that "Christ, before his ascension, left all Priests his Vicars, to whom, as to Presidents and Judges, all mortal sins were to be confessed."‖ It is evident that, by the term Sacerdotes, all Bishops and Priests are implied; inasmuch as our Saviour included all, as Papists say, who had power to absolve, which includes Priests and Bishops of every grade. This is also confirmed by the Index of the Council; in which we find the words Sacerdotes sunt Vicarii Christi, referring to the session just cited.

In consequence of his Vicarship, Innocent IV., in the Council at Lyons, excommunicated and deposed the Emperor Frederick. "Seeing we are Christ's Vicar on earth, and it was said to us in the person of Peter, 'Whatsoever ye shall bind,' &c., we declare the aforesaid Prince deprived of his dignity and honour; we absolve his subjects from all oaths of allegiance, and excommunicate all who show him any favour, or obey him as Emperor."¶ The Trent Catechism inculcates the same principle: "As the successor of St. Peter, and the true and legitimate Vicar of Jesus Christ, the Pope presides over the universal

[* "Age jam, qui voles curiositatem melius exercere, in negotio salutis tuæ, percurre ecclesias apostolicas, apud quas ipsæ adhuc cathedræ Apostolorum suis locis præsidentur, apud quas authenticæ literæ eorum recitantur, sonantes vocem, repræsentantes faciem. Proxima est tibi Achaia? habes Corinthum. Si non longe es a Macedonia, habes Philippos. Si potes in Asiam tendere, habes Ephesum. Si autem Italiæ adjiceris, habes Romam: unde nobis quoque autoritas præsto est statuta."—Tertull. Opera, tom. ii., De Præscript. Hæret., cap. xxxvi., p. 473. 8vo. Wirceb., 1781.]

[† "Nec hæc jacto, sed dolens profero, cum te judicem Dei constituas et Christi, qui dicit ad Apostolos ac per hoc ad omnes præpositos, qui Apostolis Vicaria ordinatione succedunt."—Cypriani Opera, Epist. lxviii., Ad Florentium Pupianum, p. 106. 8vo. Edit. Paris, 1836. "Inde per temporum et successionum vices Episcoporum ordinatio et Ecclesiæ ratio decurrit, ut ecclesia super Episcopos constituatur, et omnis actus ecclesiæ per eosdem præpositos gubernetur."—Idem, Epist. xxvi., Ad Lapsum, p. 33. "Potestas ergo peccatorum remittendorum Apostolis data est, et ecclesiis quas illi a Christo missi constituerunt, et Episcopis qui eis ordinatione Vicaria successerunt."—Idem, Epist. lxxiv., Ad Firmilianum Cyprianum, p. 130. "Confessus Claras a Mascula dixit: 'Manifesta est sententia Domini nostri Jesu Christi Apostolos suos mittentis et ipsis solis potestatem a Patre sibi datam permittentis, quibus nos successimus, eadem potestate ecclesiam Domini gubernantes et credentium fidei baptizantes.'"—Conc. Labb., tom. i., Conc. Carth. III., can. lxxix., col. 795, D. Paris, 1671.]

[‡ "Ubiquumque fuerit Episcopus, sive Romæ, sive Eugubii, sive Constantinopoli, sive Rhegii, sive Alexandriæ, sive Tanis, ejusdem meriti, ejusdem est et sacerdotii. Potentia divitiarum, et paupertatis humilitas, vel sublimiorem vel inferiorem Episcopum non facit. Ceterum omnes Apostolorum successores sunt."—Hieron. Opera, tom. iv., Ad Evang. Epist. ci., col. 803. Ed. Ben. Paris, 1686.]

[§ "Hæc est catholica Ecclesia: filii ejus constituti sunt Principes super omnem terram, filii ejus constituti sunt pro patribus. Agnoscant qui præcisi sunt, veniant ad unitatem, adducantur in templum regis. Templum suum Deus ubique collocavit, fundamenta Prophetarum et Apostolorum ubique firmavit. Filios genuit Ecclesiæ, constituit eos pro patribus suis Principes super omnem terram."—August. Opera, tom. iv., Enar. in Psal. xliv. 16, col. 398, B. Ed. Ben. Paris, 1681.]

[‖ "Ipsi apices et Principes omnium Episcopi."—Optat. Opera, De Schism. Donat., lib. i., p. 15. Fol. Paris, 1679.

[¶ "In quo Scripturæ sanctæ admiranda majestas, quod Principes futuros Ecclesiæ Episcopos nominavit, quorum omnis visitatio in pace est, et vocabulum dignitatis in justitia."—Hieron. Opera, tom. iii., Comment. in Isai. cap. lx., col. 453. Ed. Ben. Fol. Paris, 1704.]

* "Antistitem Dei puriorem ceteris esse oportet. Est enim Vicarius ejus."—Aug. Quæst. Vet. et Nov. Test., cap. 127.

† "Ille Sacerdos vice Christi vere fungitur qui id quod Christus fecit imitatur."—Cyp. Opera, ad Cæcilium, Epist. lxii., p. 95. 8vo. Paris, 1836.

[‡ "Itaque sancta ipsa Synodus a Spiritu Sancto, qui Spiritus est sapientiæ et intellectus, Spiritus consilii et pietatis, edocta, atque ipsius Ecclesiæ judicium et consuetudinem secuta, declarat, ac docet, nullo divino præcepto laicos, et Clericos non conficientes, obligari ad eucharistiæ sacramentum sub utraque specie sumendum," &c.—Canon. et Decret. Concil. Trident., sess. xxi.; De Communione, cap. i. Fol. Romæ, 1564.]

§ "Dominus noster Jesus Christus e terris ascensurus ad cœlos, Sacerdotes sui ipsius Vicarios reliquit tamquam præsides et judices, ad quos omnia mortalia crimina deferantur, in quæ Christi fideles ceciderint."—Idem, sess. xxiv.; De Pœnit., cap. v.

[‖ "Cum Jesu Christi vices licet immeriti teneamus in terris, nobisque in beati Petri Apostoli persona sit dictum, Quodcunque, &c., memoratum Principem, qui se imperio et regnis omnique honore ac dignitate reddidit tam indignum, quique propter suas iniquitates a Deo ne regnet vel imperet est abjectus, suis ligatum peccatis et abjectum, omnique honore et dignitate privatum a Domino ostendimus, denunciamus, ac nihilo minus sententiando privamus, omnes, qui ei juramento fidelitatis tenentur adstricti, a juramento hujusmodi perpetuo absolventes."—Conc. Labb., tom. xi., pars i.; Conc. Lugd. I., col. 644, B. Paris, 1671.]

church, as the Father and Governor of all the faithful."* Alexander VI., as Vicar of Christ, ceded the West Indies to the King of Spain.†

13. The name "Pope," from παπα, "father," is claimed exclusively by the Bishop of Rome; and from this application of it, his supremacy has been inferred. This name, however, was given indifferently to Bishops of former times, especially to those who were of most renown. Cyprian, Epiphanius, and Athanasius, were called Papæ, or "Popes." Augustine saluted Aurelius, President of the sixth General Council of Carthage, by the name of Pope.‡ Sophronius, Bishop of Jerusalem, writing to Sergius, Patriarch of Constantinople, called him, "Most blessed and honourable Pope."§ The sixth Council of Carthage termed Aurelius, Bishop of that city, sanctum Papam, or "holy Pope."‖ Eutyches, who was but a Priest and an Abbot, is styled Papa, or "Pope."¶ Many instances are recorded in Bingham, who endeavours to prove that every Bishop was formerly called Papa, or "Pope."

Baronius, a zealous asserter of the supremacy, or monarchy, of the Pope over Kings and Emperors, confessed, that anciently, every venerable Presbyter was called Papa. Afterward the term became common to all Bishops, though specially attaching itself to the Bishop of Rome. He adds, that the name Papa continued common to the Bishops for eight hundred and fifty years, till Hildebrand, in a Council at Rome, held in the year 1073, decreed that there should be but one Pope in the whole world.†† Hildebrand, therefore, appropriated the cognomen to himself and to his see, a term which had been previously given to Presbyters and Bishops, as well as to the Prelate of Rome. How, then, we ask, can this name become an argument for the supremacy of the Pontiff, which was no ground of such an assumption in other Bishops, who had this name applied to them on equal authority with that of Rome? Our opponents reason no better when they assert, that "the Pope being Christ's Vicar, and called Pope, has a supremacy over the world," when all Bishops are equally the Vicars of Christ, and were, in point of fact, anciently called Popes.

It has been objected, that "though the term Pope was given to other Prelates, yet the Bishop of Rome is called by that title absolutely, without any addition; others add their own name." Jerome, writing to Theophilus, Bishop of Alexandria, may reply: "Do your endeavour, most beloved and blessed Pope." Adnitere, Papa amantissime et beatissime. Again, it is objected, that "the Bishop of Rome alone, and none other, has been called universal Pope." The proud name, "universal," as we read in the canon law, was not, in the better ages of the Church, attributed to, but rather condemned by, the Bishops of Rome; Gregory reproved Eulogius, Bishop of Alexandria, who thus addressed him.* But after ambition invaded the Church, other Patriarchs were called by that name. Cyrus, Patriarch of Alexandria, calleth Sergius, Patriarch of Constantinople, "thrice blessed Pastor of Pastors, and Father of Fathers, the universal Patriarch."† Again, it is stated, that the "Pope

* Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 320. 8vo. edit. Dublin, 1829.

† Magn. Bullar. Rom. tom. i., pp. 454, 455, sect. vi., datum die 4. Maii, 1493. Fol. Luxemb., 1727.

[‡ "Domino beatissimo et venerabiliter suscipiendo, sincerissimeque carissimo fratri, et consacerdoti Papæ Aurelio, Alypius et Augustinus in Domino salutem."—August. Opera, tom. ii.; Epist. ad Aurelium, Epist. xli. alias lxxvii., col. 87, C. Edit. Ben. Paris, 1679.]

[§ "Papæ! Papæ beatissimi! quam mihi nunc amabilis quies, et multo quam pridem amabilior, ex quo incurioso silentio in causarum turbam decidi, et terrenis quibusdam fluctibus opprimor! Papæ! Deo honorabiles," &c.—Conc. Labb., tom. vi.; Const. Conc. iii., actio xi., col. 852, D. Paris, 1671.]

[‖ "Unde petimus Venerationem tuam, sancte Papa Aureli, ut quia hoc authenticum Concilium Nicænum in urbe dicitur esse Constantinopolitana, aliquos cum scriptis suæ Sanctitatis mittere digneris."—Conc. Labb., tom. ii.; Conc. Carthag. vi., capit. iv., col. 1590, D. Paris, 1671.]

¶ Synod. Constantinop., sub Flaviano.

 Bingham's Antiquities of the Christian Church, book ii., chap. ii., sect. vii., "Every Bishop was anciently called Papa, 'father,' or 'Pope,'" vol. i., pp. 72, 73. Straker's edit. London, 1840.

[†† "Putarunt nonnulli hanc vocem, Papa, complexam esse ex duabus dictionibus, ut idem sit PA. PA., quod Pater Patrum; meritoque Romano tantum Pontifici tribui solitam PA., pro patre positum in Saliari carmine, testatur Festus. Ne in his refellendis multum immorer; sciendum est, quod etsi ejusmodi titulus, Pater Patrum, tribui consuevit Rom. Pontifici, ut totius Catholicæ Ecclesiæ Episcopo; nihilominus Papæ nomen diversum ab eo esse, et accipi solitum a majoribus, exempla antiquarum inscriptionum facile monstrant; quorum unum tantum satis sit hic recitare. Extat ex Concilio provinciali Epiri ad Hormisdam Papam Synodalis epistola scripta, cujus ejusmodi est inscriptio: 'Synodus veteris Epiri, Johannes, Matthæus, Constantinus, &c., domino nostro per cuncta sanctissimo et beatissimo Patri Patrum, comministro, ac Principi Episcoporum, Hormisdæ Papæ.' Incipit epistola: 'Si dignus præmiis,' &c. Exscripsimus eam ex codice manuscript. Vaticano, integramque exhibemus in Annal. Eccles. simulque alias, in quibus eadem habetur nomenclatura. Cum itaque idem Hormisda et Pater Patrum, et Papa, una eademque inscriptione dictus reperiatur; plane constat diversæ significationis esse utramque vocem. Porro germana est ejus interpretatio, ut a Græca voce παππας, id est, pater, descendat. Licet alii deducant a παππος, id est, avus. At vero in prima significatione accipi consuevisse vidimus; eoque sensu accepta (ut scribit Walfridus Strabo de Reb. Eccles. cap. vii.) transiit in dignitatis nomen, ut Clerici venerandi eodem nomine appellarentur: postea tamen nomen illud cœpit esse peculiare Episcoporum, ut iidem Papæ dicerentur. Sunt de his innumera exempla apud Cyprianum, Hieronymum, Augustinum, Rufinum, Prudentium, Sulpitium Severum, Sidonium Apollinarem, Venantium Fortunatum, et novissime apud sanctum Eulogium Cordubensem, qui floruit anno Domini 850. Usque enim ad illud tempus id nomen commune fuit omnibus Episcopis, licet frequentius ac peculiarius tribui consuevisset Romano Pontifici: idque quisque facile observare poterit ex epistolis Cassiodori. Ex his itaque erroris arguitur Nicephorus, lib. xiv., cap. xxxiv., dum ait Cælestinum Romanum Pontificem concessisse ex privilegio Cyrillo Episcopo Alexandrino a se constituto legato in S.S. Concilio œcumenico Ephesino, ut Papa diceretur, ac uteretur mitra. Nam si Papæ nomen tunc temporis (ut patet) commune erat omnibus Episcopis, quidnam eo nomine contulit Cælestinus Cyrillo? Non sic quod Theodorus Balf. in Nomocan. Photii tit. viii., cap. i., ubi ait a Cælestino concessum esse Cyrillo, ut in sacris solemnibus, more Romani Pontificis, phrygio uteretur, quo quidem (ut ait) ex eo tempore semper usi sunt Episcopi Alexandrini. Quidnam vero phrygium esset, fusius disseremus in nostris Annalibus, cum agemus de Concilio Ephesino, deque litteris Cælestini ad Cyrillum datis. Sed quod ad Papæ nomen pertinet, cum futuris temporibus obtinuisset communis usus, ut Papæ nomen tantummodo Romano tribueretur Pontifici; et schismatici illud sibi in odium ejusdem Romani Præsulis fastu superbo vindicarent, aliaque non concessa præsumerent; Gregorius Septimus Papa anno a Christo Domino 1073, sui vero Pontificatus anno tertio, sexto Kal. Martii, Indict. xiii., habuit Romæ Synodum adversus schismaticos, ubi statuit inter alia plura, ut Papæ nomen unicum esset in universo orbe Christiano, nec liceret alicui seipsum vel alium eo nomine appellare. Hæc in registro epistolarum Gregorii Septimi, quod asservatur in Biblioth. Vaticana, ubi canones ejus Synodi scripti habentur. Servant ad ipsum Græci, ut nomine Papæ Romanum Pontificem intelligant, ut ex Nicetæ Chroniatæ scriptis apparet."—Baronii Martyrol. Roman. die x. Jan. not. c., pp. 33, 34. 4to. Coloniæ, 1603.]

[* "Ecce in præfatione epistolæ, quam ad meipsum, qui prohibui, direxistis, superbæ appellationis verbum, universalem me Papam dicentes, imprimere curastis. Quod, peto, dulcissima mihi Sanctitas vestra ultra non faciat: quia vobis subtrahitur, quod alteri plus, quam ratio exigit, præbetur. Si enim universalem me Papam vestra Sanctitas dicit, negat se hoc esse, quod me fatetur universum. Sed absit hoc. Recedant verba, quæ vanitatem inflant et charitatem vulnerant."—Corp. Jur. Can. a Pithœo, tom. i., distinct. xcix., cap. v., p. 122. Fol. Paris, 1695.]

[† "Deo honorabili meo Domino, benigno Principi Pastorum, Patri Patrum, universali Patriarchæ, Sergio, a Cyro humili vestro."—Conc. Labb., tom. vi.; Conc. Constan. III., act. xiii., col. 949, C. Paris, 1671.]

has always been called Pope by others; but he himself never called any by that name." Be that as it may, it was only a proof of the Pontiff's pride, as far as it could then be practised. We find a different custom obtaining even at Rome. For, after the death of Fabian, the Presbytery of Rome wrote to Cyprian, calling him "most blessed and glorious Pope," as may be seen in their epistle to Cyprian.

In like manner, those two titles of the Pope, "Most blessed and holy Father," Beatissimus et sanctissimus Pater, were anciently used in addresses to Bishops. Prosper, in his epistle to Augustine, twice calls him, "Lord, most blessed Pope," Dominum beatissimum Papam. Jerome calls Epiphanius, Beatum Papam, "Blessed Pope." This was the style of the Patriarch of Constantinople: "To the most holy and blessed universal John, Patriarch of Constantinople."* Cornelius, Bishop of Rome, writing to Rufus, a Bishop, says, "These and other things which we know to be necessary, we would not deny your Holiness."† Bishops were also called Pater Patrum, "Father of Fathers," and Episcopus Episcoporum, "Bishop of Bishops." These titles were never kindly received by the African churches, because the Bishop of Rome began to tyrannize over them in order to establish an authority over their neighbours. The Council held under Cyprian decreed, "Neither does any of us constitute himself Bishop of Bishops, or force his colleagues, by a tyrannical tenor, to the necessity of obeying."‡ The third Council of Carthage, in Augustine's time, asserted the same thing. Such was the feeling of the African church concerning the titles which some were assuming at that day, which assumption became the basis of an exclusive application of them ultimately to the Roman Pontiff.

14. Romanists call the Pope "Prince," Princeps, or Primus. If this be intended to signify chief or sovereign power, it is applicable, strictly speaking, to Christ alone, (1 Peter v. 4,) and, therefore, such titles belong not to men. Accordingly, the third Council of Carthage decreed: "Let not the Bishop of the first See be called the Prince of Priests, or chief Priest, but only Bishop of the first See."§ From another it appears that the canons of this Council were confirmed by Boniface, Bishop of Rome. This was received by the sixth General Synod in Trullo. The above-named canon is also approved by the decrees of the Papacy:‖ how, then, can the latter refuse to admit it?

In ancient times, this title of summus, or "supreme," was given to all Bishops, when men began to lose sight of apostolic simplicity. Clemens Romanus, in a good sense, calls every Pastor, or every Minister and Bishop, in charge of a flock or church, Αρχιερευς, Summus Sacerdos, or "Chief Priest."¶ Ruffinus calls Chromatius, Pontificem Maximum, "Chief Pontiff." Anacletus, Bishop of Rome, in his second epistle, writes: "The high Priests, that is, Bishops, are to be judged of God." *Summi Sacerdotes, id est, Episcopi, a Deo judicandi sunt. Besides, the title, summum sacerdotium, "the high priesthood," is attributed by Fabian, Bishop of Rome, to all Ministers of the Gospel, whether Bishops or Presbyters. Indeed, the people of God in Scripture are called βασιλειον ἱερατευμα, "a royal priesthood." Consequently, the assumption of this designation by the Pontiff is ludicrous in the extreme.

The origin of these epithets is plainly this: The Pastors in charge of flocks, embracing laity, Deacons, and Presbyters, were called Summi Sacerdotes, Pontifices Maximi, and Principes Sacerdotum, "Chief Priests," "Chief Pontiffs," "Princes of the Priests." The author under the name of Ambrose gives the Bishop or presiding Minister the name of "Chief Priest," and "Chief of the Priests."† The term Summus Sacerdos, "Chief Priest," is also adopted by Jerome as of common use. Speaking of himself, he says, "In the opinion of all men I was thought worthy of the high priesthood;"‡ and when Tertullian§ gives the title of Pontifex Maximus to the Bishop of Rome, he does him no greater honour than that which in those days was rendered to every Bishop, or chief Pastor.

15. From the preceding we learn, that those honorary titles given to the Pope or his see, (namely, "Head," "Apostolic," "Apostolic Seat," "Successor of Peter," "Vicar of Christ," "Pope," "Chief Pontiff," "Universal Father," &c.,) having been given to thousands besides the Pope, who never assumed any such supremacy, cannot establish the point in question. It is true, that in modern times, titles have been appropriated to the Bishop of Rome, and made use of to amuse and deceive the ignorant, to cover and to give plausibility to new errors, and employed as arguments to prove the Pope's supremacy; yet it is evident that all such arguments are impertinent, inconclusive, and ridiculous. Hence they determine nothing, unless it be to show that those who gravely employ them are destitute of better arguments; and therefore a cause requiring such support must be untenable and unsound.

16. When the testimony of the Fathers cannot be adduced in favour of the supremacy by legitimate interpretation,—corruption, false translations, and perverted exposition, have been resorted to in the most disgraceful manner. Chrysostom had said, that "the power of the keys was not given to Peter only, but to the rest of the Apostles also;" but Peter Possinus changes the word Apostles for that of successors, and reads it thus: "The power of the keys was not given only to Peter and his successors."‖ In the Epistle of Leo to the Bishops of France, concerning the condemnation of Dioscorus in the Council of Chalcedon, these words occur in the Latin copies: Unde sanctissimus et beatissimus Papa, caput

* "Sanctissimo atque beatissimo œcumenico Patriarchæ Johanni Constantinopol.," &c.—Conc. Constantinop. v., act. 1.

† "Hæc et alia quæ necessaria fore cognoverimus, tuæ Sanctitati non velimus denegare."—Conc. Labb., tom. i.; Cornel. P. Epis. ii. ad Rufum., cap. i., col. 671, D. Paris, 1671.

‡ "Neque enim quisquam nostrum Episcopum se Episcoporum constituit, aut tyrannico tenore ad obsequendi necessitatem collegas suos adigit."—Concil. Carthag., apud Cyprianum.

§ "Primæ Sedis Episcopus non appelletur Princeps Sacerdotum, vel summus Sacerdos, aut aliquid sed tantum primæ Sedis Episcopus."—Conc. Carthag. iii., can. 26, Conc. Labb., tom. ii., col. 1171. B. Paris, 1671.

‖ Corp. Jur. Canon., tom. i., dist. 99, cap. 3.

¶ Clement. Rom. Epist. ad Corinth., cap. xxxvi., p. 85. 12mo. London, 1687.

* Conc. Labb., tom. i., Anacleti Papæ epist. ii., col. 521, C. Paris, 1671.

† "In Episcopo omnes ordines sunt, quia primus Sacerdos est, hoc est, Princeps est Sacerdotum."—Ambros. Opera, tom. iii., Comment. in Epist ad Ephes., cap. iv., col. 504, K. Paris, 1661.

‡ "Omnium pene judicio dignus summo sacerdotio decernebar."—Hieron. Opera, tom. ii., Epist. ad Asellam, epist. xxviii. alias xcix., col. 56. Edit. Ben. Fol. Paris, 1706.

§ Tertull. Opera, tom. ii., De Pudicit., cap. i., p. 185. 8vo. Wirceb., 1781.

[‖ "Nec vero id Petro uni successoribusque ejus reservatum: sed et aliis communicatum discipulis, quando illis dictum est: 'Quorum remiseritis peccata remittuntur eis, et quorum retinueritis retenta sunt.'"—Symbol. Græc. Patrum in Matt. collatæ a Balth. Corderio et Petro Possino, tom. i., p. 232. Fol. Tolosæ, 1646.]

universalis ecclesiæ, "The most holy and most blessed Pope Leo, head of the universal church;" where these words, "head of the universal church," are not in the Greek copies, as De Marca, a distinguished Roman Catholic Bishop, acknowledges.* To show how unpalatable the production of De Marca was to the Pope, it is enough to say that the work of this great man was condemned by the Inquisitors, and forbidden to be read, printed, or possessed by any.†

He who attentively reads the Latin versions of the Greek Councils, Fathers, and other authorities, may find many such frauds employed to maintain Papal opinions. The Expurgatorial Indices are authentic testimonies to convict the Papacy of concealing the truth. This is not all: so recklessly are the Papists set upon defending the interests of Rome, that, to accomplish it, they speak blasphemously even of Christ himself. Campegius, in his work, "On the Power of the Pope," addressing Paul IV., says, "Christ had not been a diligent Father of his family, if he had not left for the benefit of his church some one who should fill his place on earth;" ‡ and cites Innocent and Aquinas to justify the assertion. Albertus Pighius remarks, that "Christ had been wanting to his church, nor would he have provided for its necessities, if he had not constituted such a Monarch and Judge." § Peter Bertrand, the Canonist, if possible, exceeds the former. He declares, that "Christ, while in the world, could, by natural right, pronounce sentence of deposition and damnation on the Emperor or on any other; and for the same reason his Vicar also can do it: for our Lord would not appear to have been discreet, if he had not left one such single Vicar behind him. But that Vicar was Peter; and the same is to be said concerning his successors." ‖ This impious gloss is approved by Gregory XIII.¶

IV. Arguments against the supremacy of Peter.

1. For this authority of the Pontiff, which is claimed as a fundamental article of the Christian faith, it is necessary that a direct and unequivocal commission from God, its author, should be given, so that none might doubt its truth. This was requisite, not only for the Apostles, to warrant their obedience, but also ours; because it is made the foundation of a duty which cannot be discharged without a clear revelation of the will of God in Scripture. That was a reasonable demand which was made from our Saviour, "Tell us by what authority doest thou these things? or who is he that gave thee this authority?" (Luke xx. 2.) Our Lord often avowed the reasonableness of this, declaring, that if by his doctrine and works he had not vouched the divine character of his authority, it had been no sin to disbelieve or reject him. (John v. 31, 36: x. 25, 37; xv. 22, 24.) For the supremacy of Peter no such commission is extant in Scripture; but, on the contrary, many indisputable testimonies of holy writ are against it.

2. There is no express mention of this dogma in the sacred writings. If such an important office were instituted by Christ, it is strange that in the Evangelists and apostolic documents, wherein many things of less magnitude are recorded, there should be no mention of it. The time when Peter was invested with that authority; the manner and circumstances of his instalment; the nature, regulations, and limits of such an office, were certainly deserving of note. The New-Testament writers could have narrated circumstantially a topic of such great consequence as the settlement of a Monarch in the church, and a sovereign of the Apostolical College, especially if it were an article of the Christian faith, the denial of which would incur damnation. It is not probable that Luke would have omitted the narrative, who "had attained a perfect understanding of all things, and had undertaken to write in order the things that were surely believed among Christians." (Luke i. 1.)

3. No time is assigned for the institution of Peter's supremacy. No such power was conferred on him when he was constituted an Apostle, or during any period of our Saviour's life. If it were, it was done so privately, that neither Peter nor the other Apostles were aware of it. Had they known it, they would not have contended about this superiority, as it is evident they did; and though our Lord, before his passion, taught his Apostles important duties, such as the maintenance of peace, charity, humility, and unity, yet he said nothing to them of paying due obedience to Peter; nor did he caution him to beware of lording it over his brethren. (Mark ix. 50; John xiii. 14, 34; xv. 12; xvii. 21.) After his resurrection, our Lord delivered various instructions to his Apostles; but made no peculiar grant to Peter. (Matt. xxviii. 19; Mark xvi. 15; Luke xxiv. 49; John xx. 21; Acts i. 2.) The claims drawn from the charge, "Feed my sheep," are altogether groundless.

4. Such a power, had it been conferred, would have been indicated by some title or name. If Peter had been appointed sovereign of the Apostolic Senate, his office would have been distinct from the common office of Apostle; as the office of King or President is distinct from that of subject or citizen. It would doubtless have been signified by some specific name or title, characterizing and distinguishing it from others; such as Arch-Apostle, Arch-Pastor, High-Priest, Sovereign Pontiff, Pope, His Holiness, or Vicar of Christ. By this it would have appeared that there was such an officer, what the nature of the office was, and what respect and obedience were due to the incumbent. But no such name or title was ever assumed by Peter, attributed to him by others, or recorded concerning him in history; the name of an Apostle being all the honour he pretended to claim, or to have received.

5. There was no office superior to that of an Apostle known to the primitive church. This is evident from Scripture. "He gave some, Apostles; and some, Prophets; and some, Evangelists; and some, Pastors and Teachers." (Eph. iv. 11.) God hath set in his church, "first, Apostles; secondarily, Prophets; thirdly, Teachers," &c. (1 Cor. xii. 28.) Why not first a Pope, a Uni-

[* "Absunt a contextu Græco verba illa: Caput universalis ecclesiæ. Et ista, Apostoli Petri præditus dignitate."—Petrus de Marca, De Concord. Sacerdot. et Imper., tom. ii., lib. v., cap. x., sect. 2. Fol. Paris, 1663. (Ed. Mus. Brit.)]

† Index Libr. Prohib., Alexandri VII. jussu, editus Romæ, A.D. 1664.

‡ "Non fuisset Christus diligens Paterfamilias, si non dimisisset in terra aliquem qui vice sua posset subvenire necessitatibus ecclesiæ; cujus sententiæ fuit etiam S. Thomas, lib. iv., Contra Gentes, cap. lxxiv."—Campeg. de Potest. Rom. Pontif., cap. i., sect. iii., p. 2. 8vo. Venet., 1555.

§ "Christus ecclesiæ defuisset, nec de necessariis prospexisset, nisi Monarcham aliquem et Judicem constituisset."—Albert. Pigh., controv. iii., fol. 70—72.

‖ "Christus dum fuit in mundo, de jure naturali, in Imperatorem et quoscumque alios depositionis sententias ferre potuisset, et damnationis; et eadem ratione et Vicarius ejus potest. Nam non videretur Dominus discretus fuisse, nisi unicum post se talem Vicarium reliquisset. Fuit autem iste Vicarius Petrus; et idem dicendum est de successoribus Petri."—Petrus Bertrandus, in Addit. ad Glossas ad caput, Unam Sanctam, 1. De Major. et Obed. Extrav. Commun. Corp. Juris Canon., tom. ii., lib. i., tit. viii. 1695.

¶ Vide Bullam Greg. XIII., dat. Rom., 1 Julii, A.D. 1580, præfixam Corp. Juris Canon. Paris, 1612, et 1618.]

versal Pastor, an Œcumenical Judge, a Vicar of Christ, a Head of the catholic church? Could St. Paul be so ignorant, envious, or negligent, as to evade, without any recognition, the supreme officer, if such an one had existed? Suppose a person undertake to enumerate the officers in any state or republic, would he not act strangely if he overlooked the King, President, or Governor? The omission would lead an impartial person to conclude, that such an officer was unknown. We cannot suppose that St. Paul omitted the chief Minister; indeed, he expressly says πρωτον, "first of all," or, in the first place, "Apostles." Peter, therefore, was no greater than an Apostle; and as such, had no supreme command over his brethren.

6. Our Lord often declares against this power, by prohibiting his Apostles assuming or admitting such a superiority one over the other. St. Luke informs us, "there was a strife among them, which of them should be accounted the greatest," (Luke xxii. 24,) or who had the highest claim to that pre-eminence. Our Lord checked this strife, not by saying that he had already appointed a superior, but that he did not intend there should be any; that he would tolerate the exercise of no such monarchy, but that they should humbly serve each other. "The Kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and they that exercise authority upon them are called benefactors. But ye shall not be so: but he that is greatest" (ὁ μειζων, "the older") "among you, let him be as the younger; and he that is chief, as he that doth serve." (Luke xxii. 25, 26.)

In the Gospel by St. Matthew we read: "Be not ye called Rabbi: for one is your Master, even Christ; and all ye are brethren. And call no man your father upon the earth: for one is your Father, which is in heaven. Neither be ye called masters: for one is your Master, even Christ. But he that is greatest among you shall be your servant. And whosoever shall exalt himself shall be abased; and he that shall humble himself shall be exalted." (Matt. xxiii. 8—12.) From this passage we are taught: (1.) That spiritual lordship and rule are an abomination in the sight of God. (2.) That no one is bound to receive implicitly the doctrines or decisions of another in matters of religion. The Spirit and word of God are the only infallible Teachers. (3.) That these words of Christ are opposed to the supremacy of the Roman Pontiff, as well as to the spiritual dominion of the Papal Clergy. Not, indeed, that the declaration of our Lord is to be interpreted in opposition to the existence of an ecclesiastical authority, which is exercised to edification, and with humility: the power ascribed to St. Peter by the Papacy exceeds any domination ever exercised by the most absolute Monarchs; they affirm, that the power of St. Peter was the same as that which the Roman Bishop now demands for himself over the Pastors and people of God, by virtue of his succession to him.

What Emperor, King or tyrant, ever pretended to rule with a power so extensive or absolute as that which is wielded by the Pope? Who, besides him, usurped command, not only over the external actions, but also over the most inward thoughts, subjecting the minds and consciences of mankind to his dictates, censures, and laws? What Prince ever adopted a style more imperious than that of the Papal Bulls? "Let it be lawful for no man whatever to infringe this declaration of our will and command, or to go against it with bold rashness." "Our most holy Lord," * is the ordinary title by which he is addressed by the Fathers of Trent, as if they were his slaves, and would prostrate Christendom at his feet. He exempts his dependants from civil laws, disposes of kingdoms, absolves subjects, and asserts prerogatives which fix on him the character of consummate antichristian pravity. A Papal canon, speaking of His Holiness, declares: "Let a Pope be so bad as by his negligence and mal-administration to carry with him innumerable people to hell, yet no mortal man whatever must presume here to reprove his faults, because the Pope being to judge all men, is himself to be judged of none, except he be found swerving from the faith;" * a point which Romanists scarcely allow to be possible. Who, but a Pope, could submit to the following blasphemous address presented by a Council of Clergy:—"All power is given to thee in heaven and earth." Similar to this is the apostrophe of Gregory VII. to Peter and Paul:—"Come, therefore, most holy Princes of the Apostles, and what I have said confirm by your authority; that now at length all men may understand whether ye can bind and loose: and that you also can give and take away on earth empires, kingdoms, and whatever mortal men can have." †

7. All the Apostles were equal in authority; and no peculiar jurisdiction was conferred on Peter which was not bestowed equally on the other Apostles.

(1.) Was Peter an Ambassador, Steward, Minister, or Vicar of Christ? So were they. For, "as the Father hath sent me, so also send I you." "We," said St. Paul, "are Ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us: we pray you in Christ's stead, be y reconciled to God." (2 Cor. v. 20.) "Let a man so account of us, as of the Ministers of Christ, and Stewards of the mysteries of God." (1 Cor. iv. 1.)

(2.) Was Peter a rock, a foundation, on which the church was to be built? The same were the others. For the wall of Jerusalem, which came down from heaven, "had twelve foundations, and in them the names of the twelve Apostles of the Lamb." (Rev. xxi. 14.) St. Paul declares, we "are built upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone." (Eph. ii. 20.)

(3.) Was Peter a builder of the spiritual house? So were the others. St. Paul says, "As a wise master-builder, I have laid the foundation." (1 Cor. iii. 10.)

(4.) Was the power of the keys, of binding and loosing, committed to him? The same may be said of all the other Apostles. (Matt. xvi. 19; xviii. 18.)

(5.) Had he power to feed the sheep of Christ? So had the others; and, indeed, all true Ministers, who on that account are called Pastors. "Take heed unto yourselves, and to all the flock, over the which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feed the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood." (Acts xx. 28; Eph. iv. 11.) These Ministers St. Peter exhorts in the following words:—"Feed the flock of God which is among you, taking the oversight thereof." (1 Peter v. 2.) Let feeding signify instruction, guidance, governing, or all of them together, then it appertains to every Pastor

* "Sanctissimus Dominus noster."—Can. et Decret. Concil. Trid., sess. ii., Decretum de modo vivendi, &c. Fol. Romæ, 1564.

[* "Si Papa, suæ et fraternæ salutis negligens, deprehenditur inutilis, et remissus in operibus suis, et insuper a bono taciturnus, quod magis officit sibi, et omnibus; nihilominus innumerabiles populos catervatim secum ducit primo mancipio gehennæ, cum ipso plagis multis in æternum vapulaturos: hujus culpas istic redarguere præsumit mortalium nullus; quia cunctos ipse judicaturus a nemine est judicandus, nisi deprehendatur a fide devius."—Corp. Juris Canon. à Pithœo, tom. i., distinct. xl., cap. vi., p. 53. Fol. Paris, 1695.]

† Plat. in Greg. VII. In Concil. Rom. vi., apud Binium.

equally; and these instructions are communicated by him who said, "Be mindful of the commandment of us, the Apostles of the Lord and Saviour."

(6.) Was the commission of St. Peter universal? So was theirs. "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth; go ye, therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them, and teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I command you." And, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature." (Matt. xxviii. 19; Mark xvi. 15; Luke xxiv. 47.) Respecting the character of this commission, observe: (i.) Christ was its author: "As my Father hath sent me, so send I you." (ii.) The Holy Ghost was given to all, to enable them to execute their embassy: "Receive ye the Holy Ghost." (John xx. 22.) By this means they possessed infallibility in doctrine, and received a power to work miracles in order to attest the truths which they taught. (iii.) The place or extent of their commission, the whole world. (iv.) The things to be taught, "whatsoever Christ commanded them." (v.) They all had the promise of divine and continued assistance: "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." (Matt. xxviii. 20.)

(7.) Was Peter furnished with extraordinary gifts, special graces, continued direction and assistance, for the discharge of the apostolic office? So were the other Apostles. The promise of the Holy Spirit was to all, "to lead them into all truth, and to clothe them with power from on high," (Luke xxiv. 49; John xvi. 13, 14, 26,) and to endow them with ability to perform miracles. Our Lord, before his departure, "breathed on them, and said, Receive ye the Holy Ghost." (John xx. 22.) Luke asserts, "They were all filled with the Holy Ghost." (Acts ii. 4.) All with confidence and truth could say, "It seemed good to the Holy Ghost, and to us." (Acts xv. 28.) All partook abundantly of that character which Paul referred to, when he said, "The signs of an Apostle were wrought among you in signs, and wonders, and mighty deeds." (2 Cor. xii. 12.)

(8.) What prerogatives, then, appertain to Peter, which the other Apostles did not possess? Certainly none, except those which are invented by the Roman Divines. Many among these have affirmed the equality of the Apostles. Cardinal Cusanus says, "We know that Peter did not receive more power from Christ than the other Apostles; for nothing was said to Peter which was not also said to the others; therefore we rightly say, that all the Apostles were equal to Peter in power."* Francis Lucas Brugensis, in his comment on Matt. xxiii. 8, "All ye are brethren," contends for the equality of the Apostles against the monarchy ascribed to Peter. De Marca was of opinion, that our Saviour, at his ascension, left the church under the College of Apostles, in which Peter was one, but not superior to the others; and that the Apostles left the government of the church to the Bishops; only in the College of Bishops and Apostles one was chosen to be President. Accordingly, the ancient church frequently gave the Bishop of Rome the first seat in Councils, not by divine right, but by custom, because Rome was the imperial city and metropolis of the empire.† The Councils of Pisa, Constance, Basil, with the Gallic Church, maintained the same doctrine.

(9.) In conformity with the foregoing views are the decisions of the ancient Councils, to the canons of which we shall allude.

(10.) The ancient Fathers assert in express terms, that the Apostles were equal, or co-ordinate in power. What can be more decisive than the following from Cyprian?—"Although our Lord giveth to all the Apostles, after his resurrection, an equal power, and saith, 'As the Father sent me, so send I you.'—The other Apostles were indeed that which Peter was, endowed with equal participation of honour and power."* Chrysostom says plainly, "Paul showeth that each Apostle enjoyed equal dignity."† He also calls Paul equal in honour to Peter.‡ Cyril declares, "Peter and John were equal in honour one to another, as they were also Apostles and holy disciples."§ Jerome affirms, "that the strength of the church is equally settled on the Apostles."‖ The declarations of Isidore will show how long these opinions continued in the church. "The other Apostles did receive an equal share of honour and power, who also being dispersed in the whole world did preach the Gospel; and to whom, departing, the Bishops did succeed, who are constituted through the whole world in the sees of the Apostles."¶ By consequence, therefore, the Fathers assert the same equality when they affirm the apostolic office to be the highest in the church, and that their successors were equal; and particularly that the Bishop of Rome had no pre-eminence above his brethren; for, "wherever a Bishop be, whether at Rome or Eugubium, at Constantinople or at Rhegium, at Alexandria or Thanis, he is of the same worth, and of the same priesthood: the force of wealth and lowness of poverty doth not render a Bishop more high or more low, because all of them are successors of the Apostles."

8. There is no intimation of this archi-apostolical power in the Epistles of St. Peter. It is usual with persons who are endowed with unquestionable authority, however prudent or modest, to exhibit in the character of their writing traces of its existence. But no person who perused these Epistles would suppose they were written by a Pope. "The Elders," says he, "which are among you, I exhort, who am also an Elder, and a witness of the sufferings of Christ, and also a partaker of the glory that shall be revealed." (1 Peter v. 1.) Were he a Popish Pontiff, his style would have been, "I, the peculiar Vicar of Christ, Prince of the Apostles, exhort and

* "Scimus quod Petrus nihil plus potestatis a Christo recepit aliis Apostolis; nihil enim dictum est ad Petrum, quod aliis etiam dictum non sit; ideo recte dicimus omnes Apostolos esse æquales cum Petro in potestate."—Nicol. de Cusa Card. Opera, De Concord. Cath., lib. ii., cap. xiii., pp. 726, 727. Basil, 1565.

† De Marca, De Concord, lib. vi., cap. i., sect. ii., iii.

* "Quamvis Apostolis omnibus post resurrectionem suam parem potestatem tribuat, et dicat, 'Sicut misit me Pater, et ego mitto vos.'—Hoc erant utique et ceteri Apostoli, quod fuit Petrus, pari consortio præditi, et honoris et potestatis."—Cypr. Opera, de Unit. Eccles., cap. ii., p. 172. 8vo. Paris, 1836.

† "Δεικνυς, ὁτι της αυτης ἑκαστος απελαυσεν αξιας."—Chryst. Opera, Comment. Epist. ad Galat., cap. ii., v. 8, tom. x. 8vo., p. 811. Edit. Bened. Paris, 1837.

‡ Idem, in Gal. i. 8.

§ "Πετρος και Ιωαννης ισοτιμοι αλληλοις, καθο και Αποστολοι και ἁγιοι μαθηται."—Conc. Labb., tom. ii., Conc. Ephes., act. i. Paris, 1671.

‖ "At dicis, 'Super Petrum fundatur ecclesia,' licet id ipsum in alio loco super omnes Apostolos fiat, et cuncti claves regni cœlorum accipiant, et ex æquo super eos ecclesiæ fortitudo solidetur."—Hieron. Opera, tom. iv., Advers. Jovin., lib. i., col. 168. Edit. Bened. Fol. Paris, 1706.

¶ "Ceteri Apostoli cum Petro pari consortio honoris et potestatis effecti sunt, qui etiam in toto orbe dispersi evangelium prædicaverunt, quibusque decedentibus successerunt Episcopi, qui sunt constituti per totum mundum, in sedibus Apostolorum."—Isid., Hisp. Opera, tom. vi., De Officiis, lib. ii., cap. v., p. 419. 4to. Romæ, 1802.

 "Ubicunque fuerit Episcopus, sive Romæ sive Eugubii," &c.—Hieron. ad Evang. Vide supra, p. 618.

require of you," &c. But nothing of the kind is seen in his Epistles: there is no decretum nostræ voluntatis et mandati, "this decision of our will and mandate." His phraseology is, "Be mindful of the commands," that is, the doctrine and precepts, "of us, the Apostles of the Lord and Saviour." (2 Peter iii. 2.)

9. There are no indications of this power being assumed in the evangelical history, whether in the Acts of the Apostles, or in the Apostolic Epistles. We do not discover that Peter claimed any extraordinary authority as Governor or Judge, or even that his brethren ascribed it to him. On the contrary, there are numerous passages which prove that he pretended to no such influence, and that none awarded it to him. All things among them were transacted in common. No appeal, in cases of dispute, was made to him; no peremptory decision was pronounced by him; he issued no orders independent of his colleagues in the apostolate; in ecclesiastical assemblies he acted as any other member; his judgment and practice were sometimes questioned, and he was expected to render an account of himself to the assembly; he did not act upon his own authority, but assigned reasons for his conduct and opinion; occasionally he received instructions from others, and proceeded accordingly. For example:—

(1.) In the designation of an Apostle, to supply the place of Judas, he suggested the matter and laid the case before the brethren. He first declared his opinion; but the whole company chose two, and referred the determination to God, by the use of the lot. (Acts i. 15—26.)

(2.) At the institution of Deacons, "the twelve called the multitude of disciples," and directed them to elect the persons; and the proposal being acceptable to them, it was done accordingly: "They chose Stephen," &c., "whom they set before the Apostles: and when they had prayed, they laid their hands on them." (Acts vi. 2—6.)

(3.) The Council at Jerusalem also furnishes positive proof against the supremacy of Peter.

First. When there was a great debate about circumcision and other affairs, there was no recourse to Peter as the supreme head or judge of controversies. For they sent to the Apostles and Elders to inquire about the question. (Acts xv. 2.) When these messengers arrived, "they were received of the church, and of the Apostles and Elders." (Verse 4.) Having made their report, "the Apostles and Elders came together for to consider of this matter." (Verse 6.) They applied, not to Peter, but to the Apostles and Elders. Had the first been invested with such prerogatives as those ascribed to him and to the Roman Pontiff, it would have been extremely uncourteous to apply primarily to the Apostles and Elders.

Secondly. Peter did not call, convene, or summon this Council, or assembly: they met by common agreement.

Thirdly. He did not preside in the meeting. James appears to have occupied the chair; who said, after having listened to all who chose to speak, Κρινω, "I judge," "I authoritatively say." The other Apostles either argued on the subject, or gave their opinion: James alone pronounced the definitive sentence. Peter did not preside; and as this was the first ecclesiastical Council, it was the time and place for him to have assumed his character as Chief or Prince, if he held it; but he did not, nor did any of the other Apostles invite him. From this we fairly conclude that Peter was no Pope.

Fourthly. Peter did not send his Legates to Antioch, to signify what he and the Council had done; but the Apostles and the whole church elected and sent their messengers.

Fifthly. The decree was not sent in the name of Peter, nor was any notice taken in it of any primacy or prerogative which he held above the other Apostles. The title of the decree is, "The Apostles, Elders, and brethren, send greeting," without any particular mention of Peter, the supposed judge of this and other controversies, and the inevident Governor of this and all other churches. Peter did not confirm the decree.

(4.) This Apostle received and executed a commission from his brethren, at Jerusalem, in their presbyterial capacity, and thus was employed under their authority; and what greatly confirms this point is, that he acted jointly in commission with John as his equal. It is stated, "Now when the Apostles which were at Jerusalem heard that Samaria had received the word of God, they sent unto them Peter and John." (Acts viii. 14.) Our Saviour hypothetically asks, "Whether is greater, he that sends, or he that is sent?" The answer is an axiom. "The servant is not greater than his Lord: neither he that is sent greater than he that sent him." The truth is, the Christians of those days did not stand on points of ceremony: each was ready to do what the brethren thought best. Hence the disciples at Antioch "appointed Paul and Barnabas to go up to Jerusalem."

(5.) Peter was called to account for his actions. (Acts xi. 2, 3.) Had the canon law been then in force, he might have told them, "that he was to judge all men, and none him; nor was he to be reproved by any mortal man, though by his impiety and ill example he carried thousands to hell with him."*

10. In controversies which are mentioned in Scripture respecting doctrines, morals, discipline, rites, &c., there is no appeal made to the judgment of Peter as decisive. No argument is built on his authority. Dissent from his opinion, want of conformity to his practice, or disobedience to his injunctions, are not mentioned as ground of reproof. This were strange, indeed, if Peter were the universal Prince and Pastor of Christians, or the supreme judge of controversies among them; for then the most certain, compendious, and effectual way to confute error and regulate practice, would be, to allege his authority. If a question now arise, the parties immediately have recourse to the Pope; and his judgment is considered decisive. If any error be broached, the voice of the Pope is heard throughout Christendom. If any schism spring up, Rome immediately attempts to arrest it. But no such regard was had to Peter. The Apostles did not send heretics to him for correction, or schismatics for censure. They endeavoured to convince them by Scripture and argument. If they employed authority, it was their own, which, they asserted, was given to them by Christ for edification.

11. St. Peter nowhere interposes as a judge of controversies, in the Roman Catholic sense of that term. When he deals with heretics, he acts not as a Pope, by anathematizing, but as an Apostle, by warning, argument, and persuasion. Mark how St. Paul represents the several parties in the Christian church: "I am of Paul; and I of Apollos; and I of Cephas; and I of Christ." (1 Cor. i. 12; iii. 22.) If Peter were sovereign of the Apostles, is it not wonderful that a Christian should prefer any other Apostle to him? Would any Bishop venture to compete with the Pope?

* Corp. Jur. Canon. a Pithœo, tom. i., dist. xl., cap. vi. Fol. Paris, 1695. Vide supra, p. 622.

12. The proceedings of the Apostles, in the conversion of mankind, founding churches, administering discipline, &c., are inconsistent with the supremacy, as they did not act on the principle that Peter was the source of jurisdiction. They were not governed by his licence or order, but by the direction of the Holy Spirit. They were "sent forth by the Holy Ghost," or went by revelation. (Acts xiii. 4; xvi. 6, 9; Gal. ii. 2.) By these aids they founded churches, ordained Pastors, exercised discipline, &c. These functions were discharged without dependence on Peter, as the Apostles did not consult his pleasure, nor did they render any account to him. They proceeded by virtue of a commission, received immediately from Christ. If it be said that St. Paul went to Jerusalem to see Peter, we answer, he went to visit him, either out of respect and love, or to confer with him for mutual edification and comfort, but not to receive any command or instructions: St. Paul disavowed dependence on man.

13. The nature of the apostolic office, state of things, and the manner of St. Peter's life, are all at variance with his supremacy. The character of the ministry of the Apostles was such, that they were not confined to any particular place of residence, but travelled continually, visiting every part, as they were divinely directed, or had opportunity, for the propagation of the Gospel. The state of things in the church was also such as to preclude that reference to Peter which supremacy requires. The Apostles were not only itinerant, but persecuted. Christians were scattered, to a considerable distance, so that to obtain the necessary instruction from Peter was difficult. The manner of the Apostle's life was unsettled and moveable. How could he attend to the duties of supremacy? "Gold and silver he had none:" how could he sustain Nuncios, Legates, Secretaries, Auditors, and other subordinate officers?

14. Every Apostle possessed an independent authority in managing the duties of his office. The direction of Him who had promised to be with him was sufficient for his guidance. Hence, St. Paul says, ικανωσεν αυτους, "God rendered them," the Apostles, able or "SUFFICIENT Ministers of the new testament;" (2 Cor. iii. 6; Rom. xv. 15;) therefore in their instructions and practice, they acted independently of Peter and of each other. The Apostles governed all; their authority was the sanction, and their decrees and writings were the laws, of the church. They exercised a common jurisdiction, according to the necessities and emergencies of the church.

15. The behaviour of Paul towards Peter shows that he acknowledged neither dependence upon, nor subjection to, him.

(1.) Paul asserts for himself an independent power, subordinate to no other man; and insists thereon in defence of his doctrine and conduct; alleging various arguments in favour of it, from the character of his call, the nature of his office, his success in the discharge of it, and the approbation of his fellow-Apostles. (2 Cor. xii. 11; Rom. xi. 13.)

(2.) His call and commission to the apostleship show that he derived his office not from man, or by the ministry of man, but from our Lord. For he was "an Apostle, not of men, neither by man, but by Jesus Christ and God the Father." (Gal. i. 1.) Our Lord said that he was a chosen vessel, whom he had sent to the Gentiles. Acts ix. 15; xxii. 21.) St. Paul is careful to declare himself an Apostle by the will of God. (1 Cor. i. 1; 2 Cor. i. 1; Eph. i. 1; Col. i. 1; 2 Tim. i. 1.) He was an Apostle by the special grace of God; (1 Cor. xv. 10; Eph. iii. 7; 1 Tim. i. 12; 2 Tim. i. 9—11;) by the command of God; (1 Tim. i. 1;) and he informs the Romans that "by Christ he had received grace and apostleship." (Rom. i. 5.)

(3.) For the warrant or authority of his office, he does not even advert to the licence of Peter, but to the special gifts and graces which he himself possessed. "Truly," said he, "the signs of an Apostle were wrought among you in all patience, in signs and wonders, and mighty deeds." "I will not dare to speak of any of those things which Christ hath not wrought by me, to make the Gentiles obedient, by word and deed, through mighty signs and wonders, by the power of the Spirit of God." (2 Cor. xii. 12; Rom. xv. 18, 19; 1 Cor. ii. 4.)

(4.) To the same purpose he mentions his success in the ministry. "Am I not an Apostle? Are not ye my work in the Lord? If I be not an Apostle unto others, yet doubtless I am to you; for the seal of mine apostleship are ye in the Lord." (1 Cor. ix. 1, 2.) "But by the grace of God I am what I am: and his grace, which was bestowed upon me, was not in vain; but I laboured more abundantly than they all: yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me." (1 Cor. xv. 10.)

(5.) In the discharge of the duties of his office, after his call and commission from Christ, without consulting with or taking licence from man, he applied himself to his work. "Immediately I conferred not with flesh and blood; neither went I up to Jerusalem to them which were Apostles before me." (Gal. i. 16, 17.)

(6.) In correcting abuses, St. Paul acted on his own authority. "Therefore, I write these things being absent, lest being present I should use sharpness, according to the power which the Lord hath given me to edification, and not to destruction." (2 Cor. xiii. 10; x. 8.) He did not receive any check from the other Apostles; but Peter who knew "the grace that was given him, gave unto him the right hand of fellowship," (Gal. ii. 9,) in token of their concurrence in what St. Paul had done.

(7.) St. Paul informs us that "he was not a whit behind the very chiefest Apostles;" (2 Cor. xi. 5; xii. 11;) not even to Peter, or James, or John, whom he elsewhere calls pillars. (Gal. ii. 9.) When he said he was "behind none," he could not have forgotten Peter: when he said, "none of the chief," he might refer especially to him. When he said, "in nothing," he alluded to the authority of his office, which he found necessary to magnify, that he might assert his apostleship to have been derived from Christ.

(8.) The inspired Apostles did not confer any thing on Paul at Jerusalem. (Gal. ii. 1, 2.) This was hardly right, if Peter were his Sovereign or Prince: and he appears to advert to this fact as if for the purpose of excluding the doctrine of supremacy. Speaking of the other Apostles, and of Peter, who was among them, he says, "Whatsoever they were, it maketh no matter to me: God accepteth no man's person;" (Gal. ii. 6;) which would not have been proper, if the words had been applied to one who was his superior in office, and to whom, as his Pastor and judge, by God's appointment, he owed submission and homage.

(9.) The Apostle of the Gentiles withstood Peter, and reproved him before all the disciples, because he was blamable. (Gal. ii. 11—14.) This behaviour would have been unseemly, on the supposition that Peter was his superior; and especially to reprove him openly, and then to transmit it in writing to the churches of the Galatians. Paul was far more bold with Peter than any man dares to be with the Pope.

(10.) St. Paul claims for himself an authority over the Gentiles, co-ordinate with that which Peter exercised over the Jews. This he asserts strongly; which cannot be reconciled with the Popish notion of Peter's supremacy. (Gal. ii. 6, 7.)

16. If St. Peter were Sovereign of the church, it appears to be necessary that he should survive the other Apostles. If otherwise, either the church must want a head, or there would be endless controversy respecting his successor. Peter died before John. Linus, Cletus, and Clemens are said to have succeeded him. Consequently, John must have been in subjection to these as Popes. Thus the office of Apostle would not be what Paul calls it, "first Apostles."

17. Others of the twelve might have assumed the supremacy on grounds similar to those on which it is claimed for Peter. To suppose, however, such a difference of power among the other Apostles is absurd; therefore, the foundation on which Peter's supremacy is built cannot be strong. James and John seem to have possessed a preference to other Apostles: for them the Saviour manifested a special regard. Immediately subsequent to the appointment of Peter and his brother, they were called to the apostleship. They were designated, by way of eminence, Boanerges, or sons of thunder. They beheld the transfiguration. One of them was "the disciple whom Jesus loved," and who leaned on his bosom; and the other was the first to witness our Lord's resurrection.

CHAPTER VI.

SUPREMACY—CONTINUED.

THE PRIMACY OF PETER NOT TRANSMISSIBLE. 1. It was personal: 2. And grounded on personal qualities: 3. The apostolic office not successive. Reasons for this: 4. Absurdity of such transmission: 5. Objection answered: 6. All true Pastors the successors of the Apostles: 7. Popes not so.

THE primacy of Peter could not have been transmitted to others.

1. It was grounded on personal graces, gifts, and acts. In personal acts; namely, his cheerfully following Christ; his confession of, and resolute adherence to, him. In personal graces; his faith in Christ, his love to, and zeal for, him. In personal endowments; his courage, activity, and ready gift of speech. A pre-eminence, that is built on these grounds, is not hereditary.

2. The primacy of Peter is established on words which were directed to himself, and characterized by personal adjuncts, such as name, parentage, which cannot extend to others. Our Lord promised to Simon, son of Jonas, that he would build his church upon him, or rather, upon himself, whom he had acknowledged: accordingly, the church was founded by his ministry, or by the blessing of God upon his preaching. Our Lord engaged, also, to give him the keys of the kingdom of heaven. This power was first used by Peter, when he opened the door of faith to the Jews, and afterwards to the Gentiles: others exercised the keys as well as Peter; but he employed them first.

3. The apostolic office, properly so called, was personal and temporary, and therefore not successive. The Apostles may be considered in a twofold point of view; namely, in their general character, as Preachers of the Gospel and administrators of the sacraments, and in their special vocation, as the Apostles of Jesus Christ. They are the predecessors of all, even to the end of the world, who shall preach the Gospel of Christ and administer the ordinances, by whatsoever name they may be called. That the Apostles had successors, as Preachers of the Gospel, we allow; but we maintain that in their special character, as the Apostles of our Lord, they had no successors, and for the following reasons:—

(1.) It was necessary, in order to constitute an Apostle, that he should have seen Christ after his resurrection, that he might be a witness of that event, which is the foundation of the Christian faith. (Acts i. 21, 22.) (2.) The Apostles received their commission immediately from Christ. (Gal. i. 1.) (3.) They possessed the power of conferring miraculous gifts by the imposition of hands. (Matt. x. 1; 2 Cor. xii. 12.) (4.) They were divinely inspired. (Acts xv. 28.) And, (5.) Their commission was universal, embracing the whole world.

Such an office, consisting of so many extraordinary privileges and miraculous powers, was not designed to be perpetuated by derivation. It contained numerous privileges which were not communicated from one to another, and which no man, without gross imposture, could challenge to himself. The Apostles did not pretend to communicate the apostolic office. They appointed regular Pastors, and associated with themselves fellow-labourers or assistants in preaching the Gospel and governing the churches. But they did not constitute Apostles equal to themselves in authority, privileges, or gifts. Augustine says, "Who is ignorant that the principate of the apostleship is to be preferred to any episcopacy?"* And Bellarmine confesses, "the Bishops have no part of the true apostolic authority;"† a theory which was adopted by the Cardinal to derive all power from the Pope.

The Apostles made the apostolate a distinct office from Pastors and Teachers, who are standing officers in the church. (1 Cor. xii. 28; Eph. iv. 11.) Wherefore Peter, who had no other office mentioned in Scripture, or recognised by antiquity, beside that of an Apostle, could have no successor in his office; consequently it expired with him, as also did that of the others, who had no successors; the primacy of Peter, therefore, whatever it was, ceased with himself, and when no Apostles were existing, there could not be such a head as that which the Papacy claims.

4. If some of the peculiar prerogatives and privileges of St. Peter descend to the Popes, we ask, why not all? Why was not Alexander VI. as holy as Peter? Why was not Honorius as sound in doctrine as Peter? Why is not every Pope inspired, and endowed with the power of working miracles? Why is not every Papal epistle canonical Scripture? What reason is there to divide these privileges, so that the Pope shall have only a few, and not others?

5. Romanists object that "Bishops were by the Fathers called successors of the Apostles." To this we reply:—

* "Quis nescit illum apostolatus principatum cuilibet episcopatui præferendum?"—August. Opera, tom. ix.; De Bapt. Cont. Donat., lib. ii., cap. i., col. 97, A. Ed. Bened. Paris, 1694.

[† "Episcopi nullam habent partem veræ apostolicæ auctoritatis."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. i., De Rom. Pontif., lib. iv., cap. xxv., col. 884, C. Colon., 1619.]

The office of an Apostle contained not only the special apostolic characters mentioned above, but also the functions of teaching and governing the church, which were exercised in ordinary pastorship. These persons were endowed with such prerogatives during the lifetime of the Apostles, deriving their powers through them, but by no means succeeding them. The Fathers were accustomed to call Bishops or Pastors the successors of the Apostles; not meaning that they succeeded to the whole of the apostolic functions, but that each received certain gifts, either from some Apostle, or apostolic man. So Clemens Romanus says: The Apostles "preaching through countries and cities, appointed the first-fruits of their conversions to be Bishops and Ministers over such as should afterwards believe, having first proved them by the Spirit." * And again: "Having constituted them as aforesaid," (that is, Bishops and Deacons,) "they gave direction, that if they should die, how other chosen and approved men should succeed in their ministry." † Thus the Pastors supplied the room of the Apostles, as Cyprian declares: "To each Pastor a portion of the flock is given, which he is to rule and govern."

6. All true Pastors, therefore, are, in a certain sense, successors of the Apostles. For all of them conjointly have equal authority, in the pastoral office. So Cyprian: "The Presidents succeed the Apostles by vicarious ordination." "The Lord hath chosen Apostles, that is, Bishops and Presidents." "There is but one chair, built by the Lord's will upon Peter." "There is one episcopate, diffused by the concordant number of many Bishops." "One episcopate, of which each doth hold his share." "The Pastors are many; but there is one flock which is fed by all the Apostles with unanimous consent." "For although we are many Pastors, yet we feed one flock and all the sheep." The Synod of Carthage also declares: "The meaning of our Lord Jesus Christ is manifest in sending his Apostles, and allowing the power given him of the Father to them alone, whose successors we are, governing the church of God by the same power." Bellarmine, however, informs us that the extraordinary charge delivered to the Apostles ceased at their death, with the exception of Peter, whose successor is the ordinary Pastor of the universal church.‡ To this assertion it is enough to observe, that it is a mere figment, having no foundation either in Scripture or in antiquity. For if it had any existence, there would have been authentic record of it, or some law concerning it, by which all posterity would have known it. No document is extant that Peter had any successor like the Pope: therefore we may safely affirm, that such never existed.

7. With great confidence we may affirm, that the Roman Pontiffs cannot be the successors of Peter; inasmuch as they neither follow him in doctrine, morals, nor practice.

[We cannot suffer the above quotations from Cyprian to pass without reminding our readers of their adulterated and spurious character; a question which has been considered at large by Dr. James, in his invaluable work on "The Corruptions of the true Fathers;" from which we extract the following. The whole passage reads,

["To Peter,* our Lord, after his resurrection, saith: 'Feed my sheep,' and buildeth his church upon him alone; and to him he gave the charge of feeding his sheep. And although after his resurrection he gave his power alike to all, saying, 'As my Father sent me, so send I you; take the Holy Ghost; if you remit to any their sins, they shall be remitted,' &c.; yet, to manifest unity, he constituted one chair, and disposed, by his authority, the origin or fountain of the same, beginning at one. The rest of the Apostles were that Peter was, in equal fellowship of honour and power; but the beginning cometh of unity. The primacy is given to Peter, that the church of Christ may be showed to be one, and one chair. And all are Pastors; but there appears to be but one flock, which is to be fed by all the Apostles with one consent. The unity of which the church is farthermore described by the Holy Ghost in the person of our Lord, saying: 'My love, my dove, is one, her mother's only darling, and dear unto her that bare her.' He that holds not the unity of this church, doth he think to hold the faith? He that withstandeth and resisteth the church, he that forsaketh Peter's chair, upon which the church was built, doth he trust that he is in the church?"

[Dr. James observes, "I have thought fittest to enter into a due examination of this place, before all others, because it is the first in their account, most pregnant in proof, frequent in citation, plain in words. Let one speak for all, saith a learned and famous writer amongst them, 'Cyprian, for the rest of the Fathers, in time more ancient, in learning more excellent, and in the honour and dignity of martyrdom, far exceeding the rest;'† and then he comes in with these words, before alleged. Which being taken as they are found in the most ancient and printed copies, without any mixture of Papists, (the bane of all good writers,) 'make rather,' as a judicious writer of our side hath long since observed, 'for an equality of all the Apostles in power, than for a supremacy of one.'‡ But the true sense of Cyprian's words is corrupted, and the book is farced§ with such words

* "Κατα χωρας και πολεις κηρυσσοντες καθισταυον τας απαρχας αυτων, δοκιμασαντες τῳ Πνευματι, εις Επισκοπους και Διακονους των μελλοντων πιστευειν."—Clemen. Roman. Epist. ad Cor., sect. xlii. Lond., 1687.

† "Κατεστησαν τους προειρημενους, και μεταξυ επινομην δεδωκασιν, ὁπως εαν κοιμηθωσι, διαδεξωνται ἑτεροι δεδοκιμασμενοι ανδρες την λειτουργιαν αυτων."—Idem, sect. xliv.

[‡ "Romanus Pontifex proprie succedit Petro, non ut Apostolo, sed ut Pastori ordinario totius Ecclesiæ, et ideo ab illo habet Romanus Pontifex jurisdictionem, a quo habuit Petrus; at Episcopi non succedunt proprie Apostolis, quoniam Apostoli non fuerunt ordinarii sed extraordinarii, et quasi delegati Pastores, qualibus non succeditur."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. i., De Rom. Pontif., lib. iv., cap. xxv., col. 884, B. Coloniæ, 1619.]

["* 'Loquitur Dominus ad Petrum: Ego tibi dico, inquit,—et iterum eidem post resurrectionem suam dicit: Pasce oves meas. Super (illum) unum ædificat ecclesiam suam, et illi pascendas mandat oves suas. Et quamvis Apostolis omnibus post resurrectionem suam parem potestatem tribuat et dicat: Sicut misit me Pater, et ego mitto vos, accipite Spiritum Sanctum. Si cui remiseritis peccata, remittentur illi; si cui tenueritis tenebuntur: tamen ut unitatem manifestaret, (unam cathedram constituit, et) unitatis ejusdem originem ab uno incipientem sua auctoritate disposuit. Hoc erant utique et cæteri Apostoli, quod fuit Petrus, pari consortio prædíti et honoris et potestatis; sed exordium ab unitate proficiscitur, (primatus Petro datur,) ut una Christi ecclesia (et cathedra una) monstretur. (Et Pastores sunt omnes, sed grex unus ostenditur, qui ab Apostolis omnibus unanimi consensione pascatur.) Quam unam ecclesiam etiam in Cantico Canticorum Spiritus Sanctus ex persona Domini designat et dicit: Una est columba mea, perfecta mea, una est matri suæ, electa genetrici suæ. Hanc ecclesiæ unitatem qui non tenet, tenere se fidem credit? Qui ecclesiæ renititur et resistit, (qui cathedram Petri, super quam fundata est ecclesia, deserit,) in ecclesia se esse confidit?'—Paris, 1607, et Romæ, 1563. (Paris, 1574.)

["† 'Verum quam germane, quam pie ac sancte ea Christi verba sancti Patres semper acceperint; instar omnium unus satis idoneus posset esse testis, Cyprianus, qui temporis antiquitate, doctrinæ præstantia, martyrii denique dignitate et amplitudine ceteros facile antecellere videatur.'—Bar., tom. i., p. 158.

["‡ J. Rainold. See his 'Conference with Hart,' pp. 166, 167, &c.

["§ (That is, 'filled.')

in the Roman Cyprian,* that in show it makes for Peter's supremacy, and so for a supremacy in power like the Pope's, as they teach men to gather of it.† For where it was in Cyprian, that the church is built upon one, which one, say they, must be understood to be Peter, they have made it to be built upon him alone. Where, in Cyprian, 'the rest of the Apostles were equal both in honour and power unto Peter, but the beginning doth come from unity;' the Roman Cyprian addeth these words: 'And the primacy is given unto Peter.' Where it was in Cyprian, that 'Christ did dispose the original of unity, beginning from one;' the Roman Cyprian addeth, 'and the chair to be one.' This was well to begin with, that upon Peter alone the church is built, that unto him the primacy is given, that Christ appointed one chair, and as the church must be one, so the chair must be one. ‡ Yet because one chair, in Cyprian's language, doth make no more for the chair of the Bishop of Rome, than of the Bishop of Carthage, the Cyprian of Antwerp, to help the matter forward, doth bring in Peter's chair. And where it was in Cyprian, even in the Roman print too, 'He who withstandeth and resisteth the church, doth he trust himself to be in the church?' the Antwerp Cyprian addeth, 'He who forsaketh Peter's chair on which the church was founded, doth he trust himself to be in the church?' So whereas aforetime St. Cyprian showed the unity of the church in an equality of Peter with the rest of the Apostles; now by good handling he showeth Peter's primacy; and that by good expounding, is the Pope's supremacy. For we must imagine, that by Peter's chair is meant the Pope's chair; which chair he forsaketh who is not obedient and subject to the Pope, according unto Gratian in the canon law.§ The only difficulty and scruple that is left to breed a doubt thereof in suspicious heads, is that clause of Cyprian, 'that Christ gave equal power to all the Apostles; and the rest were the same that Peter was, endued with like fellowship both of honour and of power.'‖ Which words if they could handsomely take away out of him in some new print,¶ (and why not take away so few, as well as add so many?) then would this be a passing fine place for you to persuade men, that the unity of the church doth pre-suppose your own chair, to which all men must be subject who will be of the church; and that they, by consequence, are no right Christians who stand against the Pope's supremacy. Hitherto are the words of that worthy writer, with whom fully agreeth my Lord of Winchester, in his book of 'Obedience,'* besides sundry others that have taken just exception to these words,† by them so often alleged and repeated,‡ that scarce any writer of their side sails in the main ocean of controversies, but he toucheth at this point. It is the very anchor of their ship, the pillar of their Church, the ground of their supremacy. Let us hear, therefore, what can be said in defence of their new editions and changings,§ in their late editions and printings of Cyprian: our law condemns no man before he be heard. Do the most copies printed read as they do?‖ We have almost thirty several editions, for less than three. Do the ancient prints make for them? Not one; and yet he hath been oftener and longer printed than any other of the Fathers.¶ Do the ancient written copies, but especially the parchments, speak for them? No; nor these neither. Let Pamelius himself testify for both. How many printed copies used he, in his revision of Cyprian's works, that were before the year of our Lord 1564? Eight or nine. How many ancient manuscripts? Nine or ten. In which of these did he find the Pope's super-apostolical power, his chair, his primacy? Verily in none but in one; and that such a one as they durst not follow for very shame throughout, but in some few places which made for the Pope's advantage.†† How call you this copy? Where was it found? In an old abbey at Cambron,‡‡ written by some blind Monk or other; for he could not see this clause, that 'the Apostles were endued with like fellowship, both of honour and power,' but hath clean left it out; §§ and instead of these words, 'but the beginning doth come from unity,' he hath put in these, 'but the primacy is given to Peter.' The writer of this copy may seem to be very old; for, you see, he begins to dote. But I hear of another ancient copy in Bavaria,‖‖ a very especial good copy, (for so it must needs be if it make for the Pope's supremacy,) and yet I must needs tell you beforehand, from the Jesuit's own mouth,¶¶ that well it may agree with the Cambron written, or printed Pamelian, in the meaning; but surely it differs much in the order and placing of the words. I will set down the words truly, as the Jesuit hath related them.

["'Our Lord speaketh unto Peter: I say unto thee, because thou art Peter, &c., and a little after, and the same after his resurrection, saith, Feed my sheep. He ["* Printed by Manutius, anno 1563.

["† Staplet. Princ. Doctr., lib. vi., cap. vii., 'Super unum ædificat ecclesiam.' MSS. 'Super illum unum.'—Manut., Pamel.

["‡ 'Cathedra una (est,) unum, viz., unius ecclesiæ ministerium certo Dei mandato enixum.—Id. Cypr., epist. xl., declarat.

["(The passage runs thus, Cypr., epist. xl., p. 72, 'Deus unus est, et Christus unus, et una ecclesia, et cathedra una super Petrum Domini voce fundata.'—Upon which follows this note: '14. Sic Manut. cæteri: super Petram, quomodo etiam MSS. quos vidi,' &c.)

["§ Dist. 93, Obedientiam, &c., Summo Pontifici. 'Qui cathedram Petri supra quam fundata est ecclesia deserit, in ecclesia se esse non confidat.'

["‖ 'Et quamvis Apostolis omnibus post resurrectionem suam parem potestatem tribuat. Hoc erant utique et cæteri Apostoli, quod fuit Petrus, pari consortio præditi et honoris et potestatis.'—Cypr. de Unitate Ecclesiæ, p. 254.

["¶ The Cambron copy was tampering about it, to square it unto somewhat; for he hath left out that clause of Cyprian touching the Apostles, 'endued with like fellowship, both of honour and power;' and instead of these words, 'but the beginning doth come from unity;' he hath put in these, 'but the primacy is given to Peter.'

[" Rainolds, ut supra.

["* Pp. 65, 66.

["† See Fulk, in his Annotat. on the New Test., p. 328.

["‡ By Baronius, tom. i., pp. 238, 384; Bellarm., Stapleton contr. 2, lib. vi., cap. v., p. 217; the Rhemists, in John, cap. xxi.; Greg. de Valentia, Annal., lib. vii., p. 53; Peter Coton, tom. i., p. 367; Leon. Coq. Exam. Præf. Mon. Jac. I. R., p. 288.

["§ 'The Roman print is followed at Antwerp, the Antwerp at Paris, the Paris otherwhere perhaps, and the newer the worser, and the worst accounted best.'—Rain. Conf., p. 171.

["‖ See the print of Spire, 1477; Bas., 1520; Bas., 1525 et 1530. Edit. Jo. Cauchii. Colon., 1520. Remboltus, Costerius, Erasmus, Gryphius, &c.

["¶ The ancientest printed copy is in Magdalen College, Oxford. Printed at Spire, anno 1477. Pamelius quotes another as ancient.

[" See the table as well of the printed as of the manuscript copies, which he used in revising of Cyprian's works.

["†† Jo. Rain. Conf., p. 168.

["‡‡ 'Cambr. Codex, MS. Abbatiæ Cambronensis in Hannonia, omnium optimus.'—Pamel.

["§§ As Pamelius showeth, Annot. in Cypr. de Unitate Ecclesiæ, epist. xiv., p. 261.

["‖‖ 'Nec illud præteribo, me in Bavarica Bibliotheca incidisse in membranaceum manu exaratum optimæ notæ exemplar Cypriani.'—Grets., lib. ii., de jure et more prohib. lib., cap. vii., p. 125.

["¶¶ 'Deprehendi Codicem illum perantiquum, sententia quidem, si non verbis aut ordine verborum, cum Pameliana editione consentire.'—Ibid.

[" There is a difference in words also, not in order only.

builds his church upon one, and commands him to feed his sheep. And although he give equal power to all the Apostles, yet he appoints one chair, and disposeth the beginning of unity by the power of this speech. The rest of the Apostles were that Peter was; but the primacy is given to Peter, that the church may be showed to be one, and one chair. And all are Pastors, but there is but one flock, which is to be fed by all the Apostles with one consent. And this unity of Paul, he that holds not, doth he think to hold the faith? He that forsaketh Peter's chair, upon which the church was built, doth he trust that he is in the church? He hath built his church upon one. And although after his resurrection he gave his power alike to all, saying, As my Father sent me, so send I you; take the Holy Ghost; if you remit to any their sins, they shall be remitted; if you bind them, they shall be bound: yet to manifest unity, he disposeth by his authority the origin or fountain of the same, beginning of one. The rest of the Apostles were that Peter was, in equal fellowship of honour and piety: but the beginning cometh of unity, that the church of Christ may be showed to be one, with one church, in the Canticle of Canticles,' &c.

[" Thus far Gretser, with his exceeding ancient copy of Bavaria; or rather, he goeth not very far, but tosseth and tumbleth up and down like a horse in a mill. We will not call his credit, but his judgment, in question. You see the world goes hard with the Jesuit, when this copy must be fetched from Bavaria to justify the Cambron, and both of them brought to testify for the Roman, the Roman for the supremacy; yet well fare the Cambron, that hath all that it should have for Peter's supremacy, though it have nothing, or little, of the Apostles' equality; but this is mistaken not only in that, but in sundry other things, taking Paul for Peter,† one sentence for another, and, according to the method of the Gospel, hath placed 'the first last, and the last first.' I wonder the modest Jesuit blushed not to see so many and so foul mistakings, within the compass of so few lines.‡ Either bring better copies than these out of your store-house of antiquity, the Vatican, Sfortian, Florentine, or Venice, from either Germany, Spain, France, or England; or else take back these witnesses again. Hi quoque habent artes, quaque jubentur, eunt. (Ovid.) These were hired to speak any thing, and have more cunning in them, than that we should rely upon the credit of them alone. For, say, is there more credit to be given to these two copies, (which, whether there be any such, or so ancient, must rest upon the faith of a Jesuit,) than to all the manuscript copies throughout the world? which, 'without doubt,' saith one of their own side, 'be some hundreds.'* I have often wondered with myself, how they could let pass such a place of great advantage for establishing the supremacy, unsought for so long. Surely if they have not taken pains to view the places, and compare them with the best originals, they are very negligent in a case that so nearly toucheth their best tenure, which is in capite. If they have collated the places, (as they are indeed most industrious, compassing sea and land to compass their desires,) having better means, and greater opportunity to do good in this kind, than any other order amongst them that I know, (for they have store of libraries, and abound in ancient manuscripts,) let them speak the truth on God's name. Is Cyprian for their supremacy, in his book, 'De Unitate?' (not to argue from the title, 'which proves the unity of the church, and not the supremacy of the Pope'). Are these sentences found in any of those choice copies? Not in one; their deep silence proves as much. Or, would they deal with us plainly, they find not these sentences, by us justly challenged of falsehood, to be in all, or any, of their ancient written copies. For proof whereof, although we cannot directly say, yet we may probably conjecture as much, in that we find not, in all our ancient written copies, any such sentences, (especially such as make for the Pope's supremacy,) which are to be seen in the Roman or Pamelian copies of this book. I have seen eight very ancient manuscripts,† and can speak of my certain knowledge, that none of these have any such matter, as may lead us to think that they were once in the text, and were afterwards left out by negligence, or thrust out of set purpose. For according to Bellarmine's rule, which is indeed an excellent rule or square to measure such like sentences by, 'Take these words away, and there will be no want of them;'‡ as much is clearly proved, as was at any time intended by Cyprian touching the unity of the church, and no more. Add these words unto the text, and they will stand out of order, as if they had never seen the text before, and cannot be shuffled in, but with much ado.§ Thus we have seen the best learned Papists shrewdly plunged in defending this inexcusable and palpable corruption of Cyprian. Stay awhile, and you shall see some clean over head and ears. Surely, if they could have but dreamed that the maintenance of this place would have proved so dangerous and troublesome unto them, they would doubtless have done as wise Captains are wont to do, rather have quitted the place at the first, than to have been thrust out of it afterwards with shame and dishonour. But I hear of two that go about to repair the breaches, and to build up the decayed walls again; the one an Englishman,‖ the other Dutch; the one in [" * 'Loquitur Dominus ad Petrum: Ego dico tibi, inquit, quia tu es Petrus, &c. Paulo post, et idem post resurrectionem suam dicit: Pasce oves meas. Super unum ædificat ecclesiam, et illi pascendas oves mandat. Et quamvis Apostolis omnibus parem tribuat potestatem, unam tamen cathedram constituit, et unitatis originem orationis suæ auctoritate disposuit. Hoc erant utique et cæteri, quod Petrus, sed primatus Petro datur, ut una ecclesia et cathedra una monstretur; et Pastores sunt omnes, sed grex unus ostenditur, qui ab Apostolis omnibus unanimi consensione pascatur. Hanc et Pauli unitatem, qui non tenet, tenere se fidem credit? qui cathedram Petri, super quam fundata ecclesia est, deserit, in ecclesia se esse confidit? Super unum ædificavit ecclesiam. Et quamvis Apostolis omnibus post resurrectionem suam parem potestatem tribuat et dicat: Sicut misit me Pater, et ego mitto vos; accipite Spiritum Sanctum; si cujus remiseritis peccata, remittentur illis; si cujus tenueritis, tenebuntur; tamen ut unitatem manifestaret, unitatis ejusdem originem ab uno incipientem sua auctoritate disposuit. Hoc erant utique et cæteri Apostoli, quod fuit et Petrus, pari consortio prædita, et honoris et pietatis, sed exordium ab unitate proficiscitur, ut ecclesia Christi una monstretur, quam unam ecclesiam etiam in Cantico Canticorum,' &c.—Hæc ex Bavarico Cod. Ib.

[" † 'Hanc et Pauli unitatem, qui non tenet.'—Cod. Bavar., Luc. xiii. 30.

[" ‡ There is no one sentence in its due place, or proper words cited.

[" * The author of 'The Grounds of the Old Religion and the New,' in his answer to Crashaw, p. 223.

[" † Two copies in the great Library at Lambeth, two in New College, Oxford, one in Lincoln College Library, another in the Public Library, the seventh at Salisbury in the old Library, the eighth at Benet (that is, Corpus Christi) College, in Cambridge.

[" ‡ 'Si auferantur, nihil perit de sensu et contextu verborum.'—Bellarm., lib. ii., de Sacram. Euchar., cap. xxii., p. 618, out of Sixtus Senensis.

[" § Hosius's copy reads, 'Hic Petro primatus datur; Pamelius, leaving both hic and et, 'Primatus Petro datur.'

[" ‖ The author of 'The Grounds of the Old Religion and of the New,' in the very conclusion of the book, in his answer to M. Crashaw's book of 'Romish Forgeries and Falsifications.'

Latin, the other in the vulgar tongue; the one a man of great name, the other without either name or fame; the one calls himself James Gretser, a Jesuit; the other shall go under the name of an 'unknown author of a Treatise of the Grounds of the Old and New Religion, printed anno Domini 1608.' Where you may observe that the author's name is purposely obscured, and the place where the book was printed concealed, a sign of no good meaning, as the learned Cardinal showeth: * 'For every one that doth ill hateth the light, and cometh not to the light, that his works may not be controlled. But he that doth verity, cometh to the light, that his works may be made manifest, that they were done in God.' (John iii. 20, 21.) † "] ‡

CHAPTER VII.

SUPREMACY—SUBJECT CONTINUED.

PETER WAS NOT BISHOP OF ROME. 1. Whether he ever was at Rome. This is not clearly declared in the New Testament: 2. Known only by tradition: 3. The Fathers imposed on by false testimony. Papias the highest source of information. His character: 4. Incredibility of his statements: 5. The time of Peter being at Rome cannot be made out, and is contrary to the authentic accounts of him in the New Testament: 6. It is inconsistent with itself. Whether he was Bishop of Rome: 7. Scripture does not assert it: 8. Nor did he found the Church at Rome: 9. Irenæus contradicts it: 10. Not Bishop of Rome twenty-five years, and of Antioch seven years: 11. The patrons of this opinion confute themselves: 12. The offices of Bishop and Apostle incompatible: 13. What meant by apostolic throne, chair, &c.: 14. How or by whom was Peter made Bishop: 15. It was needless he should be Bishop: 16. His being such would be a bad example of non-residence: 17. The same authority which makes Peter Bishop of Rome, makes Paul Bishop also. Whether Peter continued Bishop of Rome: 18. Statement of ecclesiastical writers on this point: 19. No Apostle was Bishop of Rome except in a very extensive sense: 20. Any Apostle could preside at Rome: 21. Was James Bishop of Rome? 22. The Popes call themselves successors of Peter and Paul.

PETER WAS NOT BISHOP OF ROME.

There are three questions to be discussed in connexion with the subject before us. First. Whether Peter ever was at Rome? Secondly. Was he Bishop of Rome? And, Thirdly. Did he continue Bishop of Rome after his supposed translation, and did he fill that office at his death?

With regard to the first, Was Peter ever at Rome? it is affirmed with great confidence by the members of the Church of Rome, that Peter was unquestionably in that city. The following remarks are offered on this point:—

1. It is not satisfactorily declared in the New Testament, or in any part of the sacred writings, that Peter was at Rome. That he fixed his episcopal chair in that city, is not proved from Scripture. The only place alleged to prove that Peter was there, is the following:—"The church that is at Babylon, elected together with you, saluteth you." (1 Peter v. 13.) From this it is inferred that Peter was at Rome, because by the term "Babylon" Rome is meant. That he did not write from that city, but from Babylon, in Chaldea, will be proved from Scripture. Some of their own learned authors grant this.

(1.) In the first century the ancient Babylon, on the Euphrates, was still in existence; there was also a city on the Tigris, Seleucia, called New Babylon, about three hundred stadia from Old Babylon. It is true, the latter city, compared with its original splendour, might be called, at this time, desolated; yet it was neither wholly a heap of ruins, nor destitute of inhabitants, according to Strabo, who lived in the time of Tiberius: for he says that Alexander proposed to build there a pyramid; that the Persians destroyed a part of Babylon; that they neglected it; but that Babylon had suffered most from the building of Seleucia, or New Babylon, which became the capital of the country, by which the more ancient place was deprived of its inhabitants.

The notion of a spiritual or mystical Babylon is confuted by Josephus,* who informs us that Hyrcanus, the Jewish High-Priest, was banished by Phraates, King of Parthia, thirty-six years before Christ, with permission to live in Babylon, where there were many Jews, and that all of that nation who dwelt there, and in the country as far as the Euphrates, acknowledged Hyrcanus as High-Priest. Now, the word "Babylon" means a city in the east, either Old or New Babylon, but most probably the former. The Epistle of Peter is addressed to the "dispersed Jews throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia;" (1 Peter i. 1;) which agrees with the literal meaning of the text, namely, that he actually wrote his letter from Babylon in Chaldea, as a central place whence he addressed his Jewish brethren.

(2.) Baronius † says that the Epistle of Peter was written A. D. 45. He says, with Petavius, and others, that Peter went to Rome in the second year of Claudius, or the year 44. But a learned Roman Catholic, Valesius,‡ confutes these authorities from Scripture and history, plainly showing, that Peter was always in Judea or Syria, till the death of Herod Agrippa, which was the fourth of Claudius, and forty-sixth of Christ; and, therefore, it was impossible that Peter should write that Epistle from Rome in the forty-fifth year of the Christian era.

(3.) It appears, also, from what St. Luke says, (Acts xv., &c.,) that Peter continued in Judea till the Council met at Jerusalem, concerning the question of circumcision and the ceremonial law; for he was present. This was in the year 51, according to Bellarmine, Baronius, and others; or, on the testimony of Valesius, in the year 49, which is even more probable. If Peter wrote in the year 45, he must have written several years before his arrival in that city.

(4.) It is farther evident that Peter was not at Rome when the Council sat at Jerusalem, whether in 49 or 51; for he was in the latter city. Paul says, (Gal. i. 18,) that three years after his conversion, which occurred about 37, he went to Jerusalem to see Peter, where he found him. Fourteen years after, or about the year 51, he ["* 'Refutatur impudentia Angli cujusdam Calviniani, vociferantis, scripta Patrum a Catholicis depravari.'—Jac. Grets. De Jure et Modo prohib. Lib. malos, lib. ii., cap. vii., the contents of that chapter, p. 123.

["† 'Hæc sane non boni operis argumenta sunt.'—Bellarm. in Tr. adversus Barclaium, in Præf."]

[‡ A Treatise of the Corruptions of Scripture, Councils, and Fathers, part ii., pp. 75—83. London, 1843.]

[* Joseph. Antiq., book xv., chap. ii., vol. i., p. 594. 8vo. London, 1825.

[† "Quod vero sicut hoc anno, ita etiam Romæ eadem a Petro Epistola scripta fuerit, Patres omnes qui de ea re sermonem habuerunt, expresse testati sunt; quod et ex illis ejusdem Epistolæ verbis collegerunt, quibus in fine dicitur: Salutat vos ecclesia, quæ est in Babylone collecta. Per Babylonem enim Romam intellexisse, absque ulla dubitatione confirmant."—Baronii Annal. Eccles., A. D 45, sect. xvi., p. 344, tom. i. Fol. Antv., 1610.]

‡ Euseb., Eccl. Hist., book ii., chap. 14. Cambridge, 1683.

again went to Jerusalem, and again found Peter there. According to the Roman Catholic computation, in the year 51 Peter had sat eight years as Bishop of Rome: and yet Paul neither sought nor found him at that time at Rome, but at Jerusalem. They say that he continued in the former city twenty-five years, and was martyred A. D. 68, so that the twenty-five years would commence A. D. 43; and then, A. D. 49 or A. D. 51, he would have been six or eight years at Rome; which is contradicted by the New-Testament account.

(5.) It has been proved that Peter wrote this first Epistle to the dispersed of the Jews, (1 Peter i. 1,) whose metropolis was Babylon. And when he observed, "The church at Babylon salutes you," he intended, agreeably to the common epistolary style, that they should know where he was, and who they were who saluted them; which was impossible for them to have done, if by Babylon he meant Rome. At that time Rome neither was nor could have been known to any by the name of Babylon, as no writer had ever so called it. It is true, St. John, who wrote fifty years afterward, calls Rome, Babylon. But he wrote prophetically, and therefore employed types, figures, and metaphors, to express future things. But that Peter, when writing on the duties and precepts of the Gospel, should use types and figures to such an extent as to adopt the word "Babylon" in speaking of Rome, must not be admitted. It cannot, therefore, be proved from Scripture, that Peter was ever in the imperial city.

2. That Peter was at Rome, can only be known by tradition. This, like most others, will scarcely stand the test of strict and impartial examination. Tradition must be treated as a notorious liar, to whom we ought not to give credit, unless what it asserts is confirmed by other testimony on which we can rely. If it be affirmed by tradition alone, we must suspend our belief till we obtain more competent witness. That Peter was at Rome, or that he was the Bishop of that place, we learn only by oral evidence; which states so many strange things concerning his visit, that the whole appears romantic.

It is said that Peter went to that city chiefly to oppose Simon, the magician; that at their first interview, at which Nero was present, Simon flew into the air, in the sight of the Emperor and the city; but that the devil, who had thus raised him, struck with terror at the name of Jesus, whom the Apostle invoked, let him fall to the ground, by which he broke his legs. Should the truth of this tradition be disputed at modern Rome, you are shown the print of Peter's knees in the stone on which he prayed, and another, still red with the blood of Simon.

The Romans, we are further told, enraged at Peter for maiming their teacher and bringing him into disgrace, vowed his destruction. Whereupon the Apostle thought it advisable to retire for a while from the city, and on reaching the gate is said to have met our Saviour, who, when Peter asked him whither he was journeying, replied, "I am going to Rome, to be crucified anew." This Peter took as a reproof for his flight; whereupon he returned, and was soon afterward seized by the citizens, and, by order of the Emperor, was crucified. These and many similar stories we must receive, if we admit that Peter was at Rome, since the whole is established on the same authority.

The account of Peter being at Rome must depend on human and fallible testimony, or tradition. The whole Papal monarchy and infallibility rest upon the assertion that Peter was the Bishop of Rome, and the grounds we have to assure us of his ever being there are extremely doubtful: hence it follows, that our faith and belief of the Pope's supremacy must also be dubious and uncertain. How then comes it to pass, that it is an article of the Popish faith, that the Bishop of Rome is Vicar of Christ, and Peter's successor? which article they promise, swear, and vow to believe and profess constantly, to their latest breath.

3. The statements of the Fathers show that they were imposed upon by false traditions. It is upon the authority of uncertain oral testimony that the oldest authors maintain that Peter preached the Gospel in the capital of the Roman empire. These are Arnobius,* Cyril of Jerusalem,† Eusebius,‡ Irenæus,§ and others. These have all supposed Peter to have been at Rome, who, together with Paul, planted Christianity in that metropolis of the world. But this they took upon tradition; and consequently their authority is of no greater weight than mere assertion, which had they duly examined, they would neither have believed, nor transmitted it to posterity. If we look into the sources of all ecclesiastical history, from the period of the Apostles to that of Constantine, which was about three hundred and twenty years, during which time there were not less than thirty-three Bishops of Rome, we shall find but little of moment, except what the sacred Scriptures have given. There is no authority that obliges, nor reason that persuades, us to believe anything positive which pertains to the transactions of the church. It does not appear from what quarter we have the lives of the Apostles and other holy men, inasmuch as there was no collection of them till after the reign of Constantine. What was afterward put in writing, has been often altered, many things having been corrupted or expunged, according to the sentiments of the historians. The Lives of the Saints, by Ribadeneira, Chaplain to Philip II., when he married Queen Mary, of England, is a work comparatively modern; and, judging from the errors of that author on subjects of English history, great doubt must rest on his narrative. There is no agreement in the succession of the Bishops of Rome, and very little record of their jurisdiction, no particular account of their election, or how they came to be chosen, till three hundred years after Christ.

We shall examine particularly the source of the tradition from whence it is inferred that Peter was at Rome, or that Babylon, in the Epistle of Peter, (1 Peter v. 13,) actually meant Rome.

Papias, in Eusebius,‖ is cited; and the account, as given by him, reads thus. Eusebius, as quoted in the margin, makes Papias say: "Peter makes mention of Mark in the first Epistle, which he is also said to have composed at the city of Rome, and that he shows this fact by calling the city by an unusual trope, Babylon; thus: 'The church at Babylon, elected together with you, saluteth you, as also my son Marcus.'" The truth of this depends on the authority of Papias, Bishop of

[* Arnobii Disputat. Adver. Gentes, lib. ii. Fol. Romæ, 1562.]

[† Cyril. Hieros. Opera, Catech. vi., De Hæres., cap. xv., p. 96. Ed. Ben. Fol. Paris, 1720.]

‡ Eccl. Hist., book ii., chap. 14, 15. Fol. Camb., 1683.

[§ "Petrus et Paulus Romæ evangelizarunt et fundarunt ecclesiam."—Irenæi Opera, Advers. Hæres., lib. iii., cap. i. "Omnium ecclesiarum enumerare successiones, maximæ, et antiquissimæ, et omnibus cognitæ, a gloriosissimis duobus Apostolis Petro et Paulo Romæ fundatæ et constitutæ ecclesiæ, eam quam habet ab Apostolis traditionem et annuntiatam hominibus fidem, per successiones Episcoporum," &c.—Idem, cap. iii. Fol. Genev., 1570.]

‖ Eccl. Hist., book ii., chap. xv., p. 51. 8vo. edit. London, 1838.

Hierapolis, and those who follow him. Little credit is to be given to Papias in this, or almost in anything else, from what Eusebius says concerning him.

The same historian, when speaking of the writings of Papias, represents them as worthy of small credence. Irenæus is referred to, who declares that Papias was a hearer of John the Apostle, and the associate of Polycarp. To this, the historian replies: "Papias himself by no means asserts that he was a hearer and an eye-witness of the holy Apostles, but informs us he received the doctrines of faith from their intimate friends." He then quotes the Bishop as saying, that "he received his information from the Elders, or those who followed the Apostles; for he did not derive so much benefit from books as from the voice of those who are still living." Hence he received his information, not from the Apostles, but from others; not from documentary evidence, but from hearsay, or tradition.*

That much of what Papias stated is unworthy of belief, is asserted by Eusebius, who, in the same chapter, assures us that he gave certain wonderful accounts, together with other matters, that he seems to have received from tradition. He also records several, which were received by him from unwritten testimony; likewise certain strange parables of our Lord and of his doctrine, with others rather too fabulous. In these he says that there would be a certain millennium after the resurrection, and a coporeal reign of Christ upon the earth; which things he appears to have imagined, as though they were authorized by the apostolic narrations, not understanding correctly those matters which they propounded mystically in their representations. For he was very limited in his comprehension, as is evident from his discourses; yet he was the cause why most of the ecclesiastical writers, who reverenced the man, were carried away by a similar opinion; as, for instance, Irenæus, and others who adopted similar sentiments.

We grant that in Eusebius,† both in the inferior edition of his work, by Christopherson, and in the best, by Hen. Valesius, there are high commendations of him. In Cruse's translation it is said, "At this time, also, Papias was well known as a Bishop of the church at Hierapolis, a man well skilled in all manner of learning, and well acquainted with the Scriptures." Valesius renders the passage thus: "At the same time Papias was famous, a man very eloquent and learned, and well skilled in Scripture." Christopherson even goes farther, and says that, besides his knowledge of Scripture, "he was a man certainly most learned in all other arts." Now, this commendation of Papias is so far from having any authority from Eusebius, that it appears a plain forgery; because,

First. It contradicts the character which that historian gives of him in the thirty-ninth chapter of the same book.

Secondly. Ruffinus, who translated Eusebius, says: "About this time flourished Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna, and Papias, Bishop of Hierapolis." This is the reading of the printed edition of Ruffinus, by Rhenanus, with which agrees a very ancient manuscript of that translator. In these there is not one word of that commendation of Papias which is now extant in Eusebius: consequently we may conclude that it was not formerly there.

Thirdly. Valesius, a learned Roman Catholic, who published an edition of Eusebius, acknowledges, that of three or four Greek manuscripts which he made use of, not one of them contained that commendation of Papias; and therefore he imagines that these words were added by some ignorant scholiast, contrary to the judgment and sense of the historian. For, says he, "How is it possible that Eusebius should call Papias a most learned man, and most skilled in Scripture, who, in the same book, says, he was a rude and simple person, and of very little judgment?"*

Fourthly. There are plain proofs found in Papias himself that he was ignorant and unskilled in Scripture. He says that Philip, whose daughters were Prophetesses, was the Apostle of that name; whereas, in the Acts of the Apostles, (chap. vi. 5,) he is expressly represented as Philip the Deacon.† Papias said, that "hearing oral traditions was more profitable than reading Scripture." But John informs us, that though he wrote such things as were sufficient to salvation, yet he left out much that he thought to be unnecessary. Papias prefers to revelation, the unwritten tradition concerning our Saviour, which the Apostles had omitted as unimportant. Thus, in contradiction of the Holy Spirit, he calls tradition more useful than the recorded and inspired writings of the Evangelists. Here his ignorance and want of judgment are manifest.

4. Now, although Papias had among his traditions strange and novel parables and doctrines concerning our Saviour and other things more fabulous, and fell into various errors chiefly by his ignorance and misunderstanding of Scripture, yet he is the principal witness that the Papacy has brought forward in order to prove that Peter was at Rome, and that Babylon, in the Epistle of Peter, signifies that city. They have no other text of Scripture that favours their interpretation, and only the authority of Papias for that. All other ecclesiastical historians copy the error of that writer. Such is the ground that Popery has to show that Peter was at Rome.

5. Neither that Apostle nor any of the sacred writers give the least intimation that he was in the imperial city. We are told of his being at Antioch, Jerusalem, Corinth, Babylon, &c.; but there is no mention of his visiting Rome. The silence of Paul on this subject must also be a more convincing proof of this fact than all the authorities that can be collected to the contrary. In the Epistles of St. Paul to the Romans, Galatians, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, Timothy, and to Philemon, no mention is made of Peter.

According to the testimony of Papal Doctors, St. Peter was Bishop of Rome twenty-five years; namely, from A. D. 43 to A. D. 68. Now, though we have eight instances during that period in which Paul communicated with Rome, once by writing to them, six times when writing from Rome, and once, at least, during an abode of two years in that city, still there is no hint given that Peter was there during any of these times; and we cannot suppose that he was there, and that St. Paul would take no notice of him. This appears, not only extraordinary, but incredible, if we examine into the circumstances connected with these communications, and the language which that Apostle employs. St. Paul

* Eccles. Hist., book ii., chap. xxxix., pp. 108—110.

† Idem, book iii., chap. xxxvi., p. 104.

[* "Quomodo enim fieri potest, ut Eusebius Papiam hic appellet virum doctissimum et Scripturarum peritissimum? cum ipsemet in fine hujus libri diserte affirmet, Papiam fuisse mediocri ingenio præditum, planeque rudem ac simplicem."—Euseb. Eccles. Hist., lib. iii., cap. xxxvi., cum Annot. Vales., tom. i., p. 130. Fol. Cantab., 1720.]

† Idem, book iii., cap. 39.

wrote to the Galatians from the city of Rome, A. D. 52. He and Timothy join in the address to the Colossian church. (Col. i. 1, 2.) Surely some mention would have been made of Peter, had he been there. A. D. 58 he wrote his Epistle to the Romans. And though he salutes a number of persons, and many of the highest repute, Peter is not mentioned. (Rom. xvi. 3—16.) Had Peter been at Rome at this period, as the Angel, Bishop, or Minister in pastoral charge of that church, some notice, doubtless, would have been made of him; especially as Paul salutes so many, specifying twenty-five of them by name, with several households, and others who are not named. This is the more strange, as the custom was to salute those persons of greatest note, and especially Ministers of the word. In the Epistle to the Romans there is no reference made to the presence of Peter at Rome previous to the year 58, though, according to the Roman Catholic computation, he had been already fifteen years Bishop in that city. Nothing is said with regard to his coming to, or being at, Rome, at any future time, as head of the church, or even in any other capacity. The inference, therefore, is, that Peter never was at Rome.

In the Epistle to the Ephesians, written at Rome about 61, there is no mention that Peter had been in that city, or that he was there at that time, or that he was expected at any future period. About A. D. 62 Paul wrote to the Philippians; and although he associates Timothy with himself in saluting that church at the commencement of his Epistle, and also in the salutations at the close of it, "the brethren that were with him," especially "those of Cæsar's household," not one word is said concerning Peter. St. Paul wrote to the Colossians about the year 62. Peter could not have been there, when Paul, after mentioning Tychicus, Onesimus, Aristarchus, Marcus, and Justus, adds, "These ONLY are my fellow-workers unto the kingdom of God, which have been a comfort unto me." (Col. iv. 11.) In the Epistle to Philemon, written from Rome about A. D. 62, no mention is made of Peter. When Paul appealed to Cæsar, and had been sent to Rome for that purpose, he tarried two full years in the city preaching the Gospel; but there is no account of Peter being there on his arrival, or during his two years' residence, or at the time of his departure from that capital. (Acts xxviii.) The second Epistle to Timothy was written A. D. 65 or A. D. 66. Paul says, "At my first answer, no man stood with me, but all men forsook me." (2 Tim. iv. 16.) Had Peter been there, doubtless he would not have forsaken him. This was immediately previous to the death of St. Paul. (2 Tim. iv. 6.) He nevertheless tells Timothy, that "Eubulus, Pudens, Claudia, and all the brethren" did salute him. (Verse 21.) There is no mention made of Peter.

Here are six distinct times in which St. Paul was either at Rome, or wrote to and from that city for the edification of the churches. In one year he wrote thrice from thence. At another time he remained two full years preaching in his own hired house; including, on the whole, a period of not less than thirteen or fourteen years. The Apostle gives no account that Peter was expected there subsequent to any of his visits, or that he was there previous to his arrival, or during his stay. Yet St. Paul governed the affairs of the church at Rome, gave directions for their conduct, and mentioned by name, in his salutations, all the principal Christians in the city, whether men or women. Still he says not one word about Peter, who, according to the Romanists, had his throne there, and governed the church, previous to Paul's arrival, during his residence, and after his departure. Certainly, if Peter had been at Rome, some mention would have been made of it by Paul. Indeed, there is no evidence that Peter ever was in that city. And, as it cannot be proved that he ever was Bishop or Pope of Rome, the key-stone of the supremacy is removed, and the entire fabric falls. Though the decision of this question is not an article of faith among Protestants, it is connected with one of the Church of Rome; namely, the supremacy of the Pope, which stands or falls with it.

6. The traditionary account of Peter having been at Rome, is not only contrary to the authentic record which we have in the New Testament, but inconsistent with itself.

"Concerning the time of his coming to Rome," says Fulke, "the ancient writers do not agree. Eusebius saith it was in the time of Claudius; but by Hierom, who saith he sat there twenty-five years, until the last year of Nero, it must follow that he came thither the second or third of Claudius: yet Damasus saith he came to Rome in the beginning of Nero's empire, and sat there twenty-five years; whereas Nero reigned but fourteen years. He saith, also, that his disputation with Simon Magus was in the presence of Nero the Emperor. Eusebius reporteth it under Claudius. Anterius, Bishop of Rome, as Nicephorus testifieth, did write that Peter was translated from Antioch to Rome, and from thence he passed to Alexandria, because he might more profit the church there."* These are all matters of tradition, reported many hundreds of years after the death of Peter, and entitled to no credit. Had there been any foundation for the belief that the Apostle was ever at Rome, or had been Bishop there, such confusion and contradiction would not have been found.

The second point embraced in this chapter, is to consider "whether Peter were Bishop of Rome." From what has been said, it is doubtful whether Peter were ever at Rome at all; but allowing him to have been there, it remains to be proved that he was Bishop of that city. The friends of the supremacy employ their utmost efforts to prove that he was so, being well assured that much depends upon that point.

In proof, however, that Peter never was Bishop of the imperial city, we adduce the following arguments:—

7. That he was Bishop of Rome, or of any other place, no proof is found in Scripture; and therefore the support of his Roman bishopric must be sought elsewhere. Had he been at Rome, such a fact would not have proved him Bishop there: he was at Jerusalem, Samaria, Joppa, &c.; yet he was not Bishop of any of these places, as our opponents confess.

8. St. Peter did not found the Church of Rome, because,

First. Is it likely that the Christian faith was withheld from that city for the space of twelve years after the resurrection of Christ? for so long was it before Peter is said to have visited Rome.

Secondly. It is probable that Paul preached at Rome before Peter; for when he came to that city he called the Jews together, who declared that they had heard nothing concerning him by letter, or from the brethren of Judea. (Acts xxviii. 21.) If Peter had been there, Paul, no doubt, would have been known to them, at least by name. The Jews also said unto him, "We will hear of thee what thou thinkest." It appears, therefore, that the Jews at Rome had not previously heard the Gospel. But if Peter had been among them, to whom the Jews were particularly consigned, he certainly would have taken care to preach Christ unto them.

[* Fulke's Confutation of the Rhemish Annotators, Rom. xvi. 14, p. 263. Folio. London, 1589.]

Thirdly. It is not even certain that Peter and Paul conjointly founded the church at Rome. The probability is that Paul was not at Rome till after he had written his Epistle to that church. (Rom. i. 8.) It is even still more probable that no Apostle whatever was employed in this work, and that the Gospel was first preached by those who were converted on the day of Pentecost: for we find from Acts ii. 10, that there were at Jerusalem "strangers of Rome, Jews and proselytes;" who, on their return, preached the Gospel. We find that there were Christians in the imperial city before St. Paul visited them. He refers to them, Rom xvi. 7; he mentions "Andronicus and Junia, who were in Christ before" him.

Fourthly. Though Peter may have preached at Rome, it cannot follow that he was Bishop there: other Apostles founded churches, over which they were never placed in such an office.

9. Irenæus * expressly states, that "Peter and Paul, who founded the church at Rome, made Linus Bishop; to him succeeded Anacletus; after him, in the third place from the Apostles, was Clement." † Eusebius says the same thing,* and places Linus first, afterwards Anacletus, and thirdly Clemens, thus excluding Peter and Paul from the Roman Episcopacy. Irenæus and Eusebius believed Paul and Peter to have been founders of the Roman Church, but that neither of them was a Bishop there. Valesius, a learned Roman Catholic, saw and publicly acknowledged this.† Besides, Eusebius, in two instances cited,‡ places Paul before Peter: if he believed that Peter were supreme Monarch over the Church and over his colleagues also, he offered a great affront and injury to that Apostle, by the preference which he gave to St. Paul.

10. It cannot be shown that Peter was primarily Bishop of Antioch for seven years, and subsequently Bishop of Rome for twenty-five. The authority for this is the Chronicon of Eusebius. But although that historian says, that Peter founded the church at Antioch, and afterwards by our Saviour's command went to Rome,§ he is so far from asserting, that Peter was seven years Bishop of Antioch, that he expressly declares, that Euodias was the first Bishop of that city. ‖ When Baronius

[* "Fundantes igitur et instruentes beati Apostoli Ecclesiam, Lino episcopatum administrandæ Ecclesiæ tradiderunt. Hujus Lini Paulus in his quæ sunt ad Timotheum epistolis meminit. Succedit autem ei Anacletus; post eum tertio loco ab Apostolis episcopatum sortitur Clemens, qui et vidit ipsos Apostolos, et contulit cum eis, cum adhuc insonantem prædicationem Apostolorum et traditionem ante oculos haberet."—Irenæi Opera, Advers. Hæres., lib. iii., cap. iii., p. 171. Fol. Geneva, 1570.]

[† "Dr. Wiseman, in his 'Lectures on the Doctrines of the (Roman) Catholic Church,' singularly enough adduces this passage from Irenæus," observes Mr. Faber, "for the purpose of demonstrating, that Peter was the first Bishop of Rome, and thence, that the Roman Bishop must needs be the inheritor of Peter's imaginary rockship. After observing, that, among the moderns, no ecclesiastical writer of any eminence pretends to deny the fact, that Peter was the first Bishop of Rome; the Lecturer, in evidence of the fact, cites Irenæus as speaking in terms following:—'To Peter, succeeded Linus; to Linus, Anacletus; then, in the third place, Clement.' (Iren. Adv. Hæres., lib. iii., cap. iii.) I have carefully given the citation, with its appended reference, precisely as both are given by Dr. Wiseman; (Lect. viii., vol. i., p. 278;) and I readily admit, that the passage, purporting to be cited from the oldest author who details the foundation of the Roman Church, and the succession of her early Bishops down to Eleutherius the twelfth, clearly and distinctly propounds Peter to have been the first Bishop of this Church, and Linus to have been his immediate successor. This I readily admit; and no thanks to me, for the adduced passage is imperative; but, unluckily for Dr. Wiseman's cited testimony, no such passage occurs, either in the place referred to, or, I will venture to say, in any other place of the work of Irenæus. The account which that very ancient Father really gives of the matter, differs toto cœlo from that, which, through the medium of a non-occurring citation, is gravely ascribed to him by Dr. Wiseman. It is as follows:—The Church of Rome, he tells us, was founded and organized, not by Peter singly, but by Peter and Paul conjointly; and when the two Apostles, not one of them, but the two, had thus conjointly founded and organized the Roman Church, the two, still the two, conjointly delivered to Linus (who stood to the two Apostles exactly in the same ecclesiastical relation as Titus and Timothy severally stood to Paul alone in their respective capacities of the first Bishops of Crete and Ephesus) the episcopate for the purpose of administering their newly-founded Church. Thus, in point of authoritative derivation from the two apostolical joint-founders, Linus stood as the first Bishop; and thence, since he was succeeded by Anacletus, and Anacletus by Clement, Clement himself is, of course, represented as holding the episcopate in the third place; or, in other words, as being the third Bishop. That there may be no room for misapprehension, I subjoin a correct citation from Irenæus. 'Antiquissimæ et omnibus cognitæ, a gloriosissimis duobus Apostolis Petro et Paulo Romæ fundatæ et constitutæ Ecclesiæ, eam quam habet ab Apostolis traditionem, indicantes, confundimus omnes eos, qui, quoquo modo, præter oportet, colligunt. Fundantes igitur et instruentes beati Apostoli Ecclesiam, Lino EPISCOPATUM administrandæ Ecclesiæ tradiderunt. Hujus Lini, Paulus, in his quæ sunt ad Timotheum epistolis, meminit. Succedit autem ei Anacletus. Post eum, tertio loco ab Apostolis, EPISCOPATUM sortitur Clemens; qui et vidit ipsos Apostolos, et contulit cum eis, cum adhuc insonantem prædicationem Apostolorum et traditionem ante oculos haberet.' Dr. Wiseman is aware, I conclude, that, from certain historical difficulties, many have doubted, whether Peter was ever at Rome at all, or, at least, whether he suffered martyrdom there; but, so far as my own judgment goes, I cannot set aside the express testimony of such an ancient and competent writer as Irenæus, a testimony, indeed, not going to the extent of his being the first Bishop of Rome, which, according to the plain statement of that venerable Father, he no more was than his co-operator, St. Paul, but to his having both visited Rome, and concurred in the authoritative organization of the infant community. The most whimsical part of the matter is yet to come. Peter, if we may depend upon the very oldest historical evidence, most certainly was never Bishop of Rome; but, according to Dr. Wiseman, he was Bishop of Antioch. Now, if the Lecturer be correct in this last particular, then the true heir of Peter's fancied rockship, on the two-fold supposition, first, that Peter was the rock, and next, that the rockship was hereditary, must have been the line of his episcopal successors, the Bishops of Antioch, not the line of the Bishops of Rome, who were NOT his episcopal successors. So far as the Patriarchal dignity and prerogative are concerned, Dr. Wiseman himself makes the Antiochian Prelates the heirs of Peter: the reason why he mercilessly deprives them of all right and title to the rockship is more easily understood and explained, than the ingenious Lecturer's consistency. I give his own statement, as a real dialectical curiosity. 'Peter first sat in the chair of Antioch; and that chair has ever retained its dominion over a large portion of the east. In like manner, therefore, IF, to the See of Rome, he brought not merely the Patriarchate of the west, but the primacy over the whole world, this accidental jurisdiction became inherent in the See, and heritable by entail to his successors.' (Lect. viii., vol. i., p. 279.) Indisputably as the saw runs, your IF is a great peace-maker. To give its full value to Dr. Wiseman's IF, nothing is wanting save historical testimony. His conclusion would be highly respectable, provided only his premises had been established!!"—Faber on Transubstantiation, pp. 62—65. 8vo. London, 1840.]

* Eccles. Hist., book iii., chap. ii., iv., xxi. 8vo. London, 1838.

[† "Quippe Irenæus, perinde ac Eusebius noster, Petrum ac Paulum Apostolos Romanam quidem Ecclesiam fundavisse dicit; sed eos in Episcoporum ordine nequaquam recenset. Eodem sensu in hæresi Cerdonianorum Epiphanius ait Hyginum post Jacobum, Petrum ac Paulum Apostolos, nonum Episcopalis successionis locum tenuisse. Si quis ex hoc loco contenderet Jacobum fuisse Episcopum urbis Romæ una cum Petro, is profecto ridiculus haberetur."—Euseb. Eccles. Hist., lib. iii., cap. xxi.; Cum Annot. Valesii, tom. i. Fol. Cantab., 1720.]

‡ Eccles. Hist., book iii., chap. ii., xxi. 8vo. London, 1838.

[§ "Petrus Apostolus Antiochenam Ecclesiam fundavit," &c.—Euseb. Chron., col. 557, A. Fol. Burdigalæ, 1604.]

[‖ "Inter eos, qui Antiochiæ Ecclesiam gubernarunt, primus Euodias."—Idem, col. 563, A.]

cited the Chronicon of Eusebius to prove that Peter was twenty-five years a Bishop of Rome, he was egregiously mistaken.* The place to which he refers in that work, says no such thing.† Baronius did not understand Greek: he followed the Latin translations, interpolated and corrupted by Roman device; and was consequently misled.

St. Peter's episcopacy at Antioch rests on no adequate ground. We do not find from Scripture, that he was more than once in that city; (Gal. ii. 11—13, &c.;) nor is there reference to any act of his, except that he dissembled, for which he was reprehended by St. Paul. Now, it is evident, that Paul was at Antioch for a whole year, and established the church there; (Acts xi. 26;) confirmed the believers in the faith; (Acts xiv. 22;) ordained Elders to govern them; (verse 23;) remained there a long time; (verses 26—28;) and continued to preach the Gospel in that city. (Acts xv. 35.) If we are to believe the Papacy, Peter was Bishop there, and not Paul. The truth is, that neither of them filled the episcopal chair at Antioch or elsewhere.

It is incredible, that Peter, who is termed the supreme head of the church, should be for the space of thirty-two years Bishop of the two principal churches, Rome and Antioch, and that during the lifetime of the Apostles; and yet none of them, in their writings, should say any thing concerning his episcopal acts during that period. Baronius censures Luke for having left out this account when he compiled the Acts of the Apostles.‡

11. The advocates of the opinion that Peter was Bishop of both these places, confute themselves by their position; though they agree that Peter was so long Bishop of these two places. This appears from the statements of Onuphrius, Baronius, and Bellarmine. (1.) The former asserts, that Peter remained in Judea till the year 43; after this he was Bishop of Antioch seven years, that is, until A. D. 50; and that subsequently he was twenty-five years Bishop of Rome, or to the year 75. And yet he gravely says, that Peter died in 69.§ (2.) Baronius observes, that Peter came to Antioch A. D. 39, of which city he was Bishop seven years, or until A. D. 46. ‖ And then he states, that Peter went to Rome, and was Bishop there twenty-five years, or till 71. But Baronius also tells us, that Peter died in the year 69.¶ (3.) Bellarmine maintains the same opinion with Baronius, though so full of error and ridiculous; not only in contradiction to Onuphrius, but to Eusebius, Jerome, Epiphanius, &c., whose opinions that annalist endeavours to confute.* In short, neither Scripture nor antiquity affords any foundation for such positions. The Greek Chronicon of Eusebius, written four hundred years after Christ, and corrupted in a Latin version, is the only document on which they profess to rely.

12. The office of a Bishop was incompatible with that of an Apostle. Therefore, had Peter been a Bishop of Rome, it would have confounded offices which God had made distinct. He appointed "first Apostles, then Prophets, then Pastors and Teachers." (1 Cor. xii. 28; Eph. iv. 11.) Peter could not have become a Bishop; because it would have been as great an irregularity as if a Bishop had been made a Deacon.

The offices of Bishop and Apostle are inconsistent with each other. The latter was immediately called of God; the Bishops and Pastors were appointed by the Apostles. The apostolic office was general; but the office of Pastor was confined to some flock, or to a portion of it. The office of the Apostle was extraordinary and for a time; the office of Pastor was to continue always. He that has the general charge, cannot perform the duties of the particular charge; and he that is occupied with a particular one, cannot discharge the duties of a general one. Either of these offices was sufficient for one man.

Peter's general charge of converting and inspecting the Jews, or his apostleship of the circumcision, (Gal. ii. 8,) requiring much travelling, does not agree with his assuming the episcopal office at Rome; especially at the time when he is made to assume it, which was in the days of Claudius, who banished all Jews from his capital. (Acts xviii. 2.) Had Peter been chosen Bishop of the church at Rome, he could not have accepted of the office without laying down that of his apostleship, received from his Lord and Master, and which made it obligatory on him to go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature. Upon Paul came daily the care of all the churches, especially of the Gentiles; and upon Peter that of the Jewish churches, as seems to have been intimated by the providence of God, and the suggestions of the Holy Ghost, and agreed to by the Apostles themselves. (Gal. ii. 7.)

Baronius says of St. Peter, that "it was his office not to stay in one place, but as much as possible to travel over the world, not only to bring those who did not believe to the obedience of the faith, but also to establish believers."† If so, how could he be a consistent Bishop of the church in Rome?

The Apostles were Bishops, doubtless, in one sense of the word; they were overseers or Pastors of Christ's flock, wherever they were; but the constant supervision, or pastoral charge of particular churches, they committed to men who were termed Bishops or Pastors; but wherever the Apostles had their residence, for a time, the Pastors and churches looked up to them as their spiritual fathers. Thus, James in Jerusalem, Peter in Antioch,

* Baronii Eccles. Annal., tom. i., ad ann. 39, sect. ix., p. 269. Antverpiæ, 1610.

[† "Petrus Apostolus, natione Galilæus, Christianorum Pontifex primus, cum primum Antiochenam Ecclesiam fundasset, Romam proficiscitur, ubi Evangelium prædicans 25 annis ejusdem urbis Episcopus perseverat."—Euseb. Chron., col. 157, B.]

‡ Baronii Eccles. Annal., in ann. Christ. 39, sect. viii., p. 269. Antverpiæ, 1610.

[§ "A. D. 43. S. Petrus Apostolorum Princeps in carcerem ab Herode Agrippa conjectus, et miraculose ab angelo liberatus, Romam versus iter arripuit." "A. D. 44. S. Simon Petrus Christianorum Episcopus primus, xv. kal. Februarii Romam primum ingressus, sedit in Pontificatu Romano annos xxiv., m. iii., d. xii." "A. D. 48. Paulus Antiochiæ gentium Apostolus ordinatur. Petrus Antiochiam veniens, septem annis eam rexit Ecclesiam." "A. D. 51. Petrus Antiochiæ, Jacobus Hierosolymis, Johannes Ephesi, Paulus Corinthi ecclesias hoc tempore regebant." "A. D. 56. Petrus Antiochia discedens Episcopum ibidem reliquit Euodium qui sedit annos xiv. Inde Romam rediit, Ecclesiam Romanam, duobus adjutoribus, Lino et Cleto, ordinatis, constituit." "A. D. 68. SS. Petrus et Paulus Apostoli iii. kalend. Julii occisi sunt."—Platina de Vitis Pontif. Rom., cum Annotat. Onuphrii, pp. 10—13. Fol. Coloniæ, 1568.]

‖ Baronii Eccles. Annal., ad ann. 39, sect. viii., ix., tom. i., p. 269. Antverpiæ, 1610.

[¶ "Anno Redemptoris nostri sexagesimo nono, L. Fonteio Capitone, et C. Julio Rufo, Coss., cum jam Nero ex Achaia Romam rediisset, Petrus et Paulus Principes Apostolorum, cum eadem qua semper eidem restitissent constantia, una eademque die, tertio kalend. Julii, ejus jussu diverso mortis genere gloriosum subiere martyrium."—Idem, A. D. 69, tom. i., p. 658, B. Antverpiæ, 1610.]

* Idem, ad ann. 69, sect. ii., tom. i., p. 658, D. Antverpiæ, 1610.

[† "Non erat ejus officii, in uno loco consistere, sed quantum homini licuisset, universum peragrare orbem, et nondum credentes ad fidem perducere, credentes vero in fide penitus stabilire."—Idem, A. D. 58, p. 536, E.]

Paul at Rome, and John at Ephesus, exercised episcopal authority in these places, without being officially connected with them, as their peculiar and special trust.

This is evident from what we find in Ruffinus, who, having mentioned Linus, Cletus, and Clemens, as succeeding each other in the See of Rome, while Peter was living, thus accounts for their episcopacy. "They were," says he, "appointed Bishops by Peter, to the end that, taking upon them the episcopal charge, he might be at leisure to discharge the duties of his apostolical office." This, he tells us, was not a sentiment of his own, but the common opinion.

13. As for the appellations of Apostolic see, chair, throne, &c., given by the ancients to the see of Rome, these import nothing more than that they were instituted by an Apostle, or some one of their successors. These terms were indiscriminately adopted with regard to other sees, as well as to that of Rome. In process of time, the Prelates of that city, by their ambition, appropriated these titles to their own see. They had, as they thought, till the year 1662, sufficient proof that the chair was erected by Peter, and that he sat thereon. Till that period the chair was exposed annually on the 18th of January, the festival of the said chair, for public adoration. While it was cleaning, in order to be set up in some conspicuous place of the Vatican, the twelve labours of Hercules unluckily appeared carved upon it. Giacomo Bartolini, who was present at the discovery, affirms that their worship was not misplaced, since it was paid not to the wood, but to the Prince of the Apostles. Another distinguished author, unwilling to surrender the worship of the chair, attempted to explain the labours of Hercules in a mystical sense, namely, as emblematical of the future exploits of the Popes ! !*

14. How, or by whom, was Peter made Bishop of Rome ? Did our Lord appoint him ? Did the Apostles nominate him ? Did the people choose him ? Did he assume the office himself ? To these questions no answers have been given but such as are ridiculous, absurd, and false. Bellarmine positively affirms, that "God commanded St. Peter to fix his see at Rome." † Elsewhere he contents himself with saying, "It is not improbable that God commanded St. Peter to fix his seat at Rome." ‡

15. It would have been useless for Peter to be a Bishop of Rome, inasmuch as by virtue of his apostleship he could exercise episcopal functions whenever he was present.

16. Had Peter been the Prelate of Rome, he would have acted in opposition to certain excellent ecclesiastical rules, which had either been in practice from the beginning, or, at least, the reason for them had always been good. Had Peter been the Diocesan of Rome, he would have presented an example of non-residence, a practice not allowed in the primitive church ; several canons of Councils interdicting it, and offences akin thereto.§ Later Synods, in more corrupt times, and in the declension of good order, prohibited this practice. The second Council of Lateran, under Innocent II., declares, "We enjoin that churches be not committed to hired Ministers, but that every church that is of ability has its own Priest." * The third Council of Lateran, under Alex. III., chapter xiii., says, "Therefore, when a church, or the ecclesiastical ministry is to be committed to any man, let such a person be found out for this purpose, who can reside upon the place, and discharge the cure for himself ; but if it prove otherwise, then let him who has received lose that which he has taken contrary to the holy canons." It was against rule that any Bishop should desert one church, and transfer himself to another without special reasons.†

17. The same authority which made Peter the Prelate of Rome, would make St. Paul a Bishop also. Irenæus says, "that the Roman Church was founded by the two most glorious Apostles, Peter and Paul." ‡ Dionysius of Corinth, in Eusebius, bears the following testimony, that "at Rome the flourishing seed had been planted by Peter and Paul."§ Epiphanius says, that "Peter and Paul were first at Rome, both Apostles and Bishops." ‖ Eusebius also declares, that "Alexander was the fifth in succession from Peter and Paul ;" ¶ who were not enumerated among their Prelates : if they were, they were equally Bishops of Rome.

Had the Romanists chosen Paul instead of Peter for the primary Bishop of Rome, they might have found many more reasons for the supremacy of the former than of the latter. (1.) The Romans were Gentiles. (2.) Paul was the Apostle of the Gentiles. (3.) Paul was two whole years at Rome ; but it does not appear from Scripture that Peter ever was there. (4.) The care of all the churches lay on Paul ; but of Peter no such thing is said. (5.) Paul made regulations for the churches without any authority from Peter. (6.) Paul wrote a long epistle to the Romans : Peter did no such thing.

Had the Holy Ghost in Scripture expressly told us all this concerning the supremacy of Peter, his claim would have been much higher than it is. Had our Saviour appointed Peter the Apostle of the Gentiles, declaring * Bower's History of the Popes, vol. i., p. 7. 4to. London, 1750. Third edition.

[† "Deus ipse jussit Romæ figi apostolicam Petri sedem ; quæ autem jubet Deus, mutari ab hominibus non possunt."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. i., De Romano Pontifice, lib. iv., cap. iv., col. 813, D. Coloniæ, 1620.]

[‡ "Non est improbabile, Dominum etiam aperte jussisse, ut sedem suam Petrus ita figeret Romæ, ut Romanus Episcopus absolute ei succederet."—Idem, lib. ii., cap. xii., col. 636, A.]

[§ "Quicumque temere et inconsiderate, nec Dei timorem præ oculis habentes, nec ecclesiasticum canonem scientes, Presbyteri vel Diaconi, vel quicumque omnino in canone recensentur, ab ecclesiis secesserint, ii in aliena ecclesia nullo modo recipi debent, sed omnino cogendi sunt in suas ipsorum parochias redire ; vel si perseverent, eos a communione separatos esse oportet. Sin autem etiam ausus fuerit quispiam eum, qui ad alium pertinet, surripere, et in Ecclesia, non consentiente proprio Episcopo, a quo recessit qui in canone censetur, irrita sit ordinatio."—Conc. Labb., tom. ii., Conc. Nicæn. I., can. xvi., col. 35, E. Paris, 1671.

["Si quis Presbyter, vel Diaconus, vel quis omnino ex sacerdotali ordine, relicta sua parochia, in aliam abierit, deinde omnino commigrans, in alia parochia longo tempore versari conatur, ne amplius celebret, maxime si proprio vocanti Episcopo ut in suam parochiam redeat exhortantique non pareat. Si autem in insolentia (ατα̃ξια) omnino perseverat, is omnino a sacro ministerio deponatur. Si autem eum, qui propter hanc causam depositus est, alius Episcopus receperit, ille quoque a communi Synodo puniatur, ut qui ritus ecclesiasticos dissolvat."—Idem, tom. ii., Conc. Antioch., can. iii., col. 563, A.]

[* "Præcipimus etiam ne conductis Presbyteris ecclesiæ, committantur et unaquæque ecclesia, cui facultas suppetit proprium habeat Sacerdotem."—Conc. Labb., tom. x., Conc. Lat. II., can. x., col. 1005, B. Paris, 1671.]

+ Barrow on Supremacy. Works, vol. vii., p. 178. 8vo. edition. Oxford, 1830.

[‡ "Petrus et Paulus Romæ evangelizarunt et fundarunt Ecclesiam."—Iren. adv. Hæres., lib. iii., cap. i. Fol. Genev., 1570.

["Omnibus cognitæ, a gloriosissimis duobus Apostolis Petro et Paulo Romæ fundatæ et constitutæ Ecclesiæ."—Idem, lib. iii., cap. iii.]

§ Euseb. Eccles. Hist., book ii., chap. xxv., p. 66. 8vo. London, 1838.

‖ Epiphanius cont. Hæres., 27. Fol. Basil, 1544.

¶ Euseb. Eccles. Hist., book iv., chap. i., p. 111. 8vo. London, 1838.

that the Romans were Gentiles; that Peter was two whole years at Rome; that the care of all the churches was committed to him; that he made regulations for their government; that he wrote an epistle to the Romans, to confirm them in that faith he had preached among them; —had these things in Scripture been said of Simon, with what confidence might the Papists have asserted his supremacy, and that the Pope was his successor!

Thirdly. Our next inquiry is, "Whether Peter continued Bishop of Rome after his supposed translation, and was Bishop at his death."

18. Ecclesiastical writers affirm that Peter, either alone or with Paul, constituted others Bishops of Rome; therefore Peter never was Bishop. Eusebius quotes Irenæus as saying, "The blessed Apostles, having founded and established the church," (at Rome,) "transmitted the office of the episcopate to Linus."* Hence they did not retain it in their own hands. Tertullian says that "Peter ordained Clement."† The Apostolic Constitutions do not reckon Peter, but Clement, as Bishop. "Let us pray for our Bishop James, for our Bishop Clemens, for our Bishop Euodias," &c. From these we infer, that Peter never was Bishop of Rome. Now when he appointed others, did he resign his episcopacy or retain it? If he resigned, he did not die Bishop of Rome, which shakes the foundation of the supremacy: if he retained it, there were two Bishops on the same see at the same period; which Pope Innocent I., in his Epistle to the Clergy and people of Constantinople, condemned as an irregularity unknown until that time.‡ He certainly did not believe that it had been practised by Peter. Theodoret, in his Ecclesiastical History, says, that when the Emperor Constantius would have Felix sit in the see of Rome together with Liberius, upon the return of the latter from banishment, the people of Rome would not consent to it; crying out, "One God, one Christ, one Bishop." Felix died soon after, upon which Theodoret makes the following remark:—"It was a special providence, that Peter's throne might not suffer infamy, being held by two Prelates."§ He did not believe that it had been held by Peter and Paul at the same time, or by Peter and Linus.

19. If Peter, or any other Apostle, were Bishop of Rome, it was in a large or peculiar sense that they were designated as such. Hence the following quotation from Ruffinus, which he affirms to have descended to him from others:—"Some inquire how, seeing Linus and Cletus were Bishops in the city of Rome before Clement, Clement himself, writing to James, could say, that the see was delivered to him by Peter, whereof this reason has been given us; namely, that Linus and Cletus were indeed Bishops of Rome before Clement, while Peter was yet alive; that they might take the episcopal charge; but he fulfilled the office of the apostleship." It is worthy of note, that the most ancient writers do not style Peter and Paul Bishops of Rome; but say that they founded the Church of Rome, and ordained Bishops for it.

We also observe, that in the catalogues of the Roman Bishops, the Apostles are sometimes enumerated, and sometimes not. Eusebius calls Clement the "third Bishop of Rome," yet he mentions Linus and Anacletus before him.* He says Alexander was the fifth from Peter and Paul, by which, specifying four between Alexander and the Apostles, he excludes the Apostles from the number. This proves that the ancients did not believe the Apostles were Prelates; or at least not in the same sense as others were. It is further to be observed, that the Apostolical Constitutions,† reciting the first Bishops constituted in several churches, do not count among them the Apostles, particularly Peter, Paul, or John.

20. Any Apostle, wherever he resided, was, by virtue of his apostolic office, qualified to exercise episcopal functions. This was acknowledged by all. The use we make of it is, that though Peter may have exercised episcopal functions at Rome, it does not follow that he was Bishop of that city.

21. It is objected, "James, though an Apostle, was appointed Bishop of Jerusalem; and why might not Peter, though an Apostle, undertake the episcopacy of Rome?" It is surprising so much stress should be laid on this objection, since almost every one knows that it is grounded on uncertainty. We subjoin the following as a reply:—

First. It is doubtful whether James, the Bishop of Jerusalem, was an Apostle. Eusebius, one of the greatest antiquarians of former times;‡ the author of the Apostolic Constitutions in divers places;§ Hegesippus, the most ancient historian;‖ Epiphanius;¶ Jerome; with Gregory of Nyssa; Chrysostom; and others, speak of James, Bishop of Jerusalem, as not among the Apostles, but among the seventy disciples. Of the same opinion among moderns are Grotius, Hammond, Valesius, Blondel, Salmasius, &c. It is therefore uncertain whether James, Bishop of Jerusalem, was an Apostle; and consequently the objection can be of no weight.††

Secondly. Allowing that James was an Apostle, there are two senses in which he may be called Bishop of Jerusalem. (1.) There was a special reason why one of the Apostles should be appointed to preside there, that city being the fountain and centre of the Christian religion; there our faith had its birth; the church in that city was very numerous, consisting of many thousands of believing Jews; (Acts xxi. 20;) and thither resorted great numbers of that nation who had been converted in other countries. For these reasons it was expedient that a person of great authority should preside. But there is no special reason why an Apostle should constantly dwell at any other place. Peter espe-

* Euseb., Eccl. Hist., book v., chap. vi., p. 167. London, 1838.

[† "Sicut Romanorum Clementem a Petro ordinatum."—Tertul. Opera, tom. ii., De Præscript. Hæret., cap. xxxii., p. 470. 8vo. Wirceb., 1781.]

‡ Sozomeni Hist. Eccles., lib. viii., cap. xxvi., p. 793. Fol.

[§ "Itaque flecti se passus, jussit optime quidem Liberium de exilio revocari, sed amborum esse communem ecclesiæ administrationem. His literis lectis in circo, exclamavit multitudo, egregiam esse imperatoris sententiam, qui spectatoribus in duas partes divisis et a colore cognominatis, his unum, itemque alteris unum præficeret. Ita dicteriis incessentes imperatoris literas, exclamant uno ore, nam et voces ipsas ponere visum est: Unus Deus, unus Christus, unus Episcopus."—Theodoreti Opera, Hist. Eccles., lib. ii., cap. xvii., p. 851, C. Paris, 1608.]

* Euseb., Eccles. Hist., book iii., chap. 4, 13, 15. 8vo. London, 1838.

[† Conc. Labb., tom. i., Constit. Apost., lib. vii., cap. xlvii., col. 451, A. Fol. Venet., 1728.]

‡ Euseb., Eccles. Hist., book ii., chap. xxiii., p. 61.

§ Conc. Labb., tom. i., Constit. Apost., lib. ii., cap. lv., lib. vi., cap. xii., xiv., lib. vii., cap. xlvii. Fol. Venet., 1728.]

‖ Euseb., Eccles. Hist., book ii., chap. xxiii., p. 61

¶ Epiphan., Cont. Hær. 78. Fol. Basil, 1544.

 Hieron., De Viris Illustr.

†† Barrow on the Supremacy, Works, vol. vii., p. 194. 8vo. Oxford, 1830.

Bower's Hist. of the Popes, vol. i., p. 8.

Dr. Adam Clarke's Preface to his Commentary on the Epistle of St. James, p. 3. 4to. London, 1817.

cially could not, who, besides his general apostleship, had a peculiar mission to the dispersed Jews who were committed to him, and he was therefore compelled to travel extensively, in order to benefit that people. (2.) James, as an Apostle, might have especial charge of Jerusalem, without being a Prelate in the usual acceptation of the term.

Thirdly. But the whole will be more easily reconciled when we consider James not as an Apostle, but as a Pastor or Bishop of Jerusalem by the appointment of the Apostles. So Eusebius would seem to decide when he says, "James, the brother of the Lord, to whom the episcopal seat of Jerusalem was committed by the Apostles."* And again: "James being the first that received the dignity of the episcopate at Jerusalem, from our Saviour himself, as the sacred Scriptures show that he was generally called the brother of Christ."† To the same purpose is the declaration of Epiphanius: "James, the brother of our Lord, was the first Bishop, because our blessed Lord intrusted and resigned to him his own throne on earth, before all others."‡ Hence the ancients frequently call James "Bishop of Bishops," "the Prince of Bishops," &c., because he was the first Bishop of the first see, the mother church; the Apostles being excluded from the number of that order.

For the foregoing reasons we therefore conclude that Peter was not Bishop of Rome in the sense in which it is understood by the Romish hierarchy.

22. The Popes frequently introduce Peter and Paul as their predecessors. Paul III., in his decree for convening the Council of Trent, says, "By the authority of Peter and Paul, the holy Apostles, which we also enjoy on the earth."§ The effigies of the two Apostles are frequently so placed, that the right hand is given sometimes to Paul and occasionally to Peter. These would intimate that at some former time the equality of the Apostles was a current sentiment at Rome, the language or expressions employed declaring it to be retained as an ancient tradition, while the opinion is discarded by the introduction of new terms, which give the supremacy to Peter.

CHAPTER VIII.

SUPREMACY—CONTINUED.

ROMAN Pontiffs do not possess supremacy by God's appointment.—I. THEIR ARGUMENTS DO NOT SUPPORT IT. 1. That from the occupancy of Peter's throne: 2. From Michael, the archangel: 3. From the High-Priest: 4. The Councils: 5. The Fathers considered: 6. That the supremacy is necessary to preserve unity and pure doctrine, investigated: 7. Whether by divine right, ecclesiastical right, or usurpation.—II. THEIR CLAIM IS UNCERTAIN AND FALSE. 1. The principles of it are uncertain: 2. The Pope may not hold it, though Peter did: 3. Such was the opinion of the Fathers: 4. Other Bishops called successors of the Apostles: 5. Instance in the church of Jerusalem: 6. And Antioch: 7. Election of the whole church necessary to create a Pope: 8. There have been vacancies in the Popedom. Ten cases of this.—III. THE SUPREMACY IS DESTITUTE OF WARRANT FROM SCRIPTURE. 1. There is a want of God's declared will. Specimens of their interpretations from Greg. VII. Antoninus: 2. Is unnoticed in the New Testament: 3. No obedience to it required in the word of God: 4. They mention the civil authorities: 5. Peter especially does this: 6. Paul does not mention it.—IV. IT IS DESTITUTE OF THE SUPPORT OF HISTORY. 1. Tradition is defective: 2. History is silent: 3. Not mentioned in ancient creeds: 4. Not adverted to by any expositor of the creeds: 5. Nor by ancient Synods: 6. Those who disclaimed it were not counted heretics: 7. The pagan writers say nothing concerning it: 8. No account of it in the apostolic canons and the Constitutions of Clement: 9. Nor in Dionysius the Areopagite: 10. Nor the apostolic Fathers: 11. Nor in letters to and from Popes: 12. Nor in the early disputes against heretics: 13. All the ancient writers overlook it, as Origen, Hilary, Cyril, Chrysostom, Augustine, &c.: 14. No canon in the code of the ancient church declares it.—V. THE SUPREMACY IS CONTRARY TO SCRIPTURE. 1. It assigns to another the peculiar prerogatives and titles of Christ: 2. It transforms the church from a spiritual to a worldly or political institution: 3. It destroys the equality of Pastors: 4. It infringes on the rights of the church and Pastors: 5. And also of the laity: 6. It interferes with civil government.—VI. SUCH AN AUTHORITY CANNOT BE EXERCISED WITHOUT INJURY TO RELIGION AND THE WELFARE OF MANKIND. 1. The church is too unwieldy for the government of one man in one place: 2. It reduces the church to a state of bondage: 3. It vitiates Christian doctrines: 4. It stands in the way of reformation: 5. It induces a general depravation of manners: 6. It corrupts the Pope: 7. It disturbs civil society, and destroys governments: 8. It does not secure the end it proposes. Does not maintain truth, nor determine controversies, nor promote peace and unity.—VII. IT IS AT VARIANCE WITH THE CHARACTER ASCRIBED TO BISHOPS OR CHIEF PASTORS, IN THE PRIMITIVE CHURCH. 1. The Fathers supposed no orders in the church above Bishops or chief Pastors: 2. Each Bishop was independent: 3. And all were of equal authority: 4. This independence and equality were defended in reference to the Bishop of Rome: 5. The style of address shows this. Many instances of it.—VIII. THE SUPREMACY IS OVERTURNED ON THE VERY GROUND ON WHICH IT IS ASSUMED. 1. The foundation is not of divine right: 2. But the size, dignity, wealth, &c., of the city of Rome: 3. Other Bishops obtained a precedency.

THE Bishops of Rome have not a universal supremacy over the church according to the appointment of God. In support of this proposition we observe:—

I. The arguments by which Romanists attempt to support the doctrine, that the Bishops of Rome have a supremacy which is derived from Peter, do not tend to establish it.

1. Papists assert, "The Pope occupies the chair of St. Peter, and consequently succeeds him in the government of the church." We have shown that Peter never possessed that supremacy which is ascribed to him; and therefore the Popes never could obtain from Peter such authority. How easily may power accumulate in the hands of a successor, or in a series of successors, which was utterly unknown to the founder of the line!

Besides, the line of succession, on which so much dependence is placed, is itself involved in great uncertainty. Du Pin gives the following as being what the earliest and best accounts have furnished on this point:—"According to the commonly received opinion, to St. Peter succeeded St. Linus; to St. Linus, Anacletus or Cletus; and to him, St. Clement. This order is observed by St. Irenæus, Eusebius, and St. Jerome, and in the ancient catalogues of the Popes; but Optatus, Ruffinus, and St. Augustine, and some other Latin authors, substitute St. Clement immediately to St. Linus, and place Anacletus in the third rank. Some distinguish Cletus from Anacletus. The author of the Apostolical Constitutions says, that St. Linus was ordained by St. Paul, and St. Clement by St. Peter. St. Epiphanius conjectures, that St. Peter at first ordained St. Clement; but he refusing to accept his pontificate, and going out of the way, that

* Euseb., Eccles. Hist., book ii., chap. xxiii., p. 61. 8vo. London, 1838.

† Idem, book vii., chap. xix., p. 264.

‡ "Πρωτος ουτος ειληφε την καθεδραν," &c.—Epiphan. Hæres. 78.

[§ "Hujus igitur ipsius Dei omnipotentis Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti, ac beatorum ejus Apostolorum, Petri et Pauli, auctoritate, qua nos quoque in terris fungimur," &c.—Decret. et Canon. Conc. Trident., Bulla Indictionis. Fol. Romæ, 1564.]

St. Linus and St. Cletus did successively govern the church of Rome; and that after the death of St. Peter, St. Clement succeeded to St. Cletus. The best way is to hold the most common and most ancient opinion."

2. Romanists argue in favour of a Pope, from the consideration that Michael the archangel was a Monarch or commander in heaven. "Michael and his angels fought." (Rev. xii. 7.) Therefore it ought to be so on earth. This is insisted upon by Bellarmine with ludicrous gravity.* We leave it, however, to the good sense of the reader, who will perceive that it is as good an argument for the supremacy as that which Papists adduce from the text, "God made two great lights," the greater light signifying the Pope, and the lesser the Emperor! or, "Thou hast put all things under his feet;" that is, the feet of the Pope! texts which have been seriously quoted by Popes and Divines in proof of their point.

3. It is argued by the Cardinal, also, that "the church of the Old Testament was a figure of that under the New; but they had a High-Priest over the rest, therefore there ought to be a Pope."† We grant the High-Priest was a figure, not of Peter or the Pope, but of Christ; for in two things he resembled him; namely, in offering sacrifice, and entering into the sanctuary to make atonement. (Heb. vii. 27.) Christ is entered into the heavens to intercede for us. (Heb. ix. 24.) Besides, if Peter and his successors be Priests after the order of Aaron, how can they be such after the order of Melchizedek, as some maintain? They cannot be after the order of Aaron and Melchizedek at the same time. The Apostle thus reasons: "For the priesthood being changed, there is made of necessity a change also of the law." (Heb. vii. 12.) Consequently, where the law is changed, the priesthood must also be changed. How, then, can the priesthood of Aaron be a pattern of that under the Gospel, when the law is changed? It does not naturally follow, that, because there was a High-Priest in one country, there ought to be one over all the churches in Christendom. If so, then there ought to be one supreme Emperor over all the world; or because one field or farm is committed to the care of one husbandman to cultivate, the whole earth ought to be placed under his management.

4. The Papacy assert that the Councils ascribe the supremacy to the Bishop of Rome. To this it is replied, that we have the decisions of the first eight General Councils against the supremacy of the Bishop of Rome. The first Council of Nice, held A. D. 325, canon sixth, ascribes to the metropolitan churches of Alexandria and Antioch the same authority which Rome exercised over the churches of that province.* In the second General Council held at Constantinople, in 381, canon second, the sixth canon of Nice is ratified.† In the Council of Ephesus, held in 431, canon eighth, it was decreed that Cyprus should be exempt from the jurisdiction of Antioch, or of any other see, and should choose her own Metropolitan. Therefore Cyprus could not have been under the jurisdiction of Rome.‡ In the Council of Chalcedon, or fourth General, held in 451, action sixteenth, it was determined that the Bishop of Constantinople was worthy of the same primacy of honour which the Bishop of Rome enjoyed. From the acts of this Council the following may be gathered:—§

First. That equal privileges were granted to the see of Constantinople and that of Rome. Secondly. That Rome, on account of its antiquity, had the first place. Thirdly. That these two patriarchal sees had such privileges because of their imperial dignity.

Constantinople III., action first, declares, "The Synod bestows like honours on the Bishops of Rome and Alexandria:" succeeding Councils, also, decide to the same effect.‖ The decisions of the Councils of Florence and of Trent, though in favour of the supremacy, are of no weight, because they are contrary to the decisions of more ancient Councils, and are not supported by the authority of Scripture or the primitive church. Indeed, previous to the Council of Nice, or for three hundred years after Christ, every community was governed by its own Clergy. It was decreed by that Synod, and followed by others, that the whole church should be divided into four provinces or great divisions, over which were placed four Patriarchs. The first was the Bishop of Rome; the second was the Bishop of Antioch; the third was the Bishop of Alexandria; the fourth the Bishop of Jerusalem; and not long after the Bishop of Constantinople came in the place of the Bishop of Antioch. All had equal authority in their respective provinces, and one was not to interfere with the charge of another.

5. They allege certain sayings of the Fathers to prove the supremacy of the Popes of Rome. The observation of Cyprian is quoted: Cornelius "was made Bishop by many of our colleagues who were then at Rome, who sent unto us excellent letters to his praise and honour, in testimony of his preaching and his ordination. And Cornelius was therefore made Bishop by the judgment of God and of Christ, by the testimony of almost all the

[* "Post casum vero diaboli S. Michaelem Principem esse omnium angelorum, colligitur ex capite xii. Apocalypsis, ubi dicitur: 'Michael et angeli ejus.' Quid enim est, 'Michael et angeli ejus,' nisi Michael et exercitus ejus? Ut enim, cum ibidem dicitur, 'Diabolus et angeli ejus,' intelligimus omnes angelos malos diabolo esse subjectos, ut milites imperatori; ita cum dicitur, 'Michael et angeli ejus,' intelligere debemus omnes angelos bonos Michaelem Principem suum agnoscere; quocirca recte in ecclesiastico officio S. Michael paradisi Præpositus, et Princeps cœlestis militiæ nominatur."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. i., De Romano Pontifice, lib. i., cap. ix., col. 531, A. Coloniæ, 1620.]

[† "At nos non tam urgemus figuram Aaronis, quam totius Testamenti Veteris; cum enim Testamentum Vetus sit figura Novi, sicut in Veteri fuit regimen Monarchicum, ita dicimus esse debere in Novo. Addo præterea, ipsum etiam Aaronem, non solum Christi gessisse figuram, sed Petri quoque, ac successorum ejus: sicut enim veteris legis sacrificia et sacrificium crucis significabant, et simul typi erant ejus sacrificii, quod nunc offertur in ecclesia; ita Summus Sacerdos Testamenti Veteris et Christum Summum Sacerdotem referebat, et simul typus erat ejus sacerdotii, quod nunc esse videmus in ecclesia. Eadem enim sacrificii et sacerdotii ratio est."—Idem, col. 532, C.]

[* "Can. vi. Antiqui mores serventur, qui sunt in Egypto, Libya, et Pentapoli, ut Alexandrinus Episcopus horum omnium habeat potestatem, quandoquidem et Episcopo Romano hoc est consuetum. Similiter et in Antiochia et in aliis provinciis sua privilegia ac suæ dignitates et auctoritates ecclesiis serventur. Illud autem est omnino manifestum, quod si quis absque Metropolitani sententia factus sit Episcopus, cum magna Synodus definivit non esse Episcopum. Quod si quidem communi omnium electione, quæ et rationi consentanea et ex regula ecclesiastica facta est, duo vel tres propter suam, qua delectantur, contentionem contradicant, vincant plurium suffragia."—Conc. Labb., tom. ii., Conc. Nicæn., can. vi., col. 31, D. Paris, 1671.]

[† "Episcopi ad ecclesias quæ sunt ultra suam diœcesim suosque limites ne accedant; sed secundum canones, Alexandriæ quidem Episcopus Ægyptum solum regat. Orientis autem Episcopi orientem solum administrent, servatis privilegiis ac præeminentiis, quæ sunt in Nicæni Concilii canonibus, Antiochenæ ecclesiæ; et Asianæ diœcesis Episcopi quæ sunt in sola Asiana administrent; et Thraciæ Episcopi Thraciam tantum regant, et Pontanæ Pontanam."—Idem, tom. ii., Conc. Constantinop. I., col. 1125, B. Venet., 1728.]

[‡ Idem, tom. iii., Conc. Ephes., act. vii., col. 787, et seq. Paris, 1671.]

[§ Idem, tom. iv., Conc. Chalcedon., act. xvi., can. xxviii., col. 1691, D. Fol. Venet., 1728.]

[‖ Idem, tom. vi., Conc. Constant. III., can. xxxvi., col. 1160, B. Conc. Constant. IV., can. xxi., col. 1140, B. Paris, 1671.]

Clergy, by the suffrage of the people who were present, and by the college of Priests, and of ancient and good men; and no one was appointed before him, when the place of Fabian, that is, the place of Peter, and the degree of his sacerdotal chair, were vacant, which he now occupies by the will of God, and the consent of us all."* On this we remark: (1.) That the Roman see was called the "seat of Peter," in conformity with the current, unexamined, and vague tradition of the time; as other sees were named after the Apostles, without examination or attention to the propriety of such a designation. This proves nothing for supremacy; inasmuch as the see of Rome is frequently termed the "seat of the Apostles," and the "seat of Peter and Paul." (2.) Cyprian frequently addresses the Bishops of Rome, his contemporaries, as his colleagues, ascribing to them no more authority than to other Prelates.

Optatus† is also quoted, who traces the succession of Bishops from his own time to that of Peter. To this we answer, that the succession of Bishops in other sees can be followed as well as that of Rome; but this does not prove that all have supremacy attached to them. This dogma was unknown in the time of Optatus. All the passages which have been adduced from the Fathers in favour of the supremacy of the Roman Pontiff only prove that the see of Rome obtained great authority in the fourth and succeeding centuries: the primitive policy of the church is directly opposed to the principles of such an assumption.

6. Romanists argue, that "the supremacy is necessary to preserve unity of faith, and integrity of discipline." The following facts show the contrary:—(1.) The Church of Rome is more corrupt than any other in the world, both in doctrine and discipline. (2.) Other churches, not claiming this supremacy, are much more sound in both. These are facts which are corroborated by the testimony of history, and the present state of the Christian world.

7. It is affirmed that the Popes hold their supremacy by divine right. They allege that it is either by divine or ecclesiastical right, or by usurpation: but as the latter two cannot be admitted, it must be by that which is divine.‡ This, however, cannot be allowed, because the passages of Scripture alleged in its support do not confer it. It has been shown that the supremacy originated partly by the concession of the church, and partly by the usurpation of the Popes and the Romish hierarchy. Individuals and bodies of men have protested against it. The annals of history furnish clear proof, both of the ecclesiastical concessions, and the usurpations. The times, places, and persons can generally be designated. And if a few data cannot be precisely given, in which the novelties of Rome took their rise, the time can be stated in which such innovations existed not, and also when they were established.

II. Various considerations show that their claim is uncertain and false.

1. Their doctrine partakes of the uncertainty of the premisses. If any of the foregoing suppositions of theirs be uncertain or false, their conclusion must also be uncertain or false. If Peter were not a Monarch among the Apostles; if his privileges were not successive; if he were never at Rome, nor a Bishop at his martyrdom; then supremacy is either doubtful or false. Each of these pretensions has been proved to be erroneous. The conclusion therefore is inevitable.

2. If Peter had the supremacy, it cannot follow that the Pontiff must have it. It might pass into the hands of others, even into those of the church in general; while the Apostle's episcopal office or chief pastorate of the church of Rome might be transferred to the Bishops of that city.

3. That the authority of Peter and of the Apostles, so far as it was transmissible, did devolve to the church, or the representatives of it, is evident from the opinions of the Fathers. Cyprian, in an Epistle addressed to Jubaianus, wherein he corrects the proceedings of Pope Stephen, says, "This is that one church, which holdeth and possesseth all the power of its spouse and Lord; in this we preside; for the honour and unity of this we fight."* Other quotations might be made.†

4. The Bishops or chief Pastors of churches, founded by the Apostles, are, in the style of the Fathers, their successors, in a similar sense and to the same extent as the Bishop of Rome is accounted the successor of Peter. The apostolic power, as far as it was durable and transmissible, was vouchsafed to the Pastors who fed the flocks, who only had the right to govern them.

5. An instance might be given in the church of Jerusalem, which is called by the Fathers of the second General Synod, "the mother of all churches," and "the mother of the Christian name." The eastern and western Bishops knew nothing of the assumption, that Rome was the mother and mistress of all churches. Now, if the Prelates of Jerusalem did not claim such a prerogative, how can the Bishops of the former place pretend to it?

6. Antioch had claims greater than Rome. It was the first Gentile church where the followers of Christ were originally called Christians. (Acts xi. 26.) Hence it was called by the Constantinopolitan Fathers, "the most ancient and truly apostolical church." Indeed, Antioch was anciently called "the see of Peter;" who is acknowledged to have sat there seven years before he was Bi-

[* "Et factus est Episcopus a plurimis collegis nostris, qui tunc in urbe Roma aderant, qui ad nos literas honorificas, et laudabiles, et testimonio suæ prædicationis illustres, de ejus ordinatione miserunt. Factus est autem Cornelius Episcopus de Dei et Christi judicio, de Clericorum pene omnium testimonio, de plebis quæ tunc affuit suffragio, et de Sacerdotum antiquorum et bonorum virorum collegio; cum nemo ante se factus esset, cum Fabiani locus, id est, cum locus Petri et gradus cathedræ sacerdotalis vacaret, quo occupato de Dei voluntate, atque omnium nostrum consensione firmato," &c.—Cypriani Oper., Epist. li., ad Antonianum, p. 59. 8vo. Paris, 1836.]

[† Optati Opera, De Schism. Donat., lib. ii., p. 35. Paris, 1679.]

[‡ "Romani Pontifices eam auctoritatis præeminentiam vel habent jure divino, vel jure ecclesiastico, seu ex concessione ecclesiæ, vel eam usurparunt: atqui duo posteriora nequeunt admitti. Non primum; eam non tenent a jure ecclesiastico. (i.) Quia nullum exstat hujus concessionis vestigium: (ii.) Quia Romani Pontifices suam auctoritatem in orbe terrarum ea ætate exercuerunt, qua supponi non possunt ecclesiæ universalis concessiones, seu ante omnia Concilia Generalia, ut constat exemplis jam citatis Stephani in causa rebaptizantium, et Victoris in causa Paschatis. Non secundum; eam auctoritatem sibi sine jure non arrogarunt, tum quia sic non egissent tot Pontifices pietate insignes, tum quia undequaque reclamassent alii Episcopi, dissidia inde nata fuissent, Concilia congregata; atqui tamen nulla exstat apud historicos reclamationis aut dissidiorum memoria; ergo Romani Pontifices primatum quem constanter in ecclesia exercuerunt, ipso jure divino tenent."—Bailly, Theol., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, cap. xiii., art. ii., prop. 3.]

* "Hæc est una quæ tenet et possidet omnem sponsi sui et Domini potestatem; in hac præsidemus, pro honore ejus et unitate pugnamus."—Cypriani Opera, Ep. lxxii. 8vo. Paris, 1836.

[† "Idcirco enim, frater carissime, copiosum corpus est Sacerdotum concordiæ mutuæ glutino atque unitatis vinculo copulatum, ut si quis ex collegio nostro hæresim facere et gregem Christi lacerare et vastare tentaverit, subveniant cæteri, et quasi Pastores utiles et misericordes oves dominicas in gregem colligant."—Idem, Ep. lxvi., Ad Stephanum. 8vo. Paris, 1836.]

shop of Rome. Why, therefore, may not the Prelate of Antioch claim to succeed Peter in his universal pastorship as well as his younger brother at Rome? The reason why Peter transferred his see from Antioch to the latter city, is stated as being the will of Peter, who saw fit to make the transfer. But how does this appear? Where is this determination recorded? In whose presence was it acknowledged? It is nowhere to be seen or heard of. All they can say on the subject is, that it is fit he should do so; but for this there is no authentic testimony. Bellarmine, indeed, sometimes affirms that God did command Peter to fix his seat at Rome.* But his proofs are ridiculous, and are confuted by himself, when he observes, "It is not improbable that our Lord gave express command, that Peter should so fix his see at Rome that the Bishop of that city should absolutely succeed him." †

7. An election by the whole church would be necessary to create a successor of Peter; but if we consider the ancient mode of choosing and constituting a Bishop of Rome, we should find it to be inconsistent with the supremacy. He was not chosen by a General Synod of Prelates, or by delegates sent from various parts of Christendom; but by the Clergy and people of Rome. If it be asserted that the election of a Pope was to be approved by the consent of the Bishops, according to Cyprian, who says, concerning Cornelius, that "he was acknowledged by the testimony of his fellow-Bishops, whose entire number, throughout the whole world, did consent with peaceful unanimity:" ‡ to this we reply, that such consent did not refer to the nomination or election of a Bishop. It was only by letters or messages declaring the election, and was not peculiar to the Prelates of Rome, but was common to all. § This method was adopted for the purpose of maintaining fraternal communion and correspondence, giving information that the Bishop was duly elected by his Clergy and people, was rightly consecrated by the neighbouring Prelates, and professed the Catholic faith. There is no vestige of such an election in the choice of Popes in the present day. The practice has varied much from primitive usage. At first, it was by the Clergy and people; afterward the Emperors assumed to themselves the right of nomination or election; sometimes Popes were created by powerful men, and by abandoned and licentious females; subsequently Cardinals elected; and occasionally General Councils, such as Constance, Pisa, or Basil, assumed that prerogative to themselves.

8. There have been frequent vacancies in the Popedom; which is a proof that the church may subsist without it. Namely, (1.) When Rome was desolated by the Goths, Vandals, and Lombards. (2.) At times when the Romans would not suffer Popes to live among them.* (3.) When the Pontiffs, for above seventy years, resided in France. During this period, they were titular, not real, Bishops of Rome. They were Bishops of Avignon. (4.) When Popes were intruded into the chair of St. Peter by violence. (5.) During the period of twenty-two schisms, when there was either no true Pope, or an uncertain one. (6.) When elections were uncanonical, and consequently null and void. (7.) When Popes were chosen by simony. "Such an election or assumption," says Baronius, "is null." † Hence Platina declares: "See, I beseech you, how much they have degenerated from their ancestors; for they, because very holy men, contemned that dignity when freely offered, giving themselves wholly to prayer and the doctrine of Christ; but

[* "Quoniam autem jus successionis Pontificum Romanorum in eo fundatur, quod Petrus Romæ sedem suam jubente Domino collocaverit, atque ibidem usque ad mortem sederit."—De Romano Pontifice, lib. ii., cap. i., col. 605, A. "Deus ipse jussit Romæ figi Apostolicam Petri sedem: quæ autem jubet Deus, mutari ab hominibus non possunt."—Idem, lib. iv., cap. iv., col. 813, D. Bellarm. Opera, tom. i. Coloniæ, 1619.]

[† "Et quoniam sanctus Marcellus Papa in Epistola ad Antiochenos scribit, Petrum Domino jubente venisse Romam; et sanctus Ambrosius in oratione contra Auxentium, et Athanasius in Apologia pro fuga sua, dicunt, Petrum Christi jussu Romæ martyrium pertulisse; non est improbabile, Dominum etiam aperte jussisse, ut sedem suam Petrus ita figeret Romæ, ut Romanus Episcopus absolute ei succederet: sed quidquid de hoc sit, saltem ista ratio successionis non est ex prima institutione pontificatus, quæ in evangelio legitur."—Idem, lib. ii., cap. xii., col. 636, A.]

[‡ "Venio jam nunc, frater carissime, ad personam Cornelii collegæ nostri, ut Cornelium nobiscum verius noveris, non de malignorum et detrahentium mendacio, sed de Domini Dei judicio, qui eum Episcopum fecit, et co-Episcoporum testimonio, quorum numerus universus per totum mundum concordi unanimitate consensit."—Cypriani Opera, epist. li., ad Antonianum de Cornelio et Novatiano, p. 58. 8vo. Paris, 1836.]

[§ "Sed enim cum ex litteris quas secum ferebant et ex eorum sermone atque asseveratione Novatianum Episcopum factum comperissemus, illicitæ et contra Ecclesiam Catholicam factæ ordinationis pravitate commoti, a communicatione eos nostra statim cohibendos esse censuimus, refutatis interim ac refusis quæ obstinate ac pertinaciter asserere tentabant."—Idem, epist. xl., ad Cornel.

["Secundum quod divinæ traditionis et ecclesiasticæ institutionis sanctitas pariter ac veritas exigebat, litteras nostras ad te direximus. Sed et per provinciam nostram hæc eadem collegis singulis in notitiam perferentes, ab his quoque patres nostros cum litteris dirigendos esse mandavimus. Quamquam mens nostra et propositum jam tunc fratribus et plebi istic universæ manifestatum fuisset, quando litteris nuper ab utraque parte susceptis tuas litteras legimus et episcopatus tui ordinationem singulorum auribus intimavimus."—Idem, epist. xli., ad Cornel., pp. 48, 49.]

* Bernardi Opera, tom. i., epistolæ ccxliii. et ccxliv. Fol. Lugd., 1687.

† "Hujusmodi electio vel assumptio eo ipso nulla existat."—Baron. Ann., A. D. 112, sect. xii. Fol. Antverpiæ, 1610.

["De Herimanno vero quondam nuncupato Bambergensi Episcopo, noverit vestra Sublimitas, quia jamdiu est quo per quemdam ejusdem Ecclesiæ Clericum vobis nostroque confratri Sigifredo Moguntino Archiepiscopo et Clericis prædictæ Ecclesiæ misimus per nostras literas, quod auctoritate apostolicæ sedis ab omni episcopali et sacerdotali dignitate sit depositus, et anathematis vinculo alligatus, quia non timuit simoniacæ hæresi sacrilegium adjicere, sanctamque ecclesiam sibi commissam sicut tyrannus devastare."—Conc. Labb., tom. x., Greg. VII. Epist., lib. iii., ep. vii., col. 134, D. Paris, 1671.]

["De potestatis nostræ plenitudine statuimus, ordinamus, decernimus, et definimus, quod si (quod Deus pro sua clementia et in omnes bonitate avertat) contigerit, postquam nos vel successores nostros successive ipse Deus ab hujusmodi universalis Ecclesiæ regimine absolverit, humani generis inimico procurante, et ambitione vel cupiditate ad hoc inclinante seu impellente, electionem Romani Pontificis ab eo quem eligi contigerit, vel ab aliquo seu aliquibus de cœtu Cardinalium quomodolibet votum dantibus, per simoniacam hæresim in dando, promittendo, vel recipiendo pecunias, bona cujusque generis, castra, officia vel beneficia, seu promissiones et obligationes, commissam per se vel alium seu alios quomodocumque et qualitercumque, etiam in duarum partium vel omnium Cardinalium unanimi concordia, quomodolibet, etiam per viam assumptionis unanimiter nemine discrepante, etiam sine scrutinio facto, celebrari vel fieri; non solum hujusmodi electio vel assumptio eo ipso nulla existat, et nullam eidem sic electo vel assumpto administrandi in spiritualibus et temporalibus facultatem tribuat, sed etiam contra dictum sic electum vel assumptum, de simoniaca labe a quocunque Cardinale qui eidem electioni interfuerit, opponi et excipi possit, sicut de vera et indubitata hæresi, ita quod a nullo pro Romano Pontifice habeatur; quinimo ipse sit electus, a priori suo Cardinalatus et alio quocumque honore, ecclesiis cathedralibus, etiam metropolitanis et patriarchalibus, monasteriis, dignitatibus, et aliis quibuscumque beneficiis et pensionibus, quæ tunc obtinebat in titulum vel in commendam, aut alias quomodocumque, eo ipso absque alia declaratione privatus existat; et idem electus, non apostolicus, sed apostaticus, et tanquam Simon Magus et heresiarcha, et ad prædicta omnia et singula perpetuo inhabilis habeatur et sit."—Labb. Conc., tom. xix., Conc. Lat. V., Jul. Pap. II., col. 769, A. Venet.]

these by bribery and ambition seek the Papacy." * (8.) When Popes were deposed, as was frequently the case, either by Emperors and General Councils, or both combined. In such an instance, according to Papal principles, the successors were illegal; for the Pope, being a sovereign, could not be deposed, therefore his successor is an usurper. (9.) Some Pope were heretics; and, (10.) Some were atheists and sorcerers.

III. The supremacy of the Pope is destitute of any good warrant from Scripture.

1. If God had designed the Bishop of Rome to be sovereign of the church, it may reasonably be supposed that he would have declared his will on the subject, either in express words, or by clear inference. But in Scripture, the Prelate of the imperial city is not mentioned, either by name or character. Papists cannot find any reference to him in holy writ, except by a long chain of consequences badly connected, or by childish and absurd interpretations. For instance:—

Gregory VII., A.D. 1063, ordained, that the Pope should be called "Father of Fathers," because "he has the primacy over all, is greater than all, and the greatest of all;" and gave the following reason:—"'God made two great lights in the firmament of heaven; the greater light to rule the day, and the less to rule the night;' both great, but one the greater. 'In the firmament of heaven,' that is, the universal church, 'God made two great lights,' that is, he instituted two dignities, which are the pontifical authority and the regal power; but that which presides over the day, that is, the spiritual, is the greater; and that which presides over carnal things is the less; for as the sun differs from the moon, Popes differ from Kings." † Several Pontiffs have adopted this interpretation.

2. Such a doctrine is not noticed by the writers of the New Testament. Though mention is made of the propagation, settlement, and continuance of the church; its edification, order, peace, and unity; the character of its members; the qualifications, duties, and personal fitness of its Ministers; heresies, schisms, &c.; yet there is no allusion to such a person as the Pope. In the Levitical law, all things concerning the High-Priest were minutely described; but with regard to the Christian church, no reference to such a character, in the person of a mere man, is found in the dispensation of the Gospel.

3. The Scriptures do not inculcate obedience to the Papal jurisdiction, although submission to the scriptural authorities of the church is specially enjoined. Is it not strange that there is no precept concerning our duty to the universal Pastor? If but one command were given, it would decide the controversy; such as, "Obey the Bishop of Rome, the Father of Christians, the Vicar of Christ, and the Governor of the Christian world."

4. The Scriptures require us to honour and obey the temporal sovereignty: how is it, that they omit similar instructions concerning the spiritual power? The need of such admonition has been so far felt, that divers Popes honoured the precepts concerning temporal authority, and were not backward to accommodate them by way of analogy and inference to themselves.*

5. St. Peter, who enjoins obedience to the King as supreme, and to honour him, should not have forgotten his successors, or even himself. Yet he says nothing about obeying the Pope. The Bishops of Rome do not follow him in this; for in their decretal Epistles they urge nothing so much as submission to the Apostolic See.

6. St. Paul does not mention the supremacy, though he wrote so largely to the Romans, and so frequently from Rome. He refers not to the Pope, though he enumerates the officers appointed by God, "for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ; till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ." (Eph. iv. 12, 13; 1 Cor. xii. 28.) Nevertheless there is no reference to the supremacy.

IV. The supremacy of the Pope is without testimony from tradition or history.

1. Here tradition is defective. We find in several of the Fathers, particularly in Tertullian, Basil, and Jerome,† catalogues of traditional doctrines and observances, many of which are of the greatest moment. But no reference is made to this Papal authority of the church!

2. History on this topic is silent. Eusebius, who diligently compiled all passages relating to the original constitution of the church, and to all transactions therein, has not a word on supremacy. Yet he carefully reports the successions of the Roman Bishops, and various important occurrences connected with them.

3. The supremacy is not mentioned in any of the ancient creeds, symbols, or summaries of Christian faith. Of these many still remain. Some were composed by public consent, and others by persons of eminence in the church. We depend on Innocent III. and the Lateran Council in 1215,‡ for first synodically defining this point, together with others equally new and unheard of. But the Creed of Pius IV., formed comparatively the other day, is the first that contains this article of the Popish faith.

4. The doctrine of the supremacy is not found in any of the ancient writings which treat professedly of the

* "Vide, quæso, quantum isti degeneraverint a majoribus suis; illi enim utpote viri sanctissimi dignitatem ultro ablatam contemnebant, orationi et doctrinæ Christianæ vacantes; hi vero largitione et ambitione Pontificatum quærentes, et adepti, posthabito divino cultu."—Platina de Vitis Pontif., Serg. III., p. 148. Fol. Colon., 1568.

[† "'Fecit Deus duo magna luminaria in firmamento cœli; luminare majus, ut præesset diei, et luminare minus, ut præesset nocti;' utrumque magnum, sed alterum majus. 'Ad firmamentum igitur cœli,' hoc est, universalis ecclesiæ, 'fecit Deus duo magna luminaria,' id est, duas instituit dignitates, quæ sunt pontificalis auctoritas et regalis potestas; sed illa, quæ præest diebus, id est, spiritualibus, major est; quæ vero carnalibus, minor; ut quanta est inter solem et lunam, tanta inter Pontifices et Reges differentia cognoscatur."—Corp. Juris Canon. a Pithœo, Extrav. Com., lib. i. De Majoritat. et Obedient., tit. viii., p. 395. Vide etiam Ferraris, Biblioth. Prompta, verbo Papa, art. ii., sect. iv.]

[* "Si quis putaverit se a proprio Metropolitano gravari, apud Patriarcham vel Primatem diœceseos, aut penes universalis Apostolicæ Ecclesiæ judicetur sedem. Nihil aliud est, fratres, talis præsumptio, nisi Apostolorum suorumque successorum terminos transgredi, eorumque decreta violare. Culpantur enim, ut scriptum est, fratres, qui aliter circa Episcopos judicare præsumunt, quam Apostolicæ sedis Papæ fieri placuerit. Et quis est qui judicat eum, quem Dominus sibi et huic sanctæ sedi reservari voluit judicandum? Ait namque Dominus per Prophetam Isaiam, 'Dominus Deus,'" &c.—Victoris Papæ epist. i., sect. iii., Labb. Conc., tom. i., col. 593, D. Vide etiam Leonis Papæ Epist. ad Michaelem, Constant. Patriarch., sect. x., xi, xii., Conc. Labb., tom. ix., col. 954—956. Gregorii Papæ VII. Epistol., lib. i., ep. xxii., Ad Carthag., Conc. Labb., tom. x., col. 24. Paris, 1671.]

† Tertull. Opera, tom. i., De Corona Militis, cap. iii. 8vo. Wirceb., 1780.

Basil. Opera, tom. ii., De Spiritu Sancto, cap. xxvi., p. 210, et seq. Paris, 1618.

Hieron. Opera, tom. iv., pars ii., Adversus Luciferianos, col. 289, et seq. Edit. Bened. Paris, 1706.

‡ Conc. Labb., tom. xi., pars i., Concil. Lat. IV., cap. v. Paris, 1671.

dogmas of the church. It is not discovered in any of the expositions of the creed which were made by Augustine, Ruffin, &c. It is not seen in the catechetical discourses of Cyril, Ambrose, &c.; nor in the systems of divinity composed by Augustine, Lactantius, &c. The conclusion is, that it was then no part of a Christian's faith. The Catechism of the Council of Trent, with others, and Romish expositions of them, contain the doctrine. Nothing is more clear than that it was not believed when the early standards of the church were formed.

5. This dogma is not asserted by any of the ancient Synods. Had it then been known and acknowledged, a reference to such a fact would have decided the controversy. The Popes would have appealed to it; and the Bishops would have acknowledged it. The former, after Luther, however, were better advised, as were the Bishops who adhered to it.

6. Those who disclaimed this authority were not classed among the heretics of olden time. No one obtained that epithet in former days for disavowing the supremacy of the Pope.

7. Pagan writers said nothing concerning it. No subject could have been more startling to the Heathen than this. It would have been altogether a new doctrine. Is it not, therefore, strange that such pagan historians as Marcellinus, Zosimus, and others anterior to Constantine, who condemned the Popes, and were bitterly opposed to Christianity, should not say something concerning the supremacy? It is equally strange that the adversaries of religion, as Celsus, Porphyry, Hierocles, Julian, &c., should not impugn it as a dangerous assumption, threatening the government of the empire; that the Emperors themselves would not oppose it as subversive of their imperial thrones; and, that none of the advocates of the faith, as Justin, Origen, Tertullian, Arnobius, Cyril, Augustine, &c., mentioned or defended it. Some of them advert to, and acknowledge, the supreme power of the Emperor; but is it not unaccountable that they overlooked that of the Pope? If the declaration of Boniface VIII. be true, which declares it necessary to salvation, that every human being should be subject to the Pope, it is passing strange that there should be no reference to it: "We declare, say, define, and pronounce, that it is necessary to salvation, that every human creature should be subject to the Roman Pontiff."*

8. The Apostolical Canons and Constitutions say nothing of the supremacy. Though they speak of the laws of the church, its practices, the ranks, duties, and privileges of various ecclesiastical persons, yet they are silent on the prerogatives of this universal head, the respect due to him, and the laws or constitutions promulgated by him. This is not the case in our modern canon law, of which the regulations concerning the supremacy make so conspicuous a part.

9. The old writer under the name of Dionysius the Areopagite, although he treats in several places about the degrees of the ecclesiastical hierarchy, says nothing of its sovereign Lord.

10. The apostolic Fathers do not refer to the supremacy. Ignatius, in his Epistles, speaks of the Clergy, exalts their dignity, and claims great respect for them; yet he does not mention the authority of the Pope. Clemens, Bishop of Rome, wrote to the Corinthians, who were engaged in discords and factions, in which several Presbyters were ejected from their office in a seditious manner; yet he never challenges to himself the right to decide their controversy, except to persuade them to unity and love. A Pontiff of modern times would have expressed himself in some such style as the following:—"Whoever shall presume to cross our will, let him know that he shall incur the indignation of Almighty God, and his blessed Apostles Peter and Paul."*

11. The doctrine is not assumed, or allowed, or even spoken of, in letters to and from Popes. In these letters, they do not appropriate, nor do others grant or ascribe to them, any such power. The Roman Pontiffs do not express themselves like Sovereigns, nor do the Prelates address them like subjects; but they treat each other like brethren and equals. Hence it has become a true mark of a spurious epistle, when the writer speaks in an imperious strain, or arrogates to himself such a power.

In the Epistles of Cyprian written to Cornelius, Lucius, and Stephen, though expressed with much kindness and respect, there is no regard paid to them, either as superiors in power, Pastors in doctrine, or judges in controversy. He confers with them freely on all points; he gives his opinion and advice without any awe or restraint; he reproves their practices or rejects their opinion as he deems fit; he addresses them as brethren and colleagues, and treats them as such on equal terms. Cornelius, also, wrote several Epistles to Cyprian, in which he assumes no such superiority.†

12. Supreme power was never claimed by the Fathers in terminating disputes with heretics; though many of them have treated on the methods of converting them. In their controversies against the Gnostics, Valentinians, Marcionites, Montanists, Manichees, Paulianists, Arians, &c., they never alleged the authority of the Bishop of Rome as being the most compendious and efficacious method of convincing and silencing them. Had this been recognised, heretics would have had no plea for their errors. With Papists of the present day, it is considered the speediest mode of deciding controversy.

Although many of the Fathers have written on heresies, and on the proper method of confutation, it is singular that they never adopted the way of referring debates to the decision of him to whose office of universal Pastor and judge it properly pertained. Tertullian employed other means than the supremacy of the Pontiff. He says, "When we would argue against heretics concerning the Gospel, we do commonly use these short ways by which the priority of time is alleged against the lateness of impostors, and the authority of the churches patronizing apostolical tradition."‡ Again: in the same chapter of this same treatise against Marcion, he declares: That "will appear to have been delivered by the Apostles, which hath been kept as holy in the apostolical churches. Let us see what milk the Corinthians drew from Paul; according to what rule the Galatians were corrected; what the Philippians, the *"Subesse Romano Pontifici, omni humanæ creaturæ declaramus, dicimus, definimus, et pronunciamus omnino esse de necessitate salutis."—Corp. Juris Canon. a Pithœo, tom. ii., P. Bonif. VIII. in Extrav. Com., lib. i., tit. viii., sect. i. Fol. Paris, 1695.

*"Si quis voluntati nostræ contrarie præsumserit, indignationem omnipotentis Dei, ac beatorum Petri et Pauli Apostolorum, se noverit incensurum."—Bulla Papæ.

† Barrow on the Supremacy. Works, vol. vii., p. 200, et seq. 8vo. edit. Oxford, 1830.

‡ "His fere compendiis utimur cum de evangeliis adversus hæreticos expendimur, defendentibus et temporum ordinem posteritati falsariorum præscribentem, et auctoritatem ecclesiarum traditioni Apostolorum patrocinantem."—Tertull. Opera, tom. i., Advers. Marcionem, lib. iv., cap. v., p. 423. 8vo. Wirceb., 1780.

Thessalonians, the Ephesians, do read; what the Romans, our nearest neighbours, do say, to whom both Peter and Paul left the Gospel sealed with their blood. We have also the churches nursed by St. John."* Again, in his Prescriptions against Heretics, he says: "It becometh forthwith manifest that all doctrine which agreeth with these apostolic churches, the wombs and originals of the faith, must be accounted true, as, without doubt, containing that which the churches have received from the Apostles, the Apostles from Christ, Christ from God. And that all other doctrine must be judged at once to be false, which savoureth things contrary to the truth of the churches, and of the Apostles, and of Christ, and of God."† Irenæus declares: "But we do again appeal to that tradition which is from the Apostles, which is, by successions of Presbyters, preserved in the churches."‡ Clemens Alexandrinus, with Irenæus and Tertullian,§ maintain the agreement of the doctrines of the churches of that period with those founded by the Apostles, as having been received from those venerable men, and from Christ. This by no means favours the Roman supposition; inasmuch as no more weight pertained to the authority or testimony of that church than to any other of apostolic character and origin.

13. It is strange, if the Pope be as he is represented, that his supreme power is not noticed in so many and voluminous writers on ecclesiastical subjects; that somewhere or other, at least incidentally, in their commentaries upon the Scriptures, in treatises respecting the priesthood, the unity and peace of the church concerning heresy and schism, in their epistles on ecclesiastical affairs, and in disputations with the heterodox, they never allude to it. Origen, Hilary, Cyril, Chrysostom, Jerome, and Augustine, in their observations on certain passages of Scripture, such as, "Thou art Peter," "Feed my sheep," &c., say not a word on the supremacy of the Pope. Indeed, we are beholden to our adversaries for proving this to us, when they least of all intended it; for, after all their research, they have produced no clear proof in behalf of the supremacy of the Roman Pontiff.

14. There is no canon in the whole code of the Popish Church which directly declares this authority, though that code was composed by many Councils, all professedly treating on ecclesiastical order and discipline. Nor is there any mention of the Pope, except thrice incidentally;‖ namely, when declaring the authority of the Alexandrine Bishop, and assigning to the Bishop of Constantinople the second place of honour, and equal privileges.

V. The supremacy of the Pope is contrary to the doctrine of Scripture.

1. It assigns to another the prerogatives and titles which belong only to Christ, whom the Scripture asserts to be our Sovereign Lord and King. "To us there is one Lord." (1 Cor. viii. 6.) "Who is the only Potentate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords." (1 Tim. vi. 15.) There is "one Lawgiver, who is able to save and to destroy." (James iv. 12.) The Scripture refers to one chief or great Shepherd of the sheep. (1 Peter v. 4; ii. 25; Heb. xiii. 20.) "I will set one Shepherd over them, and he shall feed them." (Ezek. xxxiv. 23.) And, "There shall be one fold, and one Shepherd," which our Lord declares shall be himself: "I am the good Shepherd: the good Shepherd giveth his life for the sheep." (John x. 11, 14, 16.) We have one "High-Priest of our profession." (Heb. iii. 1; ix. 7, 25.) The Scripture also teaches that there is one, and only one, supreme Teacher, Guide, and Father of Christians, prohibiting us to acknowledge any other by that name. "All ye are brethren: and call no man your father upon the earth; for one is your Father, which is in heaven: neither be ye called masters; for one is your Master, even Christ." (Matt. xxiii. 8—10.) Christ is the Supreme, whom "God hath given to be the Head over all things to the church, which is his body." (Eph. i. 22, 23; iv. 15; v. 23.)

It appears sacrilegious and arrogant for any man to assume or receive those titles of "Sovereign of the church," "Head of the church," "Our Lord," "Chief Pastor," "High-Priest," "Chief Doctor," "Master," "Father," "Judge of Christians," &c. To adopt the language of Gregory I., in reference to the epithets of "Universal Bishop," and "Œcumenical Patriarch," assumed by the Bishop of Constantinople, they are pompous, foolish, proud, perverse, wicked, and profane words; names of singularity, elation, vanity, and blasphemy. They are to be rejected, not merely because they are injurious to other Pastors, and the people of God's inheritance; but also an invasion of the prerogatives of our Lord.

Gregory I., in repudiating some of these titles, has condemned the whole, together with the things which they signify. In writing to the Bishop of Constantinople, who had admitted the appellation of "Universal Bishop" or "Patriarch," Gregory says: "What wilt thou say to Christ, the Head of the universal church, in the trial of the last judgment, who by the appellation of 'universal' dost endeavour to subject all his members to thee? Whom, I pray, dost thou mean to imitate in so perverse a word, but him who, despising the legions of angels constituted in fellowship with him, did endeavour to break forth unto the summit of singularity, that he might both be subject to none, and alone be over all? who also said, I will ascend into heaven, and will exalt my throne above the stars? For what are thy brethren, all the Bishops of the universal church, but the stars of heaven? To whom, while by this haughty word thou desirest to prefer thyself, and to trample on their name in comparison to thee, what dost thou say, but, 'I will climb into heaven?'"*

* "Constabit id esse ab Apostolis traditum, quod apud ecclesias Apostolorum fuerit sacrosanctum. Videamus, quod lac a Paulo Corinthii hauserint; ad quam regulam Galatæ sint recorrecti; quid legant Philippenses, Thessalonicenses, Ephesii; quid etiam Romani de proximo sonent, quibus Evangelium et Petrus et Paulus sanguine quoque suo signatum reliquerunt. Habemus et Johannis alumnas ecclesias."—Tertull. Opera, tom. i., Advers. Marcionem, lib. iv., cap. v., p. 422. 8vo. Wirceb., 1780.

† "Constat proinde omnem doctrinam, quæ cum illis ecclesiis apostolicis, matricibus et originalibus fidei, conspiret, veritati deputandam, sine dubio tenentem, quod ecclesiæ ab Apostolis, Apostoli a Christo, Christus a Deo accepit. Reliquam vero omnem doctrinam de mendacio præjudicandam, quæ sapiat contra veritatem ecclesiarum, et Apostolorum, et Christi, et Dei."—Tertull. Opera, tom. ii., De Præscrip. Hæret., cap. xxi., p. 461. 8vo. Wirceb., 1780.

‡ "Cum autem ad eam iterum traditionem, quæ est ab Apostolis, quæ per successores Presbyterorum in ecclesias custoditur, provocamus."—Iren. Opera, Advers. Hæres., lib. ii., cap. ii. Fol. Genev, 1570.

§ Clemen. Alex. Opera, tom. ii., Strom. vii. Fol. Oxon., 1715.

‖ Conc. Labb., tom. ii., Conc. Nicæn. I., can. vi., col. 31, C. Conc. Constant. I., can. iii., col. 945, C, tom. iv. Conc. Chalced., can. xxviii., col. 769, A. Paris, 1671.

* "Tu quid Christo universalis sanctæ ecclesiæ capiti in extremi judicii es dicturus examine, qui cuncta ejus membra tibimet conaris 'universalis' appellatione supponere? quis, rogo, in hoc tam perverso vocabulo nisi ille ad imitandum proponitur, qui despectis angelorum

In another letter, addressed to the Bishops of Alexandria and Antioch, alluding to the same Patriarch of Constantinople, he says: "He so boasteth that he attempts to ascribe all things to himself, and studies, by the elation of pompous speech, to subject to himself all the members of Christ, which adhere to one sole Head; namely, to Christ."* We meet with similar words in an Epistle of Pelagius II., predecessor of Gregory, to the Bishops of Constantinople.† "I confidently say," observes Gregory I., in another epistle, "that whoever calls himself Universal Bishop, or desires to be so called, doth in his elation forerun Antichrist, because he doth proudly set himself before all others." ‡

If the reasoning of Gregory I. be sound, pretending to universal sovereignty or pastorship is presumptuous. He shows that it is unlawful to assume superiority over the church; and has therefore inflicted a wound upon his successors, which no sophistry can heal. To evade, however, the force of the Scriptures in such passages as are above quoted, the Romanists have formed distinctions of several kinds of churches, and also of heads. It would be an endless and futile task to expose these evasions. It is, therefore, enough to observe, that they have no authority from, or agreement with, the word of God.

2. The supremacy transforms the church from a spiritual society to a worldly and political institution. In Scripture it is represented as a spiritual and heavenly community, compacted together by one faith, one hope, one spirit of charity. But the supremacy turns it into a secular institute, united by similar bonds of interest and design, managed by the influence of terror and intrigue, and upheld by the authority of force, policy, and wealth, of reputation and of splendour. Call it by whatever name you please, the Papal monarchy is a temporal dominion, accomplishing worldly ends by means such as our Lord never authorized; so that the subjects of it may say, with far more reason than the people of Constantinople, when Nestorius forbade some of the Priests to contradict, "We have a King; a Bishop we have not."

3. The supremacy destroys that equality which our Lord established among the Bishops or Pastors of his church. We have shown, that Christ forbade his Apostles assuming any domination or superiority over each other. In this manner Jerome interpreted our Lord, when he contended for the equality of all Pastors or Bishops in the following words:—"Wherever a Bishop is, whether at Rome or Eugubium, at Constantinople or at Rhegium, at Alexandria or at Thanis, he is of the same worth, and of the same priesthood; the power of wealth, or lowness of poverty, does not make a Bishop higher or lower; but all are successors of the Apostles." § Hence the address of the primitive Bishops of Rome to other Prelates was in style similar to the following:—Brethren, colleagues, fellow-Ministers, fellow-Bishops.

4. The supremacy infringes on the rights of the church and of the Pastors. To each church our Lord has imparted the power, and imposed the duty, of maintaining scriptural doctrine; (Rev. ii., iii.;)—and proving herself the pillar and ground of the truth; (1 Tim. iii. 15;)—of deciding controversies with due temper, and without any farther appeal, because he who will not obey or acquiesce in the decision of the church, is to be considered as an heathen and a publican; (Matt. xviii. 17;)—of censuring and rejecting offenders: "Do not ye judge them that are within? But them that are without, God judgeth. Therefore put away from among yourselves that wicked person;" (1 Cor. v. 12, 13; 1 Cor. v. 4, 5; Rev. ii. 20;)—of preserving order and decency, according to the rule prescribed to the church of Corinth, "Let all things be done decently and in order;"—of promoting edification; (1 Cor. xiv. 40; 1 Thess. v. 14;)—of deciding causes. (1 Cor. vi. 1.) The Scripture hath enjoined and empowered all Pastors to feed, guide, and rule their respective churches, as the Ministers, Stewards, and Ambassadors of God; for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ. (Acts xx. 28; Heb. xiii. 17; 1 Peter v. 2; 1 Tim. iii. 15; Titus i. 5; 1 Cor. xii. 28; Eph. iv. 11, 12; Rev. ii., &c.) All these rights and privileges the Pope has invaded, obstructed, and destroyed; pretending that their authority is derived from him, and compelling them to exercise it in no other way than as his subjects, and according to his pleasure.

5. It robs the people of the liberties and rights which have been divinely bestowed, and which they are required to preserve inviolate. St. Paul enjoins the Galatians to "stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made them free." (Gal. v. 1.) There is a privilege which we are to maintain, and a power to which we are not to submit; and whom have we more reason to fear than him who pretends to define points of faith, to impose new doctrines on the conscience, to prescribe laws, &c.? This is a power which the Apostles did not claim for themselves; for even they "have not dominion over our faith, but are helpers of our joy." (2 Cor. i. 24.)

6. The doctrine of supremacy interferes with civil government, by exempting a large class of subjects from the obligation of the law. By the ordinance of God every soul, not excepting the Pope, is subject to civil authority. (Rom. xiii. 1.)

VI. There are numerous arguments, arising from the nature and reason of things, which show that such an authority could not be practised without much iniquity and even injury to the interests of religion, and the welfare of mankind.

1. The church would be too extensive for the satisfactory and effective government of any one person. It is predicted that all the world, in time, will become Christian. How unfit and incommodious that the church should depend upon an authority resident in one place, and resting in one individual! If the entire world were reduced to the control of a despotic government, it would necessarily be ill managed. The remote parts of the church would greatly suffer; having little awe of an influence so far out of sight, either for redress of grievances, decision of causes, correction of offences, information of abuses, or the suppression of insurrections, that might occasionally arise. Who could obtain know-legionibus secum socialiter constitutis ad culmen conatus est singularitatis erumpere, ut et nulli subesse, et solus omnibus præesse videretur? qui etiam dixit, In cœlum conscendam, super astra cœli exaltabo solium meum. Quid enim fratres tui omnes universalis ecclesiæ Episcopi, nisi astra cœli sunt? quibus dum cupis temetipsum vocabulo elationis præponere, eorumque nomen tui comparatione calcare."—Conc. Labb., tom. v., Greg. I. Epistolæ, lib. iv., Ep. xxxviii., col. 1191, E. Paris, 1671.

* "Jactantiam sumpsit ita ut universa sibi tentet adscribere, et omnia quæ soli uni capiti cohærent, videlicet Christo, per elationem pompatici sermonis ejusdem Christi sibi studeat membra subjugare."—Idem, lib. iv., Epist. xxxvi., col. 1189, A.

† P. Pelagii II. Epist. viii., Conc. Labb., tom. v., col. 950, B.

‡ "Ego autem fidenter dico, quia quisquis se universalem Sacerdotem vocat, vel vocari desiderat, in elatione sua Antichristum præcurrit, quia superbiendo se ceteris præponit."—Conc. Labb., tom. v., Gregorii Papæ I. Epist., lib. vi., Ep. xxx., col. 1276, B.

§ Hieron. Opera, tom. iv., Epist. ad Evangel. Vide supra, p. 618.

ledge and experience sufficient to give laws, and administer justice, to so many nations, differing in manners, language, and custom? How little would the time and energies of one man avail in sustaining the burden of government, to receive addresses, and to weigh decisions! If the pressure of one small kingdom be so great, that wise and good Princes have been overwhelmed with its responsibility, what must be the weight of governing the world? The Babylonian, Persian, Grecian, and Roman empires, owed their downfal principally to the extent of their territory. Hence Augustus Cæsar hesitated to enlarge further the Roman dominion, and in his last will and testament advised the Senate to follow his example. *

The church would be liable to even greater inconvenience, if she were subject to the government of one Sovereign, to whom must be referred the maintenance of the faith, the execution of her discipline, the determination of her controversies, the revision of her judgments, the determination of appeals, the suppression of disorders and factions, the inspection of governors, and the regulation of all affairs concerning religion in every country. Can any one, we ask, satisfactorily discharge these duties? especially an old man, in the decay of his physical and mental powers, such as the Pope generally is.

The government of the whole militant church by one man was never contemplated by the ancient Christians; but, on the contrary, the régime of the church was provincial, and confined to certain limits. Cyprian declares, that "it was a general statute among the Bishops, and that it was both equal and just, that every one's cause should be heard in the place where the crime was committed; so that each Pastor had a portion of the flock committed to him, which he should rule and govern, having to render unto the Lord an account of his doings." † Chrysostom judged it "improper that one out of Egypt should administer justice to persons in Thrace." ‡ The African Synod thought "the Nicene Fathers had provided most prudently and most justly, that all affairs should be terminated where they arose." § They believed that "a transmarine judgment could not be firm, because the necessary witnesses, on account of sex, or age, or other impediments, could not be brought thither." ‖ There are numerous ancient canons and ecclesiastical regulations, which forbid that causes should be removed out of the bounds of their respective province or diocess.

[The Council of Basil referred to very many intolerable vexatious abuses that had prevailed, and declared that men had often been cited, and called out even from the remotest parts to the Court of Rome, and sometimes for slight and trivial business and occasion.*]

2. The authority which is invested in the supremacy reduces the church to a state of bondage. All the world would become slaves to one city, its wealth must flow thither, and its tranquillity must depend on it. This power, unrestrained by any boundary of time and place, or by any other equal and co-ordinate authority, depending on the divine institution, and consequently immutable, must become absolute and unlimited. It would continually be encroaching on others and extending itself, until it became boundless. It admits of no restraint. It claims the power of conferring all benefices. It forms new prerogatives, in favour of which every thing is interpreted. It rises above all law; a blind faith must be yielded to its assertions, as infallibly true; and a servile obedience to its decrees, as unquestionably holy; so that absolute tyranny cannot fail to ensue. Accordingly, the Papacy has destroyed all the privileges and rights of the various orders in the church, either granted by God, or established by the ancient canons. The royalties of Peter are so immense, that the Pope can hear it said, "all power in heaven and earth is given to him." It belongeth to him "to judge concerning the whole church." † He hath a plenitude of power so as to dispense with any law.‡ Various testimonies of a similar kind might be adduced.§

3. The doctrine of the supremacy corrupts the doctrines of Christ, by distorting them, so as to promote the worldly designs and interests of the Paparchy. It introduces new dogmas, and interprets the old, in order to secure the advancement of the power, wealth, and pleasure of those who maintain them. To make a trade of religion is the result. (2 Cor. ii. 17.) It converts Divines into mercenary, slavish flatterers, who suppose that gain is godliness. (1 Tim. vi. 5.) Christianity is thus modelled into a system of rites, opinions, and devices, serving to exalt and enrich the Pontiff and his Clergy. We pass over those immediately concerning His Holiness, such as his universal pastorship, his judging of controversies, power to call Councils, presidency over them, and his right to confirm or annul them; his infallibility, his double sword, or dominion over Princes, his dispensing with oaths and matrimonial vows, &c. &c. The exemption of the Clergy from secular jurisdiction, and immunity of their goods from taxation, indicate a slavish dependence on the Pope. The liberty of monastic persons from the jurisdiction of Bishops advances his power. The doctrine of purgatory and indulgences gives him a sway over the condition of the people as well as over their purses. The treasury of merits or works of supererogation draws largely on the property of the votaries of Rome. Other doctrines of that Church are similarly constructed, and adapted to enslave the people and elevate the Clergy. Let their leading writers on behalf of the Papacy be read, as Bellarmine, Dens, &c.; and it will be perceived that they uniformly tend to

* August. Opera, tom. vii., De Civitate Dei, lib. xviii., cap. xlv., col. 527. Ed. Bened. Paris, 1685.

[† "Nam cum statutum sit ab omnibus nobis, et æquum sit pariter ac justum, ut uniuscujusque causa illic audiatur ubi est crimen admissum, et singulis Pastoribus portio gregis sit adscripta, quam regat unusquisque et gubernet, rationem sui actus Domino redditurus."—Cypriani Opera, epist. liv., Ad Cornel. de Fortunato et Feliciss., p. 75. 8vo. Paris, 1836.]

[‡ "Quomodo idoneus censeri possit hujusmodi, ut in judicis thronum conscendat sibi minime congruentem? Neque enim congruum est, ut ii qui in Ægypto sunt, judicent eos qui in Thracia, et præsertim ille qui ipse reus est, inimicus et hostis."—Chrysost. Opera, tom. iii., Epist. ad Innocent. Episc. Rom., p. 616, B. Ed. Bened. 8vo. Paris, 1837.]

§ "Decreta Nicena sive inferioris gradus Clericos, sive ipsos Episcopos, suis Metropolitanis apertissime commiserunt; prudentissime enim justissimeque providerunt quæcumque negotia in suis locis, ubi orta sunt, finienda."—Conc. Labb., tom. ii., Conc. Afric. ad P. Cælest. I., col. 1675, D. Paris, 1671.

‖ "Aut quomodo ipsum transmarinum judicium ratum erit, ad quod testium necessariæ personæ vel propter sexus vel propter senectutis infirmitatem, multis aliis intercurrentibus impedimentis, adduci non poterunt?"—Idem.

[* "Inoleverunt autem hactenus intolerabilium vexationum abusus permulti, dum nimium frequenter a remotissimis etiam partibus ad Romanam curiam, et interdum pro parvis et minutis rebus ac negotiis, quamplurimi citari ac evocari consueverunt," &c.—Conc. Labb., tom. xii., Conc. Basil., sess. xxxi., De Causis, sect. i., col. 602. Paris, 1671.]

† "De omni ecclesia jus habet judicandi."—Conc. Lat. V., sess. 11.

‡ "Secundum plenitudinem potestatis de jure possumus supra jus dispensare."—Corp. Jur. Can., tom. ii., Greg. Decret., lib. iii., tit. viii., cap. iv., p. 146. Paris, 1695.

§ Barrow's Works, vol. vii., Treatise on the Supremacy, p. 288, et seq. 8vo. Oxford, 1830.

advance the interest of the Pontiff on the one hand, and that of his vassals on the other.

4. The doctrine of the supremacy impedes the progress of reformation. While other churches retain their liberty, they are enabled to preserve their doctrines from corruption, and to arrest the advance of error. But when every church and Prelate is subject to one head, it will be impossible to preserve such purity. The supreme Pontiff will soon claim the privilege of being opposed in nothing, and assume infallibility, which is the parent of incorrigibleness. Such authority will protect every error, and palliate every vice. Legions of mercenary tongues will speak, and pens will be employed to write in defence of these doctrines and practices; so that whosoever shall undertake to oppose them, will be put down by clamour, and threats, and disfranchisement. Truth will be undefended, and virtue unprotected; for what will not this party do, rather than acknowledge an error? Let the hundred grievances, so loudly protested against, and which remained unreformed, testify.

5. This favourite dogma induces depravation of manners. The chief of the Clergy speedily became proud and haughty, were tempted to hoard up wealth by rapine, extortion, and simony, to indulge in ease and sensuality, and consequently to neglect their duty. The inferior hierarchy, captivated by a love of dignity and power, used all means to attain it. Hence arose emulation, discord, pride, and slavish submission. The higher ranks became proud and haughty, the lower basely crouched. Under such guides, it is no wonder that the Papal Church became awfully abandoned and depraved.

6. This authority assumed by the Church corrupts the Pope, vitiates his morals, and renders him a scandal to the name of religion. What notorious reprobates, even monsters in crime, have filled the chair of St. Peter! * The Bishops of Rome before Constantine were holy men; the race which followed was tolerable, and the Papacy was preserved within some bounds of decency; but afterward, many of them were a disgrace to the Christian name, so that Marcellus II. doubted whether a Pope could be saved. From John VIII. to Leo IX., what a series of wicked degenerate wretches occupied the Roman See! This is acknowledged by their most celebrated historians. Bellarmine and Baronius, however, say, that the providence of God is wonderfully manifest in preserving the purity of the Church, during the lives of so many wicked Pontiffs.† How can this be called preserving the Church? for what became of the souls of these abandoned hierarchs, and of those who wickedly followed their example? To what a degree of shameless licentiousness must affairs have come, when such men as Alexander VI. were seated in the chair! when the principal use which was made of ecclesiastical power, was to enrich the relatives and the numerous illegitimate offspring of men who were blasphemously designated the Vicars of Christ!

7. This novel doctrine disturbs the frame-work of civil society, and undermines the very foundation of all just governments. Suppose the two powers, spiritual and temporal, are co-ordinate and independent of each other; the supremacy plunges Christians into a state of perplexity with regard to opposite and incompatible obligations. Concerning which our Lord says, "No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other." (Matt. vi. 24.)

We proceed to examine the reasons of this incompatibility, and the extent to which it has been tested by example.

The claims of the supremacy are such, as to make it impossible to distinguish between the bounds of the temporal and spiritual authority, so as to prevent their mutual interference. All temporal affairs are in certain respects spiritual, so as in some manner to be connected with religious, spiritual purposes; so likewise the spiritual are in some degree temporal, inasmuch as they conduce to the public peace and welfare of society. There is nothing which each of these powers may not bring under its cognizance or jurisdiction, the one pretending to advance the good of the church, and the other that of the state. In this case there would be no end of difficulty, no third power existing to arbitrate between them. Each would prosecute its peculiar designs: one by the instrumentality of temporal, the other by means of spiritual, agencies. What one power would enjoin, the other would prohibit. One, in case of disobedience, would brandish a sword; the other would thunder an anathema; one would threaten with death, the other with excision from the church; both in their way denouncing damnation. How is it possible for a kingdom so divided in itself to stand, or not come into desolation? (Matt. xii. 25.) If the claims of the supremacy are correct, we may in vain "pray for Kings, and all that are in authority; that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty." (1 Tim. ii. 1, 2.) Such interferences have caused Popes to invade the temporal power. This was the reason which Paschal II. alleged against Henry IV., Ecclesiæ regnum auferre, "he took away the dominion of the Church." *

The spiritual power will ultimately predominate, because of its advantages over the temporal. It claims to be divine, and therefore immediately from God, and depending on his will: consequently it must be perpetual, irreversible, and neither liable to diminution nor translation. It is a power which employs in its defence tongues and pens,—the most perilous weapons, which can neither be taken away, nor deprived of their virulence or force. It works by powerful considerations applied to the consciences and actions of men, promising heaven, or threatening hell. The Pope commands not only as

* Barrow's Works, vol. vii., pp. 301—304.

[† "Cetcrum etsi interdum deforme valde turpeque contigerit apponi Ecclesiæ caput; tolerandum tamen fuit ipsi quod non amens sit inventum, sed Fide Catholica sibi constans, Dei vero permissione supra cetera corporis membra provectum non sine causa vel ratione, sed magno sui judicii libramento; etenim 'pondus et statera judicia Domini sunt,' quæ etsi inscrutabilia prædicentur per transennam, tamen mortalibus intuentibus fiant aliqua saltem ex parte perspicua. Ut enim Deus significaret, eamdem suam Ecclesiam nequaquam humanum esse figmentum, sed plane divinum inventum; oportuit ostendisse, eam nequaquam pravorum Antistitum opera perdi posse, et ad nihilum penitus redigi, sicut de aliis diversarum gentium regnis, et bene statutis rebus publicis, factum constat; quæ tamdiu constitisse leguntur, quamdiu fuere per viros prudentes et virtute præditos administratæ; periisse vero penitus, ubi viris scelestibus tradita sunt earum gubernacula moderanda. Ita quidem illæ quæ, ut humanæ, ab hominibus sive bonis sive malis accepisse noscuntur, sive emolumentum vel detrimentum, statum vel casum. At non sic divina; quæ nullo possunt labefactari hominum vitio, nec mutari perdique peccato, sed permaneant opus sit in æternum."—Baronii Annal. Eccles., A. D. 897, tom. x., p. 641. Fol. Antverpiæ, 1603.]

[* "Nullum profecto gratius Deo sacrificium offerre poteris, quam si eum impugnes qui se contra Deum erexit, qui ecclesiæ Dei regnum auferre conatur, qui in loco sancto Simonis idolum statuit, qui a principibus Dei sanctis Apostolis eorumque vicariis de ecclesiæ domo Sancti Spiritus judicio expulsus est."—Conc. Labb., tom. x., Paschalis Papæ II. epist. vii., Ad Rob. Flandrens. Com., col. 629, E. Paris, 1671.]

Prince, but also as a Teacher and Judge, and an infallible Guide. We are not merely required to embrace his doctrines, but also to observe his commands. In the confessional the power of secrecy comes to his aid. All that is inculcated there must be believed. With such an advantage, we conclude that the spiritual power will ultimately overwhelm that which is temporal; draw numbers from subjection to the temporal authority, by abstracting causes from its jurisdiction, subjects from the allegiance due to it, and money from the treasury, &c.; in a word, by establishing a government within a government. All this has been confirmed by experience. Whenever the Pope found occasion to charge a Prince with tyranny, or holding heretical opinions, or acting in any scandalous manner, he excommunicated him, and refused to receive him into favour, until he acknowledged himself feudatory to the Pope: thus many kingdoms were brought into a state of servile subjection to the Papacy! Many commotions, conspiracies, rebellions, and insurrections, have thus been raised! * Many assassinations, and numerous acts of cruelty, have been the result!

Have not Popes assumed to themselves a power over all crowned heads? They called the Emperor himself their vassal. They exacted an oath from Princes, a form of which exists in the canon law, termed an "oath of fealty," and a declaration of Pope Clement V. They claimed for themselves "the power of the two swords," the temporal and spiritual, according to the common phrase so current among them, Ecce duo gladii. Consider the pragmatical sanctions, provisos, compositions, concordats, &c., which Princes have been forced to make either against them or in concert with them, in order to secure their friendship. Henry II. of England, and Lewis XII. of France, were obliged to oppose them.

These, and similar instances, are the result of the supremacy; and, supposing it were well grounded, they may be capable of justification; for it is not fit, if one must yield, that the temporal power should submit to the other. Indeed, granting the Papal supremacy in spiritual affairs, those who would subject all temporal authority to it, have reason on their side; for these authorities cannot exist together. The contest, therefore, cannot otherwise be terminated, than by disclaiming the fictitious and usurped influence of the Pontiff. Two such powers cannot have been instituted by the Almighty. But it is plain he hath established the civil, and hath endowed it with the sword: therefore the Romish supremacy is a flagrant usurpation.

8. The supremacy is useless, not answering the end for which it is proposed. It pretends to maintain truth. But truth is better supported by the labours of learned and pious Pastors. Passages of Scripture that were formerly obscure, remain so, as far as the Popes are concerned. All doubtful controversies, that have professedly been decided by His Holiness, remain as dubious as ever. His sentence may easily be eluded by an opposite interpretation, as well as the dicta of other Divines. Indeed, Papal decisions have obscured, rather than illustrated, truth. What book contains the biblical researches of a Pontiff? Not one on the face of the earth. Popes, therefore, cannot claim any credit for promoting the cause of scriptural truth.

* Vide Plat. de Vitis Pontif. Bonif. VIII., p. 244. Coloniæ, 1568. Conc. Labb., tom. x., Greg. VII. Epist., lib. iv., ep. ii., Ad Heriman. Episc. Metens., col. 149. Paris, 1671. Barrow's Works, vol. vii., On Supremacy, p. 304, et seq. 8vo. edit. Oxford, 1830.

The supremacy demands to be the only source of agreement in opinion or doctrine, by determining all controversy; which its advocates affirm to be necessary. But how can that be necessary which never existed, de facto, in the Church of Rome? Has the Pope effected this? Do all his followers agree? Do they harmonize respecting his own authority—his infallibility? Do they not differ and dispute concerning an almost infinite variety of subjects? Are all the questions really frivolous, with regard to which the Romish Divines and Schoolmen have disputed? Why did not the Council of Trent refer all controverted topics to the decision of the Pope, if he were the judge of controversy? Necessary points will be known and determined by every honest man without the Pontiff, by the unequivocal testimony of Scripture. And others need not be determined. Concord was maintained, and controversies were decided, in the primitive church, without the help of His Holiness. Neither does the supremacy maintain peace and unity. No doctrine has caused such fierce contentions and sanguinary wars in Christendom. By tyrannical administration, and offensive intrusions on the order and regularity of the primitive churches, it has been the cause of endless schism and trouble.

VII. The doctrine of supremacy is at variance with the character ascribed to Bishops or chief Pastors in the primitive and ancient churches.

1. The Fathers supposed that no rank existed in the church by original right or divine institution higher than that of a Bishop or chief Pastor. Tertullian says: "The chief Priest, who is Bishop, hath the right of giving baptism." * Optatus calls Bishops "the tops and Princes of all." † Cyprian speaks often to the same effect.‡ It cannot be conceived that the ancients would have spoken thus, if they had considered the Papal office to be such as it is at present. In the African church existed distinctions, and subordinations of Bishops, such as Patriarchs, Primates, Metropolitans, common Bishops, &c.; which were constituted by the church herself, for her more orderly and peaceable government. There was no such difference among the Bishops, as that one should have dominion over others to their injury, or to infringe on common liberty. They were governed by canons, and were subject to correction and control.

When Primates began to encroach, good men at once declared their displeasure at the evil, as is evident from the expression of Gregory Nazianzen: "I wish there were no presidency, or any preference of place, or any tyrannical prerogative." § But the superiority claimed by the Pope is of a different nature from that constituted by the ancient churches. It professes to be founded on the institution of Christ, it imposes itself on the church, is not alterable or governed by it, can endure no control,

* "Dandi quidem jus habet summus Sacerdos, qui est Episcopus." —Tertul. Opera, tom. ii., De Bapt., cap. xvii., p. 53. 8vo. Wirceb., 1781.

† Optat. Opera, De Schis. Don., lib. i., p. 15. Fol. Paris, 1679. Vide supra, p. 618.

[‡ "Cum hæc tanta ac talia et multa alia exempla præcedant, quibus sacerdotalis auctoritas et potestas de divina dignatione firmatur, quales putas esse eos qui, sacerdotum hostes et contra Ecclesiam Catholicam rebelles, nec præmonentis Domini comminatione nec futuri ultione terrentur? Neque enim aliunde hæreses obortæ sunt, aut nata sunt schismata, quam inde quod Sacerdoti Dei non obtemperatur, nec unus in ecclesia ad tempus Sacerdos et ad tempus judex vice Christi cogitatur."—Cypriani Opera, epist. liv., Ad Cornelium, p. 71. 8vo. edit. Paris, 1836.]

[§ "Utinam autem ne ullus quidem sedis principatus esset, nec ulla loci prælatio, et tyrannica prærogativa; ut ex sola virtute cognosceremur."—Gregorii Nazianz. Opera, orat. xxviii., p. 182. Fol. Antverpiæ, 1612.]

it pretends to absolute power to act with or against the canons, is limited by no bounds but its own will, &c.

2. The primitive church ascribed to each Bishop independent authority, who was subject to no other Prelate in the administration of those affairs which concerned his own diocess.

Hence the following declarations of Cyprian:—"The bond of concord abiding, and the sacrament of the Catholic Church remaining undivided, every Bishop disposes and directs his own acts, as one who shall render an account of his purposes unto the Lord."* Thus does he write when pleading the cause of Pope Cornelius against Novatian, but says nothing of any supremacy over his brethren. Again: "But we know that some will not lay down what once they have imbibed, nor will easily change their minds; but the bond of peace and concord being preserved with their colleagues, they will retain some peculiar things to which they have been accustomed; in which matter we do not force any one, or give law; when every President, in the administration of his own church, hath the free power of his own will, as he must render an account of his acts unto the Lord."† He is writing to Pope Stephen, and in a friendly manner, from common respect and simple love, not from servile obedience, acquainting him with what he and his brethren had instituted, by common consent and authority, (consensu et auctoritate communi,) concerning the degradation of Clergymen who had been ordained by heretics, or had deviated into schism.

We adduce also the following from the same writer:—

"These things I have chiefly written back according to our meanness, dear brother, prescribing to none, nor prejudging, that every Bishop should do what he thinks good, having a free power of his will."‡ "In which matter our bashfulness and modesty do not prejudge any one; so that every one may not judge as he thinketh, and act as he judgeth." He also adds, in the same Epistle: "Prescribing to none, so that each Bishop may resolve what he thinks good, having to render an account to the Lord," &c.§

"It remaineth that each of us express his opinion about this matter, judging no man, nor removing any man from the right of communion, though he be of a different opinion; for neither doth any of us constitute himself Bishop of Bishops, or by tyrannical terror drive any of us to the necessity of obeying; since each Bishop hath, on account of his liberty and authority, his own free choice, and is no less exempt from being judged by another, than he is incapable to judge another; but let us all expect the judgment of our Lord Jesus Christ, who, and who alone, hath power to place us in the government of the church, and to judge of our actions."* Cyprian utters these words as Prolocutor of the great Carthaginian Synod. He condemns the practice of one Diocesan excluding another from communion on account of a difference of opinion on minor and disputable points; he rejects the claims of those who would establish a Bishop of Bishops; he affirms that each Prelate has power to manage his own concerns, and that he receives his power immediately from the great Head of the church.

Augustine, in his reflections on the above passages of Cyprian, admires and approves of them.† He was ignorant of such power as that claimed by the Popes of Rome. In the address of the Roman Clergy to Cyprian, the supremacy of the Pope is not alluded to.‡ That the idea of Christian liberty defined by Cyprian, continued some time after his days, is evident from the ninth canon of the Council of Antioch, A. D. 351, which ordained, that "every Bishop have power in his own parish, govern it according to his best care and discretion, and provide for all the country belonging to his city, so as to ordain Priests and Deacons, and dispose things aright."§ The Monks of Constantinople, also, in the Council of Chalcedon, held A. D. 451, apparently forgot that they had a Sovereign Father in the Pope, when they said: "We are sons of the Church, and have one Father, after God, our Archbishop."

3. Bishops, in the opinion of the early Christians, were originally, and by divine appointment, of equal authority.

* "Manente concordiæ vinculo, et perseverante Catholicæ Ecclesiæ individuo sacramento, actum suum disponit et dirigit unusquisque Episcopus, rationem propositi sui Domino redditurus."—Cypriani Opera, epist. li., Ad Antonianum, p. 62. 8vo. Paris, 1836.

† "Ceterum scimus quosdam quod semel imbiberint nolle deponere, nec propositum suum facile mutare, sed salvo inter collegas pacis et concordiæ vinculo, quædam propria, quæ apud se semel sint usurpata, retinere; qua in re nec nos vim cuiquam facimus, aut legem damus; quando habeat in ecclesiæ administratione voluntatis suæ liberum arbitrium unusquisque præpositus, rationem actus sui Domino redditurus."—Idem, epist. lxxi., Ad P. Stephanum, p. 113.

‡ "Hæc tibi breviter pro nostra mediocritate rescripsimus, frater charissime; nemini præscribentes, aut prejudicantes, quo minus unusquisque Episcoporum quod putat faciat, habens arbitrii sui liberam potestatem."—Idem, Ep. lxxii., Ad Jubaianum, p. 120.

§ "Qua in parte nemini verecundia et modestia nostra præjudicat, quo minus unusquisque quod putat sentiat, et quod senserit faciat.. ..Nemini præscribentes, quo minus statuat quod putat unusquisque præpositus, actus sui rationem Domino redditurus," &c.—Idem, Epist. lxxv., Ad Magnum, p. 139. 8vo. edit. Paris, 1836.

* "Superest ut de hac ipsa re singuli quid sentiamus proferamus, neminem judicantes, aut a jure communionis aliquem si diversum senserit amoventes; neque enim quisquam nostrum Episcopum se esse Episcoporum constituit, aut tyrannico terrore ad obsequendi necessitatem collegas suos adigit; quando habeat omnis Episcopus pro licentia libertatis et potestatis suæ arbitrium proprium, tamquam judicari ab alio non possit, cum nec ipse possit alterum judicare; sed expectemus universi judicium Domini nostri Jesu Christi, qui unus et solus habet potestatem et præponendi nos in ecclesiæ suæ gubernatione, et de actu nostro judicandi."—Conc. Labb., tom. i., Conc. Carthag. III., Cypr. Sentent. Episc. de Hæret. Bapt., col. 786, E. Paris, 1671.

[† "Nunc se, si audent, superbæ et tumidæ cervices hæreticorum adversus sanctam humilitatem hujus sermonis extollant. Insani Donatistæ, quos ad pacem atque unitatem sanctæ ecclesiæ remeare, atque in ea sanari, cupimus et optamus, quid ad hæc dicitis? Vos certe nobis objicere soletis Cypriani literas, Cypriani sententiam, Cypriani consilium: cur auctoritatem Cypriani pro vestro schismate assumitis, et ejus exemplum pro ecclesiæ pace respuitis? Quis autem nesciat sanctam Scripturam canonicam, tam Veteris quam Novi Testamenti, certis suis terminis contineri, eamque omnibus posterioribus Episcoporum literis ita præponi, ut de illa omnino dubitari et disceptari non possit, utrum verum vel utrum rectum sit, quidquid in ea scriptum esse constiterit: Episcoporum autem literas quæ post confirmatum canonem vel scriptæ sunt vel scribuntur, et per sermonem forte sapientiorem cujuslibet in ea re peritioris, et per aliorum Episcoporum graviorem auctoritatem doctioremque prudentiam, et per Concilia licere reprehendi, si quid in eis forte a veritate deviatum est: et ipsa Concilia quæ per singulas regiones vel provincias fiunt, plenariorum Conciliorum auctoritate quæ fiunt ex universo orbe Christiano, sine ullis ambagibus cedere; ipsaque plenaria sæpe priora posterioribus emendari; cum aliquo experimento rerum aperitur quod clausum erat, et cognoscitur quod latebat; sine ullo typho sacrilegæ superbiæ, sine ulla inflata cervice arrogantiæ, sine ulla contentione lividæ invidiæ, cum sancta humilitate, cum pace catholica, cum caritate Christiana."—August. Opera, tom. ix., De Baptism. contra Donat., lib. ii., cap. iii., col. 98, A. Edit. Ben. Paris, 1694. Vide etiam eundem, lib. iii., cap. iii., col. 110.]

[‡ Cyprian. Oper., Epist. Cleri Romani ad Cyp., Ep. xxx., p. 36. 8vo. Paris, 1836.]

[§ "Unumquemque enim Episcopum habere suæ parochiæ potestatem, et administrare pro unicuique conveniente religione, et totius regionis curam gerere, quæ suæ urbi subest; ut etiam ordinent Presbyteros et Diaconos, et unaquæque cum judicio tractent, et nihil ultra facere aggrediantur sine metropolis Episcopo, neque ipse sine reliquorum sententia."—Conc. Labb., tom. ii., Conc. Antioch., can. ix., col. 566, B. Paris, 1671.]

They considered them all the successors of the Apostles; deriving their commission from God, as his Ambassadors, Stewards, or Vicars. One Bishop might exceed another in splendour, wealth, reputation, extent of jurisdiction, attainments, or in talent; but all were equal in office and power. This was the doctrine of Jerome.*

(1.) General custom is a fair interpreter of sentiments which are commonly held on subjects of this kind: by it we are informed, that in the primitive church the Pope was not considered as having a claim to universal sovereignty. For if such a prerogative had been instituted by our Lord, practised or taught by the Apostles, the Pontiff certainly would have possessed and exercised it in the earlier ages. But he did not. (2.) The state of the primitive church did not admit of such an authority. It then consisted of small communities dispersed in distant places, independent of each other, and unfit to be modelled into one confederacy, or to be governed by one individual. The churches were also in a state of persecution and poverty. How could a few Christians in Egypt, Ethiopia, Parthia, India, Mesopotamia, Syria, Armenia, Cappadocia, and other parts, resort for direction and justice to Rome!

The Roman Clergy, in their Epistle to Cyprian, told him, that "because of the difficulty of things and times, they could not constitute a Bishop who might moderate affairs," immediately concerning themselves.† How much more could the Bishop of Rome regulate the concerns of Christendom; when, as Rigaltius, in his note on Cyprian, says, "the church being then oppressed with various vexations, the communication between provinces was difficult and unfrequent;"‡ and Bellarmine acknowledges that anterior to the Nicene Council, "the authority of the Pope was not a little hindered, so that because of continual persecutions, he could not freely exercise it."§ Now, as the church subsisted so long without such authority, by the vigilance of its Pastors over their flocks, and the fraternal aid of other churches, such supremacy is unnecessary. It could not be a divine institution which was useless in the first and best ages of the church. It was an innovation founded on ambition.

4. The ancients maintained the independence and equality of Bishops, particularly in respect to the Roman Prelates, both interpretatively and practically. Thus when Felicissimus and his associates, who had been rejected by Cyprian, applied to Cornelius for communion, Cyprian affirmed that such was an irregular course, and subjoins: "The authority of the Bishops constituted in Africa, who have already passed judgment upon them, does not seem less (than the Roman authority) except to a few wicked and desperate persons."* He certainly meant that the authority of the African Prelates was not inferior to any other, and particularly to that of Rome. The Fathers of the Council of Antioch, A. D. 341, being ninety-seven in number, the decrees of which have been received by the Catholic Church, in an Epistle to Julius I., complaining of his demeanour in the case of Athanasius, asserted an equality with the Pope. "They did not therefore think it just, that they should be thought inferiors, because they had not so large and numerous a church."† Julius also bears similar testimony in an Epistle which is extant in the second Apology of Athanasius. "If," says he, "ye do truly conceive the honour of Bishops to be equal, and the same; and ye do not, as ye write, judge of Bishops according to the magnitude of cities."‡ The Pontiff does not contradict or confute the sentiment, so contrary to Papal supremacy; and therefore may reasonably be supposed to agree with it. To be silent on such an occasion would argue consummate inconsistency.

That Gregory I. did not hold himself superior to other Bishops, is evident from the manner in which he reprehends the Diocesan of Constantinople for assuming the prerogatives of supremacy, in "preferring himself before, and extolling himself above, other Prelates."§ When Eulogius, the Bishop of Alexandria, had in compliment said: Sicut jussisti, "As ye have commanded," he expresses his displeasure by observing: "I desire not to hear that word of command; because I know who I am, and who you are: by place, ye are my brethren; in goodness, fathers; I did not therefore command; but what seemed profitable I hinted to you."‖

5. The style used by the primitive Bishops, in their addresses and intercourse with the Prelate of Rome, indicates equality. Cyprian was contemporary with Fabianus, Cornelius, Lucius, and Stephanus. He addresses them by the terms, "brother," "colleague," "fellow-Bishop," &c. "Know now, brother,"¶ was the address of Dionysius, Bishop of Alexandria, to Pope Stephanus. The Synod of Antioch wrote, "To Dionysius and Max-

[* Hieron. ad Evang., vide supra, p. 618.]

[† "Quamquam nobis differendæ hujus rei necessitas major incumbat, quibus post excessum nobilissimæ memoriæ viri Fabiani nondum est Episcopus propter rerum et temporum difficultates constitutus, qui omnia ista moderetur, et eorum qui lapsi sunt possit cum auctoritate et consilio habere rationem."—Cypr. Opera, Epist. Cleri Romani ad Cyp., Ep. xxx., p. 38. 8vo. Paris, 1836.]

[‡ "Multa sunt in Epistolis Cypriani, quarum nulla fit ab aliis scriptoribus ecclesiasticis mentio, tum quia paucissima eorum scripta ad eos pervenerunt, tum quia, variis tunc ecclesia vexationibus oppressa, difficilis et infrequens erat provinciarum inter sese communicatio."—Idem, Epist. lxvii., Ad Stephanum. Fol. Cum Notis Nic. Rigaltii, p. 110. Paris, 1666.]

[§ "Cum igitur postea dicit, ante Nicænum Concilium quemque sibi vixisse, et ad Romanam Ecclesiam parvum respectum fuisse; nihil aliud significat, quam propter persequutiones continuas non potuisse Romanos Pontifices libere exercere eam, quam a Christo acceperant, auctoritatem."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. i., De Rom. Pontif., lib. ii., cap. xvii., col. 660, B. Paris, 1620.]

[* "Nisi si paucis desperatis et perditis minor videtur esse auctoritas Episcoporum in Africa constitutorum, qui jam de illis judicaverunt, et eorum conscientiam multis delictorum laqueis vinctam judicii sui nuper gravitate damnarunt."—Cypriani Opera, Epist. ad Cornelium, Ep. liv., p. 73. 8vo. Paris, 1836.]

[† "Non tamen æquum eensebant idcirco se inferiore loco haberi, quod magnitudine Ecclesiæ et multitudine superarentur, quippe qui virtute et animi proposito superiores essent."—Sozom., Hist. Eccles., lib. iii., cap. viii. Fol. Ed. Gul. Reading. Cantab., 1720.]

[‡ "Si igitur vere parem eumdemque honorem in omnibus Episcopis censetis esse, neque magnitudine civitatum (ut vos scribitis) de Episcopis judicatis, oportuit eum cui concredita est parva civitas in ea, quæ credita est, permanere, et nequaquam rejecta concredita, ad eam, quæ concredita non est, transvolare, ne eam, quæ a Deo data est, aspernari, illam vero, quæ hominum ambitu concessa est, magnificare videatur."—Athanasii Opera, tom. i., Ad Imp. Constant. Apol. Epist. Julii I., col. 744, B. Colon., 1686.]

[§ "Nec dispari superbia ad errorem ducitur; quia sicut perversus ille Deus videri vult super omnes homines, ita quisquis iste est, qui solus Sacerdos appellari appetit, super ceteros Sacerdotes se extollit."—Conc. Labb., tom. iv., Gregorii P. I. Epistolæ, lib. vi., Ep. xxx., Ad Mauricium Augustum, col. 1276, B. Paris, 1671.]

[‖ "Indicare quoque vestra beatitudo studuit, jam se quibusdam non scribere superba vocabula, quæ ex vanitatis radice prodierunt, et mihi loquitur, dicens: Sicut jussistis. Quod verbum jussionis, peto, a meo auditu removete, quia scio qui sum, qui estis. Loco enim mihi fratres estis, moribus Patres. Non ergo jussi, sed quæ utilia visa sunt, indicare curavi."—S. Gregorii P. I. Cognom. Magni Opera, tom. ii., Epist., lib. viii., Ep. xxx., Ad Eulog. Episc. Alex., col. 919, B. Ed. Bened. Paris, 1705.]

[¶ "Ισθι δε νυν, αδελφε." "Scias autem, frater."—Euseb., Eccles. Hist., lib. vii., cap. x., p. 323. Edit. Gul. Reading. Fol. Cantab., 1720.]

imus, and all our fellow-Ministers throughout the world."* Athanasius saith: "These things may suffice which have been written by our beloved and fellow Minister, Damasus, Bishop of great Rome."† Cyril referred to Celestine I. as "our brother and fellow-Minister, the Bishop of Rome." Marcellus addressed Julius: "Most blessed fellow-Minister." Basil and his co-Prelates of the East write to the Bishops of Italy and France, as "the beloved of God, and our most holy brethren and fellow-Ministers, the unanimous Bishops through Italy and France." The Fathers of the Ephesine Council address Celestine I., as "our brother and fellow-Minister, Celestine." Those of Carthage approach Celestine I. in the same terms in which Augustine saluted Maximinus, a Donatist Bishop: "To our Lord the most beloved and most honoured brother."‡ The oriental Bishops, Eustathius, Theophilus, and Silvanus, addressed Pope Liberius thus: "To the Lord, our brother and fellow-Minister, Liberius, Eustathius and Theophilus wish health."§ John of Antioch, writing to Nestorius, says, "To my master."‖ The Synod of Illyricum terms Elpidius, "Our Lord and fellow-Minister."¶ In these instances, the word κυριος, or Dominus, is employed as a term of civility, and applied to any person of distinction. Chrysostom frequently bestows it upon Bishops in general, and on Presbyters. Augustine salutes a Donatist Bishop thus, and reflects upon such salutation as follows:—"Since, therefore, by charity I serve you in this office of writing letters to you, I do not improperly call you master, for the sake of our one true Master, who has commanded us so to do." Celestine I. saluted in a similar manner the Ephesine Fathers, "Masters, brethren;"†† and in the sixth General Council, Thomas, Bishop of Constantinople, addressed Pope Vitalianus, as his "brother and fellow-Minister."

It would be considered in the present day a mark of unpardonable arrogance for a Bishop in the Church of Rome to address the Pope in such language as the above; a powerful proof that a great change has taken place, and that the Pontiff is not now what the early Prelates of Rome were. Nothing but Beatissimus Pater, "Most blessed Father;" Dominus noster Papa, "Our Lord the Pope," "His Holiness," &c., will satisfy the Papal hierarchy. The Roman Bishops, when writing to others, in ancient times, called them brethren and fellow-Ministers. Cornelius, corresponding with Fabius, of Antioch, says: "Beloved brother."* And with others: "Be it known to all our fellow-Bishops and brethren."† Julius to the oriental Prelates says: "To our beloved brethren."‡ Liberius to the Macedonian Clergy writes. "To our beloved brethren and fellow-Bishops;"§ and to the oriental Bishops: "To our brethren and fellow-Bishops."‖ So also Damasus and Leo.¶ Celestine calls John of Antioch, "most honoured brother." Gelasius, when writing to the Bishops of Dardania, says: "Your brotherhood."†† Gregory I. to Mauricius writes: "Our brother and fellow-Priest, Cyriacus."‡‡

If it be said, "The Popes in ancient times spoke thus from humility and modesty, or in condescension to others;" it is replied, that if they at that period were what they profess now to be, such language was affected and founded in untruth; but if their office were of divine appointment, it became them in order to the maintenance of their dignity. These Divines, therefore, must either be chargeable with betraying the interests of a sacred institution, or of using wicked methods to support it; and as the latter cannot in justice be charged upon the early Prelates, then they must have known nothing of that supremacy which their successors so presumptuously claim.

Bellarmine §§ furnishes an instance in which Damasus, in addressing the eastern Bishops, calls them, "most honoured sons."‖‖ We reply: (1.) That the whole epistle has the appearance of interpolation: it is introduced abruptly, and does not correspond with the well-known gravity of the historian Theodoret. (2.) If it be genuine, it presents marks of corruption, the style is unsuitable to the times, and different from that adopted by his predecessors and successors. (3.) It is even contrary to his own; for, writing to the Bishops of Illyricum, he invariably calls them, "beloved brethren."¶¶ (4.) This salutation does not always imply superiority, as we learn from the inscription of an epistle of Alexander, Bishop of Thessalonica, to Athanasius of Alexandria: "To my beloved son and unanimous colleague, Athanasius."

[* "Dionysio et Maximo, et omnibus per universum orbem comministris nostris; Episcopis, Presbyteris, et Diaconis; et universæ Ecclesiæ Catholicæ quæ sub cœlo est," &c.—Idem, lib. vii., cap. 30.]

† "Ἱκανα μεν τα γραφεντα παρα τε του αγαπητου και συλλειτουργου ἡμων Δαμασου."—Athan. Opera, tom. i., Epist. ad Episc. in Afric., p. 931, C. Colon., 1686.

[‡ "Domino dilectissimo et honorabili fratri."—Labb. Conc., tom. ii., Conc. Afric. Epist. ad Celest., col. 1674, D. Paris, 1671.

"Domino dilectissimo et honorabili fratri Maximino."—August. Opera, tom. ii., Epist. xxiii., col. 30, E. Paris, 1679.

§ "Κυριῳ, αδελφῳ, και συλλειτουργῳ Λιβεριῳ, Ευσταθιος και Θεοφιλος εν Κυριῳ χαιρειν."—Socrat., Hist. Eccles., lib. iv., cap. xii. Edit. Reading. Fol. Cantab., 1720.

‖ "Τῳ δεσποτῃ μου."—Labb. Conc., tom. iii., Conc. Ephes., col. 387, D. Paris, 1671.

¶ "Τον κυριον ἡμων και συλλειτουργον." ["Idcirco autem pluribus ad vos scribere noluimus, quia missus est unus ex omnibus, Dominus noster et comminister Elpidius, accurate exploraturus prædicationem vestram, utrum ita se habeat uti accepimus a Domino et comministro nostro Eustathio."]—Theod., Hist. Eccles., lib. iv., cap. ix., p. 159. Ed. Reading. Cantab., 1720.

 "Cum ergo vel hoc ipso officio literarum per charitatem tibi serviam, non absurde te Dominum voco, propter unum et verum Dominum nostrum qui nobis ista præcepit."—Aug. Opera, tom. ii., Epist. xxiii., alias cciii., col. 30, F. Ed. Ben. Paris, 1679.

†† "Κυριοι, αδελφοι."—Conc. Labb., tom. iii., P. Celest. I. Ep. ad Syn. Eph., act. ii., col. 613. Paris, 1671.

[‡‡ "Fratrem atque consacerdotem meum Cyriacum."—Conc. Labb., tom. v., Greg. I. Epist., lib. vi., ep. vi., col. 1256, A. Paris, 1671.]

[§§ "Damasus, qui in epistola ad omnes Episcopos orientales, quam Theodoretus recitat libro v. Hist., cap. x., 'Quoniam,' inquit, 'Apostolicæ sedi reverentiam debitam caritas vestra distribuit, vobis quamplurimum, carissimi filii, præstitistis.'"—Bellarm. Opera, tom. i., De Rom. Pontif., lib. ii., cap. xiv., col. 644, B. Coloniæ, 1620.]

‖‖ "Υιοι τιμιωτατοι."—Theod. Hist. Eccles., lib. v., cap. x. Ed. Reading. Fol. Cantab., 1720.

[¶¶ "Dilectis fratribus."—Sozom. Hist. Eccles., lib. vi., cap. xxiii. Ed. Reading. Fol. Cantab., 1720.]

[ "Domino dilecto filio et unanimi suo in sacris Collegæ Athanasio, Alexander Episcopus in Domino salutem."—Athanas. Opera, tom. i., Epist. Alexand., p. 783. Colon., 1686.]

VIII. The supremacy is overturned by the very arguments upon which the Roman Bishops have sought to establish it.

1. It was not of divine institution. Christianity had no laws of this kind, which made difference of place a sacred appointment.

2. But the reason why the ancients gave a kind of preference to the Church and Bishops of Rome, was, the size, dignity, opulence, convenience, &c., of the city. The Church of Rome was designated by Cyprian, "the principal Church." * Rigaltius, the commentator of Cyprian, states as the ground of this distinction, that the Church was "constituted in the principal city." † In times of severe persecution, by the providence of God, it had a large number of Christians. Cornelius, in his epistle to Fabius, enumerates forty-four Presbyters, seven Deacons, seven sub-Deacons, forty-two Acolytes, fifty-two of the inferior Clergy, and above fifteen hundred alms-people.‡ There was constantly a great resort of Christians to Rome, it being the seat of the empire and the metropolis. Such was the case in every principal city, according to the sixth canon of the Council of Antioch, held A. D. 341: "The Bishop of each metropolis should take care of the whole province, because all that had business did resort thither."

"To this Church," says Irenæus, "it is necessary that every church, that is, the faithful around, should resort, because of its more powerful principality." § The words, "more powerful principality," refer to the strength and grandeur of the imperial city; but they do not well suit the authority of a church, when none at that time possessed any principality. This appears from the context of Irenæus, who does not allege the judicial authority of the Roman Church, but only its testimony to the truth and Christian assistance. Such ground of precedence Cyprian gives in another case: "Because Rome, on account of its magnitude, ought to precede Carthage." ‖ Hence the pagan historian states a reason why "the Roman Bishops had greater authority than others," that is, they had greater interest and reputation.¶ Theodoret, in his epistle to Pope Leo, gives a similar one. "For this city," says he, "is the greatest and most splendid, presiding over the world, and flowing with a multitude of people; which, moreover, hath produced the empire now governing." **

The succour which Rome rendered to other Christians in early times, under persecution and poverty, would not fail to give some importance both to the Bishop and the Church at Rome. Dionysius, of Corinth, in writing to Soter, the Roman Prelate, mentions this in the following words, as quoted by Eusebius:—"This is your custom from the beginning, in divers ways to do good to the brethren, and to send supplies to many churches in every city, thus refreshing the poverty of those who want." *

This is the ground on which the Council of Chalcedon established the superiority of the Roman See. "The Fathers," say they, "reasonably conferred the privileges on the throne of ancient Rome, because that was the royal city." † The fountain of eminence, in their judgment, was not divine institution, or the authority of Peter, or the right of succeeding him; but the concession of the Fathers, who allowed or granted it, because it was the imperial city. Hence the Empress Placidia, in her epistle to Theodosius, in behalf of Pope Leo, says, "It becomes us to preserve to this city, which is the mistress of all lands, a reverence in every thing." ‡ The Fathers also of the second General Council advanced "the Bishop of Constantinople to the privileges of honour next to those of the great metropolis, because it was New Rome." §

3. Other Bishops, as those of Constantinople, Antioch, Alexandria, &c., obtained a precedency on the same grounds by which the Bishop and Church at Rome were put in possession of it. The Fathers of Chalcedon "assigned equal prerogatives to the most holy see of New Rome, with good reason, judging, that the city which was honoured with the royalty and Senate, and which enjoyed immunities in common with ancient Rome, should also, in ecclesiastical affairs, be magnified, being the second in order after it." ‖ On this account the Church of Constantinople aspired to the supreme principality, when the empire was extinguished in the old city. Constantinople was sometimes styled, "the head of all churches." ¶

For a similar reason, other Bishops were raised to the eminence of Metropolitans, Primates, Patriarchs, &c. The Prelate of Alexandria, before the time of Constantine, acquired the honour of second place to Rome; because that city, being the head of a rich and powerful nation, in magnitude and wealth, Gregory Nazianzen says, "it did approach next to Rome, so as scarcely to

[* "Ad Petri cathedram atque ad Ecclesiam principalem."—Cypriani Opera, epist. liv., Ad Cornel., p. 75. 8vo. Paris, 1836.]

[† "Ad Ecclesiam principalem. In urbe principali constitutam, can. xxviii. Conc. Chalced. Maxima et antiquissima, et omnibus cognita, a gloriosissimis duobus Apostolis Petro et Paulo Romæ fundata et constituta Ecclesia. Ad hanc propter potentiorem principalitatem necesse est omnem convenire ecclesiam: Irenæi verba sunt."—Cypriani Opera, epist. lv., Ad Cornelium. Cum notis Nic. Rigalt., p. 84. Fol. Paris, 1666.]

[‡ "In qua tamen sciebat (quomodo enim illud nescire potuisset?) Presbyteros quidem esse quatuor et quadraginta, septem autem Diaconos, totidemque sub-Diaconos; Acoluthos duos et quadraginta; exorcistas et lectores cum ostiariis quinquaginta duo; viduas denique cum infirmis et egentibus plusquam mille et quingentas."—Euseb. Hist. Eccl., lib. vii., cap. xliii. Ed. Reading. Fol. Cantab., 1720.]

§ "Ad hanc ecclesiam, propter potentiorem principalitatem, necesse est omnem convenire ecclesiam, hoc est, eos qui sunt undique fideles."—Iren. Opera, adversus Hæres., lib. iii., cap. iii. Genevæ, 1570.

‖ "Plane quoniam pro magnitudine sua debeat Carthaginem Roma præcedere, illic majora et graviora commisit."—Cypriani Opera, epist. xlviii., Ad Cornel., p. 54. 8vo. Paris, 1836.

¶ "Auctoritate qua potiores æternæ urbis Episcopi."—Ammian. Marcellini Rerum Gestarum qui de xxxi. supersunt, lib. xv., cap. vii., p. 92. Fol. Paris, 1681.

[ "Multis siquidem prærogativis ornatur sedes vestra. Etenim alias urbes ornat vel magnitudo, vel pulchritudo, vel habitatorum frequentia; nonnullas etiam, quæ his carent, spiritualia quædam dona illustrant; vestræ vero bonorum affluentiam Largitor dedit. Illa enim omnium maxima et clarissima, quæ et orbi terrarum præsidet, et incolarum multitudine redundat.—Theod. Opera, tom. iii., epist. cxiii., Leoni Episc. Romæ, p. 984, D. Paris, 1642.]

[* "Hæc enim, inquit, vobis consuetudo est jam inde ab ipso religionis exordio, ut fratres omnes vario beneficiorum genere afficiatis, et ecclesiis quamplurimis, quæ in singulis urbibus constitutæ sunt, necessaria vitæ subsidia transmittatis."—Euseb. Hist. Eccles., lib. iv., cap. xxiii. Ed. Reading. Fol. Cantab., 1720.]

† Conc. Labb., tom. iv., Conc. Chal., act. xv., can. xxviii., col. 769, A. Paris, 1671.

‡ Idem, Epist. Placid. ad Theodos., col. 54, B.

[§ "Constantinopolitanus Episcopus habeat priores honoris partes post Romanum Episcopum, eo quod sit ipsa Nova Roma."—Idem, tom. ii., Conc. Constant. I., can. iii., col. 948, C.]

[‖ "Sanctissimo Novæ Romæ throno æqualia privilegia tribuerunt, recte judicantes, urbem quæ et imperio et Senatu honorata sit, et æqualibus cum antiquissima regina Roma privilegiis fruatur, etiam in rebus ecclesiasticis, non secus ac illam, extolli ac magnifieri, secundam post illam existentem."—Idem, tom. iv., Conc. Chalced., can. xxviii., col. 769, B.]

¶ Imper. Leo. Cod., lib. i, tit. ii., sect. xvi.

yield to an inferior place." * Antioch obtained the next position, being the largest and most flourishing city of the east. Of which Josephus says, "For size, and other advantages, it had, without controversy, the third place in all the world subject to the Romans." † Chrysostom calls Antioch, "the head of all cities in the east." ‡ And Basil calls the church there, "the principal church in the world." § The Bishop of Carthage obtained the privilege of being the standing Primate of his province, who acted as Patriarch over all the African churches; though in that country, other primacies were not fixed to places, but were vested in the senior Bishop. Cesarea, also being the political metropolis of Palestine, preceded Jerusalem in ecclesiastical priority.

4. Though a kind of precedency was conceded to Rome, it was neither in nature nor degree equal to the claims of supremacy demanded by the Roman Pontiff. Cyprian is said to have called the Roman See, the chair of St. Peter, and the principal Church; yet he disclaimed any authority of the Roman Clergy over their brethren. Firmilian observed, that Pope Stephen "gloried in the place of his bishopric, and contended that he held the succession of Peter." ‖ Yet he did not consider himself obliged to submit to the authority of that individual, or follow his judgment; on the contrary, he severely reproved him as a favourer of heretics, an author of schism, and declared that he had cut himself off from communion with his brethren. The Fathers of the Council of Antioch have expressed themselves clearly on this subject: "They confessed that in writings, all did willingly honour the Roman Church, as having been from the beginning the school of the Apostles, and the metropolis of religion; although the instructors of religious doctrine went from the east and resided there; but refused to be considered inferiors, because they were inferior in the magnitude and number of their Church." ¶ Some regard was allowed to the Roman Church on account of its apostolic foundation, but still greater because of the grandeur of the city. The true reason why the Roman Church and Bishops obtained pre-eminence is stated by Baronius, who says, "The ancients acknowledged no other rule in instituting the ecclesiastical sees, than the division of provinces, and the prerogative before established by the Romans, (of which) there are very many examples."  Of these, Rome is most notorious.

[* "Vos magnæ urbis cives, qui primi statim post primam estis, aut ne id quidem ei conceditis, ita vos gerite, ut primi, non improbitate, sed virtute, non morum dissolutione ac mollitie, sed optimis legibus sitis."—Greg. Nazianz. Opera, orat. xxviii., p. 178. Fol. Antverpiæ, 1612.]

Evagr. Hist. Eccles., lib. ii., cap. iv. Fol. Cantab., 1720.

† Josephus's Works, vol. ii. Wars of the Jews, book iii., chap. ii. 8vo. London, 1825.

[‡ "Πολις ούτω μεγαλη και των ὑπο την ἑω κειμενων η κεφαλη εκ μεσης αναρπασθηναι κινδυνευει της οικουμενης."—Chrysost. Opera, tom. ii., Ad Popul. Antioch., hom. ii., p. 27, A. 8vo. edit. Paris, 1838.]

§ Basil. Opera, tom. ii., epist. xlviii.; Ad August., p. 820. Paris, 1618.

‖ "Atque ego in hac parte juste indignor ad hanc tam apertam et manifestam Stephani stultitiam, quod qui sic de episcopatus sui loco gloriatur, et se successionem Petri tenere contendit; Stephanus qui per successionem cathedram Petri habere se prædicat."—Cypriani Opera, epist. lxxiv., Firmil. ad Cypr., p. 130. 8vo. Paris, 1836.

¶ Soz. Hist. Eccles., lib. iii., cap. viii. Vide supra.

[ "Majores enim in instituendis sedibus ecclesiarum, non aliam iniisse rationem, quam secundum provinciarum divisionem et prærogativas a Romanis antea stabilitas, quamplurima sunt exempla."—Baronii Annal. Eccles., A.D. 39, sect. x., tom. i., p. 270. Fol. Antverpiæ, 1612.]

CHAPTER IX.

SUPREMACY—CONTINUED.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE ORIGIN, GROWTH, AND ESTABLISHMENT OF METROPOLITICAL, PRIMATICAL, AND PATRIARCHAL JURISDICTIONS. Statement of the question. 1. At the first each church was settled under its own Bishop or Pastor, and Presbyters: 2. Each church was independent of the others: 3. Afterward several churches combined together in ecclesiastical confederacies: 4. In dividing provinces and diocesses, they followed the civil divisions: 5. For the sake of order one was called upon to preside, who was termed "Metropolitan," "Archbishop," "Patriarch," or "Pope:" 6. Each province, before the time of Constantine, was independent, as each parish or Bishop's charge was previous to the existence of provincial Synods: 7. New arrangement under Constantine. Hence diocesses, Primates, and Patriarchs. Their power. The Bishop of Rome had not the charge of a whole diocess: 8. Origin of diocesses, and of Exarch, or Patriarch. Fourth canon of the first Council of Nice. Sixth canon. Remarks on them. Opinion of the Synod of Carthage. The second General Council probably introduced the diocesses and patriarchates. It obtained after the Nicene Council. Appeal of Cyril. Was probably introduced without special law. Canon of the second Council of Constantinople confirms it. Intimated in the Council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. Instances of authority gained by assumption and concession. Arrogance of Innocent I., A.D. 402. Council of Sardis, A.D. 347. The diocesan form established in the time of the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. Its ninth, seventeenth, and twenty-eighth canons cited: 9. Some churches continued independent of the Patriarchs for a long period. Such were the African, British, and Irish churches: 10. Steps by which the Bishops of Rome arrived at the supremacy. Ten observations: 11. Conclusions from the foregoing.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE ORIGIN, GROWTH, AND ESTABLISHMENT OF METROPOLITICAL, PRIMATICAL, AND PATRIARCHAL JURISDICTIONS.

We shall confine our remarks on this head to that part of the ancient discipline of the church which refers to the supremacy, as the subject would be too ample to treat at large, and unnecessary to our present purpose. We propose, therefore, to maintain the following proposition, as embracing what pertains to the supremacy:—"That all ecclesiastical precedency or subordination of Bishops or chief Pastors over others in spiritual affairs, was introduced by human ordinances, and established by law and custom, for prudential reasons, according to the exigencies of times and circumstances." In confirmation whereof the following reasons are offered:—

1. Primarily each church was settled apart, under its own Bishop or chief Pastor and Presbyters. This will apply to the age immediately succeeding the Apostles. During the first three centuries no degrees were known in the hierarchy except Bishops, Presbyters, and Deacons. The Council of the Bishop was composed of the two latter classes, who were also his assistants. As such they are viewed by Ignatius and Jerome. This order was doubtless introduced in conformity with the Jewish synagogue; each having its ruler, who presided over the others, including the Pastors and dispensers of alms. To the ruler has succeeded the Bishop, to the Pastors the Presbyters, and to the Eleemosynaries the Deacons.

2. Each church, under its own Bishop, Presbyters, and Deacons, was independent of the others, and conducted its own affairs uncontrolled. Each was αυτοκεφαλος, "governed by its own head;" and αυτονομος, "had its own laws." They made regulations concerning discipline and government, which were judged expedient and proper, without the concurrence or authority of other churches. But should any Bishop neglect to uphold the true doctrine, or to maintain charity and peace toward other communities, he was liable to be disowned by his fellows as a good Christian, and rejected from their communion, together with his church, should it embrace his views, or follow his example. In all matters of moment, the Bishops advised with each other; especially with those of the same province, who frequently met to arrange ecclesiastical affairs within their respective territories. In the Bishop's diocess, afterward so termed, the consent of the people was duly regarded. The boundary of his charge was called a "parish" or "neighbourhood," embracing a town or city and its vicinity. The division into diocesses was of subsequent origin.

3. Afterwards several churches combined together, and formed a kind of ecclesiastical confederacy. These Synods or assemblies were composed of Bishops, Presbyters, Deacons, and laymen representing their several churches. They met by their own appointment and authority, without any interference of the Magistrate. Being assembled, they chose in the first place one, and sometimes two, Bishops, to preside; whose duty it was to see the point in question calmly and fairly debated, to sum up each discussion, stating what had been urged on either side, and then to take the suffrage of the members of the Council or Synod, and, last of all, to give their own. In these assemblies all topics were decided by a majority of votes, and their decrees were binding only on those churches whose representatives were present.

Such was the character of the hierarchy during the greater part of the first three centuries. In the fourth and following, great alterations were made in the church, adapting her government to that of the State, introduced by Constantine, who re-organized the administration and discipline of the church. In his reign the several titles of Patriarch, Exarch, and Metropolitan were first introduced.

4. In dividing provinces and diocesses, the church followed the divisions of territory and of jurisdiction already established in the State. That this conformity between the civil and ecclesiastical polity may be distinctly seen, we shall give a description of the former as established by Constantine throughout the empire.

That Prince divided the whole Roman world into four prefectures; namely, the East, Illyricum, Gaul, and Italy, which were governed by four Prefects, called Præfecti Prætorio. Each prefecture was divided into diocesses, and each diocess into provinces. The prefecture of the East embraced five diocesses; namely, (1.) The East, divided into ten provinces. (2.) Egypt, into six. (3.) Pontus, into eleven. (4.) Asia, into ten. (5.) And Thrace, into six provinces. Illyricum contained two; namely, (1.) Macedon, consisting of eight provinces; (2.) And Dacia, of four. Gaul comprised three; namely, (1.) Gaul, including seventeen provinces; (2.) Spain, seven; (3.) And Britain, five. The prefecture of Italy was divided into two vicarages or lieutenancies; the one of Rome, under the Vicar of that city, comprehending ten provinces, called the suburbicarian. The other was called the vicarage of Italy, containing seven provinces, governed by the Vicar, who resided at Milan, whence they were simply called provinces of Italy. Under the Prefect of Italy was likewise West Africa; and, after Constantine's death, West Illyricum. Each diocess, and also each province, had its metropolis.

The ecclesiastical arrangement, in most places, answered to the civil; so that one Bishop was raised above another, according to the rank of his city. The chief cities of the five oriental diocesses were, Antioch, Alexandria, Ephesus, Cesarea, and Heraclea. The Prelates of these cities were exalted above all other Bishops, and distinguished by the name of Exarchs. In like manner the Bisnop of the metropolis of each province was honoured with the title of Metropolitan, to which were annexed several privileges. The prefecture of Illyricum had but one Exarch, the Bishop of Thessalonica. In the prefecture of Gaul there was no Exarch; but in the two diocesses of Gaul and Spain there were as many Metropolitans as provinces. The Roman Pontiff enjoyed all the privileges of Metropolitan over the Bishops of the provinces subject to the Vicar of the city, or the suburbicarian provinces, as they were called by Ruffin, to the number of ten, and whose names were Campania, Apulia, Lucania, Hetruria, Umbria, Picenum, Suburbicarium, Sicily, Sardinia, Corsica, and Valeria. In like manner the Prelate of Milan exercised the authority of Metropolitan over the Bishops who were subject to the Vicar of Italy. But the power of the Roman and Italian Prelates was confined within the limits of their respective vicarages. As neither had the charge of a whole diocess, they were not, like the eastern Bishops, distinguished by the title of Exarch, to which they had no right, being only Metropolitans. However, the power of the Bishop of Rome exceeded that of the Metropolitans within the bounds of his jurisdiction, embracing the ten suburbicary provinces; or, in other words, the provinces immediately in the vicinage of the capital, and of which that city was the metropolis.

In Africa the ecclesiastical polity varied from the civil. Carthage was the metropolis of all Western Africa, and the Bishop of that city was the Primate and Exarch. But in the other five provinces, the senior Bishop enjoyed the title and powers of Metropolitan. Hence it happened that Bishops of different cities, within the same province, frequently acted in that capacity. When one province was divided into two, which often occurred, the ecclesiastical polity was also altered, and the Bishop of the new metropolis was constituted Metropolitan. Several instances could be given, of ambitious Prelates applying to the Emperors for a division of the province, that their city might become a metropolis, and that they might be raised to a higher dignity. When Byzantium was declared the metropolis of another empire, the exarchate of Heraclea was, by the change, transferred from that place to the new metropolis; so that the Bishop of the former province became Suffragan to the Bishop of Byzantium or Constantinople. Upon the division of a province, the churches were also divided, and the Bishop of the new metropolis was promoted to the corresponding office.

It was the general rule to graduate the scale of ecclesiastical dignity by the secular government. This was first accomplished by Constantine, and continued by his successors, and was subsequently authorized by various Councils, both General and Provincial. Thus the ninth canon of the Synod of Antioch declares: "The Bishops in every province ought to know, that the Prelate residing in the metropolis doth undertake the care of all the province; because all that have business do meet together in the metropolis; whence it hath been ordained, that he should preside in honour, and that the Bishops should do nothing extraordinary without him; according to a more ancient canon."* The Councils of Chalcedon and Trulla ordained, that "if by royal authority any city be, or should hereafter be, re-established, the order of the churches shall be according to the civil and public form." *

[* "Per singulas provincias Episcopos constitutos scire oportet Episcopum metropolitanum, qui præest, curam et solicitudinem

Some writers, as Petrus de Marca, Christianus Lupus, Schelstrat, and Leo Allatius, Roman Catholic writers, have maintained that these ecclesiastical dignities owe their origin to Christ or his Apostles; an idea which has been confuted by Du Pin.† It is evident from the conformity between the political and ecclesiastical state of the empire, as established by Constantine, that the church was formed according to his plan; and, consequently, that such dignities are not of divine, but human, institution. Besides, it cannot be proved from Scripture, that one Bishop or chief Pastor had any power over another, much less a power over the whole number of Prelates.

5. For the sake of order, in provincial Synods, one was called upon to preside who was termed the "Metropolitan," "Archbishop," "Patriarch," or "Pope." The apostolical canons call him the "first Bishop." The African Councils, Primus or "Primate."‡ Other ancient Synods gave him the name Metropolite, and to those who resided in the principal cities they gave the appellation of "Archbishop."

6. Each province, anterior to the time of Constantine, was αυτοκεφαλος, independent of all others in ecclesiastical administration, as each parish or church was previous to the existence of Provincial Synods; each reserved to itself the constitution of Bishops, the convocation of Synods, the enacting of canons, the decision of causes, the definition of questions, the trying of appeals, &c. Yet each province held peaceful correspondence with the others, on terms similar to those on which each παροικια, "parish," held intercourse with its neighbours. Whoever in these provinces refused to submit to the decisions of such assemblies was deemed schismatical, contentious, and contumacious; because he rejected a discipline which was conducive to the public good, and to the continuance of fellowship and peace.

Thus the metropolitical administration was introduced by human prudence. It was not instituted by the Apostles, because it was not adapted to the state of things in their times, and the constitution of the apostolical churches. The natural course of events in the church flowed into this channel before such a government was established by general consent. Such was the state of affairs, A. D. 325, when the Council of Nice sat. The whole church was then a body consisting of several confederations of Bishops acting in behalf of their people, under respective Metropolitans. Such was the condition of the church to which the apostolical canons and constitutions refer, and which agrees with the times in which they were framed. The above Synod, supported by the imperial authority, confirmed those regulations as they found them in most provinces, and reduced them to more uniform practice; so that what formerly stood upon reason, usage, and particular consent, became universal law, and obtained such veneration as afterward to be considered immutable and obligatory. *

7. The new dignities or degrees which were added to the ancient hierarchy of the church, in the fourth and following centuries, were those of Metropolitan, Primate, Archbishop, Exarch, and Patriarch. These titles were not merely those of honour, they had several prerogatives connected with them. That of Metropolitan was given to the Bishop of the chief city of a province, and likewise that of Primate, he being Primus, or "first" of the province: in process of time, the title Primus or "Primate" was confined to the Bishop of some great city. The term "Archbishop" was originally bestowed on Metropolitans only of great eminence; but in the eighth century it began to be used indifferently to all Metropolitans, and even to some Bishops who were distinguished by no other title. As the Bishop of the metropolis of a province was designated "Metropolitan," so the Bishop of the metropolis of a diocess was called "Exarch;" which title, however, was sometimes given to the former. The title of "Patriarch" was at first common to all Bishops; but afterward it was confined to the Exarchs; and, lastly, to the Bishops of the five following cities: Rome, Constantinople, Antioch, Alexandria, and Jerusalem. It was bestowed on the Bishop of Rome by the Council of Chalcedon, after it had long been common to the Exarchs of the East.†

According to Constantine's arrangement, in each diocess, consisting of several provinces, an ecclesiastical Exarch, sometimes called a "Primate" or "Diocesan,"‡

totius provinciæ suscepisse. Propter quod ad metropolitanam civitatem ab his qui causas habent sine dubio concurratur. Quapropter placuit eum et honore præire, et nihil ultra sine ipso reliquos Episcopos agere, secundum antiquum patrum nostrorum qui obtinuit canonem."—Conc. Labb., tom ii., Conc. Antioch., can. ix., col. 584, A. Paris, 1671.]

[* "Sin autem etiam civitas aliqua ab imperatoria auctoritate innovata est, vel deinceps innovata fuerit, civiles et publicas formas ecclesiasticarum quoque parochiarum ordo consequatur."—Idem, tom. iv., Conc. Chalcedon., can. xvii., col. 764, C. Paris, 1671.]

["Canonem qui a patribus factus est, nos quoque observamus, qui sic edicit: Si qua civitas ab imperiali potestate innovata est, vel rursus innovata fuerit, civiles et publicos typos ecclesiasticarum quoque rerum ordo consequatur."—Idem, tom. vi., Conc. Quinisext. vel Trull., can. xxxviii., col. 1160, D. Paris, 1671.]

[† De Antiqua Ecclesiæ Disciplina Dissertationes Historicæ, Autore Ludov. Ellies Du Pin, Dissert. i., sect. vi. An metropolitica aut patriarchica dignitas fuerit a Christo vel Apostolis instituta. P. 14, et seq. Fol. Paris, 1686.]

[‡ "Primæ sedis Episcopus non appelletur Princeps Sacerdotum, vel Summus Sacerdos, aut aliquid hujusmodi; sed tantum primæ sedis Episcopus."—Corp. Juris Canon. a Pithœo, tom. i., dist. xcix., cap iii. Fol. Paris, 1695.]

[* "Presbyteri et Diaconi sine sententia Episcopi nihil perficiant: ipse enim est, cujus fidei populus est creditus, et a quo pro animabus ratio exigetur."—Conc. Labb., tom. i., Can. Apost. xxviii., col. 34, C. Paris, 1671.

["De iis qui a communione segregati sunt, sive Clericorum sive laicorum sint ordinis, ab Episcopis, qui sunt in unaquaque provincia, valeat sententia secundum canonem, qui pronunciat eos, qui ab aliis ejecti sunt, non esse ab aliis admittendos; examinetur autem numquid vel pusillanimitate, vel contentione, vel aliqua ejusmodi Episcopi acerbitate, congregatione pulsi sunt. Ut hoc ergo convenientem examinationem accipiat, recte habere visum est ut singulis annis in unaquaque provincia bis in anno Synodi fiant; ut cum omnes provinciæ Episcopi in eumdem locum communiter conveniant, ejusmodi quæstiones examinentur; et sic quos Episcopum offendisse constiterit, juste esse a congregatione separati apud omne videantur, donec Episcoporum congregationi videatur pro iis humaniorem proferre sententiam. Synodi autem fiant, una quidem ante quadragesimam, ut omnibus animi sordibus sublatis, purum munus Deo offeratur; secunda, autem, autumni tempore."—Idem, tom ii., Conc. Nicæn., can. v., col. 31, A. Paris, 1671.

["Propter utilitates ecclesiasticas et absolutiones earum rerum, quæ dubitationem controversiamque recipiunt, optime placuit, ut per singulas quasque provincias bis in anno Episcoporum Concilia celebrentur."—Idem, Conc. Antioch., can. xx., col. 579, C.]

[† "In Concilio Constantinopolitano, A.D. 536, tribuitur Patriarchæ nomen Episcopis Romano, Constantinopolitano, Antiocheno, et Hierosolymitano, nec non Epiphanio Tyri Episcopo, actione quinta."—Du Pin, Antiq. Eccles. Discip., dissert. i., sect. v., p. 13. Paris, 1686.]

‡ "Διοικητης."—Conc. Labb., tom. iii., Conc. Ephes. Epist. Orient. ad Rufum, col. 742, B. Paris, 1671.

["Provinciæ multo ante Christi adventum tempore divisæ sunt, maxima ex parte; et postea ab Apostolis, et beato Clemente pra-and occasionally a "Patriarch,"* was constituted, answering to the civil Exarch of a diocess. The Metropolitans or Primates had, by their prerogative, a right to ordain the Bishops of their respective provinces, to convene provincial Synods, and to superintend the whole province. The ordaining of Bishops was also a privilege common to the Metropolitan, with other Bishops of the same province, but with this difference, that the presence, or at least the consent and approbation, of the Metropolitan was necessary. According to the Council of Nice, "he who was not ordained or approved by the Metropolitan, was not a lawful Bishop." This privilege was confirmed to that dignitary by subsequent Councils, as Arles, Laodicea,† and many others. In the fifth century, the Patriarchs of Alexandria and Constantinople, in the East, pretended that no Bishops ought to be ordained in their respective diocesses, without their knowledge, consent, and approbation. And the Roman Patriarch, still more ambitious, claimed a right to ordain all the Bishops in the western provinces. The second privilege of the Metropolitans gave them a right to summon the Bishops of their relative provinces when they thought proper; to appoint the time and place of their meeting; to preside in their Synods, and to punish such as did not, without cause, comply with their mandate.

The superintendence exercised by the Metropolitans over their provinces implied, First, That all complaints and contests among the Bishops were to be brought to their tribunal, and there to be heard, judged, and determined, not by the Metropolitan alone, but by him and the other Bishops, in a provincial Synod. Innumerable instances of this kind might be cited. Secondly, The Metropolitans had a right to receive appeals from the sentence of inferior Bishops; and, with the other Prelates, confirm or reverse their judgment. And, Lastly, each was to watch over the Bishops of his province, that they effectively discharged the duties of their office.

The Exarchs, Patriarchs, or Diocesans, were empowered to ordain the Metropolitans, convene diocesan Synods, and to exercise a general superintendency over their respective diocesses, as the Metropolitan over his province, or the Bishop in his parish.*

The Bishop of Rome had not the charge of a whole diocess, and was not, therefore, Exarch or Patriarch. His jurisdiction did not extend beyond the limits of the vicarage of Rome, or the ten suburbican provinces; and no instance can be produced of Metropolitans or Bishops being ordained by him out of these provinces, till the time of Valentinian III., and after the year 422. In the vicarage of Italy, the Metropolitan of each province ordained all his Bishops, and was ordained himself by them. But over the suburbican provinces, the Prelates of Rome exercised greater authority than the Exarchs of the East over those of their relative diocesses. The latter left the ordination of Bishops to the Metropolitan; whereas the former ordained not only the Prelates of the metropolitan cities, but those of the ten provinces of the vicarage of Rome. The reason of this was, because the provinces had no Metropolitan to whom the right belonged; so that their prerogatives were vested in the Diocesan of Rome. As there were no Exarchs or Patriarchs in the West, the Bishops of each province were, by several Councils, clothed with the power of ordaining their own Metropolitans. That they were thus ordained in Gaul, Spain, and Western Africa, admits of no dispute;† nevertheless the advocates of the See of Rome maintain, that the Prelates of that city have a divine right to ordain all Metropolitans throughout Christendom, by themselves, their Vicars, or Delegates. To maintain this claim against the testimony of facts, they tell us that the Popes, for ages, neglected to exercise this power. But from this charge all mankind will exempt them, it being well known, that they never neglected any opportunity of exerting the power they had, and of usurping that which they had not. The Pontiffs never thought of such authority, until they were told it by some obsequious Divines. Leo, surnamed the Great, did not; for, in one of his letters to the Bishops of Gaul, decessore nostro, ipsa divisio est renovata. Et in capite provinciarum, (ubi dudum Primates legis seculi erant, ac prima judiciaria potestas, ad quos qui per reliquas civitates commorabantur, quando eis necesse erat, qui ad aulam Imperatoris vel Regum confugere non poterant, vel quibus permissum non erat, confugiebant, pro oppressionibus vel injustitiis suis; ipsosque appellabant, quoties opus erat, sicut in lege eorum præceptum erat,) ipsis quoque in civitatibus vel locis, nostros Patriarchas, vel Primates, qui unam formam tenent, licet diversa sint nomina, leges divinæ et ecclesiasticæ poni et esse jusserunt; ad quos Episcopi, si necesse fuerit, confugerent, eosque appellarent: et ipsi Primatum nomine fruerentur, et non alii. Reliquæ vero metropolitanæ civitates, quæ minores judices habebunt, (licet majores comitibus essent,) haberent Metropolitanos suos, qui prædictis juste obedirent Primatibus, sicut et in locibus seculi olim ordinatum erat; qui non Primatum, sed aut Metropolitanorum aut Archiepiscoporum nomine fruerentur.

["Nulli Archiepiscopi Primates vocentur, nisi illi qui primas tenent civitates quarum Episcopos Apostoli, et successores Apostolorum, regulariter Patriarchas, et Primates esse constituerunt; nisi aliqua gens deinceps ad fidem convertatur, cui necesse sit propter multitudinem eorum Primatum constitui. Reliqui vero, qui alias metropolitanas sedes adepti sunt, non Primates, sed Metropolitani nominentur."—Corp. Juris Canon. a Pithœo, tom. i., dist. xcix., cap. i., ii. Fol. Paris, 1695.]

[* "Reddidit etiam Timotheus Ephesinæ Ecclesiæ jus patriarchicum, quod illi ademptum fuerat a Chalcedonensi Synodo, uti supra commemoravi."—Evag. Hist. Eccles., lib. iii., cap. vi. Edit. Reading. Fol. Cantab., 1720. Vide etiam Conc. Chalced., act. ii.]

[† "Nam si iidem aliquos ordinasse fuerint deprehensi, et de his quos ordinaverint ratio subsistit, non illis obsit ordinatio. Et quoniam multi sunt qui contra ecclesiasticam regulam pugnare videntur, et per testes redemptos putant se ad accusationem admitti debere, omnino non admittantur, nisi, ut supra diximus, actis publicis docuerint."—Conc. Labb., tom. i., Conc. Arelat., can. xiii., col. 1428, D. Paris, 1671.

["Ut Episcopi Metropolitanorum et eorum, qui sunt circumcirca, Episcoporum judicio, in ecclesiastico magistratu constituantur, diu examinati et in ratione fidei, et in rectæ rationis dispensatione."—Idem, Conc. Laodic., can. xii., col. 1498, D.]

[* Conc. Labb., tom. v., Epist. Greg. I., lib. xi., ep. lvi., col. 1543. Paris, 1671.

[Joannis Zonaræ Monachi, in can. xxviii., Conc. Chalced., p. 119. Fol. Paris, 1618.

["Ordo Episcoporum quadripertitus est, id est, in Patriarchis, Archiepiscopis, Metropolitanis, atque Episcopis. Patriarcha, Græca lingua, summus Patrum interpretatur; quia primum, id est, apostolicum, retinet locum; et ideo, quia summo honore fungitur, tali nomine censetur, sicut Romanus, Antiochenus, et Alexandrinus. Archiepiscopus Græco dicitur vocabulo, quod sit summus Episcoporum; tenet enim vicem apostolicam, et præsidet tam Metropolitanis, quam ceteris Episcopis. Metropolitani autem a mensura civitatum vocantur; singulis enim provinciis præeminent, quorum autoritati et doctrinæ ceteri Sacerdotes subjecti sunt, sine quibus nihil reliquos agere licet Episcopos; solicitudo enim totius provinciæ ipsis commissa est. Omnes autem superius designati ordines uno eodemque vocabulo Episcopi nominantur; sed ideo privato nomine quidam utuntur propter distinctionem potestatum quam singulariter acceperunt. Patriarcha, Patrum Princeps; Αρχων enim Princeps; inde Archiepiscopus Princeps Episcoporum, sicut Metropolitanus a mensura civitatum. Episcopatus autem vocabulum inde ductum, quod ille, qui efficitur Episcopus, superintendat, scilicet curam gerens subditorum. Σκοπειν enim Græce, Latine intendere dicitur. Episcopi autem Græce, Latine speculatores interpretantur; nam speculator est Præpositus in ecclesia dictus, eo quod speculetur et perspiciat populorum infra se positorum mores et vitam."—Corp. Juris Canon., tom. i., Isid., Dist. xxi., cap. i., p. 27. Paris, 1677.]

† Du Pin, Antiq. Eccles. Discip., dissert. i., cap. xiii., p. 71, et seq. Paris, 1686.

he disclaims, toto cælo, the right of ordaining Bishops in that diocess.* The Bishop of Rome was the only Metropolitan in that vicarage, and, as such, had a right to ordain all the Prelates in the suburbican provinces, or those that were subject to the civil authority. But, for a considerable space of time, there is no instance of either Bishops or Metropolitans being ordained by them out of the vicarage of Rome.

8. We inquire into the origin and establishment of diocesses, and of Exarchs, or Patriarchs. Here we remark, that the diocess comprised many provinces; the provinces, many parishes; and the parish was the territory superintended by the Bishop, or chief Pastor, under whom were placed Presbyters and Deacons, as his assistants.

Some imagine that the Council of Nice established diocesses, and appointed the Exarchs or Patriarchs. But this is improbable, because that Synod was held about the time of the division, and could scarcely take notice of so recent a change. The following are the canons on this point:—"A Bishop should be ordained by all the Bishops of a province, if it can be done; but if it be too difficult to assemble them all, either because of an urgent necessity, or because of their great distance, he may be ordained by three Bishops, provided that those who are absent be willing, and consent by their letters, that this ordination should be made; but the validity of what is done in the province depends on the Metropolitan." † "We ordain that the ancient custom shall be observed which gives power to the Bishop of Alexandria over all the provinces of Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis, because the Bishop of Rome has the like jurisdiction over all the suburbicary regions. We would likewise have the rights and privileges of the church of Antioch, and the other churches, preserved; but these rights ought not to prejudice those of the Metropolitans. If any one is ordained without the consent of that dignitary, the Council declares that he is no Bishop; but if any one is canonically chosen by the suffrage of almost all the Bishops of the province, and if there are but one or two of a contrary opinion, the suffrages of the far greater number ought to carry it for the ordination of those particular persons." ‡

The remarks of Du Pin on these canons are important: "The sixth canon preserves to great sees their ancient privileges, that is, the jurisdiction or authority which they had over many provinces, which was afterward called the jurisdiction of the Patriarch, or Exarch. In this sense it is, that it compares the Church of Rome with the Church of Alexandria, by considering them all as patriarchal churches. It continues also to the Church of Antioch, and all the other great churches, whatsoever rights they could have; and, lest their authority should be prejudicial to the ordinary Metropolitans, who were subject to their jurisdiction, the Council confirms what had been ordained in the fourth canon concerning the authority of the Metropolitans in the ordination of Bishops. This exposition is easy and natural, and we have given many proofs of it in our Latin dissertation concerning the ancient discipline of the church." *

The Council of Nice does not pretend to innovate, but manifests a watchful regard for ancient custom, and securing to the churches the privileges they possessed. The Synod alludes only to provinces, and represents the Metropolitan the chief governor therein. It supposes the decision of weighty causes in provincial Synods, which is inconsistent with diocesan authority. It takes no notice of Constantinople, the principal diocess of the East, as the seat of the empire. The Synod of Antioch, following the example of the Nicene Council, mentions only Metropolitans; and that of Laodicea, held A. D. 370, does the same.

The second General Council, held at Constantinople, A. D. 383, evidently refers to this division of diocesses, whether then introduced or not. They made some innovation in the form of government, corresponding to the political arrangement. They expressly use the new word "diocess" according to the political sense, as distinct from a province. They name especially the particular diocesses of the oriental empire, as they stood in the civil establishment. They prescribe that the Bishops of each diocess should confine themselves to their own see, and not go out of its bounds to ordain or interfere with the affairs of churches in another. † They direct appeal from a provincial to a diocesan Synod, as appears from the sixth canon of the Council, which says: "The accusation of a Bishop shall be carried to those of his own province. But if it so happen that the Prelates of any province cannot rectify those things which are laid to his charge, they shall then go to a greater Synod of the Bishops of that diocess, met together for that purpose." ‡ Historians report, that the Fathers of this Synod "distinguished and distributed diocesses, constituted Patriarchs," &c. §

It is probable that this form was introduced soon after the Synod of Nice, without any solemn appointment, by assumption and submission, accommodated to the political course of the times: certain Prelates, advanced in worldly interest and reputation by the increasing wealth and power of their cities, assumed an authority which the inferior Bishops readily granted. Of this we have proof. Cyril, Bishop of Jerusalem, being deposed by Acacius, Metropolitan of Palestine, "appealed to a greater judicatory." ‖

[* "Ordinationem sibi, ut ante jam diximus, singuli Metropolitani suarum provinciarum, cum his qui ceteros sacerdotii antiquitate præveniunt restituto sibi per nos jure defendant."—Conc. Labb., tom. iii., Leonis P. I., Ep. lxxxix., col. 1399, C. Paris, 1671.]

[† "Episcopum oportet maxime quidem ab omnibus qui sunt in provincia constitui. Si autem sit hoc difficile, vel propter urgentem necessitatem, vel viæ longitudinem, tres omnino eumdem in locum congregatos, absentibus quoque suffragium ferentibus, scriptisque assentientibus, tunc electionem fieri eorum autem quæ fiunt; confirmationem in unaquaque provincia a Metropolitano fieri."—Idem, tom. ii., Conc. Nicæn., can. iv., col. 30, E. Paris, 1671.]

[‡ Idem, can. vi. Vide supra, p. 639.

* Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., vol. i., p. 600. Folio. Dublin, 1723.

[† "Non vocati autem Episcopi ultra diœcesim, ne transeant ad ordinationem vel aliquam aliam administrationem ecclesiasticam. Servato autem præscripto de diœcesibus canone, clarum est quod unamquamque provinciam provinciæ Synodus administrabit secundum ea quæ fuerunt Nicææ definita."—Conc. Labb., tom. ii., Conc. Constant. I., can. ii., col. 948, B. Paris, 1671.]

[‡ "Sed si nonnulli nec hæretici, nec excommunicati fuerint, nec prius damnati, vel aliquorum criminum accusati, dicant autem se habere aliquas adversus Episcopum criminationes; eos jubet sancta Synodus primum quidem apud provinciæ Episcopos accusationem persequi, et apud eos probare crimina Episcopi, qui aliquarum rerum accusatur. Quod si evenerit, ut provinciales Episcopi crimina, quæ Episcopo intentata sunt, corrigere non possint, tunc ipsos accedere ad majorem Synodum diœcesis illius Episcoporum, pro hac causa convocatorum."—Idem, can. vi., col. 948, E.]

[§ Theodoret. Hist. Eccles., lib. v., cap. ix.; Epistola Synodica Concilii Constantinopolitani. Fol. Edit. Reading. Cantab., 1720. Vide Epistol. ad Flavianum Episcop. Constant. Theodoret. Opera, tom. iii., epist. lxxxvi., p. 962. Fol. Paris, 1642. Vide etiam Socrat. Hist. Eccles., lib. v., cap. viii. Fol. Edit. Reading. Cantab., 1720.]

‖ "Μειζον επικαλεσατο δικαστηριον."—Socr. Hist. Eccles., lib. ii., cap. xl. Ed. Reading. Fol. Cantab., 1720.

He is the first, Socrates says, who had recourse to an appeal. It seems there was no higher tribunal in existence than the Provincial Synod, until that period, which was some years previous to the assembly at Constantinople, in which mention is made of a greater one of the diocess. The second canon of the Council of Constantinople speaks of Bishops over diocesses, as already in existence, and regulates their conduct, forbidding them to go out of the bounds of their respective Sees, or interfere with the affairs of others. The Council sanctioned appeals to the Synod of a diocess. This form of government is intimated in the Council of Ephesus, held in 431: "And the same shall be observed in all diocesses and all provinces everywhere."

Many instances might be given of authority gained by such assumption and concession, without the form of law. The See of Constantinople assumed to itself ordination and other acts of jurisdiction, in three diocesses, before any such power was granted to it by a synodical decree. Similar instances occurred in the Synod of Chalcedon. Of Chrysostom it is said, "that, going into Asia, he deposed fifteen Bishops, and consecrated others in their room." He also deposed Gerontius, Bishop of Nicomedia, who belonged to the diocess of Pontus.* Hence the Fathers of Chalcedon stated, "that they had, in a Synod, confirmed the ancient custom which the holy church of God in Constantinople exercised, to ordain Metropolitans in the Asiatic, Pontic, and Thracian diocesses." This custom was, therefore, established by the Council of Chalcedon. Indisputable cases, in which this practice was adopted, may be found in the Roman, Alexandrine, and Antiochian Churches. Other diocesan Bishops, in imitation of the above, also enlarged their jurisdiction.

An instance of a similar assumption we find in Innocent I., who was elected Pope A. D. 402, and died on the 12th of March, A. D. 417. In his epistles, he lays claim to the primacy on the ground of divine right, which was at that time a new position. Archibald Bower, Esq., in his History of the Popes, says concerning him: "He was generally esteemed a man of good parts, and well acquainted with the laws and traditions of the church. Hence he was frequently consulted by the Western, sometimes by the Eastern, Bishops, in points both of faith and discipline. Of this general esteem, and the deference that was thereupon paid to his decisions, he took advantage to lay down, with an air of authority, and as undoubted truths, many false, groundless, and dangerous maxims, all tending to the diminution of the Episcopal power, and the advancement of the Papal. The dignity of the Apostolic See was, as we have seen, the burden of almost all his letters; he even improved it into a claim of supremacy; and we may say with great truth, that to him the See of Rome was more indebted for the grandeur it afterward gained, than to all his predecessors together. He formed the plan of that spiritual monarchy, which they, by constant application, established at last, in spite of the many almost insurmountable difficulties with which they had to contend. He was the first, who, changing the ancient foundation of the primacy, claimed it as the successor of St. Peter, the Prince of the Apostles, as he is styled, and not as the Bishop of the first city, although on that consideration alone it had been granted by the Councils. I said 'primacy,' because the word 'supremacy' was utterly unknown in those days.

"The Council of Sardica, held A. D. 347, had allowed, in some cases, and under several restrictions, appeals to be made to the See of Rome, as hath been observed elsewhere. But Innocent, scorning to owe any branch of his authority to that or any other Council, claimed, by divine right, the power of finally deciding all ecclesiastical controversies and disputes; which was an unlimited jurisdiction. It is true, no regard was paid to such pretensions, nor indeed did Innocent dare to pursue them, being well apprized of the opposition he would meet with, if he had then made such an attempt. He, therefore, contented himself with laying foundations, and thought it a great advance, as it certainly was, openly to have asserted such notions. Had he gone farther, he would have been stopped in his career, and it might have proved fatal to the power of Rome before it had arrived at a state of maturity; but that he went thus far was of great benefit, because it made a beginning, and furnished his successors with an opportunity of pleading antiquity for the opinions and principles upon which they proceeded.

"Accordingly, the decretals of Innocent are frequently quoted by the advocates for the See of Rome, to show how early the Popes claimed, by divine right and as successors of St. Peter, a universal authority and jurisdiction. But if the principles on which they founded their claims were false in Innocent's time, they are so in ours." *

The exarchal or patriarchal form of government was perfectly settled in the times of the Council of Chalcedon, the fourth General Council, held A. D. 451, as is evident from three canons.† The ninth says, "If any Clergyman have any thing against his Bishop, he should address himself to a provincial Synod; or if he hath any thing to do with his Metropolitan, he shall go to the Exarch of the diocess." The seventeenth declares, "That the churches or parishes should remain under the jurisdiction of those Bishops who are in possession of them, especially if they have been so for thirty years past; but if within that time there has been any dispute about them, it shall be permitted to refer themselves to the provincial Synod; or if it be a Bishop who is injured by his Metropolitan, he may have recourse to the Exarch of his diocess, or the See of Constantinople." The twenty-eighth ordains, "That the Church of the city of Constantinople, which is called New Rome, shall have the same privileges as Old Rome, because it is the second city in the world. It also grants to the Bishop of Constantinople the jurisdiction over the diocesses of Pontus, Asia, and Thrace, and over the churches which are out of the bounds of the empire, and a right to ordain Metropolitans in the provinces of their diocesses." The Legates of the Pope objected to the passing of the last canon; but the Council nevertheless persisted in its adoption." ‡

* Sozom. Hist. Eccles., lib. viii., cap. vi. Fol. Edit. Reading. Cantab., 1720.

[* The History of the Popes, from the Foundation of the See of Rome, to the present Time. By Archibald Bower, Esq. Vol. i., pp. 327, 328. 4to. Third edit. London, 1750.]

† Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., vol. i., p. 678. Fol. Dublin, 1723.

[‡ "Can. ix. 'Si autem cum ipsius provinciæ Metropolitano Episcopus vel Clericus controversiam habeat, diœcesis Exarchum adeat.' Can. xvii. 'Quæ sunt in unaquaque provincia, rurales vicinasque parochias firmas et inconcussas manere apud eos qui illas tenent Episcopos. Et maxime si xxx. annorum tempore eas sine vi detinentes administraverint. Si autem intra xxx. annos fuit aliqua vel fuerit de iis controversia, licere iis qui injuriam sibi fieri dicunt, de iis litem movere apud Synodum provinciæ. Si quis autem injuria officiatur a proprio Metropolitano, apud Exarchum diœcesis vel Constantinopolitanam sedem litiget, sicut prius dictum est.' Can.

This was a great privilege granted to the See of Constantinople; on which her Prelate grounded his plea for the title of Œcumenical Patriarch, or Universal Bishop; against which Gregory VII. so vigorously pleaded. It has so much the appearance of domination, that the Pope has nothing so favourable to his supremacy as this boon is to the dignity of Constantinople. It is a decree of the greatest Council held among the ancients, where all the Patriarchs concurred in the decisions, which Gregory reverenced equally with the Gospels. If any ancient Council did ordain any thing like universal monarchy, it was this; in which the final determination of the greatest causes was committed to the See of Constantinople, without any exception or reservation. We mean as to semblance; for, as to the true sense, the canon refers only to important causes in the East; and chiefly to the three diocesses of Asia, Pontus, and Thrace.

Nicholas I. gives a strange exposition of this canon; affirming, that by the Primate of the diocess is understood the Pope; and that an appeal may be made to the Bishop of Constantinople, only by permission, provided that all parties agree thereto.*

9. Some provincial churches, by ancient custom, were exempt from dependence on any primacy or patriarchate. For example: there was the Cyprian church, in the estimation of the Council of Ephesus, which maintained the privileges of such small churches against the encroachments of greater, by enacting, "Let the same be observed in all diocesses and provinces everywhere, that none of the Bishops, most beloved of God, invade another province, which did not formerly belong to him or his predecessors; and if he have invaded one, and violently seized it, that he restore it." Such also was the church of Africa, as appears from the canons against transmarine appeals, and other subjects. The Irish were independent of the See of Rome A. D. 614. In that year they continued to defend the "Three Chapters," as is evident from the letter which the famous Irish Monk, Columbanus, wrote to Boniface IV. In it he supposes Vigilius, who repudiated these Chapters, to have died a heretic. He blames Boniface for condemning them. In the close of a long letter he says: "If it be correct that you have swerved from the true faith, you complain without reason of your children who oppose you, and even exclude you from their communion. In that case they have a right to do so; though they become thereby the head, and you are turned into the tail." This letter was first published by Ussher, and afterward by Father Fleming, an Irish Franciscan at Louvain, with other pieces ascribed to Columbanus.*

In the year 597, when Austin the Monk visited Britain, the churches in that island were not subject to the See of Rome. That the Britons thought that Rome had no authority over them, is manifest from their peremptorily refusing to receive for their Archbishop or Primate the person whom the Pope had placed over them. In what other manner could they disown the Papal authority, at such a distance from Rome? The British churches, and those which were not within the bounds of the four great patriarchates, were governed by their Metropolitans, were independent of the Patriarchs, and were therefore called by the Greeks αυτοκεφαλοι. Such were the churches of Cyprus, Iberia, Gaul, Spain, Armenia, Africa, &c. The patriarchal power of the Pope in the time of Gregory the Great, was confined to the suburbicarian provinces, as Du Pin satisfactorily proves.†

How destitute of foundation therefore is the declaration of Nicholas II., who died in 1061, as Gratian cites him! —"That the Church of Rome instituted all patriarchal supremacies, all metropolitan primacies, all episcopal sees, all ecclesiastical orders and dignities whatsoever."‡

10. We can now present the outlines or steps by which the Bishops of Rome arrived at this exercise of supremacy, and evaded the obstacles which were in the way.

(1.) In the discipline which authorized patriarchal power, there was no canon establishing any peculiar privilege to the Bishop of Rome, except such as the Bishop of Alexandria had in Egypt. This was established by the Council of Nice, A. D. 325. It was not imparted by a divine right, but εθη αρχαια, by "ancient customs."

(2.) The Council of Constantinople, A. D. 381, allowed the Bishop of Rome τα πρωτεια και εξαιρετος τιμη, "honorary privileges" and "precedency," before all other Prelates, assigning the place immediately after him to the Bishop of Constantinople.

(3.) The Council of Chalcedon granted ισα πρεσβεια, "equal privileges," to the see of Constantinople, with Rome.

(4.) The canons of the first, second, and fourth General Councils, referring all causes to metropolitan or diocesan Synods, excluded the Roman Bishop from interfering in their affairs, and thereby annulled the supremacy of the Pontiff. Consequently the Popes did not approve of these canons, although enacted by Synods which they admitted as General, and consequently infallible. Leo I. says, concerning the second General Council, when writing to Anatolius: "That subscription of some Bishops, made above sixty years since, as you boast, does no whit favour your persuasion; a subscription which was never transmitted to the knowledge of the Apostolic See by your predecessors, which being weak from its very beginning, and long since tottering, xxviii. 'Nos decernimus ac statuimus de privilegiis sanctissimæ Ecclesiæ Constantinopolis, Novæ Romæ. Etenim Antiquæ Romæ throno, quod urbs illa imperaret, jure patres privilegia tribuerunt. Et eadem consideratione moti centum quinquaginta Dei amantissimi Episcopi sanctissimi Novæ Romæ throno æqualia privilegia tribuerunt, recte judicantes, urbem quæ et imperio et senatu honorata sit, et æqualibus cum antiquissima regina Roma privilegiis fruatur, etiam in rebus ecclesiasticis, non secus ac illam, extolli ac magnifieri, secundam post illam existentem; ut et Ponticæ et Asianæ et Thraciæ diœcesis Metropolitani soli, præterea Episcopi prædictarum diœcesum quæ sunt inter barbaros, prædicto throno sanctissimæ Constantinopolitanæ Ecclesiæ ordinentur; unoquoque scilicet prædictarum diœcesum Metropolitano cum provinciæ Episcopis provinciæ Episcopos ordinante, quemadmodum divinis canonibus est traditum; ordinari autem, sicut dictum est, prædictarum diœcesum Metropolitanos a Constantinopolitano Archiepiscopo, convenientibus de more factis electionibus, et ad ipsum relatis.'"—Conc. Labb., tom. iv., Conc. Chalced., col. 760—769. Paris, 1671.]

* Conc. Labb., tom. viii., Nich. Papæ I. epist. viii.; ad Mich. Imper., col. 293, et seq. Paris, 1671.

[* "Jam vestra culpa est, si vos deviastis de vera fiducia, et primam fidem irritam fecistis; merito vestri juniores vobis resistunt, et merito vobiscum non communicant, donec perditorum memoria deleatur, et oblivioni tradatur. Si enim hæc certa magis quam fabulosa sunt, versa vice filii vestri in caput conversi sunt, vos vero in caudam; quod etiam dici dolor est."—Biblioth. Vet. Patrum, tom. xii., S. Columb. Abbatis Epist. ad Bonifacium Papam IV., p. 354, A. Venet., 1778.]

† Du Pin, Antiq. Discip. Eccles., dissert. i., sect. xiii., De Privilegiis Exarchorum et Patriarcharum. Fol. Paris, 1686.

‡ "Omnes sive patriarchii cujuslibet apices, sive metropoleon primatus, aut episcopatuum cathedras, vel ecclesiarum cujuslibet ordinis dignitates, instituit Romana Ecclesia."—Corp. Juris Canon., P. Nich. II., dist. xxii., cap. i., p. 29, tom. i. Paris, 1695.

you endeavour in vain now to revive."* Gregory I., referring to the same, says: "That the Roman Church does not possess the acts of that Synod, nor receive its canons." †

(5.) Consequently, in the West, the canons of the first, second, and fourth General Councils had no influence to establish there diocesan primacies. The Bishops of those cities which were heads of provinces, either knew little of these decisions, or they were hindered from adopting them, on account of the Pope having managed affairs so as entirely to control them.

(6.) It was indeed to the advantage of the Pontiff, in promoting his aggressive designs, that the western churches did not, as the eastern, conform themselves to the civil government, in establishing diocesan primacies; which would have enabled them to protect themselves and their churches from pontifical invasions. A Roman Synod, A. D. 378, consisting of Italian Bishops, gave the Pope similar privileges to those which the Council of Constantinople bestowed. There is, however, a great difference between a General Council and an Italian Synod; and what, we ask, had a Roman Synod to do in prescribing to all the provinces of the Roman empire, or even to those of the West?

(7.) Hence His Holiness assumed a patriarchal authority over the western churches; a right to call Synods, to interfere in ordinations, to determine causes on appeals made to him, to dictate laws and rules to the churches, contrary to the old rights of Metropolitans, and more recent regulations for primacies or patriarchates. Of this we have an instance in Gregory the Great, where he adduces an imperial constitution, providing that in case a Clergyman should appeal from his Metropolitan, "the cause should be referred to the Archbishop and Patriarch of that diocess, who, judging according to the canons and laws, should decide the case;" and then adroitly transfers the appeal from the Bishop to himself, as Patriarch-General of the world, saying: "If against these things it be declared, that the Bishop had neither a Metropolitan, nor a Patriarch, it is appointed that the cause be heard and decided by the Apostolic See, which is the head of all churches."‡

(8.) After the Pope had extended his authority beyond the bounds of his suburbicarian precincts, he laid hold upon the privileges granted by ecclesiastical law to Patriarchs, or claimed and exercised by them, till, at length, he enslaved the whole of the western churches. This is evident in comparing the assumption of Papal authority with that which was wielded by Exarchs, Patriarchs, and Diocesans. The Patriarch was authorized to call a Synod of the Bishops of his diocess, and with them to determine ecclesiastical affairs by a majority of votes. The Pope does not so; but, seated in his chair, and surrounded with counsellors of his own selection, he issues decrees to which all are required to submit. The Exarch ordained Metropolitans duly elected in the provincial Synod of his diocess, leaving those Bishops who were to be ordained to the Metropolitans in their provincial Synods. But the Pope interferes with the ordination of every Prelate, and suffers none to be ordained without his confirmation, for which he receives ample pecuniary remuneration.

The Patriarch, with the advice and consent of his Synod, made canons for the regulation of his diocess. But the Pope issues Decretal Letters, composed by his Secretary, which have the force of law, equal to the declarations of Scripture, and the highest decrees of the Church. The Patriarch supposed Bishops under obligation, by their ordination-vow, to render to him due respect. But the Pope requires all Bishops to take the most servile oath of obedience and homage to himself. The patriarchal régime required that Prelates, accused of offences, should be judged in their own provinces, or, by appeal, in patriarchal or diocesan Synods. But the Pope receives appeals without previous trial, which he determines independent of any Synod. The ancient Patriarchs ordered all things with the leave of, and in submission to, the Emperor; but the Pope decrees what he pleases, irrespective of the temporal authorities. Hence we infer, that the Pontiff is not Patriarch of the western churches, inasmuch as he acts according to no patriarchal rule; he is a sovereign Lord, and tyrannical oppressor of Christendom.

(9.) In all ecclesiastical transactions, His Holiness was not allowed any dominion over his fellow-Patriarchs. On account of the dignity of his city, he obtained a priority of honour or place; but never had power over them by law or canon, or by any clear and incontestable practice. Hence if any erred in faith, or offended in conduct, it was requisite to call a General Council to judge them; as in the case of Athanasius, Gregory Nazianzen, Maximus, Theophilus, Chrysostom, Nestorius, Dioscorus, and others.

(10.) All the oriental churches kept themselves free from the encroachments of the Pope. But when he became powerful and opulent in the West, he frequently made grievous attempts upon their liberty. Sometimes they warded off his attacks, at others they vigorously opposed him. The eastern churches generally maintained a distinct administration from the western, under their own Patriarchs and Synods, not suffering the Pope to interfere.* Hence, without the knowledge or leave of the Pontiff, they called and held Councils, ordained and confirmed the ordinations of Bishops; decided appeals, corrected heresies, &c. In all this, they had little regard to the Romish Prelate, except to maintain general communion and correspondence with him, as with other patriarchal Bishops; but when an ambitious ecclesiastical chief would interfere and control their affairs, he was strenuously repelled. Victor, Stephen, Julius, and Liberius experienced such power; and afterwards Damasus and others, as in the case of Flavianus; Innocent, in that of Chrysostom; Felix and his successors, in that of Acacius. In this manner they proceeded, until a final rupture took place between the oriental churches and the Pope.

11. The conclusions at which we arrive from the preceding account of the origin and growth of metropolitical and patriarchal jurisdiction, are the following:—

* "Persuasioni enim tuæ in nullo penitus suffragatur quorundam Episcoporum ante sexaginta, ut jactas, annos facta subscriptio nunquamque a prædecessoribus tuis ad apostolicæ sedis transmissa notitiam, ab initio sui caducæ, dudumque collapsæ, sera nunc et inutilia subjicere fomenta voluisti."—Leonis Pap. I. Opera, Ep. liii., Ad Anatol., p. 130. Fol. Paris, 1662. Vide etiam Ep. liv., Ad Martian. August., Ep. lv., Ad Pulcher. August., Ep. lxi., Ad Juvenal. Hieros.

† "Romana autem Ecclesia eosdem canones vel gesta Synodi illius hactenus non habet, nec accipit."—Conc. Labb., tom. v., Greg. Mag. Epist., lib. vi., ep. xxxi., ad Eulog. Alex., col. 1277, B. Paris, 1671.

‡ "Contra hæc si dictum fuerit, quia nec Metropolitanum habuit, nec Patriarcham: dicendum est, quia a sede apostolica, quæ omnium ecclesiarum caput est, causa hæc audienda ac dirimenda fuerat."—Idem, tom. v., Epist. Greg. I. Pap., lib xi., Ep. lvi., col. 1543, B. Paris, 1671.

* Petrus de Marca, De Concord. Sacerdot. et Imperii, lib. vii., cap. iv., v. Fol. Paris, 1669.

(1.) Patriarchs are of human institution. (2.) As they were established by the prudence and power of men, so they may be dissolved by the exercise of the same authority. (3.) The patriarchate of the Pope, beyond his own province or diocess, does not subsist by the authority of any canon of a General Council. (4.) He can claim no such power, except by assumption and usurpation. 5.) The Primates and Metropolitans of the western churches cannot be supposed to have submitted to such n authority as he usurps, except by fear or force. 6.) It is not a patriarchal power, such as that granted by the canons and Christian Princes, but another authority, that the Popes exercise. (7.) The most legitimate Patriarch, holding false doctrine, or imposing unjust laws, or tyrannically abusing his power, may be deposed from his office, and rejected from communion. (8.) The truth, practice, transmission, and utility of Christianity, do not depend on the existence or continuance of any such form as that which is instituted by man.

We have given an account of that ecclesiastical organization which was settled in the fourth and following centuries; the knowledge of which is absolutely necessary for the right understanding of the supremacy of the Pope. It was not suddenly and at once, but by degrees, and through much opposition, that the Prelates of Rome extended their authority beyond the limits of the Roman vicarage, and acquired the unlimited power they now enjoy, with the presumptuous title of "Universal Bishop."

CHAPTER X.

SUPREMACY—CONTINUED.

ITS ORIGIN, PROGRESS, AND ESTABLISHMENT. 1. The deference which is paid to eminence of any kind: 2. The natural tendency of power to grow and establish itself: 3. Spiritual domination especially: 4. Dissensions among Christians furnish an occasion: 5. By those who received privileges from its extension: 6. The attempts even of good men to increase their power: 7. The commendations of inferiors: 8. The feeble counteraction which a few good men can offer: 9. The ambiguity of words; as in those of Bishop, Head, successor, authority, Judge, catholic, &c.: 10. By appeals: 11. Favour of Princes: 12. Influence of Bishops with Emperors: 13. Residence of the Pope near the imperial throne: 14. Favourable opportunities for its growth: 15. Ignorance of the times: 16. Supporting the factious Clergy against the throne: 17. His headship: 18. The Monks: 19. Wealth of the Pope: 20. By interested and mercenary writers: 21. By the employment of the temporal and spiritual power: 22. The forgery of decretal epistles: 23. By subservient Synods: 24. The episcopal oath: 25. By concordats: 26. Revoking pragmatic sanctions: 27. By absolving from oaths: 28. Origin of its formal establishment. Title "universal," by Phocas, A.D. 606 or 607. Pepin's grant, A.D. 754. Grant of Charlemagne, A.D 774: 29. Obj. "When, where, and by whom, was the supremacy established?" answered.

HAVING proved that the universal sovereignty of the Bishops of Rome over the Christian church has no foundation in Scripture, or any other adequate support, it will be requisite to show by what ways and means so groundless a claim should obtain belief, and secure submission from so considerable a portion of Christendom. We shall therefore endeavour to trace the origin, progress, and establishment of the Papacy. It commenced from the smallest, and advanced to the highest, degree of influence and power to which man ever attained. This will not appear wonderful when we consider the numerous causes which contributed thereto, some of which are contained in the following observations:—

1. The foundation of the supremacy may rest in the voluntary deference which is paid to eminent talent, of whatever kind, whether of wealth, honour, reputation, place, or order of dignity, all which may secure advantages of real power over those who are inferior, and who may have constant intercourse with those of higher rank. To persons endowed with these advantages, the management of affairs is often voluntarily conceded, which remains in their hands, so long as such advantages are retained. From custom has arisen the claim of right.

Advantages of wealth and honour are not only instruments to gain, but incentives to urge individuals to acquire, authority over their more infirm and less powerful neighbours. Men will not be content with mere eminence: they desire real power and influence, in order to obtain a command over others. The Prelates of Constantinople and of Jerusalem at first possessed only certain privileges of honour, afterward they added domination. The Roman Bishops, from the beginning, were eminent on many accounts. Their see was in the imperial city, the place of general resort; their people and Clergy were rich, they had great incomes, they lived in splendour; hence they realized much respect and veneration, so that a preference was naturally awarded them. They improved this eminence by turning it into power, and their pastorate into empire. Hence Socrates, the historian, observed, "that long before his time the Roman episcopacy had advanced beyond the priesthood into rule."* He also informs us, that the same took place with regard to the church of Alexandria.†

2. The natural tendency of power is extension. It "is like the grain of mustard seed, which, indeed, is the least of all seeds; but when it is grown, it is the greatest among herbs." "Encroachment," says Plutarch, "is an innate disease of power." It is bold and enterprising, and any pretence will serve as a foundation for its claims. Every additional accession produces farther aggrandizement. Thus many absolute kingdoms have grown. The first chief was a leader of volunteers; who afterward became a Prince, with stated privileges; then a Monarch, invested with prerogatives; and, finally, a Grand Seignor, usurping absolute dominion. Thus acted Augustus Cæsar; and in modern times Napoleon. Such, likewise, was the career of the Popedom. The pretence of succeeding Peter; the name of the Apostolic See; the precedence by reason of the imperial city; the honorary privileges allowed him by Councils; the authority conferred on him of determining the causes of Bishops; the deference given him in repressing heresies; —all tended to constitute him the Sovereign of Christendom.

3. Spiritual power has a similar tendency to growth and establishment. It derives its authority from divine institution. It operates on the consciences of men. It is supposed to be unchangeable by human power, and not subject to revolution. It promises eternal reward to its supporters, and pronounces endless misery on its enemies. The Popes also profess to derive their authority from divine institution.* Their weapons are sentences of Scripture. They promise remission of sins and heavenly bliss to their followers; while they curse and excommunicate their opposers. They declare, that they cannot lose any of the power that has belonged to their see. "The privileges of the Roman Church," says Nicholas I., "can sustain no detriment."+

[* "Etenim ad id usque temporis Novitiani Romæ plurimum floruerant, cum multas ibi Ecclesias possiderent, et maximam populi multitudinem in eis colligerent. Sed invidia quoque istos attrivit; cum episcopatus Romanus perinde atque Alexandrinus, ultra Sacerdotii fines progressus, jam olim in dominationem degenerasset."—Socrat. Hist. Eccles., lib. vii., cap. xi., p. 356. Ed. Reading. Cantab., 1720.]

[† "Ex eo enim tempore, Episcopi Alexandrini sacerdotalem gradum atque ordinem supergressi, principatum quemdam obtinere, et cuncta pro imperio agere cœperunt."—Idem, lib. vii., cap. vii., p. 352.]

4. Dissensions among Christians furnished a fruitful occasion for extending the power of the Papacy. Each faction attempted to avail itself of the aid of the Bishop of the city of Rome. The leader of a civil rupture, if successful, is crowned with great privileges. So, on the occasion of the Arian faction, and the oppression of Athanasius, Marcellus, Paulus, and other Bishops, when the Pope, who conducted the orthodox party, rose into power. On this account, the Synod of Sardica decreed to him that privilege, which he so improved as to make it the chief instrument of his elevation; and by interfering in the dissensions raised by the Nestorians, Pelagians, Eutychians, Acacians, Monothelites, the Image-worshippers, and the Image-breakers, &c., his influence received considerable accession.

5. The power of the Pope was also advanced by those who were benefited by its extension. Thus the Roman Clergy first, then the Bishops of Italy, and afterward the Clergy of the West, became engaged to support, fortify, and extend his authority. All shared with the Pontiff in his domination over the laity, and in his ill-gotten wealth, credit, privileges, and immunities.

6. Some individuals, otherwise good, feel but little scruple in augmenting their power by encroachment. It is esteemed laudable to magnify their office. Hence, worthy men have thirsted after dominion. They are not so liable to be charged with ambition as others, and therefore their usurpations pass without opposition. Julius I., Damasus I., Innocent I., Gregory I., and others, whom history represents as excellent persons, thus advanced the Papal grandeur; while those who most enlarged the interests of the Papacy, as Leo I., Gelasius I., Nicholas I., Gregory VII., pass for most valuable characters. The distinction between a good man, a good Prince, and a good Pope, is distinctly marked.

7. Another element of Papal advancement was the commendation of men of inferior condition, which is liable to be interpreted as an acknowledgment in attestation of right. Thus the courtesies, or terms of respect, employed by Jerome, Augustine, Theodoret, and others, toward Popes, have been drawn into an argument for Papal authority; whereas the terms used by these Fathers, on other occasions, manifest their judgment to be opposed to such pretences.

8. In these cases, a few wise and good men possess but little power of counteraction. Their meekness, love of peace, and aversion to contention, render them liable to yield to encroachment, and others follow their example. Bad men have little interest to resist, and no heart to contend for the public good. Thus it was that the spirit of aggression was not timely resisted.

9. The ambiguity of words, operating on the imaginations of men, especially on the weak and ignorant, has contributed much towards the extension of the Papal authority. The word "Bishop" imports any kind of oversight or inspection. Thus St. Peter was accounted a Bishop of Rome, because, by virtue of his apostolic office, he occasionally superintended that church, and exercised episcopal acts. The term "head" signifies any kind of eminence; that of "Prince," priority; and the word to "preside," implies any kind of superiority or pre-eminence. Hence some Fathers applying these phrases to Peter, are supposed to have made him sovereign of the Apostles. Others giving similar epithets to the Pope, he is supposed to be superior to all Bishops, although those venerable men often expressed a contrary judgment. The word "successor" may imply any derivation of power; therefore because Peter is said by some to have founded the Church at Rome, the Pontiff is designated his successor.

The term "authority" often signifies any kind of influence on the opinions or actions of men: thus, because the Pope was occasionally requested to interpose his authority, they have ascribed to him the right of commanding, although authority is sometimes opposed to command. Livy says, "Evander held those places by authority, rather than by command." And Tacitus observes of the German Princes, that "they (governed) rather according to their authority of persuading, than the power of commanding." The word "judge" is often used for, "I think, I conceive;" yet if the Pope is said to have judged, it is alleged as an argument in favour of an authoritative jurisdiction. Romanists are perpetually dwelling on the word "catholic," as if to make that a kind of charm to weak minds. I am a catholic, that is, a universal; therefore all I hold is true. This is with the Papacy a powerful argument. Pontiffs, with their adulators, have laid great stress on these terms, and interpret various passages of Scripture in such a manner, as that Peter alone is believed to possess the keys, as he is frequently represented as holding them in paintings, &c. That Apostle, by Nicolas III., is blasphemously exalted "into the partnership of the undivided Trinity."* These arguments, strange to say, have had a wonderful influence on many men of confessed understanding, wisdom, and integrity.

10. The power of the Pope has also been enlarged by the appeals, or rather by the importunities, of persons who have been condemned, or ejected from their situations, whether on just grounds or otherwise. Several cases of persons justly censured may be adduced. Marcion went to Rome, and there sought restoration to communion. Fortunatus and Felicissimus, as Cyprian relates, being found guilty in Africa, fled to Rome for shelter, of which irregularity the Bishop of Carthage

[* "In Novo Testamento post Christum Dominum a Petro sacerdotalis cœpit ordo; quia ipsi primo pontificatus in ecclesia Christi datus est, Domino dicente ad eum: 'Tu es Petrus,' &c. Hic ergo ligandi atque solvendi potestatem primus accepit a Domino; primusque ad fidem populum virtute suæ prædicationis adduxit. Ceteri veri Apostoli cum eodem pari consortio honorem et potestatem acceperunt, ipsumque principem eorum esse voluerunt; qui etiam, jubente Domino, in toto orbe dispersi Evangelium prædicaverunt."—Corp. Juris Canon. a Pithœo. Anaclet., dist. xxi., cap. i., tom. i., p. 28. Paris, 1695.

["Quamvis universæ per orbem Catholicæ Ecclesiæ unus thalamus Christi sint, sancta tamen Romana, Catholica, et Apostolica Ecclesia, nullis synodicis constitutis, ceteris Ecclesiis prælata est, sed Evangelica voce Domini et Salvatoris nostri primatum obtinuit: 'Tu es Petrus,' &c."—Idem, Gelas., dist. xxi., cap. ii.]

† "Privilegia sanctæ Romanæ Ecclesiæ nullum possunt sustinere detrimentum."—Conc. Labb., tom. viii., Nichol. Papæ I. epist. xxxvi. col. 422, D. Paris, 1671.

[* "Hujus autem muneris sacramentum ita Dominus ad omnium Apostolorum voluit officium pertinere, ut in Beato Petro, Apostolorum omnium summo, principaliter collocaret; ut ab ipso, quasi quodam capite, dona sua velut in corpus omne diffunderet; hunc enim in consortium individuæ unitatis assumptum, id, quod ipse erat, Dominus voluit nominari, dicendo, 'Tu es Petrus,' &c."—Corp. Juris Canon., tom. ii., Sexti Decret., lib. i., tit. vi., cap. xvii. Fol. Paris, 1695.]

complained.* Martianus and Basilides, as the same Father informs us, being expelled from their sees, for having lapsed from the Christian faith, fled to Stephen for restoration.† Maximus the Cynic, who was rejected for heterodoxy, went to Rome to obtain a testimonial of his soundness in the faith; at which Basil was aggrieved. Apiarius, being condemned in Africa for his crimes, appealed to Rome for redress.

A number of instances in which those who were unjustly deprived thus appealed, may also be brought forward. Athanasius, with great partiality, was condemned by the Synod of Tyre. Paulus, and other Prelates, were expelled from their sees for orthodoxy. Chrysostom was doomed to punishment, and ejected by Theophilus and his accomplices. Flavianus was deposed by Dioscorus and the Ephesine Council. Theodoret was also censured by the same Synod. Ignatius, Patriarch of Constantinople, was excluded from his see by Photius. All these applied to the Pope for redress.

11. Christian Princes were anxious to heap honours on the Bishop of their metropolis. It seemed to them fitting, that the near relationship of their Prelate, as Pastor, and chosen by themselves, should be inferior to none in point of privilege. Thus the Bishop of Constantinople arose to such a height of honour as to be second Patriarch, though at first he was a mere Suffragan to the Bishop of Heraclea. Royal favour was assigned by the Councils of Constantinople and Chalcedon as the cause of his advancement. Numerous imperial edicts to this purpose are extant.

12. The Emperors usually favoured the Pontiff, and assisted him in accomplishing his designs, by extending his privileges, both by their authority and by letters to the eastern Monarchs. In the Synod of Chalcedon, we have the letters of Valentinian, and of the Empresses Placidia and Eudoxia, to Theodosius, in behalf of Leo, in which they solicit the extension of the honour of the Roman See. Placidia, the mother of Theodosius, uses this expression: "Seeing that it becometh us in all things to preserve the honour and dignity of this chief city, which is the mistress of all others." Nicholas I. confesses, that "the Emperors had extolled the Roman See with divers privileges, enriched it with gifts, and enlarged it with benefices."‡ Princes, who thus favoured them, did not foresee the future increase of the Papacy. They little thought that, by virtue of these privileges, the Popes would claim equality with, or superiority over, them.

13. The Roman Pontiffs had the advantage of being at hand to suggest what they pleased to the Court, and to procure edicts directed or dictated by themselves for the extension of their power. Baronius acknowledges this in the case of the Bishops of Constantinople. The same occurred with regard to the Popes and the Roman Emperors. Hence the decree of Valentinian in favour of Leo against Hilary, Bishop of Arles, in an unjust cause; for Hilary only contested the Pope's authority to annul what had been done in a Gallican Synod.* "By this," Baronius observes, "reader, thou understandest, that when the Emperors ordained laws concerning religion, they did it by transcribing and enacting the laws of the Church, upon the admonition of the holy Bishops requiring them to do their duty."† Hilary, likewise, affirms, that "it was decreed by the laws of Christian Princes, that whatsoever the Bishop of the Apostolic See should, upon examination, pronounce concerning churches and their governors, &c., should with reverence be received and strictly observed."‡ Such edicts increased the power of the Popes; and what was once obtained they invariably retained, and even increased by still higher pretensions to divine and immutable right.

14. The foundation of the Papal power being thus laid, opportunities for its enlargement were not wanting. The decline of the Roman empire gave the Pontiff an opportunity of strengthening his interests, either by approving particular measures, or otherwise opposing. When the eastern Emperors, chiefly by his means, were driven out of Italy, he seized a large portion of their territories, and thus became a temporal Prince.

The Popes have often acted the part of the incendiaries of Christendom, by exciting wars, and then, by inclining to the stronger party, would share with the conqueror in the spoils. The Pontiff incited Charles against the Lombards. On spiritual pretences, they interfered in all affairs. The usurpation of Pepin was allowed by the Pope, in the year 752. He pretended to dispose of kingdoms, and to constitute Princes; reserving, however, homage to himself. In the year 1060 Gregory VII. granted to Robert Guiscard, Naples and Sicily, "by beneficiary right," beneficiario jure. In 1139 Innocent II. gave to Roger the title of King. There is scarcely any kingdom in Europe over which the Roman Prelates have not claimed sovereignty.

They have watched opportunities to quarrel with Princes, on the feigned accusation of entrenching on the spiritual power, with regard to the investiture of Bishops, and accepting homage from them.

History furnishes numerous instances of Popes excommunicating Princes. Gregory VII., A. D. 1076, excommunicated Henry III. Calixtus II., A. D. 1120, executed a similar office upon Henry IV. Hadrian IV., A. D. 1160, upon Frederick. Celestine III., A. D. 1195, upon Henry V. Innocent III., A. D. 1219, on Otho. Honorius III. and Gregory IX., A. D. 1220, upon Frederick II. Paul III., A. D. 1535 and 1538, ejected and anathematized Henry VIII., King of England; and Pius V., in the year 1570, damned and excommunicated Elizabeth, Queen of England.

15. The ignorance of the times greatly assisted the Pontiff. While the supremacy was advancing towards

[* "Post ista adhuc insuper, pseudo-Episcopo sibi ab hæreticis constituto, navigare audent, et ad Petri cathedram atque ad ecclesiam principalem, unde unitas sacerdotalis exorta est, a schismaticis et prophanis literas ferre, nec cogitare eos esse Romanos quorum fides Apostolo prædicante laudata est, ad quos perfidia habere non possit accessum."—Cypriani Opera, epist. liv., ad Cornelium de Fortunato et Felicissimo, sive contra hæreticos, p. 75. 8vo. edit. Paris, 1836.]

[† "Basilides, Romam pergens, Stephanum collegam nostrum longe positum et gestæ rei ac veritatis ignarum fefellit, ut exambiret reponi se injuste in Episcopatum de quo fuerat jure depositus."—Idem, epist. lxvii., Ad Clerum et plebes Hispania consistentes, p. 104.]

‡ Conc. Labb., tom. viii., Nichol. Papæ I. epist. viii., col. 293. Paris, 1671.

* Idem, tom. iv., Hilarii Papæ epist. xi., col. 1046.

[† "Ex his intelligis, lector, cum de rebus sacris Imperatores leges sancivere, id ipsum admonitione sanctorum Præsulum requirentium eorum officium ex scriptis legibus statuisse; nimirum ut imperatoria coercerentur auctoritate, qui sanctiones ecclesiasticas parvi penderent."—Baronii Annal. Eccles., A. D. 458, sect. iv., tom. vi. Romæ, 1607.]

[‡ "Christianorum quoque Principum lege decretum est, ut quidquid ecclesiis earumque rectoribus, pro quiete omnium Domini sacerdotum, atque ipsius observantia disciplinæ, in auferendis confusionibus, Apostolicæ Sedis Antistes suo pronuntiasset examine, veneranter accipi tenaciterque servari cum suis plebibus, caritas vestra cognosceret."—Conc. Labb., tom. iv., Hilarii Papæ epist. xi., col. 1046, C. Paris, 1671.]

maturity, nearly all the learning of that day was confined to the Pope's clients, so that they imposed what they thought fit on the ignorant people. The dictates of the Papacy passed for infallible oracles, and its decrees for inviolable laws.

16. The power of the Roman Pontiff was also increased by his willingness to support factious Churchmen against their Sovereigns, on the pretence of spiritual interest, and Christian liberty. For instances, we allude to the case of Anselm, A. D. 1109, and that of Becket, A. D. 1154.

17. By assuming the headship of the Clergy, the Pope became their patron and protector, and thus secured in his favour able coadjutors, who were willing to defend and maintain whatever he pleased. These he exempted from all control except his own.

18. The various companies of Monks, also, contributed to his power. He founded various associations of spiritual Janissaries to be his combatants. These, depending entirely upon him, subsisting by his charters, enjoying exemptions by his authority from other jurisdictions, and being sworn to special obedience, were entirely at his command, and ready with all their might to advance his interests, and to maintain his claims. They had great sway among the people, on account of their religious and hypocritical guise, by pretending an extraordinary attainment of sanctity, austerity, and contempt of the world. As education was chiefly confined to them, they became the teachers and guides of Christendom, and powerful supporters of the supremacy. They extolled his authority as superior to all others. They attributed to him the prerogative of omnipotency and infallibility, by giving him the titles of "Vice-God," "Spouse of the Church," &c.

19. By his wealth the Bishop of Rome extended his power; and invented various methods in order to obtain it; namely, by dispensations for marriage within degrees forbidden, or at uncanonical times; for vows and oaths; for observance of fasts and abstinences; for pluralities, non-residences, indulgences and pardons, and liberating souls from purgatory; reservations and provisions of benefices not bestowed gratis; consecrated presents, as Agni Dei, swords, roses, Peter-pence, annates, tithes, &c.; confirmation of Bishops; sending palls. In the days of Henry I., of England, the Bishop of York paid ten thousand pounds sterling for his pall, according to Matthew Paris; though Gregory I. says, "I forbid giving any thing for the pallium."* They increased their riches by sending Legates to extort wealth; commutations of penance for money; pilgrimages to Rome; seizing on legacies. To what vast sums did all these amount! Hence one of the numerous profligate Prelates of Rome said, "This fable concerning Christ is very profitable to us!"

20. The Pontiff employed interested or mercenary writers to advocate his claims. By his Divines, he transformed many points of divinity so as to satisfy his thirst for power, reputation, and gain. Any story, by being often told, obtains currency. The history of some ages was composed solely by the servile agents of the Prelate; and for a long time none dared to question his pretences without being stigmatized as a heretic, and actually treated as such.

21. The Romish Bishop occasionally incited the temporal and spiritual powers against each other, that he might reap the advantage. His business was to control Princes, and enslave Bishops, and occasionally invade or usurp the rights of both; by the authority of Princes oppressing Bishops, and by the assistance of Bishops competing with Princes. If any refused to follow his course, he would vociferously cry, "St. Peter was injured."*

22. The forgery of the Decretal Epistles† greatly promoted the Papal supremacy, which authorized his encroachments by the suffrage of ancient doctrine and practice. In these, the former Popes are made to speak and act according to the arrogant pretensions of modern Pontiffs, devised long after the times of the preceding, and of which they never thought. A great part of the canon law is extracted out of these Epistles, on which they are established. The Donation of Constantine, and various fictitious acts of Councils, did the Pope much service, with other legends, miracles, and similar "deceivableness of unrighteousness."

In the year 593, two important Bulls are ascribed to Gregory I., obviously forged by the advocates of Papal supremacy. In these, the Pope is said to excommunicate all who transgress the precept of the Apostolic See. He is represented as saying: "If any King, Bishop, or Judge shall presume to infringe the decrees of our apostolic authority, or transgress this our command, let him be deprived of his honour and dignity; let him be cut off from the communion of the Church; let him be loaded with all the anathemas and curses that have been thundered against infidels and heretics since the creation of the world to the present time; let him for ever be damned in the bottom of hell, with Judas, the betrayer of our Lord."‡

23. Councils of Bishops, convened by the Pope, and composed of his friends, have aided his cause. They decided nothing contrary to his authority: he accomplished whatsoever he pleased. Numerous examples might be adduced. The fourth Lateran and the Tridentine Councils furnish proof.

24. The episcopal oath was another means of extending the Pope's authority.§ The earliest specimen of anything like this, is that which was administered by Gregory II., in 723, to Winifred, or Boniface, Arch-

[* "Antiquam Patrum regulam sequens, nihil unquam de ordinationibus accipiendum esse constituo, neque ex datione pallii, neque ex traditione chartarum, neque ex ea quam nova per ambitionem simulatis invenit appellatione pastelli.—Pro ordinatione vero, vel pallio, seu chartis atque pastello, eumdem qui ordinandus, vel ordinatus est, omnino aliquid dare prohibeo."—Conc. Labb., tom. v., Epist. Greg. Papæ I., lib. iv., Ep. xliv., col. 1199, E. Paris, 1671.]

[* "In quo datur intelligi, ut tua fraternitas ad hujus casum prompta existere possit, quando et apostolica præceptio ad injuriam beati Petri Apostoli illis in partibus non observatur, et a te spernitur ac violatur."—Idem, tom. viii., Nicolai Papæ I. Epist. xxxvii., ad Hincmarum, col. 423, C. Paris, 1671.]

[† Ample examinations of these Decretal Epistles will be found in Cooke's Censura; (London, 1623;) and also in Blondell's Examen Epist. Decretalium; (Genevæ, 1635;) on which works Dr. Andrew Rivet remarks: "Si quis cupiat rationes proprias adversus singulas quasque Clementis, Anacleti, Marcelli, Fabiani, Euaristi, &c., Epistolas, adeat Censuram Rob. Coci in Anacleto, p. 28, &c.; sed præsertim Pseudo-Isidorum et Turrianum vapulantes" (this was the first title of Blondell's work, in 1628) "scutica clariss. et doctissimi viri D. Blondelli, qui indefatigabili studio omnes illas epistolas ad fontes aut potius lacunas, unde haustæ fuerunt, revocavit, larvamque ita detraxit Pseudo-Isidoro, ut nemo sit, nisi qui sponte cæcutiat, qui videre non possit, planum illum imposuisse rudi sæculo, et hoc tempore non solum ludibrium omnibus debere, sed omnium quotquot sunt bonorum et doctorum virorum, detestationi subjacere."—Riveti Critici Sacri, lib. i., cap. viii. (Operum, tom. ii., p. 1079.)]

[‡ Bower's Hist. of the Popes, vol. ii., p. 501. Third edit. 4to. London, 1750.]

[Du Pin, Antiq. Eccles. Discip., dissert. vii. Paris, 1686.]

[§ Vide supra, p. 3.]

bishop of Mentz; * it assumed a more regular form under Gregory VII.

25. When the oppressions and exactions of the Romish Prelates constrained Princes to compete with them, if the latter could not prevail, affairs were amicably arranged. Nevertheless the Popes were sure to obtain some points, which left the rest to be realized under more favourable circumstances. We refer to the concordats between Henry II. and Pope Alexander III., A. D. 1172; Edward III. and Pope Gregory XI., A. D. 1373; and Henry V. and Pope Martin V., A. D. 1418.

26. When Princes were anxious to restrain their exorbitant demands, by pragmatical sanctions, the Popes were restless until they were repealed: but when they found weak Princes, or any potentates placed in disadvantageous circumstances, they ceased not until they obtained their purpose.

27. The power which the Pope assumed, in order to absolve men from their oaths and vows, to dispense with prohibited marriages, &c., enabled him to bring men of distinction under obligation to him. To the Pontiff they owed the tranquillity of their conscience from scruples, the gratification of their desires, the legitimation of their issue, and a title to their possessions.

28. The formal establishment of the supremacy may be dated when the Bishop of Rome assumed the title of Universal Bishop, and supreme head of the church. This was ratified A. D. 606, or 607, by Phocas, the Emperor, to Boniface III. That Prince had murdered the Emperor with his wife and children, and usurped the dominion. Nevertheless, he was acknowledged Emperor by Gregory the Great, A. D. 602. Boniface III. was no sooner invested with the Papal dignity, than, taking advantage of the partiality and favour of Phocas to him while he was the Nuncio of Gregory, he not only prevailed on the tyrant to revoke the decree which gave the title of "Universal Bishop" to the Prelate of Constantinople, the imperial city, but he obtained a new edict placing on himself, and his successors, that very epithet which a recent Pontiff had so often condemned and rejected, as vain, proud, profane, impious, execrable, blasphemous, antichristian, heretical, and diabolical. Boniface must have known that the controverted title had been stigmatized, again and again, by two of his predecessors successively; namely, Pelagius II. and Gregory; that all who should give or receive it were declared heretics; and that whosoever should presume, in the pride of his heart, to take it to himself, was a "follower of Satan," "a rival of Satan in pride," and "the forerunner of antichrist." All this Boniface knew; nevertheless, he assumed the title. Phocas issued an edict, revoking the decree of the Council of Constantinople, A. D. 588, entailing the title of "Universal Bishop" on the Prelates of Constantinople; and transferred it from them to Boniface and his successors; and then the Bishop of Rome was declared the "head of the whole Catholic Church." In the Prelate of Constantinople, the title of "universal" is thought to have been no more than merely honorary, without any accession of power. But Boniface had scarcely obtained it, when he began to exercise a corresponsive jurisdiction. No sooner did the edict reach Rome, than he assembled a Council, in which he was proclaimed the universal Bishop, or rather supreme head, or absolute Monarch, of the church; and, further, in that Synod it was pronounced, declared, and defined, that no election of a Bishop should henceforth be lawful, unless it were made by the people and Clergy, approved by the Prince or Lord of the city, and confirmed by the Pope, who interposed his authority in the following terms: Volumus et jubemus, "We will and command."

The imperial edict of a tyrant was not, as Roman Catholic writers contend, a simple acknowledgment or confirmation of the primacy of the see of Rome, but the grant of a new title, which the Pope accepted and exhibited by the exercise of a power corresponding with it, and thus was the Papal supremacy introduced. It originated with the worst of men, was procured by the basest means, it was antichristian, heretical, blasphemous, diabolical.

Baronius, Bellarmine, and others, affirm, that the title of "Universal Bishop" was condemned and rejected by Gregory in a different sense from that in which it was assumed by Boniface, and sustained by his successors. They say that the title implies no more than the general superintendence of the universal church, and as such it was received by Boniface, and not condemned by Gregory. It signifies much more; namely, that the Bishop who is so styled is the sole Prelate of the church, and that the others who bear that office, are only the Vicars or Curates of him who is called "universal." In that sense only, we are told, that it was condemned by Gregory, and never assumed by Boniface or his successors. To this we reply: (1.) That it is absurd to suppose that the Emperor would grant, or that a Bishop would accept, it in such a limited sense. (2.) The Bishop of Constantinople calls himself an "universal Bishop;" and yet he does not view other Prelates as his Vicars or Curates, but as colleagues. (3.) When Eulogius, of Alexandria, offered the title of Universal Bishop to Gregory, he did not mean to degrade himself and become the Pope's Vicar or Curate; yet Gregory rejected his offer with indignation and rebuke. (4.) That Pontiff condemned the title because it placed the Bishop who assumed it above his brethren, and, whilst it subjected all other Bishops to himself, he was subject to none; endowing him with a power which was peculiar to Christ, and never assumed by any of his Apostles, not excepting Peter. These were the reasons why Gregory opposed and condemned the title, in the very sense in which it was assumed by Boniface and his successors.

The spiritual supremacy of the Pope led to the accession of temporal power. This was accomplished in the eighth century, by the real or pretended grants of Pepin and Charlemagne.

Pepin, the son of the famous Charles Martel, governed at this time the whole French monarchy, under Childerick III., sustaining the office of Mayor of the Palace. Not content with this, he aspired to the titles and honour of Majesty, and formed the design of dethroning his Sovereign. For this purpose the Estates of the realm were assembled by Pepin, A. D. 751; and though they were devoted to his interests, they gave it as their opinion, that the Bishop of Rome ought previously to be consulted, whether the execution of such a project was lawful or not. In consequence of this, Ambassadors were sent by Pepin to Zachary, the reigning Pontiff, with this question: "Whether the divine law did not permit a valiant and warlike people to dethrone a pusillanimous and indolent Monarch, who was incapable of discharging any of the functions of royalty, to substitute in his place one more worthy to rule, who had already rendered most important services to the state?" Zachary, who stood in need of the aid of Pepin, against the Greeks and Lombards, returned an answer such as the usurper desired. Accordingly, Childerick was deprived of his kingdom, which was transferred to Pepin. Let the abettors of Papal authority justify, if they can, in the professed Vicegerent of Christ, a decision so glaringly repugnant to the laws of the Redeemer. It was solemnly confirmed by Stephen II., A. D. 754, on his visit to France, to solicit assistance against the Lombards. He dissolved the oath of allegiance which Pepin had sworn to Childerick; and, to render his title to the regal dignity as sacred as possible, he anointed and crowned him a second time.

[* Bower's Hist. of the Popes, vol. iii., p. 191. Third edit. 4to. London, 1750.]

Roman Catholic Divines are divided in sentiment respecting the authority upon which Zachary acted in this affair. Those who extol the supremacy of the Papal See, assert that it was as Pope, and not as a casuist and divine, that the Pontiff authorized the crown to be taken from Childerick and given to Pepin. The French, however, maintain that the Pope decided only as a divine. On this topic we remark: (1.) That the historians quoted by the high Romanists to prove that the Pope acted authoritatively, use the terms "authority, power," &c., as ascribed to him; yet these terms, in the sense in which they employ them, may signify "opinion, advice," &c. (2.) From the conduct of the French, it is evident, that they were unacquainted with the power which the Popes had usurped over Kings and their empires; inasmuch as they contented themselves with Zachary's judgment, and did not desire him to take the kingdom from one, and give it to the other. (3.) In the diet or assembly of the states, convened to hear the report of the Ambassadors from Rome, the opinion or approbation of the Pope is mentioned; but no notice of any command or decree received from him. (4.) From the accounts given by contemporary historians, it is plain, that the design of Pepin, in applying to the Pope, was not merely to obtain his opinion as a Divine, or his authority as a Sovereign; but to engage that personage in his favour, so as to render the attempt he meditated less odious in the estimation of the people. (5.) If Pepin were an usurper, and all agree that he was, what was Zachary, who approved of his usurpation, supporting him with all the authority of his see? They may be both compared to two robbers, dividing the booty; Pepin assisting Zachary to spiritual, and Zachary aiding Pepin to the acquisition of temporal, power.

This ready compliance of the Roman Pontiff proved an abundant source of opulence and applause to the hierarchy. The elevation of the Pope did not rest here. When Aistulphus the Lombard, elated with his conquests over the Grecian provinces of Italy, meditated the conquest of Rome and its territories, Stephen addressed himself to Pepin, represented to him his deplorable condition, and implored his help, who accordingly crossed the Alps A. D. 754, with a numerous army. Having defeated Aistulphus, he compelled him, by solemn treaty, to deliver up to the See of Rome the exarchate of Ravenna, Pentapolis, and all the cities, castles, and estates which he had seized in the Roman dukedom. Aistulphus having violated his engagement, Pepin, A. D. 755, forced the Lombard to execute the treaty he had so notoriously broken, and to make a new grant of the exarchate, &c., to the Pontiff and his successors. In the instrument, which was signed by Aistulphus, his two sons, and the Barons of his kingdom, Pepin delivered to the Abbot Fulrad, in the Pope's name, all the places mentioned therein. With this charter, the Abbot, accompanied by the commissioners of Aistulphus, went to Ravenna, and from thence to every city named in the document; and having taken possession of all in the name of St. Peter and the Pope, and received a sufficient number of hostages, he went with them to Rome, and there laying the grant, and the keys of each city on the tomb of St. Peter, placed the Pope in possession of the principality. Thus was the Bishop of Rome raised to the rank and power of a temporal Prince.

The real limits of the grant made by Pepin have been much controverted. The Bishops of Rome extend them as far as possible; while their adversaries are equally zealous in contracting them. *

Charlemagne, A. D. 774, not only confirmed this grant, made by his father Pepin, but added other donations, even ceding to the Roman Pontiff cities and provinces in Italy which the original donor never contemplated. But what those cities and provinces were, and where they were situated, is difficult to say at this period. The motives that induced that Monarch to make this gift, are less doubtful than the magnitude of the grant itself. Adrian affirms, that the object of the Emperor was the atonement for his sins. His general character forbids this motive being attributed to him: his design was to obtain uncontrolled dominion of the West. At first the Pope held his temporal authority by a kind of feudal tenure under Charlemagne; but afterward his successors maintained it as by an original and divine right.

The temporal, as well as the spiritual, power of the Pope owed its origin to a usurper; the one to Phocas, and the other to Pepin. And though the Roman Bishops bitterly inveighed against the Patriarch of Constantinople as the forerunner of Antichrist, in assuming the title of Universal Bishop, they nevertheless embraced the first opportunity to take that title to themselves; and while they also reproached the Lombards as the most abandoned among men, for usurping the dominions of their most religious sons, the Emperors, they eagerly seized on their dominion themselves as soon as they had an opportunity.

29. From the foregoing we learn the utter fallacy of the Popish assertion, that "no time can be assigned, nor the authors named, when, and by whom, the doctrine of the supremacy of the Pope was introduced." The orders of Bishop and Elder, according to the New Testament, were one and the same. The distinctions which afterward prevailed between Presbyters and Bishops were names of honour or mere official precedence, and implied no difference in order, as is well expressed by Augustine, where he says, "The office of a Bishop is above that of a Presbyter, according to the names of honour which the church by custom has adopted."† Jerome states the same. Before the Nicene Council the Bishop of Rome had little or no pre-eminence, as Eneas Sylvius declares, in his three hundred and first epistle. In the Council of Nice, A. D. 325, no pre-eminence was given to the Bishop of Rome over the whole church; the Patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem were privileged in their provinces, as the Bishop of Rome was in his. The pre-eminence of these sees was founded on ancient custom, * Bower's History of the Popes, vol. iii., pp. 356—381. Third edit. 4to. London. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist., cent. viii., part ii., chap. ii., sect. vii.—xi.

† "Quamquam enim secundum honorum vocabula, quæ jam ecclesiæ usus obtinuit, Episcopatus Presbyterio major sit."—August. Opera, tom. ii., epist. lxxxii., (alias xix.,) Ad Hieron., cap. iv., col. 202, F. Ed. Bened. Paris, 1679.

and not on divine right. When a pre-eminence was given to the Bishop of Rome, it was owing to the political position of the city, and the favour of the Emperors. The divided state of the Greek Church induced reference to be made to Rome. About A. D. 606 the Pope obtained for himself, and his successors, the title of Universal Bishop, and the see of Rome to be recognised as the head of all churches. Afterward, Zachary, A. D. 754, obtained from Pepin temporal authority, which was extended and confirmed by Charlemagne, A. D. 774. Thus it is evident, that the supremacy of Rome is not so ancient as the Papacy would have us to believe: the time when it commenced, and the instigators and abettors of such domination, can easily be determined and described.

CHAPTER XI.

SUPREMACY CONTINUED—PREROGATIVES OF THE POPE.

THE prerogatives of the Pope. It is a question of fact.—I. A SURVEY OF THE DIFFERENT BRANCHES OF THE SUPREMACY. 1. Benedict XIV.: 2. The Roman Catechism: 3. Aquinas and Dens: 4. And Bailly, cited: 5. Antoninus's enumeration of the prerogatives.—II. CONVOCATION OF COUNCILS. 1. The Popes claim it: Adrian II., Leo IX., Pius II., and Leo X., cited: 2. No ancient canon for it: 3. Council of Nice not called by the Pope: 4. Nor Constantinople I.: 5. Nor Ephesus: 6. Nor Chalcedon: 7. Nor Constant. II.: 8. Nor Constant. III.: 9. Objections answered: 10. Councils created by the Emperor. The Emperors convened them authoritatively: 11. Examples in the Councils of Pisa and Constance.—III. PRESIDENCY OF THE POPE. 1. He claims it: 2. Council of Nice: 3. Constant. I.: 4. Ephesus: 5. Chalcedon: 6. Fifth General: 7. Sixth: 8. Import of the word "Presidency:" 9. No good reason why the Pope should preside.—IV. CONFIRMATION OF A COUNCIL. 1. The Pope assumes that power: Nichol. I., Pelag. II., Gelas. I., and Benedict XIV., quoted: 2. Constantine confirmed the decisions of Nice: 3. Theodorus, those of the second General Council: 4. The third, by Theodosius II.: 5. Marcian, the fourth: 6. Justinian, the fifth: 7. And also the decrees of the sixth: 8. In ancient Councils some things were done without the consent of the Pope, and other things contrary thereto. Examples of this: 9. Obj., "Divers Councils asked the Pope's consent." Instances. Answer to this: 10. Obj., "Some Councils have been rejected for want of such confirmation," answered: 11. Obj., "Some Popes have made void the decrees of Councils."—V. HIS POWER OF DISPENSATION, OF MAKING LAWS, &c. 1. He demands this. Benedict XIV., Ferraris, and Gratian, cited. Maxims of Gregory VII.: 2. Originally the church had one Lord: 3. Next ancient customs, Con. Nic. I., canon 8. Force of these customs. Cyprian cited: 4. Institution of General Councils: 5. Power of Metropolitans in their provinces: 6. The Pope anciently bound to submit to the judgment of his colleagues: 7. And to the canons: 8. The Synods governed the churches: 9. A. D. 860 the Greeks did not admit the Roman decrees: 10. The decretal epistles gave rise to this assumption of the Popes. Character of these forgeries: 11. The Emperors possessed supreme authority.—VI. THE POPE NOT THE FOUNTAIN OF JURISDICTION. 1. This maintained. Bellarmine cited, Pius II., Council of Trent: 2. The Scripture contradicts it: 3. The primitive church against it: 4. The vicarship of the Clergy to the Pope, the product of ambition and flattery. Institution of Legates.—VII. THE POPE HAS NOT UNIVERSAL JURISDICTION OVER THE CLERGY. 1. It is claimed. Dens, Bened. XIV., cited: 2. Originally there was no such power: 3. Nor did one Bishop hold the sway over another: 4. Instances of the Pope's authority wanting: 5. The Popes were subject to the Emperor.

IT is evident, that the Roman Pontiffs, since the days of St. Peter, have not, in fact, either possessed or exercised the several prerogatives or branches of authority which are embraced in the supremacy of the Pope. This is a question of fact, which must be answered by an examination of the peculiar privileges of sovereign power, so that we may discover whether, in every age, the Popes have possessed and exercised it. In this investigation, we shall find that the Pope has no just claim to them either by law or ancient practice; while the examination of each prerogative, separately, will not fail to furnish sound argument against all such pretences.

I. We propose to survey the different branches of the supremacy, to ascertain whether the Bishops of Rome possessed it.

1. The supreme authority on which the supremacy is founded, is thus expressed by Benedict XIV., who cites Leo III. "The Roman Pontiff," says he, "is the Head of all heads, and the Prince, Governor, and Pastor of the entire church of Christ under heaven." *

2. The Roman Catechism contains, in the following words, the elements from which the prerogatives of the Popes take their rise. It says, "The Catholic Church recognises in the person of the sovereign Pontiff the most exalted degree of dignity, and the full amplitude of jurisdiction: a dignity and a jurisdiction not based on synodal or other human constitutions, but emanating from no less an authority than God himself. As the successor of St. Peter, and the true and legitimate Vicar of Jesus Christ, he therefore presides over the universal Church, the Father and Governor of all the faithful: of Bishops also, and of all other Prelates, be their station, rank, or power what they may." †

3. To the same purpose Aquinas declares, "The Pope hath the plenitude of power;" on which Dens observes, "This power extends itself to all who are in the Church, and to all things which belong to the government of the Church. Hence it follows that all the faithful, even Bishops and Patriarchs, are bound to obey the Roman Pontiff; and, likewise, that he must be obeyed in all things which concern the Christian religion, and that, too, in faith, and morals, in rites, ecclesiastical discipline, &c. The Pope, too, hath not only a directive, but also a coactive, power over all the faithful."‡ According to this theologian, the power of the Pope extends to all persons and things, whether of faith, morals, rites, discipline, &c.: that it is supreme; not merely directive, but coactive.

4. Bailly expresses himself concerning the prerogative of the Popes, as follows:—"The Roman Pontiff possesses that primacy which the Popes have often exercised, from the infancy of the church, without protest or objection. For, (1.) They instituted Bishops, when those, to whom the right of electing Prelates ordinarily belonged, neglected to choose them. (2.) They sometimes reproved Bishops, as formerly Victor reproved Polycrates

* "Romanus Pontifex est omnium capitum Caput, atque universæ, quæ sub cœlo est, Christi ecclesiæ Princeps, Moderator, et Pastor."—Benedic. XIV., de Syn., tom. i., lib. ii., cap. i., p. 74.

[† Catechism of the Council of Trent, pp. 319, 320. 8vo. Dublin, 1829.]

[‡ "Quam potestatem habet Romanus Pontifex?—1. R. Cum S. Thom., pars iii., quæst. lxxii., art. xi., ad 1, 'Papa in ecclesia habet plenitudinem potestatis;' adeo ut ejus potestas sese extendat ad omnes, qui sunt in ecclesia, et ad omnia, quæ ad ecclesiæ regimen spectant. 2. Hinc sequitur, quod omnes fideles, etiam Episcopi et Patriarchæ, Romano Pontifici obedire teneantur, item quod ei obediendum sit in omnibus, quæ religionem Christianam concernunt, ac ideo in fide et moribus, ritibus, ecclesiastica disciplina, &c.

["An Summus Pontifex habet potestatem non solum directivam, sed etiam coactivam, super omnes fideles?—R. Affirmative: quia Matth. cap. xvi., datur Petro ejusque successoribus potestas ligandi, quæ ad potestatem coactivam pertinet. Id etiam perpetua consuetudo confirmat: hinc Summo Pontifici competit potestas suspendendi, excommunicandi."—Dens Theolog., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, No. 94, Quæ et quanta sit Summi Pontificis potestas.]

of Ephesus, in the case of Easter, and as Stephen did Cyprian and Firmilian, on the subject of rebaptizing those who were baptized by heretics. (3.) They often deposed Bishops, preserving, however, the rights of each province. (4.) They prescribed laws, and pronounced decrees of faith to the whole Christian world. (5.) For just causes, they granted dispensations from the canons enacted in General Councils. (6.) They often used the right of excommunicating the faithful, throughout the whole world. (7.) They were consulted from all countries concerning the various controversies of faith. (8.) They convened General Councils, and presided in them, either themselves, or by their Legates. (9.) To them lay an appeal from the judgment of all other Bishops whatever. No one is ignorant of these things, unless he is a novice in, or a stranger to, ecclesiastical matters."*

5. Antoninus, Archbishop of Florence, alluding to what Thomas Aquinas says concerning the prerogative of the Pope, exhibits the following twenty-four cases, in which the powers of the Pontiff are presented :†—(1.) The Pope is the first and greatest of Bishops and Patriarchs. (2.) He has a universal pre-eminence over the whole church of Christ. (3.) He is head of the universal church. (4.) He is the husband of the universal church. (5.) Christian Kings and Princes, and, by consequence, all the faithful, are bound to be subjects to the Roman Pontiff. (6.) It is necessary to salvation to be in subjection to the Pope. (7.) He is to be obeyed, in preference to any other power. (8.) The Roman Pontiff succeeds Peter in that perfection of authority, and in the dignity of the vicariate of Christ, with which Peter himself as head and Pastor of the universal church, was elevated by Christ in the church. (9.) He hath the plenitude of power in the church. (10.) From him all power is derived to other Prelates. (11.) The Pope can use the power of the keys over any one in the church. (12.) The Pope can grant that any person may exercise the power of the keys on himself in the court of conscience. (13.) Whether one can excommunicate himself. (14.) The Pope may be called properly the Priest of a parish. (15.) Or of any individual. (16.) He can permit others to preach, hear confessions of the faithful, and use the power of the keys, when the parish Priests are wanting. (17.) Besides the two orders appointed of God, (namely, of Bishops and parochial Priests,) the Pope can institute another third order of Preachers, who can preach by his authority, and hear confessions. (18.) He can compel the colleges of general studies, that those of religious orders may be admitted to their society. (19.) The regulation of studies and of universities belongs to him. (20.) The authority of the universal church, in deciding matters of faith, principally resides in him. (21.) To the Pope it belongs to confirm the decisions of Synods. An appeal lies to him from a Council. By the authority of the Pope alone a General Council may be convened. It is not necessary for the Pope to call a General Council as often as he has any thing to decide concerning the faith. (22.) The Pope is not subject to the decisions of Councils. (23.) The Pope can change the statutes of the holy Fathers in General Councils, or he can dispense with them. (24.) The Pope hath the plenitude of power to dispense with all the statutes made by the regulations or Bishops of the church.

6. We enumerate the following prerogatives of the Roman See, as being most prominent, the discussion of which will test the merits of all :—(1.) That the Pope alone has power to call or convene General Councils. (2.) That he only, in person or by his Legates, can preside in and moderate General Councils. (3.) That he alone can confirm the decrees of a General Council. (4.) That the will of the Pope, declared by way of precept or proclamation, concerning the sanction, abrogation, or dispensation of laws, is of sovereign authority in the universal church. (5.) That the Pope is the fountain of all jurisdiction, and all other Bishops, Prelates, and Clergy derive their authority from his mandate or commission, and act as his deputies or commissioners. (6.) That the Pope has universal jurisdiction over the Clergy, demanding submission and obedience from them, requiring all cases of weight to be referred to him, citing them to his bar, examining and deciding their causes, &c. (7.) That the Pope, by virtue of the foregoing prerogatives, has the choice or election of Bishops and Pastors, the confirmation of elections, the ordination or consecration of the person to office, by which their character or authority is recognised, and the jurisdiction under which they discharge their several duties. (8.) That it belongs to the Pope to censure, suspend, or depose Bishops or Pastors. (9.) That the Bishop of Rome can restore censured, suspended, or deposed Prelates. (10.) That he possesses the right of receiving appeals from all inferior judicatories, for the final determination of causes. (11.) That the Pope cannot be called to an account, judged, or deposed. (12.) That he can decide controversies in faith, morals, and discipline. (13.) That he is above a Council. (14.) That he is infallible. (15.) That he has supreme power over civil Magistrates, kingdoms, and states, both in temporal and spiritual matters, by divine right. (16.) That the Pope is lawfully a temporal or civil Prince.

II. If the Pope were possessed of the supremacy, he would invariably have called or convened General Councils ; but this right he has not always exercised.

1. The Popes, however, and their advocates, claimed this power a long period before they were permitted to exercise it. Adrian II., A. D. 785, declares, "By our Lord's command, by the merits of St. Peter, and by the decrees of the holy canons and the venerable Fathers, the singular authority and special power of convening Synods hath, in many ways, been delivered to the Pope."* Leo IX., elected A. D. 1048, says, "I wish you to understand that a General Council ought not to be celebrated without the consent of the Roman Pontiff."* Pius II., chosen Pope A. D. 1458, teaches, "Among General Councils, we find nothing ratified without the authority of the Pope, when one was reigning; because the church is not a body without a head, from which all power flows to the members."† Leo X., in 1512, with the approbation of his Lateran Synod, says, "That the Roman Pontiff, for the time being, as one who has authority over all Councils, hath alone the full right and power of convening, transferring, and dissolving Councils,—and this not only from the testimony of Scripture, the sayings of the holy Fathers, and the decrees of our predecessors, and of the sacred canons, but also by the proper confession of the Councils themselves,—is manifest." ‡

[* "Eum primatum habet Romanus Pontifex, quem Pontifices Romani ab ecclesiæ incunabulis, sine reclamatione, frequentissime exercuerunt: Nam, (i.) Episcopos instituerunt, quando ii, ad quos jus ordinarium eligendi Episcopos pertinebat, deerant officio suo. (ii.) Episcopos aliquando redarguerunt, ut olim S. Victor Polycratem Ephesinum in causa Paschatis, S. Stephanus Cyprianum et Firmilianum in causa rebaptizationis hominum ab hæreticis baptizatorum. (iii.) Sæpe deposuerunt Episcopos, salvis tamen cujuscumque provinciæ juribus. (iv.) Leges præscripserunt, decreta fidei pronuntiarunt, ad totum orbem Christianum. (v.) Dispensationes a canonibus in Conciliis latis ob justas causas concesserunt. (vi.) Jure excommunicandi fideles per totum orbem sæpe usi sunt. (vii.) Consulti sunt ex omnibus regionibus circa varias fidei controversias. (viii.) Concilia Generalia provocarunt, ac ipsis præfuerunt aut per se aut per Legatos. (ix.) Ad illos appellatum est, a judicio aliorum quorumlibet Episcoporum. Nemo hæc ignorat, nisi in rebus ecclesiasticis advena sit ac omnino peregrinus: atqui cuncta hæc totidem sunt jurisdictionis actus; ergo," &c.—Bailly, Theol., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, cap. xiii., art. ii., prop. ii., sect. 4.]

[† Anton. Archiep. Florent. Summa Theol., tom. iii., pars iii., tit. xxii., cap. 6. A. D. 1485.]

* "Cui jussione Domini, et meritis B. Petri Apostoli, singularis congregandarum Synodorum authoritas, et sanctorum canonum ac venerandorum Patrum decretis multipliciter privata tradita est potestas."—Conc. Roman., P. Hadr. I., apud Bin., tom. v., p. 565.

2. It is evident, that there is no ecclesiastical canon, which confers the right of calling General Councils on the Pope. Nor can the Romanists adduce any ancient custom, there being no General Councils anterior to Constantine; and for a long period after his days the Popes did not assume or exercise such a power, neither was it considered as belonging to them. Nothing is more evident from history than that the Emperors, by their own authority, convened the first General Synods.

3. The Council of Nice, A. D. 325, was summoned by Constantine. Eusebius says of him, "As a common Bishop, appointed of God, he called together assemblies of God's Ministers."§ "He commanded a great number of Bishops to meet at Arles."‖ He summoned the Prelates from all quarters to meet at Tyre, to examine into the case of Athanasius.¶ That Constantine convened the Council of Nice, all historians agree, he himself asserts it, and the Fathers in their synodical decisions acknowledge it.

4. The second General Council, held at Constantinople A. D. 381, was convened by Theodosius I. Theodoret says, that he "commanded the Bishops of his empire to assemble at Constantinople." In this Council the Pope had so little influence, that Baronius says "it was called contrary to his will."

5. The third General Council, held A. D. 431, was called by the Emperor Theodosius II.* In the beginning of each action, it is affirmed that it was convened by the imperial decree; the Synod itself often professes it: the Pope's Legates acknowledge it; and so, likewise, does Cyril the president, as may be seen by the authorities quoted in the margin.

6. The fourth General Council, held at Chalcedon A. D. 451, was summoned by the Emperor Marcian; as is stated at the commencement of each action. This the Emperor asserts, and the Synod avows: "The holy, great, and œcumenical Synod, gathered together by the grace of God, and the command of our venerable and Christian Emperor, has determined as follows." †

7. The fifth General Council, held at Constantinople A. D. 553, was called by the authority of Justinian I. His letter convening it, asserts, that all former great Synods were called by a similar authority. It commences with these words: "It hath ever been the care of pious and orthodox Emperors, by the assembling of the most religious Bishops, to cut off heresies as they sprang up; and by the right faith, sincerely preached, to keep the holy church of God in peace." ‡ The Fathers say, that they "came together according to the will of God, and the command of the most pious Emperor." §

8. The sixth General Council, held at Constantinople A. D. 680, was convened by Constantine Pogonatus. This is evident from his letters, at the commencement of each action, and which the Council and Leo II. acknowledge. The assembly, in an epistle to Agatho, inscribes itself, "The holy and œcumenical Synod, congregated by the grace of God, and the religious sanction of the most pious and most faithful the great Emperor Constantine." ‖

* "Nolo vos lateat non debere præter sententiam Romani Pontificis universale Concilium celebrari."—Constit. Leonis IX., incip. Cum ex eo, &c.

† "Inter Concilia nullum invenimus unquam fuisse ratum, quod stante Romano indubitato Præsule absque ipsius auctoritate convenerit; quia non est corpus ecclesia sine capite; et omnis ex capite defluit in membra potestas."—Conc. Labb., tom. xix., Pii Papæ II. Bulla Retract., col. 204, E. Venet., 1728.

‡ "Solum Romanum Pontificem pro tempore existentem, tamquam auctoritatem super omnia Concilia habentem, tam Conciliorum indicendorum, et transferendorum, ac dissolvendorum plenum jus et potestatem habere; nedum ex sacræ Scripturæ testimonio, dictis SS. Patrum, ac aliorum Romanorum Pontificum etiam prædecessorum nostrorum, sacrorumque canonum decretis, sed propria etiam eorumdem Conciliorum confessione manifeste constet."—Idem, Con. Lat. V., Const. Leo. X., col. 967, D. Venet., 1728.

[§ "Ipse, velut communis omnium Episcopus a Deo constitutus, ministrorum Dei Concilia congregavit. Nec dedignatus adesse et considere in medio illorum conventu, cognitionis particeps fuit."—Euseb. de Vita Constant., lib. i., cap. xliv., p. 524. Fol. Edit. Reading. Cantab., 1720.]

[‖ "Quoniam igitur plurimos ex diversis ac prope infinitis locis Episcopos in urbem Arelatensem intra calendas Augusti jussimus convenire."—Euseb., Hist. Eccles., lib. x., cap. v., p. 485. Fol. Cantab., 1720.]

[¶ "Ad dedicationem ecclesiæ quam Hierosolymis construxerat Imperator, frequentes Episcopos jusserat convenire. Eos ergo priusquam illuc convenirent in civitate Tyro collectos, obiter causam Athanasii ventilare præcepit: ut contentione prius illic e medio sublata, festivitatem dedicationis tranquillius peragerent, ecclesiam Deo consecrantes."—Socrat., Hist. Eccles., lib. i., cap. xxviii., p. 65. Edit. Reading. Cantab., 1720. Vide etiam Euseb., De Vita Constant., lib. iv., cap. 41—43.]

[ "Hanc igitur ob causam Theodosius Episcopos duntaxat imperii sui Constantinopolim jussit convenire."—Theodoriti Hist. Eccles., lib. v., cap. vii. Edit. Reading. Fol. Cantab., 1720.]

[* "Quippe haud multo post Imperator, edicto proposito, omnes undique Episcopos ad civitatem Ephesiorum convocavit."—Socrat., Hist. Eccles., lib. vii., cap. xxxiv. Edit. Reading. Fol. Cantab., 1720.

["Merito Cyrillus petiit a Theodosio, qui tunc orientis imperium administrabat, ut ejus mandato prima Synodus Ephesi congregaretur, imperialibus literis, tum ad Cyrillum ipsum, tum ad omnes ubique sanctissimarum ecclesiarum Episcopos missis."—Evagrii Scholast. Hist. Eccles., lib. i., cap. iii. Edit. Reading. Fol. Cantab., 1720.

["Post consulatum dominorum nostrorum Flavii quidem Theodosii XIII., Valentiniani vero III., semper Augustorum, x. Kalend. Julii, Synodo congregata in Ephesiorum metropoli ex decreto religiosissimorum et Christianissimorum Imperatorum, et considentibus in sanctissima ecclesia quæ appellatur Maria, religiosissimis et sanctissimis Episcopis."—Labb. Conc., tom. iii., Conc. Ephes., act. i., col. 445, C. Paris, 1671.]

[† "Consulatu Domini nostri Marciani perpetui Augusti, et qui fuerit nuntiatus, sub die sexto Idus Octobris, Chalcedone, secundum Dei gratiam, et jussionem divinissimi et piissimi Domini nostri Marciani perpetui Augusti, convenientibus in sancta Ecclesia sanctæ martyris Euphemiæ gloriosissimis judicibus, id est, magnificentissimo et gloriosissimo Magistro," &c.—Idem, tom iv., Conc. Chalced., act. ii., col. 325.]

[‡ "Semper studium fuit orthodoxis et piis Imperatoribus patribus nostris, pro tempore exortas hæreses per congregationem religiosissimorum Episcoporum amputare, et recta fide sincere prædicata, in pace sanctam Dei ecclesiam custodire."—Conc. Labb., tom. v., Conc. Constant. II., collat. i., Justin. Imp. in Synod., col. 419, E. Paris, 1671.]

[§ "Pro Dei voluntate, et jussione piissimi Imperatoris vocati, ad hanc regiam urbem convenimus."—Idem, collat. viii., col. 562, D.]

[‖ "Sanctum et universale Concilium, quod per Dei gratiam et piam sanctionem piissimi ac fidelissimi magni Imperatoris Constantini congregatum est in hac a Deo conservanda et regia Constantinopoli nova Roma in secreto sacri palatii dicto Trullo, sanctissimo ac beatissimo Papæ senioris Romæ Agathoni in Domino salutem."—Idem, tom. vi., Conc. Constan. III., act. xviii., Epist. Conc. ad Agath., col. 1072, E.]

The Council, in other places, expresses the same thing.*

These are all the Synods which posterity acknowledges as General Councils. The seventh has been rejected by many of the western, and the eighth by the whole of the oriental, churches. Some of the Pontiffs refused to acknowledge more than six as General.† The other Councils reputed General, ten in number, have been only assemblies of western Bishops, held after the breach had taken place between the oriental and occidental hierarchy.

9. It is objected: "When the Emperors convened Councils, they did it not coactively or authoritatively, but only exhortatively or persuasively; while the Popes summoned them authoritatively." To this we reply, that the assertion is not only without foundation, but contrary to the facts of the case. The Emperors peremptorily required the Bishops to convene at the time and place which they had appointed. Constantine, in calling the Synod of Tyre, employed these words: "If any one, presuming to violate our command, and meaning," &c.‡ Theodosius II. summons the Bishops to the Council of Ephesus in these words: "We take a great deal of care in these things, will not suffer any one, if he be absent, to go unpunished; nor shall he find excuse either with God or us, who presently without delay does not, by the set time, appear in the place appointed."§ Marcian thus assembled the Council of Chalcedon, which was primarily summoned to meet at Nice: "It properly seemeth good to our clemency, that a holy Synod meet in the city of Nice, in the province of Bithynia."‖

In the imperial decrees, by which Councils were gathered together, nothing is said concerning the Pontiff having any authority to call them. The Emperors did not convene these Synods by the authority of the Pope, but solely in their own name, and by their own authority.

But as Emperors occasionally called Councils at the suggestions of the Prelates, so there are instances of Popes applying to the Emperors to summon Synods; when their petitions were sometimes heard, and at others rejected. Liberius requested Constantius to call a Synod for deciding the case of Athanasius.* He wrote to Hosius, stating, that he and other Italian Bishops had petitioned the Emperor to assemble a Council at Aquileia.† Damasus desired a Synod in Italy.‡ Innocent I. requested Arcadius to call one to restore Chrysostom. But the courtiers repelled the messengers of the Roman Prelate, as "troubling another Government, which was beyond their bounds," and in which the Pope had no right to interfere.§ Leo I. often applied to the Emperor for Synods; but generally without success.‖

10. The whole business of General Councils was an expedient of the Emperors, and was, therefore, regulated by their authority. If the Pope were highly reverenced, the Princes were jealous lest he should exercise undue influence over such of the Bishops as were their subjects; to obviate which, they frequently commanded the Prelates not to stir out of their dominions without a special licence. The English, at the Council of Clarendon, decreed, "that the Clergy should not go out of the kingdom without the King's leave."¶

General Councils, however, were irregular and acephalous bodies. They are not provided for by scriptural authority; were unknown for almost three hundred years after Christ; originated by the authority of Christian Kings; and were conducted in various ways. The first class of these Synods was tolerably regular; the next, turbulent and anarchical assemblies of professedly pious

[* "Conveniente quoque et sancto ac universali Concilio, quod per imperialem sanctionem congregatum est in hac regia et a Deo custodienda civitate," &c.—Conc. Labb., tom. vi., Conc. Constan. III., act. xviii., Epist. Conc. ad Agath., col. 1013, C.]

[† "Igitur hunc Methodium venerabilem Archiepiscopum vestrum interrogavimus coram positis fratribus nostris Episcopis, si orthodoxæ fidei symbolum ita crederet, et inter sacra missarum solennia caneret, sicuti sanctam Romanam Ecclesiam tenere, et in sanctis sex universalibus Synodis, a sanctis patribus, secundum evangelicam Christi Dei nostri auctoritatem, promulgatum atque traditum constat."—Idem, tom. ix., Joannis Papæ VIII. epist. ccxlvii., ad Sfento Pulcrum, col. 176, B.

["Hæc et his similia contra evangelica, apostolica, prophetica, atque canonica instituta afferens, sit Dei omnipotentis, et beatorum Apostolorum principum Petri et Pauli, et omnium simul sanctorum, atque venerandorum sex universalium Conciliorum auctoritate, nec non et Spiritus Sancti per nos judicio, omni sacerdotali honore et nomine alienus, et omni clericatus officio prorsus exutus."—Idem, tom. viii., Nicolai Papæ I. epist. vii., col. 287, A. Vide etiam, epist. viii. et x.]

[‡ "Si quis vero, quod minime arbitramur, præceptum nostrum etiamnum violare præsumens, adesse renuerit; mittetur quamprimum a nobis aliquis, qui, imperiali auctoritate hominem in exsilium pellens, docebit Imperatoris sanctionibus pro veritate editis minime esse repugnandum."—Euseb. De Vita Constant., lib. iv., cap. xlii., p. 650. Fol. Ed. Reading. Cantab., 1720.]

[§ "Nos quoque harum rerum curæ sedulo incumbentes, nullum æquo animo abesse sinemus, nec ullam ille vel apud Deum vel apud nos habiturus est excusationem, qui statim impigre secundum significatum tempus ad destinatum locum præsto non fuerit."—Conc. Labb., tom. iii., Conc. Ephes., pars i., cap. xxxii., Theod. Epist. ad Cyril., col. 437, E. Paris, 1671.]

[‖ "Quia igitur dubitationes quædam in orthodoxa religione nostra videntur esse commissæ, sicut etiam epistolæ viri reverendissimi Episcopi almæ urbis Romæ Leonis testantur, id specialiter clementiæ nostræ placuit, ut Synodus in Nicæna civitate provinciæ Bithyniæ celebretur."—Idem, tom. iv., Conc. Ephes., pars i., epist. xxxvii., Marc. ad Episc., col. 67, D.]

[* "Liberius Episcopus dixit: 'Judicia ecclesiastica, O Imperator, summa cum æquitate fieri debent. Quare si placet pietati tuæ, judicium constitui jube. Et si quidem Athanasius condemnatione dignus videbitur, tunc juxta ecclesiastici ordinis formam, in illum sententia proferetur.'"—Theodoriti Hist. Eccles., lib. ii., cap. xvi., p. 92. Fol. Ed. Reading. Cantab., 1720.]

[† "Quia in nullo conscientiam tuam debeo præterire: multi ex Italia Episcopi convenerunt, qui mecum religiosissimum Imperatorem Constantium fuerant deprecati, ut juberet, sicut ipsi placuerat, dudum Concilium Aquileiense congregari."—Baronii Annal. Eccles., A. D. 353, sect. xix., tom. iii., p. 630. Antverpiæ, 1598.]

[‡ Theodoriti Hist. Eccles., lib. v., cap. ix., p. 203. Fol. Ed. Reading. Cantab., 1720.]

[§ "Porro Innocentius Romanæ urbis Episcopus, cum, sicut ante scripserat, impense studeret ut Joannes restitueretur, una cum Episcopis qui ex oriente legati ad eum venerant, misit Episcopos quinque, et duos Ecclesiæ Romanæ Presbyteros, ad Honorium et Arcadium Augustos, qui Synodum, ejusque celebrandæ tempus ac locum postularent. Verum hi qui apud Constantinopolim Joanni infensi erant, quasi in contumeliam orientalis imperii hæc acta essent, calumniari cœperunt. Atque hos quidem, utpote qui externo Imperatori molesti fuissent, cum ignominia dimitti curarunt."—Sozom. Hist. Eccles., lib. viii., cap. xxviii. Fol. Ed. Reading. Cantab., 1720.]

[‖ "Nos enim, venerabilis Imperator, sicut Nestorii dogma perversum merito anathematizavimus, ita juste etiam horum impietatem, qui veritatem carnis nostræ negant a Domino Jesu Christo susceptam esse, damnamus. Unde si pietas vestra suggestioni ac supplicationi nostræ dignetur annuere, ut intra Italiam habere jubeatis Episcopale Concilium, cito (auxiliante Deo) poterunt omnia scandala, quæ in perturbationem totius ecclesiæ sunt commota, resecari; ut per universum regnum vestrum Catholicæ fidei integritate servata, et pacem Christianam manere, et vestram apud Deum crescere gloriam gaudeamus."—Conc. Labb., tom. iii., Leonis Papæ I. epist. ix., ad Theod., col. 1304, C. Paris, 1671. Vide etiam, epist. xlii.—xliv., l.]

[¶ "Archiepiscopis, Episcopis, et personis regni non licet exire regnum absque licentia Domini Regis, et si exierint, si Regi placuerit, securum eum facient, quod nec in eundo, nec in redeundo, vel moram faciendo, perquirent malum sive damnum Domino Regi vel regno."—Concil. Clarend., A. D. 1164, cap. iv., Conc. Mag. Brit. a Wilkins, tom. i., p. 435. Fol. London, 1737.]

men; the latter was a complete Roman faction, in which the Pope reigned uncontrolled.

II. That a General Council needed not the act of a Pope to convene it, is manifest from what has frequently occurred in the Church of Rome, namely, the assembly of Councils by other means than the mandate of the Pontiff. The Councils of Pisa and Constance provided for this. During the schism between Gregory XII. and Benedict XIII., the Cardinals called a Council at Pisa in the year 1409, which deposed them both, and chose Alexander V., who was placed in the chair of St. Peter. In case of schism, or in any circumstances of difficulty, the Cardinals are authorized to summon a Council. This is acknowledged by Romanists, and proves that the authority of the Bishop of Rome is not indispensable.

III. The Popes did not always preside over and regulate General Councils.

1. The Roman Pontiff now claims that privilege, not permitting any General Council to be legitimate which he does not govern, either in person or by his Legates. "All Catholics," says Bellarmine, "teach this to be the chief Pontiff's proper office, that either in person or by his Legate he superintend, and as chief Judge moderate all." * Benedict XIV. says, "The Roman Pontiff presides over General Councils, either by himself or by his Legates." † For this prerogative there is no authority in Scripture, ancient canons, or in established custom. Peter did not occupy the chair at the Council in Jerusalem: if they had a formal President, James filled that office. In the first General Councils the Popes did not act as Governors; the Emperors in their own person, or in that of others chosen by them, ruled the proceedings.

2. In the Synod of Nice, Constantine was the principal manager of its transactions; and under him Bishops presided; the Pope's Legates had but little influence.‡ If any Bishop were called the President of the Council, it must have been Hosius, as Du Pin, who, though a Roman Catholic, declares: "It is more probable Hosius presided there in his own name, and not in the Pope's; for he nowhere assumes the title of Legate of the Holy See, and none of the ancients say, that he presided in this Council in the Pope's name.§ Gelasius Cyzicenus, who first affirmed it, asserts it without any proof or authority." In the Council of Sardica, held A.D. 346, which was intended to be General, Hosius, Bishop of Corduba, governed. The name of this Prelate stands first in the subscriptions which are in Athanasius, who says, that he was the head and President of all the Councils at which he was present. Theodoret and Sozomen say he presided. In this ecclesiastical historians agree.

3. In the second General Council, at Constantinople, the Bishops, as Sozomen says, were headed by their Patriarchs.

4. In the third General Council at Ephesus, Cyril of Alexandria presided, as Leo I. acknowledges.* Modern Romanists, however, assert, that he was there as Legate of the Roman See, and not in his own name. It is certain that the Pope intrusted to him the representation of his person, and to act as his agent. But Cyril could have no authoritative presidency; because the Roman Prelate himself did not possess this power by any law or precedent, and therefore could not delegate it to another. This depended on the will of the Emperor, the election of the Fathers, or a tacit regard to personal eminence. If later historians confound these things, we are not bound to be governed by their ignorance, or to follow their mistakes. Besides, if Cyril were the Legate of the Pope, why did he send others to act in his place? or, when Cyril did not act as President, why did not the other Legates of the Pope rule in his stead, and take precedence? Juvenal, Bishop of Jerusalem, superintended in the fourth and fifth actions, in which Cyril became a petitioner. It was not, therefore, under the title of Legate that Cyril presided: it was rather because he was the first of the Patriarchs who was in person at the Council. Sometimes the presidency is attributed to Cyril alone, inasmuch as he was the most eminent person there: it is occasionally ascribed to Celestine, as being in representation present, and the first Bishop of the church in order; to Cyril and Celestine; and sometimes to Cyril and Memnon. These persons, being active members of the Synod, and having great influence, are styled Presidents and Rulers.† In the acts of the Synod, the Pope himself, and his Legates, are said συνεδρευειν, "to sit together," with the other Bishops; which does not agree with any special right to the presidency.

5. In the Council of Chalcedon, called the fourth General Council, Leo assumed a kind of superintendence by his Legates.‡ Yet, in effect, the Emperor, by his Commissioners, presided. They proposed subjects for discussion; governed the debates, and conducted them to an issue. In short, they managed the business of the Council according to their pleasure, as the Legates of the Pope at the Council of Trent. Abundant proof can be drawn from the proceedings of the Council, to show that it was controlled by the Emperor. In the contest respecting the privileges of the Constantinopolitan see, the Fathers decided contrary to the views and endeavours of the Legates: the whole Synod concurred in that decision, exclaiming, "This is a right sentence; we all say these things; these things please us all; things are duly ordered; let the things ordered be held." Nor is the presidency of the Roman Legates expressed in the conciliar acts; they are merely said συνελθειν, "to concur," and συνεδρευειν, "to sit together," with the other Fathers. Their presidency was nothing like that [* "Catholici omnes id munus proprium esse docent summi Pontificis, ut per se vel per Legatos Synodo præsideat, et tamquam supremus Judex omnia moderetur."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii., De Conciliis, lib. i., cap. xix., col. 38, D. Coloniæ, 1619.]

† "Quibus (scil., Conciliis Generalibus) præsidet Romanus Pontifex, vel per se, vel per suos Legatos."—Ben. XIV., de Synodo.

[‡ "Multis igitur hunc in modum ex utraque parte propositis, magnaque controversia in ipso principio excitata, Imperator cuncta patientissime auscultans, intento animo propositas quæstiones excepit; et quæ ab utraque parte dicebantur, vicissim astruens atque adjuvans, pertinacius certantes paulatim conciliavit."—Euseb. De Vita Constantini, lib. iii., cap. xiii. Ed. Reading. Fol. Cantab., 1720.]

§ Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., vol. i., p. 599, note. Fol. Dublin, 1723.

[* "Prioris autem Ephesinæ Synodi, cui sanctæ memoriæ Cyrillus Episcopus tunc præsedit, in Nestorium specialiter statuta permaneant; ne tunc damnata impietas, ideo sibi in aliquo blandiatur, quia Eutyches justa execratione percellitur."—Conc. Labb., tom. iv., Conc. Chalced., Leo. Papæ I. Epist. ad Synodum, col. 71, E. Paris, 1671.]

† Barrow on Supremacy. Works, vol. vii., p. 420. 8vo. edition. Oxford, 1830.

[‡ "Tamen in his fratribus Paschasino et Lucentio Episcopis, Bonifacio et Basilio Presbyteris, qui ab apostolica sede directi sunt, me Synodo vestra fraternitas existimet præsidere, non abjuncta a vobis præsentia mea, qui nunc in Vicariis meis adsum, et jamdudum in fidei Catholicæ prædicatione non desum."—Conc. Labb., tom. iv., Conc. Chalced., Leo. Papæ I. Epist. ad Synod, col. 71, B. Paris, 1671.]

exercised at Trent, or in other Papal Councils. The Emperor's deputies are invariably named in the first place, at the commencement of the acts, before the Legates of the Pope, so that they who governed the Council were not Popish. In truth the Emperor was President, as the Synod itself reports to Leo: "The faithful Emperors, for the sake of good order."

6. In the fifth General Council, Pope Vigilius was present; but the Patriarch of Constantinople presided, as appears from the beginning of each collation.* We infer, therefore, that the Pope's presidency was not considered necessary to the validity of a General Council.

7. In the acts of the sixth General Council, the Emperor is said to preside, in person or by his deputies; although Pope Agatho had Legates there. The deputies of the Emperor sat in the chief place, and were named first; they proposed what they thought proper to be discussed, declared on what side the majority was, adjourned the Council whenever they judged best, and delivered important decisions.

8. The word "presidency," like many others, has different meanings; in consequence of which some persons have been deceived. It may signify the privilege of precedence or authority in governing. The first kind of precedency the Pope would undoubtedly possess, when present at a Council; and also on account of his being the Bishop of the first see, according to the declaration of the sixth General Council, and the first of Priests, as Justinian terms him. According to this signification, the Patriarchs and chief Metropolitans are said to preside, as sitting in one of the first chairs.

The other kind of presidency was bestowed by the Emperor as he thought fit; though usually he conferred it on him who, among those present, preceded the others in dignity. We meet with an instance of this in the second Council of Ephesus, which in design was a General one. There Dioscorus, Bishop of Alexandria, presided, by command of the Emperor, notwithstanding the objections of the Legates. The presidency of the Council of Chalcedon is ascribed to several chief Bishops, by virtue of the imperial appointment.† Hence it appears, that in the early Synods the presidency was not attached to the see of Rome. In the Council of Constance, held A. D. 1414, the Cardinals of Cambray, of Hostia, and sometimes even the King of the Romans, presided: facts which show, that at that period the presidency of the Pope was not fully established, though Papal authority had risen considerably.

9. While there is no good reason that the Pope should preside in General Councils, there are many why he should not. Erroneous Popes, such as Vigilius and Honorius, were unfit to govern a Council, collected to consult upon and to define truths which were opposed to their own heretical proceedings. Lewd Popes, as Alexander VI., John XII., Paul III., and a host of others of the same character, were unqualified persons to take the chair in a Synod where laws were to be made and enforced, for the purpose of promoting chastity and restraining licentiousness. Warlike Popes, as Julius II., would be improper to regulate an assembly where peace was to be inculcated. A Pope engaged in schism, as many have been, would constitute a ludicrous President of an assembly convened to suppress discord and division. Gregory VII., Innocent IV., Boniface VIII., would be unsuitable arbitrators where controversies concerning the power of the Pope were to be discussed. In any Council where the reformation of the Church is concerned, the Pontiff is the last man in the world who ought to preside, or sit in judgment. For it is most notorious that Popes, as such, most wofully need reforming themselves; against which reformation they have been the greatest impediments.

The declaration of Pope Gelasius is applicable in this case. "I would know of them," says he, "where they would have that judgment they pretend, examined? What! by themselves? that the same may be adversaries, witnesses, and judges? To such judgment as this, even human affairs are not to be trusted, much less the integrity of the divine law."*

IV. The CONFIRMATION of a Council by the Pope is unnecessary.

If the Pope were sovereign of the church, he would, at least, have a power, exercised under certain restrictions, so that nothing should pass against his will, without the serious review and examination of a Council. This principle appears to be an essential ingredient of sovereignty.

1. It is therefore claimed by the Roman Pontiff, that no decrees of Synods shall be valid without his consent and confirmation. Nicholas I., in an epistle, addressed to Photius, says, "But the decrees are made by the holy Popes of the chief see of the Roman Church, by whose authority and sanction all Synods and holy Councils are strengthened and established: why then do you say, that you do not receive and observe them?"† He declares, also, in another epistle: "Lastly, as you know nothing is accounted valid, or to be received in universal Councils, but what the see of St. Peter has approved; so, on the contrary, whatever she alone has rejected, that only is rejected."‡ Pelagius II. asserts, "We never read of any Synod that was valid, unless confirmed by the apostolic authority."§ Gelasius declares, "We trust no true Christian is now ignorant, that no see is above all the rest more obliged to observe the constitution of each Council, which the consent of the universal church hath approved, than the prime see, which, by its authority, confirms every Synod, and by continued moderating preserves them, according to its principality."‖ Benedict XIV., who was elected

* Conc. Labb., tom. v., Conc. Constant. II., collat. i., col. 416, B. Paris, 1671.

† Barrow's Works, vol. vii., on Supremacy, p. 424, et seq. 8vo. edit. Oxford, 1830.

* "Quæro tamen ab his, judicium quod prætendunt, ubinam possit agitari? an apud ipsos, ut iidem sint inimici, et testes, et judices? Sed tali judicio nec humana debent committi negotia, nedum divinæ legis integritas."—Conc. Labb., tom. iv., Gelasii Papæ I. epist. iv., col. 1170, E. Paris, 1671.

† "Decretalia autem, quæ a sanctis Pontificibus primæ sedis Romanæ Ecclesiæ sunt instituta, cujus auctoritate atque sanctione omnes Synodi et sancta Concilia roborantur, et stabilitatem sumunt, cur vos non habere vel observare dicitis?"—Idem, tom. viii., Nicolai Papæ I. epist. vi., ad Photium, col. 285, D. Paris, 1671.

‡ "Denique ut in universalibus Synodis, ne quid ratum, vel quid prorsus acceptum, nisi quod sedes B. Petri probavit, ut ipsi scitis, habetur; sicut e contrario quod ipsa sola reprobavit, hoc solummodo consistat hactenus reprobatum."—Idem, epist. vii., ad Michael, Imp., col. 291, E.

§ "Nulla unquam Synodus rata legatur, quæ apostolica auctoritate non fuerit fulta."—Idem, tom. v., Pelag. Papæ II. epist. viii., col. 949, A. Paris, 1671. Vide etiam Corp. Juris Canon., tom. ii., dist. xvii., sect. v. Paris, 1695.

‖ "Confidimus quod nullus jam veraciter Christianus ignoret uniuscujusque Synodi constitutum, quod universalis ecclesiæ probavit assensus, non aliquam magis exequi sedem præ ceteris oportere, quam primam; quæ et unamquamque Synodum sua auctoritate confirmat, et continuata moderatione custodit, pro suo scilicet principatu."—Idem, tom. iv., Gelasii Papæ I. epist. xiii., ad Episcop. Dardaniæ, col. 1200, D. Paris, 1671.

A. D. 1740, affirms: "Beware lest you should infer, from the fact that Bishops in a General Council are judges, the Roman Pontiff, in giving a decision, is bound to follow the majority, and to approve of their doctrine: for though all the Bishops are able to decide, nevertheless the supreme judgment is from Christ the Lord, committed to his Vicar on earth, and intrusted into his hands, so that he can restore to the true faith all who have deviated into error, whether few or many."* He affirms also, that "though the Pope may consult the Cardinals, the exercise of his supreme power by no means depends on their consent." †

Ferraris, in giving the common opinion of the Church on this subject, observes, "Although, at first, a Council was convened by the apostolic authority, yet, if afterward it were dissolved by the Pope, or transferred, from that time it would be acephalous and schismatic, nor is it any longer a Council."‡ The Lateran Council had previously arrived at the same decision under Leo X.

2. Constantine, as reported by Athanasius, "confirmed by law the decrees of the Council of Nice;" § and Eusebius says, that he "ratified the decrees of the Synod by his authority."‖ The letters of Constantine are before the world; in which he exhorts and requires all to conform to the constitutions of that assembly.

3. Theodorus ratified the decisions of the second General Council: according to Sozomen, "he confirmed the suffrages of the Council by his decrees."¶ This was done at the request of the Fathers of the assembly, who addressed him as follows:—"We therefore beseech thee, that by thy pious edict the sentence of the Synod may be authorized; that as by the letters of convocation thou didst honour the assembly, so thou wouldst confirm the result of things decreed." **

4. The third General Council was recognised by Theodosius II., as Justinian says: "The above-named Theodosius, of pious memory, maintaining what had been so justly determined against Nestorius and his impiety, made his condemnation valid."* The Emperor asserted that this act pertained to him as of right and custom: for, says he, "All things, as may please God, being examined without contention, and with truth, ought to be established by our piety." †

5. The Emperor Marcian established the proceedings of the Council of Chalcedon by a decree, which says, "We, having by a sacred edict of our serenity confirmed the holy Synod, warn all to cease from disputes about religion."‡ Leo signified his compliance in the following terms:—"But because your piety and most religious will by all means must be obeyed, I have willingly approved the synodical constitutions about confirming the Catholic faith, and condemning heretics, which pleased me."§ Du Pin, when speaking concerning this Council, says, "The Emperor made two edicts to prevent all opposition to the Council of Chalcedon, and invalidated by another all that had been done against Flavian." ‖

6. Justinian confirmed the decisions of the fifth General Council, by punishing with banishment all who refused to submit to its decisions.

7. In the sixth General Council the Fathers solicited the Emperor, according to custom, to confirm its proceedings. This may be seen by referring to the decisions of the Council: ¶ a prerogative, commencing with the first General Council, the Emperors long enjoyed.

8. In ancient Councils many enactments were made, not only without the consent, but absolutely contrary to the will and desire, of the Pontiff.

In several of the first General Councils it is evident that the Pope had not even a negative voice: the little regard which was paid to him proves this. In the synodical decisions of the Councils of Nice and Sardica, no mention is made of his confirmation.

Numerous conciliar decrees have been passed in opposition to the will of the Pontiff. Overlooking those of Tyre, Antioch, Rimini, &c., we refer to General Councils; though the decisions of other Synods show that they did not believe in, or know any thing of, the negative of the Pope. In the Council of Chalcedon equal privileges were granted to the Bishops of Rome and Constantinople.

* "Ex eo porro, quod Episcopi in Concilio Generali sint veri judices, cave, ne inferas, teneri Romanum Pontificem in ferenda sententia majorem partem judicum sequi, eorumque doctrinam approbare: etenim, uti ratiocinatur idem Melchior Canus, quamvis omnes Episcopi sint veri judices, supremum tamen judicium est a Christo Domino, suo in terris Vicario commissum, eidemque munus demandatum, quotquot in errorem deflexerint, sive pauciores, sive plures numero fuerint, ad veram fidem revocandi."—Bened. XIV., De Synodo Diœcesana, tom. iii., lib. xiii., cap. ii., sect. iii., p. 256. Mechlin., 1842.

† "Supremæ suæ potestatis exercitium ab eorumdem assensu nequaquam pendere."—Idem, cap. i., sect. vi., p. 250.

[‡ "Etiamsi ab initio Concilium fuerit auctoritate apostolica congregatum, tamen si postea per Romanum Pontificem dissolutum, aut alio translatum fuerit, ex eo tempore remaneat acephalum et schismaticum, nec sit amplius Concilium sed Conciliabulum."—Ferraris, Biblioth. Prompt. Concilium, art. i., sect. ix. 4to. Francof., 1781.]

[§ "Simul patrem suum ei in memoriam revocavit, et magnam Synodum quam ille convocaverat; et quemadmodum ea quæ ab Episcopis conscripta fuerant, ille, utpote eorum particeps, lege lata confirmavisset."—Theodoriti Eccles. Hist., lib. ii., cap. iv., p. 71. Fol. Edit. Reading. Cantab., 1720.]

[‖ "Sententiam quoque quam arbiter dixerat, per epistolam significavit, confirmans et sanciens ea quæ a Synodo decreta fuerant; eosque adhortans ut concordiæ studerent, nec ecclesiæ corpus distrahere ac discerpere vellent, sed futurum Dei judicium animo reputarent."—Euseb. De Vita Constant., lib. iii., cap. xxiii., p. 591. Fol. Edit. Reading. Cantab., 1720.]

[¶ "Et hæc quidem a Synodo constituta sunt in hunc modum: Imperator vero ea suffragio suo comprobavit legemque tulit, ut fides eorum qui Nicææ olim convenerant, rata esset."—Sozom., Hist. Eccles., lib. vii., cap. ix., p. 289. Fol. Ed. Reading. Cantab., 1720.]

[ "Rogamus igitur tuam clementiam, ut per literas quoque tuæ pietatis ratum habeatur Concilii decretum; ut sicuti literis quibus nos convocasti ecclesiam honore prosecutus es, ita etiam finem eorum quæ decreta sunt obsignes."—Concilia Binii, tom. iii., Conc. Constant. I., Præfat. ad Canones, p. 357. Fol. Paris, 1644.]

[* "Sed prædictus piæ recordationis Theodosius, vindicans ea quæ ita recte contra Nestorium et ejus impietatem fuerant judicata, fecit firmiter obtinere contra eum factam condemnationem."—Conc. Labb., tom. v., Conc. Constant. II., collat. i., Justin. ad Episc., col. 420, C. Paris, 1671.]

[† "Oportet enim omnia juxta Dei beneplacitum, contentione seclusa veritatisque studio adhibito, discuti, ac tum demum a nostra pietate confirmationem obtinere."—Idem, tom. iii., Conc. Ephes. Epist. Theodos. ad Synod., col. 706, B. Paris, 1671.]

[‡ "Sacro nostræ serenitatis edicto venerandam Synodum confirmantes, admonuimus universos, ut de religione disputare desinerent."—Idem, tom. iv., Conc. Chalced., pars iii., Edict. Theodos. de Synodi Confirm., col. 841, C. Paris, 1671.]

[§ "Quia vero omnibus modis obediendum est pietati vestræ religiosissimæque voluntati, constitutionibus synodalibus, quæ mihi de confirmatione fidei catholicæ et hæreticorum damnatione placuerunt, libens adjeci sententiam meam."—Idem, tom. iii., Leonis Papæ I. epist. lix., ad Marcianum Augustum, col. 1344, D. Paris, 1671.]

‖ Du Pin, Ecc. Hist., vol. i., p. 679. Fol. Dublin, 1723.

[¶ "Sed O benignissime domine et amator justitiæ, ei qui tibi potentiam largitus est, hanc gratiam recompensa; et his quæ a nobis definita sunt, signaculum tribue, vestram in scripto imperialem ratihabitionem et per edicta divalia atque per pias constitutiones ex more eorum omnium firmitatem, quatenus nullus, his quæ gesta sunt, aut contradicat, novamve quæstionem machinetur."—Conc. Labb., tom. vi., Conc. Constant. III., actio xviii., Serm. Synod. ad Imperat., col. 1056, A. Paris, 1671.]

This was decreed and subscribed; though the "Pope's Legates did earnestly entreat, clamour, and protest against it;" the members of the Council not acknowledging the negative voice of the Pontiff. In the fifth General Synod it was decreed, that the three chapters be condemned, and that persons deceased were liable to be excommunicated. Vigilius opposed their doctrines. Nevertheless the decisions of the assembly were received by posterity, and succeeding Prelates of Rome approved of them. On this Baronius remarked, "Here stay, reader, and consider the matter attentively, that it is no new thing, that a Synod in which the Pope was not even present, by his Legates, but did oppose it, should yet obtain the title of œcumenical Synod; when afterward it received the Pope's assent, that it should be so."* According to this, the Pope can change even the nature of things. Such is a specimen of true Papal reasoning. Other instances might be given.

9. It is objected by the supporters of the supremacy, "that certain Councils asked the Pope's consent for the ratification of their decrees." The second General Synod, writing to Damasus, says, "In which things, legally and canonically settled among us, we exhort your Piety to acquiesce with us, out of spiritual charity, and the fear of the Lord." † The Council of Chalcedon solicited the confirmation of Leo I.: "That you may know how that we have done nothing out of favour or spite, but as guided by the divine direction, we have made known to you the force of all that has been done, for your concurrence, and for the confirmation and approbation of the things done." ‡ Leo II. says of the fifth General assembly, "That he agreed to what was determined, and confirmed it with the authority of the blessed St. Peter."

To this objection we reply, that it was the custom of General Councils, when they framed decrees for the public good, to request all the Bishops, who were absent, to give their attestation by subscription. Constantine recommended the Nicene decrees to the Prelates for their consent. The Synod of Sardica, in an epistle to them, says, "Brethren and fellow-Ministers, use all diligence, as being present in spirit with our Synod, to yield consent by your subscription, that concord may be preserved everywhere by all the fellow-Ministers." § Liberius requested of the Emperor Constantine, "that the faith delivered at Nice might be confirmed by the subscription of all the Bishops." * Athanasius "procured a Synod at Alexandria, to confirm the decrees at Sardica and in Palestine concerning him;" † and the Macedonian Prelates are said to have authorized their agents to ratify the faith of consubstantiality. ‡

Several instances of this description occur in history, from which it is manifest, that the decrees of Councils concerning affairs of common interest were presented to the Bishops, requesting, and frequently demanding, as a matter of right, their assent; because, as the Roman Clergy declared, "a decree cannot be firm which has not the consent of many." § By soliciting the consent of absent Bishops, they promulgated their proceedings, maintained concord, gave authority to their decisions, and engaged all to observe their decrees.

It is not surprising that Councils should seek the approbation of so eminent a Bishop as that of Rome; and as every vote had an influence, so his suffrage materially aided in attesting the faith, and in preserving discipline. His confirmation of a Council was, in effect, a declaration of his approbation; as those who were present by their votes, and those who were absent by their subscription, are said to have confirmed the decrees of Councils, such consent increasing their authority. Hence the number of Bishops composing a Council is sometimes computed according to the subscriptions of those who were absent, as well as by the votes of those who were present. The Synod of Sardica is sometimes said to consist of three hundred Bishops, although less than two hundred were there, the rest concurring by subscription; the absent Prelates expressing their assent by the words, "I confirm, I define, I decree." ‖

The effectual and authoritative confirmation of General Councils, which gave to them the force of law, was in the hands of the Emperors, and depended on their imperial sanction. This Justinian affirmed in general terms: "All these things having at intervals succeeded each other, our forenamed predecessors, of pious memory, corroborated by their laws what each Council had determined, and expelled those heretics who attempted to resist the definitions of the aforesaid four Councils, and to disturb the churches." ¶

10. It is also objected, "that some Councils have been repudiated for want of the Pope's ratification." In support of this assertion, it is stated, that the decisions of the Council of Rimini were null, because the Bishop of Rome did not consent to them. To this it may be an-

[* "Hic siste, lector, atque rem attente considera; non esse hoc novum, ut aliqua Synodus, cui nec per Legatos ipse Pontifex interfuerit, sed adversatus fuerit, titulum tamen obtinuerit œcumenicæ; cum postea ut hujusmodi titulum obtineret, Romani Pontificis voluntas accessit."—Baronii Annal. Eccles., A.D. 553, tom. vii., p. 436, A. Fol. Romæ, 1607.]

[† "Quibus tanquam canonice ac legitime apud nos constitutis, vestram quoque Reverentiam gratulari hortamur, intercedente spiritali caritate, et Domini timore omnem quidem humanum affectum comprimente."—Theodorit. Hist. Eccles., lib. v., cap. ix., p. 207. Fol. Ed. Reading. Cantab., 1720.]

[‡ "Ut autem cognoscatis, quia nihil alicui donando per gratiam fecimus, aut per inimicitias adversando, sed ut nutu gubernati divino, omnem vobis gestorum vim insinuavimus, ad comprobationem nostræ sinceritatis, et ad eorum quæ a nobis gesta sunt firmitatem et consonantiam."—Conc. Labb., tom. iv., Conc. Chalced., Relatio Synodi ad Leo. Papam I., col. 837, E. Paris, 1671.]

[§ "Σπουδασατε δε μαλλον και ὑμεις, αδελφοι και συλλειτουργοι, ὡς τῳ πνευματι συνοντες τῃ συνοδῳ ἡμων, συνεπιψηφιζεσθαι δι' ὑπογραφης ὑμετερας, ὑπερ του παρα παντων των πανταχου συλλειτουργων την ὁμοφωνιαν διασωζεσθαι."—Athanas. Opera, tom. i., Synod. Sard. Epist. ad Episc. Afric., p. 766. Fol. Coloniæ, 1686.]

[* "Postulavit autem ut fides quæ Nicææ exposita fuerat, omnium ubique Episcoporum subscriptionibus firmaretur."—Sozom. Hist. Eccles., lib. iv., cap. xi., p. 144. Fol. Ed. Reading. Cantab., 1720.]

[† "Inter hæc Athanasius, Alexandriam ingressus, Synodum Episcoporum Ægypti fieri, et ea quæ tum Sardicæ, tum in Palæstina, de ipso decreta fuerant confirmari curavit."—Idem, cap. i., p. 131.]

‡ Socrat. Hist. Eccles., lib. iv., cap. xii. Fol. Cantab., 1720.

§ "Quoniam nec firmum decretum potest esse, quod non plurimorum videbitur habuisse consensum."—Cypriani Opera, epist. xxx., Cleri Romani ad Cyprian., p. 38. 8vo. Paris, 1836.

‖ "Sententias fratrum omnes sequimur, omnes confirmamus, omnes observandas esse decernimus."—Conc. Rom. Barrow's Works, vol. vii., On the Supremacy, p. 440. 8vo. edit. Oxford, 1830.

¶ "His itaque omnibus per diversa tempora subsecutis, prædicti piæ recordationis nostri patres ea quæ in unoquoque Concilio judicata sunt, legibus suis corroboraverunt, et confirmaverunt; et hæreticos qui definitionibus prædictorum S. quatuor Conciliorum resistere et ecclesias conturbare conati sunt, expulerunt."—Conc. Labb., tom. v., Conc. Constan. II., collat. i., Justin. Epist. ad Episc., col. 420, E. Paris, 1671.

[ "Neque enim præjudicium aliquod nasci potuit ex numero eorum, qui apud Ariminum convenerunt; cum constet neque Romanum Episcopum, cujus ante omnes fuit expetenda sententia, swered: (1.) That which was alleged against the Council of Rimini, was not the want of the Pope's consent at the termination of the session, but in the Council. (2.) The same objection every Prelate might allege, as all had a right to be present, and to vote. (3.) The dissent of other Bishops, particularly of those who were eminent, is also alleged as an exception; which would be useless, if the Pope's withholding his approval had been the principal thing. (4.) The Emperor, with many of the Bishops, recognised no absolute necessity for such Pontifical approbation.

11. Another objection has arisen, "Some Popes have made null and void the decrees of General Councils." Leo I. endeavoured to invalidate those of the Council of Chalcedon concerning the privileges of the Constantinopolitan see.* His behaviour, in this case, was disorderly and factious, arrogant and schismatic, proceeding from ambition and jealousy. Such conduct ultimately overwhelmed the dignity and liberty of the Christian republic. Nevertheless, he did not ground his opposition to the decree of the Council so much on his authority to annul its decisions, as upon the inviolable obligation of the Nicene canons, which he presumed no Synod could abrogate or alter. His opposition, however, was disregarded by the Church.

It is unreasonable, that the caprice or opinion of one man, neither wiser nor better than any other, and of the same office and order with his brethren, should be preferred to them. It is absurd that such an one should have the power of overturning their decisions, inasmuch as he possesses no right to do so, which is grounded on Scripture, ancient custom, or history. The Scripture says nothing of General Councils. None were held for three hundred years after Christ; and in the early Synods, no canon was made to confirm such power in the Pope. In conformity to ancient custom, it is more reasonable that the Bishop of Rome should submit to the decision of his brethren, than that they should submit to him.

V. The will of the Pope, declared by way of precept or proclamation, concerning the sanction, abrogation, or dispensation of laws, is not of sovereign authority in the universal church.

1. This privilege the Pope claims, and asserts that his decrees and sentences have the force and obligation of law. The body of the canon law, whereby he governs the Church, consists chiefly of Papal edicts, or decretal epistles, imitating the rescripts of Emperors, and claiming the same force. We refer to Benedict XIV., who was elected Pope A. D. 1740. He says: "Those constitutions are properly called canons which bind the whole Church: such are those which emanate from the chief Pontiff or a General Council; but if the statute of a Bishop be confirmed by the Pope, and extended to the whole Church, then it is properly termed a canon, as it is now authorized by the Pope." *

Again: "When, however, in this economy of the Church, nothing occurs which takes its origin in natural or divine law, it hence follows that the Pope, for any good and lawful cause, may dispense with constitutions of this kind." † "The Pope, uttering anything contrary to the sanction of Trent, does not oppose the mind of that Council, nor does he put forth that supreme authority granted to him by Christ the Lord, of relaxing and changing, when necessary, any ecclesiastical law; but he rather uses that power on which the Council of Trent itself depends for the stability of its decisions." ‡ "To the Pope it belongs to declare, in what circumstances the divine precept ceases to oblige." § "To doubt concerning the power of the Pope, after he hath dispensed, is sacrilegious. Because it would be the same as to disparage Christ, as though he had not sufficiently provided for the Church." ‖

Ferraris, who is a faithful interpreter of Roman Catholic divinity, says, "Nevertheless, the Pope can interpret and declare the divine law, that it would not be obligatory in some cases under certain circumstances; namely, when, from the observance of it, either something unjust would follow, or a greater good be prevented. Otherwise, when no recourse is to be had to God for interpretation, he would not be a good father of a family, (which must not be allowed on any account,) if he would leave his flock without a shepherd, who, in doubtful and important cases, would interpret and declare the divine will, and thus consult for all citizens in necessary cases." ¶

We adduce also the following from the same theologian: —"The Pope is of so great authority and power, that he neque Vincentium, qui tot annos sacerdotium inlibate servavit, neque alios, hujusmodi statutis consensum aliquem commodasse."—Theodorit. Hist. Eccles., lib. ii., cap. xxii., p. 103. Fol. Cantab., 1720.]

[* "Consensiones vero Episcoporum sanctorum canonum apud Nicæam conditorum regulis repugnantes, unita nobiscum vestræ fidei pietate, in irritum mittimus, et per authoritatem beati Petri Apostoli generali prorsus definitione cassamus."—Conc. Labb., tom. iii., Leonis Papæ I., epist. lv., Ad Pulcher. August., col. 1338, A. Paris, 1671.

["Quantumlibet enim extortis assentationibus sese instruat vanitatis elatio, et appetitus suos Conciliorum æstimet nomine roborandos, infirmum atque irritum erit, quicquid a prædictorum patrum canonibus discreparit."—Idem, tom. iv., Leonis Papæ I. epist. lxi., ad Synodum Chalced., No. xvi., col. 882, E.

["Tanta apud me est Nicænorum canonum reverentia, ut ea quæ sunt a sanctis patribus constituta nec permiserim nec patiar aliqua novitate violari."—Idem, epist. lxii., No. xvii., ad. Max. Antioch., col. 884, B.]

Barrow's Works, vol. vii. On the Supremacy, p. 446, et seq. 8vo. edit. Oxford, 1830.

[* "Canonis nomine solæ denotentur constitutiones, quæ universam obstringunt ecclesiam, quales illæ sunt, quæ aut a Conciliis Generalibus, aut a summo Pontifice promanant; quod si statutum Episcopi a Papa confirmetur, et extendatur ad totam ecclesiam, tunc, utpote jam Pontifici arrogatum, recte dicatur canon."—Bened. XIV. De Synod. Diœces., tom. i., lib. i., cap. iii., sect. iii., p. 52. Mechlin., 1842.]

[† "Cum tamen in hac ecclesiæ œconomia nihil occurrat, quod a naturali aut divina lege suam trahat originem; hinc sequitur, posse Romanum Pontificem, graviori quapiam ac legitima causa impellente, super hujusmodi ecclesiasticis constitutionibus dispensare."—Idem, lib. vi., cap. viii., sect. xii., p. 462.]

[‡ "Idcirco Pontifex, aliquid edicens contra aliquam Tridentini sanctionem, non operatur contra mentem ejusdem Concilii, neque illam exerit supremam auctoritatem, sibi a Christo Domino collatam, relaxandi, et immutandi, cum opus fuerit, quamcumque legem ecclesiasticam; sed potius eo utitur arbitrio, a cujus nutu voluit idem Tridentinum suarum sanctionum firmitatem pendere."—Idem, tom. ii., lib. ix., cap. iv., sect. vii., p. 297.]

[§ "Alii ex adverso in eo rerum statu necessariam putant dispensationem summi Pontificis, cujus est declarare, in quibusnam circumstantiis desinat obligare præceptum divinum."—Idem, tom. i., lib. vi., cap. iv., sect. iii., p. 421.]

[‖ "De Pontificis potestate, postquam dispensavit, dubitare, instar sacrilegii est. Esset enim Christo quasi exprobrare, quod non satis ecclesiæ suæ providisset."—Idem, tom. ii., lib. vii., cap. viii., sect. vii., p. 63.]

[¶ "Potest tamen Papa jus divinum interpretari, et declarare, quod in aliquibus casibus propter aliquas circumstantias non obliget, cum scilicet ex divinæ legis observantia aut aliquid sequitur iniquum, aut majus bonum impeditur; alioquin cum pro interpretatione ad Deum recursus non pateat, non fuisset ipse bonus paterfamilias, (quod nullimodo est dicendum,) si gregem suum dimisisset sine pastore, qui in casibus dubiis et arduis posset jus divinum interpretari et declarare, et sic omnibus suis civibus pro necessitate consulere.'—Ferraris, Biblioth. Prompt., in verbo Dispensatio, sect. xx.]

can also modify, declare, or interpret the divine law." "The Pope can sometimes counteract the divine law, by limiting, explaining," &c. "The Pope can modify the divine law, since his power is not of man, but of God, and he supplies the place of God on earth, with ample power of binding and loosing; because God our Lord and Redeemer is said to do what his Vicar does, provided he does nothing contrary to the faith." "The Pope can interpret, and, having cause, can limit the divine law, as all commonly teach."

If Gratian be consulted, similar declarations will be found. "No person ought to have either the will or power to transgress the precepts of the Apostolical See."* "We who, according to the plenitude of our power, have authority to dispense above law or right."† Pope Agatho says, "Thus all the sanctions of the Apostolical See are to be received, as confirmed by the voice of the divine Peter himself."‡ Among the "Maxims" of Gregory VII. we find the following:—"The Pope alone can make new laws.—No book is to be deemed canonical, but by his authority.—He is to be judged by no man." But this power is exercised by the Pontiff by usurpation; as he has no ground for it in Scripture or by ancient practice.

2. Originally the church had no other sovereign than the "one Lord," and "one Lawgiver." (Eph. iv. 5; James iv. 12.)

3. Primarily, besides the divine laws, anterior to the first General Council, the church adopted certain usages for her government, which were called "ancient customs." These were such as each church enacted in provincial Synods; or which were received from one another, by imitation and compliance. They became rules or laws; not of divine, but of human, right. And hence, according to the practice of different churches, these customs varied; and thus arose that diversity with regard to order or discipline. The Pope could not impose customs or laws on any church as he thought fit; for such were not obligatory, except they had been voluntarily adopted. Those who once embraced them were at liberty to reject them when they saw proper. If the Pope insisted on the observance of his laws, he was liable to be resisted; as is manifest in the case of Victor, who endeavoured to compel the churches of Asia to obey his decree concerning the time of celebrating Easter.

In the days of Cyprian it was deemed tyrannical for one Pastor to prescribe to another. "For none of us," says he, "makes himself a Bishop of Bishops, or by tyrannical terror compels his colleagues to a necessity of obedience; since every Prelate, according to the licence of his own liberty and power, hath his own freedom, and can no more be judged by another than he himself can judge another."§ If any new law were introduced, it was by the general consent of the major part of Bishops or Pastors, to whom the others yielded compliance. But the whole authority of such laws was founded on human consent.

4. When the Emperors embraced the faith of Christ, a different custom prevailed. General Councils were instituted. The Pope possessed greater influence, having the πρωτεια τιμης, "privilege of honour," in ecclesiastical assemblies. Yet he had no casting vote, or negative above others, as all things passed by a majority. In the acts of the fifth Synod we read, "This is a thing to be granted, that in Councils, we must not regard the interlocution of one or two, but those things which are commonly defined by all, or by most." George, Bishop of Constantinople, also says, "Seeing everywhere the will of the multitude, or of the most, doth prevail, it is necessary to anathematize the persons before mentioned."*

5. Metropolitan Bishops, in their provinces, had more power than the Pontiff in the whole Church; yet they had no negative voice in synodical decisions. For it is decreed in the sixth canon of the Nicene Council, that in the designation of Bishops plurality of votes should prevail. It is indeed said in that canon, χωρις γνωμης, "without the opinion" of the Metropolitan; but this does not imply that he possesses a negative voice, but that the transaction should not pass in his absence, or without his knowledge, advice, or vote. Thus the twenty-fourth apostolical canon, to which the Nicene Synod refers, interprets it; namely, that the Metropolitan should do nothing without the opinion of all, or the majority. The Council of Antioch decreed that "a Bishop should not be ordained without a Synod, and the presence of the Metropolitan of the province;" and that a "plurality of votes should carry."† Now, as the Provincial were more ancient than the General Councils, and furnished a pattern for them; should we grant the same privilege to the Pope in General that the Metropolitans enjoyed in Provincial Synods, even then he could not make laws independently of others.

6. In former days the Pope was bound to yield to the judgment of his colleagues. So Constantine told Liberius: "The vote of the plurality of Bishops ought to prevail."‡ When Julius broke a rule of the Church, and communicated with persons condemned by Councils, the Fathers of Antioch "speedily reproved him, showing that they would not receive canons from him."§

7. The Pontiff, in common with others, was subject to the laws of the Church. The Antiochian Fathers complained that Julius transgressed the canons; nevertheless he did not repel their charge by claiming exemption from their authority, but by affirming that he had not broken them.‖ The African Fathers assured Pope Celestine,

* "Nulli fas est vel velle vel posse transgredi Apostolicæ Sedis præcepta."—Corp. Juris Canon., P. Greg. IV., dist. xix., cap. v.

† "Qui, secundum plenitudinem potestatis, de jure possumus supra jus dispensare."—Idem, P. Inn. III., Decret. Greg., lib. iii., tit. viii., cap. iv.

‡ "Sic omnes Apostolicæ Sedis sanctiones accipiendæ sunt, tanquam ipsius divini Petri voce firmatæ sunt."—Idem, P. Agatho, dist. xix., cap. ii. Barrow's Works, vol. vii., On the Supremacy, p. 449, et seq. 8vo. edit. Oxford, 1830.

[§ "Neque enim quisquam nostrum Episcopum se esse Episcoporum constituit, aut tyrannico terrore ad obsequendi necessitatem collegas suos adigit; quando habeat omnis Episcopus pro licentia libertatis et potestatis suæ arbitrium proprium, tamquam judicari ab alio non possit, cum nec ipse potest alterum judicare."—Conc. Labb., tom. i., Conc. Carth. III., Cypr. ad Synod., col. 786, E. Paris, 1671.]

[* Barrow's Works, vol. vii., On Supremacy, p 453. 8vo. edition. Oxford, 1830.]

[† "Episcopus ne ordinetur absque Synodo et præsentia Metropolitani provinciæ. Sin autem ex præfinito canone facta fuerit constitutio, aliqui autem propter suum contentionis studium contradicant, vincat plurium suffragium."—Conc. Labb., tom. ii., Conc. Antioch., can. xix., col. 570, C. Paris, 1671.]

[‡ "Valere enim debet plurium Episcoporum sententia."—Theodorit., Hist. Eccles., lib. ii., cap. xvi. Fol. 94. Cantab., 1720.]

[§ "Et convocata Antiochiæ Synodo, in unum collecti, de communi omnium sententia conscriptis literis, Julium vicissim acrius insimulant, significantes non debere ab ipso discuti, si quos ipsi ecclesiis suis expellere voluissent; neque enim se contradixisse, tunc cum Novatus Ecclesia ejectus est."—Socrat., Hist. Eccles., lib. ii., cap. xv. Fol. 93. Cantab., 1720.]

[‖ "Quippe qui judicio non stetisset, nisi sui fiduciam habuisset; neque enim sponte, sed literis nostris ad judicium vocatus, comparuit, quemadmodum vos per literas citavimus, et tamen post tanta

that he ought not to admit persons to communion who had been excommunicated by them, as being contrary to a decree of the Council of Nice.* The Roman Church informed Marcion, "that they could not receive him without the leave of his father who had rejected him." Such is the character of those ecclesiastical canons, which never exempted the Popes from the laws prescribed for the government of other Bishops. The privilege of dispensing with laws would have been strange, when the Pope could not, without censure, excuse himself for violating the canons: and how useless would be the decisions of Councils, if the Pope, independently of them, could make laws! Even when the Papal dominion had made considerable advancement, the Popes durst not claim a power over the universal canons, or exemption from them. On the contrary, they boasted to be their chief observers, guardians, defenders, and executors. If they occasionally spoke differently, and required observance to their constitutions, it was either in their own diocesses, or in provinces where they had considerable sway.

8. The Synods governed the churches. It is true the Pontiffs sometimes speak as if affairs were regulated exclusively by their authority; when this was accomplished by Councils, consisting of the western Bishops, who were devoted to the interests of the Pope. The decrees of those assemblies were binding in various places, not so much by virtue of Papal authority, as by the consent of their own Bishops. Hence we infer that the acts of Roman Prelates of the present day are of no authority, inasmuch as they do not act in Synod; but decide, ex cathedra, or with the advice of a few partisans. In the West, their decrees have been contested when contrary to the ancient canons, or when they interfered with the liberties of churches.

9. The Greeks, A. D. 860, did not admit the Roman mandates, so that the Bishop of Rome, in an epistle to Photius, complains, "that he did not receive the decrees of the Popes."

10. The Decretal Epistles gave rise to their assumption. These were forgeries, as Du Pin, and others, have fully shown.† The former proves conclusively: (1.) That these decretals were unknown to all the ancient Fathers, the Popes, and ecclesiastical authors who wrote anterior to the ninth century. (2.) The imposture of these letters appears from the fact, that they are made up of a contexture of passages of Fathers, of Councils, of letters of Popes, of canons and ordinances of Emperors, which have been written from the third age of the church down to the middle of the ninth century. These portions, drawn out of several places, have been collected together by some impostors who had not a genius large enough to compose the letters themselves. (3.) The scriptures cited in these epistles, follow the translation of Jerome, which proves that they were written since his time, and consequently do not belong to the Popes whose names they bear, who also lived before him. (4.) The subject of these letters does not agree with the times in which they profess to have been written. (5.) They abound with anachronisms. (6.) Their style is extremely barbarous, and full of solecisms, and there are some words in them not in use at that day. As these letters appeared in an unlearned age, it is not marvellous that they were received without examination. Hincmar, Archbishop of Rheims, and the French Prelates opposed them. But in a short time they acquired authority, being supported by the Court of Rome, whose pretensions they favoured. At the present period, nobody dares to defend them, the imposture being so abominably gross, that all may discover the deception. They serve as a remarkable example both of the credulity of the preceding ages, and the intolerable impudence of the hierarchy of Rome.

Du Pin, at the close of his admirable confutation of the Decretal Epistles, observes: "In them are many things to be found that do not in the least agree with the true history of those times, and were purposely said to favour the Court of Rome, and establish her pretensions against the rights of Bishops, and the liberties of the churches. But it would take up too much time to show the gross falsity of these monuments, that are now rejected by common consent, and even by those authors that are most favourable to the Court of Rome, who are obliged to abandon the patronage of these Epistles, though they have done much service in establishing the greatness of the Court of Rome, and ruining the ancient discipline of the Church, especially in relation to ecclesiastical decisions, and rights of Bishops."

11. During the regal government of the Church, which commenced with Constantine, and flourished till the supremacy of the Pope was established, the Emperor possessed the power of enacting and dispensing with ecclesiastical laws. This is evident from the codes of Theodosius and Justinian. "These things," saith the Council of Arles, "we have decreed to be presented to our Lord the Emperor, desiring his clemency, that if any thing be defective, it may be supplied by his prudence; if any thing be unreasonable, it may be corrected by his judgment; if any thing be duly ordered, it may, by his help, be perfected, divine grace assisting."* Even Popes allowed the validity of imperial decrees: Gregory I. adduced the laws of the Emperor concerning ecclesiastical affairs, as obligatory rules of practice.†

VI. The Pope is not the fountain of jurisdiction, and all other Bishops do not derive their authority from his mandate or commission; nor do they act as his deputies or commissioners.

1. The Pontiff maintains that he is the source of all ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and that all ecclesiastical power is derived from him. Bellarmine affirms, "The rule of the Church is monarchical; therefore all authority is in one, and from him it is derived to others."‡ And this he attempts to prove from the form of creating Bishops. "We provide such a church, with such a person; and we promote him to be Father, and Pastor, and Bishop of the said church; committing to him the ad-argumenta nos veluti contra canones et insolitum quiddam agentes reprehenditis. Qui igitur sunt, qui contra canones agunt?—nosne qui cum tantis rerum documentis virum recipimus," &c.—Athanas., Opera, tom. i., Pap. Julii Epist. in Apol. ii., p. 748, C. Colon., 1686.]

* Ep. ad P. Celest.

† Du Pin, Ecc. Hist., vol. i., pp. 582—586. Fol. Dublin, 1723.

[* "Hæc Domino Imperatori præsentanda decrevimus, poscentes ejus clementiam, ut si quid hic minus est, ejus prudentia suppleatur; ut si quid secus se ratio habet, ejus judicio emendetur; si quid rationabiliter taxatum est, ejus adjutorio divina opitulante clementia perficiatur."—Conc. Labb., tom. vii., Conc. Arlet. VI., can. xxvi., col. 1239, A. Paris, 1671.]

[† Idem, tom. v., Greg. Papæ Epistolæ, lib. xi., Ep. lvi., De pluribus causis examinandis, col. 1541. Paris, 1671.]

[‡ "Regimen ecclesiasticum est monarchicum, ut supra ostendimus; ergo omnis auctoritas est in uno, et ab illo in alios derivatur."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. i., De Rom. Pontif., lib. iv., cap. xxiv., col. 882, A. Colon., 1619.]

ministration in temporals and spirituals, in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost."

Pius II., in his Bull of Retraction, says, "In the militant church, which resembleth the triumphant, there is one Moderator and Judge of all, the Vicar of Jesus Christ, from whom, as from the head, all power and authority is derived to the subjected members; which power doth immediately flow from our Lord Christ."* This monstrous principle shows itself in the ordinary title of a Prelate, who styles himself, Dei et Apostolicæ Sedis gratia Episcopus, "a Bishop, by the grace of God, and of the Apostolic See." The Fathers of Trent, who betrayed the liberties of the Church, and perverted God's truth, represent Bishops as the delegates of the Pope, in matters originally belonging to the Pastors of the Church. According to the doctrine of Scripture, and the sense of the primitive church, the Pastors receive immediately their authority and commission from God, being his Ministers.

2. The Scripture teaches, that Ministers receive their commission or authority immediately from God. Speaking of the Elders, Bishops, or Pastors of the church at Ephesus, the Apostle declared, that the Holy Ghost made them Bishops or overseers to "feed the church of God." (Acts xx. 28.) Again: "He gave some Apostles; and some Prophets; and some Pastors and teachers." (Eph. iv. 11.) The Pastors and teachers, though outwardly appointed by the Apostles, had, nevertheless, their special and most important calling from God. Pastors are termed "the Ministers of Christ and of God," "the stewards of God," "the servants of the Lord," "fellow-servants of the Apostles." (Col. i. 7; iv. 7; 1 Thess. iii. 2; 1 Tim. iv. 6; 2 Tim. ii. 24; Titus i. 7.) They preside in the Lord. (1 Thess. v. 12.) They allow no other head but Christ, "from whom the whole body fitly joined together, and compacted by that which every joint supplieth, according to the effectual working in the measure of every part, maketh increase of the body unto the edifying of itself in love." (Eph. iv. 16.) It is stated that "God appoints Bishops through the Pontiff or his assignees." No proof, however, is given, that the appointment of Ministers to their office must of necessity come through the Pope; and until such is adduced, the assertion is worthless.

3. The primitive church declare themselves to the same purpose. Ignatius, in his Epistle to the Magnesians, says, that the Bishop presides in the place of God, and that we must be subject to him as unto Jesus Christ.† Cyprian affirms that "each Bishop is constituted by the judgment of God and of Christ."‡ The ancient Pastors professed to be as much the Vicars of Christ, as the Pope. In their ordinary addresses to the Bishop of Rome, and in declarations concerning him, they speak of him as their brother, colleague, and fellow-Minister. The early Pontiffs called other Prelates their follow-Bishops and Presbyters.

4. Indeed, the vicarship of the Clergy to the Pope is the product of ambition and flattery. It is ridiculous to suppose that Cyprian, Athanasius, Basil, Chrysostom, Augustine, &c., were Vicegerents or Ministers of the Pope. If they were, why did they never acknowledge it? The Bishops of Rome, however, in the fourth century, began to practise this mode.

5. Damasus, who was elected Pope A. D. 366, was the first who bestowed on certain Bishops the title of Vicar, pretending thereby to confer on them an extraordinary power, enabling them to perform several acts which they could not otherwise have accomplished. Acholius, Bishop of Thessalonica, was the first who enjoyed this title, being appointed the first Vicar in East Illyricum. Siricius, successor of Damasus, enlarged the power exercised by his predecessor, and decreed, that no Bishop should be ordained in East Illyricum without the consent of the Prelate of Thessalonica. It was some time before this decree was carried into effect. Thus the Bishops of Thessalonica, probably in the year 382, were first appointed Vicegerents or Vicars of the Prelate of Rome. This scheme was improved by succeeding Popes, who, to extend their authority, conferred the title, and its annexed power, upon the most eminent Prelates of other provinces and kingdoms, engaging them thereby to depend on the Pontiff, and to promote the authority of the See of Rome, to the subversion of the ancient rights and privileges of Bishops and of Synods.

The institution of Vicars, by succeeding Popes, was followed by that of Legates; or the latter institution was grafted on the former. The Legates were vested with greater power than the Vicars.* They were sent into all countries, and, by virtue of their authority, oppressed the Clergy and people, by extorting from both large sums of money, to support their pride and luxury. Hence many nations were compelled, through self-defence, to enact laws for excluding the Legates of the Pope from their dominions. Of this, John XXII. sorely complained; and decreed, that all people should admit his Legates, under pain of an interdict.

VII. The Pope has not universal jurisdiction over the Clergy, demanding obedience and submission, requiring all cases of importance to be referred to him, citing them to his bar, examining and deciding their causes, &c.

1. The Pontiff and his theologians say that this power belongs to the Bishop of Rome. Dens affirms, "It is no longer a question, whether the Pope can change the jurisdiction of Bishops, by extending, restraining, or taking it altogether away; for all Catholics agree that the Pope can do this."† Benedict XIV. asserts, that "the Roman Pontiff can entirely exempt any church and benefice from the jurisdiction of the Bishop."‡

2. We maintain, that the Pope, in former times, had no such right, for the following reasons:—There was no jurisdiction exercised among Christians, like that which the Papal Court now holds, and which is similar

[* "In ecclesia militanti, quæ instar triumphantis habet, unus est omnium moderator et arbiter, Jesus Christi Vicarius: a quo, tamquam capite, omnis in subjecta membra potestas et auctoritas derivatur quæ a Christo Domino Deo nostro sine medio in ipsum influit."—Conc. Labb., tom. xiii., Pii Papæ II. Bulla Retract., col. 1408, E. Paris, 1671.]

[† "Moneo, in concordia Dei studete omnia operari, præsidente Episcopo in loco Dei, et Presbyteris in loco confessionis Apostolorum, et Diaconis mihi dulcissimis habentibus creditam ministrationem Jesu Christi; qui ante secula apud Patrem erat, et in fine apparuit. Omnes igitur, eandem consuetudinem Dei accipientes, veneremini ad invicem."—Ignatii Epist. ad Magnes., cap. vi. Fol. Edit. Joh. Pearson. Episc. Oxon., 1709.]

[‡ "Factus est autem Cornelius Episcopus de Dei et Christi ejus judicio, de Clericorum pene omnium testimonio," &c.—Cypriani Opera, Epist. li., Ad Antonianum, p. 59. 8vo. Paris, 1836.]

* De Marca, De Concord. Sacerd. et Imperii, lib. v., cap. v. Fol. Paris, 1669.

† "Nec etiam quæstio est, an Pontifex immutare Episcoporum jurisdictionem possit, eam ampliando, restringendo, vel etiam penitus auferendo; hoc enim Pontificem posse omnes Catholici consentiunt."—Dens, Theolog., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, No. 93.

‡ "Romanus Pontifex possit quamlibet ecclesiam, et beneficium, ab Episcopi jurisdictione totaliter subtrahere."—Ben. XIV., De Synodo, tom. i., lib. v., cap. vii., sect. vi., p. 360.

to that exercised in civil governments. Our Saviour prohibited its exercise, and Peter forbad Ministers κατακυριευειν των κληρων, "to lord over God's heritage." (1 Peter v. 3.) At first the Episcopal power was the exercise of the pastoral office, and consisted in paternal admonition, correction of offenders, exhorting and persuading them to amendment; and if they persisted in their disorderly conduct, their case was brought before the congregation with which they were associated; (1 Cor. v. 5, 12; 2 Cor. ii. 6;) and when the cause was heard, the majority decided the question. Cyprian alludes to this scriptural custom as existing in his day; for, speaking to the members of the church, he says, "All things shall be examined, you being present and judging." * And again, he says, "According to your divine suffrages." † Tertullian inculcated similar sentiments. ‡

The usurped exercise of this prelatical or Papal power, beyond the regular pastoral authority, is noticed by early historians as having been recently introduced into the Church, and possessing the character of tyranny and oppression. Socrates says, "From that time the Episcopacy of Alexandria had already, and for some time, proceeded in a domineering power beyond that of the priesthood." § He speaks in a similar strain concerning the domination which the Bishops of the Roman See had assumed: "The Episcopacy of Rome, in like manner as that of Alexandria, had already, a great while ago, gone before in the exercise of authority beyond that of the priesthood." ‖

3. Originally no Bishop had jurisdiction over another, as Cyprian affirms. In after-times, when Synods sat, the community of Bishops did not intermeddle with the proceedings of Prelates in their own precincts or charge, except when their conduct affected the general state of the church. The custom of the Christian community, which was confirmed by the Nicene Council, decided that all causes should be finally terminated in each province; so that no regard was had to the Roman Pontiff. The Synod of Antioch declares: "If any Bishop, accused of certain crimes, shall be condemned by all the Bishops of the province, and all shall unanimously vote against him, he shall not be judged again by others; but the unanimous sentence of the Bishops of the province shall remain valid."

4. If the Pope had universal authority over the Clergy from the commencement, there would have been clear instances of the fact furnished in the history of the church; nevertheless, there are but few, and these insufficient or inapplicable.

5. The page of history informs us of commotions which took place at Rome when the Patriarch of Constantinople assumed the title of œcumenical or universal Bishop. It was afterward assumed by the Pope. This proves incontestably, that the universal jurisdiction of the Pontiff over the Clergy was not primitive; and, therefore, no part of the Christian system.

* "Examinabuntur singula præsentibus et judicantibus vobis."—Cypriani Opera, epist. xi., p. 19. 8vo. Paris, 1836.

† "Secundum vestra divina suffragia."—Idem, epist. xxxix., p. 45.

‡ Tertull. Opera, Apologet. adv. Gent., cap. xxxix., tom. i. 8vo. Wirceb., 1780.

[§ "Ex eo enim tempore, Episcopi Alexandrini sacerdotalem gradum atque ordinem supergressi, principatum quemdam obtinere, et cuncta pro imperio agere cœperunt."—Socrat. Hist. Eccles., lib. vii., cap. vii., p. 352. Fol. Ed. Reading. Cantab., 1720.]

[‖ "Sed invidia quoque istos attrivit; cum Episcopatus Romanus, perinde atque Alexandrinus, ultra sacerdotii fines progressus, jam olim in dominationem degenerasset."—Idem, cap. xi., p. 356.]

CHAPTER XII.

SUPREMACY CONTINUED—PREROGATIVES OF THE POPE.

VIII. THE ROMAN PONTIFF DID NOT ORIGINALLY POSSESS THE CHOICE, ORDINATION, AND CONFIRMATION OF BISHOPS. 1. He claims this. Explanation of election, confirmation, ordination, jurisdiction: 2. Ordination of Matthias: 3. The Deacons: 4. Elders and Bishops in the Apostles' days: 5. Afterward chosen by the Presbyters and people: 6. Choice of Bishops by the people, Presbyters, and other Bishops. Cyprian cited: 7. Subsequently by the province. Import of confirmation anciently: 8. Usurpation of power does not confer a right: 9. The second General Council confined Bishops to their own dioceses in the exercise of power: 10. The Emperors did more in confirming Bishops than the Popes. Examples of this: 11. General Councils decided the matter: 12. All Bishops anciently confirmed each other's elections.—IX. IT DOES NOT BELONG TO THE POPE TO CENSURE, SUSPEND, OR DEPOSE BISHOPS OR PASTORS. 1. This prerogative is claimed. Innocent III. The Council of Trent cited: 2. Deposition was effected by Synods. Instances adduced: 3. In some cases it was different, as Bishops deposed each other. Examples given: 4. In case of heresy, schism, or immorality, the people might desert their Bishops: 5. If any Pope assumed more than the canons allowed, or what was common to other Bishops of his rank, it was an irregularity or usurpation: 6. The Roman Prelate anciently did not depose without Synods: 7. Bishops were deposed by the Emperors' authority. Instances of this: 8. The examples quoted in favour of the Pope's authority not conclusive. Case of Marcian, A.D. 253, by Stephen,—Flavian, by Damasus. Other instances entirely impertinent.—X. THE PONTIFF CANNOT RESTORE CENSURED, SUSPENDED, OR DEPOSED BISHOPS. 1. This is asserted. Baronius cited. Gelasius I. quoted: 2. No ancient canon for it: 3. Decrees of Synods, and, 4. The apostolical canons, against it: 5. Popes were checked for interfering in such cases.—XI. OF APPEALS TO THE POPE. 1. Claims for this. Council of Florence, Gratian, Pius II., Nicholas I., and Pelag. II., cited: 2. No examples of this in antiquity: 3. Ancient customs and canons against it: 4. When the Diocesan administration was introduced, the last resort was to the Synods and their Primates. Council of Chalcedon, canon ninth, cited. Constant. I., canon sixth, cited. The African churches: 5. The Popes were opposed for receiving appeals: 6. The ancient Fathers speak against foreign appeals. Pontiffs quoted—Augustine, Bernard. Council of Basil cited: 7. The decrees of the Council of Sardis considered. Six considerations upon them: 8. The grounds on which the Pope asserts it, destroy the validity of their claims: 9. Appeals were not often made to the Pope: 10. Christian states have been compelled to make laws against them: 11. Formerly there were properly no appeals: 12. Instances of appeals are few, and not primitive. Several instances examined.—XII. WHETHER THE POPE CAN BE CALLED TO ACCOUNT, JUDGED, OR DEPOSED. 1. They pretend to this, according to the canon law: 2. Antiquity is against them: 3. Popes have been called to an account. Instances given: 4. They gave an account of their faith: 5. Various sentiments on this point. Five opinions mentioned: 6. Great perplexity on this subject. Canon law cited. Archbishop Antoninus on the deposition of wicked and incorrigible Popes.—XIII. WHETHER HE CAN DECIDE CONTROVERSIES. 1. It is ascribed to him: 2. The ancients knew nothing of it: 3. Controversies were decided by Synods: 4. Many Popes heretical: 5. Their expositions puerile.

VIII. THE Roman Pontiff did not originally possess the choice, constitution, and confirmation of Bishops or Pastors.

1. The Pope claims and exercises these prerogatives as far as he is able; pretending, that no Bishop can be ordained without his designation, and that all elections, collations, and nominations must receive his confirmation. In this matter may be distinguished, (1.) The designation of the person by election or otherwise. (2.) The confirmation of this. (3.) The ordination or consecration of the person to his office, by which his character or authority is recognised. (4.) The authority by which he acts. Into each of these the Pope intrudes himself. (i.) He claims the disposal of all benefices; but not being able to deprive patrons of their nominations and corporations of their election, by his reservations, provisions, collation of vacancies apud sedem, resignations, devolutions, &c., he encroaches on the rights of all. (ii.) He pretends that no Bishop should be ordained without his licence. (iii.) He obliges the person ordained to swear allegiance to him. (iv.) He pretends that all Bishops are his ministers and deputies. Many quotations from Papal authorities might be given, to prove that these claims are made; and the practice of the Pontiffs shows their willingness to grasp all that they demand. Benedict XIV. affirms, that "the Pope hath authority over Bishops and Patriarchs, confirming and promoting them, and when necessary deposing them, and, what is more, instituting them anew, if he chooses, and suppressing those already instituted."* Clement IV. says, "Although the plenary disposal of all churches, parsonages, dignities, and other ecclesiastical benefices, be known to belong to the Pope of Rome;"† no such privileges are found in Scripture, primitive usage, or ancient canons. They originated in ambition and avarice; are obtained by usurpation; are upheld by violence; and are encroachments on the original rights and liberties of the church. This will appear from ancient customs concerning ordination to the ministry.

2. The first after our Lord's ascension, was that of Matthias. In this service all the disciples presented two; and out of these two God chose one, by determining the lot to fall on Matthias. (Acts i. 26.) So that this choice, partly human and partly divine, went by free election of the whole fraternity so far as it was human; and Peter assumed nothing peculiar to himself.

3. In the appointment of Deacons to attend to the duties of almoners, the Apostles committed the selection of the persons to the multitude of the disciples, who, having chosen them, presented them to the Apostles, who by prayer and imposition of hands ordained them. (Acts vi.) Peter performed nothing peculiar in this ordination.

4. In the Apostles' times Elders or Bishops were appointed in every city; between whom there was no difference. Immediately subsequent to the days of the Apostles, the title of Bishop was given to the senior Pastor, or to the Pastor in charge of the flock. Those were selected whom God had designated for the ministry. Eusebius declares, concerning John the Apostle in Asia, that "he set those apart for the Clergy, whom the Spirit had marked out."‡ And Clement of Rome further informs us, that this was done with the consent of the Christian people. He makes, however, no mention of the confirmation of the Pope.

5. In succeeding times the Bishops were chosen by the Presbyters and people. (1 Tim. iii. 10.) The Clergy proposed one, and the people approved, or, by their suffrages, elected another, after strict examination into his gifts, graces, and usefulness. This is alluded to by Tertullian, and others. "The most approved Elders preside over us, having obtained this honour, not by money, but by character; for with money is nothing pertaining to God purchased."* The ancient commentator, contemporary with Ambrose, and bearing the name of Ambrosiaster, conceived, that on the death of a Bishop the oldest of the Presbyters succeeded him.

6. Afterward, on the wider diffusion of the faith, Bishops were chosen by the people, Presbyters, and neighbouring Prelates. The mode seems to be something like the following. The neighbouring Bishops convened at the place where the vacancy had occurred. Then, in the congregation, the Clergy nominated a person, attesting his qualifications and good character. The people then tendered their suffrages of approval or disapproval. Afterward the Bishops present gave their decision. Finally, by prayer and imposition of hands, they consecrated the person thus approved.

Cyprian, the best author extant on the discipline of the Church, represents this as the mode of appointing Bishops in his day. It is, however, to be observed, that even in the times concerning which he speaks, there was considerable deviation from the primitive form of government, in which the Presbyters, Pastors, or Bishops, who fed the flock, were those who only had the right to govern it. The Prelates were then fast advancing toward that state, in which those bearing such an office no longer fed the flock, and therefore could not govern them; for their authority over the Pastors, the Elders, or primitive Bishops, was usurpation. The Presbyters, in the days of Cyprian, were the Bishops in the time of Polycarp, Ignatius, and Clement of Rome. Nevertheless, the testimony of Cyprian is valuable, as it records the state of things during that period of transition between the government of Pastors or Bishops in the days of the apostolic Fathers, and that of prelacy in times subsequent to those of Ignatius and Polycarp. Prelacy and episcopacy are essentially distinct.

The Bishop of Carthage says, "For which reason, whatever is collected from divine tradition and apostolic observation, is to be held, which also is held with us among almost all provinces. So that for duly celebrating ordinations for that people for whom a president should be ordained, all his neighbouring Prelates should be present, and the Bishop should be chosen by the people, who know best the life of all, and have witnessed the actions of each from their own observation. Which thing we see done with thee in the ordination of our colleague Sabinus, that from the suffrage of all the fraternity, and of the Bishops who were present, and who had sent letters to you concerning him, the episcopacy should be conferred on him."† "A people, obedient to the Lord's

[* "In Episcopos et Patriarchas auctoritatem habet, eos confirmans et promovens, et, si quando opus est, deponens, et quod magis est, de novo, si placuerit, instituens, et supprimens institutos." —Benedict. XIV., De Synodo Diœces., tom. i., lib. ii., cap. i., sect. i., p. 77. Mechlin., 1840.]

† "Licet ecclesiarum, personatuum, dignitatum, aliorumque beneficiorum ecclesiasticorum plenaria dispositio ad Romanum noscatur Pontificem pertinere; ita quod non solum ipsa cum vacant, potest de jure conferre; verum etiam jus in ipsis tribuere vacaturis."—Corp. Juris Canon., tom. i., Clem. IV. in Sext. Decret., lib. iii., tit. iv., cap. ii., p. 313. Paris, 1687.

[‡ "Cum post obitum tyranni ex insula Patmo Ephesum rediisset Joannes, ad finitimas quoque provincias rogatus se contulit, partim ut Episcopos constitueret, partim ut Ecclesias integras disponeret ac formaret, partim etiam ut homines sibi a divino Spiritu indicatos in Clerum quemdam seu 'sortem' Domini seponeret."—Euseb. Hist. Eccles., lib. iii., cap. xxiii., p. 113. Fol. Ed. Reading. Cantab., 1720.]

* "Præsident probati quique seniores, honorem istum non pretio sed testimonio adepti: neque enim pretio ulla res Dei constat."—Tertul., Oper., tom. i., Apologet. Adv. Gentes, cap. xxxix., p. 118. 8vo. Wirceb., 1780.

† "Propter quod diligenter de traditione divina et apostolica observatione servandum, est et tenendum, quod apud nos quoque et fere per provincias universas tenetur; ut ad ordinationes rite celebrandas, ad eam plebem cui præpositus ordinatur, Episcopi ejusdem provinciæ proximi quique conveniant, et Episcopus deligatur plebe præsente, quæ singulorum vitam plenissime novit, et uniuscujusque actum de ejus conversatione perspexit; quod et apud vos factum videmus in Sabini collegæ nostri ordinatione, ut de universæ frater-

commands, and fearing God, ought to separate itself from a wicked President, and not to mingle with the sacrifices of a sacrilegious Priest; seeing especially that the people hath the power either of choosing worthy Priests, or refusing unworthy ones; which thing also, we see, descends from divine authority; so that a Priest is to be chosen before the eyes of all, and in presence of the people; and he who is fit and worthy should be approved by public judgment and testimony."* "Moreover, when a Bishop is substituted in the place of one deceased, when he is chosen peaceably by the suffrage of all the people; whom if, according to the divine instructions, the whole fraternity would obey, no one would do any thing against the college of Priests; no one, after the divine judgment, after the suffrage of the people, after the consent of the fellow-Bishops, would make himself judge, not indeed of the Bishop, but of God."† "Cornelius was made Bishop by the judgment of God and his Christ, by the testimony of almost all the Clergy, by the suffrage of the people who were then present, and by the college of ancient Priests and good men."‡ "Cornelius being in the Catholic Church ordained by the judgment of God, and by the suffrage of the Clergy and people."§ "When a Bishop is once made, and is approved by the testimony and the judgment of his colleagues and of the people."‖

This practice was so notorious, that Alexander Severus, as Lampridius informs us,¶ chose to imitate it in appointing the Governors of provinces and other officers.

7. At, and even previous to, the Nicene Council, the ordination of Bishops was performed by the Metropolitan of the province, with the consent of the provincial assembly. Various canons of different Councils prove this. When Bishops were Ministers in charge of single congregations, or of a city and its vicinity, as was the case for the first two centuries, the people and assistant Clergy chose their President or Bishop. Afterward, when the Prelates ceased to be Pastors, and when metropolitan and provincial Synods governed, the suffrages of the people, Presbyters, and Pastors, were of little value in choosing Bishops. This was effected chiefly by the Bishops themselves in their provincial assemblies:—Nevertheless, both the Clergy and laity had a voice in choosing their chief Ministers; but it was only the shadow of what was exercised in primitive times. When the Emperors embraced Christianity, the government of the church was under their control; for by authoritatively commanding the Prelates, the people and Pastors were deprived of their ancient privileges.* In all the accounts given by Cyprian, and others who refer to the ordination of Bishops, no mention is made of any special act performed by the Diocesan of Rome on those occasions.

It is objected to the foregoing views, "that there are instances of Popes appointing and confirming Bishops." The following examples have been mentioned. Leo I. says, "that Anatolius, by the favour of his assent, obtained the bishopric of Constantinople."† The same Pontiff, writing to his Vicar, the Prelate of Thessalonica, says, that he should confirm the elections of Bishops by his authority.‡ He also confirmed Donatus over the African See: "We will that Donatus preside over the Lord's flock, upon condition that he remember to send us an account of his faith."§ Gregory I. also complained that a Bishop of Salonæ had been ordained without his knowledge.‖

We reply, that these instances tend to strengthen our argument, inasmuch as they are of late origin, few in number, and not pertinent to the question. If the Pope had the nitatis suffragio, et de Episcoporum, qui in præsentia convenerant, quique de eo ad vos literas fecerant, judicio, Episcopatus ei deferretur."—Cypr. Opera, Epist. lxvii., Ad Clerum et Plebes, p. 103. 8vo. Paris, 1836.

* "Plebs obsequens præceptis Dominicis, et Deum metuens, a peccatore præposito separare se debet, nec se ad sacrilegi Sacerdotis sacrificia miscere; quando ipsa maxime habeat potestatem vel eligendi dignos Sacerdotes, vel indignos recusandi; quod et ipsum videmus de divina auctoritate descendere; ut Sacerdos plebe præsente sub omnium oculis deligatur, et dignus atque idoneus publico judicio ac testimonio comprobetur."—Idem.

† "Ceterum quando Episcopus in locum defuncti substituitur, quando populi universi suffragio in pace deligitur—cui si secundum magisteria divina obtemperaret fraternitas universa, nemo adversum Sacerdotum collegium quicquam moveret; nemo post divinum judicium, post populi suffragium, post co-Episcoporum consensum, judicem se jam non Episcopi, sed Dei, faceret."—Idem, ep. liv., p. 71.

‡ "Factus est autem Cornelius Episcopus de Dei et Christi ejus judicio, de Clericorum pene omnium testimonio, de plebis quæ tunc affuit suffragio, et de Sacerdotum antiquorum et bonorum virorum collegio."—Idem, ep. li., p. 59.

§ "Cornelio in Catholica Ecclesia de Dei judicio et Cleri ac plebis suffragio ordinato."—Idem, ep. lxvi., p. 100.

‖ "Episcopo semel facto, et collegarum ac plebis testimonio et judicio comprobato."—Idem, ep. xl., ad Cornel.

¶ In Alex. Sever., cap. xlv.

[ "Unde etiam Constantinopolitanæ ecclesiæ recens, ut ita dicam, fundatæ, quam nuper ex hæreticorum blasphemia, tanquam ex leonis faucibus, adjuvante Dei misericordia eripuimus, reverendissimum ac religiosissimum Nectarium ordinavimus Episcopum, in Concilio universali, communi omnium consensu, coram religiosissimo Imperatore Theodosio, adstipulante omni Clero, et universa civitate."—Theodorit., Hist. Eccles., lib. v., cap. ix., p. 206. Fol. Ed. Reading. Cantab., 1720.

["Episcopus a duobus vel tribus Episcopis ordinetur."—Conc. Labb., tom. i., Can. Apost. i., col. 26, A. Paris, 1671.

["Episcopus ne ordinetur absque Synodo et præsentia Metropolitani provinciæ. Eo autem præsente, omnino melius est omnes una cum eo adesse, qui sunt in provincia ejusdem muneris officiique socii, et oportet per epistolam Metropolitanum eos convocare, et si omnes quidem accesserint, bene est."—Idem, tom. ii., Conc. Antioch., can. xix., col. 570, C.

["Ut Episcopi Metropolitanorum et eorum, qui sunt circumcirca, Episcoporum judicio, in ecclesiastico Magistratu constituantur, diu examinati, et in ratione fidei, et in rectæ rationis dispensatione."—Idem, tom. i., Conc. Laodic., can. xii., col. 1498, E.

["Ut nullus ordinetur Clericus, nisi probatus vel Episcoporum examine, vel populi testimonio."—Idem, tom. ii., Conc. Carth. III., can. xxii., col. 1170, D.

["Episcopum oportet maxime quidem ab omnibus qui sunt in provincia constitui:—eorum autem quæ fiunt, confirmationem in unaquaque provincia a Metropolitano fieri."—Idem, tom. ii., Conc. Nicæn., can. iv., col. 30, E.]

[* Barrow's Works, vol. vii., On the Supremacy, p. 475, et seq. 8vo. Oxford, 1830.]

[† "Satis sit prædicto, quod vestræ pietatis auxilio, et mei favoris assensu, Episcopatum tantæ urbis obtinuit."—Conc. Labb., tom. iv., Leonis Papæ I. Epist. liv., ad Marcian. August., col. 847, C. Paris, 1671.

["Ordinatio illa adversus Nicænos canones, apostolicos, et Constantinopolitanos ab Anatolio peracta esset: cui tamen Leo connivere voluit, ob pacis studium."—Petr. de Marca, De Concord. Sacerd. et Imperii, lib. iii., cap. xiv., sect. i., p. 180. Fol. Paris, 1669.]

[‡ "Cum ergo de summi Sacerdotis electione tractabitur, ille omnibus præponatur, quem Cleri plebisque consensus concorditer postularint; ita ut si in aliam forte personam partium se vota diviserint, Metropolitani judicio is alteri præferatur, qui majoribus et studiis juvatur et meritis, tantum ut nullus invitis et non petentibus ordinetur; ne civitas Episcopum non optatum aut contemnat aut oderit, et fiat minus religiosa quam convenit, cui non licuit habere quem voluit."—Conc. Labb., tom. iii., Leonis Papæ I. Epist. lxxxiv., ad Anastasium, col. 1385, A. Paris, 1671.]

[§ "Donatum—ita Dominico volumus gregi præsidere, ut libellum fidei suæ ad nos meminerit dirigendum."—Idem, Epist. lxxxvii., Ad Episc. Afric., col. 1394, B.]

[‖ "Salonitanæ civitatis Episcopus me ac responsali meo nesciente ordinatus est, et facta res est, quæ sub nullis anterioribus principibus evenit."—Idem, tom. v., Gregorii Papæ I. Epist., lib. iv., Ep. xxxiv., ad Const. August., col. 1189, D.]

power of constituting Bishops, more numerous instances of an early date could be produced. History would abound with such cases, had they existed, as the appointment of a Bishop was a matter of constant occurrence, and striking notoriety. At least one instance might be found before the time of Leo I., who was chosen Pope A. D. 440, and died A. D. 461. Again: confirmation in early times meant no more than approbation: hence Sozomen says, "The Alexandrians rendered their churches to Peter, being returned from Rome, with the letters of Damasus, which confirmed both the Nicene decrees and his ordination."* Here confirmation evidently implies approval; for the decrees of that Synod needed not the ratification of the Pope, being duly established without it. We refer to some instances which have been adduced.

Anatolius obtained the bishopric of Constantinople, by the help of the Emperor, and the favour of the Pope.† What then? The following: Anatolius was put into that see in the room of Flavian, by the influence of Dioscorus, and aided the Eutychian faction. Nevertheless Leo, out of regard to the Emperor's interference, acknowledged Anatolius, though he was unscripturally placed in the bishopric, and was heretical and schismatic. This was the favourable assent or confirmation exercised by Leo; and what does it signify?

Again: Leo did not reject Maximus, Bishop of Antioch, from communion, nor did he attempt to invalidate his ordination, though it was open to exception. He forbore to quarrel with him, though not duly or regularly ordained; and this any other Bishop might have done as well as the Pope. Leo also enjoined the Prelate of Thessalonica to recognise and establish ordinations, because it belonged to him as Metropolitan, according to the canons, to confirm those in his province, or as Primate in his diocess. It pertained to him, as the Pope's Vicar in those territories to which the Pontiff had extended his usurped jurisdiction, to execute his orders; but what is this when compared with universal authority? Illyricum was subject to the Pope's jurisdiction.

8. With regard to the appointment of Bishops, we maintain the position, that irregular proceedings, or usurpations of power, do not confer a right. There are numerous instances of Prelates interfering with ordinations, who did not pretend to universal jurisdiction; and it would be ridiculous to infer from thence that they had a right so to do. It was objected to Athanasius, "that he presumed to ordain in cities which did not belong to him."‡ Eusebius, of Constantinople, obtruded Eusebius Emissenus into the see of Alexandria.§ Eustathius, of Antioch, ordained Evagrius Bishop of Constantinople.‖ Euzoius delivered to Lucius the bishopric of Alexandria.* Lucifer, a Sardinian Prelate, ordained Paulinus to the diocess of Antioch.† We need not be told, that these irregular ordinations were celebrated by the Legates of the Pope: historians say no such thing. The Pontiff would have been anathematized, had he sent his deputies on such an errand.

Other instances may be referred to of irregular ordination, in which Bishops, who had no canonical authority, ordained others who were not within their jurisdiction. Theognis and Theodorus constituted Macedonius Bishop of Constantinople. Theophilus of Alexandria ordained Chrysostom. The Egyptian Prelates clandestinely installed Maximus, the Cynic philosopher, into the diocess of Constantinople. Acacius forced Eudoxius into the same see.‡ Meletius, of Antioch, placed Gregory Nazianzen in charge of that diocess.§ Acacius and Patrophilus ejected Maximus from the see of Jerusalem, and placed Cyril in his room.

9. To prevent such irregularities creeping into the church, the second General Council, held A. D. 381, ordained that no Bishop should interfere with ordinations out of his own diocess. In the exercise of this law, the Pope was often frustrated in his attempts to go beyond the proper limit of his authority. Innocent I. sent Bishops to Constantinople, to procure a Synod to examine into the case of Chrysostom: his messengers received the following treatment:—Those of Constantinople caused them to be dismissed with disgrace, as molesting a government over which they had no control.‖ In the western parts, after the Pontiff had obtruded himself into most countries, so as to obtain an influence in their transactions, he did not generally interfere with ordinations. "We do not," Leo I. distinctly declared, "arrogate to ourselves a power of ordaining in your provinces."

In some parts of Italy, so late as the ninth century, the Pope did not confirm Bishops. This may be inferred from the submission of the Diocesan of Ravenna, under Nicholas I., who ascended the Papal throne A. D. 858, and died A. D. 867. It is determined, "that the Prelate of Ravenna should have no power to consecrate Bishops canonically elected in the region of Flaminia, unless it were granted to him by letters from the Apostolic See." ¶

10. If examples were of any avail in determining what is right, there are more numerous and clear instances of Emperors and Kings interposing in the ordination and appointment of Bishops, than Popes themselves. "And Zadok the Priest did the King put in the room of Abiathar." (1 Kings ii. 35.) Constantine placed a Bishop in Antioch in the room of Eustathius. On the retreat of Gregory Nazianzen from Constantinople, Theodosius the Emperor "commanded the Prelates to write on paper the names of those whom each approved worthy to be

[* "Alexandrini—qui, cum forte Petrus eo tempore ab urbe Roma reversus esset cum literis Damasi, quibus et Nicæni Concilii decreta, et ordinatio ipsius confirmabatur, ecclesias ei tradiderunt."—Sozom., Hist. Eccles., lib. vi., cap. xxxix., p. 277. Fol. Ed. Reading. Cantab., 1720.]

[† Vide supra.]

[‡ "Certe, et hoc crimen ei objecerunt adversarii, quod in urbibus nullatenus ad ipsum pertinentibus," &c.—Sozom., Hist. Eccles., lib. iii., cap. xxi., p. 127.]

[§ "Eusebius Constantinopolitanus Episcopus ad capessendam Alexandrinæ ecclesiæ administrationem eum adhortatus est."—Idem, lib. iii., cap. vi., p. 99.]

[‖ "Homousiani vero opportunum sibi tempus oblatum rati, quemdam fidei suæ virum, Evagrium nomine, elegerunt: eumque ordinavit Eustathius, olim Antiochiæ Episcopus."—Socrat. Hist. Eccles., lib. iv., cap. xiv., p. 230. Fol. Ed. Reading. Cantab., 1720.]

[* "Quam occasionem opportune sibi oblatam arripiens Euzoius, qui tum apud Antiochiam Arianæ præerat ecclesiæ, ambivit ut ipse Alexandriam mitteretur, quo ejus loci ecclesias Locio Ariano traderet."—Idem, cap. xxi., p. 235.]

[† "Lucifer ergo cum Paulinum illis Episcopum ordinasset, inde discessit."—Idem, lib. iii., cap. vi., p. 177.]

[‡ Barrow's Works, vol. vii., On the Supremacy, p. 485, et seq. 8vo. edit. Oxford, 1830.]

[§ Socrat., Hist. Eccles., lib. vii., cap. ii. Fol. Cantab., 1720.]

[‖ "Atque hos quidem, utpote qui externo Imperatori molesti fuissent, cum ignominia dimitti curarunt."—Sozom. Hist. Eccles., lib. viii., cap. xxviii.]

[¶ "Et ne electos etiam canonice in Flaminia Episcopos consecrandi facultatem haberet, nisi id sibi a Sede Apostolica literis concederetur."—Platina, De Vitis Pont. In Nicol. Papa I., p. 139. Coloniæ, 1568.]

 Euseb., De Vita Constant., lib. iii., cap. lix. Fol. Cantab., 1720.

ordained, and reserved to himself the choice of one." * Accordingly, after they had nominated several, "he delivered the see of Constantinople to Eusebius of Nicomedia." † Constantius was angry with Macedonius, because he was ordained without his licence.‡ He "rejected Eleusius and Sylvanus, and ordered others to be substituted in their places." § Anterior to the time of Ambrose, the see of Milan being vacant, a Synod of Bishops entreated the Emperor to elect one.‖ Flavian addressed the Emperor Theodosius, "Give, O King, the see of Antioch to whom you shall think good."¶ The Emperor also called Nestorius from that city to the see of Constantinople, and he was, as Vincentius Lirinensis declares, elected by the Emperor's judgment.

The favour of Justinian advanced Menas to the see of Constantinople; and the same preferred Eutyches thereto. In Spain the Kings elected Bishops by the decrees of the Council of Toledo.†† The Emperor Charles confirmed Bishops, as Pope John VIII. testifies, and reproves the Archbishop of Verdun for rejecting a Prelate "whom the Clergy and people of the city had chosen, and whom the Emperor had confirmed by his consent." ‡‡ When Macarius of Antioch was deposed by the sixth Council, the Bishops of the diocess requested the Presidents of that Synod to suggest another to the Emperor to be placed in his room.§§ In Gratian several instances are recorded wherein Popes declared, that they could not ordain Bishops to churches, even in Italy, without the leave of the Emperor. There are, in later times, other decrees, made by Pontiffs of a different description, which forbid Princes interfering with the election of Prelates.‖‖ The Emperors, for a long period, enjoyed the privilege of appointing and confirming the Bishops of Rome. Platina, in the Life of Pelagius II., elected A. D. 578, says, "Nothing was then done by the Clergy in electing a Pope, unless the Emperor approved of the choice."¶¶

It is affirmed, that "Adrian, with his whole Council, delivered to Charles the Great the right and power of electing the Pope, and of ordaining to the Apostolic See. He defined that Archbishops and Bishops in every province should receive investiture from him; and that if a Bishop were not commended and invested by the King, he should be consecrated by none; and that whoever acted contrary to this decree, he would bind in the bond of anathema." * Leo VIII. attributed the like privilege to Otho I.: "We give him for ever power to ordain a successor and Bishop of the chief Apostolic See, and to change Archbishops." † And Platina, in his Life of that Pontiff, says, that "being weary of the inconstancy of the Romans, he transferred all authority to choose a Pope from the Clergy and people of Rome to the Emperor." ‡

Now, if this power of confirming Bishops belonged to the Pope by divine institution, how could he consistently part with it, or cause it to be transferred to others? This would be a renunciation of what is termed divine right. It is, however, notorious that most Christian Princes invested Bishops until the time of Gregory VII., who was installed A. D. 1073. Temporal Princes possessed this right according to the usages of the times, not merely as such, but as patrons, founders, benefactors, and protectors of the church.

11. General Councils have decided on the appointment and confirmation of Bishops. The second General Synod confirmed the ordination of Nestorius, Bishop of Constantinople, and of Flavian, Prelate of Antioch, although the Roman Church opposed both.§ The fifth Council recognised the ordination of Theophanius, Prelate of Antioch. The Council of Pisa chose Alexander V., Basil elected Felix V., and that of Constance, Martin V.

12. All Catholic Bishops, in ancient times, might, and generally did, confirm the elections and ordinations of Bishops to the same extent as the Popes; that is, they signified their approbation of the orthodoxy of their faith, the purity of their morals, and the regularity of their ordination, by admitting them to the communion of peace and charity, and to an interchange of good offices, which they expressed by κοινωνικαι επιστολαι, "letters of communion," in answer to certain synodical communicatory epistles. Cyprian, and all the Bishops of that age, thus confirmed the ordination of Cornelius.‖ Bishops, however, were complete as such before they gave that account of themselves; so that it was out of the power of the Pope, or of any other, to reverse their ordination, or dispossess them of their diocess.

IX. It does not pertain to the Pope to censure, suspend, or depose Bishops or Pastors.

1. This authority the Pope says he claims by divine prerogative. Innocent III. declared, "Therefore these three

[* "Haud multo post, cum Imperator mandasset Episcopis, ut nomina eorum quos quisque Episcopatu dignos judicaret, in charta præscriberent, unumque ex omnibus eligendi facultatem sibi ipse reservasset, alii quidem aliorum nomina præscripserunt."—Sozom. Hist. Eccles., lib. vii., cap. viii.]

[† "Eusebio vero Nicomediæ Episcopo sedem Constantinopolitanam tradidit."—Idem, lib. iii., cap. iv.]

‡ Idem, lib. iii., cap. vii. Fol. Cantab., 1720.

[§ "Illos quidem ecclesiis suis expulit; alios vero in eorum locum substitui præcepit."—Theod. Hist. Eccles., lib. ii., cap. xxvii., p. 112. Fol. Cantab., 1720.]

‖ Idem, lib. iv., cap. vii.

[¶ "Da igitur, Imperator, cui voles sedem Antiochenam."—Idem, lib. v., cap. xxiii., p. 225.]

 Evagrii Hist. Eccles., lib. iv., cap. xxxviii. Fol. Cantab., 1720.

†† Conc. Labb., tom. vi., Conc. Toletan. XII., capit. vi. Paris, 1671.

[‡‡ "Quem Clerus et populus civitatis elegerat, piæque memoriæ Carolus Imperator suo consensu firmaverat."—Idem, tom. ix., Johan. Papæ VIII. epist. lxx., col. 56, A.]

§§ Idem, tom. vi., Conc. Constant. III., act. xii.

‖‖ Corp. Juris Canon., tom. i., distinct. lxiii., cap. ix. Fol. Paris, 1695.

[¶¶ "Nihil a Clero in eligendo Pontifice actum erat, nisi ejus electionem Imperator approbasset."—Platina, De Vitis Pont., in Pelag. II., p. 81. Fol. Coloniæ, 1568.]

[* "Hadrianus autem Papa cum universa Synodo tradiderunt jus et potestatem eligendi Pontificem, et ordinandi Apostolicam Sedem—insuper Archiepiscopos et Episcopos per singulas provincias ab eo investituram accipere definivit; et nisi a Rege laudetur et investiatur Episcopus, a nemine consecretur; et quicunque contra hoc decretum ageret, anathematis vinculo eum innodavit."—Corp. Juris Canon., tom. i., dist. lxiii., cap. xxii. Fol. Paris, 1695.]

[† "Largimur Domino Othoni primo Regi Teutonicorum, ejusque successoribus hujus regni Italiæ in perpetuum, facultatem eligendi successorem, atque summæ Sedis Apostolicæ Pontificem ordinandi, ac per hoc Archiepiscopos seu Episcopos, ut ipsi ab eo investituram accipiant," &c.—Idem, a Pithœo, tom. i., distinct. lxiii., cap. xxiii.]

[‡ "Qui statim, Romanorum inconstantiæ pertæsus, authoritatem omnem eligendi Pontificis a Clero populoque Romano ad Imperatorem transtulit."—Platina, De Vitis Pont. In Leo. Papæ VIII., p. 154. Fol. Coloniæ, 1568.]

§ Theodoriti Hist. Eccles., lib. v., cap. ix. Fol. Cantab., 1720.

[‖ "Cum locus Petri et gradus cathedræ sacerdotalis vacaret; occupato de Dei voluntate atque omnium nostrum consensione firmato."—Cypriani Opera, epist. li., Ad Antonian., p. 59. 8vo. Paris, 1836.

[" Ad comprobandam ordinationem tuam facta auctoritate majore, tunc demum scrupulo omni de singulorum pectoribus excusso, per omnes omnino in provincia ista positos literæ fierent, sicuti fiunt, ut te universi collegæ nostri et communicationem tuam, id est, Catholicæ Ecclesiæ unitatem pariter et caritatem, probarent firmiter ac tenerent."—Idem, epist. xliv., Ad Cornel.]

things, (the translation, confirmation, and deposition of Bishops,) which we have premised, are reserved to the Roman Bishop, not so much by canonical, as by divine, institution." * The Council of Trent also granted this power to the Pope. "The more weighty criminal causes against Bishops, though it should be heresy, (which may God avert!) and which are worthy of deposition or deprivation, are taken cognizance of and terminated by the Roman Pontiff alone." † Such authority did not anciently, either by custom or canon, much less by divine right, belong to the Pontiff; because,

2. Deposition of Bishops was effected by provincial, patriarchal, or diocesan Synods. In them causes were discussed, and sentences pronounced. It was thus resolved in the Council of Nice. ‡ The African assembly urged the same, in their letter to Celestine, in the following words:—"Whether they be Clergy of an inferior degree, or whether they be Bishops, the Nicene decrees have most plainly committed them to the Metropolitan's charge; for they have most prudently and justly discovered, that all matters whatsoever ought to be determined in the places where they take their rise." § The same law was recognised and enacted by the Councils of Antioch, Constantinople, Chalcedon, &c.; and we have numerous examples wherein these laws were carried into execution.

Paul of Samosata, for his error on the divinity of Christ, and scandalous conduct, was deposed by the Council of Antioch. ‖ Eustathius, Bishop of that see, was removed by another Synod convened at the same place. ¶ Eustathius, Prelate of Sebastia, was set aside by the Council of Gangra.  A Synod at Constantinople deposed Marcellus, Bishop of Ancyra, for heterodoxy in reference to the divinity of Christ. †† Photinus, Bishop of Sirmium, was deposed by a Council held in that city, at the command of the Emperor. ‡‡ Athanasius was tried and condemned by the Synod of Tyre, though the sentence is generally considered unjust. Chrysostom was deposed, though unjustly, by an assembly at Constantinople. The Bishops at Antioch, according to the Emperor's order, deposed Stephen, Prelate of that place, for a wicked contrivance against the fame of Euphratas and Vincentius. §§ In all these condemnations, censures, and depositions, the Bishop of Rome had no concern. The proceedings were conducted on the supposition, that, according to the canons or existing laws of the church, such decisions were to be passed by Synods. It is said of Chrysostom, that, in connexion with this Council, he deposed fifteen Bishops. *

3. In some cases, Bishops, as defenders of the faith, and executioners of the canons, deposed others, by not allowing wicked or heretical Prelates to be capable of holding offices, presuming that their places were ipso facto void. This shows that vestiges of the primitive Episcopacy or pastorship, which existed in the ages immediately succeeding the Apostles, had still some hold on the church.

Gelasius proposed as a regulation, "That not only a Metropolitan, but every other Bishop, had a right to separate any persons or any place from the Catholic communion, according to the rule by which his heresy was condemned." † On this account the Bishops of Rome quarrelled with those of Constantinople for a long time, because they did not reject Acacius from the number of Prelates, in consequence of communicating with heretics. Cyprian rejected Marcian, Bishop of Arles, for adhering to the Novatians. ‡ Athanasius deposed Arian Bishops, and substituted others. § Acacius and his associates deposed Macedonius and other mitred heads. ‖ Indeed, the Bishops of those times deposed each other on various occasions. ¶ Maximus, Bishop of Jerusalem, deposed Athanasius. Eusebius, of Nicomedia, threatened to deprive Alexander of Constantinople, unless he would admit Arius to communion.  Acacius and his coadjutors ejected Maximus, Bishop of Jerusalem. He also deposed Cyril of Jerusalem, and many others at Constantinople. †† Cyril deposed Nestorius; and Nestorius, in his turn, Cyril and Memnon. ‡‡ Cyril and Juvenalis deposed John of Antioch; and John of Antioch, with his Bishops, as in duty bound, did the same office for Cyril and Memnon. §§ Stephen, writing concerning Bassianus, says: "Because he had entered into the church with swords; therefore he was expelled out of it again by the holy Fathers, both by Leo of Rome, the imperial city, and by Flavianus; by the Bishop of Alexandria, and also by the Prelate of Antioch." ‖‖ Cyprian affirms, that when "any Diocesan becomes heretical, or tears and spoils the flock of Christ, the rest may succour, and gather together the sheep of our Lord into one company." ¶¶ The same doctrine was taught by Celestine I., in an epistle to the Ephesine Council.  The nature of the censures of these times consisted in disowning persons who were guilty of heresy, schism, or immoral acts; and in refusing to hold communion with them.

* "Et ideo tria hæc quæ præmisimus, non tam constitutione canonica, quam institutione divina, soli sunt Romano Pontifici reservata."—Corp. Juris Canon., tom. ii., Innocent. Papæ III. in Greg. IX. Decret., lib. i., tit. vii., cap. ii. Fol. Paris, 1695.

† "Causæ criminales graviores contra Episcopos, etiam hæresis, (quod absit,) quæ depositione aut privatione dignæ sunt, ab ipso tantum summo Romano Pontifice cognoscantur et terminentur."—Can. et Decret. Conc. Trid., sess. xxiv., Decret. de Reformat., cap. v. Fol. Romæ, 1564.

‡ Conc. Labb., tom. ii., Conc. Nicæn., can. v., col. 30, E. Paris, 1671. Vide supra, p. 655.

§ "Decreta Nicæna sive inferioris gradus Clericos, sive ipsos Episcopos suis Metropolitanis apertissime commiserunt; prudentissime enim justissimeque providerunt quæcunque negotia in suis locis ubi orta finienda."—Idem, tom. ii., Conc. African. Epist. ad Celest. I., col. 1675; C.

‖ Euseb. Hist. Eccles., lib. vii., cap. xxx. Fol. Cantab., 1720. Socrat. Hist. Eccles., lib. i., cap. xxiv. Fol. Cantab., 1720.

¶ Sozom. Eccles. Hist., lib. ii., cap. xix. Fol. Cantab., 1720.

 Socrat. Hist. Eccles., lib. ii., cap. xliii. Fol. Cantab., 1720.

†† Sozom. Hist. Eccles., lib. iii., cap. xiv. Fol. Cantab., 1720. Socrat. Hist. Eccles., lib. i., cap. xxxvi. Fol. Cantab., 1720.

‡‡ Idem, lib. ii., cap. xxix.

§§ Theodoriti Hist. Eccles., lib. ii., cap. x. Fol. Cantab., 1720.

* "Δεκαπεντε επισκοπους καθειλεν."—Conc. Labb., tom. iv., Conc. Chalced., act. xi., col. 684. Paris, 1671.

[† "Quod non solum Præsuli Apostolico facere licet, sed cuicumque Pontifici, ut quoslibet et quemlibet locum, secundum regulam hæreseos ipsius ante damnatæ, a Catholica communione discernant."—Idem, Gelas. Papæ I. epist. iv., col. 1169, A.]

[‡ "Idcirco enim, frater carissime, copiosum corpus est Sacerdotum concordiæ mutuæ glutino atque unitatis vinculo copulatum, ut si quis ex collegio nostro hæresim facere et gregem Christi lacerare et vastare tentaverit, subveniant cæteri, et quasi Pastores utiles et misericordes oves Dominicas in gregem colligant."—Cypriani Opera, epist. lxvi., ad Stephanum, p. 101. 8vo. edit. Paris, 1836.]

§ Sozom. Hist. Eccles., lib. iii., cap. xxi. Cantab., 1720.

‖ Socrat. Hist. Eccles., lib. ii., cap. xlii. Cantab., 1720.

¶ Idem, cap. xxiv.

 Idem, lib. i., cap. xxxvii.

†† Idem, lib. ii., cap. xxxviii. Theodoriti Hist. Eccles., lib. ii., cap. xxvi. Fol. Cantab., 1720.

‡‡ Socrat. Hist. Eccles., lib. vii., cap. xxxiv. Cantab., 1720.

§§ Sozom. Hist. Eccles., lib. iv., cap. xxiv. Cantab., 1720.

‖‖ Conc. Labb., tom. iv., Conc. Chalced., act. xi., col. 692. Paris, 1671.

¶¶ Cypriani Opera, epist. lxvi. Ad Stephanum. Vide supra.

 Conc. Labb., tom. iii., Conc. Ephes., act. ii., col. 614. Paris, 1671.

In case of heresy, schism, or immorality, every Christian had a right to desert his Bishop. John of Jerusalem becoming erroneous in faith, Epiphanius wrote to the Monks of Palestine, "not to communicate with him, until they were satisfied of his orthodoxy."* For the same reason Jerome, while living in Palestine, declined communion with its Patriarch, asking him, "if it were said anywhere to him, or commanded, that without satisfaction concerning his faith, they were bound to maintain communion with him?"†

5. If any Pope assumed more than the canons allowed, or was usual to other Bishops of his rank, it was considered an irregularity and an usurpation. Nor would examples of extravagant proceedings in a Pope give him a right any more than other factious Bishops. Whenever the Pope attempted this, his power was disavowed as illegal and novel. Other Bishops have deposed Popes.‡ The orientals, at Sardica, deprived Julius, for fostering heretics and others who had been condemned by Synods.

6. In ancient times, on important occasions, the Pontiffs did not presume to depose Bishops, without the joint authority of Synods.§ This was the case of Julius, in the deposition of Eusebius of Nicomedia; of Innocent, in that of Theophilus and his coadjutors for wrongfully deposing Chrysostom. Leo I., without the assistance of a Synod, did not attempt to try Dioscorus, who favoured Eutyches, and persecuted the orthodox. We are safe in concluding, therefore, that Popes would frequently have deposed Bishops, had it been regular for them so to do.

What has been done in this matter by Popes in conjunction with others, or with Synods, is not to be ascribed to the authority of the Pontiffs as such. It might be accomplished by their influence, but not by their power. The Council of Sardica, and not Pope Julius, corrected the opponents of Athanasius; that of Chalcedon, and not Pope Leo, deposed Dioscorus; the Roman Synod, and not Celestine, censured Nestorius; that of Ephesus deposed him.

7. If examples were arguments of right, there would be other pretenders to the deposing power besides the Pope. Particular Bishops would claim it. The people would exercise the authority; for they have occasionally done so. Of Constantine, Platina says, "At length he is deposed by the people of Rome, being very much excited by anger, and the disgrace of the case." There are numerous instances of Bishops being removed or deposed by the imperial authority. Constantine the Great "commanded Eusebius and Theogonius to depart out of the cities over which they presided as Bishops."‖ He threatened also to depose Athanasius.¶ Constantius deposed Paul of Constantinople,* and ejected all who would not subscribe to the creed of Ariminum.† The Emperor Leo set aside Timotheus Ælurus, for which Leo the Pontiff commended him.‡ Justinian banished Anastasius, Bishop of Antioch; and expelled Anthimus of Constantinople, and Theodosius of Alexandria.§ Constantius banished Liberius, and caused another to be put in his room. Otho expelled John XII.; and Justinian banished Vigilius, and deposed Sylverius. During the period of the regal or imperial form of church polity, no great Patriarch was finally condemned without the authority or leave of the Emperor. Flavian was supported by Theodosius against the Pope. Dioscorus maintained his standing by the power of Theodosius, junior; and the deposition of Dioscorus, in the Synod of Chalcedon, was voted with the following reserve:—"If it shall please our most sacred and pious Lord." The Emperors deposed all Prelates who were not ordained according to their laws. Justinian, having laid down conditions, and required qualifications, concerning Bishops, subjoins: "But if any be ordained without using our forementioned constitution, we command you that by all means he be removed from his bishopric."‖

8. The examples adduced by the advocates of the supremacy, to prove that to the Pope belongs exclusively the power of deposing Bishops, are not satisfactory.

(1.) They allege the case of Marcian, Bishop of Arles, concerning whom Cyprian exhorts Stephen to direct letters to the Bishop of Gaul, and to the people of Arles, that Marcian should be set aside, and another elected. His words are: "Let letters be addressed to the province and the people living in Arles, by which, on the expulsion of Marcian, another Prelate may be chosen in his place."¶ On this case we remark: Shortly after the election of Stephen, A. D. 253, he received an epistle from Faustinus, Bishop of Lyons, in the name of the Gallic Prelates, informing him that Marcian, of Arles, had embraced the doctrine of Novatian. They wrote to Cyprian at the same time on that subject; not anxious to adopt any vigorous measures against their colleague Marcian, without the advice and approbation of other Prelates, especially those of Rome and Carthage; the former being eminent for the dignity of his see, and the latter for his zeal, piety, and learning. Faustinus did not find in the Bishop of Rome the concurrence he anticipated; and therefore wrote a second letter to Cyprian, exhorting him to animate the other by his example. Cyprian wrote to Stephen, pressing him to send letters to the

[* "Cunctis Monachis ab eodem Epiphanio scripta venerunt, ut absque satisfactione fidei nullus ei temere communicaret."—Hieron. Opera, tom. iv., epist. xxxviii., (alias lxi.,) ad Pammach., col. 332. Ed. Bened. Paris, 1706.]

[† "Alicubine dictum aut tibi alicubi mandatum est, quod sine satisfactione fidei communionem tuam subiremus?"—Idem, col. 331.

["Quod tibi non communicavimus fidei est."—Idem, col. 333.]

[‡ Sozom. Hist. Eccles., lib. iii., cap. xi. Cantab., 1720.]

[§ "An qui in hominem Imperatorem peccasse dicebantur, nulla interveniente Synodo, dejici debuerunt."—Conc. Labb., tom. iv., Gelasii Papæ I. epist. xiii., ad Episc. Dardaniæ, col. 1199. Paris, 1671.]

[‖ "Et Eusebium quidem ac Theogonium ex civitatibus in quibus erant Episcopi, exulari jussit."—Sozom., Hist. Eccles., lib. i., cap. xxi. Fol. Cantab., 1720. "Isti ergo eo tempore depositi et ex civitatibus suis ejecti fuere."—Theodorit. Hist. Eccles., lib. i., cap. xx.]

[¶ "Nam si quemquam eorum qui ecclesiæ sociari expetunt impeditum esse abs te et aditu prohibitum intellexero, mittam continuo aliquem, qui, mandatis meis obsequens, te deponat et extra patriam tuam deportet."—Socrat., Hist. Eccles., lib. i., cap. xxvii. Fol. Cantab., 1720.]

["Cum igitur mentis meæ sententiam intelligas, omnibus, qui ecclesiam intrare postulant, aditum inoffensum præbebis; quod si prohibueris quempiam, qui se ecclesiæ participem velit, aut si excluseris ab ingressu, mittam continuo cum meis mandatis, qui te deponant, et in alium locum deportent."—Athanas. Opera, tom. i., Apolog. ad Imp. Constant., p. 778, B. Colon., 1686.]

[* Socrat., Hist. Eccles., lib. ii., cap. vi. Fol. Cantab., 1720.]

[† Idem, cap. xxxvii.]

[‡ Evagrii Hist. Eccles., lib. ii., cap. xi. Fol. Cantab., 1720. [Conc. Labb., tom. iii., Leonis Pap. I. epist. xcix., Ad Leonem August., col. 1436. Paris, 1671.]

[§ Evagrii Hist. Eccles., lib. iv., cap. xi., xli. Fol. Cantab., 1720.]

‖ "Si quis autem citra memoratam observationem Episcopus ordinetur, jubemus hunc omnibus modis episcopatu depelli."—Justin. Novell. Constitut., cap. i. 8vo. 1567.

¶ "Dirigantur in provinciam et ad plebem Arelatense consistentem a te literæ, quibus abstento Marciano alius in ejus locum substituatur."—Cypr. Opera, epist. lxvi., Ad Stephanum, p. 100. 8vo. edit. Paris, 1836.]

Bishops of Gaul, exhorting them to depose Marcian, and to elect another. This is a plain statement. On the Roman Catholic version of the case, we observe, that Faustinus and the Bishops of Gaul did not on this occasion apply to Stephen only, but also to Cyprian. If, therefore, their application to the Bishop of Rome be construed into a tacit acknowledgment of his universal jurisdiction, the like construction may be put on their address to the Bishop of Carthage.

The case was not referred to Stephen or to Cyprian for adjudication, but rather for advice and approbation. Stephen hesitated; and therefore Cyprian, in a letter, pressed him to encourage, by his epistles, the people of Arles, and the Bishops of Gaul, to depose Marcian, and appoint another. This was a plain acknowledgment, that not in the Diocesan of Rome, but in the people and Clergy, dwelt the power of deposing one Prelate, and appointing another.

Cyprian does not ascribe to the Pope any peculiar authority, but one that was common, and which he and all other Bishops might exercise. He says in the same epistle, "It is our part to provide and succour in such a case; therefore the body of the Priests is so numerous, that by joint endeavour they may suppress heresies and schisms;" and exhorts Stephen to aid the French Prelates, "that they would not suffer Marcian to insult the college of Bishops."*

We subjoin the solution of this case by Rigaltius, a learned Roman Catholic, in his note on Cyprian: "In this case of Marcianus, Prelate of Arles, if the right of excommunication did belong solely to the Bishop of Rome, wherefore did Faustinus, Diocesan of Lyons, advertise Cyprian, Bishop of Carthage, who was so far distant, concerning those very things touching Marcianus, which both Faustinus himself and others of the same province had before sent word of to Stephen, Bishop of Rome, who lived nearest, being, moreover, the chief of all? It must either be said, that this was done because of Stephen's negligence; or, what is more probable, according to the discipline then used in the church, that all Bishops of neighbouring places, but especially those presiding over the most eminent cities, should join their counsels for the welfare of the church, and that the Christian religion might not receive the least damage in any of its affairs whatsoever: hence it was that in the case of Marcianus of Arles, the Bishop of Lyons forwarded letters to those of Rome and Carthage; and again, that he of Carthage, as being most remote, did write to the Prelate of Rome, as being his brother and colleague, who, by reason of his propinquity, might more easily know and judge of the whole mattter." † Other instances are comparatively of a later date, and therefore not of such weight in the case.

(2.) It is alleged, as an example, that Flavianus, Bishop of Antioch, was deposed by Damasus. The true state of that case is as follows:—The excellent Flavianus was substituted in the place of Meletius by the college of Bishops.* A party adhered to Paulinus, and, after his death, chose Evagrius, and ordained him, in opposition to the canons of the church. The Pope and Roman Prelates joined with this faction, and used their influence in vain with the Emperor against Flavian, so that he, after duly considering the case, left Flavian in quiet possession of his see. Here is nothing stated concerning the deposing power of the Pontiff; but only of his associating with the schismatical party. Several other instances are alleged by the Papal theologians, such as Nestorius by Celestine I., Polychronius of Jerusalem by Sextus III.; Dioscorus of Alexandria by Leo; Anthimus of Constantinople, A. D. 536, by Agapetus; Acacius by Felix III.; Pyrrhus and Paul by Theodore, &c.†

X. The Popes cannot restore censured, suspended, or deposed Bishops.

1. This power is nevertheless claimed by and ascribed to them by the advocates of the supremacy. Baronius says, "It is a privilege of the Church of Rome exclusively, that a Bishop deposed by a Synod may, without another Synod of a greater number, be restored by the Pope."‡ Gelasius I. says, "that the Apostolic See of St. Peter has a right of loosing whatever the sentences of other Bishops have bound; that the Apostolic See, according to frequent ancient custom, had a power, no Synod preceding, to absolve those whom a Synod had unjustly condemned, and without a Council to condemn those who deserved it."§ But that such power did not formerly belong to them is evident, because,

2. There is no ancient custom or canon in the church which authorizes it.

3. The decrees of provincial, in primitive times, and of diocesan, Synods, subsequently, were inconsistent with such a power. The decisions concerning Episcopal causes were deemed irrevocable; and consequently no power of reversing their conclusions was reserved to the Pontiff.

[* "Cui rei nostrum est consulere et subvenire, frater carissime, qui, divinam clementiam cogitantes et gubernandæ ecclesiæ libram tenentes, sic censur amvigoris peccatoribus exhibemus, ut tamen lapsis erigendis et curandis vulneratis bonitatis et misericordiæ divinæ medicinam non denegemus. Quapropter facere te oportet plenissimas literas ad co-Episcopos nostros in Galliis constitutos, ne ultra Marcianum pervicacem et superbum et divinæ pietatis ac fraternæ salutis inimicum collegio nostro insultare patiantur."—Cypr. Opera, epist. lxvi., Ad Stephanum, p. 103. 8vo. edit. Paris, 1836.]

[† "In hac Marciani Episcopi Arelatensis causa, si jus abstinendi sive excommunicandi competebat soli Episcopo Romano, cur Faustinus Episcopus Lugdunensis Cypriano Episcopo Carthaginiensi longe dissito semel atque iterum significat ea de Marciano, quæ jam utique ipse Faustinus et alii ejusdem provinciæ Episcopi nunciaverant Stephano proximiori, et omnium Episcoporum principi? Dicendum igitur factum id fuisse aut per negligentiam Stephani: aut, quod magis videtur, per disciplinam quæ tunc in ecclesia vigebat, ut omnes quidem in circumpositis locis, sed præsertim urbium clarissimarum, Episcopi in commune consulerent ecclesiæ, viderentque ne quid detrimenti res Christiana catholica caperet. Itaque super isto Marciani Arelatensis facinore, Lugdunensem Episcopum ad Romanum et Carthaginiensem dedisse literas, istum vero ut remotissimum dedisse vicissim suas ad Romanum ut fratrem et collegam, qui in propinquo facilius possit de negotio et cognoscere et statuere."—Cypriani Opera, cum Notis Nic. Rigaltii, Epist. lxvii. Fol. Paris, 1666.]

[* Theodoriti Hist. Eccles., lib. v., cap. xxiii. Fol. Cantab., 1720. [Socrat., Hist. Eccles., lib. v., cap. xv. Fol. Cantab., 1720. [Sozom., Hist. Eccles., lib. viii., cap. iii. Fol. Cantab., 1720.]

[† Barrow's Works, vol. vii., On the Supremacy, p. 507, et seq. 8vo. edit. Oxford, 1830.

[Bower's History of the Popes, vol. i., p. 386, et seq.; vol. ii., p. 5, et seq., p. 45, et seq., p. 348, et seq.; vol. iii., p. 33, et seq. 4to. Third edit. London, 1754.]

‡ "Privilegium quidem solius ecclesiæ Romanæ esse reperitur, ut depositus a Synodo Episcopus absque alio Synodo majoris numeri restitui possit per Romanum Pontificem."—Baronii Annal. Eccles., tom. vi., A. D. 449, sect. 127. Romæ, 1607.

§ "Quorumlibet sententiis ligata Pontificum sedes B. Petri Apostoli jus habet resolvendi.—Sedes Apostolica frequenter, more majorum, etiam sine ullo Synodo præcedente, et absolvendi quos Synodus inique damnaverat, et damnandi nulla existente Synodo quos oportuit, habuit facultatem."—Conc. Labb., tom. iv., Gelas. Papæ I. Epist. xiii., col. 1203. Paris, 1671.

4. The apostolical canons, which illustrate ancient customs, and various synodical decrees, prohibited communion with persons condemned according to the canons.* Gelasius also says, "That he who had polluted himself by holding communion with a condemned person, is a partaker of his condemnation." †

5. In former times Popes were opposed for receiving Bishops who had been rejected by particular Synods. Cyprian declared the restitution of Basilides by Stephen, void.‡ The Fathers of the Antiochian Council reprehended Julius for admitting Athanasius and Marcellus to communion after their condemnation by Synods. The oriental Bishops of Sardica excommunicated that Pontiff for communicating with those individuals. These instances show that the Popes were not at that time, in the estimation of the people, endowed with such authority.

6. As it regards the examples of restoration cited by the Romanists, they are not valid when in opposition to the foregoing considerations. This will appear to any who examines the import attached to the word "restitution" in ancient authors, and in examining the cases adduced.§

XI. Of appeals to the Pope.

1. These he claims the right to receive from all inferior judicatories. At the Council of Florence this was the first great branch of authority which the Greeks were required to recognise as vested in the Pontiff. "He will have all the privileges of his Church, and that appeals be made to him." ‖ When Alexander III. was advised not to receive an appeal in Becket's case, he replied in the following profane language :—"This is my glory, which I will not give to another." He was accustomed to encourage them on the slightest occasion; remarking that, "concerning appeals for the smallest causes, we would have you hold, that similar deference is to be paid to them, as though the affair were of the greatest moment." ¶ Numerous decisions of this kind may be found in Gratian's decrees, taken from the spurious epistles of ancient Popes; nevertheless, ratified by their successors, and authoritatively established as law.

Pius II., in a Bull dated January 18th, 1460, declares: "An execrable and unheard-of abuse in all ancient times has lately crept in, being countenanced by some through a spirit of rebellion, and in order to avoid the punishment due to their crimes; I mean the abuse of appealing from the Roman Pontiff, Christ's Vicar on earth, to whom it was said in the person of St. Peter, 'Feed my sheep;' 'Whatsoever thou shalt bind upon earth,' &c., to a future Council. This, all who are in the least acquainted with the canons must look upon as contrary to the established laws of the Church. By these appeals, the Apostolic See is restrained from doing justice to those who recur to it; all are at liberty to commit with impunity what crimes they please; the discipline of the Church is trampled under foot, the hierarchy overset; and every thing must fall into disorder and confusion. Besides, how absurd is it to appeal to what does not exist, and perhaps never will! We therefore condemn, upon the most mature deliberation, all such appeals; we pronounce, declare, and define them to be contrary to the canons, and in themselves null; and order, that, for the future, no one shall presume, under any pretence whatsoever, to appeal from our judgment, or from that of our successors. If any one shall act contrary to this ordinance, after two months from the day of its publication in our Chancery, he shall, by what dignity soever distinguished, the royal, imperial, and pontifical not excepted, incur, ipso facto, the sentence of excommunication, from which none but the Pope himself shall have power to absolve him, except at the point of death. All universities, colleges, notaries, witnesses, and every other person, who shall assist at such appeals, or be anyways concerned in them, shall be liable to the same penalty." * All who are in any degree acquainted with ecclesiastical history, will perceive that this document is contrary to the canons and practice of the Church. This the continuator of Fleury acknowledges.

Nicholas I. asserts, "They are the canons which declare that all appeals of the Church be brought to the examination of this see, and decree that none be made from it, and that thus she judge the whole Church; but herself is judged by no one." † In another epistle he says, "The holy statutes and venerable decrees have committed the causes of Bishops, as being weighty matters, to be determined by us." ‡ Pelagius II. says, "As the Synod has appointed, and usage requires, let greater and difficult cases be always referred to the Apostolic See." § Gelasius says, "They are the canons which will have the appeals of the whole Church tried by this see." ‖ In early days the Pope had no such authority.

2. The history of the primitive church furnishes no examples of appeal to the Pope.

3. Ancient customs and canons are against it. The Council of Nice decreed, as the African Fathers allege in defence of their refusal to allow appeals to the Pope: "The Nicene decrees most evidently did commit both Clergymen of inferior degrees and Bishops to their Metropolitans." ¶ Theophilus says, "I suppose you are not

* Conc. Labb., tom. i., Canon. Apost. x.—xiii., col. 48; tom. ii., Conc. Nicæn., can. v., col. 30, 31. Conc. Sard., can. xvi., xvii., col. 640—642. Conc. Carth. III., can. ix., col. 1168. Evagrii Hist. Eccles., lib. ii., cap. iv. Fol. Cantab., 1720.

† "Damnati hominis communione pollutus, damnationis ejus factus est particeps."—Conc. Labb., tom. iv., P. Gelas. I. epist. xiii., col. 1203. Paris, 1671.

[‡ "Romam pergens, Stephanum collegam nostrum longe positum et gestæ rei ac veritatis ignarum fefellit, ut exambiret reponi se injuste in episcopatum de quo fuerat jure depositus."—Cypriani Opera, epist. lxvii., Ad Clerum et Plebes de Basilide, &c., p. 104. 8vo. edit. Paris, 1836.]

§ Barrow's Works, vol. vii., On the Supremacy, p. 518, et seq. 8vo. edit. Oxford, 1830. Bower's History of the Popes, vol. i., pp. 64, 116, et seq. Third edit. London, 1750.

‖ Conc. Labb., tom. xiii., Conc. Florent., sess. xxv., col. 382. Paris, 1671.

[¶ "De appellationibus pro minimis causis interpositis volumus te tenere, quod eis, pro quacunque levi causa fiant, non minus est, quam si pro majoribus fierent, deferendum."—Corp. Juris Canon. a Pithœo, tom. ii., Alex. III. Epistola ad Vigorien. Episc. in Decret. Greg. IX., lib. ii., tit. xxviii., cap. xi., p. 120. Paris, 1695.]

 Idem, tom. i., Grat., caus. ii., quæst. vi.; caus. iii., quæst. vi.; caus. ix., quæst. iii., xvi.

* "Execrabilis et pristinis temporibus," &c.—Magn. Bullar. Roman., tom. i., Bulla P. Pii II., p. 370. Fol. Luxemb., 1728.

† "Ipsi sunt canones, qui appellationes totius ecclesiæ ad hujus sedis examen voluere deferri; ab ipsa vero nusquam prorsus appellari debere sanxerunt, ac per hoc illam de tota ecclesia judicare, ipsam ad nullius commeare judicium."—Conc. Labb., tom. viii., Nicolai Papæ I. epist. viii., Ad Mich. Imperat., col. 293. Paris, 1671.

‡ "Sacra statuta et veneranda decreta Episcoporum causas, utpote majora negotia, nostræ definiendas censuræ mandarunt."—Idem, epist. xxxviii.

§ "Majores vero et difficiles quæstiones (ut sancta Synodus statuit, et beata consuetudo exigit) ad Sedem Apostolicam semper referantur."—Idem, tom. v., P. Pelag. II. epist. viii., col. 948.

‖ "Ipsi sunt canones, qui appellationes totius ecclesiæ ad hujus sedis examen voluere deferri."—Idem, tom. iv., P. Gelas. I. epist. iv., col. 1168.

¶ "Decreta Nicæna sive inferioris gradus Clericos, sive Episcopos, suis Metropolitanis apertissime commiserunt."—Idem, tom. ii., Syn. Afric. in Epist. ad P. Celest., col. 1675, C.

ignorant what the canons of the Nicene Council command, ordaining that a Bishop should judge no cause out of his own district." *

4. When the diocesan administration was introduced, the final resort was to their Synods and Primates. It was a peculiar privilege of Patriarchs to receive appeals from Metropolitans and provincial Synods, and to reverse their decrees, if found faulty. The Council of Chalcedon says, "If any Bishop or Clergyman have a controversy with the Metropolitan of his province, let him have recourse to the Exarch of the diocess." † In the seventeenth canon it is said, "If any man be injured by his Bishop or Metropolitan, let him bring his cause before the Exarch of the diocess, or the throne of Constantinople." These canons are adopted by the civil law, and confirmed by imperial edicts. By one of Justinian's Constitutions, the Patriarch is to receive appeals from a provincial Synod, and give final determination to all causes that are brought before him: the regular way of proceeding also is there specified; namely, "That no man shall bring his cause first before the Patriarch, but before his own Bishop, then before the Metropolitan, after that before a provincial Synod, and last of all before the Patriarch, from whose judgment there lay no appeal." ‡ The same is repeated and confirmed by other laws of that Emperor. § In the second General Council also it was ordained, "that in every province, a provincial Synod ought to rule, and determine all affairs."

Several provincial Synods expressly prohibited all appeals from their decisions. The African provinces always had a Primate at Carthage, after diocesses were erected, who was independent of all others, as Justinian declares in his Novellæ. ‖ The African Councils always thought so; for they never sent to Rome for ordinations; and prohibited appeals thither upon any account whatsoever. This is evident from the twenty-second capitulum of the Council of Milevis, held A. D. 418, which declares, "If they think it necessary to appeal, they should not appeal, unless to African Councils, or to the Primates of their provinces. But if any one appeal beyond the seas, he should not be received into communion by any in Africa." ¶

This decree was confirmed by various acts of General Synods, made upon the appeal of Apiarius, an African Presbyter, whom Zosimus, Bishop of Rome, pretended to restore to communion, after he had been deposed by an African Council. Zosimus alleged for himself a pretended decree of the Synod of Nice, giving him authority to receive appeals; which the African Fathers proved to be a forgery, by sending for authentic copies of the Nicene decrees to Constantinople, Antioch, and Alexandria, where no such canon was known. Upon this the African Fathers wrote to Celestine; Zosimus and Boniface having both died while this controversy was pending. The letter is so full of good sense, and appropriate, that we introduce the following extract:—

"For we must let your venerable Holiness know, that it hath been so established by the Council of Nice. And although mention is there made only of Clerks and laymen; yet there is no room to doubt, but it was their intention that such a regulation should extend to Bishops also. And it would be a great irregularity should your Holiness hastily and unduly admit to your communion, Bishops, who have been excommunicated in their own provinces. Your Holiness, therefore, must not receive the Presbyters and other Clergymen, who, to avoid the punishment which they deserve, recur to you; the rather as we know of no constitutions thus derogatory to the authority of our churches; and the Council of Nice hath subjected the Bishops themselves to the judgment of their Metropolitan. The Fathers of that Council have decreed, with great wisdom and equity, that all disputes should be finally determined in the places where they began, being sensible that the grace of the Holy Spirit, necessary for judging rightly, would not be wanting in any province. Especially as every man, who thinketh himself injured, may apply for redress, if he pleaseth, to the Synod of his own province, or to a National Council. Would it not be presumption in any of us, to suppose or imagine, that God will inspire a particular person with the spirit of justice, and refuse it to many Bishops assembled in Council? And how can a judgment, given out of the country, and beyond sea, be right, where the necessary witnesses cannot be present, by reason of their sex, age, or some other hinderance? As for your sending Legates, we find no such ordinance in any Council, nor in the writings of the Fathers. As for what you have sent us by our Colleague, Faustinus, as a canon of the Council of Nice, we must let you know, that no such canon is to be found in the genuine and uncorrupt copies of that Council, which have been transcribed and sent us by our fellow-Bishop, Cyril of Alexandria, and the reverend Atticus of Constantinople. Those copies we sent to Boniface, your predecessor, of worthy memory. We, therefore, earnestly beg you would send no more Legates nor Ecclesiastics to execute your judgments here, lest you should seem to introduce worldly pride and arrogance into the church of Christ." * They conclude by entreating him not to suffer Faustinus to continue any longer among them. Celestine, finding it to be useless to employ force at this juncture, thought it best to acquiesce for the present.

5. The Popes met with considerable opposition in receiving appeals. When Felicissimus and Fortunatus, after having been deposed in Africa, applied to Cornelius, Cyprian maintained that such application was irregular and unjust. † When Basilides and Martialis were deposed in Spain for their crimes, they applied to Stephen for restoration; but the Clergy and people of that country paid no attention to the decision of the Pope. When Athanasius, Marcellus, Paulus, &c., who had been condemned by Synods, applied for relief to Julius, the oriental Bishops opposed, denying that he had any power to interfere. Nor could that Pontiff produce any law in proof of his claim, or in justification of his proceedings, except a common right, which pertained to other Prelates as well as to himself. The contest of the African Church with

* "Arbitror te non ignorare quid præcipiant Nicæni Concilii canones, sancientes Episcopum non judicare causam citra terminos suos."—Pallad., cap. vii.

† Conc. Labb., tom. iv., Conc. Chalced., can. ix. Vide supra.

‡ Cod. Just., lib. i., tit. iv., cap. ii.

§ Justiniani Novellæ, constit. cxxiii., cap. xxii. 8vo. 1567. Phot. Nomocan., tit. xxix., cap. i.

‖ Justiniani Novellæ, constit. cxxxi., cap. iv. 8vo. 1567.

¶ "Quod si et ab eis appellandum putaverint, non provocent nisi ad Africana Concilia, vel ad Primates provinciarum suarum. Ad transmarina autem qui putaverit appellandum, a nullo intra Africam in communionem suscipiatur."—Conc. Labb., tom. iii., Conc. Milev., cap. xxii., col. 385, E. Venet., 1728.

[* Idem, Epistola Conc. Afric. ad Papam. Cælest., col. 1675.]

[† "Oportet utique eos quibus præsumus non circumcursare, nec Episcoporum concordiam cohærentem sua subdola et fallaci temeritate collidere, sed agere illic causam suam ubi et accusatores habere et testes sui criminis possint."—Cypriani Opera, epist. liv., p. 75. 8vo. edit. Paris, 1836.]

Celestine in the case of Apiarius is notorious; and the reasons they assigned for repelling that appeal are still valid. The Bishops of Gaul also vigorously and with success opposed Zosimus, when he interfered with the regulations of the Gallic diocesses.*

6. The early Fathers adduce powerful arguments against foreign appeals, and show their injurious tendency. Cyprian, and the African Bishops, declare, that there was an ecclesiastical law against them; that they infringed on the authority bestowed on Christian Ministers; that they interfered with the time and attention both of Pastors and people; that causes could be better decided where witnesses of fact could be obtained; and that there is everywhere a competent authority equal to any that might elsewhere be had. Some early Popes were of the same opinion. Fabian, elected A. D. 236, says, "Let the cause be always heard where the crime is committed." † Liberius I., elected Bishop of Rome A. D. 352, desired Constantius that the judgment of Athanasius might be made in Alexandria, "because there the accused, the accusers, and their defender were." Damasus, constituted Pope A. D. 366, affirms himself to be incompetent to judge in a case which had previously been determined by the Council of Capua. He says: "But since the Synod of Capua has thus determined, we perceive we cannot judge it." ‡ Leo I., who was raised to the Popedom A. D. 440, writing to Anastasius, Prelate of Thessalonica, reproves him for compelling Atticus, a Bishop, to take a rough and dangerous journey, through snow and unknown ways.§

Augustine, in matters of appeal, or rather of reference to a fair and candid arbitration, associates other churches with that of Rome. Writing against the pertinacity of the Donatists, he says: "For the business was not about Priests or Deacons, or the Clergy of an inferior order; but it concerned our colleagues, (Bishops,) who may reserve their cause entire for the judgment of their own order, especially those of the apostolic churches." ‖ In the same epistle he says: "Probably Melchiades, Bishop of Rome, with the transmarine Bishops his colleagues, ought not to have usurped that judgment which had been decided by seventy Africans, when Tigistanus presided as Primate. But why might he not assume it? Because the Emperor, when requested, sent Bishops to be judges, who would sit with him, and would determine whatsoever appeared just in the whole case." ¶

Bernard complains of the mischief attending appeals in his day, in the following words:—"How long will ye be deaf to the complaints of the whole world, or pretend that you are so? Why sleep you? When will the consideration of so great confusion and abuse in appeals awake in you? They are made without right or equality, without due order, and against custom. Neither place, nor manner, nor time, nor cause, nor person, are considered. They are everywhere made lightly, and for the most part unjustly," &c.*

On this subject the Council of Basil, held A. D. 1431, declares: "Hitherto many abuses of intolerable vexations have prevailed, while many have too often been called and cited from the most remote parts to the Court of Rome, and that sometimes for small and trifling matters, and are so wearied with charges and trouble, that they sometimes think it best to recede from their right, or buy off their trouble with great loss, rather than be at the cost of suing in so remote a country." +

7. In opposition to the foregoing, the decrees of the Council of Sardica have been introduced as authorizing appeals to Rome. We quote from Du Pin:—

"In the third canon Hosius proposes, first, that it should be forbidden to appeal to Judges of a neighbouring province; and, secondly, he says, that for the honour of the memory of St. Peter, he judged it convenient, with the leave of the Council, to ordain, that if a Bishop, condemned in his own country, thought himself innocent, those who had judged him should write to the Bishop of Rome, to inquire whether the cause of the accused should be examined anew; that if he and the Judges he should name were of this opinion, they must proceed to a new decision at the place; but if he did not think fit that the cause should be examined anew, then the sentence already given must stand good." "Gaudentius adds in the fourth canon, that a Bishop deposed by the Synod of the province, who desires this new decision, must not be expelled his see till the Prelate of Rome has determined whether the cause ought to be examined anew." "Lastly, in the fifth canon, according to the Greek, and the seventh, according to the edition of Dionysius Exiguus, Hosius says, that when the Roman diocesan thinks fit that the cause of a Bishop should be examined a second time, he ought to write to the Prelates adjoining his province, that they examine the whole matter with care and exactness; that he must also be empowered to send Legates in his own name to this new Synod, unless he think it more convenient to leave the judging of the case to the neighbouring Bishops of the province only, without sending thither his Legates. The Bishops of the Council approve these propositions of Hosius and Gaudentius." ‡

Against the conclusions drawn from these canons, we observe:—

(1.) They were not formed as those of other Councils; but are propositions made by Hosius and other Prelates, which were approved by the Synod.

* The History of the Popes, from the Foundation of the See of Rome, to the present Time. By Archibald Bower, Esq. Vol. i., p. 352, et seq. 4to. Third edit. London, 1750.

† "Revera semper ibi causa agatur, ubi crimen admittitur."—Conc. Labb., tom. i., Fabiani Papæ epist. iii., col. 646, E. Paris, 1671.

‡ "Sed cum hujusmodi fuerit Concilii Capuensis judicium, advertimus quod nobis judicandi forma competere non possit."—P. Damasus, as quoted by Barrow. Works, vol. vii., p. 536.

[§ Conc. Labb., tom. iii., Leonis Papæ I. epist. Ad Anastasium, Paris, 1671.]

‖ "Neque enim de Presbyteris aut Diaconis aut inferioris ordinis Clericis; sed de collegis agebatur, qui possent aliorum collegarum judicio, præsertim apostolicarum ecclesiarum, causam suam integram reservare."—August. Opera, tom. ii., epist. clxii., alias xliii., col. 91, F. Ed. Bened. Paris, 1679.

¶ "An forte non debuit Romanæ Ecclesiæ Melchiades Episcopus cum collegis transmarinis Episcopis illud sibi usurpare judicium, quod ab Afris septuaginta, ubi Primas Tigisitanus præsedit, fuerat terminatum. Quid quod nec ipse usurpavit? Rogatus quippe Imperator judices misit Episcopos qui cum eo sederent, et de tota illa causa quod justum videretur statuerent."—Idem, col. 94, D.

[* "Quousque murmur universæ terræ aut dissimulas, aut non advertis? Quousque dormitas? Quousque non evigilat consideratio tua ad tantam appellationum confusionem, atque abusionem? Præter jus et fas, præter morem et ordinem fiunt. Non locus, non modus, non tempus, non causa discernitur aut persona. Præsumuntur leviter passim, plerumque et nequiter."—Bernardi Opera, tom. iv., De Consid., lib. iii., cap. ii., p. 11, B. Lugduni, 1687.]

[† "Inoleverunt, autem hactenus intolerabilium vexationum abusus permulti, dum nimium frequenter a remotissimis etiam partibus ad Romanam curiam, et interdum pro parvis et minutis rebus ac negotiis, quamplurimi citari et evocari consueverunt, atque ita expensis et laboribus fatigari, ut nonnunquam commodius arbitrarentur juri suo cedere, aut vexationem suam gravi damno redimere, quam in tam longinqua regione litium subire dispendia."—Conc. Labb., tom. xii., Conc. Basil., sess. xxxi., col. 601, C. Paris, 1671.]

‡ Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., vol. i., p. 606. Folio. Dublin, 1723.

(2.) The discipline which the Fathers of Sardica established in these canons is new; for it is opposed both to the decisions of the Council of Nice and to those of Antioch; especially to the two following canons of the latter Synod, held A. D. 341, or A. D. 342, about six years previous to the Sardican:—"Canon 14. In case the Bishops of one province cannot agree about judging a Prelate, the Metropolitan may call those of the neighbouring province, to examine and decide the controversy. Canon 15. But if a Bishop is condemned unanimously by all the Prelates of the province, he cannot be judged anew, and the sentence of that Synod ought to remain firm."* The canons of Sardica were different from those of Antioch; which were conformable to the ancient practice and discipline of the church, as is manifest from the decisions of the Council of Nice.

(3.) The Divines of Sardica do not grant the Bishop of Rome power to judge the cause of a Prelate in his own Court; but only authority to inquire whether the case were properly decided: if not, it was his prerogative to order a new trial in his own country by the neighbouring Bishops, whither he might send his Legates if he thought fit. This power of receiving appeals, with respect to judging and deposing Bishops, has been extended by the Pontiffs to all causes, even to those which were most trivial. Such was the case with Alexander III.† Subsequent days added the following to the decisions of the Council, who inserted it in their letter to Julius:—"It is very meet or reasonable that all Bishops should acquaint their head, that is, the See of St. Peter, with what passes in their respective provinces."‡ This is a forgery: it stands unconnected with the original letter, and is opposed to the canons of Sardica themselves.

(4.) The canons of this Synod are also contrary to those of the Council of Constantinople, held A. D. 381. The second "renews and confirms the ancient law of the church, authorized by the fourth, fifth, and sixth canons of the Synod of Nice, commanding the Bishops to be ordained by those of the same province, and such of the neighbouring districts as they should think fit to call in; directing all ecclesiastical matters to be settled by a Council composed of the Bishops of that neighbourhood, or at least of the diocess composed of all the provinces under the same Vicar; and strictly forbidding the Bishops of one see to interfere with the business of another."§ By this decree the decisions of the Sardican Council are revoked, or rather disowned, and all appeals thereto forbidden. By the third canon the see of Constantinople is declared first in rank and dignity after that of Rome. Rank was given to the see of Constantinople, but no jurisdiction. The Council of Chalcedon bestowed authority: by this Synod they were empowered to ordain the Metropolitans of the diocesses of Pontus, Asia, and Thrace.

(5.) The canons forbidding appeals to Rome, enacted about the year 426, were quoted among those of the African collection, A. D. 825, and confirmed by a Council at Carthage the same year.

(6.) The decrees of Sardica were never received into the code of the universal church. Hence the language of Du Pin, who remarks: "These canons end with these words in the edition of Dionysius Exiguus, 'The whole Council hath said, the Catholic Church spread over all the earth shall observe what has been now ordained.' However, the canons of the Council of Sardica were never received by the Catholic Church as general laws. They were never put into the code of the universal church, approved by the Council of Chalcedon. The East never received them, neither would the Bishops of Africa own them. The Popes only used them, and cited them under the name of the Council of Nice, to give them greater weight and authority."*

8. The grounds on which the Bishops of Rome formerly asserted the right of appeal, destroy the validity of the claim. Zosimus, in his contest with the African churches, although determined on the exaltation of his see, and on the possession of every prerogative, did not presume to go beyond the canons, nor to claim the power of receiving appeals independent of such authority. He thus conceded that he was equal to other Bishops, except in the official authority which they vested in him. The iniquitous course which he adopted in the case of Apiarius, to extend his influence, and diminish that of the African Prelates, is proof sufficient that he derived his claim from the canons alone. No better opportunity could have been presented in which to urge a divine right. Therefore, as Zosimus never mentioned such, we may infer he had no idea of an assumption of that kind, or did not think it of sufficient validity, to be of use in the present dispute. This divine right of receiving appeals from all parts of the world, is now held as an article of faith by every true Roman Catholic; so that to dispute it would be no less dangerous, in countries where the Holy Tribunal is established, than to deny any article of the Apostles' or the Nicene Creed. Innocent I. claimed, by divine right, the power of deciding controversies; but he seems to have confined it to articles of faith. This pretension, to its utmost limits, was claimed in process of time by his successors. When subsequent Councils repealed or contradicted the canons of Sardica, on which the Popes founded their usurpations, they revived the claim of Innocent, and no longer challenging the prerogative of receiving appeals by the canons, but by divine right, they placed it beyond the power of all future Councils to abridge or restrain it.

9. On many occasions appeals were not made to the Pope, which shows that he was not generally believed to possess the power of receiving them. Paul of Samosata appealed to the Emperor; so did the Donatists, not to the Pope, but to the Emperor;† and were then referred, by the Emperor, not to the Pope individually, but to him and other judges as the Emperor's commissioners. Atha-

[* "Can. xiv. Si quis Episcopus ob aliqua crimina judicetur, deinde contingat Episcopos, qui sunt in provincia, de eo dissentire, illis quidem eum, de quo fertur sententia, innocentem pronuncian-tibus, his vero reum, pro tota componenda controversia visum est sanctæ Synodo, ut Metropolitanus Episcopus ex propinqua provincia alios evocet judicaturos et controversiam decisuros, et cum provincialibus, quod probatum fuerit, confirmet.

["Can. xv. Si quis Episcopus, aliquorum criminum accusatus, fuerit ab omnibus provinciæ Episcopis condemnatus, et omnes unam consentientem adversus eum sententiam tulerint, is ne amplius ab aliis judicetur, sed provinciæ Episcoporum firma maneat sententia." —Conc. Labb., tom. ii., Conc. Antioch. Canones, col. 567, D. Paris, 1671.]

[† "De appellationibus pro causis minimis interpositis volumus te tenere, quod eis, pro quacumque levi causa fiant, non minus est, quam si pro majoribus fierent, deferendum."—Corp. Juris Canon. a Pithœo, tom. ii., Decret. Greg. IX., lib. ii., tit. xxviii., cap. xi. Fol. Paris, 1695.]

‡ Hilar., Frag. i.

§ Theodoriti Hist. Eccles., lib. v., cap. ix. Fol. Cantab., 1720. Socratis Hist. Eccles., lib. v., cap. viii. Fol. Cantab., 1720. Sozom. Hist. Eccles., lib. vii., cap. ix. Fol. Cantab., 1720.

* Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., vol. iii., p. 607. Fol. Dublin, 1723.

[† "Illos vero ab ecclesiastico judicio provocasse, ut causam Constantinus audiret."—August. Opera, tom. ii., Epist. clxii., (alias xliii.,) p. 90, C. Ed. Bened. Paris, 1679.]

nasius first appealed to the Emperor. Chrysostom requested the succour of the Pope, to whom he did not appeal as a judge. He referred to a General Council, which Innocent judged necessary for a right decision in his case.* Eutyches appealed to all the Patriarchs, and Theodoret intended to address all the western Bishops. Appeals were therefore made to other Prelates, as well as to the Popes.

10. Christian states, to prevent mischief arising from appeals to the Pontiff, have been compelled to enact laws against them. The English statutes of Provisors, Præmunire, &c., are examples of the opposition raised against Papal usurpations in the exercise of appeals. In the year 878, the kingdom of France was so harassed with them, that Hincmar, Archbishop of Rheims, was appointed to address the Pope on the subject; who, after showing that such a practice, if encouraged, would entirely subvert all ecclesiastical discipline, quotes the canons of Sardica, on which the Popes grounded their right of receiving them, and from these very canons proves, that Bishops are to be judged only on the spot, and that Priests are only allowed to appeal to their Metropolitans.

11. Anciently there were properly no appeals in the church. They were introduced by Cyril of Jerusalem, who, as Socrates says, "first referred to a greater judicature, against ecclesiastical rule and custom."† This proves that about that time, or the middle of the fourth century, diocesan Synods were established, from which there was no appeal; the provincial Synods were the last resort previous to the erection of diocesses. In proof of the want of regularity in ecclesiastical appeals, when of novel use, they were often made to the Emperors. Paul of Samosata referred to Aurelianus; the Donatists,‡ Athanasius, and the Egyptian Bishops, to Constantine; Priscillian to Maximus; and Idacius to Gratian.§ Hence canons were enacted to restrain Bishops from having recourse to the civil tribunals.

12. Instances of appeal are comparatively few, and these not primitive. Some cases are quoted by Roman Catholic writers; but, on examination, it will be found that they are of rare occurrence; they are of recent date, and when Papal encroachments had advanced; some of them are impertinent; and all of them fall short of establishing Romish appeals. If the Popes had originally a well-known, unquestionable right to receive such, there might have been produced many ancient, clear, and appropriate instances. The following have been alleged:—

(1.) Marcion, A. D. 142, is represented as appealing to the Pope.* But the truth was, that Marcion, for gross immorality, was, by his own father, Bishop of Sinope, driven from the church. He fled to Rome, and begged admittance to communion; but it was not granted. On his expostulating, the Pope replied, "We cannot, without the permission of thy honourable father, do this; for there is one faith, and one concord; and we cannot cross thy father, our good fellow-Minister."† Such was the case; and is it not strange that it should be produced as an instance of an appeal, when it was only the supplication of a fugitive criminal to be admitted to the communion of the church?

(2.) The case of Felicissimus and Fortunatus, A. D. 252, is adduced, also, as an instance of a similar kind. This was the irregular application of desperate and wicked men, on whom a definite sentence had already been passed at their proper tribunal in Africa, from whom no appeal could be allowed.‡

(3.) That of Basilides, A. D. 253, to Stephen, has been alleged. His application to that Pontiff was resisted by Cyprian, and proved utterly ineffectual.§

These are all the instances which the Romanists have collected from the first three centuries; so that during this period the power of receiving appeals by the Pope was either unknown or but feebly exercised.

(4.) Other cases might be introduced, proving that for a long period there were no regular appeals to the Bishop of Rome. Our limits do not allow us to enlarge: although we might adduce numerous instances, and select those that contain the greatest exhibition of reason on the side of the Papacy; nevertheless they would not establish the practice. We might examine into the case of Athanasius, who appealed to Julius, A. D. 350; of Chrysostom, A. D. 403, to Innocent I.;‖ of Pelagius and Celestine, to Innocent I., A. D. 416;¶ of Antony, A. D. 422, of Apiarius, A. D. 426,†† and of Cyril, A. D. 430, to Celestine;‡‡ of Flavianus of Con-

* Sozom. Eccles. Hist., lib. viii., cap. xxvi. Fol. Cantab., 1720.

[† "Depositus tamen, nihilominus, appellationis libello ad eos qui ipsum deposuerant misso, ad majus judicium provocavit."—Socrat. Eccles. Hist., lib. ii., cap. xl. Fol. Cantab., 1720.]

‡ "Ad Imperatorem appellaverunt."—August. Opera, tom. ix., De Eccles. Unitat., cap. xvi., col. 365. Ed. Ben. Paris, 1676.

[§ This was a very different kind of appeal from the generality of instances here recorded. Idacius was wishing the assistance of the secular power to punish the Priscillians; "On which account," says Sulpitius, "the accusers displease me as much as the guilty." Moreover, he informs us that St. Martin, a man, says he, to be compared with the Apostles, reproved Idacius, advised him to desist from his accusation, and desired Maximus the Emperor to abstain from the blood of heretics; declaring that it was sufficient, that, being judged heretics by the spiritual sentence, they should be expelled their churches; and that it was a new and unheard-of wickedness, that a secular judge should determine the cause of the church," &c. And what do Baronius and his copyist Binius make out of this case? A resemblance to the proceedings of the Inquisition; "that when any one desireth the assistance of the civil Magistrate against heretics, that he may not seem a follower of the Idacian party, he first advisedly makes this protestation, that he so desires the correction of these incorrigible delinquents, as to entreat their blood may not be shed!" (Annales, A. D. 386, sect. xxiii.) See Whitby's Discourse concerning the Laws made against Heretics, Preface, pp. 36—39. 4to. London, 1682.]

[* This case of appeal has, however, been doubted both by Protestants, and members of the Church of Rome. "Hujus tamen sententiæ falsitas non pertenuibus argumentis nobis patefacta est. Extabat inter-pontificium, cum a Romanorum Presbyterio admitti in communionem ecclesiæ Marcio flagitavit; neque de rescindenda unquam Sinopensis Episcopi sententia, verbum movit ullum: aliud vero est abrogare judicis inferioris decretum, aliud orantem dignari eucharistia. Imo expresæ negat Ecclesia Romana, id sibi jure competere, invito Sinopensi Episcopo, a quo pulsus ecclesia Marcio fuerat, communioni ut restitueret. Nobis, inquit, injussu venerandi Patris tui facere istud non licet. Quis autem ibit inficias, summo judici facultatem eam competere, quæ omisso neglectoque inferioris consensu provocantem absolvere valeat? Denique ipse Natalis Alexander multis evertit argumentis eam Marcionis appellationem. Primum, quia istius appellationis nullum est apud veteres ecclesiasticos vestigium. Secundum, quia nullo monumento antiquitatis ostendi potest, laicis licitum fuisse appellare ab excommunicatione ab Episcopis ob crimen in semetipsos lata. Præterea expectasset Marcion Hygino successorem dari, cui appellationis libellum afferret. Non ergo ad Pontificem Romanum provocavit, sed solum ecclesiæ Rom. communionem impetrare voluit."—Basnagii Annales Politico-Eccles., Ad Ann. cxxxi., sect. v. It is but right to add, that Mansi, in the notes to his edition of Natalis Alexander, takes an opposite view. (tom. v., p. 92. Edit 1736.)]

† Epiph. Hær. 42. Fol. Basil, 1544.

‡ Cypriani Opera, epist. liv. Vide supra.

§ Idem, epist. lxvii. Vide supra.

‖ Bower's Hist. of the Popes, vol. i., p. 119, et seq., p. 294, et seq. 4to. Third edit. London, 1750.

¶ Idem, p. 324, et seq.

 Idem, p. 366, et seq.

†† Idem, p. 370. et seq.

‡‡ Idem, p. 387, et seq.

stantinople, of Theodoret, and of Eutyches, to Leo,* in the time of the Council of Chalcedon, A. D. 451; of John of Lappa, in 669, to Vitalianus; † also of Maurus, in the same year.‡ We refer also to the case of Wilfrid of England, A. D. 678; § and of Hincmar, A. D. 864.‖ If these instances be examined, we shall be able to trace the grounds on which Papists rest their doctrine of appeals to the Bishop of Rome.

XII. Whether the Pope be liable to be called to an account, judged, or deposed, has been differently believed, and as variously decided.

1. Roman Pontiffs assume this privilege, according to certain maxims, contained in the canon law, drawn from the decisions of Popes which have obtained considerable authority in their courts; whether such decisions were genuine or forged, makes but little difference to the advocates of the supremacy.¶

2. Antiquity has decided differently. It considered the Pope as subject to correction as any other Bishop, should he deviate notoriously from the faith, or violate canonical discipline. This in former times was not questioned.

3. There are numerous instances in which Popes have been called to an account, and occasionally deposed. Some, in accordance with the usages of the times, have found it necessary to clear themselves by adjuration. Gratian records that Leo, Bishop of Rome, in the church of St. Peter, in the presence of the Emperor Charles, the Clergy, and the people, purged himself by oath.* Pelagius, being accused that he was accessary to the death of Vigilius the Pontiff, exonerated himself by this means. Paschal I., Leo III., and Leo IV., in other circumstances, did the same. There are instances in which Bishops have refused communion with the Pope; which is a species of censure. In the time of Polycrates and Victor, the whole eastern church withdrew from communion. Various Bishops of Italy and Illyricum renounced that fellowship for a long period, because they admitted the authority of the fifth General Council.

Occasionally Popes have been deposed by other Bishops. Hilary anathematized Liberius on his defection to the Arians;† and Maurus, Bishop of Ravenna, condemned Vitalianus. In some instances, Popes have been censured and afterwards acquitted. Sixtus III. being accused by one Bassus, a Council was assembled at the command of the Emperor Valentinian, and after a protracted examination he was acquitted by a synodical decision of fifty-six Bishops. Symmachus, being accused by Festus and Probinus, two senators of Rome, assembled one hundred and fifteen Bishops; and a Synod being formed, he was proved to be innocent.....Examples are recorded in which the Emperors have deposed Popes. Constans deposed Martin. Otho II., having, with good advice, laboured to reclaim John XII. without effect, "called a Council consisting of the Bishops of Italy, by the sentence of whom the life of that wicked man should be judged;" and the issue was that he was deposed. Nicholas I. desired to be tried by the Emperor.‡

* Bower's Hist. of the Popes, vol. ii., p. 30, et seq., p. 38, et seq., p. 113, et seq.

† Idem, vol. iii., p. 85, et seq.

‡ Idem, vol. iii., p. 87, et seq.

§ Idem, vol. iii., p. 96, et seq.

‖ Idem, vol. iv., p. 304, et seq.

[¶ "Observandum est tertio, rationem præcipuam, cur Papa judicari non possit, esse, quia Princeps est ecclesiæ totius, et proinde superiorem in terris non habet; nam quia summus Princeps est ecclesiæ, non potest judicari ab ullo ecclesiastico Antistite, et rursum, quia respublica ecclesiastica spiritualis est ac proinde major ac sublimior quavis republica temporali, propterea summus Princeps ecclesiæ dirigere et judicare potest summum Principem reipublicæ temporalis, non autem ab eo dirigi aut judicari debet, nisi rectus ordo, et ipsa rerum natura pervertatur. Hæc, inquam, est ratio primaria, et, ut Scholæ loquuntur, a priori-tamen, quia hæc ratio assumit id, quod in tota hac disputatione probare nitimur, videlicet, Rom. Pontificem Principem esse totius ecclesiæ: idcirco hac et similibus rationibus prætermissis, ex testimoniis Conciliorum, Pontificum, Imperatorum, ac Doctorum ecclesiæ demonstrabimus, Romanum Præsulem judicari non posse, ut inde confirmemus primariam nostram thesim, quæ est, Romanum Pontificem caput et Principem esse ecclesiæ universæ."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. i., De Rom. Pontif., lib. i., cap. xxvi., col. 686, D. Coloniæ, 1620.

["Summus Pontifex simpliciter et absolute est supra ecclesiam universam, et supra Concilium Generale, ita ut nullum in terris supra se judicium agnoscat. Hæc etiam est fere de fide, et probatur primo ex duabus præcedentibus; nam si Papa est caput ecclesiæ universæ, etiam simul congregatæ, et ecclesia universa, etiam simul congregata, non habet ullam potestatem ratione suæ totalitatis; sequitur Papam supra Concilium esse, et supra ecclesiam, non contra."—Idem, tom. ii., De Concil. Auctorit., lib. ii., cap. xvii., col. 95, C. Colon., 1620.

["Hujus culpas istic redarguere præsumit mortalium nullus: quia cunctos ipse judicaturus a nemine est judicandus, nisi deprehendatur a fide devius: pro cujus perpetuo statu universitas fidelium tanto instantius orat, quanto suam salutem post Deum ex illius incolumitate animadvertit propensius pendere."—Corp. Juris Canon. a Pithœo, distinct. xl., cap. vi. Fol. Paris, 1685. Vide etiam, distinct. xxi., cap. vii.

["Patet profecto Sedis Apostolicæ (cujus auctoritate major non est) judicium a nemine fore retractandum: neque cuiquam de ejus licere judicari judicio: juxta quod Innocentius Papa, Ruffo et ceteris Episcopis per Thessaliam constitutis scribens, ait, (Nemo umquam Apostolico culmini [de cujus judicio non licet retractare] manus obvias audacter intulit: nemo in hoc rebellis extitit, nisi qui de se voluit judicari,) et Beatus Papa Gelasius. Nec de ejus judicio, id est, Romanæ Ecclesiæ, canones umquam præceperunt judicari, sententiamque illius constituerunt non oportere dissolvi; cujus potius sequenda decreta mandaverunt."—Ibid., caus. ix., quest. iii., cap. x. Vide etiam Extravagant. Com., lib. i., tit. viii., De Majorit. et Obedient. Bonif. VIII., cap. i., Unam Sanctam, &c.]

[Conc. Labb., tom. ix., Leonis Papæ IX. epist. i., cap. x.—xvii., col. 955. Paris, 1671.

[Idem, tom. viii., Nicolai Papæ I. ep. viii., Ad Mich. Imp., col. 293.

[Idem, tom. ix., Joannis Papæ VIII. ep. lxxv., Ad Mich. Regem, col. 59.

[Idem, tom. iv., Gelasii Papæ I. ep. iv., Ad Faustum, col. 1168.

[Idem, ibid., ep. xiii., Ad Episc. Dardan., col. 1199.

[Idem, tom. x., Gregorii Papæ VII. ep. viii., Ad Ubertum, &c., col. 11.

[Idem, ibid., ep. xxi., Ad Anselmum, col. 22.

[* "Presbyter, si a plebe sibi commissa mala opinione infamatus fuerit, et Episcopus legitimis testibus approbare non potuerit, suspendatur usque ad dignam satisfactionem, ne populus fidelium in eo scandalum patiatur. Digna vero satisfactio est, (sicut a majoribus constitutum esse docetur,) quando sive secundum canones, sive ad arbitrium Episcopi, septem sibi collegas adjungit, et jurat in sacrosancto Evangelio coram posito, quod crimen sibi illatum non perpetravit. Et hac satisfactione purgatus, secure deinceps suum exequatur officium."—Corpus Juris Canon., tom. i., caus. ii., quæst. v., sect. xiii., Ex Conc. Ilerdensi De Purgatione Clericorum, p. 159. Fol. Paris, 1695.

["Ipse ergo Sacerdos, si suspiciosus aut incredibilis suo Episcopo, aut reliquis suis Consacerdotibus, sive bonis et justis de suo populo vel de sua plebe hominibus, fuerit; ne in crimine aut in prædicta suspicione remaneat, cum tribus aut quinque vel septem bonis ac vicinis Sacerdotibus, exemplo Leonis Papæ, (qui duodecim Episcopos in sua purgatione habuit,) vel eo amplius, si suo Episcopo visum fuerit, aut necesse propter tumultum populi inesse prospexerit, et cum aliis bonis et justis hominibus, se sacramento coram populo super quatuor Evangelia dato purgatum ecclesiæ reddat. Si quis autem scire desiderat, quales testes ad accusationem Sacerdotum recipi debeant, et quidquid de accusatore faciendum sit, pleniter in canonibus reperire poterit."—Idem, sect. xix., Qualiter Sacerdotes se purgare debeant.]

[† With regard to the apostasy of Liberius, the reader is referred to a valuable and learned communication from the pen of the Rev. George S. Faber, B.D., which appeared in the Protestant Journal, 1831, pp. 363—369; a valuable publication edited by the Rev. Josiah Allport, of Birmingham, abounding with most important information on subjects connected with the Popish controversy. We regret that our limits prevent us alluding to that article in a more extensive manner.]

‡ Corp. Jur. Can., tom. i., caus. ii., qu. vii., cap. xli., p. 172. Fol. Paris, 1695.

Some Popes were deposed by Councils, both General and Provincial. The Fathers of that of Antioch threatened to set aside Julius,* whom the Bishops at Sardica did afterwards excommunicate. The fifth General Council, held A. D. 553, condemned in general terms Vigilius; and the Emperor Justinian banished him for not complying with its decrees. The sixth General Council, held A. D. 680, anathematized Honorius as a heretic, and ordered his books to be burned.† The Synod of Pisa, A. D. 1409, deposed Gregory XII. and Benedict XIII. That of Constance, held A. D. 1414, degraded John XXIII. for his wicked conduct; and that of Basle, held A. D. 1431–42, Eugenius IV.

4. The practice of Popes giving account of their faith, when entering upon their office, to other Bishops, implied that they were amenable to others. For examples of this, we refer to the synodical epistles of Gregory I. Euphemius, Bishop of Constantinople, complained that this practice had fallen into desuetude.

5. The various opinions entertained among Romanists on this subject are somewhat curious. The first is, of those who believe that the Pope cannot possibly fall into error or heresy; and therefore he cannot be deposed on any account. This is the sentiment of Pighius. The second is that of those who believe that the Pope for secret heresy is, ipso facto, condemned by the Most High; and therefore he may be deposed or judged by the Church. Johannes de Turrecremata was of this opinion. The third is that held by Cardinal Cajetan, that the Pope, for manifest heresy, is deposed of God; and may actually and formally be degraded by the Church. The fourth is, that the Pope cannot be set aside for secret or manifest heresy; and consequently not by the Church. The fifth is that embraced by Bellarmine, who stated that the Pope could not be arraigned for any crime but heresy; and even not for all heresy, but for that which is manifest; neither is he then deposed by an act of the Church, but by himself, inasmuch as he ceases to be supreme Pontiff in consequence of that heresy: that the Church may afterward punish him; but he is then no Pope; for as soon as he became a heretic, his popedom departed from him.‡ His reasoning is this: A manifest heretic is not even a member of the Church, much less, therefore, can he be a Pope; therefore the Pope is deposed without a sentence. If the Church afterward proceed against him, they do not judge the Pope, but the man. The statement of such egregious trifling is its confutation.

6. The greatest perplexity is connected with the inquiry, "Can the Pope be deposed for any cause?" In former times this was discussed in the Church of Rome; but since the power of the Pontiff has become so fully established, his deposition is a question which does not admit of discussion. It is not now even pretended that His Holiness can be deposed for any wickedness, however enormous. Heresy seems to be the only crime for which he can be set aside, according to Jesuitical interpretation; and this is so evaded and explained, that but little can be gathered from their expositions.

The following is the decision of the canon law:—"No mortal can presume to correct the faults of the Pope, because he can judge all men, and is judged by none, unless he is found to deviate from the faith."* Hence it is inferred that he may be deposed for heresy. The comment on this decree says, that the Pontiff may be degraded for any notorious crime, such as adultery, simony, provided he be incorrigible, and a scandal to the Church. But this conclusion is contrary to the law, which declares, "that no one can judge the chief See, not even the Clergy, King, or people." Antoninus, Archbishop of Florence, who follows Augustine of Ancona and Petrus de Palude, says, that "the Pope for any crime, however notorious, cannot be deposed, because such a deposition, or accusation, would tend to the injury of the whole Church; since, if his accusation were heard, the Church would be without a head; and he ought not to be condemned, unless for the sin of heresy, for which he would correct himself or amend. Thus the Bishops assembled in Council did not depose Marcellus for heresy and idolatry, because he was prepared to be corrected, and to reverse his opinion; which he did. But for heresy itself he is very properly deposed de facto, because the Pope is chosen for the head of the whole Church, according to Eph. i. 22, 23: 'He gave him (Christ) to be the head over all things to the church, which is his body.' But the Pope represents the person of Christ. Hence, also, Christ calls Peter Cephas, that is, 'head;' and it belongs to the head to cause life to flow to all the members. But the beginning of spiritual life is faith, because 'without faith it is impossible to please God,' saith the Apostle. If, therefore, the Pope be found to deviate from the faith, he is destitute of spiritual life, and, of consequence, cannot cause life to flow to others: hence, as a dead person is not a man, so the Pope who is taken in heresy is not Pope, because, ipso facto, he is deposed. The same saith Petrus de Palude, as above;—Because the Pope, on no account, as long as he is a Pope, for any crime whatever, can be deposed by a Council, nor by the whole Church, nor by the whole world. And this, not merely because he is superior, and hath no man above him who can judge him, but because he is of God, who reserves the judgment of the Roman Prelate to himself, as long as he is Pope. But when he falls into heresy, then he is cut off by that very act from the Church, and ceases to be head, and then he is deposed de facto and not de jure; because 'he who believeth not is condemned already' de jure; and this is previous to any judgment, because, on account of his being heretic, he is cut off from the Church; but a head cut off from a body, as long as it is cut off, cannot be the head of that body from which it is dissevered. Hence the Pope, on this account, ceases to be the head of the body, the Church. And thus he cannot remain heretical, because the keys of the Church cannot be had out of the Church. But by other sins the Pope becomes a languid head, which, however, does not

* Sozom. Hist. Eccles., lib. iii., cap. viii. Fol. Cantab., 1720.

† Conc. Labb., tom. vi, Conc. Constant. III., actiones xiii., xiv., xvii. Paris, 1671.

[‡ "Est ergo quinta opinio vera, Papam hæreticum manifestum per se desinere esse Papam, et caput sicut per se desinit esse Christianus, et membrum corporis Ecclesiæ: quare ab Ecclesia posse eum judicari et puniri. Hæc est sententia omnium veterum Patrum, qui docent, hæreticos manifestos mox amittere omnem jurisdictionem, et nominatim Cypriani, ubi sic loquitur de Novatiano, qui fuit Papa in schismate cum Cornelio. Ubi dicit, Novatianum, etsi verus ac legitimus Papa fuisset, tamen eo ipso casurum fuisse a pontificatu, si se ab ecclesia separaret.

["Fundamentum hujus sententiæ est, quoniam hæreticus manifestus nullo modo est membrum Ecclesiæ, id est, neque animo, neque corpore, sive neque unione interna, neque externa. Nam Catholici etiam mali sunt uniti, et sunt membra, animo, per fidem, corpore, per confessionem fidei, et visibilium sacramentorum participationem: hæretici occulti sunt uniti, et sunt membra, solum externa unione; sicut, e contrario, boni Catechumeni sunt de Ecclesia interna unione tantum, non autem externa: hæretici manifesti, nullo modo, ut jam probatum est."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. i., De Rom. Pontif., lib. ii., cap. xxx., col. 702, D. Coloniæ, 1620.]

* Corp. Juris Canon., tom. i., Distinct. xl., cap. vi. Fol. Paris, 1696. Vide supra.

cease to be head, nor can it, of consequence, be judged by the members."* Such is the interpretation of Antoninus, whom Bellarmine followed.

It is, however, curious to learn how he disposes of a wicked, incorrigible Pope. "What, then, is to be done when a Pope is so wicked, that he destroys the Church of God by his morals? Petrus de Palude says, there is a twofold remedy. The first is the example of Paul, who resisted Peter, face to face, at Antioch. So we are not to obey the Pope in evil, but to resist him by honest reprehension. The second remedy is the example of St. Hilary, who prevailed against the Pontiff by prayer. The whole Church therefore is to pray for such an incorrigible Pope, that God may correct him, or take him away. For God would never despise his Church, that he would not hear; and a Council is to be called against him, if he is unwilling to call one. In that case the Cardinals may summon."†

After citing from the canon law the quotation referred to, the Archbishop says, respecting a wicked Pope: "If it should happen that some may be chosen to the Papacy who are not good men, they may, nevertheless, be sometimes good Prelates. For charity alone simply makes them so. But one can be a good Prelate by prudence and knowledge, as it respects his intellect, in the exercise of which he can be useful in governing others. For it is said that the government of the Church is not to be committed to the ignorant or the unskilful. And in this appears the singular providence of God, by which he governs his Church well and usefully by the instrumentality of wicked men. But if such be chosen to the Papacy, who is a wicked man, and a bad Prelate; nevertheless, the power of such is from God, and under such a government the predestinate are purified and saved, and the wicked are subdued and condemned. Yet the Bishop is always to be honoured on account of his dignity."‡

Now as bad or wicked men are generally acknowledged to be lawful Pontiffs, and as a large number of them were of that character, it is no wonder that immoral Clergy were considered equally lawful. Consequently, profligate laymen may be good Christians, or, in other words, good Catholics, and placed among the faithful in the Church of Rome. Thus immorality is not only sanctioned and tolerated, but supported, in this apostate Church, from His Holiness downward through all the ranks of the hierarchy to the flocks, who, however wicked and depraved, are allowed to boast in the name of faithful and good people.

Hence the following from the Florentine Prelate:— "And since the Pope can do all things, and many more, he can also do that which is common to all; namely, he can err and sin, and may be more severely punished in hell than others, unless he repent. For he may commit simony, according to St. Thomas, in giving spiritual benefits for temporal ones for reward, as is reported of Boniface IX.; and he may become a heretic, as is said concerning Liberius or Leo; and he may perniciously favour heretics, as is written of Anastasius; and he may be guilty of necromancy, as is said in the annals of a certain Pope Sylvester, a magian, but he repented; and he may be involved in rapine, as Peter Damian says of Benedict; he may also be given to luxury, as is said in the annals of John XI., who, when he was in the act of adultery, was suddenly smitten by the devil; he may also commit any other crimes. Nevertheless, on these accounts, obedience, or due reverence, is not to be withdrawn from him, on account of the person whom he represents, (namely, our Lord Jesus Christ,) unless he become a heretic; nor can his election be affected or invalidated by any one, if it be made by two-thirds of the Cardinals, unless on account of heresy, if he remain in it."*

XIII. That the Pope can DECIDE CONTROVERSIES is another prerogative claimed by him, and for him by those who adhere to the supremacy.

1. It is a power which is ascribed to the Pontiff, that to him pertains the right to decide controversies in faith, morals, and discipline. The primitive church knew of no such prerogative, nor did they apply for its exercise in any case of difficulty.

2. Irenæus, Tertullian, Justin Martyr, and other apologists and champions of Christianity, when treating on subjects of controversy, never had recourse to the Pope's authority, as a mode of deciding doubtful questions. Many opposed the opinions of the Bishop of Rome, and were condemned for doing so. Polycarp dissented from Eleutherius; Polycrates, from Victor; Cyprian, from Stephen; Dionysius of Alexandria, from Stephen. All these were men distinguished for wisdom and piety in that early day.

3. The most notable controversies were decided by Synods or Councils by Scripture, history, or what was then called tradition, the dictates of reason, and the fitness of things, without any reference to the Pontiff, as such. Several Councils of Africa and Asia defined the point concerning re-baptization, without the leave of the Pope, and even contrary to his expressed opinion. The Council of Antioch condemned the doctrine of Paul of Samosata, without any interference of the Pope, and even before they gave him notice of such dispute. The Pope had but little to do in the first Council of Nice. The General Synod of Constantinople decided the question respecting the divinity of the Holy Ghost against Macedonius, without the aid of the Pope, who subsequently did no more than express his consent. The Council of Africa condemned Pelagius independent of the Romish Bishop.

4. Many Popes have been heretical, and incapable of correcting others. This was the case with Stephen, Liberius, Felix, Vigilius, Honorius, &c.

5. The expositions of certain Pontiffs, on several portions of holy Scripture, amply prove their utter incompetency to decide controversy.

CHAPTER XIII.

SUPREMACY CONTINUED—PREROGATIVES OF THE POPE.

XIV. WHETHER THE POPE IS ABOVE A COUNCIL. Romanists are divided on this subject. 1. Some maintain that the Pope is above a Council. Baronius, Gelasius I., Pighius, Benedict XIV., Dens, and the fifth Council of Lateran, cited: 2. Others maintain the superiority of a Council. Pope Leo, Council of Constance, Council of Basil, quoted: 3. The question much debated: 4. Anciently the Pope was considered inferior to a Council: 5. Their arguments for the superiority of a Council from Almain: 6. Opinions of opponents from Cajetan: 7. In the twelfth century, and subsequently, the Pontiffs did every thing

* Antonini Summa Theol., pars iii., tit. xxii., cap. iv., sect. iii. Fol., 1485.

† Idem.

‡ Idem, tit. xxii., cap. ii.

* Idem, cap. vii.

they saw fit in Councils. Sentiment of Ennodius, namely, That the Pope by virtue of his office was holy. Du Pin cited: 3. The supremacy cannot be supported by universal tradition.—XV. THE INFALLIBILITY OF THE POPE. 1. Distinctions and explanations on questions of right, and of fact. Of speaking ex cathedra, and as a private individual: 2. Some believe the Pope to be infallible. Dens, Pighius, Bishop Hay, Cajetan, the Jesuits: 3. Others do not believe it. The French Divines: 4. The common opinion according to Ferraris: 5. Great diversity in the sentiments of the Papacy. Lieberman cited. Their evasion concerning opinions. The evasive doctrine of Bishop Hay. Contests in France in 1661. Doctrine of the Gallic Church censured: 6. The arguments which are brought to support it considered: 7. Arguments against the infallibility of the Pope. General Councils have decided against it: 8. The expositions of some Popes are positive proofs against their infallibility. Exposition of Jer. i. 10, by five Popes: 9. The ancient Christians did not refer to it as a mode of deciding controversies: 10. If the Pope were infallible, the consent of the Church were unnecessary: 11. Popes have contradicted Popes in faith and morals. Instances adduced: 12. Some have issued, officially, impious and wicked decrees: 13. Others have contradicted Scripture: 14. Some have been heretics, and taught heresy: 15. Others have made ignorant and foolish decisions: 16. Some have decided to suit their passions: 17. Others sophistically: 18. A few have adopted a new creed: 19. Some have decided contrary to General Councils: 20. The manner in which the charge of heresy has been evaded. Authors cited: 21. Whether the Pope can fall into heresy, or lose faith, as a private person. Ferraris cited. Opinion of Dens: 22. Conclusion.

XIV. WHETHER the Pope be above a Council, is a point on which the Roman Church is divided into two parts. One maintains that he is above a Council; and this party generally believe that he is also infallible. The other suppose that he is inferior to a Council, and can be corrected by it.

1. We refer to the statements of those who assert that the Pope is above a Council. Bellarmine stands foremost in this division of the Roman Catholic Church.* Baronius, the great annalist and supporter of supremacy, considers this an error in Hincmar, Bishop of Rheims, "That he held, as if the canons of Councils were of greater authority in the church of God than the decrees Popes; which," says he, "is an absurd and unreasonable opinion."† Gelasius I. declares, "That the authority of the Apostolic See in all Christian ages has been preferred before the universal Church, and that both the canons of our predecessors and manifold traditions confirm it."‡ Nothing can be more destitute of foundation than this assertion.

Pighius, who died A. D. 1543, and wrote, among others, a work on the Hierarchy in six books, dedicated to Paul III., towards the conclusion of his treatise, writes: "Unless I am deceived, it is sufficiently demonstrated from these things, that all the authority of Councils is derived entirely from that of the Apostolic See; from it alone they receive their influence and force; it was ever the controller in all Councils, and the infallible rule of orthodox faith, and not the contrary. Councils, without the authority of the Pope, however full and universal, not only can err, but have frequently erred even in the definition and business of faith. But the Pope never erred: he was the rule of orthodox faith, which he received from the beginning pure from the chief Apostles; he hath continually preserved it, and will preserve it to the end. He always succoured erring Councils."*

Benedict XIV., who was elected A. D. 1740, affirms, that "the Pope is above a Council."† Dens, after explaining that the inquiry is not concerning a Council convened by the Pope, but, "whether a General Council taken by itself without the Pope, but nevertheless legitimately called, is above the Pope?—Answer. The French hold the affirmative: out of France it is generally maintained that the Pope is above a Council, so that he can transfer it, dissolve it," &c.‡ The fifth Council of Lateran says, "It is manifest that the Roman Pontiff hath a power embracing authority over General Councils."§ On this Bailly observes, "We do not acknowledge the fifth Lateran Council as œcumenical, so that to this day, as Bellarmine says, it remains a question among Catholics."‖

2. There are others who are of the opinion, that a Council is superior to a Pope.

Leo, in his ninety-third letter, directed to Theodoret, having learned that the orthodox faith had triumphed over the errors of the Nestorians and Eutychians in the Council of Chalcedon, expressed his joy "that the Synod had confirmed, by its judgment, that which was not subject to amendment, namely, the doctrines which he asserted." Du Pin observes, "These words are very remarkable, because they evidently prove, that there is

[* "Summus Pontifex simpliciter et absolute est supra Ecclesiam universam, et supra Concilium Generale, ita ut nullum in terris supra se judicium agnoscat. Hæc etiam est fere de fide, et probatur primo ex duabus præcedentibus; nam si Papa est caput Ecclesiæ universæ, etiam simul congregatæ, et Ecclesia universa, etiam simul congregata, non habet ullam potestatem ratione suæ totalitatis; sequitur Papam supra Concilium esse, et supra Ecclesiam; non contra," &c.—Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii., De Concilii Auctoritate, lib. ii., cap. xvii., col. 95, C. Coloniæ, 1620.]

[† "At quantum halucinatus sit Hincmarus ista delirans, jam paucis ostendamus. Ex his omnibus recitatis a Gerberto ex Hincmaro tres haud leves numerantur errores, atque primus ille, ex quo reliqui, dum videlicet subjicit decreta Romanorum Pontificum quibuscumque canonibus Conciliorum; dum enim illa temporaria, perpetui isti ab eodem asseruntur, et illa per istos abrogari tradit, plane significat majoris esse auctoritatis in ecclesia Dei canones Conciliorum decretis Pontificum. Hæc quam sint absurda, et ab omni ratione penitus aliena, quæ sæpe superius sunt allata, demonstrant, hic breviter repetenda."—Baronii Annales Eccles., A. D. 992, tom. x., p. 886, E. Antverpiæ, 1603.]

[‡ "Apostolicæ vero Sedis auctoritas, quod cunctis seculis Christianis Ecclesiæ prælata sit universæ, et canonum serie paternorum, et multiplici traditione firmatur."—Conc. Labb., tom. iv., Gelas. Papæ I., epist. viii., col. 1185, B. Paris, 1671.

[* "Satis ergo, ni fallor, ex his demonstratum est, omnem prorsus actionem Conciliorum omnium ex unius Apostolicæ Sedis auctoritate dependere; ab ea sola suam auctoritatem, suum robur accipere; eam esse fuisseque semper Conciliis omnibus moderatricem et orthodoxæ fidei regulam infallibilem, non vice versa; illa siquidem, hujus sedis auctoritate seclusa, quantumvis frequentia et universalia, non solum errare posse, sed errasse frequenter, etiam in fidei definitione et negotio; hanc vero nunquam, sed normam orthodoxæ fidei, ut eam ab initio accepit ab Apostolorum principibus illibatam, conservasse perpetuo, et conservaturam ad finem; errantibus Conciliis hanc semper succurrisse."—Pighius, De Hierarch. Ecclesiast., lib. vi., cap. xi. Fol. Coloniæ, 1538. See also Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., vol. iii., p. 393. Dublin, 1723.

† "Qui (Romanus Pontifex) supra Concilium est."—Benedict. XIV., de Synod., tom. iii., lib. xiii., cap. xii., sect. ii., p. 460. Mechlinæ, 1842.

‡ "Quæritur ergo, utrum Concilium Generale, seorsim sumptum sine Pontifice, sed tamen legitime congregatum, sit supra Pontificem?—R. Affirmativam tuentur Galli: extra Galliam communiter sustinetur Pontificem esse Concilio Generali superiorem, adeo ut possit illud transferre, dissolvere," &c.—Dens Theolog., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, No. 95.

[§ "Cum etiam solum Romanum Pontificem pro tempore existentem, tamquam auctoritatem super omnia Concilia habentem, tam Conciliorum indicendorum, transferendorum, ac dissolvendorum plenum jus et potestatem habere, nedum ex sacræ Scripturæ testimonio, dictis sanctorum patrum, ac aliorum Romanorum Pontificum etiam prædecessorum nostrorum, sacrorumque canonum decretis, sed propria etiam eorumdem Conciliorum confessione manifeste constet, quorum aliqua referre placuit, reliqua vero, utpote notoria, silentio præterire."—Conc. Labb., tom. xix., Conc. Lat. V., sess. xi., col. 967, D. Venet., 1728.]

[‖ "Concilium Lateranense V. non agnoscimus ut œcumenicum. Ideo usque ad hanc diem, inquit Bellarminus, quæstio superest inter Catholicos."—Bailly, Theologia, tom. ii., De Ecclesia, cap. xiii., art. iv.]

no judgment, but that of a universal Council, which may not be re-examined, and that the judgment of the Pope himself is subject to amendment."* Leo I. was elected Pope A. D. 440, and died A. D. 461.

Almain maintained, in opposition to Cardinal Cajetan, that the Pope is inferior to a Council.† The Synod of Constance, held A. D. 1415, asserts, "This holy Synod decrees and declares, that it being legitimately assembled in the Holy Ghost, forming a General Council and representing the Catholic Church, hath its power immediately from Christ; which every person of every condition or dignity, even the Papal, is bound to obey in those things which concern the faith and the extirpation of the aforesaid schism, and the reformation of the Church in its head and members.—Whosoever, of any condition, state, or dignity, even Papal, pertinaciously disdains to obey the commands and statutes of this Synod, and any other General Council lawfully assembled, should be subjected to proper penance and properly punished, unless he repent."‡ The Council of Basil confirmed the decision of Constance respecting the power of the Pope; and decreed, "First, That it is a verity of the Catholic faith, that the holy General Council has power over the Pope and every other person. Secondly, That the General Council being lawfully assembled, cannot be dissolved, translated, nor adjourned by the authority of the Pope, without its own consent. Thirdly, He that does obstinately resist these truths ought to be accounted heretical."§ The Faculty of Divinity in Paris, in a declaration made to the King, May 8th, A. D. 1663, declare, in their fifth article, "That the Pope is not above a Council."‖

3. This question has been debated with vigour among the Romanists; but the greater number, as Eneas Sylvius, (afterward Pius II.,) adhere to the side of the Pope, because it is said he disposes of benefices, whereas Councils do not give any. As the Pope has been the supreme executive power in the Church of Rome, and has therefore the gift or confirmation of her emoluments, he has so far prevailed by this tremendous power, as entirely to subvert the authority of Councils, and the greater number of the Bishops have embraced his opinions, and obey his mandates.

4. Anciently the Pope was not considered to be above Councils; for "greater is the authority of the world than of one city."* This has been so fully shown in this "Delineation," that we need not again enlarge.

5. We proceed to examine the arguments adduced by Romanists themselves, in order to prove that a Council is superior to the Pope; and perhaps the greatest champion in favour of this point, is Almain, who wrote in the sixteenth century, and was the antagonist of Cardinal Cajetan, who maintained opposite views. We introduce an outline of his arguments as collected by Du Pin. In his treatise on the "Authority of the Church and Councils," he lays it down as a principle, that Jesus Christ gave the ecclesiastical power immediately to his church; and concludes against the Cardinal, that the Church, or General Council that represents the Church, is superior in power to the Pope. He proves this proposition, (1.) By the testimony of St. Augustine, who, speaking of the decree of Pope Miltiades, says, that supposing that he had not determined aright, recourse might have been had to a full Synod of the universal Church. (2.) By the twenty-first canon of the eighth General Council, which allows that General Synods should examine the decisions of the Popes. (3.) By the testimony of Damasus, who remitted the judgment of Bonosus to the Council. (4.) Because, according to St. Augustine's opinion, St. Peter received the keys, as he represented the Church. (5.) That it would be strange, if when the Pope should make an ill use of his authority, there should be no power that could hinder him from ruining the Church and himself. (6.) The Pope, being a son of the Church, ought to submit to it. (7.) When there is a double election, so that there are two who claim a right to the Papacy at the same time, it is necessary there should be a judge who has power to determine which of the two has the prior claim. This judge must be the superior, and cannot be any other than the Church. (8.) Jerome and the Popes acknowledge this superiority in the Church, and in the Synod representing the Church, which indeed is founded on the light of nature; so that the General Council, whether the Pope be assisting in it or not, as it represents the whole Catholic Church, is always superior to the Pontiff.

"It is objected against this doctrine, (1.) That the Pope is head of the universal Church. (2.) That it was only to St. Peter that Jesus Christ said, 'Feed my sheep;' and that thereby he constituted him Monarch of the Church and sole and universal Pastor; and that the members of his Council are his sheep. (3.) That the Pope is Bishop of the whole Church, as every Bishop is of his own diocess. (4.) That the Pope has a sovereign power in the Church, and consequently there can be no power above it, or equal to it. (5.) That the Pope is the immediate Vicar of Jesus Christ, and not of the Apostles. And, (6.) That the General Councils receive their authority from the Pope."† Almain proceeds to answer these objections, which contain the leading principles of those who maintain the superiority of the Pope to a Council. It were useless to adduce all those arguments by which this class of Romanists attempt to support their doctrines. Bailly enumerates many of them; and the following are the principles upon which they are founded:—

"That the power of the Pope is not exercised or governed by his own will, but according to the received rules of the Church, and by the canons, especially those

* Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., vol. i., p. 474. Fol. Dublin, 1723.

† Idem, vol. iii., p. 285.

‡ "Hæc sancta Synodus decernit et declarat, quod ipsa, in Spiritu Sancto legitime congregata, Concilium Generale faciens et Ecclesiam Catholicam repræsentans, potestatem immediate a Christo habet, cui quilibet, cujuscumque status vel dignitatis, etiamsi Papalis, existat, obedire tenetur in his quæ pertinent ad fidem et extirpationem dicti schismatis et reformationem dictæ Ecclesiæ, in capite et in membris.—Quicumque cujuscumque conditionis, status, et dignitatis, etiamsi Papalis, qui mandatis et statutis seu ordinationibus aut præceptis hujus sacræ Synodi et cujuscumque alterius Concilii universalis legitime congregati, super præmissis, seu ad ea pertinentibus, factis vel faciendis obedire contumaciter contempserit, nisi resipuerit, condignæ pœnitentiæ subjiciatur, et debite puniatur."—Conc. Labb., tom. xii., Conc. Constantien., sess. v., col. 22, C. Paris, 1671.

[§ "Veritas de potestate Concilii Generalis, universalem Ecclesiam repræsentantis, supra Papam et quemlibet alterum, declarata per Constantiense et hoc Basileense Generalia Concilia, est veritas fidei Catholicæ. Veritas hæc, quod Papa Concilium Generale, universalem Ecclesiam repræsentans, actu legitime congregatum super declaratis in præfata veritate, aut aliquo eorum, sine ejus consensu nullatenus auctoritative potest dissolvere, aut ad aliud tempus prorogare, aut de loco ad locum transferre, est veritas fidei Catholicæ. Veritatibus duabus prædictis pertinaciter repugnans est censendus hæreticus."—Idem, Conc. Basil., sess. xxxiii., col. 619, B. Vide etiam, sess. xxxviii, col. 630, A. See also Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., vol. iii., p. 38. Fol. Dublin, 1723.]

‖ Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., cent. xvii., p. 150. Fol. Oxford, 1725.

* "Si auctoritas quæritur, orbis major est urbe."—Hieron. Opera, tom. iv., epist. ci., (alias lxxxv.,) Ad Evang., col. 803. Ed. Bened. Paris, 1706.

† Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., vol. iii., p. 285. Fol. Dublin, 1723.

made by General Councils.—That the government of the Church is monarchical, but mixed, or regulated by aristocracy. First. It is monarchical; for a monarchical government is that in which some one person is superior, who has the right of introducing laws, and to whom obedience is due. But in the Church the Pope is superior to others; he has the right of introducing laws, and obedience is due to him, unless the Church object. This is the doctrine of Cardinal de Alliaco, Gerson, Almain, and constantly of the sacred Faculty of Paris. Secondly. This government is not purely monarchical, but it is regulated by aristocracy; for the power of the Pope is not absolute, nor is it altogether independent, but is tempered by the authority of Bishops, who are the (optimates) nobles, who receive their authority from Christ, and who, taken collectively, and united in a General Council, are superior in authority to the Roman Pontiff." *

Almain maintained that the final decision of subjects of faith belonged to a General Council. Cajetan contended that it pertained to the Pope, and that all his decrees on points of faith were infallible. The former asserts the contrary, namely, that the Pope may be deceived in judging; and he endeavoured to prove this proposition from numerous instances in which the Pontiffs contradicted each other in their decrees.

6. Cajetan was the champion of the Pope for the supremacy of the see of Rome. He maintained that "the Pope's authority is sovereign in the Church, and that Jesus Christ gave the keys only to St. Peter, that he and his successors might enjoy the sovereignty; that the Apostles, as such, were all equal, and received their apostleship immediately from Christ: but if they be considered as sheep of Christ, they belonged to Peter, whom Christ constituted the only and sovereign Pastor of the flock. There are five things in which the power of Peter differed from that of the other Apostles; namely, (1.) It belonged to Peter according to the natural order, but to the rest of the Apostles by a special grace. (2.) He was constituted the Vicar-General of Jesus Christ; whereas the other Apostles were only lieutenants or delegates. (3.) He was invested with authority and power over the other Apostles; whereas they had no authority over one another. (4.) The power of the rest of the Apostles was to cease in their persons; whereas that of Peter was to continue in his successors. (5.) That of the other Apostles was only executive, whereas the power of Peter was legislative." †

These are distinctions which previously were little heard of; and which Cajetan founded on comparatively frivolous conjectures. To prove that the Apostles had only an executive power, he adduces the words in the preface of the mass, where it is said of them, that "they are the Vicars of the work of Jesus Christ;" (quos operis tui Vicarios;) on which he observes, that they are not said absolutely to be "the Vicars of Jesus Christ," but "the Vicars of his work," that is, "Vicars for executing." The replies which he gives to certain objections which he raised against himself are similar to the preceding.

The same authority maintained, that "if we take the Church and the Council in conjunction with the Pope, they have no more power or authority than the Pope has alone, and that the Church and Council, without the Pope, have no power at all, being an imperfect body, a trunk without a head." *

Cajetan, endeavouring to destroy the authority of the Councils of Constance and Basil, in opposing the Synod of Pisa, affirms, "that the Church, without the Pope, has no authority to make laws, or to judge of persons, or to hold a full and perfect Council. Yet in some certain cases a Synod may be called without the Pope's authority; as when the Pope refuses to call it when he is required, or if he deserve to be deposed as a heretic, or if there be several persons who pretend to the Papacy, and strive for it. But the power of this Council is restrained to the single point of determining what concerns the Pontificate; and in every other case, if a General Synod were called when there is a Pope whose right is not controverted, and who is not a heretic, the meeting of such an assembly would be to no purpose, because the Pope has power to annul every thing that it can do or order. Though the Pope, being a heretic, has no superior whose authority is absolute above his own, yet there is a ministerial power which may depose him. There are three things to be distinguished,—the Papal authority, the person of the Pope, and the union of his person with the authority. Though the Papal power be immediately from God, yet the union of that with the person of such a man is made by human election. So that a man may be Pope, and may cease to be so, dependently on human power, which is neither superior nor equal to himself, but is even inferior. And this has no right over the union of that power with the person of such a man. A Pope cannot be deposed for any other crime but heresy; for it is only in such a case that the law of God requires he should be set aside; thus he is above all other laws, and infidelity or heresy are the only things which are directly contrary to the conditions requisite for being a Pontiff.

"There are six cases in which the Church may depose a Pope. (1.) In that of perpetual captivity. (2.) Of incurable madness. (3.) If all the Cardinals should happen to die, after the election of a Pope, and before that election were made public. (4.) When the Cardinals cannot prove that their election was canonical. (5.) If all the world were so prejudiced against the Pontiff, that there were no probability of his being obeyed. In this case he ought not to be deposed. (6.) If the Pope were bound by oath or vow to resign the Papacy, and refused to do so. In this case the Church could not compel him to do so." †

Almain flourished from A. D. 1508 to A. D. 1515; Cajetan, from A. D. 1508 to A. D. 1534. The latter, A. D. 1508, when thirty-nine years of age, was chosen General of the Dominican order. Shortly after, he undertook the defence of the Pope's sovereign authority against the Council of Pisa, and for this purpose he wrote a treatise. The services which he performed on that occasion were well rewarded by His Holiness; for De Vio was made Bishop of Cajeta, and afterward Archbishop of Parma, and finally Cardinal by Leo X., A. D. 1517, by whom he was sent Legate to Germany to oppose Luther. When Cajetan published his book on the Pope's supremacy, about the year 1511, it was forwarded by the Council of Pisa to the Faculty of Divinity in Paris, that they might write an answer to it. They laid the charge of this on Almain, who performed his task so well, that his treatise was approved both by the Faculty and the court. Nevertheless, the sentiments of Cajetan have generally prevailed, and obtained dominancy in the Church of Rome, as is manifest from the decisions of the Council of Trent, and the manner in which they have been received.

[* "Ex eo quod Romanus Pontifex Conciliis Generalibus sit inferior, sequitur, 1. Ipsius potestatem non proprio arbitrio, sed juxta receptas Ecclesiæ regulas, et canones præsertim a Conciliis œcumenicis constitutos, esse exercendam ac moderandam, in eoque positus est tertius Cleri Gallicani declarationis articulus. Sequitur, 2. Regimen Ecclesiæ esse monarchicum, sed aristocratia temperatum. (1.) Est monarchicum; nam regimen monarchicum illud intelligitur, in quo est aliquis superior qui jus habeat ferendi leges, et cui debeatur obsequium; atqui in Ecclesia S. Pontifex est aliis superior, jus habet ferendi leges, et ipsi debetur obsequium, nisi reclamaverit Ecclesia. Hæc est doctrina Cardinalis de Alliaco, Gersonii, Almaini, et constanter sacræ Facultatis Parisiensis. (2.) Regimen illud non est pure monarchicum, sed aristocratia temperatum; nempe potestas Romani Pontificis non est absoluta nec prorsus independens, sed temperatur auctoritate Episcoporum, qui sunt Ecclesiæ optimates, qui suam a Christo potestatem acceperunt, quique collective sumpti ac in Concilio Generali adunati, sunt Romano Pontifice auctoritate superiores."—Bailly, Theol., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, cap. xiii., art. iv.]

† Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., vol. iii., p. 364. Fol. Dublin, 1723

[* Idem.] [† Idem.]

7. In the twelfth century, and afterwards, the Popes directed affairs in the Councils according to their own pleasure. With the exception of the Synods of Constance, Basil, and Pisa, all were directed by the Pontiffs, even from the first Lateran Council, A. D. 1123, to that of Trent, A. D. 1545. So that the power of the Roman Prelate over these Synods was finally completed; and this is, at present, the recognised doctrine of the Church of Rome.

The professed sanctity of the reigning Pope, by virtue of his office, had, by reason of the corruption and ignorance of the times, advanced to considerable maturity. This sentiment was promulgated by Ennodius, Bishop of Pavia, who died A. D. 521. Writing in defence of Symmachus, he took occasion to state, "that the Pope had no need of reformation, because he that was promoted to this dignity was holy, and God would not suffer that he who held a place so eminent should be corrupted; that in strictness the Pope could not be judged by a Council, yet he had voluntarily subjected himself to its judgment." * In commenting on this sentiment, which was seriously advocated, Du Pin observes, "I do not think that there are many who will pass this proposition, that a man, being promoted to the Papacy, becomes holy, and that this dignity either finds or makes him so. It is a paradox that may be overthrown by many contrary examples. Yet Ennodius had no other way to exempt the Pope from the jurisdiction of a Council, and in effect there is no other way to do it; for it is against order that there should be no remedy to hinder the excesses and exorbitancies of the first Bishop of the Church: and therefore, if all men be agreed that this way is indefensible, and that the Popes may be corrupt and disorderly, is it not necessary that a Council should be able to remedy this inconvenience? and how can this be done, unless it has a right to judge the Pope?"

The same historian remarks, on the ecclesiastical affairs of the twelfth century, that "the most part of the Councils were called either by them or by their Legates, and they were the authors of the constitutions that were made therein, and to which the Bishops scarce did any thing else but give their consent." † Although the term œcumenical or General was applied to the eight Councils held in the Levant, which were composed principally of Bishops of the eastern churches; those of the western being represented by the Legates of the See of Rome, who were often accompanied by few or none of the Bishops: but after the separation of the Greek and Latin hierarchies, the succeeding General Synods were composed chiefly of western Prelates, convened by the Popes, who published decisions conformable to the doctrine and discipline which those Prelates approved. In the greater part of them, almost every thing was accomplished at the beck of the Pope.*

8. From the preceding we may legitimately infer, that the Pope cannot lay claim to supremacy on the ground of universal tradition, or, in other words, by the voice of ancient history; and if he cannot establish his right by this argument, how can it be proved? Certainly not by Scripture, nor by the decrees of ancient Synods.

XV. The infallibility of the Pope.

Among Romanists there exists a great diversity of opinion concerning this doctrine: some deny it altogether, others qualify it, and a few hold it as an article of faith.

1. Several distinctions are made by Divines, an explanation of which will be necessary, in order to understand their statements, as well as the line of argument they pursue. These concern questions of fact and of faith; speaking ex cathedra, and as a private Doctor or individual. We adduce the definitions from Dens † and Bailly; ‡ the latter denying, with the French Divines, the absolute infallibility of the Pontiff, and the former as resolutely affirming it.

There is, says Dens, one question of right (juris) and another of fact (facti). A question of right, or of faith or doctrine (dogmatis), is that in which it is inquired what is this or that doctrine in itself, whether true or false, Catholic or heretic, &c.; for instance, whether Christ is consubstantial with the Father. A question of fact is that in which it is inquired, what is the doctrine contained in these propositions, books, or authors; namely, whether the heresy which denies the Word to be consubstantial with the Father, is contained in the writings of Arius. Questions of fact are distinguished in a threefold point of view. (1.) A fact may be immediately revealed; for example, the incarnation of the Word. (2.) A fact may be merely historical or personal, which refers to the truth of the thing done, or the state, condition, internal sense of the mind, guilt or innocence, of any person. (3.) A fact may be dogmatic, which attributes an article of faith to any book or person.

The Pope is said to define or speak ex cathedra, but sometimes not. "He is considered," says Dens, "to speak

* Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., vol. i., p. 531.

† Idem, vol. ii., p. 395.

* Idem, vol. ii., p. 388.

[† "Prænotandum, 1. Aliam esse quæstionem juris, aliam facti: quæstio 'juris' seu dogmatis ea est, qua quæritur, qualis sit in se hæc vel illa doctrina, an vera, an falsa, Catholica, an hæretica, &c.; v. g., an Christus sit Patri consubstantialis. Quæstio 'facti' illa est, qua quæritur, quænam sit doctrina his propositionibus, vel libris, vel authoribus expressa; v. g., an hæresis, quæ negat Verbum esse Patri consubstantiale, contineatur in scriptis Ariis. Prænotandum, 2. Triplex distingui factum; aliud enim est immediate revelatum, v. g., incarnatio verbi. Aliud est factum mere historicum et personale, quod respicit rei gestæ veritatem, vel personæ alicujus statum, conditionem, internum animi sensum, crimen vel innocentiam. Aliud factum est dogmaticum, quod aliquod fidei dogma attribuit alicui libro vel personæ."—Dens Theolog., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, No. 84, De Authoritate Ecclesiæ circa Quæstiones Facti.

["Pontifex censetur loqui ex cathedra, quando loquitur ex plenitudine potestatis, præscribens universali Ecclesiæ aliquid tanquam dogma fidei credendum, vel in moribus observandum, aut acceptandum tanquam bonum vel religiosum."—Idem, No. 96, De Infallibilitate Summi Pontificis.]

[‡ "Romanum Pontificem aliquid ex cathedra definire, cum agit et loquitur ut Pontifex Supremus, ut Petri successor, ut Pastor universalis, seu totius Ecclesiæ caput; tunc, inquiunt, reapse docet ex cathedra Pontificia, et tanquam sedens in cathedra Petri, cujus munere fungitur."—Bailly, Theolog., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, cap. xiii., art. iii., An Romanus Pontifex errare possit.]

ex cathedra when he speaks from the plenitude of his power, prescribing to the universal Church anything to be believed as an article of faith, or to be observed in morals, or received as good and religious." Or, as Bailly explains it, "the Pope defines ex cathedra when he acts and speaks as supreme Pontiff, as the successor to Peter, as universal Pastor, or head of the whole Church; then he truly teaches ex cathedra, pontifically, and sitting, as it were, in the chair of Peter, whose office he holds."

The Pope may be considered speaking as a private person, or Doctor, when he writes a private letter, or a book, &c. "All," says Dens, "acknowledge that the Church is infallible in facts immediately revealed. All admit that the Church can err in facts purely historical and personal."* In reference to the Pope, he affirms, "The chief Pontiff, as also an entire General Council, can err in mere facts, or in things not pertaining to faith or morals. He can also err when he does not speak ex cathedra; but when he speaks ex cathedra he is infallible." †

Many others deny the infallibility of the Pope; and among those who support it, are some who do so with this qualification, that the consent of the Bishops is necessary to decide finally on the infallibility of his decision. The gist of the controversy, however, is between those who maintain the Pope's infallibility, and those who reject it in common with the Protestants, with whom this class make it a kind of open question.

2. Some believe the Pope to be infallible, from whose statements we adduce the following:—Dens affirms, "The chief Pontiff, defining ex cathedra things pertaining to faith or manners, is infallible; which infallibility proceeds from the special assistance of the Holy Spirit."‡ Pighius declares, that "the judgment of the Apostolic See, with a Council of domestic Priests, is far more certain than the judgment of a universal Council of the whole earth without the Pope." §

Bishop Hay says, "When the head of the Church, without calling together the other Pastors, publishes any decree concerning faith or morals, and this decree is accepted and received by the body of the Pastors, either expressly or tacitly, it then becomes a decree of the whole Church, and of the same infallible authority as if it had been made in a General Council." ‖

"Q. 27. On what grounds do those Divines found their opinion, who believe that the Pope himself, when he speaks to all the faithful, as head of the Church, is infallible in what he teaches?—A. On several very strong reasons, both from Scripture, tradition, and reason. Q. 28. What proofs do they bring from Scripture?" After enumerating the case of the High Priest, "Thou art Peter," "Feed my sheep," he says, "Whence it follows, that St. Peter, as head of the Church, and consequently his successors in office, shall never fail in faith, nor teach false doctrine. Q. 29. What proofs of the infallibility of the head of the Church do they bring from tradition?—A. From the testimonies of the holy Fathers from the very earliest ages, which show that this was the belief of the Church in their days. Q. 30. What proofs are brought from reason?—A. The proofs from reason are founded on facts, and on principles received by all members of the Church as divine truths: for, (1.) There never was an instance of any Pope who proposed a doctrine to be believed by the Church, that was contrary to the sacred truths of faith revealed by Christ; for though there have been a few, and only a few, Popes that were bad men in their own practice, yet the most inveterate adversaries of the Catholic faith could never yet show that any Pope ever taught bad doctrine. From all which the infallibility of the head of the Church naturally flows; for if Christ oblige all to be united with him in faith and doctrine, he surely is obliged to preserve him from teaching false doctrine." The Bishop concludes, that there are no solid proofs against the infallibility of the Pope; and infers that "the church of Christ is the sacred rule of faith and the supreme judge of controversy, and that she is fully qualified by her divine Spouse to discharge this office, so as to pronounce sentence upon every point of revelation clearly and distinctly, and with infallible certainty."

Cajetan maintains that "the last decision in matters of faith belongs to the Pope; and that all his decrees on such topics are infallible." *

In 1661, a Jesuit maintained, in the college of that Society at Paris, a thesis, in which he inserted this proposition: "Jesus Christ has granted to St. Peter and his successors, as often as they speak ex cathedra, the same infallibility which he had himself;" from whence he concluded, that "there is in the Roman Church an infallible judge of controversies, even excluding a General Council, as well in questions of right as in those of fact; and that since the Constitutions of Innocent X. and Alexander VII. have been published, all ought to believe, as an article of faith, that the book which bears for its title 'The Augustinus of Jansenius' is heretical, and that the five propositions taken out of this book pertain to that Divine, and are condemned in his meaning." Shortly after, the author of the thesis published the following explanation:—"First, that he did not acknowledge in the Pope the same personal infallibility which is in Jesus Christ, but only an infallibility of assistance, whereby the Vicars of Jesus Christ are rendered infallible in their definitions. Second, upon his having extended this infallibility to questions of fact, he declares that he spoke only of facts joined to questions of faith, such as that of Jansenius." †

4. Some Romanists do not receive this dogma. The sixth article of the declaration of the Faculty of Divinity in Paris, presented to the King, May 8th, 1631, contains the following:—"That it is not the doctrine or opinion of the Faculty, that the Pope is infallible when he has not the concurring consent of the Church." ‡ The Gallic Clergy in those days were opposed to this idea. Of the

[* "Ecclesiam in factis immediate revelatis esse infallibilem, omnes agnoscunt. Omnes admittunt, Ecclesiam errare posse in factis pure historicis et personalibus."—Dens Theolog., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, No. 84.]

[† "Summus Pontifex, sicut et integrum Concilium Generale, errare potest in meris factis, vel in rebus fidem aut mores non concernentibus: quia infallibilitas in talibus non est necessaria ad regimen Ecclesiæ, nec error nocet integritati religionis. Errare etiam potest quando non loquitur ex cathedra. Summus Pontifex ex cathedra definiens res ad fidem vel mores spectantes, est infallibilis, quæ infallibilitas provenit ex speciali assistentia Spiritus Sancti."—Idem, No. 96.]

‡ Dens Theol., tom. ii.; De Ecclesia, No. 96, ut supra.

§ "Longe certius est unius Apostolicæ Sedis cum Concilio domesticorum Sacerdotum judicium, quam sine Pontifice judicium universalis Concilii totius orbis terrarum."—Pighius, De Hierarch. Eccles., lib. vi., cap. xi. Fol. Colon., 1538.

‖ The Sincere Christian instructed, vol. i., pp. 184—190. 12mo. Dublin, 1822.

* Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., vol. iii., p. 285. Fol. Dublin, 1723.

† Idem, cent. xvii., vol. i., book iii., chap. ix., p. 147. Fol. Oxford, 1725.

‡ Idem, p. 150.

same opinion also were the first Councils. The Synods of Basil, Constance, and Pisa declared against it.

5. The following is the common opinion on the subject of the infallibility of the Pope, as held by the Church of Rome in the present day. It is stated by Ferraris: "As it respects the infallibility of the Pope, it is to be observed that he can be considered in a twofold point of view. In the first place, as it regards himself, and as a private person, and a private Doctor. In the second place, he may be considered, in reference to others, as a public man, and master of the universal Church, teaching it ex cathedra, in proposing what is to be believed, or what is to be done. For the Pope to speak ex cathedra is nothing else than that he is constituted by God master of the universal Church, and its visible rule; and hence, by the supreme authority of his pontificate, he can judge and define concerning the doubtful matters in faith, the doctrine of morals, and dogmatic facts, and also teach the Church what she is to believe or do. This is, in reality, the common opinion. Hence, to speak ex cathedra, is not closely confined to those things which the Pope proposes as revealed by God, and to be believed by us with a theological faith; as when he condemns any doctrine as heretical, or defines it to be of faith; it is extended to other things which he proposes to be held or preserved, either when he proscribes any doctrine as rash, scandalous, and the like, or declares any contract or fact to be unlawful and the like."—"It is concluded, from these things briefly noted:—that the decrees which the Pope utters ex cathedra about the doctrine of faith and manners are infallible, is of faith." *

6. As there is great diversity of opinion among Romanists concerning the infallibility of the Pope, warm, and often intemperate, controversies have arisen. The disputants may be divided into two classes; namely, those who believe in the infallibility of the Pontiff, and those who deny it. The former hold the doctrine under so many modifications, that it is difficult to discover the various shapes which the question has assumed. Some grant the Pope the attribute of infallibility in as ample a manner as it was possessed by Jesus Christ, as far as decisions in faith, doctrines, and discipline are concerned. The Jesuits and many others are of this school. Some allow that the decisions of the Roman Bishop are infallible when they are received by the whole Church, or the body of Prelates. The following proposition is maintained by Bailly, who so far limits the infallibility of His Holiness as almost to deny it:—"The Roman Pontiff, though teaching ex cathedra, is not infallible in matters of faith; or his decrees are not irreformable, unless the consent of the Church is added."* Others believe that the Pope is infallible when, by the advice of his domestic Priests or Bishops, he utters anything concerning faith or morals. Of this opinion was Pighius, who was copied by many.

Lieberman asserts, that "from the principles of Catholic faith, it is certain that the chief Pontiff hath the principal part in deciding controversies of faith; and his judgment is irreformable if the consent of the Church be added. But whether his judgment be infallible before the consent of the Church be annexed, is a matter of controversy among Catholics, provided the faith be safe." † From this he deduces the following corollary:—"Therefore the infallibility of the Roman Pontiff cannot be urged against heretics; neither can it be adduced to establish the Catholic faith." ‡

Other shades of doctrine might be brought forward, all of which are liable to further variations, associated with questions of opinion, as distinguished from those of faith and morals, on which the judgment of the Pope is to decide. This is increased by the distinction arising from questions of fact and those of right; the former being subdivided into those which pertain to faith, and those which do not. To decide as a private Doctor, or individual, in the place of speaking ex cathedra, may make a serious distinction in Roman Catholic divinity. From these varieties in the doctrines of the Papacy concerning the infallibility of the Pope, connected with questions of right and of faith, and deciding ex cathedra and otherwise, there is an endless series of doubts and difficulties associated with the doctrine. Hence we discover but little agreement among the Papists when discussing this subject; while their endless evasions meet Protestants at every step of the investigation of the principles, practice, and discipline of the Church of Rome. If the constitution of a Pope be quoted against them, either the decision was only on a matter of opinion, or it was not a question of right; or if it were a fact, it was not one concerning faith or morals; or, at any rate, His Holiness did not speak ex cathedra, or officially, and his sentiment is only that of a private person, or of a mere theologian. But doubts are not yet at an end; for there remain other sources of cavil. The decree may not have been received by all the Bishops, and hence it goes for nothing. On each of these articles we might give numerous examples to prove the evasive manner in which the infallibility of the Pope is made the instrument of prevarication and dispute. Our limits will not allow us to enlarge further than to give a specimen of that of which we complain.

Bishop Hay represents it as no article of faith that the Pope is infallible, and therefore members of his Church may differ among themselves on the point, and yet be good Catholics. He says, concerning the infallibility of the Pope, "As this is a question in which faith is not concerned, because the Church has never given any decision about it, one may believe it or not in his private [* "Quantum ad Papæ infallibilitatem, advertendum est, quod Papa potest considerari dupliciter. Primo, quoad se, et ut persona privata, privatusque Doctor. Secundo, quoad alios, ut persona publica, et magister universalis Ecclesiæ, eam ex cathedra docens, proponendo quid credendum, quidve agendum sit. Loqui autem Papam ex cathedra nihil aliud est, quam ipsum esse a Deo constitutum magistrum universalis Ecclesiæ, et hujus regulam visibilem, indeque auctoritate suprema sui Pontificatus judicare et definire de dubiis fidei, et doctrina morum, ac factis dogmaticis, et sic Ecclesiam docere, quid credere, vel agere debeat; est in re communis. Hinc loqui ex cathedra non arctatur præcise ad ea, quæ Papa proponit ut a Deo revelata, et a nobis credenda fide theologica, uti quando aliquam doctrinam damnat ut hæreticam, vel definit esse de fide; sed insuper extenditur ad cætera, quæ proponit seu tenenda, seu servanda, uti quando aliquam doctrinam proscribit ut temerariam, scandalosam, et hujusmodi, seu declarat aliquem contractum aut factum esse illicitum et hujusmodi"—"His breviter notatis concluditur: quod decreta quæ edit Papa ex cathedra circa doctrinam fidei et morum sunt infallibilia, est de fide."—Ferraris, Biblioth. Prompt., Papa, art. ii., sect. xxxviii.—xli.

* "Romanus Pontifex etiam ex cathedra docens in rebus fidei non est infallibilis, seu irreformabilia non sunt ipsius decreta, nisi accesserit Ecclesiæ consensus."—Bailly, Theolog., tom. ii.; De Ecclesia, cap. xiii., art. 3.

† "Ex principiis fidei Catholicæ certum est, summum Pontificem in dijudicandis fidei controversiis præcipuas partes habere; ejusque judicium, si Ecclesiæ consensus accesserit, esse irreformabile. An autem ante Ecclesiæ consensum infallibile sit, salva fide controvertitur."—Liebermann, Institut. Theolog., tom. ii.; Demonst. Relig. Cath., pars ii., cap. iii., art. 4, sect. iii., p. 518. Fourth edit. Mogunt., 1836.

‡ "Ergo infallibilitas Romani Pontificis urgeri non potest contra hæreticos; neque adhiberi ad stabiliendam fidem Catholicam."—Idem, p. 520.

opinion, according as he thinks the reasons on each side preponderate."* And again, "When the head of the Church publishes any decree concerning faith and morals to which he requires submission from all the faithful, is he himself infallible in what he teaches? Answer. This is not proposed as an article of faith, nor has the Church ever made any decision concerning it. Great numbers of the most learned Divines are of opinion, that in such a case the head of the Church is infallible in what he teaches; but there are others of a contrary opinion, who think that his decree is not to be considered as infallibly certain, till the body of the Bishops receive it, either by their express approbation, or by their tacit submission to it, by which it becomes a decree of the whole Church, whose infallibility is undoubted."† The Romish Prelate, however, treats with the utmost contempt the opinion of those who deny the infallibility of the Pope, and states that they have neither Scripture, tradition, nor argument in support of that notion!

In the year 1661, and subsequently, the doctrine of the infallibility of the Pope created considerable controversy between the Jesuits on the one hand, and the regular Clergy on the other.‡ When the Jesuits maintained their theses, which are mentioned in a preceding page, they were vigorously met by the other Clergy. A tract immediately appeared, entitled, The Frauds of the Jesuits in their Treatise. Shortly after was published a larger work, entitled, A Defence of the Liberties of the Gallican Church, against the Theses of the Jesuits, maintained at Paris, in the College of Clermont, the 12th of December, 1661, addressed to all the Parliaments of France. The followers of Loyola, however, persisted in defending their favourite doctrine. This called for an arrêt of Parliament against it, which again produced the renewal of the declaration of the Faculty of the Sorbonne, passed May, 1661, which was presented to the King by the Archbishop of Paris. The sixth article declared, that "it is not the doctrine or opinion of the Faculty, that the Pope is infallible, when he has not the concurrent consent of the Church." This terminated in another arrêt of Parliament, May 13th, 1663, asserting, that "no one is ignorant of the efforts and artifices practised by the partisans of the Court of Rome above thirty years, to advance the power of the Pope by fictitious prerogatives, and to introduce into those parts of the world the new opinions of ultra-Montanes: that the Parliament, equally jealous of maintaining the royal authority, the rights of the crown, the liberties of the Gallican Church, and the ancient doctrine, to all which these opinions of the infallibility and superiority of the Pope over a Council are directly opposite, has not failed to restrain these enterprises; so that these monsters have been stifled in their birth, and these attempts have been so far from meeting with any success, that they have served only more powerfully to confirm the truth, and to cover with shame the emissaries of the Court of Rome. But since the six propositions contain not only the condemnation of every thing that could establish the superiority of the Pope in temporals, but also whatever could be brought to support the chimera of infallibility, and an imaginary dependence of a Council upon the Pope, it is needless to examine whether all these propositions are conceived in affirmative terms; it being certain that there is no medium between two contradictory propositions; and if the Faculty do not believe that the Pope is infallible, it must, by a necessary consequence, believe that he may fall, or be seduced into error, and corrected by a superior power, which can be no other than that of a Council and the universal Church." The Parliament furthermore prohibits the inculcation of the infallibility of the Pope, because "it was contrary to the ancient doctrine of the Church, the canons of General Councils, the liberties of the Gallican Church, and the ancient decrees of the Faculty of Divinity." Such is a brief outline of the dispute respecting the infallibility of the Pope, between the Jesuits and the Church of France.

The doctrine of the Gallic Church has not escaped censure, it being considered by many in that of Rome as bordering upon heresy. Bellarmine, speaking concerning this sentiment of the French hierarchy, says, "It is not properly heretical; for as yet we see, those who hold this sentiment are until now tolerated by the Church; nevertheless, the opinion seems by all means erroneous, and bordering on heresy."† Lieberman manifests no great friendship for the doctrine of the Gallic Church in 1663. He observes, "I have no disposition to defend their opinion; and, to say the truth, I cannot even now understand what benefit flowed from it to the Church, unless that new seeds of discord were thrown among the children of the same community, who, until that period, dwelt peacefully in the same house; for from that time their minds were heated with contentious altercations."‡ But the Bishop of the Canaries speaks out concerning all who modify in any way the infallibility of the Pope, and considers them as the plagues and destroyers of the Church. He declares, that "the Roman Pontiff cannot err in deciding controversies of faith; and those who teach the contrary are the pest and ruin of the Church."§

7. In support of this infallibility, the advocates adduce Scripture and other proofs. They labour, however, to such an extent in their arguments, that the result evidently shows, that their doctrine is untenable. We may require them to settle this point in their own church, before they present it to others for adoption. To those who assert, and those who deny, the Pope's infallibility,

* Sincere Christian instructed, vol. i., p. 191.

† Idem, p. 185.

[‡ For an account of this disputation, the reader is referred to a volume, entitled, True Catholic and Apostolic Faith maintained in the Church of England, by Andrew Sall, Doctor in Divinity. A new edition, revised and edited, with a Memoir and Notes, illustrative and biographical, by the Rev. Josiah Allport, Minister of St. James, Birmingham, p. 293, et seq. 8vo. London, 1840. The work itself is of immense importance in the controversy with Rome, and deserves to be studied with deep and prayerful attention; but the notes appended to this new edition by Mr. Allport, give to it a tenfold value, which can only be duly appreciated by those who seek authentic information on every point of difference between the Reformed and the Papal hierarchies, and an acquaintance with the spirit and disposition of mind in which all these discussions should, and, in order to permanent utility, must, be conducted.]

* Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., cent. xvii., vol. i., pp. 147—151. Fol. Oxford, 1725.

† "Non est proprie hæretica; nam adhuc videmus ab Ecclesia tolerari, qui illam sententiam sequuntur: tamen videtur omnino erronea, et hæresi proxima."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. i., De Roman. Pontif., lib. iv., cap. ii, col. 805, B. Coloniæ, 1620.

[‡ "Mihi quoque eam defendere animus non est; et ut vera dicam, non potui hucusque satis intelligere, quid ex ea utilitatis in Ecclesiam profluxerit, nisi quod nova jacta sint discordiarum semina inter ejusdem Ecclesiæ filios; quippe ab eo tempore animi multo magis altercationum æstu incaluerunt."—Liebermann. Instit. Theolog., tom. ii., cap. iii., art. iv., sect. iii., § iv., p. 516. Mogunt., 1836.]

[§ "Illud assero, ac fidenter quidem assero, pestem eos Ecclesiæ ac perniciem afferre, qui aut negant Romanum Pontificem Petro in fidei doctrinæque auctoritate succedere, aut certe astruunt summum Ecclesiæ Pastorem, quicunque tandem ille sit, errare in fidei judicio posse."—Melchior. Cani Opera, Loci Theologici, lib. vi., cap. vii., p 327. 12mo. Coloniæ, 1605.]

we present the following:—The supreme Judge must be infallible: The Pope is not infallible: Therefore, &c.

The Jesuists, canonists, and courtiers, are obliged to prove the major proposition, inasmuch as it is their own assertion; and they prove it, in their manner. The minor proposition has been asserted by the French Doctors. We leave the conclusion to those who are concerned.

8. Other arguments against the Pope's infallibility might be adduced, sufficient to disprove it altogether. The decisions of General Councils are at variance with the infallibility of the Pope. The first proceeded on the supposition, that the Pope was not infallible, by deciding authoritatively without any reference to such a dogma; while some Synods, as those of Constance and Basil, have decided against it.

9. Various expositions of Scripture, which have been furnished by Popes, are positive proofs against their infallibility. We advert to the interpretation which several have given of the following text, containing the commission given to Jeremiah:—"See, I have this day set thee over the nations, and over the kingdoms, to root out, and to pull down, and to destroy, and to throw down, to build, and to plant." (Jer. i. 10.) Alexander III., elected Pope A. D. 1159, having told some of his brethren how "the Emperor held his stirrup when he mounted his palfrey;" * in his next constitution quoted the passage, and said, "that the power over nations and kingdoms, to pull up, cast down, and destroy, was given to Jeremiah, and in him to the evangelical Priest, to Peter and his successors." Innocent III., elected A. D. 1198, in his epistle to the Emperor of Constantinople, cites the same text, and another (Gen. i. 16) more foreign to the subject, if possible, to prove, that "God designed that the Pope should obtain the supreme magistracy of the world." † Pope Boniface VIII. cites the same text for the same purpose. He says, "The spiritual power ought to judge the earthly, if it be not good: thus is verified the prophecy of Jeremiah, 'I have placed thee over the nations.'" ‡ Paul III., in his Bull condemning Henry VIII., dated Rome, 1535 and 1538, informs us, that he was Vicar of Christ our blessed Saviour, and placed in the throne of justice above all Kings in the whole world, according to the prophecy of Jeremiah. § Pius V., in 1570, in his Bull of condemnation of Queen Elizabeth says, "Our blessed Saviour committed to Peter and his successors the government of the Church, with all fulness of power. He constituted him alone a Prince over all nations and all kingdoms, to pull up and throw down, to scatter and destroy, to plant and build, that he may keep in the unity of the Spirit the faithful people," &c.* Here are five Popes successively perverting a plain passage of holy writ; and that, too, ex cathedra, in behalf of the whole Church. Were these infallible interpreters? Other instances might be brought forward in which the fallacy of this assumption would be equally manifest. We might, indeed, expect infallible commentaries on Scripture, were the Popes infallible. But, instead of this, we have expositions wofully at variance with the most simple of the canons of ordinary biblical criticism.

10. The ancient Christians did not refer to the infallibility of the Pontiff for the decision of controversies. In that which took place between Stephen and the Africans concerning baptism, the decision of the Roman Prelate was not received by the Carthaginian Churches, or by the Bishops of the east, with many others. This is a proof that infallibility was neither known nor acknowledged by them. It did not, however, break, as Augustine says, the communion of the Church; and he excused Cyprian because "a plenary Council had not yet decided on this point." Other instances of disproving the infallibility of the Pope might be drawn from the history of early ages.

11. If the Pope were infallible, his decisions would also partake of that infallibility, independent of the consent of the churches. Among the ancients, when a controversy arose, they had recourse to the judgment of other communities. Irenæus says, "It is necessary to have recourse to the most ancient churches with which the Apostles were conversant, and from them, concerning the present question, receive what is certain and clear." † And Tertullian, in his Prescriptions, asserts, "Now what they did preach, that is, what Christ did reveal unto them, I will here also rule, must be proved in no other way than by those same churches which the Apostles themselves founded; themselves, I say, by preaching to them, as well viva voce, (as men say,) as afterwards by epistles." ‡ And in the sixth century, at the fifth General Council, in which the three chapters were condemned, Vigilius was disposed to insist on the adoption of his own sentiment; but the Fathers of the Synod decided "that

[* "Sequenti vero die, in festo B. Jacobi, ab eodem Imperatore rogati, ad prædictam ecclesiam S. Marci solemnia celebraturi missarum accessimus. Et nobis illuc venientibus præfatus Imperator extra ecclesiam obviam venit, et dextro latere nostro devote suscepto, nos in ecclesiam introduxit. Et peractis missarum solemniis, nos usque ad ipsius ecclesiæ portam dextravit. Et cum ascenderemus palefredum nostrum ibi paratum, stapham tenuit, et omnem honorem et reverentiam nobis exhibuit, quam predecessores ejus nostris consueverunt antecessoribus."—Alexand. Papæ III. Bulla viii. Magn. Bullar. Roman., tom. i., p. 46. Fol. Luxemb., 1727.]

[† "Porro subesse Romano Pontifici omni humanæ creaturæ declaramus, dicimus, definimus, et pronunciamus omnino esse de necessitate salutis."—Corp. Juris Canon., tom. ii., Extrav. Com., lib. i., tit. viii., De Majorit. et Obedient. Bonif. VIII., cap. i., p. 395. Fol. Paris, 1695.]

[‡ "Spiritalem autem et dignitate et nobilitate terrenam quamlibet præcellere potestatem, oportet tanto clarius nos fateri, quanto spiritalia temporalia antecellunt. Quod etiam ex decimarum datione, et benedictione, et sanctificatione, ex ipsius potestatis acceptione, ex ipsarum rerum gubernatione claris oculis intuemur. Nam veritate testante, spiritalis potestas terrenam potestatem instituere habet, et judicare si bona non fuerit; sic de Ecclesia et ecclesiastica potestate verificatur vaticinium Hieremiæ: Ecce, constitui te hodie super gentes et regna, et cætera quæ sequuntur. Ergo si deviat terrena potestas, judicabitur a potestate spiritali; sed si deviat spiritalis minor, a suo superiori. Si vero suprema, a solo Deo, non ab homine, poterit judicari, testante Apostolo: Spiritalis homo judicat omnia, ipse autem a nemine judicatur."—Idem, p. 394.]

[§ "Ejus qui, immobilis permanens, sua Providentia, ordine mirabili dat cuncta moveri, disponente clementia vices, licet imeriti, gentes in terris, et in sede justitiæ constituti, juxta quoque Prophetæ Hieremiæ vaticinium dicentis: Ecce," &c.—In Bulla Damnationis et Excommunicationis Henrici VIII. Romæ, 1535 et 1538.]

[* "Regnans in excelsis, cui data est omnis in cœlo et in terra potestas, unam sanctam, Catholicam, et Apostolicam Ecclesiam (extra quam nulla est salus) soli in terris, videlicet, Apostolorum Principi Petro, Petrique successori Romano Pontifici, in potestatis plenitudine tradidit gubernandam. Hunc unum super omnes gentes et omnia regna Principem constituit, qui evellat, destruat, dissipet, disperdat, plantet, et ædificet, ut fidelem populum, mutuæ caritatis nexu constrictum, in unitate Spiritus contineat, salvumque et incolumem suo exhibeat Salvatori."—Bulla Damnationis et Excommunicationis Elizabethæ Reginæ Angliæ, &c. A. D. 1570.]

[† "Oporteret in antiquissimas recurrere ecclesias, in quibus Apostoli conversati sunt, et ab eis de præsenti quæstione sumere quod certum et re liquidum est."—Irenæi Advers. Hæres. lib. iii., cap. iv., p. 172. Fol. Genevæ, 1570.

[‡ "Quid autem prædicaverint, id est, quid illis Christus revelaverit, et hic præscribam, non aliter probari debere, nisi per easdem ecclesias, quas ipsi Apostoli condiderunt, ipsi eis prædicando, tam viva (quod aiunt) voce, quam per epistolas postea."—Tertull. Opera, tom. ii., De Præscript. Hæret., cap. xxi., p. 461. 8vo. Wirceb., 1781.]

the truth cannot be otherwise ascertained in common disputes concerning the faith, than by discussing the question among the Bishops; for each one needs the aid of his neighbour." *

If the decisions of the Pope were not infallible before their approval by other Bishops, they could not be rendered such by any subsequent proceeding. Error cannot become truth, nor truth error. These are essentially opposite to each other, and do not change their nature by the suffrages of men. But we can furnish incontestable proof of the fallibility of the Popes from positive error.

12. Several Pontiffs, concerning faith and morals, have made decrees which are contrary to the decisions of others. John XII. and Nicholas III. uttered opposing sentiments on the question: "Whether Christ and his Apostles had any property?" Innocent III. and Celestine contradicted each other in the matter of divorce, when either the husband or the wife was a heretic. Pelagius and Gregory the Great differed concerning the marriage of the sub-Deacons of Sicily. Gregory III. determined that "the husband, if his wife be taken with any special infirmity, might marry another." † Nicholas I. declared the contrary, saying, "On account of such infirmity, their marriage cannot be dissolved." ‡ Lucius III. approved of marriages made without consent of parents. § Evaristus, before his day, pronounced such to be unlawful. ‖

The following Pontiffs, Gregory IX., Innocent IV., Alexander IV., Nicholas III., Martin IV., Nicholas IV., and Clement V., anathematized all who denied that the Franciscan Friars had no property in common or in private. Another, John XXII., reprobated all who maintained it, and recurred to the fagot, to use his own words, in order "to root out of the Church so pestilential, erroneous, heretical, and blasphemous a doctrine." When His Holiness was informed that his decision had occasioned great scandal in the Church, he replied, "That they were mistaken, since it could be proved, by innumerable instances, that what had been decreed wrong or amiss by one Pope or Council, could be rectified and amended by another." *

Gregory I. condemned the worship of images, and the use of the title "Universal Bishop;" avowed himself a subject of the Emperor; denied the books of Maccabees to be canonical, and asserted the perfection of Scripture: † sentiments which are opposed to the decision of other Popes. Leo and Gelasius condemned communion in one kind. ‡ Several taught a contrary doctrine. Alexander III., in a Council held at Rome, composed of three hundred Bishops, A.D. 1179, censured Peter Lombard, the Master of the Sentences, of heresy concerning the incarnation. Innocent III., A.D. 1215, absolved him without either repentance or recantation.

13. Prelates of Rome, in matters of faith and morals, have officially made impious and wicked decrees. Some, deciding ex cathedra, have attempted to depose Kings and Princes, to absolve their subjects from the oath of allegiance, and to transfer their dominions to others. Innocent VI. pronounced a sentence of deposition against the Emperor Frederick. Paul III. deposed Henry VIII., of England, A.D. 1535; deprived his children of their inheritance, absolved his subjects from their oath of allegiance, and charged the Clergy not to obey him in anything, &c. Pius V., A.D. 1570, deprived Elizabeth, Queen of England, of her kingdom, absolved her subjects from their oath of allegiance, and charged them under pain of anathema not to obey her. Urban II. § allowed it was lawful for good Catholics to commit murder on excommunicated persons. ‖ Innocent IV.

* "Non potest in communibus de fide disceptationibus aliter veritas manifestari, (quam discussa inter Episcopos quæstione,) cum unusquisque sui proximi adjutorio indiget."—Conc. Labb., tom. v., Conc. Constant. II., collat. viii., col. 563, B. Paris, 1671.

[† "Nam quod proposuisti, quod si mulier infirmitate correpta non valuerit debitum viro reddere, quod ejus faciat jugalis? Bonum esset si sic permaneret ut abstinentiæ vacaret. Sed quia hoc magnorum est, ille qui se non poterit continere, nubat magis; non tamen subsidii opem subtrahat ab illa, quam infirmitas præpedit, et non detestabilis culpa excludit."—Idem, tom. vi., Gregorii Papæ II. epist. xiii., Ad Bonifacium, col. 1448, E.]

[‡ "Hi qui matrimonium sani contraxerunt, et uni ex duobus dementia, aut furor, aut aliqua infirmitas accesserit, ob hanc infirmitatem et causam conjugia talium solvi non possunt. Similiter sciendum est de his, qui ab adversariis excæcantur, aut membris truncantur, aut a barbaris exsecti fuerint."—Idem, tom. viii., Nicolai Papæ I. Decreta, tit. xviii., De Matrimonio, can. vii., col. 561, D.]

[§ "Cum causa quæ inter militem et uxorem ejus vertitur:—Respondemus. Quod cum ibi raptus dicatur admitti, ubi nil ante de nuptiis agitur; iste raptor dici non debet, cum habuerit mulieris assensum, et prius eam desponsaverit, quam cognoverit, licet parentes reclamarent (a quibus eam dicitur rapuisse). Præterea cum post matrimonium carnis commixtione perfectum, teste Apostolo, uxor sui corporis potestatem non habeat, sed maritus, et e converso; si præcessisse matrimonium, vel ex probationibus viri, vel ex mulieris confessione claruerit, post matrimonium sine assensu viri non potuit ipsa monasterium ingredi, aut aliter continentiam profiteri. Non ergo pro eo, quod post matrimonium consummatum, rapta per vim in monasterio fuerit, viri poterit consortium declinare, maxime si probari nequeat virum, ut mulier profiteretur continentiam, assensisse."—Corp. Juris Canonici, tom. ii., Decret. Greg. IX., lib. v., De Raptoribus, tit. xvii., Lucius III., cap. vi. Fol. Paris, 1695.]

[‖ "Similiter custoditum et traditum habemus, ut uxor legitime viro jungatur. Aliter enim legitimum (ut a Patribus accepimus, et a sanctis Apostolis eorumque successoribus traditum invenimus) non fit conjugium, nisi ab his qui super ipsam fœminam dominationem videntur habere, et a quibus custoditur, uxor petatur, et a parentibus aut propinquioribus sponsetur, et legibus dotetur, et suo tempore sacerdotaliter (ut mos est) cum precibus et oblationibus a Sacerdote benedicatur, et a paranymphis (ut consuetudo docet) custodita et consociata, a proximis tempore congruo petita, legibus dotetur, et solenniter accipiatur; et biduo vel triduo orationibus vacent, et castitatem custodiant, ut bonæ soboles generentur, et Domino in actibus suis placeant. Taliter enim et Domino placebunt, et filios non spurios, sed legitimos atque hereditabiles, generabunt."—Conc. Labb., tom. i., Evaristi Papæ epist. i., Ad omnes Episc. Afric., col. 534, B. Paris, 1671.]

* Bower's History of the Popes, vol. i., Preface, pp. viii., ix. 4to. Third edit. London, 1750.

[† Gregorii Papæ I. Epistolæ, lib. vii., epist. xi., Ad Eusebium, &c.; lib. ii., epist. lxii., Ad Mauricium Augustum; lib. iv., epist. xxxii., Ad Eumdem; epist. xxxvi., Ad Eulogium et Anastasium; epist. xxxviii., Ad Johan. Episc. Constant.; lib. vi., epist. xxx., Ad Mauricium Augustum.]

[‡ "Comperimus autem, quod quidam sumpta tantummodo corporis sacri portione a calice sacri cruoris abstineant. Qui proculdubio (quoniam nescio qua superstitione docentur obstringi) aut integra sacramenta percipiant, aut ab integris arceantur, quia divisio unius ejusdemque mysterii sine grandi sacrilegio non potest provenire."—Corp. Juris Canonici, tom. i., Decret. III. Pars. De Consecrat., dist. ii., Gelas. Papa, cap. xii., p. 454. Paris, 1695.]

[§ "Excommunicatorum interfectoribus (prout in ordine Ecclesiæ Romanæ didicisti) secundum intentionem modum congruæ satisfactionis injunge. Non enim eos homicidas arbitramur, quos adversus excommunicatos zelo Catholicæ matris ardentes, aliquos eorum trucidasse contigerit. Ne tamen ejusdem Ecclesiæ matris disciplina deseratur; eo tenore, quem diximus, pœnitentiam eis indicito congruentem; qua divinæ simplicitatis oculos adversus se complacare valeant, si forte quid dupplicitatis pro humana fragilitate in eodem flagitio incurrerint."—Idem, tom. i., causa xxiii., Urbanus II., quæst. v., cap. xlvii., p. 324. Paris, 1695.]

[‖ "Down to the last century, in many parts of Italy, it was held as orthodox doctrine, that to murder an excommunicated Catholic, is not a sin! Benedict XIV., in his book De Synodo, published at Louvain, so lately as in 1763, in the Index, at the word excommunicatus, proposes the question, 'Whether an excommunicated person may be murdered?' and he refers us for an answer to his third volume, p. 136. Now what is the answer there? It is, in plain terms, that, provided no private pique or revenge is mixed up with it, and the murder is committed from pure zeal for the good cause of the Church, it is not sinful; but, lest any such private passion should insinuate itself into that pure zeal, the murderer ought to apply for

called Kings mancipia Papæ, "the Pope's slaves." That power cannot be infallible which arrogates an authority inconsistent with itself, or contrary to the acknowledged principles of morality. In such decisions Pontiffs have made void the most solemn obligations, have shaken the foundations of society, and have disseminated the impious doctrines of rebellion and perjury, rapine and violence.

14. Others have decided contrary to Scripture. In the canon law, De majoritate et obedientia, the Pope's supremacy over Kings is attempted to be proved from Gen. i. : the Roman Prelate is said to be the sun, and the Emperor the moon. Every one who inculcates the peculiar doctrines of the Church of Rome, such as auricular confession, sacerdotal absolution, transubstantiation, &c., teaches that which is opposed to Scripture.

15. Some have been heretics, and have taught heresy, in that sense in which the Church of Rome herself understands it. Victor, A. D. 192, approved the prophetic spirit of Montanus and his two companions, Prisca and Maximilla: this we learn on the authority of his contemporary Tertullian.* Baronius and Bellarmine acknowledge that the Pope was deceived and imposed on; nevertheless they refuse to surrender his infallibility. Baronius says that it is no new thing that a Pope should be deceived by impostors.† And Bellarmine asserts, that the Montanists craftily concealed from the Pope what was erroneous and heretical in their prophecies.* These apologies furnish no plea in favour of infallibility.

Marcellinus, under Dioclesian, sacrificed to idols. Augustine, together with Baronius, Bellarmine, Christian Lupus, &c., says that this was only a slander of the Donatists. Binius, Schelstrate, and others, who confess his fall, say that Marcellinus, through fear of death, sacrificed, so that he sinned against his profession, but that inwardly he did lose his faith. Liberius subscribed to the Arians, and consented to the condemnation of Athanasius. Honorius I., elected A. D. 625, was condemned by the sixth General Council as a Monothelite. Perhaps no fact is more clearly asserted by history; and yet the devotees of Rome will not allow that he was a heretic. John XXIII. denied the immortality of the soul, and the resurrection of the body; which heresy was objected against him in the Council of Constance. Eugenius IV. was deposed by the Synod of Basil as "a pertinacious heretic deviating from the faith."† Adrian II. did not take the Pope to be infallible, when he said he might not be judged, excepting for heresy, and therefore apologizes for the orientals anathematizing Honorius on that account. Innocent I., and his successors, at least as far as Gelasius I., asserted the communion of infants to be necessary to salvation.‡ Vigilius denied two natures in Christ; and, in his Epistle to the Empress Theodora, anathematized all who said that there existed two natures in one person. Another heresy of which many Popes have been guilty, according to the best historians, is that of simony.§

16. Some Popes have decided questions ignorantly or foolishly. It often happens that the Pope is not skilled in divinity; Innocent X. was accustomed to say concerning himself, "that the Vicar of Jesus Christ was not obliged to examine all things by dispute; for the truth an absolutio ad cautelam! and it quotes the authorities of Urban II., of Gratian, of Baronius, and of Cardinal Turrecremata! He indeed takes care, in the next chapter, to qualify this doctrine, as not extending to all excommunicated persons, but only to such as violated the public peace, called the treugæ Domini in the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth centuries; and it must be confessed that this is the true interpretation, as appears from Gratian, (cap. xlvii., Excommunicatorum, [causa] xxiii., quæst. v.,) and from De Marca's learned dissertation on the Council of Clermont. But still, the maxim, being ill understood, gave rise to many pious murders in Italy, which were connived at, as in the case of Father Sarpi, who was three times piously waylaid, and zealously stabbed, and left for dead, A. D. 1607, and afterwards, as recorded in his Life prefixed to his works, (p. 169, Venice, A. D. 1677,) and also in Dr. Johnson's Life of Sarpi. Peter Walsh was waylaid in like manner in the woods of Glenmalura, (as in my Historical Address, part ii., p. 153,) when he was excommunicated;" and Dr. O'Conor, from whom this extract is made, was expecting plainly the same easy and pious style of refutation to be exercised towards himself. See his Columbanus, No. VII., with an introductory Letter to the Marquess of Buckingham. By the Rev. C. O'Conor, D.D., p. 111. Buckingham, 1816. On Sarpi's case we may add, from a recent Life of him, a few lines of general remark:—"Ma a quei tempi era volgatissima, difesa a Roma come dogma, e inculcata da Preti e Frati e con maggior cura da Gesuiti la massima che chi ammazza l'eretico otteneva da Dio ampia perdonanza de suoi peccati; talche il delitto, non che apparisse sotto le orrende sue forme, si vestiva agli occhi de fanatici di un carattere religioso. Ne sono pieni i libri di Bellarmino, Becano, Mariano, Suarez, Toleto, Bonarscio, Azorio, ed altri cento: ne furono vittima Enrico III., ed Enrico IV., il Principe di Nassau, e poco manco che non lo fossero la Regina Elisabetta, il Re Guiacomo, e Duplessis Mornay cui un eremita ando per assassinare nel suo letto."—Biographia di Fra Paolo Sarpi di A. Bianchi Giovini. (Zurigo, 1836, vol. ii., p. 21.)] licet velimus non mentitum esse (periculosum enim alioqui est, hæreticis de suis dogmatibus quæcumque dicentibus fidem præstare) quid magnum est, falsis assertionibus surreptam, pacificis scriptis litteris, communicationem dare Romanum Pontificem."—Baronii Annales Eccles., A. D. 173, sect. iv., p. 176. Fol. Antverpiæ, 1597.]

[* "Nam idem tunc Episcopum Romanum, agnoscentem jam prophetias Montani, Priscæ, Maximillæ, et ex ea agnitione pacem Ecclesiis Asiæ et Phrygiæ inferentem, falsa de ipsis Prophetis et ecclesiis eorum adseverando, et præcessorum ejus auctoritates defendendo, coëgit et literas pacis revocare, jam emissas, et a proposito recipiendorum charismatum concessare."—Tertull. Opera, tom. ii., Advers. Praxeam cap. i., p. 237. 8vo. Wirceb., 1781.]

[† "Enituit tunc temporis quæ de sede Petri impolluta servanda viguit semper vigilans divina providentia; nam cum illi totis viribus nisi essent primariæ ecclesiæ communicationem suffurari, quo sic ab universa Catholica Ecclesia viderentur esse recepti atque probati; dum res apud Romanum Pontificem ageretur, idemque de impartienda illis communicatione literas dedisset, continuo revocavit, cum adveniens Praxeas, Catholicæ religionis tunc homo, multa de illis, quæ hactenus præteriissent ipsum Romanum Pontificem, eidem significasset, inculcassetque. Testatur id quidem Tertullianus cum ait: Nam idem Praxeas concessa, &c. Hæc Tertullianus; quem ‡ Idem, tom. iv., P. Gelas. I. ep. ix., col. 1186. Paris, 1671.

[§ "Quod auctoritate Apostolicæ Sedis ab omni episcopali et sacerdotali dignitate sit depositus et anathematis vinculo alligatus, quia non timuit simoniacæ hæresi sacrilegium adjicere, sanctamque ecclesiam sibi commissam sicut tyrannus devastare."—Conc Labb., tom. x., Gregorii Papæ VII. Epistolæ, lib. iii., epist. vii., Ad Henric. Reg. Roman., col. 134, D. Paris, 1671. Vide etiam Conc. Lateran. v., sess. v., Constit. Julii II., col. 769, A., tom. xix. Edit. Venet., 1728.]

of his decrees depended on divine inspiration."* Nicholas I.† allowed that baptism, administered only in the name of Christ, without any express mention of the other Persons of the Trinity, is valid; which is a manifest error. (Matt. xxviii. 19.) If we may believe Tertullian, Zephyrinus approved the prophecies of Montanus; and on that account granted peace to all the churches of Asia and Phrygia, till Praxeas persuaded him to revoke that act. Innocent III. urged that the Mosaic law is still binding on Christians, and supports his position by this interpretation: "Indeed the word Deuteronomy signifies 'second law,' and is proved from the meaning of the word; so that whatever is decreed in that book, ought to be observed in the New Testament."‡ When a corruption crept into the decree called Sancta Romana,§ where, instead of these words, Sedulii opus heroicis versibus descriptum, all the old copies, till recently, read, hæreticis versibus descriptum; this very mistake made Adrian VI.,‖ and others, believe that all poetry was heretical: because Gelasius, whose decree that was, though he believed Sedulius to be a good Catholic, yet, as they thought, concluded his verses to be heretical.

17. Some have decided in order to serve their own purposes.

18. Others have determined important questions sophistically.

19. Some have adopted officially a new creed. This applies especially to Pius IV., and his successors.

20. Other Pontiffs have decided contrary to General Councils. By a canon of the Roman Church, Presbyters, Deacons, and Sub-Deacons are forbidden to marry, and required to part with their wives, if married. The General Council, called Quinisext, held A. D. 691, condemns this practice in the thirteenth canon, not only as a deviation from the apostolic canons, but as expressly forbidden by the words of Christ: "What God hath joined together, let not man put asunder:" (Matt. xix. 6:) and by his Apostle, "Art thou bound unto a wife? seek not to be loosed." (1 Cor. vii. 27.) The Synod commanded that practice to be suppressed, and, after recommending marriage, as instituted by Almighty God, and sanctioned by Christ, they close the canon with the following words:—"If any one shall henceforth presume, against the apostolical canons, to deprive the Clergy of the lawful company of their wives, let him be deposed." From this we infer, that the Pope at the close of the seventh century was not thought infallible on questions of morals; otherwise the Council would not have condemned a practice which several Prelates of Rome had established. Stephen also approved the baptism of heretics, contrary to the decrees of the Council of Nice, and other Synods.

21. We notice the evasive manner in which Romanists answer the charge of heresy which is brought against their Pontiffs. Baronius, Stella, Almain, Occam, Canus, Du Pin, Bailly, and generally the greatest scholars and best men in the Church of Rome, confess that a Pope may be a heretic, that some of them actually were so, and that three General Councils, the sixth, seventh, and eighth, believed it; and that the canon Si Papa affirms it in express terms. But all this they profess easily to explain. For though it be true, that if a Pope were a heretic, the Church might depose him; yet no Pope can be a heretic; the man may be a heretic, but the Pope cannot; for when he becomes a heretic, he is ipso facto no Pope, for he is no Christian. So teaches Bellarmine.*

Cajetan maintains that the power by which the Council deposes the Pope is not authoritative, but ministerial; and that it cannot be inferred from thence that the Synod has any authority over the Papal dignity, but only over the person of that man who is clothed with it. Almain calls this mode of reasoning, "a piece of chicanery that cannot be maintained, and a pitiful defence." With him Du Pin accords.† Antoninus, Archbishop of Florence, Petrus de Palude, Augustine of Ancona, as we have already shown, express themselves in the same style with Bellarmine, Cajetan, Dens, and the Jesuits generally. Comment on such gross evasions, sophistry, and wilful perversion of truth, would be lost labour. It is no wonder that Alphonsus à Castro calls them "impudent flatterers of the Pope," who ascribe to him infallibility, either in judgment, or interpretation of Scripture.‡

22. Whether the Pope can fall into heresy as a private person, or lose faith, stands closely connected with the foregoing. The negative side of this question must be taken by such Divines as Bellarmine, Cajetan, &c., if they be at all consistent. In truth this is the legitimate

* "Le Pape respondit, que le Vicaire de J. C. n'estait point obligé d'examiner toutes choses par la dispute; que la vérité de ses décrets dependoit seulement de l'inspiration divine."—Memoir. Hist. de Propos. Cinq.

[† "A quodam Judæo, nescitis utrum Christiano an Pagano, multos in patria vestra baptizatos asseritis, et quid inde sit agendum consulitis. Hi profecto, si in nomine Trinitatis, vel tantum in nomine Christi, sicut in Actibus Apostolorum legitur, baptizati sunt, (unum quippe idemque est, ut S. Ambrosius exponit,) quia non illorum, sed ejus est, rebaptizari non debent."—Conc. Labb., tom. viii., Nicolai Papæ I. Decreta, tit. xvi., De Baptismo, col. 559, A. Paris, 1671.]

[‡ "Sane cum Deuteronomium lex secunda interpretetur, ex vi vocabuli comprobatur, ut quod ibi decernitur, in Novo Testamento debeat observari: locus enim quem elegit Dominus, Apostolica Sedes esse cognoscitur; cum enim Petrus urbem fugiens exivisset, volens eum Dominus ad locum quem elegerat, revocare, interrogatus ab eo, Domine, quo vadis? respondit, Venio Romam iterum crucifigi."—Corp. Juris Canonici, tom. ii., Decretal. Gregor. IX., lib. iv., Qui filii sint legitimi, tit. xvii., Innocent. III., cap. xiii., Per venerabilem, p. 219. Fol. Paris, 1695.]

[§ "There is no distinction in the canon law oftener cited than this in the Schools; and yet the whole chapter is so corruptly set forth, that, by confession of our adversaries, it is scarcely known which is which. From the words, Ceterum post gesta, unto the end of the chapter, all hath been added by some one or other that meant to play his part in the canon law. What sound doctrine can be built upon such unsound writings? Archidiaconus is one of the first that observed the corruption of these words, since they are found missing in the ancient copies, by confession both of Protestants and Papists. Yet here we may note the singular policy of our adversaries: as elsewhere, to serve their turns, they have falsely made that Palea which is none; so here, where the words (as being added afterwards) are missing in the ancient copies, they have omitted the word Palea. And why? Because the omission thereof makes for them. Thus, then, they can make and unmake, give and take away, chop and change words, at their pleasures; or rather at the pleasure of their Lord the Pope."—James on the Corruptions, &c., p. 167. 8vo. edit. Camb., 1843.]

[‖ This story about Adrian is taken from Bishop Taylor's Liberty of Prophesying, (sect. vii.,) and the assertion must be incorrect, that "all the old copies" read hæreticis; for an early edition, printed by Jenson, (Venetiis, A. D. 1477,) in the possession of the Rev. Joseph Mendham, M. A., of Sutton Coldfield, gives plainly the reading heroicis.]

* Bellarm. Opera, tom. i.; De Rom. Pont., lib. ii., cap. xxx. Vide supra.

† Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., vol. iii., p. 286. Fol. Dublin, 1723.

[‡ "Non enim credo aliquem esse adeo impudentem Papæ assentatorem, ut ei tribuere hoc velit, ut nec errare aut in interpretatione sacrarum literarum hallucinari possit. Nam cum constet plures eorum adeo illiteratos esse ut grammaticam penitus ignorent, qui fit ut sacras literas interpretari possent? Si ergo in interpretatione sacrarum literarum quilibet homo errare potest, erit necessario judicium interpretationis penes totam Ecclesiam, penes quam jus fuerat discernendi sacras Scripturas ab humanis. Nam hæc errare non potest, cum a Spiritu Sancto sit edocta."—Alphonsus à Castro advers. omnes Hæres., lib. i., cap. iv. Fol. Coloniæ, 1539.]

doctrine of the Church of Rome. Ferraris, her standard ecclesiastical lexicographer, and Dens, support it. The following is the explanation of Ferraris :—"It is also more probable that the Pope, as a private person, cannot fall into heresy, and lose faith. Our conclusion is proved from the words of Christ to Peter in Luke xxii. Hence, when it is manifest, that Peter was so confirmed of God, that his faith, even personally, by no means could fail, the same may be said of the Popes his successors. For such a privilege is bestowed on them, that they might confirm their brethren in the faith. But how will they confirm, if they themselves are heretics or infidels? Will they confirm in others that faith which themselves abhor or oppose? Then, because the Pope is the living rule, which all the faithful ought to follow, and to have continually before their eyes, it is necessary to fortify it with some singular privilege, by which not only the see itself, but also his person, should be preserved from error in those things which are of faith. Otherwise, if we admit that the Pope himself should fall into heresy and lose faith, what else can be expected but that the blind will lead the blind into the ditch?" "Nor is it of any weight to say, that although every Pope, as St. Peter, not as a private person, were able to fall into heresy and revolt from the faith, this would be an article of faith, and, consequently, they are heretics who hold the contrary opinion. This conclusion is not proper, since distinguished Doctors, as well Canonists as theologians, hold the contrary opinion; and those who do so are not heretics, because they hold it not with pertinacity, as is required to constitute heresy, but are ready to obey the decision of the Church."*

Dens, on this point, argues thus: "Can the Pope, as a private person, be a heretic?—Answer. Although the affirmative would not be contrary to the preceding conclusion; (namely, that as a private person the Pope may err;) yet the negative opinion seems more probable, so that the privilege of Peter may also pass to the successors of Peter; and this is conformable to the providence of God, that whoever is the guide of our faith cannot himself fall from faith. It is also shown from this, that it cannot be proved of any Pope thus far, that he was a formal heretic: and this is testified by Augustine, in his 165th letter, concerning the Popes down to his own time. Obj. 'The Pope is said to judge all, and is judged by none, unless he be a heretic; therefore he can be a formal heretic.'—Answer. The consequence is denied; for it is only said, what may be, in a case in which a Pope would fall from the faith; but we suppose that this case never happened, and never will."*

23. Our inquiries concerning pontifical infallibility might be extended to the canonization and beatification of saints, and to the approbation of religious orders: to each the infallibility of the Pope is extended by those who believe its existence in other matters. Ferraris and Dens maintain the infallibility of the Pope in all these, and attempt to support it by arguments such as they employ to establish his inerrancy in general. The principles and practice of modern Romanism are founded on the supposition that the Pope is infallible in establishing various religious orders, and in selecting the proper objects of worship in the canonization and beatification of saints.†

[* "Papa probabilius etiam ut persona privata non potest in hæresim incidere, et in fide deficere. Probatur autem nostra conclusio ex verbis a Christo dictis D. Petro, Lucæ xxii.: Ego autem rogavi pro te, &c.; quæ verba non personaliter ad solum Petrum sed ad omnes successores in ejus cathedra pertinere. Ideo enim tale privilegium est illis impetratum, ut fratres suos in fide confirment; sed quomodo confirmabunt, si sint ipsimet vel hæretici vel infideles? An in aliis eam fidem stabilient quam ipsimet animo execrantur et impugnant? Tum quia cum Pontifex sit viva regula, quam omnes fideles sequi et præ oculis semper habere debent, oportet muniri singulari aliquo privilegio, quo ab errore in iis, quæ sunt fidei, non solum sedes ipsa, sed etiam illius persona præservetur; alias si et ipsum Papam in hæresim labi, et a fide deficere admittamus, quid aliud sperari poterit, nisi quod cæcus ipse nos cæcos simul in foveam trahat?"

["Nec valet objicere, quod si omnis Papa ut S. Petrus, neque ut persona privata, posset in hæresim incidere, et a fide deficere, hoc esset de fide, et consequenter essent hæretici contrariam sententiam tenentes; quod non est dicendum, cum illam teneant clarissimi Doctores, tum canonistæ, tum theologi; tamen contrarium sentientes non essent hæretici, quia propriam opinionem non sustinent cum pertinacia, ut requiritur ad hæresim; sed parati sunt parere Ecclesiæ definitioni."—Ferraris, Biblioth. Prompta, Papa, art. ii., sect. 62, 63, 65.]

CHAPTER XIV.

SUPREMACY CONTINUED—PREROGATIVES OF THE POPE.

XVI. Power of the Pope over the civil Magistrate, Kingdoms, or States. 1. Position of the question. Bailly cited. Three opinions among them: 2. The French did not allow a direct or indirect authority: 3. Some ascribe to the Pope a direct and supreme power over the world in temporals as well as in spirituals. Gregory VII. and Benedict XIV. cited: 4. Others ascribe to him an indirect power, by divine right, over civil and temporal affairs. Opinion of Bellarmine and of Dens. The indirect authority includes the direct: 5. It is claimed by divine right. Pius V. and Paul IV. cited: 6. Its nature and extent. Sentiment of Antoninus, namely, that the Pope hath power to ordain what belongs to the public good, and remove what prevents it. All inferior power is subject to him as to its institution, conferring, and removal. All subordinate authority, even secular, ought to aid the Pope in what pertains to good government, and to be subject to him, as far as this is concerned. His power is exercised over Pagans, in punishing them when they act contrary to the law of nations:—and over Jews, heretics, and schismatics, by dealing with them in a fourfold way; namely, by excommunication, deposition, deprivation of temporal goods, and military persecution. His power over Catholics is this:—He can elect or choose the Emperor; can appoint the electors, and change those elected, and provide for a new Emperor by hereditary succession; deprive him of the kingdom, and raise war against him: 7. Arguments brought by Romanists to prove their doctrine, answered: 8. Reasons against it: 9. The distinction between the direct and indirect power of the Pope over Princes and Christian people shown to be evasive: 10. The power over temporals, whether direct or indirect, asserted and claimed by the Council of Trent. Instances given.—XVII. The Pope as a temporal Prince. 1. Papists assert it: 2. Their reasons for it. Examples of Melchisedek; of Moses, Eli, and the Maccabees. Sentiment of Gelasius I: 3. Grant of Constantine. Arguments on this point: 4. Various opinions on this subject: 5. Scripture proof against it: 6. It is inconsistent with the Christian ministry to pronounce sentence of death: 7. Or to go to war.

XVI. Power of the Pontiff over the civil Magistrate, kingdoms, or states.

[* "An Pontifex, saltem ut privata persona, possit esse hæreticus?—R. Etsi id præced. conclusioni non obesset, ut dictum est, videtur tamen sententia negativa probabilior, ita ut privilegium Petri (de quo Lucæ cap. xxii., Rogavi, &c.) etiam transeat ad Petri successores; idque consentaneum est divinæ Providentiæ, ut qui Doctor est fidei, ipse a fide non deficiat. Probatur etiam ex eo, quod de nullo Pontifice hactenus probari potuerit, fuisse formalem hæreticum: idque S. Aug. epist. clxv. de Pontificibus ad sua usque tempora testatur. Obj. Dist. xl., can., Si Papa, &c.: 'Dicitur Papa cunctos judicare, a nemine judicandus, nisi deprehendatur a fide devius; ergo potest esse hæreticus formalis.'—R. Neg. conseq. tantum enim dicitur, quid fieri posset, casu quo Pontifex a fide deficeret; putamus autem casum hunc nunquam evenisse, nec eventurum."—Dens Theolog., tom. ii.; De Eccles., No. 97.]

† Ferraris, Biblioth. Prompta, Papa, art. ii., sect. xlix.—lxi. 4to Francof., 1783. Dens Theologia, tom. ii.; De Ecclesia, No. 85; De Infallibilitate Ecclesiæ in Canonizatione Sanctorum.

1. The members of the Church of Rome are divided on this topic. The French maintained that the Pope has no direct or indirect power over the temporal concerns of Kings. This is the first article in the declaration of the Gallic Clergy; and is supported by Bailly, who says, concerning the Italians, that "they reject truth, as well as concord. They are divided into two classes. Some teach that the Roman Pontiff has received from Christ a plenary, direct, immediate, and official power, not only in spiritual affairs, but also in civil, and over the temporal concerns of Kings; that Kings may be deposed by him, and subjects absolved from their oath of fidelity. Bellarmine, whom many Italians follow, softens this a little by saying," &c.* The Gallican Church maintained that the Pope had neither direct nor indirect power over the civil affairs of states. The Italians believed that it was unlimited; another class modify the sentiments of the high Romanists, and assert that the power of the Pope over kingdoms was indirect. Bailly maintains, as cited above, that this is only palliating the uncontrollable power of the Pontiff, both in spiritual and temporal affairs. We shall state the sentiments of each, and fix on the true doctrine of the Church of Rome on this point, as correctly as we can, amid such discordant and evasive sentiments.

2. The French did not allow that the Pope possessed a direct or indirect power over kingdoms or Princes in civil affairs. Their opinion is, "that Kings and Princes, in temporal matters, are not subject to pontific or ecclesiastical power; that they cannot directly or indirectly be deposed by the power of the keys; or their subjects be freed from fidelity and obedience, or exonerated from their plighted oath of allegiance." This was the declaration of the Gallic Clergy, A. D. 1682, which others adopted. The Senate of Paris, A. D. 1610, proscribed the treatise of Bellarmine on the power of the Pope.

3. Some ascribe to the Pope a direct and supreme power by divine right over the whole world, as well in temporals as in spirituals. Gregory VII., in his "Maxims," maintains the following propositions:—"It is lawful for the Pope to depose Emperors. The Pope can absolve subjects from their oath of allegiance, which they had taken to a bad Prince. His decision no man can reverse, but he can set aside all other judgments. He is to be judged by no man." These Dictatus Gregorii VII. are to be found in his epistles. Some question their genuineness: this is, however, admitted by Baronius, Panvinius, De Marca, and other able critics. At any rate, he and his successors have maintained this doctrine, and practised it extensively. Bellarmine† and Dens acknowledge that such sentiments are held.‡ Benedict XIV., A. D. 1752, calls himself and his fellow-Popes, "the ex-officio administrators of the goods of the Church."*

4. Others ascribe to the Pope an indirect power, by divine right, over the civil and temporal concerns of Kings, Princes, Emperors, and states; which, Bailly says, softens the matter a little!! Bellarmine observes, "That the Pope hath not directly and immediately any temporal power, but only spiritual; nevertheless, for this spiritual end, he hath indirectly a certain power, and that, too, supreme, in temporals; so that the Pope cannot, as such, ordinarily dethrone temporal Princes, even for a just cause, in that manner in which he deposes Bishops; but he can change kingdoms, and take them away from one and give them to another, as supreme spiritual Prince, if this be necessary for the salvation of souls."†

The same theologian further says, "The thing is certain and thoroughly examined, that the Pope, for just temporal causes, can also sometimes depose temporal Princes."‡ And to make it certain concerning the nature of the doctrine, he declares, that "the existence of this power in the Pope concerning temporals, is not a matter of opinion among Catholics, but a certainty."§ He teaches also, that it is not only lawful to depose heretical Princes, but it is necessary, and that (Roman) Catholics are bound to do so under pain of committing mortal sin. He says, "The Church would sin grievously, if she allowed any King to tolerate heresy without punishment, and to defend heretics."‖ And further, "It is not right for Christians to tolerate an heretical King, if he endeavour to draw away his subjects to his heresy."¶ Bellarmine enumerates twenty-one Italian authors, fourteen French, nine German, seven English and Scotch, nineteen Spanish, and these not common, but eminent, authors, who are of this opinion. Peter Dens coincides with this sentiment. He says, "Bellarmine, Sylvius, and others, assert, that the Pope hath not, by divine right, direct power over temporal kingdoms, but indirect; that is, when the spiritual power cannot be freely exercised, and cannot obtain its end by spiritual means, then it can recur to the temporal; according to Aquinas, who teaches, that Princes can sometimes be deprived of their dominion, and subjects liberated from

[* "Theologi ultramontenses sicut in præsenti materia veritatem abjecerunt, sic et concordiam. In duplicem classem scinduntur. Alii docuerunt Romanum Pontificem non tantum in res spirituales, sed etiam in civiles ac temporalia Regum, plenissimam, directam, immediatam, ac ordinariam potestatem a Christo accepisse; posse ab eo Reges deponi, et eorum subditos a sacramento fidelitatis absolvi. Bellarminus, quem Itali multi sequuntur, rem paulisper emollit, docendo," &c.—Bailly, Theolog., tom. ii.; De Ecclesia, cap. xiv., art. v.]

[† "Summum Pontificem jure divino habere plenissimam potestatem in universum orbem terrarum, tum in rebus ecclesiasticis, tum in politicis. Hostiensis docet, per Christi adventum omne dominium Principum infidelium translatum esse ad Ecclesiam, et residere in summo Pontifice, ut Vicario summi et veri Regis Christi, et ideo posse Pontificem regna infidelium jure suo donare, quibus voluerit fidelium."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. i., De Romano Pontifice, lib. v., cap. i., col. 887, A. Coloniæ, 1620.]

[‡ "An etiam Summus Pontifex potestatem quamdam habet temporalem et civilem?—R. Certum est, quod potestatem etiam directam habeat in loca temporali dominio sibi subjecta; nil enim repugnat, quod idem sit Princeps ecclesiasticus et politicus in temporalibus, ut patet in Melchisedech, Machabæis," &c.—Dens Theolog., tom. ii.; De Eccles., No. 98; De Potestate Temporali Summi Pontificis.]

* "Pro generalis bonorum ecclesiasticorum administratoris officio."—Bened. XIV. Bullar., tom. ix., De Bonis Ecclesiarum, p. 200. Mechliniæ, 1827.

† "Romanum Pontificem non habere directe et immediate ullam temporalem potestatem, sed solum spiritualem; ratione tamen spiritualis, habere saltem indirecte potestatem quamdam, eamque summam, in temporalibus."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. i., De Rom. Pontif., lib. v., cap. i., col. 888, A. Coloniæ, 1620.

"Adeo ut non possit Papa, ut Papa, ordinarie temporales Principes deponere, etiam justa de causa, eo modo quo deponit Episcopos; tamen potest mutare regna, et uni auferre, atque alteri conferre, tanquam summus Princeps spiritualis, si id necessarium sit ad salutem animarum."—Idem. cap vi., col. 901, D.

‡ "Est res certa et explorata, posse Pontificem maximum justis de causis temporalibus judicare atque ipsos temporales Principes aliquando deponere."—Idem, tom. vii., De Excusat. Barclaii, cap. iii., col. 852, B. Coloniæ, 1617.

§ "Sic igitur de potestate in temporalibus, quod ea sit in Papa, non opinio, sed certitudo apud Catholicos est."—Idem.

‖ "Ecclesia nimis graviter erraret, si admitteret aliquem Regem, qui vellet impune fovere quamlibet sectam, et defendere hæreticos."—Idem, tom. i., De Rom. Pontif., lib. v., cap. vii.

¶ "Non licet Christianis tolerare Regem hæreticum, si conetur pertrahere subditos ad suam hæresim."—Idem.

their oath of allegiance; and this was done more than once by the Popes."* The reason alleged for expulsion is heresy or infidelity, or compelling subjects to be infidels or heretics.

The indirect power virtually embraces the direct. This modification of the exercise of Papal supremacy, introduced by Bellarmine, and followed by others, was very displeasing to Sixtus V., as an improper modification of the power of his See. Nor was it better received by Princes and states; because it virtually contained all the offensive doctrine of the direct power. Hence, by the Senate of France, the doctrine of Bellarmine was condemned with the same marks of disapprobation as that of the direct power of the Pope in temporals. With what facility can the indirect power be transformed into the direct! The kingdom of France knew this to its cost. If the Pope called their Prince, Huguenot, as he did Henry IV.; or, tyrant, as Henry III.; or, unprofitable for the Church and kingdom, as he did Childerick;—then the Monarch may be dethroned. Or, if the Prince be called a heretic, or a favourer of heretics, as Pius V. said of Elizabeth; then he may be dethroned, his subjects absolved from allegiance, and his dominion transferred to another.

5. Romanists further maintain, that this authority of the Pope over the temporal concerns of kingdoms, is of divine right. In the preface to the Bull of Pius V., against Elizabeth, the power ascribed to the Pope is said to be given by God. "He that reigneth on high hath granted to Peter, and his successors."† Paul IV., in his Bull entitled, "Against Heretics and Schismatics, and their Favourers," affirms, that "the Pope of Rome here on earth is the Vicar of God and our Lord Jesus Christ, hath obtained the plenitude of power over nations and kingdoms, is Judge of all men, and is to be judged of no man in the world."‡

6. With regard to the nature and extent of the Papal power, we shall introduce Antoninus, Archbishop of Florence, who says, "The power of jurisdiction seems to import the power of declaring by way of statute, or of deciding questions.—In things of natural or divine right, the authority of the Pope does not extend in deciding them; but if there be any doubt concerning such things, the power of decision belongs to the Pope. Hence it is unlawful to hold, or to think, contrary to the Pope; and the power of declaring concerning doubtful questions belongs to him alone. The Pontiff, using a General Council, and requiring the aid of the universal Church, cannot err.—The Pope hath the plenitude of power, as it regards all cases and all persons in the militant Church."—"All ecclesiastical authority is subject to the Papal power in three things. (1.) As to correction of abuses. (2.) As to the institution and conferring of inferior power. (3.) As to the assisting subsidy, (subsidium adminiculativum,) that is, what is requisite to aid it, if it stand in need of aid."*

"First. To him it belongs to ordain those things which pertain to the public good, and remove those things which prevent this end, as vices, abuses, which alienate men from God. So that to the Pope, as first and principal President, it belongs to correct vices of this kind, and remove what concerns all inferior powers, as far as in him lies, so that the whole Christian community may conduce to the proper end. And this, according to Jeremiah i. 10: 'Behold, I have placed thee over the nations and kingdoms, to root up and destroy, to scatter and disperse,' that is, as it regards vices, 'to build up and plant,' that is, as it regards virtues. No ecclesiastical Prelate is above kingdoms, except the Pontiff. And in proof of this, Zacharias deposed Lewis from the kingdom of France, because he was useless, as the canon law says. (Distinct. xv., quæst. vi., Alius.) Innocent deposed the Emperor Frederick.

"Secondly. All power inferior to the Pope is subject to him as it regards its institution, conferring, and removal. Whenever, in any Council, statutes are enacted, the whole authority of giving vigour to them is in the Pope alone. If the power of collation do not exist in the Pontiff, independently of the Christian community, he does not possess the plenitude of power; which is false. Wherefore, as the institution of inferior powers is not made immediately by Christ, nor by the universal Church, as was proved, it follows, that it was made by the Bishop of Rome, as the Vicar-general of Christ. So the canon law (distinct. lxxx., can. i.) says, 'It pertains to the Pope to institute and confer all ecclesiastical powers inferior to himself.'

"Thirdly. All inferior powers, even secular, ought, and are bound, to aid the Pontiff in that which contributes to the good government of the Church; and they are subject to him as far as this is concerned. The republic is bound to preserve that power on which the good of the commonwealth rests; but the good of the Christian republic relies especially upon the power of him, whose it is to regulate the whole Church, and appoint the ranks and orders in it; the good of the Church hangs upon the subserviency of one part to another, for instance, of Curates to the Bishop, of Bishops to the Archbishops, and thus up to the Pope: but, especially, the good of the Church depends on the subordination of the whole people to the Pope, because every power ought to be subservient to him. And if secular persons would purpose any thing against this power, secular Princes themselves ought to pacify their subjects, and subdue those who are rebels to the spiritual Court of Rome.

"The five following propositions are errors, or rather, heresies:—(1.) The power of Prelates inferior to the Pope, whether of Bishops or Pastors, is immediately from God, as well as the power of the Pope. (2.) In the government of the Church militant, the common people cannot be reconciled to God by penitence, except by the Curates and parochial Priests. (3.) Although the Pope and Prelates are principal in respect to parishioners, they are not, however, their immediate Curates, or they have not the immediate care of them. (4.) Neither the Pope, nor a Bishop, can hear the confessions of parishioners; but they are bound to confess their sins to their parish Priests. (5.) Though it be granted, that those who con-

[* "Bellarminus, Sylvius, aliique dicunt Pontificem non habere jure divino potestatem directam in temporalia regna, sed indirectam; hoc est, quando potestas spiritualis exerceri libere non potest, nec suum finem assequi per media spiritualia, tunc ad temporalia recurrere possit, juxta S. Thom., qui docet Principes interdum privari posse dominatione et subditos a fidelitatis juramento liberari; et ita a Pontificibus non semel est practicatum."—Dens Theolog., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, No. 98.]

† Bulla Damnationis et Excommunicationis Elizabethæ Reginæ Angliæ. Vide supra.

‡ "Romanus Pontifex, qui Dei et Domini Jesu Christi vices gerit in terris, et super gentes et regna plenitudinem potestatis obtinet, omnesque judicat, a nemine in hoc seculo judicandus."—Magn. Bullar. Rom., tom. i., in Bull. xix. Pauli IV., p. 841. Fol. Luxemb., 1727.

* Antonini Summ. Theol., tom. iii., pars iii., tit. xxii., cap. iii. et seq. Fol. Romæ, 1485.

fessed to the Pope or to their Diocesan, are not required to confess the same sins to their parish-Priests; yet the Pope, or a Bishop, cannot grant the general authority of hearing confessions to others, such as Fathers Confessors, or the like; but those who confess to them, are bound to acknowledge the same sins to their parish-Priests. These five propositions are not only to be judged errors, but heresies; which is proved by the canon law, (Distinct. xxii., Omnes,) where it is said, 'Whoever deprives any churches of their due, is unjust; but he who deprives the Roman Church of her due, is to be esteemed a heretic.'

"With regard to the temporal and spiritual jurisdiction, which is in the Church, it is to be observed, that the power is threefold and varied. The first is immediate, namely, from God. The second is derivative, namely, from God, through the Pope; and this is the power of all inferior Prelates. The third is given for ministering or subserviency; and this is the power of the Emperor and of terrestrial Princes.—The temporal influence of Emperors, Kings, and Princes is given by the Most High for ministering, through the mediation of the Pope and other Prelates of the Church, in whom resides the spiritual.—The authority of the Pope is greater than all created power beside that of Christ, in some manner extending itself to celestial, terrestrial, and infernal things; so that what is said in the eighth Psalm concerning Christ, may be said of the Pope: 'Thou hast put all things under his feet, sheep and all oxen, and beasts of the field; the fowls of heaven, and fishes of the sea.' And very aptly, because the Pope is the Vicar of Christ. He calls terrestrial things 'sheep;' he calls celestial things 'birds;' he calls infernal things 'fishes of the sea.'—As it respects the power of the Pope over those in hell, who are designated by the 'fishes of the sea,' because as the fishes continually are agitated by the waves, so those in purgatory are continually exercised by the afflictions of punishment; God hath subjected to the Pope also the 'fishes of the sea,' that is, those who are in purgatory, to relieve them by indulgences.—The authority of the Pope is exercised over those on the earth, namely, Pagans, who are designated by 'the beasts of the field;' over Jews and heretics, who are denoted by 'oxen;' over Christians, who are represented by 'sheep.' God hath subjected all these under the feet of the Pope, that is, under his jurisdiction, as is declared in the Psalm, 'Thou hast put all things under his feet, sheep and oxen.'

"Pagans are subject to the Pope, who presides in the world in the place of Christ. But Christ hath full power over every creature. The Pope is the Vicar of Christ, and no one can lawfully withdraw himself from his obedience, as no one can withdraw himself lawfully from submission to God. And as Christ has received from the Father the government and sceptre of the church of Israel, so he hath granted to Peter and his successors the most plenary power. And although Pagans cannot be bound or loosed by excommunication, or absolution in confession, yet by the authority of the keys they can be bound by the Church, and when judged, they may be condemned; and thus, if they would awake from their state and return to the faith, they might be absolved by the same authority. In like manner, although they cannot be said to be of the Church by the merit of faith and good works, yet they can be said to belong to the Church by judiciary power, and occasional utility; but the Pope cannot take away the dominion and jurisdiction from the Pagans, which they justly possess.

"The gifts of nature are not to be taken from infidels, nor even from demons. The power, therefore, of government, as it is a gift of Providence bestowed on every human creature, cannot be taken away from infidels by the Pope, or any Christian Kings. But it is not inconsistent with this, that the Church persecutes Saracens, because they resist ecclesiastical laws, and occupy the lands of Christians. The Pope can punish Pagans, and barbarous people, when they act contrary to the law of nations in manifest things, because every one can be punished for the transgression of that law which he receives and professes. And though Pagans cannot be visited with the spiritual infliction of excommunication, and the like, yet they can be punished by the Church with pecuniary exactions, and by Princes with corporeal punishment also.

"The power of the Pope is exercised over the Jews, designated by 'oxen,' because their necks are still subject to the yoke of the Mosaic law; and God hath also subjected these oxen under the feet of the Pope. The Church can punish indirectly the Jews with spiritual punishment, by excommunicating Christian Princes, to whom the Jews are subject, if they neglect to inflict upon them temporal punishment, when they do anything against Christians. But neither the Pope, nor any other, should compel the Jews to receive faith, when it belongs to God alone to infuse it. Nevertheless, if the conversion of some should be desired, they may be compelled by terrors and stripes, not indeed to receive faith, but that they should present no obstacle to faith by an obstinate will; for in the conversion of infidels, the judgment of God ought to be imitated. But as to the Jews who are forced to faith, that is, to receive baptism, if they are compelled by an absolute coaction, since they do not discern the nature of this sacrament, they are not bound to receive Christianity. But if they are obliged by a conditional coaction, they are to be compelled to retain what they promised, because a compulsory conditional will is voluntary.

"The power of the Pope is exercised over heretics and schismatics, denoted also by 'oxen,' because they resist the truth with the horn of pride. God hath subjected these also under the feet of the Pope, to be punished in a fourfold way; namely, by excommunication, deposition, the deprivation of temporal goods, and military persecution. But then they are only to be taken for heretics when they refuse to reform their pestiferous doctrines, and are ready pertinaciously to defend them. (Dist. xxiv., quæst. i., Hæretici.) Schismatics are designated by 'oxen,' on account of their pride. The Pope hath subjected these also, exercising power over them. For as there is a twofold power in the Church, (namely, one of order, and another of jurisdiction,) the Pontiff deprives schismatics of the latter, divesting them of all authority over those subject to them. Of the power of order or consecration he deprives them as to its execution; that is, so that they cannot perform the acts of their respective orders. Yet this cannot be taken away by man; because the character which is impressed in ordination, which is the very power itself, is indelible. Hence, when a Priest or Bishop consecrates the host, or confers orders, he administers truly, and confers them, provided he observe the forms of the Church; but he does it to his destruction, and the destruction of those who knowingly receive the sacrament from him. But they are all called schismatics who resist the Pope; not, however, in every degree of opposition, but when they act against him by spontaneous intention, by manifest rebellion, and by the refusal to submit to his judicial sentence, in not acknowledging him as head of the Church. But if, for the accomplishment of some temporal convenience, or for the avoidance of danger, any one should resist the precepts of the Pope, and refuse to obey him, such a one, though he sin grievously, cannot, however, be called a schismatic: for schism implies a division from the unity of the faith, and love of the Church. Therefore those are esteemed schismatics who refuse to submit to the Pope as the head of the Church, and to communicate with the members who are subject to him.

"To the question, 'Are all tyrants resisting the Pope schismatics?' it is answered, There are three kinds of separatists to be distinguished. (1.) Some are schismatics by intention, and not by operation. (2.) Others are so by operation, and not by intention; for of themselves they do not intend to divide from the unity of the Church. (3.) Some are so designated by intention and operation; and the Church corrects and subdues these, and persecutes them, until they return by repentance, or break out openly in their wickedness. Hence, both divine and human laws ordain, that those divided from the unity of the Church, and wicked disturbers of its peace, may be subdued by the secular power." (Dist. xxiii., quæst. v., Non vos, et Can. seq.) "The Pope and the other Prelates of the Church, it is true, should not themselves engage actually in putting to death any man by immediate execution, so as to lay violent hands on him. But through the medium of the secular power, the Pope, and other Prelates, can, and ought to exercise justice, and obtain help over tyrants and those who disturb the peace of the Church, as appears from the canon law." (Dist. xxiii., quæst. iii., per totum, et quæst. vi. Vides et Dist. lxiii. Adrianus.)

"Of the power of the Pope over Christians, and especially over Emperors. These are designated by 'sheep,' concerning whom our Saviour says, 'My sheep hear my voice.' (John x.) These are subjected under the feet of the Pope, especially according to that text, 'Thou hast put all things under his feet,' sheep, &c. Hence, when he gave the Papacy to Peter, he said, 'Feed my sheep.' Where, in the first place, it may be proper to speak of the power of the Pope, both with regard to the Emperor and the empire. The Pope can choose or elect the Emperor, who is the Minister of the Pontiff, in this, that he is the Minister of God, whose place he fills: for God hath deputed the Emperor as his Minister; since he hath power to regulate all in the Church, to secure peace, and can direct and destine them to accomplish a spiritual end; for just and reasonable cause, he can also of himself choose an Emperor; namely, on account of the negligence or discord of electors, or for the peace and benefit of Christian people, or for the goodness and fitness of the person elected, or to restrain the boldness and power of heretics, Pagans, and schismatics. The Pope ought to be the prop of truth, justice, and equity. He can do nothing against the truth, but for the truth. It is correct that the Emperor receives the sword from God, in a way in which the Pope does not receive it, except as he is the Vicar of God. For His Holiness cannot choose an Emperor as a private person, but as the successor and Vicar of Christ.

'As the Pontiff can choose an Emperor, so he can appoint the electors, and change those appointed, for just cause, he may also refuse to confirm him who is elected, or may depose him when confirmed. Gregory V., in the time of Otho, having collected the Princes of Germany, chose seven official electors of the imperial court; namely, four laymen and three Archbishops. And hence, since this power is conferred on the electors by the Apostolic Chair, so when it is necessary for the utility and peace of Christianity it can be changed. But when it happens that the electors have chosen two Emperors, it belongs to the Pope to favour one party in this, that he would choose one in preference to the other, whom he knew to be more fit for the empire, and for the defence of the Church, and to whom fame, his life, and justice, would award it. Or when a part of the electors, when called and waited on, are unwilling to elect, or to convene for that purpose, then the Pope chooses, as appears from the canon law, Extrav. de elect. Venerabilem. The reason of this is, that if the Princes called and waited upon are unwilling to assemble, the Apostolic Seat ought not, on that account, to be destitute of an advocate and defender. This is proved by example, because, when Lotharius and Conrad were elected, in the discord, the Pope crowned Lotharius, and when crowned he obtained the empire.

"In like manner, the Pope can provide for a new Emperor by hereditary succession, when he sees that the peace of Christian people can be better provided for by the hereditary succession of the empire than by election: for he hath ordained this, that it might be so, when it is a matter of positive right, in which the Pope hath the plenitude of power. And the reason of the thing is, that the Church stands in need of the Emperor as advocate and defender for the pacific state of the present life. Considering the acts and condition of men, it seems more suitable for the Church, on account of the tranquil state of the faithful, to regulate the imperial dominion by hereditary succession than by election, for three reasons. The Emperor elect ought to be confirmed by the Pope. When confirmed, he ought to be consecrated. Also the Pontiff can, for sufficient cause, excommunicate the Emperor, and depose and deprive him of the empire, as Innocent III. did Otho, and Innocent IV. Frederick; and with the temporal sword, if he is unwilling to give up the administration of temporals, to persecute him, and to raise up war against him, and to absolve his vassals and subjects from the oath of allegiance.

"The power of the Pope over other Kings and Princes of Christian people is the same as that of the Jewish High Priest, whom all Jews of every condition were bound to obey: so all Christians, high and low, are required to obey the Pope, who holds the place of Christ; and disobedience to him is punished as it was to the High Priest. I suppose it to be said as a truth, that the Pope, the Vicar of Christ, hath universal jurisdiction of spiritual and temporal things in the whole world in the place of the living God. But those who assert, that the Pope on earth hath the sole dominion in spiritual, but not in temporal, things, are like the counsellors of the King of Syria, who said, 'Their gods are gods of the mountains, and therefore they overcame us; but we will fight against them in the plains, and in the valleys, in which their gods have no dominion, and we will prevail against them.' This is true to the letter. Thus in modern times bad counsellors, with pestiferous flattery, seduce Kings and Princes of the earth, saying, 'Gods of the mountains,' that is, the Popes, are supreme in spiritual matters; but they are not gods of the valleys, because they have no dominion in temporal affairs: but 'in the plains,' that is, with the power of temporal goods, 'we will fight against them and prevail.' But let us hear what the divine sentence said to them: 'Because the Syrians say, their God is god of the mountains, and not god of the valleys, I will g ve all this multitude into your hand, and ye shall know that I am the Lord.'"

The foregoing is fully supported by the canon law. Multitudes of quotations might be given from other authors which correspond with the sentiments of the Archbishop. This is the true doctrine of the Church of Rome, and confirmed by their practice; though policy leads them in the present day to deny that they hold it. The interpretation of Bellarmine, in substituting the indirect for the direct power, is of no avail but to delude Romanists, and to deceive the easy, liberal, and unsuspecting Protestant.

7. Examine the principal arguments by which Romanists attempt to establish this doctrine. (1.) It is argued by Bellarmine, that "Saul was deprived of his kingdom by Samuel; that King Uzziah was ejected from the temple by the High Priest; that Queen Athalia, by the command of Jehoiada the High Priest, was killed; that certain Kings under the old law were anointed by Prophets. Therefore," &c.* To this we answer, that Samuel, though of the tribe of Levi, was not a Priest. He did not depose Saul from his throne authoritatively; but prophetically declared that he was deprived of his kingdom by Jehovah. Uzziah, becoming leprous on account of his sin, though living in a separate house, possessed, nevertheless, his kingdom to his death. Athalia usurped the throne, from which she was justly ejected. Some Prophets, by the command of God, anointed Kings; but this was not done by their proper and ordinary authority. (2.) It is said, that "Christ drove the buyers and sellers out of the temple, and sent devils into the swine; therefore he had power over temporal affairs, and hath transmitted it to his disciples." This mode of interpretation would prove almost anything; and those who gravely depend on such glosses are beyond the reach of argument and legitimate interpretation. (3.) The argument of the two swords† is adduced to favour the temporal and spiritual power of the Pope. (Luke xxii. 36.) Even Bernard, Abbot of Clairvaux, contends, that "two swords were given to Peter, the one temporal, and the other spiritual."‡ (4.) It is argued, "God made two great lights," &c. (Gen. i.) This text is maintained with vigour by Antoninus, who gravely applies the passage to support the temporal power of the Pope.* He quotes to the same purpose Psalm viii.: "Thou hast put all things under his feet," &c. (5.) Boniface VIII. argues thus: "Christ said to Peter, 'Feed my sheep;' but the Emperor is one of his sheep; therefore he is committed to Peter."† How far this scripture proves the power of the Pontiff in deposing Princes from their dominions, no one can be at a loss to ascertain; no argument is necessary to refute such trifling. (6.) "The Apostle says, 'The spiritual man judgeth all things;' (1 Cor. ii. 15;) therefore the Pope judgeth the Emperor." Such reasoning carries with it the easy burden of its own confutation.

8. Several powerful arguments against the assumed temporal power of the Pope have been advanced:—

(1.) Christ, as Founder and Head of the church, disclaimed all authority of that kind. He told Pilate that he was indeed a King, but that his "kingdom was not of this world," that he did not come to establish temporal dominion, but "to bear witness unto the truth," and set up a spiritual kingdom. (John xviii. 34, 36, 37.) Hence he fled when the Jews would have made him King. Being asked by one to speak to his brother to divide the inheritance with him, he answered, "Man, who made me a judge or a divider over you?" (Luke xii. 13, 14.) From these passages, and others of a kindred character, it is manifest that Christ, as Founder and Head of the church, disavowed all temporal power. The Pope professes to be Christ's Vicar upon earth: it is therefore absurd to suppose that he possesses more power than Christ himself.

(2.) The doctrine of the temporal authority of the Pontiff over Princes is not more repugnant to the example of Christ, than to the doctrine taught by the Apostles. In this manner Paul inculcated subjection. "Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers." (Rom. xiii. 1.) "Ye must needs be subject, not only for wrath, but also for conscience' sake." (Verse 5.) "Put them in mind to be subject to principalities and powers, to obey Magistrates." (Titus iii. 1.) Here the faithful are taught to be subject to "the higher powers," to "principalities" and "Magistrates," and none are exempt from this obedience. St. Peter enjoins submission in terms no less expressive than those used by St. Paul. "Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake: whether it be to the King, as supreme; or unto Governors, as unto them that are sent by him for the punishment of evil-doers, and for the praise of them that do well. For so is the will of God." (1 Peter ii. 13—15.) We leave the asserters of Papal supremacy to reconcile subjection to the higher powers, to principalities and Magistrates, as an indispensable duty of Christians, with the Pope's assumption not only to be free from all subjection himself, but also to subject all Princes to his authority as supreme Lord, both temporal and spiritual, over them.

[* Bellarm. Opera, tom. i.; De Roman. Pontif., lib. v., cap. viii., col. 907. Colon., 1620.]

[† "In hac ejusque potestate duos esse gladios, spiritalem videlicet et temporalem, evangelicis dictis instruimur. Nam dicentibus Apostolis, 'Ecce gladii duo hic,' in ecclesia scilicet cum Apostoli loquerentur, non respondit Dominus nimis esse, sed satis. Certe qui in potestate Petri temporalem gladium esse negat, male verbum attendit Domini proferentis, 'Converte gladium tuum in vaginam.' Uterque ergo est in potestate Ecclesiæ, spiritalis scilicet gladius et materialis. Sed is quidem pro Ecclesia, ille vero ab Ecclesia exercendus. Ille Sacerdotis, is manu Regum et militum, sed ad nutum et patientiam Sacerdotis. Oportet autem gladium esse sub gladio, et temporalem auctoritatem spiritali subjici potestati. Nam cum dicat Apostolus: 'Non est potestas nisi a Deo; quæ autem sunt, a Deo ordinata sunt;' non autem ordinatæ essent, nisi gladius esset sub gladio, et tanquam inferior reduceretur per alium in suprema."—Corp. Juris Canon., tom. ii.; Extravagant. Com., lib. i.; Bonifac. VIII., tit. viii.; De Majorit. et Obedient.]

[‡ "Dracones, inquis, me mones pascere et scorpiones, non oves. Propter hoc, inquam, magis aggredere eos, sed verbo, non ferro. Quid tu denuo usurpare gladium tentes, quem semel jussus es ponere in vaginam? Quem tamen qui tuum negat, non satis mihi videtur attendere verbum Domini dicentis sic, 'Converte gladium tuum in vaginam.' Tuus ergo et ipse, tuo forsitan nutu, etsi non tua manu, evaginandus. Alioquin si nullo modo ad te pertineret et is, dicentibus Apostolis, 'Ecce gladii duo hic,' non respondisset Dominus, 'Satis est,' sed, 'Nimis est.' Uterque ergo Ecclesiæ, et spiritualis scilicet gladius, et materialis; sed is quidem pro Ecclesia, ille vero et ab Ecclesia exercendus est. Ille Sacerdotis, is militis manu, sed sane ad nutum Sacerdotis et jussum Imperatoris Et de hoc alias. Nunc vero arripe illum, qui tibi ad feriendum creditus est, et vulnera ad salutem, si non omnes, si non vel multos, certo quos possis."—Bernard. Opera, tom. iv.; De Consideratione, lib. iv., cap. iii., p. 15, D. Fol. Lugdun., 1687.]

* Antonini Sum. Theolog., tom. iii., pars iii., tit. iii., cap. i. Fol. Rom., 1485.

† Corp. Juris Canon., tom. ii.; Extravag. Com., lib. i.; Bonifac. VIII., tit. viii.; De Majorit. et Obedient.

(3.) The Bishops of Rome, anterior to Gregory VII., considered the Emperors as supreme in temporals, and as holding their power from God alone; and that they, with all Ecclesiastics and laymen, were bound to obey their mandates. Agapetus, Gelasius, Symmachus, Gregory the Great, &c., taught this doctrine.*

(4.) The same unreserved obedience to the higher powers, to Kings and Princes, though wicked and heretical, was recommended by the Fathers of the Church as an indispensable duty upon Christians: the reason they alleged was, that "all power is of God, and whoso resisteth the power resisteth the ordinance of God." They also added the charge given to servants by St. Peter, to be "subject to their masters with all fear, not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward."† From whence they inferred that it was not lawful for the faithful to withdraw their obedience from the powers ordained of God, even when they persecuted the Church instead of defending it.

(5.) In things pertaining to religion, whatsoever is new cannot be admitted. But this opinion was novel and unheard of, till Gregory VII., in the eleventh century, endeavoured to depose Henry IV. This attempt raised the indignation of many, as Gregory himself confesses. "All the Latins, with few exceptions, praise and defend the cause of Henry, and charge me with excessive severity and impiety toward him."‡ Hence the opinion and practice of this Pontiff obtained the name of the "Hildebrandine, or Gregorian heresy," both from the Romanists and the Reformed Churches; for certainly no heresy ever arose which was more pernicious to the peace and tranquillity of Christendom.

(6.) This doctrine became the fruitful source of war and strife, causing endless conspiracy, insurrection, rebellion, massacre, and assassination. Respecting the impudent attempt of Gregory to dethrone Henry, Otto, the Prelate of Frisinghen, says, "How many wars, how many evils of war, followed from hence! How often has miserable Rome been besieged, taken, and devastated!"§ What a flood of mischief overflowed Europe from the decrees of Innocent IV. against the Emperor Frederick II.; of Boniface VIII. against Philip Augustus, King of France, and of others who were guilty of similar practices!

(7.) The doctrine rests on a bad foundation, even on false facts and reasonings, and erroneous interpretations of Scripture. Of these many instances have been adduced.

(8.) It is a grievous heresy, though inculcated by Roman Pontiffs. If a man taught that adultery, murder, and incest, were lawful, he would be called a heretic by Christians of every name, inasmuch as these crimes are expressly forbidden in the word of God. And is not he who declares that perjury, rebellion, and assassination are lawful, nay, who commands them as duties binding upon the Church, and conducive to the support of religion, to be branded with the same epithet? The doctrine taught by Gregory was eagerly embraced and practised by his successors, many of whom deposed Kings, absolved subjects from their allegiance, and raised as well as encouraged rebellion. This doctrine the Papacy still holds, no Pope having disowned it.

9. It will avail nothing to say, that the indirect power only over Kings and empires is taught and claimed in the present day. For this, to all intents and purposes, embraces the direct authority. No work is easier than to propose some spiritual end in promoting what the Pontiff calls true religion, and in resisting heresy. Romanism with him is the apostolic faith; and whatever promotes it is lawful and right, and contributes to this spiritual end! Hence the most fearful offences against truth and right have been committed under the plea of ecclesiastical utility. Every thing contrary to the Papacy, and in favour of Protestantism, may be lawfully rooted out of any nation; as was the case in France, Spain, Italy, and other countries, by fire and sword, by confiscation, imprisonment, banishment, and death, and all for a spiritual end! In a word, the substitution of the indirect for the direct power is a flagrant Jesuitical trick, and cannot deceive any thoroughly acquainted with such a mystery of iniquity as the Papal system.

10. This power in temporal affairs, the observance of which was asserted and claimed by the Council of Trent, the Church of Rome has endeavoured to enforce wherever she could. France never received the decisions of that Council as a whole, though solicited to do so by the Pope, the Court of Rome, and the Gallic Clergy. The reasons they gave for such rejection may be reduced to the following:—(1.) The attempt upon the jurisdiction of Princes and Magistrates. (2.) The liberties of the Gallican Church. The principal articles in which the jurisdiction of Kings and Magistrates is invaded, wherein the Council claimed an authority which did not belong to it, are as follows:—The Council forbade duels; and excommunicated Emperors, Kings, and other Princes, who suffered them; declaring them deprived of the right and dominion of the city, castle, or other place in which a duel is permitted to be fought. The penalty of excommunication and deprivation of goods is also inflicted on crowned heads. The Synod gave Bishops a power to punish authors and printers of prohibited books, and to lay on them pecuniary fines. It enjoined Prelates to coerce Ecclesiastics, by depriving them of the revenue of their benefices. It gave the entire control of hospitals to the Diocesan. It took away the jurisdiction of Conservators; allowed Bishops a power of compelling parishioners to provide a maintenance for their Priests; and granted to the Prelates, as delegates of the Holy See, authority to oblige laymen to repair churches, and to put the profits of benefices under sequestration.

The same Synod empowered Bishops to punish imperial and royal Notaries, and to suspend them from the exercise of their function; gave to them a power to change testators' wills; and declared, that the appeal from the temporal judges of a Bishop shall be cognizable before the Archbishops. It confirmed the constitution of Boniface VIII., by which tonsured Clergymen, although married, provided they be not bigami, are exempt from lay jurisdiction. It asserted, that the marriage of the son under his father's authority, made without his father's consent, is valid. The Council gave Bishops a power of punishing, not only those who contract clandestine mar-

* Bower's History of the Popes, vol. ii. 4to. Third edit. London, 1750.

† Du Pin, De Antiq. Eccl. Discip., dissert. vii., p. 433, et seq. Fol. Paris, 1686.

‡ "Quotquot Latini sunt, omnes causam Henrici, præter admodum paucos, laudant ac defendunt, et pernimiæ duritiæ ac impietatis circa eum me redarguunt."—Conc. Labb., tom. x.; Greg. Papæ VII. Epistolæ, lib. vii., epist. iii.; Ad Germanos, col. 228, A. Paris, 1671.

[§ "Quanta autem mala, quot bella, bellorumque discrimina inde subsecuta sint, quoties misera Roma obsessa, capta, vastata, quod Papa super Papam, sicut Rex super Regem, positus fuerit, tædet memorare."—Ottonis Frising. Chronic., lib. vii., cap. xxxvi., p. 127. Fol. Basil., 1569.]

riages, but also the witnesses who were present and assisted. It allowed Ordinaries to banish concubinaries, and to punish them severely. It permitted ecclesiastical Judges to cause their sentences against laymen to be executed, by seizing the profits of their estates, and causing the imprisonment of their persons; and granted to Bishops authority to convert the revenues of hospitals to other uses. All these decrees which the Council enacted, were considered encroachments on the jurisdiction of the civil authority.*

XVII. The power of the Roman Pontiff, as a temporal Prince, in his own dominions.

1. Papists say, that it is not contrary to the word of God that the Pope should be both a political and an ecclesiastical Prince; that the two swords of spiritual and ecclesiastical power belong to him, and that he is the right heir of St. Peter's patrimony.†

2. To support this, several examples are adduced of which mention is made in Scripture. "Moses was both Priest and King; Eli judged Israel forty years. The Maccabees. Melchizedek, long anterior to Moses, was both Priest and King," and a significant figure of Christ. (Heb. vii. 2, 3.) In his day the offices of the spiritual and temporal government were not distinguished. All the Patriarchs exercised those functions. The priestly office of Moses was only temporary, and that by the supreme decision of God. Afterward it was confined to Aaron and his sons. While Moses acted under the Patriarchal economy, he filled both offices; but when the Levitical law was established, he ceased to be Priest, and exercised only the civil authority. Joshua succeeded Moses as Prince, and Aaron and his sons as Priests. Thus the offices, by divine appointment, became distinct. Eli judged Israel when anarchy reigned. Micah set up an idol in his house, because there was no King in Israel, and every man did that which was right in his own eyes. (Judges xvii.) The tribe of Dan offered violence to Micah and robbed him. (Judges xviii.) The Levite's wife was shamefully abused by the Gibeonites. (Judges xix.) The men of Benjamin took wives by force. (Judges xxi. 21—23.) Thus the manners of the people became dissolute for want of effective government. It cannot be proved by the example of Eli, that the civil authority was annexed to the priesthood by divine appointment; but rather because of the corruption of the times: no regularly-established civil power being in existence, the people were led to apply to the High-Priest, to whom the judgment of many affairs was referred by the law of the Most High. (Deut. xvii. 8; Lev. xiii. 2.) The office of priesthood, and that of the civil Magistrate, were distinct from the time of Aaron's consecration to the termination of the Jewish polity.

With regard to the example of the Maccabees, they did contrary to the law in taking on themselves the twofold office. The priesthood was annexed to the posterity of Aaron for ever. (Num. iii. 10.) The sceptre was not to depart from Judah till Shiloh came. (Gen. xlix. 10.) When Uzziah invaded the Priests' office, he was punished for the sacrilege; and it is profanity in the priesthood to enter on the discharge of civil office. The pious Kings of Israel and Judah never performed sacerdotal acts; and faithful Clergymen, of whatever grade, never were temporal Princes. The opinion of Gelasius I. is worthy of consideration: "Before the coming of Christ, some, in carnal and earthly acts, were figuratively both Kings and Priests. Such a one was Melchizedek. The devil also imitated this in his members, so that the Pagan Emperors would also be called chief Priests. But after that Christ had come, the true King and Priest, the Emperor was no more called by the Priest's name, neither did the Priest challenge the kingly state. So Christ hath distinguished both offices by their proper acts and dignities, that Christian Emperors, in eternal things, should need the help of Priests, and that they in temporal things should use the benefit of imperial decrees."*

3. It is stated, that Constantine the Great and others granted to the Pope the government of the city of Rome, and other parts of Italy; and therefore it is right that he should enjoy the immunity.† To this we reply, that the pretended act, by which the sovereignty of Rome and the provinces of the western empire were said to be conferred on the Roman Prelate, has so many marks of forgery, that it is absurd to consider it the production of Constantine. We subjoin some of the reasons which prove this: (1.) Among the twelve copies of that instrument, said to be extant, great differences exist. (2.) The style of it is barbarous, and different from that of the genuine edicts of Constantine. It is full of novel modes of speech, the expressions are affected, and the terms such as were never used till subsequent to those times. (3.) The date of this act is false. It states that the donation was made in the spring A. D. 324, four days after he had been baptized by Silvester. It bears the names of the Consuls Constantine for the fourth time, and Gallicanus. Now Constantine in his fourth consulship had not Gallicanus, but Licinius, for his colleague; and this consulship answers to the year 315, at which time Constantine was not baptized, even in the opinion of those who believe that he was the subject of that ordinance at Rome by Silvester; and yet mention is made of the rite in this edict of donation. Byzantium is called Constantinople, though it had not that name till ten years subsequent to the date of this document. All ancient writers agree, that Constantine was not baptized at Rome, but at Nicomedia, when he lay at the point of death. (4.) None of the ancients mention this pretended liberality of Constantine to the Church; but who can believe that Eusebius, and other historians of antiquity, who have minutely detailed the benefits of this Emperor to Christen-

* Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., vol. iii., p. 650. Fol. Dublin, 1723.

[† Bellarm. Opera, tom. i., De Romano Pontif., lib. v., cap. ix. "Non pugnare cum verbo Dei ut unus homo sit Princeps ecclesiasticus et politicus simul."—Vide etiam, Corp. Juris Canon., tom. i., dist. xcvi., Constantinus. Fol. Paris, 1696.]

[* "Ante adventum Christi, ut quidam figuraliter, adhuc tamen in carnalibus actionibus constituti, pariter Reges existerent, et pariter Sacerdotes. Quod S. Melchisedec fuisse sacra prodit historia. Quod in suis quoque diabolus imitatus est, utpote qui semper, quæ divino cultui convenirent, sibimet tyrannico spiritu vendicare contendit; ut Pagani Imperatores, iidem et maximi Pontifices dicerentur. Sed cum ad verum ventum est eumdem Regem atque Pontificem, ultra sibi nec Imperator Pontificis nomen imposuit, nec Pontifex regale fastigium vendicavit. Quamvis enim membra ipsius, id est, veri Regis atque Pontificis, secundum participationem naturæ, magnifice utrumque in sacra generositate sumpsisse dicantur, ut simul regale genus et sacerdotale subsistant; attamen Christus, memor fragilitatis humanæ, quod suorum saluti congrueret, dispensatione magnifica temperans, sic actionibus propriis dignitatibusque distinctis officia potestatis utriusque discrevit, suos volens medicinali humilitate salvari, non humana superbia rursus intercipi, ut et Christi Imperatores pro æterna vita Pontificibus indigerent, et Pontifices pro temporalium cursu rerum imperialibus dispositionibus uterentur, quatenus spiritalis actio a carnalibus distaret incursibus, et ideo, militans Deo, minime se negotiis sæcularibus implicaret."—Conc. Labb., tom. iv., Gelasii Papæ I. tract. i., De Anathematis Vinculo, col. 1232, B. Paris, 1671.]

† Bellarm. Opera, tom. i., De Rom. Pontif., lib. v., cap. ix., col. 910. Coloniæ, 1620.

dom, should pass over a gift so important? (5.) Is it probable that such a grant would be unknown to the Bishops of Rome and to others till the eleventh century, had it existed? (6.) There are various errors and even absurdities in this edict, which demonstrate that it was composed by some ignorant impostor. In it the Pope is represented as wearing a crown of gold, like that of Kings and Emperors, whereas in those times they did not wear a crown, but only a diadem. The fabulous account of Constantine's baptism by Silvester, and of the miraculous cure of his leprosy, is reported as certain. Constantinople was made a Patriarchal See, which was not the case till some time afterward. (7.) While Constantine lived, and a long time posterior to his death, the city of Rome and the empire of the West were subject to the Emperors. The Pontiffs acknowledged them as Sovereigns, without pretending that the city of Rome or Italy, or any part of the western empire, belonged to them. All the temporal power which the See of Rome has obtained since, is owing to Pepin and the Emperor Charlemagne.*

4. On the nature, extent, and origin of the temporal power of the Pope, there is much diversity among Romanists. We have seen that some ascribe it to the grant of Constantine; others, with Du Pin, maintain that the reputed act of that Emperor is a base forgery. The canonists and others believe that his gift was not so much a grant, as a restitution of what had been tyrannically taken from the chief Pontiff; because he has both temporal and civil power immediately from Christ. Gregory VII. maintained that he was rightful Sovereign of the whole universe, as well in civil as in spiritual concerns.†

5. St. Paul saith, "Who is sufficient for these things?" (2 Cor. ii. 16;) that is, for the work of the ministry. Now if the most comprehensive mind be insufficient for it, when the whole time and attention are employed in discharging its duties, how much more incompetent is he who employs so much of his time in attending to the duties of a kingdom? "No man that warreth, entangleth himself with the affairs of this life;" (2 Tim. ii. 4;) a text which proves that engaging in military affairs, and, consequently, in any other engrossing business, as that of traffic, or the state, &c., is utterly inconsistent with the duties of a Pastor of the church of Christ.

6. The civil Magistrate has the power over life and death. The Pope also, as a political Prince, must pronounce and execute sentence in which the life, property, and liberty of the people are concerned. But this is inconsistent with the Pastor's character. The High-Priest was forbidden to touch blood; and the offenders were brought to the gate of the city before the Magistrates. (Deut. xvii. 5.) Criminals, in the most corrupt times, were not placed before the Priests; but in the presence of the civil officers. The former claimed no such power. They said, "It is not lawful for us to put any man to death." (John xviii. 31.) The authority was in the Magistrate, as Pilate said to Christ, "Knowest thou not that I have power to crucify thee, and have power to release thee?" (John xix. 10.) It is of no avail to say, that "the Pope and Clergy put none to death; they only deliver culprits over to the civil power for that purpose:" this does not mend the affair. The Pope, in his own dominions being the civil power, the case is not applicable; consequently, the sin of staining his hands with blood justly falls upon him. In Papal dominions, when the Clergy deliver culprits whom they condemn to the civil Magistrate, it is worse than if they executed them themselves: civil officers are only their vassals and executioners; and the hierarchy incurs the additional guilt of hypocrisy and glaring duplicity in thus delivering them over.

7. If the Pope be a temporal Prince, he may make war. This has been the common practice of Popish Prelates. We are aware how many furious contests were carried on against the Saracens by the Papacy in her crusades; and history abounds with instances in which the Pontiffs have originated, nurtured, and consummated scenes of atrocity and blood.

* Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., vol. i., pp. 163, 164. Fol. Dublin, 1723.
† Idem, vol. ii., p. 264.

BOOK IV.

MISCELLANEOUS DOCTRINES, USAGES, &c., OF THE CHURCH OF ROME.

CHAPTER I.

CELIBACY.

I. The Doctrine stated. 1. Council of Trent, and, 2. Roman Catechism, cited.—II. Of Chastity in general. 1. Is opposed to vague, illicit, and forbidden lusts. Scripture proofs of this. Necessity of the distinction. Romanists, in praising chastity, disparage matrimony: 2. The Council of Trent teaches that marriage is against chastity: 3. The Scriptures, and other authorities, teach that this virtue exists in connexion with matrimony.—III. Of Virginity, as connected with Celibacy. 1. In what cases and sense, and for what reasons, marriage is sometimes equal, and sometimes preferred, to virginity or celibacy: 2. The preference to celibacy ought to be on scriptural grounds: (1.) For the present distress, or necessity; (2.) For greater tranquillity; (3.) The unmarried had more leisure to serve the public: 3. Celibacy in itself is not good: 4. It is confined to those who have the gift of continency —IV. Of the Vow of Virginity or Celibacy. 1. Is to be received only by some: 2. The Romish vow not supported by the Old Testament: 3. Nor by the New: 4. Objections against it: (1.) It is imposed on improper persons; (2.) It is impossible to practise it; (3.) Is opposed to Christian liberty; (4.) Leads to ease; (5.) And to immorality: 5. Matt. xx. 34—36, considered: 6. And Matt. xix. 11, 12, noticed: 7. 1 Cor. vii., answered: 8. Rev. xiv. 4, 5, examined.—V. Clerical Celibacy. Their Arguments for it considered. 1. It is uncertain whether it is enjoined by Scripture, or by the Church. Bailly and Mumford cited: 2. They say the Church ordains it: 3. That it is wisely, justly, and piously instituted: 4. The Clergy must be chaste, Titus i. 8: 5. That the purity necessary for the Clergy requires celibacy: 6. Luke xviii. 29, considered: 7. A single life is preferred to a married one, 1 Cor. vii. 33: 8. The cares of the married state are incompatible with the ministry. Bailly cited. Bishop Hay. Reasons against this argument.—VI. Arguments against the Celibacy of the Clergy. 1. It is not supported by the divine law: 2. But is contrary to it: 3. It is at variance with the divine institution of marriage, Gen. ii. 18, 21, 24: 4. And with Heb. xiii. 4: 5. Patriarchs, Priests, and Prophets were married: 6. Christ sanctioned marriage: 7. Many of the Apostles were married: 8. The clerical rules of Paul embraced marriage as belonging to the duly-qualified Pastor: 9. Celibacy originated in Heathenism: 10. Is a mark of heresy and apostasy, 1 Tim. iv. 1—3: 11. It dissevers the ties that bind men to their country, and renders them subservient to the Pope. Sarpi and Hume cited.

I. Statement of the doctrine of celibacy.

1. We will first state the doctrine of the Church of Rome on this subject, as inculcated by the Council of Trent. "Whoever shall affirm that persons in holy orders, or Regulars, who have made a solemn profession of chastity, may contract marriage, and that the contract is valid, notwithstanding any ecclesiastical law or vow; and that to maintain the contrary is nothing less than to condemn marriage; and that all persons may marry, who feel that though they should make a vow of chastity they have not the gift thereof; let him be accursed. For God does not deny his gifts to those who ask aright, neither does he suffer us to be tempted above that we are able." "Whoever shall affirm that the conjugal state is to be preferred to a life of virginity or celibacy, and that it is not better and more conducive to happiness to remain in virginity, or celibacy, than to be married; let him be accursed." *

2. The Roman Catechism expresses itself as follows:— "The words, 'Increase and multiply,' which were uttered by Almighty God, do not impose on every individual an obligation to marry; they declare the object of the institution of marriage; and now that the human race is widely diffused, not only is there no law rendering marriage obligatory, but, on the contrary, virginity is highly exalted, and strongly recommended, in Scripture, as superior to marriage, as a state of greater perfection and holiness." †

* Canon 9. "Si quis dixerit, Clericos in sacris ordinibus constitutos, vel Regulares, castitatem solemniter professos, posse matrimonium contrahere, contractumque validum esse, non obstante lege ecclesiastica, vel voto; et oppositum nil aliud esse, quam damnare matrimonium; posseque omnes contrahere matrimonium, qui non sentiunt se castitatis, etiam si eam voverint, habere donum; anathema sit: cum Deus id recte petentibus non deneget, nec patiatur nos supra id quod possumus tentari."

Canon 10. "Si quis dixerit, statum conjugalem anteponendum esse statui virginitatis, vel cælibatus, et non esse melius ac beatius manere in virginitate aut cælibatu, quam jungi matrimonio; anathema sit."—Concil. Trid., sess. xxiv. Doctrina de Sacramento Matrimonii. Fol. Romæ, 1564.

[† Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 328. 8vo. Dublin, 1829.

[There are a few particulars, recorded by the Rev. Joseph Mendham, concerning this Catechism, a work of such great repute in the Church of Rome, that they ought not to be overlooked in this controversy. The original title was, Catechismus ex Decreto Concilii Tridentini, ad Parochos, Pii Quinti Pont. Max. Jussu editus, Romæ, 1566. Cum Privilegio Pii V., Pont. Max. "When completed, it was approved, not only by its pontifical editor, but by a pontifical successor, Gregory XIII.; by Carlo Borromeo, saint and Cardinal; by about twenty Synods, after the General one of Trent; and by eminent Doctors without number. It is likewise recognised by Paul V., at the beginning of his Ritual. Lagomarsini, in his edition of the Orations and Epistles of Poggiano, Rome, 1762, and particularly in the notes added to the Life of that author, by Gratianus, at the beginning of the second volume, has satisfactorily proved that it had four authors, and that the fourth, the one most difficult to be determined, was Muzio Calini, Archbishop of Zara. The exact and practised Latinity of Poggiano himself gave the work its ultimate form and polish. The work was in the selfsame year, 1566, translated, as directed, into the vernacular tongue, Italian, and soon after into other European languages. Into English it was first translated by John Bromley, in the reign of James II., A.D. 1687; subsequently in Ireland, Dublin, A.D. 1816, by permission; and, lastly, in the same unfortunate country by Jeremiah Donovan, the Reverend, Professor of Rhetoric and Belles Lettres in the Royal College of Maynooth, as faithless and dishonest a translator as the Church of Rome has anywhere produced; and that is saying something, but nothing more than the truth. It is enough to say of the contents of this document, which is by no means a Catechism in the ordinary acceptation of the name, being an instruction for instructors, that it embodies, although in a softened and cautious form, all the essentials of the corrupt Christianity of Rome, particularly the corporality of transubstantiation. It binds all the subjects of Rome with a chain of iron, as Drs. Doyle and Murray, at their mock examination in 1825, before the Commission, were obliged

II. A few words on chastity in general may not be out of place, before we enter on the formal discussion of Romish celibacy.

1. Chastity is properly opposed to vague, illicit, and forbidden lusts; and is a necessary virtue of the true Christian. God hates impurity of every kind; and all who are polluted with the defilements of an immodest life, cannot be in the favour of God. This view is supported by the following portions of Scripture:—Eph. iv. 19, 20; v. 3—7; 1 Thess. iv. 3—7. The doctrine, therefore, concerning a pure chastity should be inculcated, and strongly recommended and enforced, that all might possess it. The false persuasion is to be banished from the minds of men; namely, that the chastity well pleasing to God exists only in an unmarried state, as though being married were inconsistent with purity. When we speak of chastity according to the word of God, we do not refer to that which pertains to an unmarried state, but to that which applies equally to both. The purity concerning which the Scriptures speak, implies, (1.) That all unhallowed desires, pollution, and association prohibited by God, are to be shunned. (2.) That chastity in the marriage state is pleasing to Him, on account of his appointment, blessing, and sanctification. (3.) In those who have the gift of continency, chastity is the purity of a single life, in which there is an abstinence, not only from prohibited, but also from lawful, desire.

When Romanists utter encomiums on chastity, they invariably direct their discourse chiefly against matrimony, and say but little on the evil of indulging in forbidden lust. The people, hearing those thus speak who indulge in almost every forbidden pleasure, yet boast of chastity, because they do not enter into lawful marriage, entertain a hatred against that state, and are inclined to think that the gratification of unlawful desires cannot be very sinful. The Theologues of Trent ought to have distinguished between true chastity, and vague, illicit, and forbidden enjoyment; when the danger was, not from lawful wedlock, but from licentious association. God, who is a Being of unsullied purity, ordains that those who cannot resist ought to marry; but the malign spirit, the enemy of chastity, who is also called ακαθαρτος, "impure" or "unclean," as a roaring lion goeth about to excite to unholy acts; while the Holy Spirit declares against all unhallowed and forbidden pleasure.

2. The Council of Trent asserts that chastity may be distinguished from matrimony, as though it could not exist in the married state. In the ninth canon it is stated, "If any one shall say that Regulars, having solemnly professed chastity, can contract marriage, and that all persons may marry who feel, that though they should make a vow of chastity, they have not the gift thereof; let him be accursed." They teach, therefore, that chastity would be violated and contaminated by marriage.

[To disparage wedlock was, as appears by the writings of many ancient authors, considered, in the pure, primitive age of Christianity, as one of the most prominent and distinctive features of damnable heresy. St. Paul imputed such condemnation to the operation of seducing spirits, and announced it as a result of the doctrines of devils. Clement of Alexandria, alluding to the heretics of his day, says, "There are some who publicly call matrimony fornication, and maintain that it is a tradition of the devil." Theodoret, speaking of Saturnilus the heretical disciple of Menander, says, "He was the first who called marriage a doctrine of the devil;" and discoursing about the Encratites, with whom the Manicheans, Gnostics, Nicolaitans, Basilideans, Montanists, and other heretics, concurred in condemning or despising matrimony, he says, "They observe celibacy, calling marriage whoredom, and pronouncing legitimate union diabolical." Epiphanius, in concurrence with Theodoret, observes that the heretic Saturnilus held, that marriage, and the procreation of children, was suggested by Satan; and that the Encratites taught, that it manifestly proceeded from the devil. Basil informs us, that the Marcionites abominated marriage; and Harmenopulus relates, that the Massilians habitually dissolved the matrimonial bond. This practice appears to have been general among the early heretics, whose sects were so numerous, and so intermingled with the early Christians, that the less reflecting and less sound of the latter began gradually to adopt their sentiments concerning that holy state. This is evident from an Epistle of Innocent I., A. D. 414, addressed to the Bishops of Macedonia, in which he maintains it to be impious to decry or condemn the institution of wedlock.*]

3. The word of God, and other authorities, teach that the purest chastity may exist in connexion with the married state. Our Lord recognises marriage as a divine ordinance, and therefore holy, just, and good. (Matt. xix. 2—12.) The unbelieving wife is sanctified by the believing husband, and the contrary. (1 Cor. vii. 14.) St. Paul calls marriage a great mystery. (Eph. v. 32.) He says, respecting the married, that God had called them not to uncleanness, but to holiness. (1 Thess. iv. 7.) He represents the married woman's duty to be "to continue in faith, and charity, and holiness, with sobriety;" (1 Tim. ii. 15;) that it is the duty of the aged "to teach the young women to be sober, to love their husbands, to love their children, to be discreet, chaste, keepers at home, good, obedient to their own husbands." (Titus ii. 4, 5.) "Marriage is honourable in all." (Heb. xiii. 4.) And Peter ascribes chastity to the married state. (1 Peter iii. 2.)

[The Apostolical Constitutions speak of the married state thus: "We believe that lawful marriage and the begetting of children is honourable and undefiled. For the difference of sexes was formed in Adam and Eve for the increase of mankind. The Bishops assembled at the Council of Gangra, A. D. 324, when heretical and heathenish sentiments, deprecative of matrimony, had begun to spread among the people, and to be adopted even by some of the Clergy, declared that they honoured the chaste bond of wedlock. The celebrated Paphnutius, who had led a life of perpetual celibacy, and unsuspected continence, disinterestedly resisting an attempt which was made, at the first Council of Nice, to forbid the Clergy the company of their wives, loudly, and with the desired effect, affirmed, in the midst of the assembly, that marriage was honourable in all, and the bed undefiled, and to acknowledge. But independently of what were oaths then, and perjuries in 1831, the fact is undeniable, and eminently important."—Mendham's Life and Pontificate of St. Pius V., pp. 38—40. 8vo. London, 1832.]

[* "Uxorem ducere crimen est, an non est crimen? Si crimen est, ergo (præfata venia dixerim) erit Autor in culpa, qui ut crimina committerentur in paradiso præcepit, cum ipse eos benedixit. Si vero non est crimen, quia quod Deus instituit nefas sit crimen appellare, et Solomon addidit, 'Etenim a Deo præparatur viro uxor;' quomodo creditur inter crimina esse dimissum quod Autore Deo consummatum? Nuptiarum ergo copula, quia Deo mandato perficitur, non potest dici peccatum."—Corp. Juris Canon., tom. i., distinct xxvi., can. iii. Fol. Paris, 1695.]

pronounced the sexual intercourse of married persons chastity, or modesty. Chrysostom and Theophylact, using nearly the same words, maintained, in opposition to some of the heathen philosophers of their days, that 'wedlock was in no respect whatsoever obstructive of virtue.' The former, indeed, proceeds much farther; and exhibits that holy state in its true point of view: 'Marriage presents to us no obstacle in our way to heaven; for if it were an impediment to us, and if a wife were to occasion our being ensnared, God, who created her at the beginning, would certainly not have denominated her an assistant to man:' 'And truly,' says Clement of Alexandria, 'she is, according to Scripture, a requisite assistant.' In another of his works, the former says, 'Marriage is a chain, a chain ordained by God.' In another, he says, 'Marriage, to those who make a proper use thereof, is a harbour of temperance; inasmuch as it prevents nature from driving at random. For by a legitimate conjunction, as by rocks interposed and resisting the billows of lust, it places and preserves us in the greatest tranquillity.' Again, he says, 'Marriage is the safeguard of chastity;' an observation concurrent with the precept of St. Paul, 'To avoid fornication, let every man have his own wife,' &c. Clement of Alexandria, whose language on the subject of second marriages is somewhat reprehensible, speaks highly in favour of wedlock in various passages of his Stromata and Pedagogue. Augustine's encomiums on marriage are numerous. Gregory of Nyssa, among other commendations, says, 'It is valuable, inasmuch as it introduces into the world those who may please God.'"]

III. Virginity considered as connected with celibacy.

1. It may be inquired, in what case, and in what sense, and also for what cause, marriage is sometimes equal, and occasionally regarded as superior, to celibacy. The Council of Trent overlook the scriptural view of the subject, and, instead of preferring virginity to marriage on legitimate grounds, they anathematize all who magnify the latter. When Romanists speak of the object of celibacy, they maintain that it is to satisfy for sins, and meritorious in procuring eternal life. An entirely different view is taken in the word of God.

2. Sufficient reason from Scripture ought to be adduced by those who prefer a celibate life. St. Paul affirms, that he who giveth his virgin in marriage does well; but he who does not, does better; (1 Cor. vii. 38;) and that a widow is happier if she remain in that state. (1.) The Apostle says, "I suppose this is good for the present distress." (1 Cor. vii. 26.) The word αναγκη, "distress," signifies also "necessity," "tribulation," "calamity." The church was persecuted, and those who had families to care for would be exposed to greater inconvenience than those who had none. (2.) The unmarried among the Corinthians at that time had greater tranquillity than the married. The married shall have "trouble in the flesh." (Verse 28.) (3.) They had also more time to devote to the service of God. (Verses 32—34.) The Apostle speaks concerning unequal marriages with Heathens; in consequence of which believers were burdened with innumerable cares. The passages do not apply with equal force to marriages among Christians.

3. Celibacy abstractedly and in itself is not good, being evil or otherwise according to the use made of it. If chosen with pious intention, by proper persons, and accompanied with holy obedience, it is praiseworthy; but if selected from a persuasion that it is meritorious, the most licentious life may be led by a celibate. The excellence of such a state does not consist in simple abstinence from marriage, but in observing the covenant of God. (Isaiah lvi. 4.) The widow who does not refer celibacy to its proper end is dead while she lives. (1 Tim. v. 6.)

4. A single life is to be confined to those who have the gift of continency. Our Lord declares that this state is not applicable, except to those to whom it is given. (Matt. xix. 11.) The Apostle says, "Every man hath his proper gift of God, one after this manner, and another after that." (1 Cor. vii. 7.) He also teaches that widows who are under a certain age ought to marry. (1 Tim. v. 9.) The Romanists, by their doctrine of celibacy, oppose the Scripture, and exact vows from those who are not endowed with that gift.

IV. Of the vow of virginity or celibacy.

1. It is to be received only by those who have the gift of continency: and unless this be possessed, to embrace it would be sinful. Useful rules on this subject may be collected from St. Paul. No one, decoyed with the praises of a single life, and not having ascertained whether he possessed the gift of continency, should take the vow. The rule given is, either the necessity existing, or the power which an individual may possess over his own will. He calls that necessity, when any one is unable to bridle his desires, so that he is compelled either to commit adultery, or to marry. He who has this gift of God, together with power over his own will, may lawfully vow a single life. Those sin not, who, having that power, see fit to marry. St. Paul also teaches that those who thus vow should be of mature age, (1 Tim. v.,) and that they are in danger of falling into a snare, if they enter into such engagements thoughtlessly or for wrong ends. How manifestly does the Tridentine Council contradict the Apostle! The former pronounces an anathema on those who contract marriage and are uncertain whether they possess the gift of continency: the latter declares it to be a duty to marry!

2. The vows mentioned in the Old Testament give no countenance to the doctrine of celibacy. They referred to that which was commanded or authorized by the will of God. The Popish vow of celibacy possesses no such character. No place in the Old Testament can be adduced which enjoins such restraint.

3. In the New Testament the vow of virginity is not enjoined. It is only permitted. To require it, is to teach for doctrines the commandments of men. Celibacy in proper persons is not disproved: it has its foundation in the words of Christ. (Matt. xix. 12; 1 Cor. vii. 7.) He permits eunuchs, but does not command men to be such. He says that few can receive it; so that he imposes the necessity of it on none. St. Paul recommends the tranquillity of virginity, and says, that "it is good for" virgins and widows, if they remain so on account of the present distress. He does not enjoin it, otherwise he would consider that he was laying a snare, to entangle Christians. (1 Cor. vii. 35.) He teaches, that "it is better to marry than to burn." (Verse 9.) And "to avoid fornication, every man should have his own wife." (Verse 2.) He wills that "the younger widows marry." (1 Tim. v. 14.) He enjoins that the Bishop to be chosen should be "the husband of one wife;" (1 Tim. iii. 2;) and asserts, that to prohibit marriage is the doctrine of devils. (1 Tim. iv. 1—3.) From all this it is manifest that the Popish vow of celibacy is not of divine injunction.*

[* Theodoret says, "The Lord God made no laws concerning virginity, knowing it to be above nature." Chrysostom, exhibiting an instance of that inconsistency with which most of the Fathers are

4. To the vows of virginity or celibacy, as inculcated by the Church of Rome, the following objections are presented :—(1.) They exact vows from young persons, who are not capable of judging discreetly. Leo I. required the age of forty in Monks before their consecration. Several Councils ordained the same. Pius I. recommended the twenty-fifth year. This the third Council of Carthage confirmed. Synods of more recent date have allowed vows of virginity to be taken as early as fourteen years of age in males, and twelve in females. The Council of Trent recognises sixteen years as the age before which the vow should not be taken.* Cardinal Bellarmine forms two propositions with regard to the proper age. The first is, that "to receive the vows of continence, obedience, and poverty, the age required is that in which the use of free will exists ; and where this is, vows may be received at any age." The second is, that "that age is necessary for public profession, which the laws of the Church have prescribed ; and these vary according to time and place."† If we be guided by the practice which has generally obtained in the Roman Church, the following monastic rule has been usually adopted :—"Who vows deliberately ? Girls and boys, before they can judge, may be persuaded to vow ; sometimes also they may be compelled." And we ask, who is ignorant of the practice of compelling children and young people by persuasion, which in their case is compulsion, as well as by forcible constraint, to take upon them such fearful vows ?

This custom of the Papacy is directly contrary to the directions of St. Paul : "Let not a widow be taken into the number under threescore years old." (1 Tim. v. 9.) "But the younger widows refuse." (Verse 11.) "I will therefore that the younger women marry." (Verse 14.) Here the age of sixty is that which the Apostle requires for those who are to devote themselves to celibacy. Certain qualifications are mentioned :—that she be "well reported of for good works; have brought up children, lodged strangers, washed the saints' feet, relieved the afflicted, and diligently followed every good work." (1 Tim. v. 10.) The younger widows are to be refused, because, as a general thing, they will "wax wanton against Christ :" they are therefore instructed to marry. The evils to be shunned by refusing them a place among the widows or Deaconesses of the church are also enumerated : "For when they have begun to wax wanton against Christ, they will marry ; having damnation, because they have cast off their first faith. And withal they learn to be idle, wandering about from house to house ; and not only idle, but tattlers also, and busy-bodies, speaking things which they ought not." And the manner in which the younger women are to be most advantageously employed likewise is stated : "I will therefore that the younger women marry, bear children, guide the house, give none occasion to the adversary to speak reproachfully."

(2.) The Papal vow of continency deviates from the divine word, because it is impossible to those not possessing the gift. It is special. Our Lord expressly says, "All men cannot receive this saying, save they to whom it is given." (Matt. xix. 11.) St. Paul teaches the same. It is, however, said, that God gives this boon to those who ask it. We reply, that this is applicable only to those common graces which are necessary for all. But the special gift of continency is intended but for a few ; and these only are the proper persons to receive it. This is evident to all who have examined the Scripture on this head.*

(3.) The vow of celibacy is opposed to Christian liberty. The Apostle denies that he had any precept from the Lord concerning virgins endowed with such a gift. (1 Cor. vii. 25.) He declares, that he would not lay a snare for any one. (Verse 35.) But the Papal engagements are snares to the consciences of men, inasmuch as they take away the power of entering into the married state ; whereas God, by his chosen Apostle, would not impose a necessity on any, but instituted marriage as a remedy to be resorted to by all. The Apostle in general pronounces, "If they cannot contain, let them marry." (1 Cor. vii. 9.) But under the Papacy they vow celibacy with the intention that they must never marry, whatever may be the result ; whether they can contain or not, whether they have dominion over their passions, or are hurried on to unlawful gratification. The Papacy teaches, that marriage would be a violation of a lawful vow. St. Paul says, "It is better to marry than to burn." They declare the contrary. St. Paul says, "If a virgin marry, she sinneth not." They assert, that it is a grievous sin, and those who commit it are held accursed. St. Paul says, "Not that we would lay a snare for you." But though this snare has entangled their Clergy, Nuns, and Monks in the grossest sins of the flesh, and has deeply tainted the whole Church of Rome, and characterized it with the perpetration of the grossest crimes, they nevertheless adhere to the sin of an almost universal prostitution.

(4.) By such vows the Clergy are generally placed in a state, in which they enjoy ease, abundance, and fulness of bread. Numerous fruits, connected with these, are well known.

(5.) Their celibacy has produced corrupt manners, both among the Clergy and people. Several passages of Scripture are adduced to support celibacy, which demand attention.

5. The following is cited :—"The children of this world marry, and are given in marriage : but they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry nor are given in marriage : neither can they die any more : for they are equal unto the angels ; and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." (Luke xx. 34—36.) The plain meaning is, that marriage is the condition of our present mode of existence ; but not of a future life. According to the Roman Catholic interpretation, we might argue, "Animal life is sustained by aliment : not so the angelic justly chargeable, observes, that "the respectability of virginity is not so much as mentioned in the Old Testament." And Clement of Alexandria, by affirming that man and woman do not constitute two human beings, but one only, sanctions an opinion, that either is defective without a durable union with the other : an opinion which is really not without a very plausible foundation.]

[* "In quacumque religione, tam virorum, quam mulierum professio non fiat ante decimum sextum annum expletum ; nec qui minore tempore quam per annum post susceptum habitum in probatione steterit, ad professionem admittatur. Professio autem antea facta, sit nulla ; nullamque inducat obligationem ad alicujus regulæ, vel religionis vel ordinis, observationem, aut ad alios quoscumque effectus."—Can. et Decret. Conc. Trident., sess. xxv. ; De Reg. et Monial., cap. xv. Fol. Romæ, 1654.]

[† "At his non obstantibus dicimus duo. Primo, ad vota suscipienda continentiæ, obedientiæ, et paupertatis, requiri quidem eam ætatem, in qua sit usus liberi arbitrii : sed ubi is adfuerit, in quacumque ætate licere talia vota nuncupare. Secundo dicimus, ad professionem publicam expectandam etiam eam ætatem, quam leges Ecclesiæ præscribunt, quæ pro temporum et locorum diversitate variæ exstiterunt."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii. ; De Monachis, cap. xxxv., col. 473, A. Coloniæ, 1620.]

* Gerhardi Loci Theologici, De Conjugio, sect. i., De Cœlibatu, tom. vii. 4to. Jenæ, 1620.

life; therefore to abstain from food, as far as possible, is in the same degree to make one's self an angel." But our Lord's intention was to confute the Sadducee, whose doctrine struck at the root of all religion; and to reprobate the gross conceptions of the future life then current among the Jews. Nevertheless, this is the passage which is made more use of than any other in recommending the practice of religious celibacy. By a similar interpretation the sanguinary measures of the Papacy were excused and recommended, by such passages as the following:—"Compel them to come in:" "I am not come to send peace upon earth, but a sword:" "It is better that one member perish," (that one heretic, or a thousand, be burned,) "than that the whole body" (the church) "be lost:" "Here are two swords," the spiritual and temporal: "And God made two great lights," the greater light the Pope, the lesser light the Emperor.

6. The following is quoted in favour of celibacy:—"But he said unto them, All men cannot receive this saying, save they to whom it is given. For there are some eunuchs which were so born from their mother's womb: and there are some eunuchs which were made eunuchs of men: and there be eunuchs which have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake. He that is able to receive it, let him receive it." (Matt. xix. 11, 12.) The Jewish notion of marriage led the Israelites to consider it a positive and universal duty, requiring, like other national prejudices, to be modified, in order to make room for a more comprehensive religious system. Our Lord did not intend to condemn personal cleanliness, when he said, "To eat with unwashen hands defileth not a man." What he contemplated was, to bring in a spiritual and genuine notion of purity, in the place of rabbinical superstition. Nor does he, in the present instance, disparage matrimony, which here and elsewhere he honours with a solemn sanction; or speak of celibacy as a loftier or more holy condition.

Our Lord appears to have embraced the occasion suggested by the observation of the disciples, "At that rate it is not good to marry," to introduce a higher motive of conduct, as belonging to the "kingdom of heaven," and which, in opposition to the Jewish opinion, might lead certain individuals to separate themselves even from the lawful engagements of ordinary life, to promote his kingdom in an evil world, unencumbered by any other hinderance. The motives of the Gospel might induce a man to lay down his life for Christ, to surrender property and every social endearment, and, as a circumstance attending this devotedness, abstinence from marriage might be an acceptable sacrifice. This sovereign rule may make a man a martyr, or induce him to lead a single life, or impel him to traverse the globe.

In our Lord's rule we observe, First, the well-defined restriction, "All are not able to receive it; if any man is able to receive it, if to any this ability has been given, let such receive it," plainly pointing to a peculiarity of original temperament, which whosoever possessed, might act upon it without peril or presumption. This restriction was contemned by the ancient church, so that thousands, from infancy, or before the age of puberty, were, by the fanaticism of their parents, devoted to celibacy, and exposed to the pursuits of a criminal life in after-days.

Secondly. Our Lord points out a motive, which, after the restriction had been duly regarded, might justify such a course of life: "For the sake of the kingdom of heaven." But the ascetics, instead of seeking to promote the kingdom of heaven, or pure religion, by remaining in the midst of the mass as its salt and light, to preserve and guide, enclosed themselves in religious houses, and were secluded from society at large. Thus they acted on the spirit of selfishness, and in direct opposition to the precepts and spirit of the Gospel. Christ went about doing good, consorting with publicans and sinners; but the ascetics, minding their own things, left the church and the world to wander in error and in crime.

Thirdly. The Redeemer gives no countenance whatever to the principle, that marriage is a pollution, and celibacy a holy state of proximity to God. If such a notion were embraced in our Lord's declaration, here was the place to make it known. In each of these respects, the celibacy of the Nicene Church, and the continuation of it in the Latin, was a flagrant contempt of the rule. First, as it overlooked the restriction with which it had been guarded; secondly, it brought contempt upon the motive which might otherwise justify the celibacy of the few to whom it might have been proper; and, thirdly, it introduced and placed prominent a motive, not merely foreign to Christianity, but positively subversive of it.

7. The seventh chapter of the first Epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians, is insisted on as authorizing celibacy. In the former chapter, the Apostle asks, "What, know ye not that your bodies are the temple of the Holy Ghost?" or, "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God?—If any man defile the temple of God," &c. This truth is employed as a dissuasive from sinful indulgences, such as those specified in the context; and Christians living unblamable in the conjugal relation, fulfilled the intention of the injunction, in abstaining from the works of the flesh, and in cherishing the fruits of the Spirit. Neither in this chapter, nor in any other part of the New Testament, is there any trace of the doctrine, that celibacy is a merit, or that it is a holier condition, or that marriage is, in any sense, a spiritual degradation, or pollution. Among those who devote themselves to itinerant labours, or perilous missions, a family of children may be an incumbrance, while a pious and intelligent wife may be a help-mate. In our Lord's view, it was a favour when public calamity fell on a community during the summer rather than in the winter; and, even then, those were accounted comparatively happy who were not "with child," or who did not "give suck." The Apostle, therefore, in like manner refers to the temporary and special reason which might recommend celibacy: "I suppose this is good for the present distress," for a man, if unmarried, "not to seek a wife." If we ask, what is meant by "doing better," (verse 38) we have an answer in the immunities of a single life, in relation either to seasons of persecution, extraordinary labours, or to any circumstance in which a Christian might think himself at liberty, personal temperament being considered, to use the privilege of "waiting upon the Lord without distraction." "I would that ye should be without carefulness."

8. The following has been quoted in favour of celibacy:—"These are they which were not defiled with women; for they are virgins. These are they which follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth. These were redeemed from among men, being the first-fruits unto God and to the Lamb. And in their mouth was found no guile:" (ψευδος, "lie," not δολος, "guile:") "for they are without fault before the throne of God." (Rev. xiv. 4, 5.) Christians, without any regard to their being single or married, are called by St. James, (i. 18,) "a first-fruit" unto God; and in the Apocalypse, they are designated the "faithful," as distinguished from the "false." They are said to be αμωμοι, "unblamable," and not αφθοροι, "uncorrupt," which was the ecclesiastical name applied to the παρθενοι, "virgins." The scarlet-clad woman, shameless, cruel, and arrogant, and the inveterate enemy of the saints, is an adulteress in the ecclesiastical and symbolic sense of the word; and it is not the profligacy so much as the idolatry that is intended by the prophetic style. The correlative term, virgins, the "true and faithful," "the followers of the Lamb," are those who possessed purity of faith and innocence of manners. Or if by the term "virgins" is meant the virgins of the church, or the celibates, then this interpretation excludes from the privileged chair several of the Apostles, and many of the holiest men and women of every age. Besides, the morals of the professed, whether Priests, Nuns, or Monks, do not correspond with the virgins named, among whom reigned, in all ages of their existence, shameless vices, or a pitiable and loathsome pravity of heart, or entire uselessness. The Monastic Orders were guilty of supporting a system of vain pretensions, profitable frauds, or, in a word, lies, either in the sense of delusions, or of wilful falsification. Take, for instance, the choicest instances of Nicene monkery, as those of St. Anthony, St. Hilarion, St. Martin of Tours, or others of modern date, and there will be discovered marvellous extravagance, delusion, and lying, in the place of holy simplicity, modesty, and truth. The celibacy of the Church of Rome is twofold; namely, that of the Clergy, and that of Monks and Nuns. We advert to the former.

V. The arguments of the Romanists in behalf of clerical celibacy.

1. It is a debated point, whether the celibacy of the Clergy is enjoined by Scripture, or only by the authority of the Church. Bailly observes: "You inquire, whether Clergymen in sacred orders are bound to observe perpetual continency, by the divine or apostolical law? It is answered, with many theologians, against certain others, that the celibacy annexed to sacred orders was neither instituted nor commanded by Christ, or by the Apostles at his command. Nothing is found in Scripture or tradition, by which it can be proved, that perpetual continency was imposed on Ministers by Christ, or by the Apostles at his command. On the other hand, the Church permitted, for many ages, to the Greek Priests the society of wives whom they had taken before ordination, and still permits, as is evident from what we have before said: but the Church is unable to dispense with a law imposed by Christ, or by the Apostles at the command of Christ.—It may therefore be said, that the law of perpetual continency imposed upon sacred Ministers was introduced by the hierarchy, or by the Apostles as governors and leaders of the churches, who proposed it, not as a divine and immutable, but as an ecclesiastical law, as the best mode of governing the church, and as a most suitable discipline for Ministers of the altar.—For these reasons it is manifest, that the law of celibacy is at the same time ecclesiastical and apostolical, in that sense in which we have now explained it. Hence Epiphanius says, that this law was honestly and religiously instituted by the Apostles. Nor are the Fathers to be understood otherwise." *

[* "Quæres, utrum Clerici in sacris ordinibus constituti lege divina vel apostolica teneantur ad perpetuam continentiam?—R. Cum multis theologis contra quosdam alios, cœlibatum sacris ordinibus annexum, nec a Christo nec ab Apostolis jussu Christi fuisse institutum seu præceptum; nihil enim in Scripturis aut traditione reperitur quo probari possit perpetuam continentiam sacris Ministris a Christo vel ab Apostolis jussu Christi fuisse impositam. Aliunde Græcis Sacerdotibus uxorum quas ante ordinationem suam acceperant usum jam a multis seculis permisit Ecclesia, et etiamnum permittit, uti constat ex iis quæ antea diximus; atqui Ecclesia dispensare non potest a lege per Christum vel ab Apostolis jussu Christi imposita. Dicendum igitur est legem perpetuæ continentiæ sacris Ministris impositam fuisse latam ab Ecclesia, seu ab Apostolis ut ecclesiarum rectoribus ac ducibus, qui illam proposuerunt non ut divinam et immutabilem, sed ut legem ecclesiasticam, ut optimam ecclesiæ administrandæ rationem, ut disciplinam sacris altarium Ministris convenientissimam. Ex his patet legem cœlibatus esse simul ecclesiasticam et apostolicam eo nimirum sensu quo rem modo exposuimus. Hinc S. Epiph., Hær. xlviii., ait legem istam ab Apostolis honeste ac religiose institutam esse. Nec aliter intelligendi sunt alii Patres qui dixerunt Apostolos illam legem docuisse aut servavisse."—Bailly, Theologia, tom. v., De Ordine, cap. vii., art. iii., prop. ii.]

According to the foregoing, celibacy was not enjoined by Christ or his Apostles; and hence it is not of divine right. Still, it is considered to be in some sense apostolical; and this will suffice. Here is a specimen of Jesuitical Roman Catholic theology, which will answer the purpose of the theological disputant. When the Protestant is to be answered, celibacy is only a matter of discipline, for the benefit of the Church. To the Romanist it is of apostolical and ecclesiastical authority, which, in his view, is nothing less than divine, and therefore a part of the word of God, though not of the written testimony. This will prepare the way for the next step of authority by which celibacy is enforced.

[The Jesuit Mumford observes, "1. Matrimony being a sacrament and giving grace, it may seem to some that all should do better, to make themselves partakers of this grace. I answer, that the want of this one grace is more than abundantly recompensed by those many great and often-received graces, of which a single life makes us far more capable, as of receiving more frequently and worthily the sacrament of sacraments, the body and blood of our Lord, which Priests daily do, with considerable increase of greater graces; very singular graces also are obtained by prayer, to which chastity doth exceedingly conduce, as Scriptures teach.

["2. Let us hear the Scripture: 'And it came to pass, that, after the days of his office were expired, he departed into his house. And after those days, Elizabeth his wife conceived.' (Luke i. 23.) Hence it appears, as Jerome saith, that even in the old law, the Priests who offered the holy host for the people did not so much as stay in their own houses, but were purified, and so separated for that time from their wives. Whence the Scripture saith, 'After the days of his office, he departed,' &c. Our Priests of the new law being to offer daily sacrifice, are daily to observe virginal purity.

["3. Again, even in married laymen, St. Paul approves abstaining from their wives 'for a time, that they may give themselves unto prayer.' (1 Cor. vii. 35.) 'And this,' saith he, 'I speak for your own profit, not that I may cast a snare upon you, but for that which is comely; and that ye may attend upon the Lord without distraction.' Priests, therefore, who daily should be attending upon our Lord, and praying for themselves and the people, and so often also sacrificing, should daily abstain.

["4. 'He that is without a wife is careful of the things that pertain to our Lord, how to please God: but he that is with a wife is careful of things that pertain to the world.' (1 Cor. vii. 32.) Priests should still be in a state most capable of being 'careful of things that pertain to God, and how to please him;' therefore they should not have wives; for 'he that is with a wife is careful of things that pertain to the world,' which Priests should not be; but if any men, surely Priests chiefly should be those, who should become eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake. (Matt. xix. 12.)

["5. 'No man being a soldier to God entangleth himself in the affairs of this life; that he may please him who hath chosen him to be a soldier.' (2 Tim. ii. 4.) Of all men, Clergymen should take care to please him who hath chosen them to be soldiers, and therefore they of all men should not 'entangle' themselves with secular business, and worldly affairs. And yet if they be married, necessity enforceth them to entangle themselves above married men. For the greatest part of other married men have a settled estate left them to leave their children. But the greater part of Clergymen liveth wholly upon benefices which they can get. And being well bred, and made fit company for the chief of the parish, they also and their wives and their children look high and must be highly maintained. To maintain them thus, only by the benefit of a benefice, (enjoyable at the farthest during life, and perhaps to be taken away far sooner,) there is a kind of necessity for them to make hay apace, whilst the sun shines; they not knowing how little while that may be, and knowing that it cannot be long. But let us proceed:—

["6. 'It behoveth therefore a Bishop to be the husband of one wife.' (1 Tim. iii. 2.) In the first birth of Christianity, virginity was so rare, both among Jews and Gentiles, that it was not possible to find men endued therewith, who were both of sufficient maturity in years, and knowledge, and experience in affairs, as is requisite in Bishops and Priests. Yet, even then, the Apostles would have this at least observed, that no man who married a second wife should be made a Bishop, no, nor a Deacon; and therefore not a Priest. And then this place is understood by the Councils and Fathers unanimously. See the Rhemish Testament on this place. But as for marrying after priesthood received, it is a thing wholly unheard of in God's church. Neither is there one authentic example thereof in the whole world, as the Rhemists say. St. Paul adds yet further: 'Let the Deacon be the husband of one wife.'

["7. Ridiculous is the interpretation of those who say St. Paul would only have such made Deacons, Priests, Bishops, as have but one wife at once. For this is to require no more than he requires of all Christians. If you say, he yet requires of them that they never had, at one and the same time, more wives than one before their conversion, this is showed evidently not to express the meaning of these words; for he useth just the same words, and the like expression, when he could have no such meaning. For when he speaketh of choosing a widow, he in like manner saith, 'She should be a widow, having been the wife of one man.' How ridiculous is it to say, that here (where there is just the same expression) the meaning is, that only such should be chosen to be widows (for the end here appointed) who had had but one husband at one time before her conversion! For neither Jews nor Gentiles did ever permit women to have more husbands than one at once. It had been, therefore, ridiculous to require that which could not but be.

["8. Your chief objection against all this, as also against vowed virginity, is, that you conceive St. Paul (1 Tim. iv. 1—3) to teach, that this is 'the doctrine of devils, forbidding to marry.' I answer, that St. Paul speaks only against the doctrine of heretics, (cited by the Rhemists here, to which add the Manicheans, and others,) who taught that the use of marriage came from a bad god, or devil. As for us, we honour marriage more than you; for we hold it to be a sacrament, which you do not. Neither can you say that we absolutely forbid marriage, because we forbid, or rather declare marriage to be by God forbidden, to those persons only who, wittingly and willingly, have either vowed virginity when they might have married if they pleased, or who, wittingly and willingly, (when they might as freely have married,) undertook holy orders, to which state they knew none were admitted but such as would voluntarily and freely profess virginity. For the Church, now abounding with very sufficient choice of worthy persons, who will voluntarily make such vows, and undertake freely such a profession, will admit no others to holy orders, because she is taught (in all the texts I cited in the beginning) that these be the fittest. With us, therefore, there is no man, or woman, who might not have married if they would. And therefore we cannot be said to forbid marriage, unless you will say that St. Paul did forbid marriage, when he forbade Bishops, Deacons, and vowed widows to pass to second marriage. This is only to forbid breaking of vows, to such as voluntarily would make them, when they might freely have married.

["9. Your other objections be foul corruptions of Scripture. The first of them is, 'Have we not power to lead about a woman, a sister, as also the rest of the Apostles, and our Lord's brother and Cephas?' (1 Cor. ix. 5.) Here, in place of a 'woman,' your Bibles read 'wife,' making the Holy Ghost restrain the word (gynaika) to a 'wife,' though it is known that this word is usually put for a 'woman,' whether wife or not wife. Here the Rhemish Testament shows how antiquity ever expounded this place of leading about such devout women as followed Christ 'to minister to him.' (Matt. xxvii. 55.) 'I could thus have maintained myself,' saith St. Paul, 'by partaking of your temporal goods, to whom I give spiritual goods. But to burden nobody, I, (being a tradesman,) have made it my glory to maintain myself by the labour of my own hands.' Yea, your own Bible, but two chapters before, translated the self-same Greek word, for such a woman as could not be a wife. 'It is good for a man not to touch a woman.' (1 Cor. vii. 1.) Translate, if you dare, 'It is good for a man not to touch a wife.'

["10. The second corrupt text you object is, Heb. xiii. 4; for where we read word for word out of the Greek, 'Marriage honourable in all,' you read, 'Marriage is honourable in all men,' adding the verb 'is,' and the noun 'men,' yet your best Bibles have not this noun, ('men,') and they print this verb ('is') in a different letter: as also in the former text they did print the word 'woman' in the margin. This juggling the vulgar perceived not; and the Bibles used it to make them take for the true text, that which is but their interpretation of it. But if a man would presume to add a verb which should come as near as may be to the mind of the Apostle, then he should put the verb in the imperative mood, thus, 'Let marriage be honourable in all.' For St. Paul useth this mood in the first verse, 'Let brotherly love continue;' and in the second, 'Be not unmindful,' &c.; and in the third verse, 'Remember them in bonds.' The fourth verse, being that we speak of, should be likewise expressed by a verb in that mood, especially seeing he still goeth on in that mood in the fifth verse. 'Let your conversation be without covetousness.' The Apostle's sense then seems clearly to be, 'Let marriage be honourable in all;' that is, let no man dishonour his marriage-bed, with either unfaithfulness to his spouse, or with unnatural or brutish lust; and so his next words very fitly are, 'For God will judge fornicators and adulterers.' But your Bible, by a double imposture, makes a quite different sense. The first is to put the verb in the indicative mood, 'Marriage is honourable;' and because this alone helped not much, you used a second imposture in the words following, which in Greek are, εν πασι, and in Latin, in omnibus. And in both languages all scholars see that there is doubt, whether this should signify, 'in all men,' taking the adjective in the masculine gender, or, 'in all things,' taking it in the neuter gender. Our Bibles leave it as they find it, 'in all;' but your Bible undertakes absolutely to determine the sense of the Holy Ghost, and make him say roundly, 'Marriage is honourable among all men.' Thus your Bible, anno 1577: yea, 'inter quosvis,' saith Beza, 1565; that is, 'Marriage is honourable among any kind of persons.' Out of which new scripture the people easily infer, marriage is honourable among those who have received holy orders, or have made vows of virginity. And the text being thus stretched, they might add, 'among brothers and sisters, father and daughter.'" *]

2. Romanists argue that "Clergymen are bound to observe this law which the Church in former times enjoined and confirmed repeatedly, and hath renewed it under divers punishments; namely, suspension, excommunication, and imprisonment itself."† We allow that the Church of Rome hath enjoined celibacy upon her Clergy, and enforced the observance of it by suspension, excommunication, and imprisonment; but she has done this, not only without authority from the Bible, but also against its express sanctions. Her enactments in this matter are consequently null and void.

3. Bailly asserts, "The Church hath wisely, piously, and justly instituted this law."‡ That cannot be done wisely which infinite Wisdom does not institute; nor piously, which his goodness and holiness have rejected; nor righteously, which an infinitely-just God has condemned. Of this description is the celibacy of the Clergy, as will be more fully shown.

4. It is objected against the marriage of the Clergy, that St. Paul says, "A Bishop must be sober, or chaste." (Titus i. 8.) To this we reply: (1.) If Bishops, by divine precept, are bound to abstain from their wives, then celibacy is, by divine right, annexed to the ministry. (2.) The Apostle admits that a Bishop may be the husband of one wife and have children: how, then, can he be said to require celibacy in the Clergy? (3.) The word σωφρων means "prudent," "sober," rather than "chaste," and refers more particularly to mental endowments. The Apostle recommends the quality as it existed among married men, and was exercised. Consequently the Romanists are at variance with him; for they insist on that which is not found in the married state, and therefore their ecclesiastical law contradicts the precept of the inspired Apostle.

5. They argue that the purity required in the ministry is inconsistent with the married state. Bailly observes, "It is the duty of the Ministers of the Church to handle holy things; for instance, to consecrate or administer the body of Christ. But these sublime and most holy duties seem to require supreme and angelical purity, and hence a single life."* Bishop Hay says, "Seeing, therefore, that the office of the priesthood requires the most angelical purity, and the most sublime sanctity, in those who are admitted to it, therefore the Church has judged proper to oblige all who enter into that office, to embrace the more perfect state of chastity."† To the foregoing we reply: (1.) Romanists assume it as a thing admitted, that marriage and chastity are opposed to each other; than which nothing can be more contrary either to truth or to fact. Marriage was established in Paradise while man was in a state of innocence; and hence it was a holy institute, and one which St. Paul terms "honourable in all." (Heb. xiii. 4.) (2.) If the Romish doctrine be true, it would not apply to Priests only, but to all Christians without distinction: for there is nothing required, with regard to holiness, from persons who hold offices in the Church, which is not expected from every Christian. It was not to the Priests, but to the whole congregation of Israel, that God said, "Be ye holy, for I the Lord your God am holy." St. Peter takes up the same words, and addresses them as a divine command, not to Clergymen only, but to the whole body of Christians, who were scattered through the provinces of Lesser Asia. (1 Peter i. 16.) St. Paul tells us, that "without holiness no man shall see the Lord." (Heb. xii. 14.) If such holiness be inconsistent with the married state, then it is unlawful for any to marry, and the human race would become extinct as Christianity became universal. (3.) Both the Bishop and the theologian, as well as the Papal hierarchy, speak profanely concerning the eucharist, and various religious duties. Their argument implies, that to consecrate the body of Christ, and to perform the office of the ministry, alone require sanctity, and that a small degree of holiness will be sufficient for those who receive the sacrament. St. Paul ascribed peculiar profanity to those who received this sacrament unworthily; whereas in Rome, the profaneness appears to belong solely to the act of administration. This strikes at the foundation of all sound morality. (4.) There is much inconsistency between the doctrine of the Church of Rome on this subject, and that which she teaches officially concerning the validity, and even sinfulness, of those who minister in holy things, while in a state of mortal sin. When speaking of celibacy, her Ministers must possess angelic purity. But when she speaks of the ministration of wicked Clergymen, she pronounces it to be valid and efficacious. In the Roman Catechism, and by the Council of Trent, it is taught that the ministrations of wicked Priests are acceptable and efficient, though they themselves may be stained with crime of the deepest dye.

6. Bishop Hay argues thus: "This is also manifest from the special reward promised by our Saviour, and bestowed in heaven upon those who lead a chaste life:

[* Mumford's Catholic Scripturist; or, the Plea of the Roman Catholics, pp. 187—197. London, 1686.]

[† "Clerici majoribus ordinibus initiati ad hanc legem tenentur quam ipsis antiquitus Ecclesia injunxit infinitiesque confirmavit, ac sub diversis pœnis, nimirum suspensionis, excommunicationis, ipsiusque carceris, renovavit."—Bailly, Theol., tom. v., De Ordine, cap. vii., art. ii., prop. ii.]

‡ "Legem istam juste, pie et sapienter fuisse sacris Ministris imposiam."—Idem.

* "Sacrorum Ecclesiæ Ministrorum est sacra contrectare, Christi corpus conficere vel administrare. Hæc autem sublimia ac sanctissima munera summam et angelicam puritatem ac proinde vitam cœlibem exigere videntur."—Idem.

† Sincere Christian instructed, vol. ii., p. 142. 12mo. Dublin 1822.

our Saviour says, 'Amen, I say unto you, There is no man that hath left house, or parents, or wife, for the kingdom of heaven's sake, who shall not receive much more in this present time, and in the world to come life everlasting.' (Luke xviii. 29.)"* Let it be kept in mind that this passage is adduced in support of the doctrine, that it is more pleasing to God for a man to live single than to be married. According to such an exposition, it is more pleasing to the Almighty to be without a house than to have one; and to be without parents than to have them. The words of Christ refer to circumstances in which the service of God may render it necessary for a man to forsake his nearest and dearest relatives, and even to lay down his life. No reference whatever is made to the compulsory celibacy of the Clergy.

7. The Papists argue, that "single life, by the Apostle, is preferred before the married state; therefore it is the most fit for Ministers. 'He that is married careth for the things that are of the world.'" (1 Cor. vii. 33.) We reply: (1.) Single life is preferred to married in all men, and not only in Ministers; and therefore, as laymen are not bound to a single life, though it be in itself more convenient, so Ministers ought not to be confined to a state of celibacy. (2.) Though a certain condition may in itself be best, yet it may not be so for all men. Riches are better than poverty, because they are God's blessing, and may be employed for useful purposes; yet it is not good for every man to be rich. Single life is better for those that have the gift of chastity, and can, with a quiet conscience, live in that state; otherwise matrimony is better. St. Paul, who wished every one to live as himself, afterward declared, "It is better to marry than to burn." So, in his judgment, to marry is good for those who have not the gift of continence.

8. The Church of Rome further maintains that the cares of a married life are incompatible with the duties which are enjoined on the Ministers of Christ. This appears their strongest argument. Bailly expresses it thus: "That law is justly, piously, and wisely instituted, which being made, sacred Ministers can, most easily and accurately, perform the duties annexed to their order; but, in consequence of the law of celibacy, sacred Ministers can the more easily and accurately fulfil the duties annexed to their order. For the principal duties of the sacred Ministers are, to sacrifice, to pray, to teach, to administer the sacraments, to take care of the poor, and other duties of the same kind. But who does not see that these duties are much more easily performed by men devoted to perpetual continence, than by the married?"†

Bishop Hay expresses the same: "The duties of their condition, as Pastors of the flock of Jesus Christ, make the married state in a manner incompatible with their vocation; for they are chosen by Jesus Christ, and separated from the rest of mankind for the service 'of the Gospel of God;' (Rom. i. 1;) that they 'may go and bring forth fruit,' in the conversion of souls to God, and 'that their fruit may remain.' (John xv. 16.) They are dedicated by their vocation to this holy service of God and his Gospel, and are obliged to give their whole attention to the good of the people; to instruct them, to administer the sacraments to them, to comfort them in their distress, to assist them in their sickness, and especially when death approaches; and for this purpose to answer their calls at all times, by night or by day, even though at the risk of their own life, when the good of their people's souls requires it. Now, it is evidently incompatible with the cares of a wife and family to discharge all these duties properly; and therefore St. Paul says, 'No man, being a soldier of God, entangleth himself with worldly business, that he may please him to whom he hath engaged himself.' (2 Tim. ii. 4.) Now, the Church well knowing that no kind of worldly business so much entangleth a man, and withdraweth him from the duties of the pastoral charge, as the cares of a wife and family, therefore she expressly requires her Pastors to abstain from a state so inconsistent with that charge."*

The following observations are offered in reply:—(1.) In the Greek text, τῳ Θεῳ, which the Douay version renders "of God," is not added, it being said in general, ουδεις στρατευομενος, "no one who warreth." (2.) Therefore the Apostle speaks concerning a "soldier," properly so called, and not of a clerical and spiritual soldier. (3.) By πραγματειαν βιου, "the affairs of this life," the Apostle does not mean the moderate use of the things which pertain to the support of life, but "business," "merchandise," "traffic," and such as do not consist with a soldier's duty; so that the sense is, that each person should "mind his proper business," and studiously abstain from what would be an impediment in his vocation; as a soldier is expected to abandon all other business, and devote himself to military affairs. (4.) If by the "affairs of life," marriage is understood, then the consequence would be that all military men should be unmarried. (5.) If the saying of the Apostle be interpreted to mean a spiritual soldier, the result inevitably would be that no man can fight under the banner of Christ unless he be a celibate; and therefore the married man can never be a true Christian. If this spiritual warfare has no place in the married state, why does St. Paul accommodate his panoply to married persons? (Eph. vi. 11;) and why command them to return to their conjugal duties, lest Satan should assail them? (1 Cor. vii. 5.) (6.) The Apostle enjoins that a Bishop should rule well his own house: how, then, could he expect him to pay no attention to the concerns of this life? He concedes that the virtues necessary for the ministry should exist in him who is the husband of one wife, and hath his children in subjection. (7.) If marriage pertain to secular business or to the affairs of this life, and be inconsistent with that of a devoted Christian, then the Apostles, Prophets, and Patriarchs, who were chiefly married, were secular. (8.) Why do Popish Prelates employ themselves in the affairs of this life, when they exercise political jurisdiction, and exhibit more than Persian splendour? (9.) To the assertion that marriage is an impediment to the discharge of ministerial duties, we oppose the words of the institution, in which the wife is said to be a help meet for man. (Gen. ii. 18.) Rebecca was no impediment to Isaac, nor Elizabeth to Zachariah. Nazianzen commends his own mother by name, who was not only an assistant but a guide to his father's piety, who was also a Bishop. St. Paul asserts that a wife governs the house; (1 Tim. v. 14;)

[* Sincere Christian instructed, vol. ii., p. 142. 12mo. Dublin, 1822.

† "Illa lex juste, pie, ac sapienter instituta est, qua posita, multo facilius, multoque accuratius Ministri sacri possunt implere officia suis ordinibus annexa; atqui, posita cœlibatus lege, ministri sacri multo facilius, multoque accuratius implere possunt officia suis ordinibus annexa. Nam præcipua Ministrorum sacrorum officia sunt sacrificare, orare, docere, sacramenta ministrare, curam pauperum gerere, et alia ejus generis. Quis autem non videt hæc officia multo facilius competere viris perpetuæ continentiæ devotis quam conjugatis?"—Bailly, Theolog., tom. v., De Ordine, cap. vii., art. iii., prop. ii.

* Sincere Christian, vol. ii., p. 144. 12mo. Dublin, 1822.

and Solomon declares that a prudent woman builds it. (Prov. xiv. 1.) We conclude, therefore, that a pious wife may be a help to a Minister, and relieve him of many domestic and secular cares.

Nothing better exemplifies the advantage of female aid than the extent of service which the wives of Protestant Missionaries render to the cause of the Redeemer. By this means the domestic excellence of Christianity makes a favourable impression on the heathen mind. Hence the striking contrast between Protestant and Roman Catholic converts. The latter are Heathen as before, with little, if any, improvement, either in morals or intelligence. Such has been the character of proselytes to Romanism from the earliest times to the present day. We indignantly fling back this argument on the Papacy, and cite the testimony of a distinguished Roman Catholic Clergyman, of Spain, who became a convert to Protestantism, and renounced Popery. We allude to the Rev. Joseph Blanco White.

"The cares of a married life, it is said, interfere with the duties of the Clergy. Do not the cares of a vicious life, the anxieties of stolen love, the contrivances of adulterous intercourse, the pains, the jealousies, the remorse, attached to a conduct in perfect contradiction with a public and solemn profession of superior virtue; do not these cares, these bitter feelings, interfere with the duties of the priesthood? I have seen the most promising men of my University obtain country vicarages, with characters unimpeached, and hearts overflowing with usefulness. A virtuous wife would have confirmed and strengthened their purposes; but they were to live a life of angels in celibacy. They were, however, men, and their duties connected them with beings of no higher description. Young women knelt before them, in all the intimacy and openness of confession. A solitary home made them go abroad in search of social converse. Love, long resisted, seized them, at length, like madness. Two, I knew, who died insane: hundreds might be found, who avoid that fate by a life of settled systematic vice."*

Even in the golden age of monasticism, the holy Monks, as they have been called, were not without cares. Cyprian, in the third century, inveighed against the Nuns on account of their shameless licentiousness: and this was not an incidental or local abuse; for it had spread itself on all sides, and had become, notwithstanding all remonstrances, the common usage of the cœnobite ascetics, and even of some of the anchorites. Not only did the aged Monks avail themselves of the offices, and enjoy the society, of youthful women in their cloisters; but the young did the same, in defiance of the unavoidable scandal of such conduct.† Juvenile Nuns also entertained their paramours under various pretexts.‡ "What a sight is it," says Chrysostom, "to enter the cell of a solitary Monk, and to see the apartment hung about with female gear, shoes, girdles, reticules, caps, bonnets, spindles, combs, and the like, too many to mention! But what a jest is it to visit the abode of a rich Monk, and to look about you! for you find the solitary uovos surrounded with a bevy of lasses, one might say, just like the leader of a company of singing and dancing girls: what can be more disgraceful? and, in fact, the Monk is all day long vexed and busied with petty affairs proper to a woman.....Not merely is he occupied with worldly matters, contrary to the apostolic precept, bu even with feminine cares; and these ladies being very luxurious in their habits, as well as imperious in their tempers, the good man was liable to be sent on fifty errands,—to the silversmith's, to inquire if my lady's mirror were finished, if her vase were ready, if her scent-cruet had been returned; and from the silversmith's to the perfumer's, and thence to the linen-draper's, and thence to the upholsterer's: and at each place he has twenty particulars to remember. Then, add, to all these cares, the jars and scoldings that are apt to resound in a house full of pampered women! Paul says, 'Be ye not the servants of men:' shall we not then cease to be the slaves of women, and this to the common injury of all? Christ, who would have us behave ourselves as his valiant soldiers, assuredly has not, for this purpose, clad us in the spiritual armour, that we should take upon ourselves the office of waiting, like menials, upon worthless girls, κορων τριοβολιμαιων· or, that we should busy ourselves with their spinnings and sewings, or spend the live-long day by their side, while at work, imbuing our minds with effeminate trifles."*

* Practical and Internal Evidences against Catholicism, &c., by the Rev. Joseph Blanco White, p. 137. Second edition. 8vo. London, 1826.

† Chrysost. Oper., tom. i.; Contra eos qui Subintrod. habeant Virg., p. 279. 8vo. Ed. Bened. Paris, 1834.

‡ Idem, Quod Regul. Fæm. Viris cohab. non debeant, pp. 310—312.

[* The original Editor of this work has given the above abridged from Chrysostom, by the able author of Ancient Christianity, Mr. Isaac Taylor. We present our readers with the passage entire, as furnishing an important representation of monasticism in that early period of the Christian church. Chrysostom wrote two treatises of a similar character, one, Against Clerks and Virgins dwelling together; the other, Against Virgins dwelling together with Clerks; for, notwithstanding the obloquy it brought upon the Church among the Heathen, and the scandal it created among believers, the Clergy persisted in having young women dwell with them, under the pretence of patronage to the worthy, and defence to the helpless. "Quale enim est, si in domum viri solitarii itur, videre calceos muliebres suspensos, et cingula, et mitras, et calathiscos, et colum, et radium textorium, et pectines, et fusa, et alia quæ particulatim omnia numerare non licet? Si autem quæ divitis sunt scruteris, major est risus materia. Primum quidem in puellarum tanta turba solus versatur, quasi choraules in orchestra, qui in choro mulierum saltantium concinit: quo quid turpius et inhonestius? Deinde disrumpitur tota die famulis succensens ob res quæ ad mulierem spectant. Nam ei necessarium est aut omnino silere, et omnia negligentem ab illa increpari, vel dicentem et increpantem turpiter agere; et vide quid contingat. Nam qui jussus est ne prope quidem ad temporalia negotia accedere, non solum temporalia, sed muliebria ipsissima tractat. Etenim vasa muliebria afferre non detrectabit argentariis, subinde rogans num speculum dominæ præparatum sit, num cadum absolverint, num lecythum reddiderint; nam in eam corruptionem venerunt omnia, ut pluribus vasis quam sæculares multæ utantur virgines. Hinc iterum ad unguentarium currit colloquuturus de aromatibus dominæ: sæpe etiam præ nimio studio, nec detrectabit si et pauper injuria sit afficiendus. Utuntur autem virgines unguentis, et variis et pretiosis. Deinde ab unguentario ad vendentem lintea; et ab illo iterum ad aulæorum textorem. Non enim verentur imperare hæc parva, quia vident eos valde obedientes, et gratiam habentes imperantibus majorem, quam aliis ministrantibus. Hinc iterum siquando aliquid apparandum quod ad gestatorium tabernaculum hoc pertineat, usque ad vesperam impransi perseverant officinis affixi. Et illud non est mirandum, sed quod et miseris famulis sint molesti, et frequenti injuria et inclamatione hos urgeant. Cogita quantæ hinc querimoniæ; minister enim injuria affectus, maxime pro talibus rebus, quia eum qui se injuria affecit non alio modo ulcisci potest, lingua hoc facit, et occulta obtrectatione nec parcit alicui eorum, quibus furori suo satisfaciat, sed tam immodice ulciscitur, quantum verisimile est servum ita exprobratum, et cui sola hæc est consolatio e malis suis adversus eum qui se contristavit. At qui pauperi, inquit, cohabitat, cum argentariis negotia non habet: non enim paupertas sinit; neque assidet officinis unguentariis, sed cum sutoribus et textoribus, et variegatoribus et tinctoribus multum conversatur; et quid opus recensere sordes omnes, ut quando in domum intrant, quo subtegmen ac tramam vendant, et deinde in foro, ut talia iterum requirant? Et hæc quidem domi, in foro autem risu digniora ferunt. In Ecclesia vero dici non potest quanta sit turpitudo. Nam quasi oporteat ut locus nullus illorum opprobrium ignoret et illiberalem servitutem, sic in loco hoc sancto et terribili omnibus suam intemperantiam prædicant, et, quod uti-

Thus it will be seen, that the celibacy of the Church of Rome has no foundation in holy Scripture, accomplishes none of the good which its votaries ascribe to it, and is injurious to the morals of both the Clergy and the laity. In proof of this, we adduce,—

VI. Arguments against the celibacy of the Roman Clergy.

1. This state is not supported by the divine law. Many Romanists allow this. Therefore as such a requisition is unauthorized by the word of God, it is presumption to enforce it on the Clergy. It answers no purpose to say, that the intention is to promote greater sanctity; for He who made man knows what is best for him. He has vouchsafed his Holy Spirit to sanctify; and the fruit of the Spirit, as love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, will produce that which will benefit mankind and honour God. An artificial and compulsive sanctity will do more harm than good, and, instead of purifying, will only tend to corrupt and debase, man.

2. Clerical celibacy is contrary to the divine law. It is at variance with the very existence of the human race. It is opposed to the original institution of marriage, which was founded on the principle, that it was not good for man to be alone. It is adverse to the example of the most pious men from Adam to Christ. Our Redeemer chose married men as his Ministers. He sanctioned marriage by his presence and approbation. The Apostles describe a Bishop or Pastor of a flock as married, and not only point out his personal duties arising therefrom, but state the character which his wife and children should sustain, as well as the model of his ecclesiastical government, and the order which the head of a family exercises in his house among his wife and children. In short, the prohibition of marriage to the Clergy is considered part of Heathenism, a heresy in the church, as well as a mark of antichristian pravity.

3. Marriage, with which celibacy is at variance, is of divine institution. (Gen. ii. 18, 21—24.) God pronounces a state of celibacy to be a bad one; or at least negatively so, inasmuch as it is said, "It is not good for man to be alone." The judgment of Councils, Fathers, Doctors, Synods, or Popes, is of no authority, inasmuch as they have no right to annul the divine law. The Almighty made the woman to be a help to the man; which shows, that every son of Adam should be united to a daughter of Eve. It proves also that marriage is a help in the discharge of ministerial duties, and not an impediment. There are other particulars which might be collected from the original institution of marriage: these, however, prove that it directly contradicts the celibacy of the Church of Rome.

4. St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Hebrews, writes as if in prophetic warning against the heresies about to arise in the Church. He asserts that marriage was the best state, "honourable in all, and the bed undefiled." (Chap. xiii. 4.) This may have been written with regard to the opinions of the Essenes, or Therapeutæ, who despised marriage; either by way of assertion, as in our version, or as preceptive, thus: "Let honourable marriage, and the bed undefiled, obtain among all." The plain meaning, however, is, that marriage is honourable in every person, old or young; and the passage shows the absurdity of the Popish tenet, that the conjugal state in the Clergy is dishonourable and sinful; which is in opposition to the Apostle, who declares the contrary. It is at variance with the institution of God, which evidently designed that every male and female should be united in this holy estate; and is contrary to nature, which has produced everywhere men and women in about equal proportion. The marriage state is the best; and the exceptions to it are so few that they cannot be supposed to interfere with the general rule.

The gift of continency is peculiar, and does not belong to all. This is proved from our Lord's words in reference to it: "All men cannot receive this saying, save they to whom it is given." (Matt. xix. 11.) To the same import is the declaration of St. Paul, when treating formally on celibacy: "Every man hath his proper gift of God, one after this manner, and another after that." (1 Cor. vii. 7.) Hence we infer, that celibacy should not be imposed on any Clergymen, as the decision of this matter is left to the individual himself. Those not endowed with the gift of continency are allowed to marry. "Nevertheless, to avoid fornication, let every man have his own wife, and let every woman have her own husband. If they cannot contain, let them marry: for it is better to marry than to burn." (1 Cor. vii. 2, 9.) Marriage is left to the voluntary choice of all. Those who have not the special gift, are left to act as they see fit. Each is to judge for himself. St. Paul asserts: "Have we not power to lead about a sister, a wife, as well as other Apostles, and as the brethren of the Lord, and Cephas? Or I only and Barnabas, have not we power to forbear working?" (1 Cor. ix. 5, 6.)

5. The Patriarchs, Priests, and Prophets of the Old Testament were married. In this state they lived, and were pleasing to God. Adam, Seth, Enos, Enoch, who walked with God, Noah, a just and perfect man, Shem, Abraham, the father of those who believe, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Aaron, and the Priests and Prophets, were married. To get rid of part of the difficulty que gravius, ea re gloriantur, ob quam erubescere oportebat. Ante fores ipsas excipiunt, eunuchorum loco inserviunt, obvios submovent, ac præeuntes altum sapiunt videntibus omnibus, et non verecundantur, sed ea re gloriantur; atque in ipso sancto et horrendo mysteriorum tempore ministrantes ad earum placitum, criminandi occasiones multis intuentibus præbent. Illæ autem miseræ et calamitosæ, cum oporteret ab hac illos gratia prohibere, illa insuper gloriantur, et confidentiores fiunt; quamquam si quis vel iis vel illis maledicere vellet, quid maledicto hoc inveniret atrocius, quam ut tam innumeris testibus intemperantia eorum arguatur, et in oculis omnium fœde agant? Quid opus est dicere quot in ecclesiis ob illarum gratiam subvertantur, quot divina opera a multis negligantur, ut ne has irritent? Et quid dico, ne irritent? Si quis tantum insuavius et tristius eas aspexerit, omnia malunt ferre, quam dissimulare illam hoc passam esse. Sed quousque tandem et nos fœde agimus, illorum omnia enarrantes? Non utique hoc proposuimus: nam si omnia tractare velimus, multa et longa nobis oratione opus esset: imo si maxime vellem, non possent omnia dici, quandoquidem, dum ex multis pauca colligimus, etiam sic prolixi sumus. Sed non ad hoc venimus, verum inviti ad illorum memoriam rapti sumus, ut cordati auditores parumper admonerentur: quod reliquum est? Operæ pretium videtur ut obsecrationem et precationem adhibeamus. Oro igitur et supplico, et ante genua vestra me provolvo, atque obnixe rogo, persuadeamini, et ab hac emergamus ebrietate: simus nostri ipsorum compotes, et agnoscamus honorem, quem dedit nobis Deus: et Paulum clamantem audiamus, 'Ne sitis servi hominum,' et desinamus ut serviamus mulieribus ad communem omnium nostrorum perniciem. Milites nos esse Christus vult strenuos et athletas. Non propter hoc nos armavit armis spiritualibus, ut puellarum triobolarium ministeria suscipiamus, ut circa lanas et stamina, et alia ministeria versemur, ut assideamus mulierculis nentibus et texentibus, ut totum diem consumamus, verbisque et moribus muliebribus animas imbuamus; sed ut configamus invisibiles virtutes quæ nobis adversantur, ut diabolum percutiamus qui contra nos ducem agit, ut abigamus feroces dæmonum phalanges, ut subvertamus eorum propugnacula, ut potestates et mundi dominos, rectores harum tenebrarum, in servitutem ducamus, ut spiritualia malitiæ fugemus, ut ignem spiremus, ut ad quotidianas mortes parati simus."—Chrysost. Opera, tom. i.; Contra eos qui subintrod. habeant Virg., p. 295—298. 8vo. Edit. Bened. Paris, 1834.]

in the case, Romanists have taken great liberties with Chrysostom, who asserts, that the Patriarchs and Prophets had wives. In his twenty-first homily on Genesis, he treats of the character of Enoch and Noah, as married men. The Belgian Index decided, that the words, "all the Prophets had wives," should be expunged. The Spanish Index followed that example.

6. Christ sanctioned marriage by his presence and approbation. At a marriage he performed his first miracle. (John ii. 1.) Among the Jews the moral dignity of woman, and the religious equality of the sexes, had been far better understood than among any other people of antiquity. Their rational and pure family habits allowed to woman her due place in society. Our Lord, in his personal behaviour, recognised this state of domestic regulation. He allowed himself to be attended and ministered to by women; (Luke viii. 1—3; Matt. xxvii. 55;) and thus sanctioned, as good and safe, that intercourse of the sexes, in social and common life, which then prevailed. The first disciples and the Apostles recognised it; (Acts i. 14; Phil. iv. 3;) and it has been the glory of Christianity that it has wrought the regeneration of the social economy in this way, by refining and hallowing social intercourse. Our Lord was occasionally attended on his journey by women, and his wants and personal comfort were secured by their assiduous services and contributions. But no injunctions of the ascetic institutes are more frequent or serious, than those which prohibit all such intercourse. To be in the society of women, and to converse with them, were viewed as great offences.

7. The Apostles were, for the most part, married; and what was fitting and proper for them, must be so for others. That many of them were so, we have proof from Scripture. St. Paul speaks of the other Apostles beside himself and Barnabas, as married. (1 Cor. ix. 5.) Our Lord refers to Peter's wife's mother; (Matt. viii. 14; Mark i. 30;) which shows that he was married. Philip, the Evangelist, is said to have had four daughters. (Acts xxi. 9.) Indeed, Paul asserts that other Apostles, James and Jude, "brethren of our Lord," and Cephas or Peter, were married: the inference, therefore, is, that omitting Judas, in the first selection of Apostles all were married. Here let it be observed:—(1.) That our Lord chose married, and not single, men; proving that the former state was consistent with the purity and usefulness of the Christian ministry. (2.) This privilege they possessed as a matter of right; for the word εξουσιαν (1 Cor. ix. 4, 5) means "right" rather than power, or "power" in the sense of right: this right, or authority, was not merely derived from their office, but from Him who invested them with that office, from the constitution of their nature, and from the universal propriety or fitness of things. (3.) Their wives were persons of the same faith: less cannot be implied in the term "sister," or what is still more conformable with the original, a "wife who is a Christian sister" in faith. The marriage of the Apostles is also a decisive proof against the papistical celibacy of the Clergy. With regard to the endeavours of the Romanists to evade the force of the declaration of St. Paul, by asserting that the Apostles had holy women, who attended them and ministered to them in their peregrinations, it is enough to say that we have no proof of it. Nor could they have suffered either young or old females, or the wives of other men, to accompany them without considerable scandal.

8. St. Paul, when giving the ecclesiastical constitution established by the Apostles, embraced marriage, and its connected domestic relations, as qualifications in the Pastors of the church. The apostolic rule would nearly justify the maxim, "No husband, no Bishop." If prelacy itself had been as clearly enjoined as the marriage of Bishops and Deacons, there would probably have never been any controversy about it. Timothy and Titus are authoritatively addressed on subjects specially clerical, and formally taught what are the true qualifications of Pastors. We select that which has respect to the marriage-state, and the domestic qualifications growing out of it, or connected with it. Writing to the former, he says, "This is a true saying, If a man desire the office of a Bishop, he desireth a good work. A Bishop then must be blameless, the husband of one wife: given to hospitality: one that ruleth well his own house, having his children in subjection with all gravity; for if a man know not how to rule his own house, how shall he take care of the church of God?" (1 Tim. iii. 1, 2, 4, 5.) Of the Deacons and their wives the Apostle observes: "Even so must their wives be grave, not slanderers, sober, faithful in all things. Let the Deacons be the husbands of one wife, ruling their children and their own houses well." (1 Tim. iii. 11, 12.) To Titus, he says, when speaking of the Elders or Bishops that were to be ordained in every city: "If any be blameless, the husband of one wife, having faithful children, not accused of riot or unruly. For a Bishop must be blameless, as the steward of God." (Titus i. 6, 7.) On these we remark,

(1.) That Ministers of Christ may, or rather ought to, be married. That they may be so, is obvious from the inspired record. In two several epistles, written expressly in reference to ministerial qualifications, the Bishop or Deacon most fit for his calling is represented as married, living with his wife, and discharging the duties of a well-ordered family. But the terms made use of in these passages mean much more than a bare permission to marry, or a toleration in office of those who are in that state. The words employed denote "duty" or "necessity." The impersonal verb, δει, oportet, par est, necesse est, signifies, "it is becoming, it is right, it is necessary." The expression of the Apostle (1 Tim. iii. 2) is, Δει ουν τον Επισκοπον μιας γυναικος ανδρα ειναι, "For a Bishop must, or ought to, be the husband of one wife." In the Epistle to Titus (i. 7) the expression is similar, and implies that a Bishop must, or ought to, be blameless. The conjugal state is represented as that which is most becoming, proper, and indeed necessary, for one who presides over the flock of Christ. It is considered as needful a qualification as temperance, blamelessness, and aptitude to teach. And though a Minister may be faultless who is unmarried, yet he is not so valuable as one who has a pious and intelligent wife who walks worthy of her vocation. The Apostle does not say, "Although Bishops and Deacons are not prohibited from marrying, yet, whenever it can be done, it is well to prefer those who profess virginity." No such language escapes the Apostle. He represents a Bishop as one having a wife and children, and ruling well his house. (2.) The Bishop must have only one wife at a time; but then he ought to have one, in order to be a proper ensample to the flock. (3.) The Bishop or Pastor of a flock should exercise prudent family government: "One that ruleth his own house well, having his children in subjection with all gravity, and not accused of riot, or unruly." He should govern his household by rule, every one knowing his own place, and each doing his own work at the proper time. No family can be ruled without subjection; and none can govern so well as a husband, who is by nature, and the appointment of God, the head and ruler of his house. (4.) Domestic discipline was required in every primitive Bishop, as a guarantee that he would be an efficient ruler in the church. Deficiency in this disqualified a man for having charge of the flock: "For if a man know not how to rule his own house, how shall he take care of the church of God?" If a man's family arrangements be imprudent, he ought not to be intrusted with any branch of government, ecclesiastical or civil. From this it is plain, that in designating the qualifications of a Pastor, a married man was most fit. The abstracted and visionary Cœlebs is not the proper person. He may do to trim the lamps, open the doors, sweep the church, or discharge some low ecclesiastical duty; but he is not the individual to furnish an example to the flock of one of the most important relations of human life, a well-regulated family.

9. Celibacy owes its origin to Heathenism, and was introduced into the Christian church from the superstition of the Gentiles. From the Gentiles it was admitted among the Essenes, a sect of the Jews, as appears from Josephus, who, in describing them, affirms that they observed celibacy.* From the Essenes it was embraced by the Montanists, Marcionites, Manichees, and other heretics; and at length the Christian church itself adopted the system, the result of Gentile superstition and heretical pravity.

10. The celibacy of the Clergy is heretical, and is a mark of an apostate church. This is proved from the following passage of holy Scripture:—"Now the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils; speaking lies in hypocrisy; having their conscience seared with a hot iron; forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them who believe and know the truth." (1 Tim. iv. 1—3.) On this passage, we advert to the language of Bishop Newton, which, by its soundness and just critical acumen, recommends itself:—

"I. The first thing to be considered is, the apostasy here predicted: 'Some shall depart,' or rather 'apostatize,' 'from the faith.' An apostasy from the faith may be either total or partial; either when we renounce the whole, or when we deny some principal and essential article of it. It is not every error, or every heresy, that is apostasy from the faith. It is a revolt in a principal and essential article, when we worship God by any image or representation, or when we worship other beings besides God, and pray unto other mediators besides 'the one Mediator between God and man, the Man Christ Jesus.' This is the very essence of Christian worship, to worship the one true God, through the one true Christ; and to worship any other god, or any other mediator, is apostasy and rebellion against God and against Christ. Such is the nature of apostasy from the faith; and it is implied that this apostasy shall be general, and affect great numbers. For, though it be said only, 'Some shall apostatize,' yet by 'some,' here, 'many' are understood. The original word frequently signifies a 'multitude,' and there are abundant instances in Scripture where it is used in that sense, as the reader may perceive from John vi. 64—66; Rom. xi. 17; 1 Cor. x. 5, 6. This apostasy may be general and extensive, and include many, but not all.

"II. It is more particularly shown wherein this apostasy should consist, in the following words:—'Giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils;' or rather: 'Giving heed to erroneous spirits and doctrines concerning demons.' 'Spirits' seem to be much the same in sense as 'doctrines;' the latter word may be considered as explanatory of the former; and error sometimes signifying 'idolatry,' 'erroneous doctrines' may comprehend idolatrous as well as false doctrines. But it is still farther added, for explanation, that these doctrines should be 'doctrines of devils' or 'of demons;' where the genitive case is not to be taken actively, as if demons were the authors of these doctrines, but passively, as if demons were the subject of those doctrines. In Jer. x. 8; Acts xiii. 12; Heb. vi. 2, the genitive case is used in this manner; and, by the same construction, 'doctrines of demons' are doctrines about or concerning demons. This is, therefore, a prophecy that the idolatrous theology of demons, professed by the Gentiles, should be revived among Christians. Demons, according to the theology of the Gentiles, were middle powers between the gods and mortal men; and were regarded as mediators and agents between the gods and men. Of these demons there were accounted two kinds: one kind were the souls of men deified or canonized after death; the other kind were such as had never been the souls of men, nor ever dwelt in mortal bodies. These latter demons may be paralleled with angels, as the former may with canonized saints; and as we Christians believe there are good and evil angels, so did the Gentiles that there were good and evil demons. It appears, then, as if the doctrine of demons, which prevailed so long in the heathen world, was to be revived and established in the Christian church. And is not the worship of saints and angels now, in all respects, the same that the worship of demons was in former times? The name only is different, the thing is essentially the same. The Heathens looked upon their demons as mediators and intercessors between God and men; and are not the saints and angels regarded in the same light by many professed Christians? The promoters of this worship were sensible that it was the same, and that the one succeeded the other; and as the worship is the same, so likewise it is performed with the same ceremonies. Nay, the very same temples, the very same images, the very same altars, which once were consecrated to Jupiter and the other demons, are now re-consecrated to the Virgin Mary and other saints. The very same titles and inscriptions are ascribed to both; the very same prodigies and miracles are related of these as of those. In short, the whole almost of Paganism is converted and applied to Popery: the one is manifestly formed upon the same plan and principles as the other.

"III. Such an apostasy as this—of reviving the doctrines of demons, and worshipping the dead—was not likely to take place immediately: it should prevail and prosper 'in the latter days.' The phrase of the 'latter times' or 'days,' or the 'last times' or 'days,' signifies any time yet to come; but denotes more particularly the times of Christianity. The times of Christianity may properly be called the 'latter times' or 'days,' or the 'last times' or 'days,' because it is the last of all God's revelations to mankind. (Heb. i. 1, 2; 1 Peter i. 20.)

"IV. Another remarkable peculiarity of this prophecy is, the solemn and emphatic manner in which it is delivered: 'The Spirit speaketh expressly.' By the

* Josephus, vol. ii., Wars of the Jews, book ii., chap. viii., sect. ii. 8vo. edit London, 1825.

'Spirit' is meant the Holy Spirit of God, which inspired the Prophets and Apostles. The 'Spirit speaking expressly,' may signify his speaking precisely and certainly, not obscurely and involvedly, as he is wont to speak in the Prophets; or it may be said, 'The Spirit speaketh expressly,' when he speaks in express words in some place or other of divine writ; and the Spirit hath spoken the same thing in express words before in the prophecy of Daniel. Daniel has foretold, in express words, the worship of new demons or demi-gods. (Dan. xi. 38.) The mauzzim of Daniel are the same as the demons of St. Paul; gods protectors, or saints protectors, defenders, and guardians of mankind. This, therefore, is a prophecy not merely dictated by private suggestion and inspiration, but taken out of the written word. It is a prophecy not only of St. Paul, but of Daniel too; or rather of Daniel, confirmed and approved by St. Paul.

"V. The Apostle proceeds (verse 2) to describe by what means, and by what persons, this apostasy should be propagated and established in the world: 'Speaking lies in hypocrisy,' &c.; or rather, 'through the hypocrisy of liars, having their conscience,' &c.: for the preposition rendered 'in,' frequently signifies 'through' or 'by.' 'Liars,' too, or 'speaking lies,' cannot possibly be joined with the original word rendered 'some,' and that rendered 'giving heed,' because they are in the nominative case, and this is in the genitive. Neither can it well be joined in the construction with the word rendered 'devils' or 'demons;' for how can 'demons' or 'devils' be said 'to speak lies in hypocrisy,' and 'to have their conscience seared,' &c.? It is plain, then, that the great apostasy of the latter times was to prevail, through the hypocrisy of liars, &c. And has not the great idolatry of Christians, and the worship of the dead particularly, been diffused and advanced in the world by such instruments and agents? by fabulous books, forged under the names of the Apostles and saints; by fabulous legends of their lives; by fabulous miracles, ascribed to their relics; by fabulous dreams and revelations; and even by fabulous saints, who never existed but in imagination?

"VI. Verse 3: 'Forbidding to marry,' &c. This is a farther character of the promoters of this apostasy. The same hypocritical liars who should promote the worship of demons should also prohibit lawful marriage. The Monks were the first who brought a single life into repute: they were the first also who revived and promoted the worship of demons. One of the primary and most essential laws and constitutions of all Monks was the profession of a single life; and it is equally clear that the Monks had the principal share in promoting the worship of the dead. The Monks then were the principal promoters of the worship of the dead in former times. And who are the great patrons and advocates of the same worship now? Are not their legitimate successors and descendants, the Monks, and Priests, and Bishops of the Church of Rome? And do not they also profess and recommend a single life, as well as the worship of saints and angels? Thus have the worship of demons, and the prohibition of marriage, constantly gone hand in hand together; and as they who maintain one maintain the other, so it is no less remarkable that they who disclaim the one, disclaim the other.

"VII. The last mark and character of those men is: 'Commanding to abstain from meats,' &c. The same lying hypocrites who should promote the worship of demons, should not only prohibit lawful marriage, but likewise impose unnecessary abstinence from meats; and these two, as indeed it is fit they should, usually go together as constituent parts of the same hypocrisy. It is as much the law of Monks to abstain from meats, as from marriage. Some never eat any flesh; others only certain kinds, on certain days. Frequent fasts are the rule and boast of their orders. So lived the Monks of the ancient church; so live, with less strictness, perhaps, but with greater ostentation, the Monks and Friars of the Church of Rome; and these have been the principal propagators and defenders of the worship of the dead, both in former and in latter times. The worship of the dead is indeed so monstrously absurd as well as impious, that there was hardly any probability of its ever prevailing in the world but by hypocrisy and lies. But that these particular sorts of hypocrisy—celibacy, under pretence of chastity; and abstinence, under pretence of devotion—should be employed for this purpose, the Spirit of God alone could foresee and foretell. There is no necessary connexion between the worship of the dead, 'and forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats;' and yet it is certain that the great advocates for this worship have, by their pretended purity and mortification, procured the greater reverence to their persons, and the readier reception to their doctrines. But this idle, Popish, Monkish abstinence is as unworthy of a Christian as it is unnatural to a man: it is preventing the purpose of nature, and 'commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving by believers, and them who know the truth.'"*

The word κωλυω, to "forbid," "hinder," "restrain," "deny permission," applies to any prohibition, whether authoritative, effectual, or intentional: it specially implies, to prohibit by edicts, and under penalties. The ancient Church of the fourth century absolutely forbade to marry within the pale of the ascetic community; and generally, as to the Clergy, by the force of opinion and usage. What the Encratites did in the second century, the Church practised in the fourth: and while the most flagrant violations, both with regard to continence and fasting, everywhere prevailed, the Church of Rome laid down the law of celibacy as irreversible, admitting no exceptions, to the utmost reach of her jurisdiction. The Papacy took all the marks of an apostate Church, by exerting an authority for maintaining the ascetic principle and practice, as well in relation to the secular as the regular Clergy. In the Monkery of Romanism, as well as in the Nicene age, we discover, beyond all doubt, the Apostle's marks of the coming apostasy. Nor is there any other system or body to which these designations belong. The Reformers, German, Swiss, and English, paid a modest and religious regard to antiquity; yet they unanimously and decisively rejected the ancient asceticism, and separated the Churches they founded from this apostasy.

In support of the Roman Catholic gloss on 1 Tim. iv. 1—3, the Rhemish Testament has the following note:—

"Verse 3. 'Forbidding to marry.' He speaketh, saith Chrysostom, of the Manichees, Encratites, and Marcionites. Ambrose, upon this place, addeth to these the Patricians also. And generally all antiquity affirm the same of both of them, and also of the heretics called Apostolici, Ebionitæ, and the like. Their heresy about marriage was, that to marry, or to use the act of matrimony, is of Satan, as Irenæus witnesseth; and that the distinction of male and female, and the creation of man and woman for generation, came of an ill god. They taught their hearers, saith Augustine, that if they had intercourse, they should in anywise provide that they might not conceive or have children. Clemens Alexandrinus writeth, that such admit no marriage nor procreation of children, lest they should bring into the world creatures to suffer misery and mortality. This is the damnable opinion concerning marriage, noted here by the Apostle. For the second point, consisting in the prohibition of meats, or use of certain creatures made to be eaten, the said heretics, or divers of them, (for they were not all of one sect touching these points,) taught, that men might not eat certain sorts of meats, especially of beasts and living creatures; for that they were not made, say they, of the good God, but of the evil. Wine they called the gall of the Prince of darkness, and not to be drunk at all; and the vine whereof it came, to be of the devil's creation. Divers other creatures they condemned as things by nature and creation polluted and abominable. So these were the heretics, and their heresies, which Paul here prophesieth of, that forbid marriage and meats, as you have heard, for which they and their followers were condemned in divers Councils. Is it not now an intolerable impudence of the Protestants, who, for a small similitude of words in the ears of the simple, apply this text to the feasts of the Church, and the chastity of Priests and Religious?"

[* Newton's Dissertations on the Prophecies, vol. ii., p. 150—157. 8vo. London, 1818.]

To the foregoing we reply, that the notes of the Rhemist Expositors bear evident proof of concession, which establishes the charge of apostasy on the Church of Rome. They concede that the Apostle speaks of heretics who forbade marriage, and the use of certain kinds of food. Now, the Romanists do the very same, and consequently the charge of heresy against them is fully sustained. The heretics who ascribed the institution of matrimony to Satan, and the creation and procreation of mankind to the devil, spoke not falsehood in hypocrisy, but in open blasphemy, and might easily be discerned and avoided. But the Romanists, under the pretence of holiness, religion, chastity, purity, fasting, prayer, forbid marriage and meats to some at all times, and to all at others; therefore they are those of whom St. Paul speaks. After the Apostle had declared wherein true religion consisted, he specified the marks of a corrupt and apostate church, which made the principal part of religion to consist in avoiding marriage and meats. For they only are specially called religious by them who obey the prohibition of marriage and meats, though they live no more continently than the old heretics called Origeniani turpes, "filthy Origenists," who, as Epiphanius testified of them, "rejected marriage; and yet lust ceased not among them, and defiled their body and mind with wantonness. For some of them are in the habit of Monks that live solitarily, and some of the women are in the habit of women that live solitarily; but they are awfully corrupt. They study not for chastity, but for feigned chastity, and that which hath the name only. They desire to be in honour for the exercise of chastity supposed to be in them." Such were the Monks and Nuns for the most part in England, in the visitation of their houses before their suppression. Even the Manichees permitted marriage to their laymen, or hearers, but on no account to the Clergy, whom they called their elect or chosen ones. There is, therefore, no way for Romanists to transfer this matter to the old heretics, who, with as good reason, might charge it to each other, the Manichees to the Tacianists, and the Tacianists to the Manichees. The marks are so evident, that none who forbid marriage or meats, whether Papist or otherwise, can escape, and those who forbid them in hypocrisy, under colour of more perfection and holiness, are especially described by the Apostle. It is therefore inconsistent in Romanists to say, that the words of the Apostle, in a similitude, refer to the celibacy of the Church of Rome.

11. Celibacy renders the Clergy unfeeling and unsocial, breaks up the ties that bind men to their country, and renders them subservient to the Pope. The Almighty, at the creation, chose for man the social life. "It was not good for him to be alone," or, in other words, it was bad or dangerous, inasmuch as it would render the human race unsocial, and destitute of feeling or sympathy for each other. The ordinary means for cultivating social sentiments are the association and intercourse of families, the care and education of children, the performance of domestic duties, participation in family afflictions, and an interest in the well-being of the state as a member of civil society. These are some of the appointed means, by which we are led to "weep with those that weep, and rejoice with those that rejoice;" and hence, the cordial, sincere, and proper discharge of every social duty. The Rev. Richard Cecil justly remarked, "It ought to be considered that the very character which would best fit the Clergy for living in a single state, would abstract them too much from the feelings and wants of their people. I am fully sensible that I should have been hardened against the distresses of my hearers, if I had not been reduced from my natural stoicism by domestic sufferings." Chrysostom observes, that marriage doth not only not hinder the practice of divine philosophy, if we will be sober, but also administers to us great comfort in it, by calming the turbulence of our nature, and not permitting us to be tossed in tempest, but preparing a haven wherein to ride securely.*

The celibacy of the Clergy is one of those devices of the Church of Rome, designed for its aggrandizement, by which the Ministers of religion, rendered strangers to pure domestic affection, are drawn to concentrate all their zeal in the promotion of the interests of the Papacy. That such was the policy of the Tridentine Fathers, we have the testimony of Sarpi, the expositor and historian of the Council. He says, "It is plain that married Priests will turn their affections and love to their wives and children, and, by consequence, to their house and country; so that the strict dependence of the Clergy on the Apostolic See should cease. Thus the granting of marriage to Priests would destroy the ecclesiastical hierarchy, and leave the Pope Bishop of Rome only."

David Hume, the historian, adverting to the state of society in the tenth century, says, "The Roman Pontiff, who was making every day great advances toward an absolute sovereignty over the Ecclesiastics, perceived that the celibacy of the Clergy alone could break off entirely their connexion with the civil power, and, depriving them of every other object of ambition, engage them to promote, with unceasing industry, the grandeur of their order. He was sensible, that so long as the Monks were indulged in marriage, and permitted to rear families, they never could be subjected to strict discipline, or reduced to that slavery under their superiors, which was requisite to procure to the mandates issued from Rome a ready and zealous obedience. Celibacy, therefore, began to be extolled, as the indispensable duty of Priests; and the Pope undertook to make all the Clergy throughout the western world renounce at once the privilege of marriage."

[* "Sed quia non solum nihil nobis obstant ad philosophandum secundum Deum, si voluerimus esse sobrii, sed et magnam afferunt consolationem, dum comprimunt insanum naturæ impetum, nec turbari quasi mare sinunt, sed efficiunt ut scapha feliciter in portum appellat; ideo consolationem hanc humano generi tribuit."—Chrysost., Opera, tom. iv., In cap. v. Genes. Homil. xxi., p. 220, A. Ed. Bened. 8vo. Paris, 1837.]

The Pontiff is aware of the advantages to be derived from his celibate ranks, not only among the ordinary Clergy, but also from the various grades of regulars, or religious orders. They can, with great facility, be transferred from one country to another; and be employed as spies and politicians to great advantage. Most of the Priests and Bishops in the United States of America are foreigners, who, having no natural affinity with that country, may speedily become fit and able instruments, in the hands of the Roman Pontiff, to control, in order to render subservient to the interests of the Popedom, her foreign as well as her domestic policy.

[A recent writer upon the subject now under consideration, observes, that "to preserve and augment the opulence of the Church, and the splendour and power necessarily connected with that opulence, was manifestly and indisputably one of the principal objects of concern, whereby the general conduct of successive Popes, with a view to their own ultimate aggrandizement, was effectually governed. But that wealth seemed always in danger of diminution, so long as the Clergy were permitted to marry and beget children. Accordingly, the Popes, with the aid of obsequious provincial Councils, that is, Councils swayed by authoritative individuals, attached by personal considerations to the Papal government, directed their utmost endeavours to effect the discontinuance of that practice. The resistance which Pelagius made to the appointment of a married man to the see of Syracuse, originated, as his epistle clearly indicates, in an apprehension of an eventual diminution of the riches of the Church. In the 'Corpus Juris Canonici,' edited by Pithœus, many decretal epistles of the successors of Pelagius, with reference to married Clergymen and their children, may be found. The thirty-third canon of the Council of Agde, A. D. 506, which prohibits those Bishops, who have neither sons nor grandsons, from appointing any other heir but the Church;* and the decree of the Council of Seville,† to the same effect; are strong additional proofs of the existence of an operative solicitude for the increase of its riches, and an implied solicitude for the preclusion of that practice whereby they were likely to be diminished. The thirty-first canon of the fourth Council of Lateran, A. D. 1215, is further proof of the latter.‡ The recorded opinion of Cardinal Pio di Carpi, given in a Consistory, held December 10th, A. D. 1561, puts beyond all doubt that which, without the information of any document, might have been reasonably suspected; namely, that in enforcing clerical celibacy, the Popes were governed by a persuasion of it being requisite to the confirmation of their power, and the preservation of their wealth. That Consistory, as we learn from the celebrated author of the 'History of the Council of Trent,' was held for the purpose of considering a request made by Charles IX. of France to Pius IV., to permit the marriage of Priests; a request with which it seems that the Pope, strange as it may appear, was not indisposed to comply; although the Council of Paris, A. D. 1527, had declared, that sacerdotal celibacy was a traditionary article of ecclesiastical discipline from the days of the Apostles; and that to maintain, that Priests might marry, after engaging in holy orders, was unpardonable heresy. Pio di Carpi, whose opinion was said to have decided the Consistory and the Pope against clerical matrimony, observed, that if the Priests had wives and children, they would not depend on the Pontiffs, but on their respective Princes; that they would seek to make the benefices hereditary; that before celibacy was instituted, the See of Rome received no profit from other nations and cities; but that since its institution, it had become patron of many benefices." *]

["* 'Episcopus qui, filios aut nepotes non habens, alium quam Ecclesiam relinquit heredem, si quid de Ecclesia, non in Ecclesiæ causa aut necessitate, præsumpsit, quod distraxit, aut donavit, irritum habeatur. Qui vero filios habet, de bonis quæ relinquit, ab heredibus ejus, indemnitatibus Ecclesiæ consulatur.'—Conc. Labb., tom. iv., Conc. Agathens., can. xxxiii., col. 1388, E. Paris, 1671.

["† 'Episcopus qui res proprias, excepto filiis et nepotibus, alteri, et non Ecclesiæ suæ, dimiserit, quicquid de Ecclesiæ rebus, aut donavit, aut vendidit, aut quoque modo ab Ecclesia transtulit, irritum haberetur.'—Conc. Labb., tom. iv.

["‡ 'Ad abolendam pessimam quæ in plerisque inolevit ecclesiis corruptelam, firmiter prohibemus ne canonicorum filii, maxime spurii, canonici fiant in sæcularibus Ecclesiis in quibus instituti sunt patres; et si fuerit contra præsumptum, decernimus non valere; qui vero tales (ut dictum est) canonicare præsumpserint, a suis beneficiis suspendantur.'—Conc. Labb., tom. xi., pars i., Conc. Later. IV., can. xxxi., col. 182, E. Paris, 1671."]

CHAPTER II.

CELIBACY CONTINUED.

I. THE CELIBACY OF THE CLERGY HAS PRODUCED LICENTIOUSNESS IN MORALS FROM ITS COMMENCEMENT TO THE PRESENT TIME. 1. Celibacy was corrupt among the Heathens: 2. The early heretics: 3. And also among early orthodox Christians, down to the period of the Reformation: (1.) Cyprian; (2.) Chrysostom; (3.) Paphnutius; (4.) Udalric; (5.) Bernard, cited; (6.) The eleventh century; (7.) Third Council of Lateran in 1179; (8.) Innocent III.; (9.) Nicholas de Clemangis; (10.) Address of Oxford University to the Council of Constance, A. D. 1414; (11.) Scotland at the Reformation; (12.) England, A. D. 1548.—II. ITS CORRUPTION SUBSEQUENT TO THE REFORMATION. 1. In Protestant countries secrecy and great caution observed: 2. J. B. White's testimony, A. D. 1835, concerning Spain: 3. Of a French Catholic Priest with regard to France in 1836: 4. Other Catholic countries fearfully corrupt: 5. In Protestant countries similar corruptions prevail to a great degree. Reasons for this: 6. Consciousness of guilt leads the Papacy to accuse Protestants of crimes similar to their own: 7. Romanists bear witness to the licentiousness of clerical celibacy.—III. QUESTIONS CONNECTED WITH THE MARRIAGE OF THE CLERGY. 1. Of married Clergymen living with their wives after ordination: 2. Whether persons may marry after entering orders: 3. Can married persons, by mutual consent, become Celibates, Priests, Monks, or Nuns?—IV. ORIGIN, PROGRESS, AND ESTABLISHMENT OF CLERICAL CELIBACY. 1. Originated in the merit ascribed to virginity and celibacy: 2. Misinterpretation of 1 Tim. iii. 2: 3. Views of the early Christians on bigamy. Origen, Tertullian, and others, cited: 4. Sentiments of others: 5. It was interpreted by some as forbidding polygamy: 6. Celibacy not imposed during the first three centuries. Examples of married Clergy living with their wives: 7. Romanists cannot reply to these: 8. Decisions of the early Councils on this subject: 9. Synoptical survey.

IN the foregoing chapter we stated the doctrine of the Church of Rome with regard to celibacy. Some observations were also made respecting chastity, virginity as connected with celibacy, and the vow. This state as connected with the Clergy was examined, and the arguments in favour of it answered. In the present chapter, we propose to consider its licentiousness, answer some inquiries concerning it, and trace its origin, progress, and establishment.

[* Letters on the Constrained Celibacy of the Clergy of the Church of Rome, pp. 244—246. 8vo. London, 1816.]

I. The celibacy of the Clergy has produced great licentiousness of manners from its commencement to the present period.

1. Among pagan nations, the celibacy of their priesthood degenerated into shocking profligacy of manners. Ample proofs of this might be given, from the early Fathers, and from the writings of the Heathen.

2. From the latter the praises of virginity were received into the Church; but those who adopted it were among the first heretics of the day. Epiphanius informs us, that when Nicolaus affected celibacy, and either could not, or would not, govern himself in that state, he rushed into the indulgence of promiscuous intercourse, and induced others to follow his example. St. Paul describes the revolting fruits of such profession, among some, whom he exhorted to marry. (1 Tim. v. 11—14.) The description which Irenæus, Epiphanius, and others, have given of the shameless actions of those early professors of extraordinary purity among the heretics, are such as to forbid them either to be written or read.

3. The orthodox Christians complain of similar licentious conduct among the celibates of the primitive church.

(1.) Cyprian, in his reply to Pomponius, describes the wickedness of their conduct. Among females who had taken the vow, great disorders ensued. He states the particulars so minutely, that there is no room for doubt. The questions proposed at the Roman confessional alone furnish a specimen. Cyprian flourished in the third century. But shameful practices commenced anterior to that period. Allusions are made to them in the "Shepherd of Hermas," and also in Tertullian. But the first distinct declaration of them is in Cyprian, who inveighs severely against them in his Epistles, and even recommends, in opposition to the Popish doctrine, that it is better to marry than continue such scandalous deeds. Their concubines were by the Greeks called συνεισακτοι, and by the Latins mulieres subintroductæ, and were professed virgin sisters in the Church, under a vow of perpetual chastity. With these many of the single Clergy lived, dwelling and even sleeping together, mutually agreeing to have no conjugal intercourse. Such a marriage they considered as that of the soul, not of the body. Many of the Bishops strongly opposed this conduct; but a long time elapsed before it was wholly abolished.*

(2.) Chrysostom, who flourished about the end of the third century, and died A. D. 308, reluctantly admits of proceedings in the professed virgins of his day, as gross as those described by Cyprian. From him we learn, that, while a few were virtuous and sincere, although fanatical and extravagant, there prevailed among others the worst kind of immorality. They were either shamefully vicious, or possessed depraved hearts. He says, "Alas, my soul! well may I exclaim, and repeat the lamentable cry with the Prophet! Alas, my soul! Our virginity has fallen into contempt: the veil is rent by impudent hands, that parted it off from matrimony: the holy of holies is trodden under foot, and its grave and tremendous sanctities have become profane and thrown open to all; and that which once was had in reverence, as far more excellent than matrimony, is now sunk so low, as that one should rather call the married blessed, than those who profess it. Nor is it the enemy that has effected all this, but the virgins themselves."* Such is the confession of one of the warmest admirers of the ascetic life.

(3.) At the Council of Nice, A. D. 325, when a decree was about to be introduced, enjoining celibacy on the Clergy, Paphnutius, an unmarried Bishop, testified against it on the ground that such a prohibition would produce great immorality, and was contrary to the Scriptures.† This is proved from the testimony of Sozomen and Socrates.‡

* Cypriani Opera, Epist., Ad Pomponium, ep. lxi., De Virginibus, p. 88. 8vo. Paris, 1836.

* Chrysostom. Opera, tom. i., p. 309. Ed. Bened. 8vo. Paris, 1834.

[† Synodical testimony to this effect might be abundantly enlarged. The Council of Angers, A. D. 453, deprived of their functions all ecclesiastical persons refusing to abstain from visiting strange women. The Synod of Arles, in the same kingdom, had, the year before, prohibited the use of matrimony to all persons within the limits of the priesthood. Hence we might infer, that a sinful, promiscuous intercourse with women was the immediate consequence of that censurable and unwarrantable prohibition. The Council of Orleans, A. D. 541, enacted a canon against women taken in adultery with Ecclesiastics; that of Seville, A. D. 590, enacted one against illicit connexion, on the part of the Clergy, with strange women and female domestics; and that of Chalons, A. D. 650, to the same effect. By the Synod of Mentz, A. D. 812, Priests were prohibited retaining in their houses any woman of whom the least suspicion might be entertained, (as the Nicene Fathers had decreed,) namely, a mother, an aunt, or a sister, because it was found that, at the instigation of the devil, sin was committed even with them, or with their waiting-maids, as the canonists have surreptitiously added, in order to blink the enormity of the crime; which, however, the language of the decree renders abundantly evident, and which the decision of a Council, held in the same city, A. D. 888, and several subsequent decrees to the same effect, amply warrant us in believing. By the latter Council, Priests were prohibited lodging in the same house with any woman whatsoever; it having been discovered, as the Prelates acknowledged, that in consequence of such association incest had been committed. The Synod of Bracara, in Gallicia, A. D. 675, enacted a canon with the view of precluding the continuance of a similar enormity; and in a religious assembly of Crusaders, in Troyes, A. D. 1127, a rule of the same tendency was agreed to. By an Epistle from Boniface, the Apostle of Germany, as he has been styled, to Pope Zachary, it appears that the lives of the French Clergy, in the eighth century, were to the last degree profligate. Incest, fornication, adultery, and concubinage were common among them; some kept four, five, or more, concubines. The Synod of Worms, A. D. 868, enacted two canons (xi., xii.) against Ecclesiastics detected in fornication. In the Council of England, A. D. 969, Dunstan complained heavily of the debaucheries and indecencies of the Clergy, for which, by the way, he himself was chiefly answerable, having been one of the most active of the Papal agents in enforcing the obligation of celibacy. By the Synod of Coyac, A. D. 1050, the Clergy were forbidden to wear indecent garments, or to lodge with women; a prohibition which, even in the most debauched age, would surely not have been requisite in the case of married Clergymen. The Council of Rome, A. D. 1051, under the auspices of Leo IX., passed a decree, ordering all women who prostituted themselves to Priests, within the walls of Rome, to be sent as slaves to the Lateran Palace. Thus, under the immediate observation of the Popes themselves, the persons employed in administering the sacraments had, in consequence of the unscriptural obligation of celibacy, become polluted whoremongers. The Council of Clermont, A. D. 1095, enacted canons against the habitual fornication of the Clergy, as also did that of Poictiers, A. D. 1100, and that of London, A. D. 1175. The Synod of Placentia, A. D. 1095, with others, forbade the playing lascivious airs on the church organs.]

[‡ "Verum Paphnutius consessor surgens contradixit; nuptiasque honorabiles vocans, et congressum viri cum uxore sua castitatem esse dicens, consilium dedit Synodo ne hujusmodi legem ferret. Rem enim esse toleratu difficilem; ac fortasse occasionem incontinentiæ, tum ipsis tum uxoribus ipsorum, inde subministrandam."—Sozom., Hist. Eccles., lib. i., cap. xxiii., p. 41. Fol. Cantab., 1720.

[" Cumque, hac re in medium proposita, singulorum sententiæ rogarentur, surgens in medio Episcoporum consessu, Paphnutius vehementer vociferatus est, non esse imponendum Clericis et Sacerdotibus grave hoc jugum, honorabiles nuptias et torum immaculatum esse dicens; ne ex nimia severitate damnum potius inferrent Ecclesiæ. Neque enim omnes ferre posse tam districtæ continentiæ disciplinam; ac forsitan inde eventurum esse, ut cujusque uxoris

(4.) Udalric,* Bishop of Augusta, wrote a letter to Nicholas I., in which he says, concerning Gregory the Great, "that he, by his decree, deprived Priests of their wives; when, shortly after, he commanded that some fish should be caught from the fish-ponds, the fishers, instead of fish, found the heads of six thousand infants that had been drowned in the ponds. When Gregory ascertained that the children thus killed were born from the concealed fornications and adulteries of the Priests, he forthwith recalled his decree, and purged the sin with worthy fruits of repentance, extolling the apostolic command, 'It is better to marry than to burn;' adding from himself, 'It is better to marry than to be the occasion of death.'"†

(5.) Bernard, who died A. D. 1153, utters the following complaint in his Sermon to the Clergy on Conversion:—

"If, according to the prophecy of Ezekiel, we could look behind the partition, that we might see the horrible thing in the house of the Lord, perhaps the foulest abominations would appear on the inside of the partition. Nay, besides fornications, adulteries, and incests, there are not wanting among some the most shameful, ignominious conduct. Would that those things which are not convenient had never been committed to such an extent as to induce the Apostle to write thus concerning them; (Rom. i. 28;) neither that it were needful for us to declare, nor that the least credence were to be given to our declaration, that any lust so abominable as this had at any time occupied the mind of man! Alas! the enemy of man has defiled the body of the Church with the execrable ashes of the Sodomites; and indeed the most filthy and abominable crimes have defiled some of its very Ministers also. Many of these offenders, not indeed all, but many, it is certain, cannot be concealed on account of their multitude, nor, by reason of their impudence, do they court concealment; and many are seen to have employed this licentiousness for an occasion to the flesh, abstaining from the nuptial remedy, and hence using this liberty of theirs for perpetrating every crime. Would that those who cannot contain would fear to enrol themselves as the adherents of celibacy! It is better to marry than to burn, and to be saved in the humble grade of the common people, than to live worse, and to be judged more severely, in the sublime rank of the Clergy."*

(6.) In the eleventh century, the secular or parochial Clergy kept women generally in their houses, upon more or less terms of familiarity, by the connivance of their ecclesiastical superiors, which almost amounted to actual toleration. The sons of Priests were capable of inheriting, by the laws of France and Castile.

(7.) The third Lateran Council, held A. D. 1179, speaks of the detestable custom of keeping concubines, long used by the English Clergy.†

(8.) Innocent III., who died in 1227, declares, "that certain Latin Priests had concubines in their houses, and some were not afraid to betroth or marry them."

(9.) Nicholas de Clemangis, about 1400, says, "In many dioceses the Rectors of parishes, for a certain stipulated sum to the Prelates, generally and publicly had concubines."‡ castitas minime custodiretur. Castitatem autem vocabat congressum viri cum uxore legitima."—Socrat., Hist. Eccles., lib. i., cap. xi., p. 39. Fol. Cantab., 1720.]

[* This Epistle of Udalricus, Huldericus, or Ulrick, was written about the year 870, in consequence of a warm dispute between the Bishop and the Pope, on the subject of sacerdotal marriage. Nicholas had censured Odo, Archbishop of Vienna, in an Epistle, written A. D. 865, because, by his authority, a Sub-Deacon, named Alvericus, had taken a wife; and at the same time decreed, that none but Readers and Singers should have permission to marry. "De illo Clerico Alverico nomine, quem per ordines Ecclesiasticos usque ad Sub-Diaconatum caste vixisse dicitis, cur vestra autoritate uxorem duxerit, miramur; eo quod nulli umquam (exceptis illis quibus ecclesiastica regula habere permittit) uxorem ducendi licentiam damus." (Corp. Juris Canon., tom. i., distinct. xxxii., Nicol. Papæ I., Odoni Vienn., cap. iv.) This decree he sent to the churches of Germany, with orders to have it carried into effect. Udalricus not only refused to second him, but proceeded to show by what arguments the Germanic Clergy maintained the warrantableness of clerical matrimony. After adverting to various passages of Scripture in favour of his position, he reminds His Holiness of the fifth apostolical canon which denounces excommunication and deposition against such Bishops, Priests, and Deacons, as shall repudiate their wives on pretence of religion, and persist in living separately from them;—of the canon of Isidore, "Let a Clergyman be chaste, or at least engaged in the bonds of a single marriage;"—of Sylvester, requiring that the wife of a Deacon be blessed by a Priest; a decree, by the way, which was subsequently condemned as spurious! In very powerful language, the worthy Prelate enters into a thrilling representation of the notorious and lamentable effects of this Pontifical obligation: he then proceeds to refute the reasons which have been urged in its behalf by those obsequious Divines who looked to the patronage of the Court of Rome, rather than to the purity of this priesthood. That this valuable and most telling document should be decried by the Papacy as a forgery, and as destitute of all authenticity and genuineness, we are prepared to hear. An anonymous writer, who lived about the middle of the sixteenth century, ascribed its production to Volusianus, Bishop of Carthage; stating that it was found, among other papers, in a suppressed monastery of Augustinians at Canterbury. No doubt exists that it was the production of Udalricus; who, according to Jacobus de Voragine, died at the age of eighty-three, A. D. 900. The event which occasioned the Epistle is noticed among the canons; (vide supra;) and the letter itself alluded to. Bertoldus of Constance, in his continuation of Hermannus Contractus, relates that Gregory VII., in a Synod held at Rome, A. D. 1079, condemned the Epistle of Udalricus to Nicholas, on the subject of clerical marriage. Æneas Syivius, (subsequently Pius II.,) in his account of his journey through Germany, mentions his having passed through Augsburg, of which Udalricus had been Bishop, the same who opposed the Pope on the subject of the Clergy's concubines, as their wives were often, in the time of Gregory VII., contemptuously called. "Transivimus Augustam: S. Udalricus huic præsedit, qui Papam arguit de concubinis." The account of the fish-pond has never been successfully refuted by the Papacy.]

† "Gregorium Magnum suo quodam decreto Sacerdotibus aliquando uxores ademisse. Cum vero paulo post jussisset ex piscina sua pisces aliquot capi, piscatores pro piscibus sex millia capitum infantum suffocatorum reperisse: quam cædem infantium cum intelegit Gregorius ex occultis fornicationibus vel adulteriis Sacerdotum natam esse, continuo revocavit decretum, et peccatum suum dignis pœnitentiæ fructibus purgavit, laudans apostolicum illud, 'Melius est nubere quam uri,' et de suo addens, 'Melius est nubere, quam mortis occasionem præbere.'"—Epist. Udalrici, apud Gerhard. Loc. Theolog., De Minist. Eccles., sect. ccexxxix., tom. vi., p. 548. 4to. Jenæ, 1619.

* "Si juxta Ezechielis Prophetiam parietem fodiamus, ut in domo Dei videamus horrendum, pessima forte appareat intra parietes abominatio; siquidem post fornicationes, post adulteria, post incestus, nec ipsæ quidem apud aliquos ignominiæ passiones et turpitudinis opera desunt. Utinam non fierent quæ usque adeo non conveniunt, ut nec Apostolum hæc scribere, nec nos dicere oporteret, nec dicentibus crederetur, quod humanum aliquando occupaverit animum tam abominanda cupido! Heu! execrabili Sodomorum cinere inimicus hominum Ecclesiæ corpus aspersit, et ipsorum etiam Ministrorum ejus nonnullos sane fœtidissima et spurcissima respersit, &c. Multi, non quidem omnes, sed tamen multi, certum est, nec latere possunt præ multitudine, nec præ impudentia quærunt; multi utique libertatem in qua vocati sunt in occasionem carnis dedisse videntur, abstinentes remedio nuptiali, et in omne deinceps flagitium effluentes. Utinam qui continere non valent, cœlibatui nomina dare vererentur. Esse sine dubio melius nubere quam uri, et salvari in humili gradu fidelis populi, quam in Cleri sublimitate et deterius vivere et districtius judicari."—Bernard. Opera, tom. iv., Tract. de Convers. ad Clericos, cap. xx., p. 110. Fol. Lugdun., 1667.

† "Cum in Anglia prava et detestabili consuetudine et longo tempore fuerit obtentum ut Clerici in domibus suis fornicarias habeant."—Conc. Labb., tom. x., Conc. Lat. III., Append. de Clericis Matrimonio copulatis, vel aliis Fornicarias habentibus, cap. ii. col. 1633, B. Paris, 1671.

‡ "Plerisque in diœcesibus, Rectores parochiarum ex certo et conducto cum suis Prælatis pretio passim et publice concubinas tenent."—Nicol. de Clemang., De corrupto Eccles. Statu. See Lewis's Life of Pecock, p. 21. 8vo. Oxford, 1820.

(10.) The University of Oxford, at the command of the King, drew up an account of abuses that needed reformation, in forty-six articles, to be laid before the Council of Constance, which sat A. D. 1414. The thirty-eighth states, "that the carnal and debauched lives of the Clergy in our days, and their public fornications which are never punished, except by a small fine in private, set an evil example before others: it would, therefore, be a holy thing, and contribute to the reformation of the Church, if Priests of every rank and order, who were public fornicators, were obliged to abstain from celebrating mass for a limited time."*

(11.) The following picture of the Roman Clergy in Scotland is equally startling:—"Inferior benefices were put up to sale, or bestowed on the illiterate and unworthy minions of courtiers; on dice-players, strolling bards, and the bastards of Bishops."† "The lives of the Clergy, exempted from secular jurisdiction, and corrupted by wealth and idleness, were become a scandal to religion, and an outrage on decency. While they professed chastity, and prohibited, under the severest penalties, any of the ecclesiastical order from contracting lawful wedlock, the Bishops set an example of the most shameless profligacy before the inferior Clergy; avowedly kept their harlots, provided their natural sons with benefices, and gave their daughters in marriage to the sons of the nobility and principal gentry; many of whom were so mean as to contaminate the blood of their families by such base alliances, for the sake of the rich dowries which they brought."‡ To authenticate the above statement, there is no need to go to the testimony of the Reformers, or to satirical poems published at the time. The truth is registered in the Acts of Parliament, in the decrees of their own Councils, in the records of legitimation, and in the confessions of their own writers.§

(12.) In an Act of Parliament passed in England, February 19th, 1548, it was stated, that "great filthiness of living, with other inconveniences, had followed on the laws that compelled chastity, and prohibited marriage; so that it was better they should be suffered to marry than to be so restrained."‖

II. In modern times, the immoral results are as certain and ruinous as formerly; except that more secrecy is observed, especially in countries which are not Roman Catholic.

1. In Protestant communities the sins of the celibates are more secret than formerly; nevertheless, it may be doubted whether they are less heinous or fewer in number. Ample proofs of the profligacy of the celibate life are before us; only a few of which we shall place before our readers, and these will necessarily be curtailed: it would be a shame to speak openly on these topics, or even to quote the written testimony of those who have recorded them, or were eye or ear witnesses of the abominations which they have detailed.

2. The Rev. Joseph Blanco White, who was a Spanish Priest of great celebrity, and of unquestionable veracity, speaking of the character of the Clergy of the country in reference to their celibacy, says, "My feelings are painfully vehement when I dwell upon this subject. That neither the freedom I have enjoyed so many years, nor the last repose of the victims, the remembrance of whom still wrings tears from my eyes, can allay the bitter pangs of my youth; are proofs that my views arise from a real, painful, and protracted experience. Devoted to the ecclesiastical profession from the age of fifteen, when I received the minor orders, I lived in constant friendship with the most distinguished youths who, in my town, were preparing for the priesthood. Men of the first eminence in the Church were the old friends of my family,—my parents' and my own spiritual directors. Thus I grew up, thus I continued in manhood, till, at the age of five-and-thirty, religious oppression, and that alone, forced me away from kindred and country. The intimacy of friendship, the undisguised converse of sacramental confession, opened to me the hearts of many, whose exterior conduct might have deceived a common observer. The coarse frankness of associate dissoluteness left indeed no secrets among the spiritual slaves, who, unable to separate the laws of God from those of their tyrannical Church, trampled both under foot in riotous despair. Such are the sources of the knowledge I possess: God, sorrow, and remorse, are my witnesses.

"A more blameless, ingenuous, religious set of youths than that in the enjoyment of whose friendship I passed the best years of my life, the world cannot boast of. Eight of us, all nearly of the same age, lived in the closest bond of affection, from sixteen till one-and-twenty; and four, at least, continued in the same intimacy till about thirty-five. Of this knot of friends, not one was tainted by the breath of gross vice, till the Church had doomed them to a life of celibacy, and turned the best affections of their hearts into crime. It is the very refinement of Church cruelty to say they were free when they deprived themselves of their natural rights. Less, indeed, would be the unfeelingness of a parent who, watching a moment of generous excitement, would deprive a son of his birthright, and doom him, by a voluntary act, to pine away through life in want and misery. A virtuous youth of one-and-twenty, who is made to believe Christian perfection inseparable from a life of celibacy, will easily overlook the dangers which beset that state of life. Those who made, and those who still support, the unnatural law, which turns the mistaken piety of youth into a source of future vice, ought to have learned mercy from their own experience; but a Priest who has waded (as most do) through the miry slough of a life of incessant temptation, falling and rising, stumbling, struggling, and falling again, without at once casting off Catholicism with Christianity, contracts, generally, habits of mind not unlike those of the guards of oriental beauty. Their hearts have been seared with envy.

"I cannot think on the wanderings of the friends of my youth without heart-rending pain. One, now no more, whose talents raised him to one of the highest dignities of the Church of Spain, was, for many years, a model of Christian purity. When, by the powerful influence of his mind, and the warmth of his devotion, this man had drawn many into the clerical, and the religious, life, (my youngest sister among the latter,) he sunk at once into the grossest and most daring profligacy. I heard him boast that the night before the solemn procession of Corpus Christi, where he appeared nearly at the head of his chapter, one of two children had been born which his two concubines brought to light within a

* Henry's History of Great Britain, vol. x., p. 20. 8vo. London, 1823.

† M'Crie's Life of John Knox, p. 10. 8vo. Sixth edit. Edinburgh, 1839.

‡ Idem, p. 11.

§ Wilkin's Concil. Magn. Brit., tom. iv., Conc. Edinburgh, pp. 46—60. Fol. London, 1737.

‖ Burnet's History of the Reformation, vol. ii., part i., p. 116. London, 1825.

few days of each other. The intrigues of ambition soon shared his mind with the pursuit of pleasure; and the fall of a Potentate, whom he took the trouble to instruct in the policy of Machiavel, involved him in danger and distress for a time. He had risen again into court influence, when death cut him off in the flower of life. I had loved him when both our minds were pure: I loved him when Catholicism had driven us both from the path of virtue: I still love, and will love, his memory, and hope that God's mercy has pardoned his life of sin, without imputing it to the abettors of the barbarous laws which occasioned his spiritual ruin.

"Such, more or less, has been the fate of my early friends, whose minds and hearts were much above the common standard of the Spanish Clergy. What, then, need I say of the vulgar crowd of Priests, who, coming, as the Spanish phrase has it, from coarse swaddling-clothes, and raised by ordination to a rank of life for which they have not been prepared, mingle vice and superstition, grossness of feeling, and pride of office, in their character? I have known the best among them; I have heard their confessions; I have heard the confessions of young persons of both sexes, who fell under the influence of their suggestions and example; and I do declare that nothing can be more dangerous to youthful virtue than their company. How many souls would be saved from crime, but for the vain display of pretended superior virtue, which Rome demands of her Clergy!"*

3. The following exhibition of Roman clerical corruption is by a Popish Clergyman in 1836: it is edited by Samuel F. B. Morse, A.M., and entitled, Confessions of a French Catholic Priest. The Editor, whose veracity cannot be questioned, was intimately acquainted with him, but was compelled to conceal his name in order to avoid the persecution which is authorized by the fourth Council of Lateran, in the decree against heretics.

"Catholic or Protestant writers," says the Priest, "who have spoken of the corruption of the Church and of the Roman Clergy, have not shown its cause. They saw only the effect, without tracing it up to its source. I will try to supply their silence. I have read a number of those books, against a body to which I belonged,—a body which I know as well as it is possible for any one to know it; and I can say that its entire degradation is unknown. Careful of saying nothing which can shock the reader, I shall reveal only what is necessary to unveil those 'anointed of the Lord,' but nothing to offend the eye. I shall surprise Protestants by saying, that in France the immense majority of young men in our seminaries are not corrupted; many of them are virtuous. It is nevertheless true. They are ignorant, superstitious, fanatical, given up to their superstitious practices, &c.; but, I declare they are not vicious. That may be conceded, although, in appearance, and in contradiction to their indecent studies; for they are taught that it is necessary to learn all these in order to be able to fulfil their duty; and that to hear confession in all its extent, it is necessary to know all human perversity. I do not give a judgment on these reasons: be that as it may, our superiors endeavour to inspire us, in those recitations, with a great dislike of such crimes; and I can affirm, that it is painful to the sense of decency in man, to be obliged to be familiar, as we are, with such books. This is a true picture of the seminaries. That I know; and I am indifferent whether it agrees or not with those drawn by others.

"The account of the corruption of the Clergy begins when they are out of the seminary. Young men are sent into a parish in the quality of Curates, or Vicars; at the commencement they fulfil their duties with care, and for a time remain faithful to their vows. Many have told me this after their fall. By and by they open astonished eyes. Restored to freedom, after ten or twelve years of thraldom in a college, they become different men, and gradually forget their vow. 'O!' said a young Priest, with tears in his eyes, after having four or five years discharged the duties of his station, 'God only knows what I have suffered during this time: if I have fallen, it was not without fighting: had I been allowed to choose a wife, as such is the law of God, who destines man to marriage, whatever our rules teach to the contrary, I should have remained virtuous; I should have been the happiest man in the world; I should have been a good and holy Priest; while now I am—O! I am ashamed of myself.'

"This is the sad history of their fall; for, let us be just,—what can become of a young Priest of twenty-five years of age, confined in a lonely wilderness of a country parish, in a village where he has only the society of his Sacristan and his servant, because all his parishioners, being coarse peasants, especially in the south and in the west, scarcely knowing how to read, are unable to afford him any comfort in his solitude? His duty occupies but little time, save on the Sunday; and during the whole week, after a short mass and the confession of a few women, he is reduced to ask himself, 'What shall I do?' Study has few, if any, charms for him, because he is forbidden to read those works which inform and entertain the intellect. He is allowed only to peruse theology, such as Dens, Gomez, Rodriguez, the Life of Saints by Godescar, &c. If he obtain others, the Bishop, in his visit, would chide him severely, and term him a worldly Priest. Our poet, Racine, so pure, so chaste, is scarcely tolerated; many Bishops not allowing him to have a place in the library of their Clergy. The young man, previous to his profession, had anticipated a pleasant existence in the Ecclesiastic state, and he finds but privation, ennui, and disgust; his passions are raised; the demon of evil thoughts takes possession of him. His ministry also places him in many circumstances with ignorant young women, into whose most secret thoughts he is obliged to enter, and his virtue is shaken. And can it be otherwise, when the Cleric has those intimate associations with females which the Papacy requires? It would be unreasonable to expect more from human nature than it is able to do. Such, however, is the situation of the Catholic Priest.

"I do not say this to veil or excuse the crime, the natural result of the institution; but I think I am bound to state the fact as it is. Sometimes the resistance is firm, and the struggle long; but at length this martyr of fanaticism, this victim of his system, and of his superiors, abandons his vow through despair, shuts his eyes and throws himself into the slough of passion. This is the end of almost all the Priests. In the beginning their conscience bitterly reproaches them; again they try to be faithful; they flutter, and fall; reform again, go on, and fall again; and at length, to finish this horrid struggle, they remain in vice. Let us add to this catastrophe, the temptations against their faith and doctrines, which end with many in complete atheism, into which they fall by the excess of degradation, temptations to atheism in those who reason, from the impossibility of reconciling their faith with reason.

* White's Practical and Internal Evidence against Catholicism, pp. 132—137. 8vo. Second edit. London, 1826.

"The resolution being taken of enjoying life, as they say, after having been so long deprived of it, the only question is to enjoy it safely and secretly, namely, without dishonour. Dishonour, in a French Priest, is more intolerable than death; and a Priest whose excesses are known, loses his reputation; therefore he neglects nothing to hide carefully both them and his victims from observation. Inconceivable mystery of the human species! This obligation of keeping a profound secret, is the best reason which he puts forward to seduce them: other Frenchmen, by their vanity, boast of their bonnes fortunes; but the Priest cannot make that boast, because he would be laughed at. His hypocrisy and care of his fame prevail over his national vanity. In this manner, through their dark ministry, they have immense power upon the mind of women; for they attack only those whose disposition they have long studied in confession. The reader can have some just idea of this power from the following fact, knowing, as I did, the individual when it became public:—A Priest, in a parish not far from mine, laid his snare for a young married woman, who had the reputation of piety, because she attended mass every morning. He, through his diabolical arguments, triumphed over her scruples. She went to him in the vestry almost every morning before the bell rang to call the people to mass. He confessed and absolved her, and she received the communion at the altar. The good people said, admiring her daily practice: 'How pious is this young wife: she partakes of the sacrament every day; she is doubtless a saint!'

"There are no means which their cunning does not invent to meet with victims. If the husband is jealous and suspicious, his wife, upon the advice of the Curate, will feign to be sick; and as it is the duty of a Priest to visit often (every day, if possible) his sick parishioners, he will remain alone with her to speak upon spiritual subjects in appearance, or to confess her. If a Priest, in spite of his proverbial cunning, be discovered, and he be denounced to the Bishop by public opinion, he may be removed, in order to silence the scandal, and sent to a distant village, where he is unknown; and where, by and by, he can re-commence the same mode of life. Sometimes he will be interdicted, according to the will of his Diocesan, who, in such cases, often judges at random, and more frequently by caprice than justice. The Priest is blamed by his superiors, not precisely for having been weak and guilty, but much more for not having 'better kept appearances,' as said the mother of Talleyrand, formerly Bishop of Autun. In his youth he said to his mother, who engaged him in the Church because he had little prospect of advancing elsewhere, being lame, 'Mother, I do not feel born to celibacy.' 'My son, keep appearances, like others.' He did not keep even appearances. This kind of 'bon mot' is the motto of the Clergy; and it ought to be inscribed on its banner, as was the device of Constantine: In hoc signo vinces, 'By this sign thou shalt conquer;' for it is with this it gains so many victories. A Priest who is faithful to it is never guilty, although he cares neither for God, nor virtue, nor his fellow-men. Hence the horrible crimes so common among the Clergy, to whom nothing is sacred, to avoid dishonour.

"Our ecclesiastical rules, composed by superiors as cunning as men can be, and who know well the disposition of Priests, perhaps by their own, try to avoid scandal, the true plague of their religion. Our laws forbid us keeping a maid-servant who is not of a certain age. This age varies according to the whim of the Bishop, who is the supreme director of everything. On this plan the rule would be useful if properly executed; but owing to priestly artifice, there is no real law, and it does not prevent Priests from keeping young and beautiful servants, with whom they live as with a wife; for, as they say,

'Il est avec le ceil des accomodements.'

If, however, her youth violate too strongly the Episcopal rule, the Priest applies directly to the Bishop, to whom he will say, that his servant is, perhaps, a little young; but on account of her faithfulness and other good qualities, it would be difficult for him to find another who suits so well. 'How old is she?' says his lordship, flattered by this mark of submission. 'My Lord, between thirty and forty,' answers the Priest, making her older by ten or fifteen years than she really is; and the Bishop, who has not the proof of the contrary, and who requires not the record of her birth, replies, 'It is a little young; but, however, on account of her good qualities, I give you a dispensation on account of age: take care of scandal, and remember that a woman drove Adam out of paradise.' The Priest boasts of such a dispensation, and avoids being accused to the Bishop by his spies.

"Consequently this half-ecclesiastical couple will be careful of scandal. To avoid the suspicion of living too friendly, the better to keep up appearances, they will feign ill-will toward each other. Sometimes the Vicar, when he has some of his parishioners at his house, will pretend to be angry with his servant, and threaten to dismiss her: his good, short-sighted peasants try to calm his counterfeited anger, to soften him, and to pray him to keep her. Good people!

"The 'age' law does not apply to Curates, who have at home their mothers, sisters, cousins, or nieces; consequently they are at liberty to hire young servants. Moreover, a Priest is always stationed as far as possible from the place of his birth. He is quite unknown, as well as his family, in the parish: many times he will take with him a young girl, who is his relation only by Adam, and whom he presents under the title of cousin or niece. None inquire the relationship of the Curate and his pretended cousin. If, however, there happen proof of too intimate understanding, he will send her under some Jesuitical pretext to a distant city for a time, or he will try the use of medicine. A Physician said to a Priest, an acquaintance of mine, 'Sir, I have already twice prescribed for your servant-maid; but beware, I will not do it a third time.' Would this fact, that I could warrant, (authenticate,) be a confirmation of the disclosures of Montreal?

"A Priest who is satisfied with the good services of his maid, makes his will in her favour, to the disappointment of his relatives, who watch the inheritance of their richer member with eager and impatient eyes. But, alas! there are no pleasures without pain, no roses without thorns, no spring without winter. The demon of trouble invades those secret illicit unions as well as others. Those internal quarrels end to the disadvantage of the Curate, whose reputation is at the mercy of his companion. She has not been at his school without profit; and therefore abstracts from him fees, the price of masses or indulgences, by threatening to publish their intimacy, and to draw upon him an interdiction. The unhappy man yields to the force of circumstances, and, stripping himself of his purse to pay for keeping the secret, consoles himself, that he has still a good income in his holy water, and the credulity of the parish.

"But if a good understanding exist in their union, and silence the quarrels occasionally arising, they grow old together. The maid takes care of the income and of the interior of the house; and the poor Priest has not always the power of preventing her encroachments even in spiritual matters. The 'Vicar of Wakefield' (whose history caused me to shed bitter tears at seeing what I might have been) had his department, and his wife hers; and they were never mixed together. But the servant-maid of the Catholic Curate is less circumspect: she creeps into spiritual affairs, and gives decisions which are almost as much reverenced as those of the Priest himself. He is, indeed, the oracle of the parish, the true son of the light: but his satellite is, on her part, the feminine oracle; a star, the light of which, although reflected from his own, is not without merit. When his mate and representative gives, by usurpation, some decision about masses, or saints, or prayers, his jealousy murmurs a little; but, knowing that it is a duty to yield in a family to numerous contrarieties for the sake of peace, he never contradicts her opinion by an opposite one in public. Other Priests commit greater and more horrible crimes, and renew the monstrosities of the cities of the plain, as they are spoken of in the Bible. On one occasion, I confessed some young lads of my catechism, from eleven to fifteen years old. Each of them acknowledged abominable crimes. I inquired, trembling,

* * * * * *

"I observed, that no crime could deter a Priest from its commission, if necessary to obliterate the trace of others. A Paris journal gave lately a striking proof of this. A Priest of the diocess of Dijon, (department of the Cotedor,) De la Collonge by name, after a long life of debauchery with a young sempstress whom he had seduced, smothered her one night, cut her body into pieces, and hid them in holes in his house. This is not a history of old times, but of the year 1836. It did not occur among cannibals or anthropophagi; but in France, in the beautiful province of Bourgogne. The monster who perpetrated this murder, in consideration of the interference of the Bishop (the creature of the new King) and of the high Clergy, who took a great interest in him, escaped the pain of death, even that of exposure and pillory, that his cassock, and the body to which he belonged, be not dishonoured. He has been condemned only to the galleys. Some twenty years ago, the whole of France resounded with the before-unheard-of crime of Contresotto, a monster Priest with a human visage; and that of Mingrot, who, being unable to seduce a female, first killed her, and having violated the dead body, cut it into pieces and dispersed the fragments. Her brothers, while the culprit fled to Piedmont for protection, published this almost incredible history under the title, 'To the Brothers of the Female Victim.' There is not a doubt respecting the truth of the statement. It is public, and notorious in France, as well as a variety of other cases, although less monstrous. The publication in the newspapers of such crimes is one of the most powerful reasons why the Clergy, thus unveiled, curse the freedom of the press, which keeps an eye ever open upon their conduct. The 'Constitutionel,' and the 'Courier,' deserve the thanks of the friends of morals and humanity for their courage and zeal in discovering and publishing such horrors, without fearing the power or the vengeance of the Papal hierarchy.

"I ought to begin with my holy superiors, my Lords the Bishops, Archbishops, Cardinals, and Pope, who are, in general, as much more advanced, in the way of corruption, beyond simple Priests, as they are in honour and dignity. I beg their Lordships' and His Holiness's pardon for having so long postponed to do them justice; and I hasten to repair my fault. Unluckily, however, I know them but little; for my relations with the Lords of the Roman Church have been rare and en passant. Thank God! my native land is no more sullied by the Holy See, its Cardinals, and school of licentiousness. They have left at Avignon, where they resided during the great schism, traces of their passage, as I have ascertained in my intercourse with this country. I say nothing about the Pope but what every one knows: I only make this observation, that he causes himself to be almost worshipped, and receives more honours in one day, than Christ did in the three years of his mission.

"Among the French Bishops, I know but three: mine own, of whom I will not speak for pertinent reasons, M. De Cheverus, Archbishop of Bourdeaux, and M. De Guelin, of Paris. As for M. De Cheverus, I should be reproached by my conscience, if of him I said other than good. He is one of those men who atone for the crimes of many Catholics. His virtues recall those of Fenelon and of Lamotte, who were good and pious men, not because, but although, they were Romanists. His administration of his immense diocess, his charity, his talents, have won to him all hearts; and every time I went into his see, I everywhere heard blessings pronounced upon him. He has been created Cardinal lately. He is one of those whom Roman purple honours not, but who honours the Roman purple. I could give account of other Prelates; but I have made it a rule to speak only of what I know and have seen. Therefore I advert only to the Archbishop of Paris, who cut so deplorable a figure in the secret Council called the Camarilla, which destroyed the throne of Charles X. by dint of its follies. He has all the duplicity and hypocrisy of a secret Councillor. Under the veil of piety and virtue, he conceals deep corruption. So far does he go in his Jesuitical art, that many a Parisian who may read this book, will probably judge me a slanderer: it is, however, true, that I have by accident been personally acquainted with one of his mistresses. It is also true, that His Highness has many others in the convent of the Carmelites, in the street St. Jaques, his seraglio. When, several years ago, the mob in Paris, in one of those awful insurrections so frequent, passed over his palace and pillaged it, many gowns, which were not the least like a Priest's cassock, were found in his cabinet. His confidants published that they were those of his sisters, who, by the way, never went to this palace. Credat Judæus Apella. He is the only Bishop of whom I can, or wish to, give an accurate statement. Would it not be right to say with Sinon, in Virgilius, Ab uno disce omnes?"*

4. It were easy to advance undoubted testimony respecting the corruption of Roman Priests, growing out of their celibacy, in all Popish nations, as the fact is notorious. In South America it is so customary for Priests to have their mistresses, that it ceases to be marvellous. In Cuba a similar custom prevails.

* Confessions of a French Catholic Priest, pp. 126—142. New-York, 1837.

5. In Protestant countries the case is different, at least, in appearance. The comparison between the married, chaste Clergy of Protestants, in general, so far affects the Papists, that they dare not, without betraying their cause, indulge in profligacy to that extent of guilt to which they are prone when removed from Protestant observation. But their secret sins are neither few nor small, as is known by sufficient developements, and the nature of the case. Secrecy is their fort. Their own people, who are privy to their sins, hesitate to expose them in the eye of Protestants. If they would, they dare not, as it would insure to them the hatred and revenge of the Clergy. The Priests, being careful to seek concealment for their own vices, shrink from exposing those of their brethren. The secrecy of the confessional also aids in preserving this privacy, when otherwise they would be detected and exposed. The following particulars, if duly considered, will lead us to conclude, that the chastity of the Popish priesthood is, after all, no very sacred thing:—

(1.) They are men, and only such; therefore they are as liable as others to fall into sin. (2.) They are, in general, unconverted men; consequently they are uninfluenced by the power of divine grace, so as to have victory over the lusts of the flesh. (3.) They are accustomed generally to luxurious living, and indulge freely in the use of wine and stimula ing liquids. (4.) They are in direct association with females of every grade, over whom they exercise almost unlimited control. At confession they endeavour to search the heart, and thus become acquainted with human weakness. (5.) In the families of Bishops and Priests, females form a part, and are such as they select. (6.) They have access to the various sodalities of nuns, sisters of charity, &c., with whom they are on terms of intimate familiarity. (7.) They have peculiar means of privacy, by the confessional, the convenience of their houses, which are adapted to such circumstances, the secrecy which their people are bound to observe, and by their opportunities of concealing, removing, or confining their accomplices, &c. (8.) It is a fact, that clerical celibacy, in its origin among Heathens, was followed by licentiousness; among the early Christian heretics, it was depraved; among orthodox ancient believers, it became corrupt; during the middle ages, it was awfully polluted; and at the time of the Reformation, it was the source of unbounded immorality. In all Catholic countries it is the fountain of crime, and pollutes the whole Church. Can we, therefore, suppose that celibate Popish Priests and Bishops in professedly Protestant countries are better than their brethren in former ages? especially when we consider their opportunities of privacy, of which they studiously avail themselves, and by which they are protected from public scrutiny.

6. The conscious guilt of Romish Priests and controvertists may be adduced as a reason why they continue pertinaciously to accuse the blessed Reformers of unchastity. They know how vulnerable the character of their own Clergy is on this point; and, in order to divert the attention of their opponents, and place them on the defensive, they, with an impudence unparalleled, become the assailant and accusing party. In many of their writings it is asserted, as an undoubted matter of fact, that Luther both taught and practised this vice; though it is well known, that among the thousands of enemies which he had during his life, there were none that attempted to produce evidence of any thing worse than that he married a religious woman, that is, one who, like himself, was under the Popish vow of chastity. Similar accusations were brought against other Reformers, but with equal disregard to truth.

7. In all ages, from the apostolic times, numerous learned and pious Romanists are found who opposed the prohibition of marriage, until it was established by violence. Since then, even in the darker period, there have been many who, revering the testimony of Scripture, and deprecating the horrible scandals of celibacy, opposed the law which enjoined it, and were anxious that the liberty of legitimate marriage should be restored to the Clergy. The Waldenses, A. D. 1160, opposed the celibacy of the Priesthood. A. D. 1270, Thomas Aquinas wrote against it. Durandus and Marsilius rejected it, A. D. 1320. About the same time the poets Dante and Petrarch exposed the enormities of that state. Balæus informs us, that about the year 1340 great contests arose concerning the marriage of the Clergy. John Wycliffe opposed celibacy. Sigismund, at the Council of Basil, A. D. 1430, recommended the marriage of the Clergy, because more evil than good resulted from celibacy. Æneas Sylvius, afterward Pius II., at the same Council deplored the state of the Church on account of it. A cloud of witnesses might easily be brought forward to establish our position.*

As there is an increasing esteem for morality and pure Christianity in Germany, the necessity of altering the ecclesiastical law, which forbade the marriage of Priests, is more and more felt; and as Romish Priests and their supporters continue to abuse the ignorance of a large body of Roman Catholics, in order to uphold the celibacy, to inspire the people with superstitious veneration of their purity, and to carry out their selfish plans, so shall we find that the loud voice of reason and of history will prevail. All seem united to restore to the Priests their inalienable rights as men. The representatives of the people in the kingdom of Wirtemberg have several times, from 1828 to 1836, moved in their legislative assembly, that the Catholic Clergy be allowed to marry. A petition, signed by the most respectable Catholics in the grand dukedom of Baden, praying for the repeal of this unnatural ecclesiastical law, was read (1831) in the House of Representatives. This petition was signed not only by many thousand laymen, but also by two hundred and eighty Roman Catholic Clergymen, among whom were many Superintendents, Presidents of Colleges, eighty-six Pastors, twenty-one Vicars, three above seventy, and six from sixty to seventy, years old, fifteen from fifty to sixty years of age, &c. This petition received favourable and promising attention. Since that time associations have been formed in every part of Germany, the object of which is to abolish celibacy in a legitimate manner. At the head of these associations are found Roman Catholic Clergymen, supported not only by influential and liberal laymen of the higher order, but by the voice of public opinion among the lower classes. The members are bound not only to express their convictions and experience of the evil effects of celibacy, but to sign their names to their publications, and to make every proper effort to obtain the privilege of marrying by civil and ecclesiastical law. To accomplish this, periodicals are published, and meetings held, in order to enlighten and encourage each other, and to prepare the people for the change. These societies are under the superintendence of four celebrated Professors. Two months subsequent to the first announcement, a number of highly-respected Ecclesiastics and Civilians became members. Among the Clergy are the names of every age and station in the Church. It is also remarkable that many Priests who are on the verge of the grave, and must therefore be considered impartial, have taken a zealous interest in this enterprise. Members of Roman Catholic Consistories, and of the Theological Faculty of Tubingen, have joined the association. The public press has almost unanimously spoken in favour of this movement. In the diocess of Trier, eighty of the most eminent Priests formed a society in 1835, to accomplish in a lawful manner a reformation in the ecclesiastical discipline of the Romish Church, especially with regard to celibacy and convents. The Archbishop of Trier has written a pastoral epistle against it, which is proclaimed from the pulpits of the ignorant and fanatical Priests: such threatenings, however, are vain.

* See Chemnicii Exam. Conc. Trid., tom. iii., pp. 161—166, where many such authorities are given.

III. There are several questions connected with the marriage of the Clergy, which may be stated and examined.

1. Romanists allow that persons who have been once married may be ordained Bishops or Priests; provided they do not live with their wives; but those who have been twice married, or who have married widows, cannot. To this we reply, (1.) That it is an express violation of the law of God for man and wife to separate, except on account of the adultery of one party, when the other is freed from the contract. On this subject Romanists violate the law of God, by separating those whom he hath joined. (2.) In this they follow the heresy of Montanus, into which Tertullian fell. (3.) St. Peter and the other Apostles lived with their wives; St. Paul says that he might have done the same. (1 Cor. ix. 5.) (4.) He also gives instructions respecting the house and family of the Minister, the behaviour of his wife, children, &c. (1 Tim. iii. 5, 11.) Hence their wives were not separated from their society in the days of the Apostles. (5.) St. Paul also saith, if the wife will not consent, the husband cannot leave her; and though there be an understanding, yet they must be asunder only for a time. Hence a final agreement to separate cannot be allowed without directly contradicting the Apostle. (1 Cor. vii. 5.)

2. It may also be inquired, "Is it lawful for Ministers to marry after they have entered into holy orders?" Members of the Church of Rome cannot deny that, according to the decision of St. Paul, married persons were called to the ministry of the church, ordained, and lived with their wives subsequently. After failing to pervert this truth, they dispute, and maintain, that it was never allowed that ordained Ministers should marry. The question is, "Would this be sinful?" We maintain that the Scripture enjoins no such restriction; for, in the Old Testament, where external purity was strictly enjoined, the Priests were not only permitted, but commanded, to marry, provided they did not marry prostitutes, nor repudiated persons. This was the case, not only with the inferior, but also with the High Priest, after he was anointed and consecrated: and in the very chapter where these injunctions are given, the Priests are exhorted, "Be ye holy, for I am holy." St. Paul establishes it as a maxim of divine authority, that Ministers who are married before orders, or who marry after receiving them, do it without sin. He, therefore, who can have a wife without sin, may contract marriage without sin: and a Bishop, Presbyter, or Deacon may marry without offence; (1 Tim. iii.; Titus i.;) for the same reason he may contract marriage subsequent to his entering orders without sin. The Apostle expressly says, that he had no precept of the Lord by which unmarried persons were prevented from entering into that state. (1 Cor. vii.) He declares it to be a doctrine of devils to prohibit marriage. St. Paul also asserts, that he had a similar power of contracting marriage, to that of Peter and the other Apostles; (1 Cor. ix.;) and acknowledged no vow of celibacy binding upon himself or others, so as to prevent them, without sin, from marrying when they thought prudent.

3. Another question in connexion with this subject is the following:—"Can married persons, with mutual consent, become celibate Priests, Monks, or Nuns?" Romanists say they can: Protestants affirm that they cannot, and adduce the following reasons:—

(1.) The marriage contract is indissoluble, except on account of adultery. "Whom God hath joined together, let not man put asunder." (2.) If the Roman doctrine be correct, it will follow, that married persons can dissolve the union by their own power and will. If they can do this for the sake of becoming Priests, Monks, or Nuns, then they may do so for other reasons. Causes for dissolving the marriage contract would then be as numerous as the passions and feelings of those concerned might dictate; and the result would be, as among the Jews and pagan nations, that the marriage contract would be invalidated on the most frivolous occasions. Every wisely-regulated government restrains this tendency of human nature, by enacting laws against all voluntary dissolutions of the nuptial vow. (3.) The mutual dissolution of marriage is a breach of the engagement, that they will continue man and wife till separated by death. Who ever heard of a matrimonial vow, the validity of which only continued until one or both of the parties became votaries? This dissolution of the vow is an element of Paganism, and ought not to have any place among Christians. (4.) It is contrary to St. Paul's rule: "Defraud ye not one the other, except it be with consent for a time, that ye may give yourselves to fasting and prayer; and come together again, that Satan tempt you not for your incontinency." (1 Cor. vii. 5.) The Apostle declares they should separate themselves only for a time; and the reason for the temporary separation was, that they might for a season devote themselves to fasting and prayer. They that are a long time apart are liable to fall into temptation. (5.) Man and wife are expressly commanded not to separate: "Let every man, wherein he is called, abide. Art thou bound unto a wife? seek not to be loosed." (1 Cor. vii. 24, 27.) The Apostle had a command from God, that man and wife should not separate: "I command, not I, but the Lord, Let not the wife depart from her husband." (Verse 10.)

IV. We proceed to consider how celibacy commenced, and was established in the Church. In order to this we propose to trace its history.

1. The unscriptural merit attached to virginity or the celibate life, so raised this state in the estimation of the people, that those who abstained from marriage were in higher reputation than those who embraced it; and as the Bishops were chosen from among those who were most esteemed, the usage of selecting unmarried men for the prelacy obtained.

2. With this sentiment it were easy to interpret the apostolic injunction, that "a Bishop should be the husband of one wife only," differently from the true meaning of the Apostle. Many expounded the passage so as to make it forbid all second marriages. The laws of the ancient church on bigamy were framed in reference to this rule. They were divided, however, about the sense of the apostolical canon; which occasioned various practices among them in reference to the ordination of those who had been twice married.

3. It was a common opinion, that all persons were to be refused orders as digamists, who were twice married after baptism, though legally and successively to two wives, one after another. In consequence of being imbued with the pagan and heretical doctrines of the Novatians and Montanists, they supposed that the Apostle had forbidden persons twice married to be ordained Bishops. Such were therefore repelled from the superior orders of the Church. That this was the practice of some churches in the time of Origen, appears from his comment on Luke: "That not only fornication, but marriages, excluded men from the dignities of the Church; for no digamist could be either Bishop, Presbyter, or Deacon." Tertullian, when he became a Montanist, urged this argument in order to repudiate second marriages in all. He pleaded, that "a layman could not in decency desire licence of the Ecclesiastics to be married a second time, seeing the Ecclesiastics themselves, Bishops, Presbyters, and Deacons, were but once married."* Similar sentiments are to be found in other parts of his writings.†

Several ancient writers entertained the same opinions, as Ambrose,* Jerome,† Gennadius.‡ The Councils of Agde § and Carthage IV.‖ put the same sense on the Apostle's words. Epiphanius distinguishes between the superior and inferior orders, making the rule in this sense obligatory on the former, but not on the latter.

4. Others extended the apostolic rule to all persons twice married, whether before or after baptism. Ambrose was of opinion that these should be excluded from ordination.¶ So it was decreed by Innocent, Bishop of Rome, and the Council of Valencia.†† This opinion, however, did not obtain to any great extent.

5. The most consistent and general sentiment was, that the Apostle's rule was the prohibition of the ordina-

[* "Qualis es, id matrimonium postulans, quod eis a quibus postulas non licet habere, ab Episcopo monogamo, a Presbyteris et Diaconis ejusdem sacramenti, a viduis quarum sectam in te recusasti; et illi plane sic dabunt viros et uxores, quomodo buccellas."—Tertull. Opera, tom. ii.; De Monogamia, cap. xi., p. 149 8vo. Wirceb., 1781.]

[† "Igitur defuncto per Dei voluntatem etiam matrimonium Dei voluntate defungitur; quid tu restaures, cui finem Deus posuit? quid libertatem oblatam tibi iterata matrimonii servitute fastidis? Obligatus es, inquit, matrimonio, ne quæsieris solutionem. Nam etsi non delinquas renubendo, carnis tamen pressuram subsequi dicit. Quare facultatem continentiæ, quantum possumus, non diligamus? Quamprimum obvenerit, imbibamus: ut quod in matrimonio non valuimus, in viduitate sectemur. Amplectenda occasio est, quæ admit quod necessitas imperabat. Quantum detrahant, quantum obstrepant sanctitati nuptiæ secundæ, disciplinæ Ecclesiæ, præscriptio Apostoli declarat, cum digamos non sinit præsidere, cum viduam allegi in ordinationem nisi univiram non concedit: aram enim Dei mundam proponi oportet. Tota illa Ecclesia candida de sanctitate describitur."—Tertull. Opera, tom. ii.; Ad Uxorem, cap. vii., p. 64.

["Inde igitur apud nos plenius atque strictius præscribitur, unius matrimonii esse oportere, qui alleguntur in ordinem sacerdotalem. Usque adeo quosdam memini digamos loco dejectos. Sed dices: Ergo cæteris licet, quos excipit. Vani erimus, si putaverimus, quod Sacerdotibus non liceat, laicis licere. Nonne et laici Sacerdotes sumus? Scriptum est, Regnum quoque nos et Sacerdotes, Deo et Patri suo fecit.

["Differentiam inter ordinem et plebem constituit Ecclesiæ auctoritas, et honor per ordinis confessum sanctificatus a Deo; ibi ecclesiastici ordinis non est confessus? Et offers et tinguis, Sacerdos tibi solus. Sed ubi tres, Ecclesia est, licet laici; unusquisque enim de sua fide vivit, nec est personarum acceptio apud Deum.

["Quoniam non auditores legis justificabuntur a Deo, sed factores, secundum quod et Apostolus dicit. Igitur si habes jus Sacerdotis, in temetipso ubi necesse est, habeas oportet etiam disciplinam Sacerdotis, ubi necesse sit habere jus Sacerdotis. Digamus tinguis? Digamus offers? Quanto magis laico digamo capitale erit agere pro Sacerdote, cum ipsi Sacerdoti digamo auferatur agere Sacerdotem. Sed necessitati, inquis, indulgetur. Nulla necessitas excusatur, quæ potest non esse. Noli denique digamus deprehendi, et non committis in necessitatem administrandi quod non licet digamo."—Idem, De Exhort. Castitat., cap. vii.]

[* "De castimonia quid loquar, quando una tantum, nec repetita permittitur copula? Et in ipso ergo conjugio lex est, non iterare conjugium, nec secundæ conjugis sortiri conjunctionem. Quod plerisque mirum videtur, cur etiam ante baptismum iterati conjugii ad electionem muneris et ordinationis prærogativam impedimenta generentur; cum etiam delicta obesse non soleant, si lavacri remissa fuerint sacramento. Sed intelligere debemus, quia baptismo culpa dimitti potest, lex aboleri non potest. In conjugio non culpa, sed lex est. Quod culpæ est igitur, in baptismate relaxatur: quod legis est, in conjugio non solvitur."—Ambros. Opera, tom. iv.; De Officiis.]

[† "Prædicator continentiæ, nuptias ne conciliet. Qui Apostolum leget dicentem: 'Superest, ut qui habent uxores sic sint, quasi non habeant:' cur virginem cogit et nubit? Qui de monogamia Sacerdos est, quare viduam hortatur, ut digama sit."—Hieron. Opera, tom. i., epist. ii.; Ad Nepotian.

["Considera quod vidua non eligatur, nisi unius viri uxor: et nos putamus Sacerdotum hoc tantum esse privilegium, ut non admittatur ad altare, nisi qui unam habuerit uxorem. Non solum enim ab officio Sacerdotii digamus excluditur, sed et ab eleemosyna Ecclesiæ; dum indigna putatur stipe, quæ ad secunda conjugia devoluta est. Quamquam lege sacerdotali teneatur, et laicus, qui talem præbere se debet, ut possit eligi in sacerdotium. Non enim eligitur, si digamus fuerit. Porro eliguntur ex laicis Sacerdotes. Ergo, et laicus tenetur mandato, per quod ad sacerdotium pervenitur."—Idem, epist. xi.; Ad Ageruch.]

[‡ "Maritum duarum post baptismum matronarum Clericum non ordinandum."—Gennad. de Eccles. Dogmat., cap. lxxii.; apud August. Opera, tom. iii., p. 126. Basil., 1528.]

[§ "Placuit de bigamis aut internuptarum maritis, quamquam aliud patrum statuta decreverint, ut qui hucusque ordinati sunt, habita miseratione, Presbyterii vel Diaconatus nomen tantum obtineant; officium vero Presbyteri consecrandi et ministrandi hujus modi Diaconi non præsumant."—Conc. Labb., tom. iv.; Conc Agath., cap. i., col. 1383. Paris, 1671.]

[‖ "Simili sententiæ subjacebit Episcopus, si sciens ordinaverit Clericum eum, qui viduam aut repudiatam uxorem habuit, aut secundam."—Conc. Labb., tom. ii.; Conc. Carth. IV., cap. lxix., col. 1205. Paris, 1671.]

[¶ "Plerique ita argumentantur, unius uxoris virum dici post baptismum habitæ, eo quod baptismo vitium sit ablutum, quo afferebatur impedimentum. Et vitia quidem atque peccata diluuntur omnia, ut si quis contaminaverit suum corpus cum plurimis quas nulla conjugii lege sociaverit, remittantur ei omnia: sed conjugia non resolvuntur, si quis iteraverit: culpa enim lavacro, non lex solvitur: nulla enim culpa conjugii, sed lex est. Ideo et Apostolus legem posuit, dicens: 'Si quis sine crimine est, unius uxoris vir.' Ergo qui sine crimine est, unius uxoris vir, tenetur ad legem sacerdotii suscipiendi: qui autem iteraverit conjugium, culpam quidem non habet coinquinati; sed prærogativa exuitur Sacerdotis."—Ambrosii Opera, tom. v., Epist. ad Vercellenses, col. 246, A. Paris, 1661.]

[ "Ne ab aliquibus existimetur, ante baptismum si forte quis accepit uxorem, et ea de sæculo recedente alteram duxerit, in baptismo esse dimissum: satis errat a regula: quia in baptismo peccata remittuntur; non acceptarum uxorum numerus aboletur."—Conc. Labb., tom. ii., Innocent. Papæ I. epist. ii., cap. vi., col. 1251. Paris, 1671.

["Nec illud debere admitti, quod aliquanti pro defensione pravi erroris opponunt, et adserunt, quod ante baptismum uxor accepta non debeat imputari; quia in baptismo omnia dimittuntur, nec uxorum numerus aboletur."—Idem, epist. xxiii., cap. vi., col. 1278.]

[†† "Sedit igitur neminem post hanc Synodum, qua ejusmodi illicitis vel sero succurritur, de digamis, aut internuptarum maritis, ordinari Clericum posse. Nec requirendum, utrumne initiati sacramentis divinis, anne Gentiles, hac se infelicis sortis necessitate macularint, cum divini præcepti casta sit forma."—Idem, tom. ii., Conc. Valent., cap. i., col. 905.]

tion of polygamists, or such as had numerous wives at the same time, and such as without cause had put them away and married others. This was a common practice, both among Jews and Gentiles, and such as the Apostles accounted a just impediment of ordination. Chrysostom expounds 1 Tim. iii. 2, against polygamy. Theodoret and Theophylact maintain the same interpretation. Jerome, though he favours a different opinion, declares that there were many who interpreted the words as applicable to polygamy. It is, however, certain that second marriages, when lawfully contracted, were not insuperable objections to ordination. Tertullian, after he became Montanist, sarcastically addressed the Christians of his time, because persons were ordained who had been twice married. He says, "How many digamists preside among you, who thus insult the Apostle!"* It appears from the letters of Siricius† and Innocent,‡ that the Bishops of Spain and Greece ordained such among the Clergy; for these Pontiffs reproved them for this usage. Theodoret ordained one Irenæus a Bishop, who had been twice married; and when some objected, he defended it by referring to the practice of other churches. "Herein," says he, "I followed the example of my predecessors." Alexander, Bishop of Antioch, with Acacius of Beræa, ordained Diogenes, who had been twice married. Praylius ordained Dominus of Cæsarea, likewise a digamist. Proclus, a Prelate of Constantinople, received and approved the ordination of many such. The practice of the Church appears to have varied in this matter, in proportion as the doctrines of Heathenism and of heresy prevailed against those of St. Paul, who taught that none should be Bishop who had more than one wife. Bellarmine and other Romanists misrepresent history when they say, that the ordination of persons twice lawfully married is against the rule of the Apostle, and the universal practice and consent of Christendom.

6. No vow of celibacy, or abstinence from conjugal society, was required of the Clergy, as a condition of their ordination, during the first three centuries of Christianity. The contrary is evident from innumerable examples of Bishops and Presbyters, who lived in a state of marriage without any prejudice to their ministerial functions. It is generally agreed by ancient writers, that several of the Apostles were married. Some say all of them, with the exception of St. Paul and St. John. Others say St. Paul was married, because he writes to "his yoke-fellow," whom they interpret to be his wife. (Phil. iv. 3.)§ However, passing by the case of that Apostle, it cannot be denied that all the other Apostles, or the greater part of them, were married. In the following centuries, we have the account of married Bishops, Presbyters, and Deacons, without any reproof or mark of dishonour attached to them. From among the many instances which might be given, some may be adduced.

Valens, Presbyter of Philippi, mentioned by Polycarp, was a married man.* Chœremon, Bishop of Nilus, an exceedingly old man, was married. He fled with his wife to Arabia, in time of persecution, under Maximinus the tyrant, where they both perished, as we are informed by Eusebius.† Novatus was a married Presbyter of Carthage.‡ Cyprian himself is generally supposed to have been married.§ Cæcilius, the Presbyter, through whose instrumentality Cyprian was converted to Christianity, was married.‖ Numidicus, another Presbyter of Carthage, of whom Cyprian informs us, "that in the Decian persecution he saw his own wife, with many other martyrs, burned by his side; while he himself, lying half consumed, covered with stones, and left for dead, was found expiring by his daughter, who drew him out of the rubbish, and brought him again to life."¶ Eusebius assures us that Phileas, Bishop of Thmuis, and Philoramus, had, each of them, a wife and children. They were pressed with that argument by the heathen Magistrate, to deny their religion, in the Diocletian persecution. They contemned the remonstrance which urged them to spare their families, and preferred the law of Christ. Domnus, Bishop of Antioch, was son to

* "Quot enim et digami præsident apud vos, insultantes utique Apostolo!"—Tertull. Opera, tom. ii., de Monogam., cap. xii., p. 153. 8vo. Wirceb., 1781.

[† "Apostolus 'unius uxoris virum' tam Sacerdotem, quam Diaconum fieri debere mandavit. Quæ omnia ita a vestrarum regionum despiciuntur Episcopis quasi in contrarium magis fuerint constituta."—Conc. Labb. tom. ii., Siricii Papæ, epist. i. Ad Himer. Tarrac., cap. viii., col. 1021. Paris, 1671.]

[‡ "Eos qui viduas accepisse suggeruntur uxores, non solum Clericos affectos agnovi, verum etiam usque ad infulas summi sacerdotii pervenisse; quod contra legis esse præcepta, nullus ignorat."—Idem, Innocentii Papæ I. epist. xxii., ad Episc. Maced., cap. i., col. 1272.]

§ Bingham's Origines Ecclesiasticæ, or, the Antiquities of the Christian Church, vol. i., book iv., chap. v., sect. 1—5. 8vo. London, 1840

[* "Nimis contristatus sum pro Valente, qui Presbyter factus est aliquando apud vos, quod sic ignoret is locum qui datus est ei.—Valde ergo, Fratres, contristor pro illo, et pro conjuge ejus: quibus det Dominus pœnitentiam veram."—Polycarpi Epist. ad Philip., cap. xi. 4to. Oxon., 1709.]

[† "Chœremon erat quidam grandævus, Nili urbis Episcopus. Hic una cum conjuge in Arabicum montem fuga delatus, non ulterius reversus est. Et fratres, quamvis accurate omnia perscrutati, nec ipsos posthac, nec ipsorum cadavera reperire potuerunt."—Euseb. Hist. Eccles., lib. vi., cap. xlii. Fol. Ed. Reading. Cantab., 1720.]

[‡ "Uterus uxoris calce percussus, et abortione properante in parricidium partus expressus. Et damnare nunc audet sacrificantium manus, cum sit ipse nocentior pedibus, quibus filius qui nascebatur occisus est."—Cypriani Opera, epist. xlviii., ad Cornelium, p. 53. 8vo. edit. Paris, 1836.]

[§ Bingham, in his Antiquities of the Christian Church, from which Dr. Elliott largely quotes, has evidently mistaken Pagi, who says, "Baronius, num. x., quod in prima hujus Criticæ editione non adverteram, inde male deduxit Cyprianum uxorem habuisse."—Critica Historico-Chronologica in universos Annales Ecclesiasticos Cæsaris Card. Baronii, tom. i., A.D. 248, p. 231. Antv, 1727.]

[‖ "Erat sane illi etiam de nobis contubernium viri justi et laudabilis memoriæ Cæcilii, et ætate tunc et honore Presbyteri, qui eum ad agnitionem veram divinitatis a sæculari errore correxerat. Hunc toto honore atque omni observantia diligebat, obsequenti veneratione suspiciens, non jam ut amicum animæ coæqualem, sed tamquam novæ vitæ parentem. Denique, illi demulsus ejus obsequiis, in tantum dilectionis immensæ merito provocatus est, ut de sæculo excedens, arcessitione jam proxima commendaret illi conjugem ac liberos suos, et quem fecerat de sectæ communione participem, postmodum faceret pietatis heredem."—Pont. Vita Cypriani. Fol. Oxon., 1682.]

[¶ "Numidicus—uxorem adhærentem lateri suo, concrematam simul cum cæteris, conservatam magis dixerim, lætus aspexit. Ipse semiustulatus et lapidibus obrutus et pro mortuo derelictus, dum postmodum filia sollicito pietatis obsequio cadaver patris inquirit, semianimis inventus et extractus et refocillatus, a comitibus quos ipse præmiserat remansit invictus."—Cypriani Opera, epist. xxxiv Ad Clerum et Plebem, p. 42. 8vo. edit. Paris, 1836.]

[ "Hujusmodi fuit Philoramus: qui non vulgarem Magistratum, Procuratoris scilicet summæ rei, apud Alexandriam gerebat, et pro dignitate ac prærogativa honoris Romani, stipatus militibus quotidie jus dicebat. Hujusmodi etiam fuit Phileas, Ecclesiæ Thmuitarum Episcopus; vir cunctis in patria honoribus ac muneribus summa cum laude perfunctus et in philosophiæ studiis admodum clarus. Qui cum innumeri, cognati atque amici, quidam etiam ex Magistratibus atque honoratis, eos rogarent; cum Judex ipse eos cohortaretur ut sui ipsorum misereri, et uxoribus ac liberis suis consulere vellent; nunquam his omnibus adduci potuerunt, ut vitæ suæ conservandæ causa, divinas leges de confessione et negatione nominis Christi latas contemnerent; sed virili ac philosophico animo, seu Demetrian, who was Prelate of that see before him.* Polycrates, Bishop of Ephesus, A. D. 180, succeeded seven of his ancestors who had filled that diocess. Spiridion, a popular Bishop in the Council of Nice, was married, and had a daughter called Irene. Of him Sozomen says, He was a husbandman, married, and had children; but not the worse on that account in relation to divine matters."†

Gregory Nazianzen was father of the Gregory who succeeded him, as appears from the oration which he made in favour of his parent. He says, "that a good and diligent Bishop serves in the ministry nothing the worse for being married, but rather the better, and with more ability to do good." Of his mother he says, "that she was given to his father of God, and became not only his helper, but also his leader, both by word and by deeds, training him to the best things; and though in others it was best for her to be subject to him, on account of the right of marriage, yet in religion and godliness she doubted not to become his leader and teacher." ‡ Gregory of Nyssa was married. Synesius of Ptolemais was married, and was the father of children, while a Bishop. Hilary of Poictiers was married, and had a daughter.§ Paulinus was ordained first, A. D. 393, at Barcelona, in Spain, and having lived fourteen years with his wife Therasia, was ordained in the year 409 Bishop of Nola. We have no record that he left his wife.‖ Germanus was a notable Bishop in Africa, and was married, having a daughter named Leantia, who was afterward put to death by the Arians. Fabian and Hormisda, Bishops of Rome, were married: other Prelates of that city were sons of Priests and Bishops, as Damasus testifies in his Pontifical. Nor will it avail to say, that these children were born before their fathers were Presbyters or Bishops; for Gratian, after rehearsing their names, says, "And many besides are found to have governed the Apostolic See, being born of Priests or Ministers." ¶

7. The most learned advocates of the Church of Rome have never found any answer to all this, except the groundless pretence, that all married persons, when they were ordained, promised to live separate from their wives, which answered to the vow of celibacy in others. This is all that Pagi * and Schelstrate † have to say on the subject; not only without proof, but against the clearest evidence of ancient history. Such, however, is the unfounded statement of most Roman writers. The Jesuit annotators of the Rhemish Testament assert, that their "exposition only is agreeable to the practice of the whole Church, the definition of ancient Councils, the doctrine of the Fathers without exception, and the Apostles' tradition."‡ "You may see how shamefully the state of the new heretical Clergy of our time is fallen from the apostolic, and all the Fathers', doctrine herein; who do not only take men once or twice married, but, which was never heard of before in any person or part of the Catholic Church, they marry after they are Bishops or Priests." These annotators further say, in their note on Titus iii. 6, "If the studious reader peruse all antiquity, he shall find all notable Bishops and Priests of God's church to have been single, or continent from their wives, if any were married before they came to the Clergy. So was Paul, and exhorteth all men to the like. So were the Apostles after they followed Christ." These are the groundless assertions of the greater part of Romanists; in reference to which nothing can be farther from the truth.

There was, indeed, manifested in some places a disposition to introduce the law of celibacy, by a few zealous individuals: it was, however, promptly repressed by the prudence and authority of wiser men. Eusebius observes, that "Pinytus, Bishop of Gnossus, in Crete, was for laying the law of celibacy upon the brethren; but Dionysius, Bishop of Corinth, wrote to him, that he should consider the weakness of men, and not impose that heavy burden upon them." §

In this state affairs continued for three centuries, without any law requiring celibacy of the Clergy at the time of their ordination. The Apostolical Canons consider the hierarchy as married, and as living with their wives.‖ Du Pin, in his account of the ecclesiastical discipline of the first three centuries, affirms, "It was lawful for Priests to keep the wives they married before they were ordained, but marriage was never permitted after ordination; both the one and the other was allowed to Deacons." ¶

8. The decisions of the early Councils on this topic will show the process by which the law of celibacy was established.

In the year 305 the Council of Elvira, in Spain, assembled. This was the first Council which enacted decrees against marriage. The twenty-seventh canon potius religiosa ac Deo dicata mente, adversus omnes judicis minas et contumelias ambo perstantes, securi percussi sunt."—Euseb. Eccles. Hist., lib. viii., cap. ix. Fol. Ed. Reading. Cantab., 1720.]

[* "Demetriani scilicet beatæ memoriæ Episcopi qui ante hunc magna cum laude eandem rexit ecclesiam, filium Domnum; virum omnibus quæ Episcopum decent dotibus exornatum."—Idem, lib. vii., cap. xxx. Fol.]

[† "Rusticus hic fuit, uxorem habens et liberos; sed non ideo in rebus quæ ad Deum spectant inferior."—Sozom. Eccles. Hist., lib. i., cap. xi. Fol. Cantab., 1720.]

[‡ "Huic contra mulier Dei beneficio concessa, non modo adjutrix, (minus enim id laudis et admirationis haberet,) sed et dux et antesignana fuit, nimirum eum vita et sermona ad optima quæque per seipsam ducens; ac cæteris quidem in rebus, ut matrimonii leges ferebant, viro suo parere optimum esse judicans, fidei autem et pietatis magistram quoque se præbere haudquaquam erubescens."—Gregorii Nazianz. Opera, Orat. in Laud. Patris, p. 109. Fol. Antv., 1612.]

§ Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., vol. i., p. 191. Fol. Dublin, 1723.

‖ Idem, p. 363.

[¶ "Osius Papa fuit filius Stephani Subdiaconi. Bonifacius Papa fuit filius Jucundi Presbyteri. Felix Papa filius Felicis Presbyteri de titulo Fasciolæ. Agapitus Papa filius Gordiani Presbyteri. Theodorus Papa filius Theodori Episcopi de civitate Hierosolyma. Silverius Papa filius Silverii Episcopi Romæ. Deusdedit Papa filius Stephani Subdiaconi. Felix enim III., natione Romanus, ex patre Felice Presbytero fuit. Item Gelasius, natione Afer, ex patre Episcopo Valerio natus est. Item Agapitus, natione Romanus, ex Patre Gordiano Presbytero originem duxit. Complures etiam alii inveniuntur, qui de Sacerdotibus nati Apostolicæ Sedi præfuerunt."—Corp. Juris Canonici a Pithœo, tom. i., Decret., pars i., dist. lvi., Damasus, cap. ii. Fol. Paris, 1695.]

[* "Hæc similiave exempla aliud non probant, quam ex matrimonio junctis ad sacerdotium fuisse promotos, quos postea matrimonio usos ostendere debuisset Pearsonius, ut ejus argumentum vim haberet."—Pagi Crit. Hist. Chron., tom. i., A. D. 248, sect. vi., p. 232. Antv., 1727.]

[† "Hos omnes nihil aliud voluisse, quam ex matrimonio junctis ad sacerdotium fuisse promotos, recte adnotat Pamelius, addens, nullibi scriptum reperiri, hos postea matrimonio usos: quod omnis antiquitas semper tradiderat, continentiæ legem sacris illis ordinibus esse adnexam, unde et canon, 'Pudicitiæ custodes etiam ab uxoribus se abstineant.'"—Schelstrate, Eccles. Afric. sub Primat. Carthag., dissert. iii., cap. iv. Paris, 1679.]

‡ Rhemist Annot. on 1 Tim. iii. 2.

[§ "In eodem volumine continetur etiam Epistola ad Gnossios, in qua Pinytum Ecclesiæ illius Episcopum monet, ne grave onus castitatis fratrum cervicibus tanquam necessarium imponat, sed ejus quæ in plerisque hominibus inest infirmitatis rationem habeat."—Euseb. Hist. Eccles., lib. iv., cap. xxiii. Fol. Cantab., 1720.]

[‖ Conc. Labb., tom. i., Canones Apost. vi., xl. Paris, 1671.]

¶ Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., vol. i., p. 590. Fol. Dublin, 1723.

forbids Bishops and Clergymen to have in their houses strange women. The thirty-third prescribes celibacy to Priests and Deacons. The sixty-fifth, which pronounces that cleric to be unworthy of communion who shall retain an adulterous wife, is authentic evidence, that the Clergy of Spain married at that period; so that the law of celibacy was far from being established. The Council of Ancyra, held A. D. 314, ordains concerning Deacons: "If they declared at the time of their ordination that they would marry, they shall not be deprived of their function if they did; but if they were ordained without making this declaration, and afterward married, they should be obliged to quit their ministry." This canon shows that abstinence from marriage was not exacted from any, but such as would willingly profess it; and that it was lawful to marry after entering holy orders.

The Synod of Neo-Cæsarea, held about the same time with that of Ancyra, forbids Presbyters marrying after ordination; yet such as were married before, are allowed to continue without censure, and are obliged to separate from their wives only in case of fornication. "Canon 1. If a Priest marry after he has been ordained, he ought to be degraded; and if he commit fornication or adultery, he ought to be punished more rigorously, and be put under penance.* Canon 8. He cannot be admitted into holy orders, whose wife has been convicted of adultery; and if a Clergyman's wife commit adultery, he ought to divorce her, on pain of being deprived of his ministry."†

The third canon of the Council of Nice, held A. D. 325, forbids all strange women dwelling in the same house with the Ministers of the Church, but not their wives.‡ At this Council, a proposition was made to introduce a canon, "obliging the Clergy to abstain from all association with their wives, whom they had married previous to ordination." Paphnutius, an Egyptian Bishop, who was a celibate, opposed it; saying, "So heavy a burden was not to be laid on the Clergy; that the married state was honourable; that they should not by too great severity bring detriment on the Church; for all men could not bear so severe a law, and the purity of the wives so separated would also be endangered; that conjugal society was chastity; and it was sufficient that such of the Clergy as were unmarried prior to ordination should continue so, according to the ancient tradition of the Church; but it was not proper to separate any man from his wife, to whom he had been married while a layman."§

The statements of Sozomen and Socrates, who narrate this affair, are amply sustained by other historians of great credit.* All that Bellarmine and Valerius say, is, that they dissent from them. This plea is unavailing. Du Pin observes, "Some question the truth of this story: I believe they do it rather for fear lest it might prejudice the present discipline, than from any solid proof they have for it. But these persons should consider that this canon is a matter of discipline, and that the discipline of the Church may change according to the times, and that it is not necessary for the defence of it, to prove that it was always uniform in all places."† There is no doubt but the Council decided in favour of the married Clergy, as historians relate. Hence the practice was different from that of the present Romish hierarchy. The apology of Du Pin, however, would be of weight in behalf of his Church, provided the law of celibacy were not at variance with the word of God, and universally observed. The Council of Gangra, according to Socrates,‡ anathematized Eustathius the heretic, because he taught that men should separate from such Presbyters as retained their wives, whom they married while they were laymen, saying, that their communion and oblations were abominable. The decree is still extant among the canons of that Council, and is in these words: "If any one separate from a married Presbyter, as if it were unlawful to participate of the eucharist when such a one ministers, let him be anathema."§

At the time of this Council, it appears that some, in consequence of the false views entertained concerning the superiority of celibacy to marriage, were led to despise that institution. Hence they censured in the fourteenth canon those who forsook their husbands, professing to detest marriage. The Council, in a kind of pastoral address, have given some excellent advice to the Christians of that day. We select a part which pertains to celibacy and marriage: "We ordain these things, not to exclude those who would, according to the advice of holy Scripture, exercise themselves in the Church by those practices of continence and piety, but against those who use these kinds of austerities for a pretence to satisfy their ambition, who despise those who lead an ordinary life, and who introduce innovations contrary to Scripture and the ecclesiastical laws. We admire virginity when it is accompanied with modesty; we praise abstinence which is joined with piety and prudence. We respect that retirement which is made with humility; but we also honour marriage."‖

The Council of Valence, held A. D. 374, ordain in their first canon, that "those are not to be ordained for the future who have been twice married, or those who have espoused widows, whether they did it before or after their baptism."¶ The first Council of Carthage, held A. D. 348, ordains in its third canon, that "those persons who profess virginity should not cohabit or have any familiarity with persons of the other sex, under the pain of ex-

[* "Presbyter si uxorem duxerit, ordine suo moveatur. Si autem fornicatus fuerit, vel adulterium commiserit, penitus extrudatur, et ad penitentiam deducatur."—Conc. Labb., tom. i., Conc. Neocæsar., can. i., col. 1510, E. Venet., 1728.]

[† "Si alicujus uxor, cum esset laicus, adulterata fuisse convicta fuerit, is non potest ad ministerium accedere. Sin autem etiam post ordinationem adulterata fuerit, debet eam dimittere; quod si cohabitet, non potest sibi commissum ministerium exequi."—Idem, can. viii.]

[‡ "Vetuit omnino magna Synodus, ne liceat Episcopo, nec Presbytero, nec Diacono, nec ulli penitus eorum qui sunt in Clero, introductam habere mulierem, præterquam utique matrem, vel sororem, vel amitam, vel eas solas personas, quæ omnem suspicionem effugiunt."—Idem, tom. ii., Conc. Nicæn., can. iii., col. 34, E.]

[§ "Cumque, hac re in medium proposita, singulorum sententiæ rogarentur, surgens in medio Episcoporum consessu Paphnutius, vehementer vociferatus est non esse imponendum Clericis et Sacerdotibus grave hoc jugum; honorabiles nuptias et torum immaculatum esse dicens; ne ex nimia severitate damnum potius inferrent Ecclesiæ. Neque enim omnes ferre posse tam districtæ continentiæ disciplinam; ac forsitan inde eventurum esse, ut cujusque uxoris castitas minime custodiretur; castitatem autem vocabat congressum viri cum uxore legitima; satis esse, ut qui in Clerum fuissent adscripti, juxta veterem Ecclesiæ traditionem, jam non amplius uxores ducerent; non tamen quemquam sejungendum esse ab ea, quam anteliac tunc, cum esset laicus, legitime duxisset."—Socrat. Hist. Eccles., lib. i., cap. xi. Fol. Cantab., 1720.]

* Gerhard. Loci Theologici, tom. vi., De Minist. Eccles., sect. 344. 4to. Jenæ, 1619.

† Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., vol. i., p. 600. Fol. Dublin, 1723.

‡ Socrat. Hist. Eccles., lib. ii., cap. xliii. Fol. Cantab., 1720.

[§ "Si quis de Presbytero qui uxorem duxit, contendat, non oportere eo sacra celebrante oblationi communicare, sit anathema."—Conc. Labb., tom. ii., Conc. Gangren., can iv., col. 427, C. Venet., 1728.]

‖ Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., tom. i., p. 613. Fol. Dublin, 1723.

[¶ Conc. Labb., tom. ii.; Conc. Valent., can. i., ut supra.

communication for the laity, and of deposition for the Clergy." Thus, it appears, that the practice against which Cyprian inveighs, and which always accompanies restrained celibacy, was considerably prevalent when the Council sat.* Du Pin, after examining the discipline of the fourth century, says, "The Bishops, Priests, and Deacons were obliged to celibacy in the West; which law was not established in the East."† In the year 401 the fifth Synod of Carthage ordained, that "Bishops, Priests, and Deacons should have no association with their wives, under pain of degradation."‡ That of Arles, held about 443, decreed in its second canon, that "no man be made Priest who is married, unless he renounce the privileges of marriage."§

There is considerable diversity both in practice and opinion respecting the marriage of Clergy and their celibacy during the fifth, sixth, and following centuries, as appears from various canons which refer to these topics. The Council of Anjou, A. D. 433, decreed, that "no person should be ordained a Deacon or Priest who hath had more than one wife." The Council of Tours, in 461, canons first and second, recommends a single life to the Bishops, Priests, and Deacons. The third forbids them to dwell with women. The fourth forbids the Clergy who might marry, to marry widows.‖

The Council in Trullo, held A. D. 692, made a difference between Bishops and Presbyters. The twelfth canon binds the Prelates of Africa and Libya to observe the law of celibacy. The thirteenth prohibits the separation of Presbyters, Deacons, or Sub-Deacons, from their wives, or compelling them to continency before they be ordained. The forty-eighth decrees that the wife of him who shall be made Bishop shall be put away, and withdraw into a monastery, some distance from his residence. Thus while the thirteenth canon allows Presbyters, Deacons, and the inferior Clergy to live with their wives after ordination, and rebukes the Church of Rome for inculcating the contrary, the forty-eighth enjoins Prelates to separate from their wives, who are required to enter a monastery. This Synod enjoins celibacy on Bishops, and no others; which is a standing law of the Greek Church to this day. In the Latin hierarchy the alteration was made gradually; in Africa the Diocesans resided with their wives at the time of the Council in Trullo, as appears from the twelfth canon cited above. It is, however, unnecessary to carry this inquiry farther. What has been advanced will show that the married Clergy were permitted to officiate in the first and purest ages of the Church, and that celibacy was no impediment to their ordination, as is pretended by the polemical writers in the Papacy.

9. The holy Scriptures, both of the Old and New Testament, allow the marriage of Clergymen. In the New Testament forbidding to marry is pronounced a doctrine of devils. (1 Tim. iv. 1.) The Apostles were chiefly married, and resided with their wives. So also were those who immediately succeeded. During the time of the Apostles, and in the age immediately following, the doctrine of pagan celibacy infected the Church. Tertullian, Jerome, and Ambrose extravagantly recommended it. Nevertheless, the greater part of the Clergy were married; but the errors of Paganism being embraced by the early heretics and leading characters, the reputation of the celibate advanced in the Church. At the time of the Council of Nice, this heretical doctrine obtained great repute; and in several Synods it was not only highly recommended, but absolutely enjoined, especially on Bishops. From the sixth to the eleventh century there was a continual struggle on this subject. In consequence of the suppression of lawful marriage, concubinage was resorted to as a substitute, which became very general in the Church, notwithstanding the constant repetition of the canons of almost every Council against it, whether General or Provincial. The sons of Priests were considered capable of inheriting, by the laws of France and Castile. Vigorous efforts were made by Dunstan in England, with the assistance of King Edgar, to dispossess the married Canons, if not the married Clergy, of their benefices; but the idea of the lawfulness of marriage made continual progress down to the middle of the eleventh century. Leo IX., who was elected A. D. 1048, commenced the difficult work of enforcing celibacy among the hierarchy. His successors never lost sight of this example. The laity took part against the married Priests, who were either reduced to infamy and want, or obliged to renounce their dearest connexions.

Gregory VII. did his utmost to enforce this novel doctrine. In the year 1074, in a Synod held in Rome, it was enacted, that no Priest should henceforth marry, and such as had either wives or concubines should relinquish either them or the sacred office. Many of the married Ecclesiastics were pious and upright men, whom Gregory ought to have spared. But there were others, in all parts of Europe, who kept mistresses under the name of wives, whom they dismissed at pleasure, substituting other prostitutes, and often a plurality of them, in their place. When the Decree of Gregory was promulgated, horrible tumults were raised by those Priests who had wives or concubines. The history of those times is crowded with details of such commotions by Priests who strove to retain their companions. The Clergy in the Italian provinces of Milan were willing to relinquish the priesthood rather than renounce them. Accordingly, they seceded from the Church, and branded the Pope and his adherents with the name of Paterini, that is, Manichæans, or "heretics." The German Clergy were excited to tumult. They declared "they would rather lose the priesthood than separate from their wives. Let him who despises men see where he can procure angels for the churches." The tumults were similar in almost every part of the Continent.*

[* "Nullus igitur nullaque sanctimoniæ et virginitati deserviens propter blasphemiam Ecclesiæ, si vobis placet, in una domo cum extraneis penitus commorari debent. Universi dixerunt: Qui nolunt nubere, et pudicitiæ meliorem eligunt partem, hæc vitare debent. Et non solum non habitare simul, sed nec habere ad se aliquem accessum. Hoc ergo et lex jubet, et sanctitas vestra commendat, ut in singulis Conciliis statutum est. Gratus Episcopus dixit: Ergo persuasio interdum prudentes solet arcere a peccatis, dum imprudentes debet metus hujuscemodi constringere, si sanum Concilium respuunt, et salutare mandatum. Si ergo laici sunt, post commonitionem, si contempserint, a communione separentur. Si Clerici sunt, honore priventur. Universi dixerunt: Placet."—Conc. Labb., tom. ii.; Conc. Carth. I., can. iii., col. 748, E. Venet., 1728.]

† Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., tom. i., p. 629. Fol. Dublin, 1723.

[‡ "Præterea cum de quorumdam Clericorum, quamvis erga uxores proprias, incontinentia referretur, placuit Episcopos et Presbyteros et Diaconos, secundum propria statuta, etiam ab uxoribus continere. Quod nisi fecerint, ab ecclesiastico removeantur officio. Ceteros autem Clericos ab hoc non cogi, sed secundum uniuscujusque Ecclesiæ consuetudinem observari debere."—Conc. Labb., tom. ii.; Conc. Carth. V., cap. iii., col. 1455, A. Venet., 1728.]

[§ "Assumi aliquem ad sacerdotium non posse in conjugii vinculo constitutum, nisi fuerit præmissa conversio."—Idem, tom. v.; Conc. Arlet. II., can. ii., col. 3, B.]

[‖ Conc. Labb., tom. v.; Conc. Turon., can. i.—iv., col. 74, et seq.]

* See the authorities cited by Mosheim, Ecclesiastical History book iii., cent. xi., part ii., cap. ii., sect. 13; Murdock's Translation

CHAPTER III.

CELIBACY CONCLUDED.

I. Of Monks and Nuns. 1. Different kinds: 2. The vow of poverty. Their riches. Rules precluding personal property: 3. Vow of obedience. Their servility: 4. The secluded life inconsistent with religion: 5. Their doctrine of merit fallacious.—II. The Tyranny of the Church of Rome over the Monks and Nuns. 1. St. Paul's rule for widows contrary to the practice of the Papacy: 2. Erasmus: 3. Fourth Council of Toledo, held A.D. 634, cited: 4. Council of Trent cited: 5. Particulars embraced in the decisions of that Council. Trial and punishment of eloped Nuns: 6. Rules for confining or imprisoning them: 7. Their practice on this point: 8. The history of religious oppression in the Church of Rome ill understood.—III. Their vow of celibacy has produced licentiousness among Monks and Nuns from its origin till now. 1. They were licentious in the ancient church: 2. And at the time of the Reformation. English monasteries: 3. No radical change, except greater secrecy, has taken place since. Scipio de Ricci's testimony.—IV. General Survey. 1. The moral character of celibates in general: 2. Learning of Monks: 3. Picture of convents by the Rev. Joseph Blanco White: 4. Reference to a more particular examination of the subject.

I. We proceed to consider the other classes of celibates in the Church of Rome; namely, the Monks and Nuns.

1. Monks, in Latin called Monachi, from the Greek word μονος, "alone," were such as lived solitarily. At first there were three descriptions of this class. Some were called Eremites, from ερημος, "a desert," because they lived in woods or deserts by themselves. Others were designated Anchorites; that is, "separate, or set apart, from men, and living alone." They generally resided in cells and caves. The third kind were called Cœnobites, from κοινος, "common," and βιος, "life," who dwelt in companies or colleges by themselves, and had all things common. These are the Monks of the present day. The variety of sects is almost innumerable; such as Franciscans, Dominicans, Benedictines, Jesuits, Friars, Carthusians, &c. Females who enter into vows of celibacy are called "Nuns." Of these also there are numerous companies. The vows of all are poverty, obedience, and continence; but the Jesuits add that of unlimited obedience to the Pope.

2. With regard to the vow of poverty, it may be said, that, however well it was observed by the early celibates and by a few individuals, it has for a long time existed only in name. Convents of Monks and Nuns have succeeded in becoming immensely rich communities. In England they laid hold of the greater part of the riches of the kingdom. Their possessions were so great, that the monopoly became the occasion to enact laws preventing the increase of their wealth, or depriving them of their ill-gotten pelf. In Cincinnati, the Jesuits have purchased possessions to the amount of between fifty and sixty thousand dollars. When such a sum was paid for real property, what must be the amount of money employed in other respects! Colleges are built and endowed by them, schools are erected and supported, and vast sums expended for various proselyting purposes. For such people to vow poverty is hypocrisy, when it increases rather than diminishes their riches. It is, however, pleaded, that the engagement only implies, that they relinquish all personal property, and all they possess is thrown into the common stock for the benefit of the community. Be it so. Then we assert that poverty is abandoned, and durable riches are acquired. In such a community, all become rich, none are poor.

The following regulations concerning those who hold private property, and profess to bequeath it to others, are recognised in the Papacy:—"Regulars of either sex cannot in any thing, either by licence, or by dispensation of the Superior, have any private property. Nay, such a licence, though it may be obtained from the Generals of the Orders themselves, who profess that they can concede it, cannot excuse the Monks or Nuns from the fault and sin imposed by the Council of Trent." * "A Regular who is found in the article of death to have any wealth, ought to have it buried with him in the earth without the monastery, in a dunghill, as a sign of his perdition and eternal damnation, because he died in mortal sin." † "No Regulars, whether superiors or inferiors, can make a will; and the reason is, that on account of the vows of obedience and poverty, they deprive themselves of all liberty and property, so that they can no more have any power to choose or refuse (nec velle, nec nolle) by which they could dispose of it." ‡ "Nay, it is not permitted to professed Regulars to modify, by way of declaration, the testament that was made by them before their profession." §

How admirably the above rules are adapted to seize upon the property of unsuspecting individuals, and to transfer it to some rich fraternity! Merchants, because they have property in a Company, for the purpose of enriching themselves, may as well be said to be poor, as these associations of Monks and Nuns, who abound in wealth to such a degree, that every individual is placed beyond the reach of poverty.

3. By the vow of obedience, Monks and Nuns are bound to obey their Governor, and to follow his injunctions. The Franciscans follow the rule of St. Francis, who, instead of a girdle, wore a cord, went barefoot in winter, and practised various austerities. Such obedience, they affirm, is acceptable to God, and meritorious. It has, however, no support from Scripture, but is opposed to it. "Ye are bought with a price; be not ye the servants" (or slaves) "of men." (1 Cor. vii. 23.) Nothing is more servile than the Monkish orders. They have no will of their own. This is a fundamental principle. Hence they are bound to submit, without any resistance, to all the dictates of their Superiors, who must be subject to the General of the Order; and all are required to manifest abject obedience to the will of the Pope. Thus the monastic orders, of every name and sect, are the slaves of the Bishop of Rome; who magis-

vol. ii., p. 166; Hallam's View of the State of Europe, during the Middle Ages, vol. ii., p. 248, et seq. Sixth edition. London, 1834; Chemnicii Exam. Conc. Trid., tom. iii., p. 112.

[* "Regulares utriusque sexus nequeunt in particulari, neque de licentia ac dispensatione Superioris, habere peculium, seu aliquid proprium. Immo, talis licentia, etiamsi obtenta ab eorum Generalibus, qui dicerent eam posse concedere, non excusaret Fratres aut Moniales a culpa et pœna a Tridentino imposita."—Ferraris, Biblioth. Prompt., Regulares, art i., sect. xv.]

[† "Regularis deprehensus in morte habere aliquam proprietatem debet cum ipsa subterrari extra monasterium in sterquilinio, in signum suæ perditionis et damnationis æternæ, quia in peccato mortali decessit."—Idem, sect. xvi.]

[‡ "Regulares omnes professi, tam superiores quam subditi, nequeunt condere testamentum. Et ratio clara est, quia ob votum obedientiæ et paupertatis omni libertate et proprietate se privant, ita ut nec velle, nec nolle, nec quidquam proprium de quo disponere possint, amplius habeant."—Idem, sect. lxii.]

[§ "Quinimo Regularibus professis neque licet testamentum a se conditum ante emissam professionem moderari per viam declarationis."—Idem, sect. lxvi.]

terially, and with infallible decision, sends his orders to the Generals; these to the Superiors, the Abbesses and Abbots; and these again to their crouching vassals. Innumerable proofs of the low degradation and the unchristian servility of Monks and Nuns might be adduced.

4. The secluded life of the monastic orders is inconsistent with the character of true piety. Christianity is an active religion, and adapted only to the vigorous scenes of real life. Christians are "the salt of the earth," to preserve it from corruption, and to heal its moral maladies. They are "the light of the world," not to be put under a bushel, but in a candlestick, to be exhibited, that all may be guided by its direction. We are to "consider one another, to provoke unto love and to good works; not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is; but exhorting one another." (Heb. x. 24, 25.) Here the Apostle evidently speaks against those who shun society, because they fail in the duties of charity. Our Saviour did not pray that his disciples should be taken out of the world, but that they might "be kept from the evil." (John xvii. 15.)

5. This branch of the Roman system furnishes an apt illustration of the effects of its published opinions on human merit. The miserable ascetic who retires from the world, and denies himself the lawful gratifications of life, vainly imagines that by so doing he becomes more worthy of the divine regard. All this is spurious sanctity, and the hopes which it engenders are false and baseless. Though occasionally a truly religious Monk or Nun may be found, the majority must be classed with the sentimental, the superstitious, the infidel, and the profligate.

II. The Church of Rome exercises great and detestable tyranny toward persons of both sexes who are bound by religious vows.

1. St. Paul lamented that young widows, after devoting themselves to the service of the church, and living at the expense of her members, grew disorderly, and married, incurring blame from the enemies of Christianity. Against this evil he provided a rational remedy; namely, that none should be received under the age of sixty. The Church of Rome allures boys and girls of sixteen to bind themselves with perpetual vows. Females are confined in prisons, because certain frailties cannot be concealed. The others are let loose upon the people, anticipating that superstitious reverence will close the eyes of the public on their misconduct.

2. On this cruel, antiscriptural, and barbarous usage, Erasmus justly, although indignantly, observed: "Christian clemency has, for the most part, abolished the servitude of the ancients, leaving but vestiges of it in a few countries. But under the cloak of religion a new kind of slavery has been invented, which now prevails in a multitude of monasteries. Nothing there is lawful but what is commanded; whatever may accrue to the professed, becomes the property of the community; if you stir a foot, you are brought back as if flying after murdering your father and mother." We inquire, How is this tyranny authoritatively established, enforced, and practised by the Church of Rome?

3. At an early period the will of a parent could bind a child for ever to the monastic life. The fourth Council of Toledo, held A. D. 634, decrees, "A Monk is made by paternal devotion, or personal profession. Whatever is bound in this manner, will hold fast. We therefore close, with regard to these, all access to the world, and forbid all return to a secular life." *

By the more modern discipline of the Papal hierarchy, this practice has been abolished; but there is little difference in allowing boys and girls of sixteen to bind themselves with perpetual vows, and devoting themselves irrevocably to the cloister from the cradle. The Church, in her present regulations, only adds the artifice of seduction to the unfeelingness of cruelty. This will appear from the authoritative decision of the Council of Trent, which enjoins all Bishops to enforce the close confinement of Nuns by every means, and even to engage the assistance of the secular arm for that purpose; it entreats all Princes to protect the enclosures of the convents, and threatens instant excommunication to those civil Magistrates who withhold their aid when the Bishops require it.

4. After the reader shall have perused the ninth canon of the Council of Trent on marriage,† he will be prepared to consider the decisions of that assembly in the fifth and nineteenth chapters of the twenty-fifth session. "The holy Synod, renewing the constitution of Boniface VIII., which begins Periculoso, commands to all Bishops, under the obtestation of divine judgment, and the threat of eternal malediction, that the Ordinaries in all monasteries subject to them, but in others, by the authority of the Apostolical Seat, should enforce that the confinement of Nuns, where it has been violated, should be diligently restored; where it is inviolate, that it should be carefully preserved; and that they would subdue the disobedient and those who contradict, by ecclesiastical censures and other punishments, in any decisive manner whatever, and call in the aid of the secular arm for this purpose, if necessary. And the holy Synod exhorts all Christian Princes to furnish aid, and enjoins it under pain of excommunication, to be incurred ipso facto, upon all secular Magistrates. Let no professed Nun come out of her monastery, under any pretence whatever, not even for a moment."‡ The Council further decrees: "If any of the Regulars pretend that fear or force compelled them to enter the cloister, or that the profession took place before the appointed age, or the like, and wishes to renounce the habit for any cause, or to go away with the habit without the licence of the Superiors, let them not be heard, except within five years of their profession; and then they shall not bring the case before any except their own Superior and the Ordinary. But if they put off the frock of their own accord, no allegation of such shall be heard; but being compelled to return to their convents, they must be punished as apostates, being in the mean time deprived of all the privileges of their order." *

* "Monachum aut paterna devotio, aut propria professio facit. Quicquid horum fuerit alligatum tenebit. Proinde his ad mundum reverti, intercludimus aditum, et omnem ad sæculum interdicimus regressum."—Conc. Labb., tom. vi., Conc. Tolet. IV., can. xlix., col. 1463, D. Venet., 1728.

[† Vide supra, p. 715.]

‡ "Bonifacii octavi constitutionem, quæ incipit, 'Periculoso,' renovans sancta Synodus, universis Episcopis, sub obtestatione divini judicii, et interminatione maledictionis æternæ, præcipit ut in omnibus monasteriis sibi subjectis, ordinaria, in aliis vero, Sedis Apostolicæ auctoritate, clausuram sanctimonialium, ubi violata fuerit, diligenter restitui, et ubi inviolata est, conservari maxime, procurent; inobedientes atque contradictores per censuras ecclesiasticas, aliasque pœnas, quacumque appellatione postposita, compescentes, invocato etiam ad hoc, si opus fuerit, auxilio brachii sæcularis. Quod auxilium ut præbeatur, omnes Christianos Principes hortatur sancta Synodus, et sub pœna excommunicationis, ipso facto incurrenda, omnibus Magistratibus sæcularibus injungit. Nemini autem sanctimonialium liceat post professionem exire a monasterio etiam ad breve tempus quocumque prætextu."—Concil. Trident., sess. xxv., cap. v. Fol. Romæ, 1564.

5. The following particulars, embraced in the foregoing decisions of the Council of Trent, respecting the escape of Nuns, their trial and punishment, the duties of their Superiors, the secular authority, &c., are worthy of attention :—

First. No Nun can leave the convent, on any pretence whatsoever, not even for a moment; though they were compelled by fear, force, or while children, to enter that place. Secondly. Their trial must be before the Superior, or the Bishop, if they leave within five years of their profession. But if they renounce it voluntarily as such, they are compelled to return to the convent without a hearing. Thirdly. Their punishment consists: (1.) Of ecclesiastical censures, such as penance, refusal of absolution, of sacraments, excommunication, &c. (2.) Other punishments of any kind, whether imprisonment, tortures, as the tortures of the Inquisition, or death, in the most hideous forms. The Council enjoins such punishments as apostates from the Roman Church are visited with.

"The punishments of apostasy from religion, (monasticism,) or from a religious state, by common law, are the following:—The first is excommunication, which is incurred ipso facto, if the apostasy is accompanied with the relinquishment of the monastic habit.

"The second punishment is suspension, during his apostasy, from the sacred orders which the apostate has received. And if he celebrate mass during his suspension, or exercise other functions of his order, he is irregular. And although none but the Pope, by common law, can absolve him from this irregularity; yet by special law, or by special privilege, all monastic Prelates can dispense with this in reference to their subjects.

"The third punishment is, that, during his apostasy, the monastic delinquent stands deprived of the privileges of his order.

"But besides these punishments, established by common law, there are others, such as privation of his suffrage or vote, both active and passive, in the Consistory, imprisonment, whipping, fasting, and the like, which are differently inflicted by each monastic body, in reference to their own apostates; so that each order may consult the proper and particular constitutions of their body, in almost all of which excommunication, ipso facto, is incurred by apostates and fugitives, whether the apostasy, or flight, be with or without the habit. And those also, ipso facto, incur excommunication, who receive, retain, or hide apostates, or fugitives, or afford them either counsel or help for their flight, or apostasy, as appears from many Papal constitutions." †

Fourthly. It is made the duty of Bishops and the superiors of convents to compel and subdue refugees in any manner.

Fifthly. If excommunication, suspension, deprivation of the privileges of their order, imprisonment, whipping, fasting, and the like, or any other kind of punishment or torture which superiors see fit to inflict; if the excommunication of those who receive, retain, or hide apostates or fugitives, or of those who afford them counsel or advice, do not secure the culprit Nuns; then the strong arm of the civil power is resorted to, and all Princes and Magistrates, who do not lend their assistance in delivering up these fugitive Nuns or Monks, are excommunicated ipso facto.

6. The above are regulations, established by the infallible decrees of the Council of Trent, repeated and enforced by Pontiffs, and practised in innumerable instances; specimens of which we shall adduce. In the mean time, however, we shall quote a few more of their regulations on the confinement of Nuns, that the reader may have the statement in their own words, supported by the supreme authorities of their Church.

"Confinement before the time of Boniface VIII. was only advisory, though it was much commended.—Boniface VIII., A. D. 1294, first by formal and absolute precept enjoined confinement on Nuns.—Hence, now, all professed Nuns of every description are bound to confinement.—Nuns, who rashly leave the enclosure of their monastery, besides other grievous punishments, incur, ipso facto, the greater excommunication reserved to the Pope.—The Nun incurs the greater excommunication and the other punishments, who goes beyond the door of the enclosure with both her feet, or with one or both of her hands.—The Nun who ascends on the roof violates the enclosure, and incurs the aforesaid punishments." *

7. On the practical results of these unchristian regulations, we refer to the Rev. Joseph Blanco White; who observes, "How strictly these laws are preserved in vigour by the proud tyranny of the Church of Rome, and the blind subserviency of every government and people who acknowledge her, I will instance in two cases. The first I have on the authority of Don Andres Bello, Secretary to the Columbian Legation in this country: a gentleman whose great worth, talents, and learning, I have had

* "Quicumque Regularis prætendat se per vim et metum ingressum esse religionem, aut etiam dicat ante ætatem debitam professum fuisse, aut quid simile, velitque habitum dimittere, quacumque de causa, aut etiam cum habitu discedere sine licentia superiorum, non audiatur, nisi intra quinquennium tantum a die professionis, et tunc non aliter nisi causas quas prætenderit deduxerit coram Superiore suo et Ordinario. Quod si ante habitum sponte dimiserit, nullatenus ad allegandum quamcumque causam admittatur; sed ad monasterium redire cogatur, et tamquam apostata puniatur; interim vero nullo privilegio suæ religionis juvetur."—Concil. Trident., sess. xxv., cap. xix. Eol. Romæ, 1564.

† "Pœnæ apostasiæ a religione, seu statu religioso, de jure communi sunt sequentes. Prima est excommunicatio, quæ ipso facto incurritur, si fiat apostasia cum dimissione habitus. Secunda pœna est suspensio ab ordinibus sacris, quos apostata suscepit, durante apostasia. Et si durante suspensione celebret, vel alios ordines exerceat, fit irregularis. A qua irregularitate licet de jure communi non possit dispensare nisi Papa, ut clare innuunt dicti duo canones, Cum æterni, et, Cum medicinalis, de jure tamen particulari per privilegia possunt ab ipsa dispensare cum suis subditis omnes Prælati regulares, ut patet ex concessione Sixti IV. Tertia pœna est, quod durante apostasia regularis apostata existat privatus privilegiis suæ religionis. Præter autem has pœnas a jure communi statutas, sunt etiam aliæ, ut privatio vocis activæ et passivæ, carceris, flagellationis, jejunii, et hujusmodi, quæ diversimode a qualibet religione in particulari pro suis apostatis sunt impositæ, et ideo circa istas potest quisque consulere proprias et particulares suæ religionis constitutiones, in quibus fere omnibus est imposita excommunicatio, ipso facto, incurrenda ab apostatis et fugitivis, sive habitu retento, sive dimisso, fiat apostasia aut fuga. Apostatas et fugitivos recipientes, retinentes, vel occultantes, aut eis pro fuga et apostasia consilium aut auxilium præstantes, peccant mortaliter, et ipso facto excommunicationem incurrunt, ut patet ex pluribus constitutionibus Pontificiis."—Ferraris, Biblioth. Prompt., Apostasia, sect. 49—56.

[* "Clausura ante tempora Bonifacii VIII. fuit solum sub consilio; quamvis enim fuerit multum commendata.—Primo enim sub formali et absoluto præcepto clausuram Monialibus indixit Bonifacius VIII.—Unde ad clausuram tenentur nunc Moniales omnes professæ cujuscumque regulæ, ordinis, et nominis, etiam tertiariæ in congregatione viventes, et tria vota essentialia emittentes.—Moniales temere egredientes e clausura sui Monasterii, ultra alias gravissimas pœnas, incurrunt, ipso facto, excommunicationem majorem reservatam Papæ.—Excommunicationem et alias dictas pœnas incurrit Monialis, quæ ambobus pedibus exit ostium clausuræ una vel altera palma.—Monialis ascendens supra tectum violat clausuram, et incurrit dictas pœnas."—Idem, Moniales, art. iii., sect. i.—xi.]

many an opportunity to know and admire, during an acquaintance of nearly fifteen years. The second is one of the many cases which I can attest from my personal knowledge.

"The desertion of Monks, according to the information which my friend Mr. Bello has given me on this point, has been at all times frequent in the territories of Spanish America. Their general conduct, I have been assured by every one acquainted with that country, is openly and outrageously profligate. One of the unfortunate slaves of Rome, 'a man who,' to use my friend's own expression, 'having been his own instructer, lived miserable because his mind was far above all that surrounded him,' took the determination of absconding from his cowled masters, and seeking for liberty in exile. His real name was Father Christoval de Quesada, a native of Cumana, and Friar of the Order of Mercy. Under the assumed designation of Don Carlos de Sucre, he travelled in different countries of Europe, and was every where admired for his accomplishments and agreeable manners. The love of his country betrayed him, at length, into the rash step of venturing back; yet at a sufficient distance from his native town to imagine himself safe from detection. His abilities recommended him to the Archbishop of Caraccas, who made him his Secretary. Some years had elapsed, when a person, having desired to speak privately to the supposed Sucre, showed him that he was in possession of his secret; but engaged to keep it, probably in consideration of some pecuniary reward. The unfortunate runaway knew too well the nature of his circumstances and danger; and only thought of surrendering on the most favourable conditions. He disclosed his case to the Archbishop, who engaged the head of the Order of Mercy to receive the unfortunate Father Christoval, without inflicting any punishment for his flight. 'It was in these circumstances,' says my friend, in an interesting letter to me, 'that he taught me Latin, a language which he possessed in perfection. He was a man of uncommon good-nature; plain and unaffected in his manners, and rather slovenly in his dress. To classical knowledge he added that of mathematics, and a considerable taste for Spanish poetry. His sermons were excellent whenever he took the pains to write them, which was seldom the case. He voluntarily took charge of the library of the convent; which he enriched with many excellent works, unknown till then in my town. He also devoted part of his time to the garden of the convent, which had hitherto been allowed to be overrun with weeds. Part of the ground he allotted to a numerous breed of ducks, fowls, and other domestic animals; but from this he was obliged to desist, for the Friars, whose siesta was disturbed by the cackling, contrived to poison their brother's favourites.'

"'Such,' he concludes, 'is the history of Father Quesada, who gave to his return to the convent the appearance of a voluntary act, and donned his frock with the best good humour in the world; well aware that in his circumstances anything else would have been most imprudent. I have heard in South America a thousand other cases of runaway Friars, who have been forced back to their convents; but I am not in possession of the individual circumstances.'

"A strong mind, and a natural good temper, divested the preceding instance of the horrors which generally attend the capture of the spiritual slaves who seek liberty by flight. That which I am about to relate is of a much more melancholy cast. I have laid it already before the public, in Doblado's Letters from Spain; but though that work contains no other fiction but a few changes of names, I deem it necessary to record, with all the solemnity of history, the fate of the unfortunate Nun whom I there introduced to my readers.

"The eldest daughter of a family, intimately acquainted with mine, was brought up in the convent of St. Agnes at Seville, under the care of her mother's sister, the Abbess of that female community. The circumstances of the whole transaction were so public at Seville, and the subsequent judicial proceedings have given them such notoriety, that I do not feel bound to conceal names. Maria Francisca Barreiro, the unfortunate subject of this account, grew up a lively and interesting girl, in the convent; while a younger sister enjoyed the advantages of an education at home. The mother formed an early design of devoting her eldest daughter to religion, in order to give to her less attractive favourite a better chance of getting a husband. The distant and harsh manner with which she constantly treated Maria Francisca, attached the unhappy girl to her aunt by the ties of the most ardent affection. The time, however, arrived when it was necessary that she should either leave her, and endure the consequences of her mother's aversion at home, or take the vows, and thus close the gates of the convent upon herself for ever. She preferred the latter course; and came out to pay the last visit to her friends. I met her, almost daily, at the house of one of her relations; where her words and manner soon convinced me that she was a victim of her mother's designing and unfeeling disposition. The father was an excellent man, though timid and undecided. He feared his wife, and was in awe of the Monks; who, as usual, were extremely anxious to increase the number of their female prisoners. Though I was aware of the danger which a man incurs in Spain, who tries to dissuade a young woman from being a Nun, humanity impelled me to speak seriously to the father, entreating him not to expose a beloved child to spend her life in hopeless regret for lost liberty. He was greatly moved by my reasons; but the impression I made was soon obliterated. The day for Maria Francisca's taking the veil was at length fixed; and though I had a most pressing invitation to be present at the ceremony, I determined not to see the wretched victim at the altar. On the preceding day I was called from my stall at the Royal Chapel to the confessional. A lady, quite covered by her black veil, was kneeling at the grate through which females speak to the Confessor. As soon as I took my seat, the well-known voice of Maria Francisca made me start with surprise. Bathed in tears, and scarcely able to speak without betraying her state to the people who knelt near the confessional box, by the sobs which interrupted her words, she told me she wished only to unburden her heart to me, before she shut up herself for life. Assistance, she assured me, she would not receive; for rather than live with her mother, and endure the obloquy to which her swerving from her announced determination would expose her, she would risk the salvation of her soul. All my remonstrances were in vain. I offered to obtain the protection of the Archbishop, and thereby to extricate her from the difficulties in which she was involved. She declined my offer, and appeared as resolute as she was wretched. The next morning she took the veil; and professed at the end of the following year. Her good aunt died soon after; and the Nuns, who had allured her into the convent by their caresses, when they perceived that she was not able to disguise her misery, and fearing that the existence of a reluctant Nun might by her means transpire, became her daily tormentors.

"After an absence of three years from Seville, I found that Maria Francisca had openly declared her aversion to a state, from which nothing but death could save her. She often changed her Confessors, expecting comfort from their advice. At last she found a friend in one of the companions of my youth: a man whose benevolence surpasses even the bright genius with which nature has gifted him; though neither has been able to exempt him from the evils to which Spaniards seem to be fated in proportion to their worth. He became her Confessor, and in that capacity spoke to her daily. But what could he do against the inflexible tyranny in whose grasp she languished?

"About this time the approach of Napoleon's army threw the town into a general consternation, and the convents were opened to such of the Nuns as wished to fly. Maria Francisca, whose parents were absent, put herself under the protection of a young Prebendary of the cathedral, and by this means reached Cadiz, where I saw her on my way to England. I shall never forget the anguish with which, after a long conversation, wherein she disclosed to me the whole extent of her wretchedness, she exclaimed, 'There is no hope for me,' and fell into convulsions.

"The liberty of Spain from the French invaders was the signal for the fresh confinement of this helpless young woman to her former prison. Here she attempted to put an end to her sufferings, by throwing herself into a deep well; but was taken out alive. Her mother was now dead, and her friends instituted a suit of 'nullity of profession' before the Ecclesiastical Court. But the laws of the Council of Trent were positive; and she was cast in the trial. Her despair, however, exhausted the little strength which her protracted sufferings had left her; and the unhappy Maria Francisca died soon after, having scarcely reached her twenty-fifth year."*

8. The history of religious oppression in the Church of Rome is far from being known. She will sacrifice all to display her spiritual dominion. Nothing, however, is more difficult than to collect the evidence of individual suffering produced by her tyranny. Sufficient transpires in the monasteries of both sexes to form an estimate of the misery that exists. But despair and shame silence the sighs of their female inmates. Nevertheless, a knowledge of human nature, a moderate share of candour, and the consideration of the laws which govern these houses, point to the wretchedness which such engagements have produced.

III. The vow of celibacy among Monks and Nuns has produced licentiousness from its origin until now. Of this there are innumerable and undeniable proofs.

1. In the ancient church the result of celibacy was the corruption of morals. We refer to the testimonies of Cyprian, Chrysostom, and Bernard. These evidences might be extended greatly. It could also be shown that the monastic institutions, from their origin to the Reformation, were constantly relapsing into unrestrained licentiousness, notwithstanding all the iron and cruel laws which were invented to preserve purity. A volume would not contain the records. A survey of the canons of Councils, and the restraints of pious men, as well as the occasional outbreakings of depraved morals in the cloisters, prove incontestably, that the private or concealed wickedness of the inmates was fearfully great.

2. At the time of the Reformation in Great Britain, the enormities of monasteries were so intolerable, that they became public nuisances. In the year 1535, Henry VIII. ordered the religious houses in England to be visited by Commissioners appointed for that purpose. The instructions contained eighty-six articles, referring to the points concerning which inquiry should be made. Among other questions, we find the following:—"Whether any men conversed with the sisters alone, without the Abbess's leave? Whether any sister were forced to profess, either by her kindred or by the Abbess? What employment they had out of the times of the divine service? What familiarity they had with religious men? Whether they wrote love-letters? or sent and received tokens or presents?"*

It is uncertain by whom the Monkish institution was first introduced into this country. The Monks were numerous, and in subjection to their diocesans, according to the canons of the Council of Chalcedon. When the Danes made a descent upon England, they robbed and destroyed the monasteries. King Edgar, a dissolute and wicked Prince, founded forty-seven. In process of time, nearly all became independent of the ecclesiastical and civil authorities, and were subject solely to the Pope. The historian Burnet draws from original documents a correct account of these religious houses in England:—

"The abbeys being exempted from all jurisdiction, both civil and spiritual, and from all impositions, and having generally the privilege of sanctuary for all that fled to them, were at ease, and accountable to none; so they might do what they pleased. They found also means to enrich themselves, first, by the belief of purgatory. For they persuaded all people, that the souls departed went generally thither; few were so holy as to go straight to heaven, and few so bad as to be cast to hell. Then people were made believe, that the saying of masses for their souls gave them great relief in torments, and did at length deliver them out of them. This being generally received, it was thought by all a piece of piety to their parents, and of necessary care for themselves and their families, to give some part of their estates towards the enriching of these houses, for having a mass said every day for the souls of their ancestors, and for their own, after their death. And this did so spread, that if some laws had not restrained their profuseness, the greater part of all the estates in England had been given to those houses. But the statutes of Mortmain were not very effectual restraints; for what King soever had refused to grant a Mortmain, was sure to have an uneasy reign ever after.

"Yet this did not satisfy the Monks, but they fell upon other contrivances to get the best of all men's jewels, plate, and furniture. For they persuaded them that the protection and intercession of saints were of mighty use to them; so that whatsoever respect they put on the shrines and images, but chiefly on the relics, of saints, they would find their account in it, and the saints would take it kindly at their hands, and intercede the more earnestly for them. And people who saw courtiers much wrought on by presents, imagined the saints were of the same temper; only with this difference, that courtiers love to have presents put in their own hands, but the saints were satisfied if they were given to others. And as in the courts of Princes the new favourite commonly had greatest credit, so every new saint was believed to have a greater force in his addresses; and therefore everybody was to run to their shrines, and make great presents to them. This being infused into the credulous multitude, they brought the richest things they had to the places where the bodies or relics of these saints were laid. Some images were also believed to have a peculiar excellence in them; and pilgrimages and presents to these were much magnified. But, to quicken all this, the Monks found the means, either by dreams and visions, or strange miraculous stories, to feed the devotion of the people. Relics without number were everywhere discovered; and most wonderful relations of the martyrdom and other miracles of the saints were made and read in all places to the people; and new improvements were daily made in a trade, that, through the craft of the Monks and the simplicity of the people, brought in great advantages. And though there was enough got to enrich them all, yet there was strange rivalling, not only among the several orders, but the houses of the same order. The Monks, especially of Glastonbury, St. Alban's, and St. Edmondsbury, vied one with another who could tell the most extravagant stories for the honour of their house, and of the relics in it.

* Practical and Internal Evidence against Catholicism. By the Rev. J. B. White. Pp. 283—288. Second Edition. 8vo. London, 1826.

* Burnet's History of the Reformation, vol. i., p. 242. 12mo London, 1825.

"The Monks in these houses, abounding in wealth, and living at ease and in idleness, did so degenerate, that, from the twelfth century downward, their reputation abated much; and the privileges of sanctuaries were a general grievance, and oft complained of in Parliaments: for they received all that fled to them, which put a great stop to justice, and did encourage the most criminal offenders. They became lewd and dissolute, and so impudent in it, that some of their farms were let for bringing in a yearly tribute to their lusts: nor did they keep hospitality and relieve the poor; but rather encouraged vagabonds and beggars, against whom laws were made, both in Edward III., King Henry VII., and this King's reign.

"But from the twelfth century the orders of begging Friars were set up; and they, by the appearance of severity and mortification, gained great esteem. At first they would have nothing, no real estates, but the ground on which their house stood. But afterwards distinctions were found for satisfying their consciences in larger possessions. They were not so idle and lazy as the Monks, but went about and preached, and heard confessions, and carried about indulgences, with many other pretty little things, Agnus Deis, rosaries, and pebbles; which they made the world believe had great virtue in them. And they had the esteem of the people wholly engrossed to themselves. They were also more formidable to Princes than the Monks, because they were poor, and, by consequence, more hardy and bold. There was also a firmer union of their whole order, they having a General at Rome, and being divided into many provinces, subject to their Provincials. They had likewise the school-learning wholly in their hands, and were great Preachers; so that many things concurred to raise their esteem with the people very high; yet great complaints lay against them, for they went more abroad than the Monks did, and were believed guilty of corrupting families. The scandals that went on them, upon their relaxing the primitive strictness of their orders, were a little rectified by some reformation of these orders. But that lasted not long; for they became liable to much censure, and many visitations had been made but to little purpose. This concurring with their secret practices against the King, both in the matter of his divorce and supremacy, made him more willing to examine the truth of these reports; that if they were found guilty of such scandals, they might lose their credit with the people, and occasions be ministered to the King, to justify the suppression of them.

"But now I come to consider how the Visiters carried on their visitations. Many severe things are said of their proceedings; nor is it any wonder that men who had traded so long in lies, as the Monks had done, should load those whom they esteemed the instruments of their ruin with many calumnies. By their letters to Cromwell, it appears, that in most houses they found monstrous disorders. That many fell down on their knees and prayed they might be discharged, since they had been forced to make vows against their wills: with these the Visiters dispensed, and set them at liberty. They found great factions in the houses, and barbarous cruelties exercised by one faction against another, as either of them prevailed. In many places, when they gave them the King's Injunctions, many cried out, that the severity of them was intolerable, and they desired rather to be suppressed than so reformed. They were all extremely addicted to idolatry and superstition. In some they found the instruments and other tools for multiplying and coining.

"But for the lewdness of the Confessors of nunneries, and the great corruption of that state, whole houses being found almost all with child; for the dissoluteness of Abbots, and the other Monks and Friars, not only with whores, but married women; and for their unnatural lusts; and other brutal practices, these are not fit to be spoken of, much less enlarged on, in a work of this nature. The full report of this visitation is lost; yet I have seen an extract of a part of it, concerning one hundred and forty-four houses, that contains abominations in it equal to any that were in Sodom.

"One passage, that is more remarkable, I shall only set down; because upon it followed the first resignation of any religious house that I could ever find. Dr. Leighton beset the Abbot of Langdon's house, and broke open his door of a sudden, and found his whore with him: and in the Abbot's coffer there was a habit for her, for she went for a young brother. Whether the shame of this discovery, or any other consideration, prevailed with him, I know not; but, on the 13th of November, he and ten Monks signed a resignation." *

3. Since the Reformation from Popery no radical change has taken place in the morality of Monks and Nuns; except that they have been compelled to be more private in their excesses, in consequence of the vigilance and better morals of Protestants.†

* * * *

* Burnet's Hist. Ref., vol. i., pp. 245—249. 12mo. London, 1825.

[† The original author of this work gave various details from Mons. De Potter's Vie de Scipion de Ricci, Evêque de Pistoia et Prato. Bruxelles, 1825. 3 tomes, 8vo.; and also from the Rev. S. J. Mahoney's Six Years in the Monasteries of Italy, and Two Years in the Islands of the Mediterranean, and in Asia Minor. 12mo. Philadelphia, 1836. But these are so repulsive to English notions of virtue and decorum, that the Editor has felt it a duty to omit them. "Ricci was one of the most exemplary and zealous members of the Jansenist party,—that Roman Catholic sect which, for the space of more than two centuries, has been vainly trying to obtain the benefits of our Reformation, without rejecting

IV. In offering some concluding observations on the monastic institutions of the Papacy, we advert,

1. To the moral quality of the ascetic system, as it affected the Monks themselves. If we overlook the evidence of history, and abandon Christian principle, we may easily be led to follow the hermit to the wilderness, or the Monk to the cloister. In persons of an imaginative or romantic temperament, it will be difficult to repress the yearning for seclusion. To such the course of self-denial prescribed would be to continue in society amidst its toils, cares, and duties; that of self-indulgence would be to retire from the busy world to the retreat of the solitary. The anchorite may have virtues: nevertheless, we must not forget the selfishness of the system, and its opposition to the spirit and precepts of the Gospel. What shall we say to that influence upon the morals of an unmarried Clergy, which resulted from the access allowed them to the interior of convents? The less that is said on such a theme, the better; but it is indispensable that we advert to it. If the worst enemy of the Church were supposed to devise the most efficacious plan to corrupt the sacred enclosure, one more successful he could not have chosen than to impose celibacy on both sexes; to screen both from the eye of the world; and allow them free access to each other, under pretext of spiritual superintendence! More needs not be said. That some convents have generally been pure, may be allowed; and that individuals have maintained their integrity in the most corrupt houses, is, perhaps, also certain. But these are the exceptions to the general rule; which is, that the body has been, and still is, corrupt.

2. We constantly hear of the services which the Monks and the Papal hierarchy have rendered religion and learning; and many appear willing either to disbelieve or bury in oblivion the wounds which their ignorance and gross immoralities have inflicted upon both. In judging of the utility of olden institutions, we ought not to confound their accidental effects with the predominant and decided tendency of their moral operations. There is no human establishment unmixed with evil; and perhaps few without some good. We must not therefore confine our observations to one side only, whether good or bad; but examine whether an institution originated at the sacrifice of social prosperity, was calculated eventually to improve or degrade society. The usurer, who founded an almshouse to maintain those whom his unjust transactions had reduced to poverty, is a correct portrait of the Monks with regard to the mental interests of mankind. They uncivilized the polished, while they left the ignorant uninstructed; and then led them into folly and superstition.

A variety of circumstances induced the ancient Christians to reject profane literature. For the most part they were unacquainted with it. The learning of the times was associated with false and impure principles. But nothing appears to have prepared the way for the darkness of the middle ages to such an extent as the prevalence of monkery in the Church. The extraordinary reverence which was paid to the multitudes inhabiting Egypt, who led a monastic life, amounting to seventy-six thousand, at the end of the fourth century, tended to throw into the shade every branch of science and art; and when such institutions prevailed in the West, a spirit of opposition to everything that can refine and enlighten was evoked. Gregory the Great used his influence to efface what remained of ancient literature, and to introduce monkish learning. In this he succeeded, and became the founder, master, and leader of the barbarous schools of the middle ages. The present course of study which is pursued in these secluded abodes retains the leading features which it possessed during the former periods of ignorance and gloom, and but little is introduced of the improvements of modern literature. What department in science has recently received any aid from monkish research?

3. The monastery, though represented by its admirers as a refuge from care, and the seat of happiness, is the most pitiless state of bondage and anxiety that is known to exist. The following sketch, by the Rev. Joseph Blanco White, will furnish a representation:—

"The picture of female convents requires a more delicate pencil: yet I cannot find tints sufficiently dark and gloomy to portray the miseries which I have witnessed in their inmates. Crime, indeed, makes its way into those recesses, in spite of the spiked walls and prison grates which protect the inhabitants. This I know with all the certainty which the self-accusation of the guilty can give. It is, besides, a notorious fact, that the nunneries in Estramadura and Portugal are frequently infected with vice of the grossest kind. But I will not dwell on this revolting part of the picture. The greater number of the Nuns whom I have known were beings of a much higher description; females whose purity owed nothing to the strong gates and high walls of the cloister; but who still had a human heart, and felt, in many instances, and during a great portion of their lives, the weight of the vows which deprived them of their liberty. Some there are, I confess, among the Nuns, who, like birds hatched in a cage, never seem to long for freedom: but the happiness boasted of in convents is generally the effect of an honourable pride of purpose, supported by a sense of utter hopelessness. The gates of the holy prison have been for ever closed upon the professed inhabitants; force and shame await them wherever they might fly; the short words of their profession have, like a potent charm, bound them to one spot of earth, and fixed their dwelling upon their grave. The great poet who boasted that 'slaves cannot live in England,' forgot that superstition may baffle the most sacred laws of freedom: slaves do live in England, and, I fear, multiply daily by the same arts which fill the convents abroad. In vain does the law of the land stretch a friendly hand to the repentant victim: the unhappy slave may be dying to break her fetters, yet death would be preferable to the shame and reproach that await her among relatives and friends. It will not avail her to keep the vow which dooms her to live single the authority of the Pope and his Church. He was made Bishop of Pistoia and Prato in 1780, by the Archduke Leopold, then reigning in Tuscany, who, being also a Jansenist, wished to employ Ricci in the work of ecclesiastical reform which he meditated in his dominions. The zealous Bishop, bound by his allegiance to Rome to respect the monastic institutions, was yet too well aware of the depravity which they are apt to produce. He knew that the Dominicans of Tuscany were notoriously profligate, and had for a long time made an infamous use of their exclusive authority over the Nuns of their order. In 1642 the Commune of Pistoia had petitioned the Grand Duke, that the direction of the convents of St. Lucy and St. Catherine should be taken out of the hands of the Dominicans, 'on account,' they said, 'of the great evils arising from it, which, out of reverence and modesty, are passed over in silence; for the greatest scandals, and worst consequences, would follow from the exposure.' In another petition by the Gonfaloniero, and two hundred noblemen, Knights, and citizens of Pistoia, it was demanded that the government should 'apply a remedy to protect the honour of the Nuns, who were of the first families of that town.'" —J. B. White's Evidence, pp. 290, 291.]

she has renounced her will, and made herself a passive mass of clay in the hands of the Superior. Perhaps she has promised to practise austerities which cannot be performed out of the convent,—never to taste meat, if her life were to depend on the use of substantial food; to wear no linen, to go unhosed and unshod for life; all these, and many other, hardships, make part of the various rules which Rome has confirmed with her sanction. Bitter, harassing remorse seizes the wavering mind of the recluse, and even a yielding thought toward liberty assumes the character of sacrilege. Nothing short of rebellion against the Church that has burned the mark of slavery into her soul, can liberate an English Nun. Whereto could she turn her eyes? Her own parents would disown her; her friends would shrink from her as if her breath wafted leprosy; she would be haunted by Priests and their zealous emissaries; and, like her sister victim of superstition in India, be made to die of a broken heart, if she refused to return to the burning pile from which she had fled in frantic fear.

"Suppose that the case I have described were of the rarest occurrence; suppose that but one Nun in ten thousand wished vehemently for that liberty which she had forfeited by a few words in one moment; what law of God (I will ask) has entitled the Roman Church thus to expose even one human creature to dark despair in this life, and a darker prospect in the next? Has the Gospel recommended perpetual vows? Could anything but a clear and positive injunction of Christ or his Apostles justify a practice beset with dangers of this magnitude? Is not the mere possibility of repenting of such vows a reason why they should be strictly forbidden? And yet they are laid on almost infants of both sexes. Innocent girls of sixteen are lured by the image of heroic virtue, and a pretended call of their Saviour, to promise they know not what, and make engagements for a whole life of which they have seen but the dawn!

"To what paltry shifts and quibbles will not Roman Catholic writers resort to disguise the cruelty of this practice? Nuns are described as super-human beings, as angels on earth, without a thought or wish beyond the walls of their convents. The effects of habit, of religious fear, of decorum, which prevented many of the French Nuns from casting off the veil, at a period when the revolutionary storm had struck awe into every breast, are construed into a proof of the invariableness of purpose which follows the religious profession. Are Nuns, indeed, so invariably happy? Why, then, are they insulted by their spiritual rulers, by keeping them under the very guards and precautions which Magistrates employ to secure external good behaviour among the female inmates of prisons and penitentiaries? Would the Nuns continue, during their lives, under the same privations, were they at liberty to resume the laical state? Why, then, are they bound fast with awful vows? Why are they not allowed to offer up, day by day, the free-will offering of their souls and bodies? The reluctant Nuns, you say, are few. Vain, unfeeling sophistry! First prove that vows are recommended on divine authority; that Christ has authorized the use of force and compulsion to ratify them when they are made; and then you may stop your ears against the complaints of a few sufferers. But can millions of submissive or even willing recluses atone for the despair of those few? You reckon, in indefinite numbers, those that in France did not avail themselves of the revolutionary laws. You should rather inquire how many, who, before the Revolution, appeared perfectly contented in their cloistral slavery, overcame every religious fear, and flew to the arms of a husband, as soon as they could do it with impunity. Two hundred and ten Nuns were secularized in Spain during the short-lived reign of the Cortes.* Were these helpless beings happy in their former durance? What an appalling number of less fortunate victims might be made out by averaging, in the same proportion, the millions of females who, since the establishment of convents, have surrendered their liberty into the hands of Rome!

"Cruel and barbarous, indeed, must be the bigotry or the policy which, rather than yield on a point of discipline, sees with indifference even the chance, not to say the existence, of such evils. To place the most sensitive, innocent, and ardent minds under the most horrible apprehensions of spiritual and temporal punishment, without the clearest necessity, is a refinement of cruelty which has few examples among civilized nations. Yet the scandal of defection is guarded against by fears that would crush stouter hearts, and distract less vivid imaginations, than those of timid and sensitive females. Even a temporary leave to quit the convent for the restoration of decaying health is seldom given, and never applied for but by such Nuns as unhappiness drives into the disregard of public opinion. I saw my eldest sister, at the age of two-and-twenty, slowly sink into the grave within the walls of a convent; whereas, had she not been a slave to that Church, which has been a curse to me, air, amusement, and exercise might have saved her. I saw her on her death-bed. I obtained that melancholy sight at the risk of bursting my heart, when, in my capacity of Priest, and at her own request, I heard her last confession. Ah! when shall I forget the mortal agony with which, not to disturb the dying moments of that truly angelic being, I suppressed my gushing tears in her presence; the choking sensation with which I forced the words of absolution through my convulsed lips; the faltering steps with which I left the convent, alone, making the solitary street where it stood re-echo the sobs I could no longer contain! I saw my dear sister no more; but another was left me, if not equal in talents to the eldest, (for I have known few that could be considered her equals,) amiable and good in no inferior degree. To her I looked up as a companion for life. But she had a heart open to every noble impression; and such, among Catholics, are apt to be misled from the path of practical usefulness, into the wilderness of visionary perfection. At the age of twenty she left an infirm mother to the care of servants and strangers, and shut herself up in a convent, where she was not allowed to see even her nearest relations. With a delicate frame, requiring every indulgence to support it in health, she embraced a rule which denied her the comforts of the lowest class of society. A coarse woollen frock fretted her skin; her feet had no covering but that of shoes open at the toes, that they might expose them to the cold of a brick floor; a couch of bare planks was her bed, and an unfurnished cell her dwelling. Disease soon filled her conscience with fears; and I had often to endure the torture of witnessing her agonies at the confessional. I left her, when I quitted Spain, dying much too slowly for her only chance of relief. I wept bitterly for her loss two years after: yet I could not be so cruel as to wish her alive." †

"* Report of the Minister Garelli, laid before the Cortes, March 1st, 1822."

† White's Practical and Internal Evidence against Catholicism. pp. 138—146. 8vo. Second Edit. London, 1826.

4. We hasten to conclude this subject of celibacy. There are lengths and depths of crime, of pollution, of misery and oppression, connected with it, at which the heart sickens. To avoid offending pious ears, we have omitted the most glaring narratives. We have dealt in quotation, when it could be done consistently with brevity, and the sacredness of truth.

"The ascetic institute," says Isaac Taylor, "and the celibate, has existed under three distinguishable conditions. The first, that in which we find it in the middle of the third century, when it was the least artificial in its constitution, and, one would suppose, the least liable to abuses. What it was in fact, at that time, may be gathered from those passages in Cyprian to which I have already referred. The epistle to Pomponius, and the treatise De Habitu Virginum, must be perused entire. The second condition is that of the Nicene age, when monasteries and convents were springing up on all sides, and when the ascetic feeling (mania) was at its height. The third is that regulated and severe form, imposed upon the monastic orders under the auspices of the Romish Church, and with which at present we have nothing to do. It is with the second that we are concerned. Does the inquirer choose then to take his idea of the Nicene asceticism from devotional pieces, and hortatory compositions, showing what it should have been; or from the direct and indirect admissions of its admirers? I presume the latter course to be preferred; nor can we do better than open Chrysostom; and it is curious to turn from any of his splendid descriptions of the celestial polity which the monastic orders professed to realize, (as tom. i., p. 115,) to passages such as the one already cited, and to the two treatises, in one of which this passage occurs. I will say nothing more of them than that they should serve as a caution against the easy, but dangerous, error of supposing that modern Church historians have fully and fairly depicted the ancient Church. The very facts most necessary to be known are barely glanced at by any of these writers. The first of these admonitory treatises is addressed Προς τους εχοντας παρθενους συνεισακτους· the title of the second is, Περι του μη τας κανονικας συνοικειν ανδρασιν. It is manifest that the practices inveighed against were common, and the abuses mentioned notorious. There is, indeed, nothing to be wondered at in these things; except it be the infatuation of those who, with such facts before them, could yet persist in the endeavour so to fight against human nature, common sense, and Christianity. Basil's Treatise on Virginity, which I will not recommend the reader to make himself acquainted with, gives indications enough of the existence and frequency of abuses even worse than those referred to by Chrysostom. Jerome, cautious, and yet caustic, can neither withhold the truth, nor plainly declare it. In his epistle to Eustochium he must be listened to as a reluctant witness, intimating more than he will say. Elsewhere, however, he freely admits that the excellence professed by the two classes of ascetics was but rarely realized. Comment. in Lament., cap. iii. Sed rara est et paucissimis dono Dei hæc perfectio concessa.

"Again, in the epistle, Ad Rusticum Monachum, the truth comes out; and it appears plainly, that the system exhibited, in Jerome's time, every one of those inherent bad qualities which have always drawn upon it the contempt and abhorrence of mankind. This epistle (of a few pages only) the studious reader will peruse throughout: no evidence can be more unexceptionable. Alone, Jerome's testimony might well be admitted as sufficient; but it accords minutely with that of Chrysostom, especially as to the custom against which the first of the above-named treatises is directed: 'Some you may see with their loins girt, clad in dingy cloaks, with long beards, who yet can never break away from the company of women; but live under the same roof, sit at the same tables, are waited upon by young girls, and want nothing proper to the married state, except—wives!' The luxury commonly indulged in by the rich ascetics, the ostentatious and rapacious practices of the poor, and the insanity of the fanatical sort, are spoken of without disguise: Vidi ego quosdam, &c.....publice extendentes manus; pannis aurum tegimus, et contra omnium opinionem, plenis sacculis morimur divites, qui quasi pauperes vivimus. Nothing else can be inferred from this epistle, (and see, Ad Nepot.,) than that the graphic description it contains of knavery, licentiousness, and insanity, was applicable to the many; and that the exceptions were few: Nequaquam considerans quid alii mali faciunt, sed quid boni tu facere debeas; neque vero peccantium ducaris multitudine, et te pereuntium turba, &c. This sort of evidence, furnished by a passionate admirer of the ascetic institute, ought to be considered as conclusive.

"Erasmus, determined to give the ancient Monks a credit, at the expense of his contemporaries, contradicts the clearest testimonies in his Antidote to this epistle, which, by the way, is highly curious, as indicative of the approaching Reformation. I beg to commend the passage to the attention of the modern admirers of ascetic practices: Quæ, says Erasmus, magis ad Judæos pertinent, quam ad Christianos, et superstitiosum facere possunt, pium non possunt. Does not all experience confirm this testimony?

"I really resent the humiliation of making grave references to book and chapter of a work like that of Cassian. If called upon to make good any of the assertions or intimations concerning the Nicene monkery, which I may have left unsupported by direct citations, Cassian would help me out of every difficulty. The monastic rules of St. Pachomius are appended to this writer's Institutes, and exhibit the spirit and quality of the monastic life: they are prefaced by Jerome with a brief and curious account of it, as then established in the Thebais, under the immediate direction of 'an angel sent from heaven' for this purpose.

"But the reader who would give the ancient asceticism the highest possible advantage, will take his idea of it from Basil. This Father's ascetic writings do not occupy much space, and they should be read by those who are now told that the monastic system of the ancient Church was wise, holy, rational, and Christian-like. These compositions are,—some of his epistles, as those to Nazianzen, and to Amphilochius; the treatises on virginity, and on abdication of the world, and spiritual perfection. By the way, why should not this treatise find a place among 'selections' from the Fathers? Let us have it faithfully rendered, and without retrenchment. Basil says to his disciple, a young Monk, 'Hast thou left thy cell? Thou hast left there thy virtue.' What sort of virtue is that which evaporates the moment it is exposed to day-light? Or, what is the whole meaning of the impassioned advice, 'Shun the society of those of thine own age; yea, flee from it as from a burning flame?' How few, then, are the steps that lead from the doctrine of angelic virginity to the lowest depths! First comes celibacy, imposed upon youths of ardent temperament; then, by necessity, the stern separation of the sexes; and next—what? we may learn from Basil! It is not without vehement emotions of disgust and indignation that one sees this ancient and worst device of the devil set a going again, after such proofs of its true quality. Basil's Monastic Institutions, and Rules, longer and shorter, embody all points of the theory and practice of the ascetic life; and whoever wishes to know what it was, will read these throughout.

"Compelled to forego the ample citations I had intended, I will point to a few expressions only as they present themselves. Ad Amphiloc. 2., Basil decides that girls should not be allowed to profess before their sixteenth or seventeenth year. Any irregularity fallen into by those who had voluntarily devoted themselves at this mature age, was to be punished with 'inexorable severity.' He enjoins also, that when parents or brothers, or, as sometimes happened, distant relatives, brought girls to the convent from interested motives, the consent of the victim should be ascertained. The Monast. Constit. commence by recommending a total surrender of the soul and body to God, including (cap. xx.) the renunciation of every tie of kindred. 'It is the devil's craft,' says Basil, 'to keep alive in the mind of the Monk a recollection of his parents and natural relatives, so as that, under colour of rendering them some aid, he may be drawn aside from his heavenly course.' Let us now compare theory with facts. We hear Basil (cap. iii.) strictly forbidding, except in cases of the most extreme necessity, any sort of intercourse with women. At the same moment the Monks generally, according to Jerome and Chrysostom, were maintaining as many girls about them as their means would allow. Pachomius forbids a Monk to secrete anything in his cell, not even an apple; and Basil insists again and again, that his Monks are to renounce every atom of private property; but Jerome tells us, that the Monks about him were gathering wealth within their ragged sleeves.

"To Basil's rule, that a Monk should cease to care for his relatives, some, he tells us, objected the Apostle's declaration: 'If a man provide not for his own,' &c. Yes; but Paul addressed this to the living, not to the dead; but a genuine Monk is virtually dead to the world, although breathing the upper air; and as such, he is exempt from every secular obligation. 'As dead, thou art free from all contributions for the benefit of thy natural relatives; and, as utterly a pauper, thou hast nothing which thou canst bestow.' Is not this nearly the same as the 'corban' of the Pharisees?

"In his second discourse, (Constit. Monast.,) Basil insists upon the greater severity needful in the government of convents, and imposes restrictions which one would imagine must have secured a degree of decorum. How far these rules were regarded, we may best learn from Chrysostom. I must cut short these references, only taking the liberty to recommend those who may now be carrying the Hymni Ecclesiæ in their pockets, or in their bosoms, to look into the history of monkery, from the Nicene age onward, before they allow themselves to speak of it as a heaven-born institution."*

* Taylor's Ancient Christianity, and the Doctrines of the Oxford Tracts, vol. i., pp. 411—415. 8vo. London, 1839.

CHAPTER IV.

WORSHIP OF SAINTS.

I. PRELIMINARY REMARK.—II. STATEMENT OF THE DOCTRINE. 1. Creed of Pius IV. Council of Trent. The Catechism cited. Their indefinite mode of expression: 2. The Roman Church ascribes to the saints the honour due to God alone. The decision of Gregory XVI. Gabriel Biel. Sentiments of Antoninus: 3. Some Romanists confine the worship of saints to mere honour. Declaration of the Vicars Apostolic. Opinion of Gother. Such sentiments are calculated for Protestant countries. Romanist worship is idolatrous.—III. OF SAINTS TO BE WORSHIPPED, AND WHAT WORSHIP IS DUE TO THEM. 1. Saints to be worshipped. Ferraris cited: 2. The worship rendered. Ferraris quoted. Dulia, hyperdulia, and latria explained.—IV. THE MANNER IN WHICH THEIR PRAYERS ARE QUOTED AT LARGE. The assertion that they disapprove of superstition. Various classes into which their prayers may be arranged: First. Instances in which they ask the prayers of the dead saints, as they do those of the living: Secondly. Examples in which the saints are made intercessors and advocates: 1. As intercessors, advocates, or mediators: 2. Prayers in which reliance is placed upon the merits of the saints: 3. Prayers in which merits and advocacy are united: Thirdly. Prayers in which latria is rendered to them, or shared between them and God. 1. Confession is made to them and to God. Examples: 2. Direct petitions presented to them. Examples: 3. Supplication made to them. Their Litanies cited: 4. Ascriptions of praise are offered: 5. Attributes of God are ascribed to them: Fourthly. Saint-worship ends in latria: 1. Instance in Pope Gregory XVI.: 2. And the whole church. Bonaventura quoted: 3. They materialize the worship of God: 4. Specimens of prayers used by the Scapulars in Spain, Italy, &c.: 5. Examples of prayers used in France: 6. Ireland: 7. Portugal: 8. Present sentiments at Rome.

I. NOTHING is more common with Roman Catholic authorities than to endeavour to divert attention from the point in debate, when the arguments of Protestants are to be combated. For instance: in the invocation of saints, they endeavour to introduce other topics in connexion with the public and private practice of their Church. They charge their opponents with being irreverent toward the saints; or they attempt to evade or explain away her gross idolatrous practices.

Protestants honour the saints on account of the virtues which they possessed; and they teach that it is profitable to follow their example as far as they have followed Christ, and have taken the word of God for their direction.

II. We present a general statement of the doctrine of the Romanists, showing what the priesthood teach respecting the invocation of the saints.

1. The Creed of Pope Pius IV. says: "Likewise, that the saints reigning together with Christ, are to be honoured and invocated, that they offer prayers to God for us, and that their relics are to be venerated."*

The Council of Trent, in its twenty-fifth session, decrees as follows:—

"The holy Council commands all Bishops and others, who have the care and charge of teaching, that according to the practice of the Catholic and Apostolic Church, received from the first beginning of the Christian religion, the consent of venerable Fathers, and the decrees of holy Councils, they labour with diligent assiduity to instruct the faithful concerning the invocation and intercession of the saints, the honour due to relics, and the lawful use of images; teaching them, that the saints, who reign together with Christ, offer their prayers to God for men; that it is a good and a useful thing suppliantly to invoke them, and to flee to their prayers, help, and assistance; because of the benefits bestowed by God through his So Jesus Christ our Lord, who is our only Redeemer and Saviour; and that those are men of impious sentiments who deny that the saints, who enjoy eternal happiness in heaven, are to be invoked; or who affirm that they do not pray for men, or that to beseech them to pray for us, is idolatry; or that it is contrary to the word of God, and opposed to the honour of Jesus Christ, the one Mediator between God and man; or that it is foolish to supplicate, verbally or mentally, those who reign in heaven." *

[* Vide supra, pp. 2, 3.]

The Catechism of the Council says, "The veneration and invocation of angels and saints, who enjoy the glory of heaven and the honour which the (Roman) Catholic Church has always paid, even to the bodies and ashes of the saints, are not forbidden by the first commandment.—Their intercession, therefore, we invoke, because they always see the face of God, and are constituted by him the willing advocates of our salvation.—To honour the saints who sleep in the Lord, to invoke their intercession, and to venerate their sacred relics and ashes, far from diminishing, tends considerably to increase, the glory of God; in proportion as the Christian's hope is thus animated and fortified, and he himself excited to the imitation of their virtues.—True, there is but one Mediator, Christ the Lord, who alone has reconciled us through his blood; and who, having accomplished our redemption, and having once entered into the holy of holies, ceases not to intercede for us; but it by no means follows, that it is therefore unlawful to have recourse to the intercession of the saints." †

The creed of Pius IV., the Council of Trent, and the Catechism, express themselves cautiously on the subject, as may be seen by those who carefully examine the foregoing statements from these authoritative standards. This dogmatic mode of instruction answers the purpose of the various sentiments which are entertained in the Church of Rome concerning this worship. Those who pray directly to the saints may rest secure from censure; and those who view them as intercessors merely, may teach and practise according to their peculiar notions without danger. We advance the sentiments of both under separate heads, before we proceed to introduce to our readers the general practice of the Papal hierarchy with regard to saint-worship.

2. The Roman Church ascribes to the saints the honour due to God alone. Gregory XVI., in his encyclical letter, addressed to all Patriarchs, Primates, Archbishops, and Bishops, dated August 15th, 1832, says, "We select for the date of our letter this most joyful day, on which we celebrate the solemn festival of the most blessed Virgin's triumphant assumption into heaven, that she who has been, through every great calamity, our patroness and protectress, may watch over us writing to you, and lead our mind, by her heavenly influence, to those counsels which may prove most salutary to Christ's flock." *

In the same Epistle, the Pope says, "But that all may have a successful and happy issue, let us raise our eyes to the most blessed Virgin Mary, who alone destroys heresies, who is our greatest hope, yea, the entire ground of our hope. (St. Bernard. Serm. de Nativ. B. V. M., sect. vii.) May she exert her patronage to draw down an efficacious blessing on our desires, our plans, and proceedings, in the present straitened condition of the Lord's flock. We will also implore, in humble prayer, from Peter, the Prince of the Apostles, and from his fellow-Apostle Paul, that you may all stand as a wall to prevent any other foundation than what hath been laid. And, supported by this cheering hope, we have confidence that the Author and Finisher of faith, Jesus Christ, will at last console us all in the tribulations which have happened to us." †

After reading the above, what ideas are we to entertain of the candour or veracity of those Romanists who cease not, after Bossuet and others, to affirm, that "they ONLY pray to saints to intercede for them?" Here is the head of their religion performing a solemn act of worship to the deified Mary, on a day dedicated to her presumed assumption, invoking her, as his patroness and protectress, in a time of great calamity, entreating her to aid him by her heavenly influence, to that which would be salutary for the Church. Is this ONLY to pray to her to undertake for us? The leader in this act of devotion is the supreme earthly oracle of faith; the visible, living, speaking guide of the Church. If this be not idolatry, then idolatry exists only in name. Similar sentiments might be quoted from other Pontiffs.

Gabriel Biel, on the Canon of the Mass, says, "that we, by the instituted order of God, should fly to the aid of the saints, that we might be saved by their merits and prayers. He also says, that our heavenly Father gave the half of his kingdom to the most Blessed Virgin, Queen of heaven; which is signified in the case of Esther, to whom Ahasuerus promised the half of his kingdom. So that our heavenly Father, who possessed justice and mercy, retained the former, and conceded to the Virgin Mother the exercise of the latter." ‡

Antoninus, Archbishop of Florence, teaches that the intercession of the Virgin averts the exercise of God's justice to a degree even beyond what Gabriel Biel

* "Mandat sancta Synodus omnibus Episcopis, et ceteris docendi munus curamque sustinentibus, ut juxta Catholicæ et Apostolicæ Ecclesiæ usum a primævis Christianæ religionis temporibus receptum, sanctorumque Patrum consensionem, et sacrorum Conciliorum decreta, in primis de sanctorum intercessione, invocatione, reliquiarum honore, et legitimo imaginum usu, fideles diligenter instruant, docentes eos, sanctos, una cum Christo regnantes, orationes suas pro hominibus Deo offerre; bonum atque utile esse suppliciter eos invocare, et ob beneficia impetranda a Deo per Filium ejus Jesum Christum Dominum nostrum, qui solus noster Redemptor et Salvator est, ad eorum orationes, opem, auxiliumque confugere: illos vero qui negant sanctos, æterna felicitate in cœlo fruentes, invocandos esse; aut qui asserunt, vel illos pro hominibus non orare, vel eorum, ut pro nobis etiam singulis orent, invocationem esse idololatriam; vel pugnare cum verbo Dei, adversarique honori unius Mediatoris Dei et hominum Jesu Christi, vel stultum esse in cœlo regnantibus voce vel mente supplicare; impie sentire."—Canon. et Decret. Conc. Trid., sess. xxv., De Invocatione, Veneratione, et Reliquiis Sanctorum, et Sacris Imaginibus. Fol. Romæ, 1564.

† Catechism of the Council of Trent, pp. 354, 355, 357. 8vo. Dublin, 1829

* "Testemque nostræ erga vos voluntatis epistolam damus lætissimo hoc die, quo de Virginis sanctissimæ in cœlum assumptæ triumpho solemnia festa peragimus, ut quam patronam ac sospitem inter maximas quasque calamitates persensimus, ipsa et scribentibus ad vos nobis adstet propitia, mentemque nostram cœlesti afflatu suo in ea inducat consilia, quæ Christiano gregi futura sint quam maxime salutaria."—Greg. P. XVI. Epist. Ency., 18 kalend. Sept., 1832.

† "Sed ut omnia hæc prospere ac feliciter eveniant, levemus oculos manusque ad sanctissimam Virginem Mariam, quæ sola universas hæreses interemit, nostraque maxima fiducia, imo, tota ratio est spei nostræ. (Ex S. Bernardi Serm. de Nativ. B. V. M., sect. vii.) Suo ipso patrocinio, in tanta Dominici gregis necessitate, studiis, conciliis, actionibusque nostris exitus secundissimos imploret. Id et ab Apostolorum Principe Petro, et ab ejus co-Apostolo Paulo, humili prece efflagitemus, ut stetis omnes pro muro, ne fundamentum aliud ponatur præter id, quod positum est. Hac jucunda spe freti, confidimus Auctorem Consummatoremque fidei Jesum Christum consolaturum tandem esse nos omnes in tribulationibus, quæ invenerunt nos nimis."—Idem. See Affaires de Rome, Pièces Justificatives, pp. 6—37.

‡ Gabriel Biel super Canonem Missæ.

teaches. Let any one peruse the forty-five chapters of this Prelate, spread over more than three hundred pages of his work, and he will find sufficient to confirm him in the opinion, that the full deification of the Virgin scarcely interferes more with the divine attributes than the power ascribed to her does.* Those to whom she turns her eyes, in her advocacy, are justified and saved. She is the throne of grace to which sinners are exhorted to flee with confidence.

We hesitate to record the profane blasphemies which are found in the writings of various Popes, Prelates, and Divines on this subject. We refuse even to name the vulgar preaching and rude discourses of Friars and Priests who induct the multitude into the worship of saints, as being too indelicate for the ears of even an intelligent Romanist; though such is an undoubted part of the system, both doctrinally and practically. Some, however, give a more refined view of the worship of saints than the foregoing class.

The declaration of the Romish Vicars Apostolic in Great Britain, which is adapted for a Protestant latitude, and would be semi-heresy in Rome, says, "Catholics do solicit the intercession of the angels and saints reigning with Christ in heaven. But in this, when done according to the principles and spirit of the Catholic Church, there is nothing of superstition, nothing which is not consistent with true piety. For the Catholic Church teaches her children, not to pray to the saints, as to the authors or givers of divine grace; but only to solicit the saints in heaven to pray for them in the same sense as St. Paul desired the faithful on earth to pray for him." †

Gother, in his Papist Misrepresented, says, "Cursed is he that believes the saints in heaven to be his redeemers, that prays to them as such, or that gives God's honour to them, or to any creature whatever. Amen." "Cursed is every goddess-worshipper, that believes the blessed Virgin Mary to be any more than a creature; that worships her, or puts his trust in her more than in God; that believes her above her Son, or that she can in anything command Him. Amen."‡

We should not forget that such declarations as the foregoing are either intended to circulate in Protestant countries; or they are the views of enlightened Roman Catholics who are freed, through the evangelical influence of the times, from the superstitions and true doctrines of their Church. Very few in Catholic countries, where their system and its practice have full sway, would express themselves in such guarded language as Gother or the Apostolic Vicars.

That the Roman Catholic system is idolatrous, has been often asserted, and satisfactorily proved. Evidence is found in the ordinary devotions and daily practice of the Roman Catholics. God is not the exclusive object of their worship; his providence is not their sole trust; nor do they confess their sins to him only; but divide that solemn act between the Almighty, the Virgin, the angels, and the saints. Before, however, we present to the reader examples of their devotion, we shall furnish more of their own explanations respecting the saints that are to be worshipped, the kind of adoration due to them, and other points connected therewith.

* S. Antonini Summæ Theol., pars iv., tit. xv., pp. 911—1270.

[† Declaration of the Catholic Bishops, the Vicars Apostolic, and their Coadjutors in Great Britain, sect. iv., p. 11. 8vo. A new Edition. Stereotyped for the Catholic Institute, London.

[‡ Gother's Papist Misrepresented and Represented, p. 117. 4to. London, 1685.]

III. As it regards the saints to be worshipped, and the worship due, we present the explanations of Ferraris, who supports his statements from the highest authorities of the Church of Rome: and the reader who wishes to examine the subject farther may consult him.

1. With respect to the saints that are to be worshipped, the following statements are given by Ferraris, and amply supported by other authorities:—"No one should be venerated as a saint, without the licence of the Pope; though during his life-time he may have wrought miracles.* Hence he only is properly and strictly taken as a saint, and worthy of veneration, who is duly canonized by the Pope enrolling his name in the register, or publicly, solemnly, and canonically entering it in the number and catalogue of saints, and declaring and defining him to be such, by a published decree, that he may be esteemed and worshipped by all.† The Pope being assured by the instinct of the Holy Spirit, of the person's sanctity, and of his being in glory, issues his diploma or breve of his beatification.‡ Hence many choice Doctors hold that it is an article of faith, that the Pope cannot err, in the canonization or beatification of saints.§ It is not certain who was the first Pope who canonized saints. Many hold that the first canonization solemnly celebrated was by Leo III., in the year 804.‖ For the purpose of canonizing or beatifying any one, it is necessary that miracles were wrought by him, not only during his life, but especially after his death.¶ In the beatification and canonization of martyrs, it is not necessary that there should be made so exact and strict inquiry concerning probity of life, and miracles done during life, as it is in the beatification and canonization of Confessors; but special examination is to be made concerning the miracles performed after death, and respecting the cause for which they suffered death. According to the decree of Urban VIII., no canonization or beatification can take place, in modern times, within fifty years after the person's death.†† But for just causes, and by dispensation from the Pope, the case may be examined and decided before, as appears

[* "Pro sancto aliquem venerari non licet sine licentia Papæ, etiamsi in vita fecisset miracula."—Ferraris Biblioth. Prompt., Veneratio Sanctorum, tom. vii., sect. i.]

[† "Sanctus igitur proprie et stricte captus et veneratione dignus est omnis et solus ille, qui rite canonizatus, id est, per Pontificem albo, seu numero et catalogo aliorum sanctorum publice, solemniter, ac canonice adscriptus, tamquam sanctus declaratus et definitus est, addito statuto, ut ab omnibus pro tali habeatur, atque colatur."—Idem, sect. ii.]

[‡ "Pontifex instinctu Spiritus Sancti factus certus de illius sanctitate et existentia in gloria, devenit ad illius beatificationem, expediendo ad id ipsius beatificationis diploma seu breve."—Idem, sect. xii.]

[§ "Hinc plurimi classici Doctores tenent, quod sit de fide, quod Papa non possit errare non solum in canonizatione, sed etiam in beatificatione."—Idem, sect. xv.]

[‖ "Hinc non certo constat, quisnam fuerit primus Summus Pontifex, qui solemniter canonizationem sanctorum celebraverit. Nam multi tenent, quod prima canonizatio solemniter celebrata fuerit a Leone III., A. D. 804."—Idem, sect. xix.]

[¶ "Miracula non solum in vita, sed præcipue post obitum patrata, sunt necessaria ad beatificationem et canonizationem alicujus."—Idem, sect. xxv.]

[ "In beatificatione et canonizatione martyrum non solet fieri tam exacta et stricta inquisitio de probitate vitæ et miraculis tempore vitæ peractis, ac fit in beatificatione et canonizatione confessorum; sed præcipue de miraculis post mortem, et de causa, ob quam passi sunt, indagatur."—Idem, sect. xxvii.]

[†† "Nostris hisce temporibus, nisi habetur apostolica dispensatio, non procedit Sacra Congreg. Rit. in causis servorum Dei ad effectum canonizationis, seu beatificationis, aut declarationis martyrii, nisi elapsis quinquaginta annis ab obitu illorum. Sic expresse statuunt decreta jussu Urbani VIII."—Idem, sect. xxx.]

from the decrees of Alexander VII., Clement IX., and Clement XI." *

2. As to the kind of worship rendered to the saints, the same writer remarks; "That it may be fully understood what worship or adoration is due to them, it is to be observed, that adoration is an act by which any one submits himself to another, in the recognition of his excellence. This is the common opinion. And this adoration or worship is civil or political, sacred or religious. Adoration merely civil or political, is that which may be offered to Kings and supreme Princes on account of the excellence of their station, or the excellency of human power which they possess beyond others; as is mentioned in Scripture, where some are said to have adored Kings. So David, falling on his face, adored three times. (1 Sam. xx. 41,) 'All the assembly blessed the Lord God of their fathers, and bowed themselves, and adored God, and then the King;' (1 Chron. xxix. 20;) where, as you see, the same word adoration refers to God and the King; although, to God the worship is latria, to the King it is only civil respect. Sacred or religious adoration is that which is offered to any one on account of sacred or supernatural excellence, as the adoration which is rendered to God, the blessed Virgin Mary, and all the saints." † "Of sacred or religious adoration there are three kinds; namely, latria, hyperdulia, and dulia. The adoration or worship of latria, is that which is due to God alone, and is given on account of his uncreated supremacy and infinite excellency. The adoration or worship of hyperdulia is that which is due and rendered to the blessed Virgin on account of the maternity of God, and other excellent gifts, and her special supereminent sanctity beyond others. The adoration or worship of dulia is that which is due and given to the saints on account of the supernatural excellence of their sanctity and glory. These are common opinions." *

IV. Examples showing in what manner, for what causes, in what sense, and with what confidence, the Romanists invoke saints and angels.

Some affirm they do not approve of the errors, superstitions, and abuses of the vulgar, or of individuals, in the adoration of saints. The Council of Trent asserts, that "all superstition should be removed" from such invocation. But the Synod does not explain what is superstition; for if all that is termed superstitious and unscriptural were removed from the worship of saints, nothing would remain about which to contend.

We shall advert to their forms of prayer; not from private sources, but from the public authorized prayers of the Church of Rome. We quote from the Breviary, the Missals, and other acknowledged books of devotion. Many pious and orthodox sentiments may be found in them, which we rejoice to perceive; but it is lamentable that they should be associated with so many superstitious forms and unscriptural views. We arrange them under the following heads; namely, First, Instances in which Romanists solicit the saints in heaven to pray for them, as they ask the prayers of the saints on earth. Secondly, In which the intercessory, mediatory, and advocatory prayers of the saints are solicited. Thirdly, In which latria, or supreme worship, is rendered to saints, or divided between them and God. Fourthly, The worship paid to saints and angels, in which latria is divided between them and God, is the natural tendency of saint-worship as taught and practised among them; which, in fact, is the case.

And, First, we shall produce instances in which they ask the saints in heaven to pray for them, as they ask the help of the prayers of pious living persons.

The angelic salutation, or the Ave Maria, "Hail Mary," is a prayer in constant use among Romanists, and is as follows:—"Hail, Mary, full of grace, the Lord is with thee; blessed art thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb, Jesus. Holy Mary, mother of God, pray for us sinners, now, and in the hour of our death. Amen."

The following invocation to the blessed Virgin, the guardian angel, and patron saint, is in common use. We insert it as found in the Christian's Guide, published by the permission of the Most Reverend Archbishop Whitfield, Baltimore. "O holy Virgin, mother of God, [* "Quæ quidem dispensatio supra complementum dictorum quinquaginta annorum solet interdum ob justas causas a Romano Pontifice concedi, ut sæpius concessam esse constat, et signanter in causa Pollocen. Mart. Josaphat., ab ipsomet Urbano VIII."—Ferraris Biblioth. Prompt., Venerat. Sanct., sect. xxxii.

[In illustration of the above, we insert the following, which has been kindly communicated to us by the Rev. Thomas Hartwell Horne, B.D., &c., dated Dec. 26th, 1843:—"Yesterday morning I received, by foreign newsman, a number of the Archives du Christianisme, (published on Saturday last at Paris,) containing an extract from the Popish paper l'Univers, of Nov. 27th. I translate it, in the hope that it may be useful to you. They write from Rome, on the 13th of Nov. (1843): 'Yesterday evening a grand ceremony took place in the Basilica of St. Peter, at Rome: that of the beatification of the Seraphic Virgin, (Seraphine Vierge,) MARY FRANCES OF THE FIVE WOUNDS OF JESUS CHRIST, who died in 1814, in the convent of the Nuns (Religieuses Solitaires) of the order of St. Peter, of Alcantara, at Naples, where she was born of a family of humble artisans. In the great Tribune of St. Peter, which was lighted by thousands of wax tapers, there were placed two pictures, representing the miracles which had been performed by the blessed (!!!) Mary Frances, and a third picture, of very large size, covered with a white veil. As soon as the reading of the act of beatification was finished, hundreds of trumpets and trombones sounded; salvos of artillery were discharged from the castle of St. Angelo; and, on a signal being given by the Pope, the great picture, representing the beatified Nun carried to heaven by angels, was uncovered, and raised up to the arches of the church. This majestic ceremony, which concluded the solemnity, produced an indescribable effect upon the numerous spectators. The preparations for the solemnity at St. Peter's cost upwards of 100,000 Roman crowns, (550,000 francs, or upwards of £11,000 sterling,) besides the price of a great number of pictures which have been ordered; for, according to the custom on such occasions, portraits of the person beatified, painted in oil colours, and in rich frames, were to be distributed to all the Cardinals, as well as to the great churches, and to the principal convents in the pontifical states. After Vespers, the Pope and the Sacred College went to PRAY TO and HONOUR the Blessed!'"]

[† "Ut plene percipiatur, quinam cultus, seu adoratio, debeatur sanctis ac beatis, advertendum est, quod adoratio est actus, quo quis alteri se submittit in recognitionem suæ excellentiæ. Est in re communis. Et hæc adoratio, seu cultus, alia est mere civilis, seu politica, et alia sacra, seu religiosa. Adoratio mere civilis, seu politica, est illa, quæ exhiberi solet Regibus et Principibus supremis propter excellentiam sui status, seu potestatis humanæ, quam præ aliis habent; uti passim in sacra Scriptura leguntur quidam adorasse suos Reges, ut David: (1 Sam. cap. xx:) 'Cadens pronus in terram, adoravit tertio.' 'Benedixit omnis Ecclesia Domino Deo patrum suorum, et inclinaverunt se, et adoraverunt Deum, et deinde Regem;' ubi, ut vides, eadem vox adorationis tribuitur Deo et Regi, licet Deo cultus latriæ, et Regi solus cultus civilis ac politicus competens. Adoratio sacra seu religiosa est illa, quæ exhibetur alicui ob excellentiam suam sacram, et supernaturalem, uti est adoratio, quæ exhibetur Deo, et B. Mariæ Virgini, ac sanctis omnibus et beatis."—Ferraris Biblioth. Prompt., Venerat. Sanct., sect. xxxiv., xxxv.]

[* "Adorationis sacræ, seu religiosæ, tres sunt species, nempe latria, hyperdulia, et dulia; communis theologorum. Adoratio, seu cultus, latriæ est illa, quæ soli Deo debetur ac exhibetur propter summam, increatam, ac infinitam suam excellentiam; communis. Adoratio, seu cultus, hyperduliæ, est illa, quæ B. Mariæ Virgini debetur ac exhibetur ob excellentiam maternitatis Dei, et alia excellentissima dona, ac specialissimam ejus sanctitatem ceteris supereminentem; communis. Adoratio, seu cultus, duliæ est illa, quæ debetur ac exhibetur sanctis ob supernaturalem excellentiam suæ sanctitatis et gloriæ; communis."—Idem, sect. xxxvi.—xxxix.]

my advocate and patroness, pray for thy poor servant; show thyself a mother to me: and thou, O blessed spirit, whom God in his mercy hath appointed to watch over me, intercede for me this day, that I may not stray from the path of virtue. Thou also, O happy saint, whose name I bear, pray for me, that I may serve God faithfully in this life, as thou hast done, and glorify him eternally with thee in heaven. Amen."

There are but few prayers found in the Roman Liturgy where the saints are addressed in precisely the same manner as the Scripture teaches, when we are exhorted to solicit an interest in the supplications of the righteous on earth. In the petition quoted above, the mother of Jesus is represented as our advocate and patroness, and in most others the merits or advocacy of the saints invoked form a part of the supplication. In the examples of Scripture, no mention is made either of advocacy or merits. The Ave Maria comes nearer the model of Scripture example than any other; provided the Virgin were alive, and that her name was not burdened with the idolatrous ignominy of petitions, by which the majesty of God is infringed, and the intercession of Jesus Christ invaded.

Secondly. To furnish examples of prayer, in which the saints are represented as intercessors, or advocates, and where they are invoked in reference to their merits, we adduce the following:—

1. The "Roman Missal, translated into the English Language, for the Use of the Laity," contains this passage:—"Sanctify, O Lord, the offerings we have consecrated to thee, and, being appeased thereby, mercifully look down upon us, by the intercession of blessed Saturninus, thy martyr." "We humbly beseech thy divine Majesty, O Lord, that as the blessed Apostle Andrew was a Teacher and Pastor of thy church, so he may be with thee our perpetual intercessor." "Assist us, O merciful God, and vouchsafe, by the intercession of blessed Thomas the Apostle, to preserve in us what thou hast bestowed on us." "O God, who, by delivering to the blessed Apostle Peter the keys of the kingdom of heaven, didst give him the power of binding and loosing, grant that, by his intercession, we may be freed from the bonds of our sins."

2. We bring forward prayers, in which the merits of the saints hold a conspicuous place, either without any expressed connexion with the merits of Christ, or associated with them. "May the holy prayers of blessed Andrew the Apostle, we beseech thee, O Lord, render our sacrifice pleasing to thee; that what we solemnize in his honour, his merits may render acceptable." "O God, by whose favour we celebrate the glory of blessed Saturninus, thy martyr, grant that we may be assisted by his merits." "Mercifully receive, O Lord, the offerings consecrated to thee by the merits of blessed Felix, thy martyr, and grant they may be a continual support to us." "Graciously receive, O God, we beseech thee, the offerings we have made, and, in consideration of the merits of blessed Marcellus, thy martyr and Bishop, grant they may procure for us the helps necessary to our salvation."

3. The following present the merits and intercession of the saints united:—"O God, who didst prepare an agreeable abode for thyself in the heart of blessed Gertrude the virgin, graciously cleanse our hearts, we beseech thee, through her merits and intercession, from all stains, and grant we may enjoy the same happiness with her, through Christ our Lord. Amen." "O God, who by innumerable miracles hast honoured blessed Nicholas the Bishop, grant, we beseech thee, that, by his merits and intercession, we may be delivered from eternal flames." "O God, who, to recommend to us innocence of life, wast pleased to let the soul of thy blessed virgin Scholastica ascend to heaven in the shape of a dove, grant, by her merits and prayers, that we may lead innocent lives here, and ascend to eternal joys hereafter." "O God, who wast pleased to send blessed Patrick, thy Bishop and confessor, to preach thy glory to the Gentiles, grant that, by his merits and intercession, we may, through thy grace, be enabled to keep thy commandments."

The foregoing furnish examples in which saints are invoked to act as advocates, intercessors, or mediators. They are not merely besought to pray for us, but also to intercede; and their merits are supposed to be associated with this prayer and intercession. Hence the mediatorial character of Jesus Christ is invaded; for we have no examples in Scripture in which the prayers of living saints are associated with their merits; much less have we any such association respecting those who are departed.

Thirdly. There are many instances in which latria, or "supreme worship," is rendered to saints, or divided between them and Almighty God.

1. A general confession of sin is made to them and to God. We refer to the Confiteor, which is a prominent form in the Breviary, and a leading petition in every devotional exercise, in constant and general use.*

2. Many prayers are employed in which direct petitions are presented to the saints and to the Most High. "We fly to thy patronage, O holy mother of God; despise not our petitions in our necessities, but deliver us from all dangers, O ever glorious and blessed Virgin." "O God, in defence of whose church the glorious Prelate Thomas fell by the swords of wicked men, grant, we beseech thee, that all who implore his assistance may find comfort in the grant of their petition." This was Thomas à Becket.

"The Salve Regina.—Hail! holy Queen, mother of mercy, our life, our sweetness, and our hope! to thee we cry, poor, banished sons of Eve, to thee we send up our sighs, mourning and weeping in this valley of tears; turn then, most gracious advocate, thy eyes of mercy toward us, and, after this our exile is ended, show unto us the blessed fruit of thy womb, Jesus; O clement! O pious! O sweet Virgin Mary!"

"Vers. Pray for us, holy mother of God!

"Resp. That we may be made worthy of the promises of Christ."

"A Prayer to our Angel Guardian.—O holy angel! to whose care God in his mercy hath committed me; thou who assistest me in my wants, who consolest me in my afflictions, who supportest me when dejected, and who constantly obtainest for me new favours, I return thee now most sincere and humble thanks; and I conjure thee, O amiable guide! to continue still thy care, to defend me against my enemies, to remove from me the occasions of sin, to obtain for me a docility to thy holy inspirations, to protect me, in particular, at the hour of my death, and then conduct me to the mansions of eternal repose."

"A Commemoration of the blessed Virgin Mary.—O holy Mary! succour the miserable; help the fainthearted; comfort the afflicted; pray for the people; intercede for the Clergy; make supplication for the devout female sex; let all experience thy help who celebrate thy holy commemoration."

[* Vide supra, p. 203.]

"Vers. Pray for us, O holy mother of God!

"Resp. That we may be made worthy of the promises of Christ."

"To the Virgin.—Mother of my God! thou refuge of sinners! cast a look of compassion on me. Thy beloved Son can refuse thee nothing. Obtain for me the assistance I stand in need of, to make a good confession, which will restore me to his grace and love."

"The Prayer of St. Bernard.—Remember, O most compassionate Virgin Mary! that from all ages it is unheard of that any one was forsaken, who, placing himself under thy maternal protection, implored thy assistance and begged the favour of thy prayers. Animated with the confidence which this inspires, I fly to thee, O Virgin of virgins, and mother of my God! and, in the bitterness of my sorrows, I throw myself at thy feet. O mother of the eternal world! despise not my humble supplications, but listen graciously, and mercifully grant the request which, from my heart, I make thee."

3. Another class of devotional prayers is that in which supplication becomes a prominent part.

"The Litany of Saints.—Lord! have mercy on us.
"Christ! have mercy on us.
"Lord! have mercy on us.
"Christ! hear us. Christ! graciously hear us.
"God the Father of heaven, have mercy on us.
"God the Son, Redeemer of the world, have mercy on us.
"God the Holy Ghost, have mercy on us.
"Holy Trinity, one God, have mercy on us.
"Holy Mary,
"Holy mother of God,
"Holy Virgin of virgins,
"St. Michael,
"St. Gabriel,
"St. Raphael,
"All ye holy angels and archangels,
"All ye holy order of blessed spirits,
"St. John Baptist,
"St. Joseph,
"All ye holy Patriarchs and Prophets,
"St. Peter,
"St. Paul," &c., &c., &c., &c., } "Pray for us."

"The Litany of the blessed Virgin.—We fly to thy patronage, O holy mother of God! Despise not our petitions in our necessities, but deliver us from all dangers, O ever glorious and blessed Virgin!

"Lord! have mercy on us.
"Christ! have mercy on us.
"Lord! have mercy on us.
"Christ! hear us. Christ! graciously hear.
"God the Father of heaven, have mercy on us.
"God the Son, Redeemer of the world, have mercy on us.
"Holy Trinity one God, have mercy on us.
"Holy Mary,
"Holy mother of God,
"Holy Virgin of virgins,
"Mother of Christ,
"Mother of divine grace,
"Mother most pure,
"Mother most chaste,
"Mother undefiled," &c., &c., &c., } "Pray for us."

["The following 'Litany of the Sacred Heart of Mary' varies a little from one published by the late titular Bishop Milner:—

["'Lord, have mercy on us!
["'Son of God, have mercy on us!
["'Holy Ghost, have mercy on us!
["'Jesus Christ, hear us!
["'Jesus Christ, graciously hear us!
["'God the Father of heaven, have mercy on us!
["'God the Son, Redeemer of the world, have mercy on us!
["'God the Holy Ghost, have mercy on us!
["'Holy Trinity, one God, have mercy on us!
["'Heart of Mary, conceived without the stain of sin!
["'Heart of Mary, full of grace!
["'Heart of Mary, sanctuary of the holy Trinity!
["'Heart of Mary, tabernacle of the Incarnate Word!
["'Heart of Mary, after God's own heart!
["'Heart of Mary, illustrious throne of glory!
["'Heart of Mary, perfect holocaust of divine love!
["'Heart of Mary, abyss of humility!
["'Heart of Mary, attached to the cross!
["'Heart of Mary, seat of mercy!
["'Heart of Mary, consolation of the afflicted!
["'Heart of Mary, refuge of sinners!
["'Heart of Mary, advocate of the Church, and mother of all the faithful!
["'Heart of Mary, after Jesus, the most assured hope of the agonizing!
["'Heart of Mary, Queen of angels and of saints! } "'Pray for us.'" ["'Lamb of God, who takest away the sins of the world, spare us, O Lord!

["'Lamb of God, who takest away the sins of the world, hear us, O Lord!
["'Lamb of God, who takest away the sins of the world, have mercy on us, O Lord!
["'V. O most sacred and amiable heart of Mary, Mother of God, pray for us!
["'R. That our hearts may be inflamed with divine love.

["'Prayer.—O God of goodness, who hast filled the holy and immaculate heart of Mary with the same sentiments of mercy and tenderness for us with which the heart of Jesus Christ, thy Son, and her Son, was always overflowing; grant that all who honour this virginal heart may preserve until death a perfect conformity of sentiments and inclination with the sacred heart of Jesus Christ, who, with thee and the Holy Ghost, lives and reigns, one God, for ever and ever. Amen.

["'Aspiration.—O Mary! Thou art light in our doubts, consolation in our sorrows, and protection in our dangers! After thy only Son, thou art the certain hope of faithful souls! Hail, hope of the desponding, and refuge of the destitute; to whom thy Son has given such power, that whatever thou willest is immediately done.'" *]†

["* P. 204 of The New Month of Mary.....By the Very Rev. P. R. Kenrick."]

[† Mariolatry: or, Facts and Evidences demonstrating the Worship of the Blessed Virgin Mary by the Church of Rome, derived from the Testimonies of her reputed Saints and Doctors, from her Breviary, and other authorized Romish Formularies of Devotion, confirmed by the Attestation of Travellers. (By the Rev. Thomas Hartwell Horne.) Second edition. Pp. 51—53. 12mo. London, 1841.

The supplicatory form of the foregoing prayers, and the manner in which they are offered, divide the worship of God with saints and angels; and award to them the supreme worship which we owe to God alone.

4. Ascriptions of praise are given to saints directly, or shared between them and God. The following quotation from the Breviary furnishes a suitable example:—"To those who recite devoutly the following prayer after the office, Pope Leo X. hath granted pardon for those defects and faults arising from human weakness in reading the office:—'Eternal praise, honour, virtue, and glory from every creature to the holy and undivided Trinity, to the humanity of our crucified Lord Jesus Christ, to the most blessed and glorious integrity of the fruitful Mary, always Virgin, and to all the saints; and may we receive remission of all our sins for ever! Amen.'"

5. In a word, attributes belonging to God alone are ascribed to saints and angels. The Virgin is called the "Star of the sea, who supports the fallen state of mortals," "Mother of mercy, Our life and hope, Most gracious advocate. She graciously helps us to accomplish the work of our salvation, by her most powerful intercession." She is also termed, "Mirror of justice, Seat of wisdom, Cause of our joy, Spiritual vessel, Tower of David, Ark of the covenant, Gate of heaven, Morning star, Refuge of sinners," &c. If such expressions as these have any meaning at all, they ascribe to a human being attributes which belong to God alone, such as power, grace, knowledge, &c.

Fourthly. The worship paid to saints and angels, in which latria is shared between them and God, is the natural tendency of that idolatry which is taught and practised in the Church of Rome.

1. The head of the Roman Church ascribes latria to the saints doctrinally, and exhorts his people to practise it. Gregory XVI., in the epistle already cited, recognising the Virgin Mary as the patroness and protectress of the Church, ascribes to her the power of watching over him, and of leading his mind by her heavenly influence to those counsels which may prove most salutary toward Christ's flock. In the conclusion he exhorts the Prelates as follows:—"But that all may have a successful and happy issue, let us raise our eyes to the most blessed Virgin Mary, who alone destroys heresies, who is our greatest hope, yea, the entire ground of our hope." The very head of the Church here ascribes the attributes of God to a human being, founding the encouragement to pray to her in this ascription, and thus furnishing a model and example for others.

2. This sentiment, which Gregory and other Pontiffs have embraced, has deeply imbued the leading Divines of the Papacy, so that the devotional psalms of the Old Testament have been accommodated to the Virgin by Bonaventura.

3. In consequence of this depravation of Christian worship, their devotions have become materialized, and the worship of God as a Spirit has been transferred to inferior and material beings. Of this we have many specimens. In the "Litany of the Sacred Heart of Jesus," the worship of Christ as God is transferred to the material object. We have in this Litany alone thirty-one expressions similar to the following:—"Heart of Jesus, have mercy on us; heart of Jesus, ocean of bounty, have mercy on us." In that "of the Blessed Sacrament," the bread is put before the suppliant as the supreme God. The following are examples:—"Wheat of the elect, have mercy on us; food of angels, have mercy on us," &c. There appears to be a close connexion between the doctrine of transubstantiation, the worship of material objects, and that of saints. The practical effects of the latter in the Church of Rome are, to ascribe to saints the supreme adoration which belongs to God; unless so far as they are restrained from the grosser outward idolatries of their system by the awe or influence of Protestant sentiments and practice.

4. We adduce the prayer to the Virgin, as used by the Scapulars in Italy, Spain, and Ireland. A book was printed in Dublin in 1826, for the Confraternity of the Holy Scapular of Whitefriars-street, with the following title:—"A brief Account of the Indulgences, Privileges, and Favours conferred on the Order, Confraternities, and Churches of the most glorious Mother of God, the Virgin Mary of Mount Carmel: with distinct Instructions for the Brothers and Sisters of the sacred Scapular, and for all the faithful who visit the churches of the said Order. Translated from the Italian and Spanish Languages, by Thomas Coleman, principal of the College of Carmelites, in Ireland."*

The work affirms, that the Virgin Mary will never permit those who are truly devoted to her to be damned. It is extracted from the writings of men who never published any work, without first having the approbation of the Holy and Apostolic See.

"O Virgin Mary of Mount Carmel, dearest mother of God, Queen of angels, advocate of sinners, comforter of the afflicted, extend, O glorious Virgin, the ear of your pity to the prayers of me, your most humble servant, and grant me by your grace to be in the number of those whom you love and keep inscribed in your virginal bosom. Purify my heart, O immaculate Virgin! from every sin; take away and banish from me all, everything that can offend your chaste eyes; purge this soul of its affection for earthly and sinful goods, and raise it to the love of celestial and everlasting blessings, and cause that this may be my whole study and diligence; pray to your Son, O holy Virgin! for me now, always, and at the hour of my death, and in that tremendous and awful day of judgment, and when I shall be obliged to render an account of my actions, that by your means I may be able to escape the eternal flames." Let any one consider the foregoing, and he will see how inapplicable is the common explanation of their Apologists, who say, that "they only pray to saints or the Virgin to pray for them." And the above prayer is used by the Scapulars, and other devout Romanists, in Italy, Spain, and Ireland.†

5. The following is used in France, and may be found in a "Manual of Prayers and Exercises in Honour of the most holy Sacrament: Paris, 1827. By Charles Mary Libraire." We give the following translation from the French:—

"Prayer to the Virgin Mary.—Most holy Virgin Mary, mother of God, Queen of heaven and of earth, I devote myself entirely to thee: I choose thee as my Queen, my protectress, and my mother. I give myself up to thee to be to the end of my life thy humble subject, thy servant, and thy child. I firmly believe in all thy privileges, and especially in thy immaculate conception, and thy triumphant assumption. I am resolved never to be ashamed of thy worship, to defend thy honour on all occasions against thine enemies, and never to permit any of those under my control to say or do anything that may be opposed to it. I desire to act in all things from love to thine adorable Son and to thee, and I implore thee to dispose of the merit of my good works as it shall please thee, for his greater glory and for thine own. Finally, to supply those honours which I desire, but cannot render to thee, I offer to thee all those which thou didst receive here on earth from the incarnate Word, and which thou shalt receive eternally in heaven from the most holy Trinity.

* The Protestant Journal: or, the true Catholic Protest against the modern Church of Rome, for 1831. (Edited by the Rev. Josiah Allport, Minister of St. James's, Birmingham.) P. 814. 8vo. London, 1832.

† Idem.

"O tender mother, and supreme Queen! come thou to my aid, scatter the dangers that threaten me, disperse mine enemies; grant to me the virtues which are needful for me: above all, assist me in all my actions, preserve me from all sin, or obtain from God my removal from this world. I ask of thee these favours through the blood of Jesus, and by the maternal affection which thou hast toward me. Amen."*

6. The saint-worship of the Irish Roman Catholics runs through dulia and hyperdulia, as they distinguish between the worship of the common saints and that of the Virgin, so as to end in ascribing to her latria, or supreme worship. In a tract published in Ireland in 1832, cum permissu superiorum, "with the permission of superiors," entitled, The Little Testament of the Holy Virgin, after the preface, there is a prayer in these words:—

"O ever blessed Virgin Mary, the avenue of God's tender mercies to man! Thou wert promised from the beginning of the world 'to crush the serpent's head.' (Gen. iii. 15.)"

In the last page of the tract we meet with the following:—

"My child, I bequeath you my strength: it will uphold you in your temptations and labours, if you be but ready to be sacrificed for God.—From conviction, that as without Mary you can do nothing; so with her you can do all.—All-powerful Virgin, pray for Ireland."

When we associate this prayer with the encyclical letter of the Pope, both of which were issued in 1832, what greater idolatry was ever avowed? The Pope declares, that the Virgin Mary is the sole foundation of their hope. In the above prayer, she is put in the place of God, and invested with omnipotence: "All-powerful Virgin!" She is represented as giving to man strength to overcome temptation and to endure labour. Sacred Scripture, in which Christ applied to himself the words, "Without me ye can do nothing," and where the Apostle applies to him, "I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me," are blasphemously perverted. This lesson is taught the Irish children in their common school-book, by the permission of the Board of Education, and by the authority of the superiors of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, and, of course, by the authority of the supreme Pontiff.*

7. The following specimen is published in a book of devotion in general use among the Portuguese; and it is a just representation of their worship in countries which are purely Popish. It was translated by the Rev. Mr. Kidder, and published in the Western Christian Advocate, vol. vii., p. 137.

Trezenario of the prodigious wonder-worker and glorious Patriarch, St. Francis de Paula, founder of the sacred Order of the Minimos, or practical method of devotion for the thirteen Fridays instituted by the sacred saint; dedicated to the most august and faithful Queen, Donna Marianna Victoria, our Lady, by the Priest and Friar, Francis de Paula Bozio, Professor of the same institution. Lisbon, 1788.

With licence from the Royal Board of General Commission upon the examination and censure of books.

This book consists of thirteen prayers to St. Francis de Paula for the several Fridays observed as days of special devotion by his particular followers. The first is dedicated to the saint's humility; the second to his obedience; the third to his chastity; the fourth to his poverty; the fifth to his mortification; the sixth to his prudence; the seventh to his faith; the eighth to his hope; the ninth to his charity; the tenth to his love of his neighbour; the eleventh to his meekness; the twelfth to his patience; the thirteenth and last to his perseverance. As a specimen of what worship actually is paid to saints, and, by due authority, sanctioned at least in Portugal, we subjoin a translation of the "Prayers to St. Francis de Paula, for the third Friday, dedicated to the virtue of chastity of the said saint."

"O immaculate dove of purity, most precious emerald, and most singular exemplar of chastity, who, for the space of ninety-one years that thou livedst in this vale of misery, never didst defile the lily whiteness of thy virgin purity. By means of that singular prerogative, grant me the grace I desire to obtain, for the sake of which I resort to thine altar on these thirteen sacred days on which the passion of our Redeemer is commemorated.

"1. I pray thee, by the vow of chastity, which from thine infancy, thou didst make to God, always keeping it without the least failure. 2. I pray thee, by that column of fire which, in signal of triumph, appeared over thee, when thou didst quench in the waters of a river the flame which the excitements of the flesh were kindling against thy chastity. 3. I pray thee, by the immaculate purity which thou didst preserve till the end of life, as the oracle of the Vatican hath declared. 4. I pray thee, by the purity of thy most chaste eyes, with which thou didst kindle in the hearts of those whom thou didst behold impulses of the most pure and virtuous desire. 5. I pray thee, by that most pure and celestial innocence, by which thou didst attract to thy conversation the angelic spirits, who were delighted to hold intercourse with a soul so pure as thine. 6. I pray thee, by that zeal with which thou didst persuade those who sought after thee to [* "Très-sainte Vierge Marie, mère de Dieu, Reine du ciel et de la terre, je me consacre à vous tout entier. Je vous choisis pour ma Reine, ma protectrice, et ma mère. Je me donne à vous pour être jusqu'au dernier soupir votre humble sujet, votre serviteur, et votre enfant. Je crois fermement tous vos priviléges, et en particulier votre conception immaculée, et votre assomption triumphante. Je fais résolution de ne jamais rougir de votre culte, de défendre en toute rencontre votre honneur contre vos ennemis, et de ne permettre jamais qu'aucun de ceux qui dépendront de moi disent ou fassent rien qui y soit contraire. Je veux en tout agir par amour pour votre adorable Fils et pour vous, et je vous prie de disposer du mérite de mes bonnes œuvres comme il vous plaira, pour sa plus grande gloire et la vôtre. Enfin, pour suppléer aux honneurs que je désirerais, mais que je ne puis vous rendre, je vous offre tous ceux que vous avez reçus ici-bas du Verbe incarné, et que vous recevrez eternellement, au ciel, de la très-sainte Trinité.

["O mère tendre, et Reine suprême! venez à mon secours, écartez les dangers qui me menacent, dissipez mes ennemis; accordez-moi les vertus qui me sont nécessaires: surtout.....assistez moi dans toutes mes actions, préservez-moi de tout péché, ou obtenez de Dieu qu'il me rétire de ce monde. Je vous demande ces grâces par le sang de Jesus, et l'amour maternel que vous avez pour moi. Ainsi soit-il."—Protestant Journal, 1832, p. 699.]

* Protestant Journal for 1833, p. 773.

flee from familiarity with persons of the opposite sex..... 7. I pray thee, by the consolation and delight thou didst receive in conversing with souls pure and chaste, preferring them to Princes and Monarchs. 8. I beseech thee, by that comparison which thou usedst, in order to render sublime the virtue of chastity, saying, that it brings heaven to earth, and exalts earth to heaven; and that the angels are virgins without body, and virgins angels clothed with flesh. 9. I beseech thee, by the incomparable modesty of all thy senses, with which thou didst guard, in thy heart, the inestimable gift of chastity. 10. I beseech thee, by the sweet perfume which constantly exhaled from thy blessed body, and the admirable brightness which shone in all thy parts as proofs of thy perfect purity. 11. I beseech thee, by the prodigious miracle thou didst perform, curing the insanity of a profane lover, taking out of his ear an insect that emitted an insufferable odour, thus demonstrating to the bystanders the injurious effects of luxury, and the excellence of chastity. 12. I beseech thee, by that most singular gift granted by God to thy body, after death, exempting it from corruption, and preserving it unscathed even by the fire into which it was cast by the heretics, but which reverently suspended its effects until sanctified by the touch of some crosses which burned conjointly with thy body. 13. I beseech thee by the great prodigy thou didst perform, when a worldly woman kissing a tooth of thine which was preserved in the sanctuary of Paula, it was broken by that kiss, on account of which, penetrated with true contrition, she made a vow to God of perpetual continence. I do not, in the slightest degree, distrust thy powerful intercession, O most holy angel of purity, notwithstanding I see myself submerged in a sea of guilt. I acknowledge myself unworthy of thy protection; because I find myself stripped of the white garments of innocence, and consequently without merit to receive the precious robe of divine grace; as another prodigy of sin I have scattered the treasures of the divine assistance; but in imitation of thee, confessing at once my faults, I resort to the mercy of God, whom I have so gravely offended, and I hope, from thine intercession, that, having exchanged my licentious habits for those which are good, I shall happily attain the grace for which I have supplicated thee. Amen."—"Pater Noster, Ave Maria, Gloria Patri."

Here follows a hymn, an antiphony, and a response.

8. At Rome, under the eye of the Pope, the most glaring idolatry exists in their saint-worship. In the Archives du Christianisme of August 8th, 1840, we have extracts from two sermons preached at Rome. In one of them, delivered in the church of St. Louis at Rome, the Preacher declares, "that the kingdom of heaven was divided in two immediately after Christ had said on the cross, 'It is finished.' The kingdom of Justice was allotted to himself, who appears only as a severe Judge; and the kingdom of Mercy to Mary, who alone can open to us the gate of heaven." The traveller who heard and reported the discourses says, "I read, in the church of the Jesuits, that the Pope has granted one hundred years' indulgence to him who shall recite the following prayer:—'Immaculate Virgin, Queen of heaven and the angels, I adore thee. Thou hast delivered me from hell. It is from thee that I expect all my salvation.'" Such are the idolatrous sentiments and practice to which the worship of saints leads. And these are not abuses of their doctrine and practice: they are, on the contrary, the legitimate and unavoidable results of it, except where they are counteracted by the better teaching and practice of Protestants.

[The Rev. Thomas Hartwell Horne, in his excellent manual entitled Mariolatry, &c., observes, "It can scarcely be necessary to apprize our readers, that there is not a single text in the New Testament which affords any pretext whatever in favour of Mary-worship. Our Saviour, in his personal intercourse with the blessed Virgin, from the very commencement to the close of his ministry, manifested an anxious desire of precluding, especially with regard to her, the belief that any intercession with him might be expected. At the marriage-feast, which immediately preceded his ministry, he checked her interference, even with some severity, when she intimated her expectation that he would work a public miracle for the accommodation of the company; though he immediately afterwards performed the same privately, for the conviction, as it appears, of his disciples. (John ii. 1—11.) In the progress of his ministry, he publicly disclaimed her right of concerning herself with his conduct, even for his personal welfare; demanding, 'Who is my mother, and who are my brethren?' Who are the persons urging, under these titles, claims on my attention, while I am engaged in proclaiming the doctrine of salvation? (Matt. xii. 48—50.) And in the concluding scene of suffering, we may well believe that, when he again addressed his mother with the cold appellation 'woman,' and directed his beloved disciple to behold in her his mother, (John xix. 26, 27,) his intention was to abdicate for ever the human relationship of his earthly parent, as terminated with his earthly existence, that she might not, by superstitious worship, be exalted, as she has been, to the throne of heaven.* The silence of the Apostles John, Peter, James, Jude, and Paul, is a clear proof that no honours were paid by them, or in their time, to the Virgin Mary. Equally silent are the genuine writings of the apostolical Fathers, (as those who immediately succeeded the Apostles are ordinarily termed,) and of the subsequent ecclesiastical authors to the time of Athanasius. It is, indeed, a well-attested fact, that no divine honours were given, earlier than the fourth century, to the blessed Virgin Mary, of whom no 'true member of the Anglican branch of the Catholic Church either can or will speak disparagingly or irreverently.' The first persons upon record, as offering divine honours to her, were the Collyridians, who derive their names from the κολλυριδες, or certain cakes, which they offered annually to St. Mary, in sacrifice, upon her festival, when they worshipped her as a goddess. This superstition came from Thrace, and the yet more distant regions of Scythia and Arabia. While they were mere Pagans, they had been accustomed to bake and present similar cakes to the goddess Venus, or Astarte; (the moon;) and after they professed Christianity, they thought that this honour might now be best shown to Mary.† This superstition was condemned by Epiphanius, Bishop of Salamis, and a canonized saint of the Romish Church, in as strong terms as if he had foreseen the hyperdulia, or transcendent kind of service, with which Romanists would one day worship the Virgin Mary. 'What Scripture,' he says, 'has delivered anything concerning this?

[" * Miller's Letter to the Rev. E. B. Pusey, D.D., p. 62. London, 1840. 8vo.

[" † Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History, cent iv., book ii., part ii., chap. v., sect. 25; vol i., pp. 414, 415, of Dr. Murdock's accurate translation, edited by Mr. Soames.

Which of the Prophets have permitted a man to be worshipped, that I may not say a woman? For a choice vessel she is, indeed, but yet a woman.'.....'The body of Mary was holy, indeed, but NOT God. The Virgin, indeed, was a virgin and honourable, but not given to us for adoration, but one that did herself worship Him who was born of her in the flesh, and (who) came down from heaven out of the bosom of his Father.' After censuring the Collyridians at considerable length for invoking the Virgin as a goddess, he sums up the whole in the following very emphatic terms:—'Let Mary be in honour; but let the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit be worshipped. Let no one worship Mary." *

["The worship of the Virgin Mary, which had continued to spread between the fourth and ninth centuries, was in the tenth century carried much further than before. Towards its close the custom became prevalent, in the Latin or Western Church, of celebrating masses, and abstaining from flesh on Saturdays, in honour of St. Mary. In the next place, the Daily or Lesser Office of St. Mary was introduced, which was subsequently confirmed by Urban II. in the Council of Clermont. And, lastly, tolerably distinct traces of the Rosary and Crown of St. Mary, as they are called, or of praying according to a numerical arrangement, are to be found in this century. The Rosary consists of fifteen Pater Nosters, or repetitions of the Lord's Prayer, and one hundred and fifty Ave Marias, or salutations of the Virgin Mary; and the Crown of St. Mary consists of six or seven repetitions of the Lord's Prayer, and sixty or seventy salutations.† Succeeding ages have witnessed the invention of additional superstitious services in honour of the blessed Virgin.

["We now propose to show, from the irrefragable evidence of reputed saints and Doctors of the Romish Church, as well as from her authorized formularies of public devotion, and from accredited manuals of private devotion, that the worship of the Virgin Mary is taught and enforced by the modern Church of Rome; and the practice of it shall then be demonstrated from the testimonies of modern travellers.

["I. Our first class of evidence shall be drawn from a few of the principal reputed saints and Doctors of the Romish Church.

["1. We commence with the blessed Peter Damian, Cardinal Bishop of Ostia, about the middle of the eleventh century. In his first sermon on the nativity of the Virgin Mary, he thus identifies the Almighty with her. Having asserted that God is (or exists) in all created things in four ways, he says, 'In a fourth manner he exists in one creature, namely, the Virgin Mary, by identity, because he is the same as she is.'‡ And in his apostrophe to the Virgin, he actually ascribes omnipotence to her: 'He that is mighty has done great things in thee; and all power is given unto thee in heaven and on earth.' §

["2. St. Bernard was Abbot of Clairvaux, in France, at the close of the eleventh and in the former half of the twelfth century. He wrote numerous homilies in honour of the blessed Virgin, besides making very frequent mention of her in his other writings. Having affirmed that the word Mary signifies 'star of the sea,' and endeavoured to show how appropriate it is to the Virgin, he proceeds thus to exhort his hearers to the worship of her:—

["'If the waves of temptation arise, if thou runnest against the rocks of tribulation, look to the star, call Mary. If thou art tossed on the waves of pride, ambition, detraction, or emulation, look to the star, call Mary. If passion, or avarice, or the allurement of the flesh, toss the little bark of (thy) mind, look to Mary. If, disturbed by the heinousness of (thy) crimes, confounded by the filthiness of (thy) conscience, dismayed with horror of judgment, thou beginnest to be swallowed up in the gulf of sorrow, the abyss of despair, think on Mary. In dangers, in difficulties, in doubtful affairs, think on Mary, call upon Mary. Let her not depart from (thy) mouth, let her not depart from (thy) heart; and, in order that thou mayest obtain the suffrage of her prayer, forsake not the example of her conversation. If thou follow her, thou dost not deviate; if thou supplicate her, thou dost not despair; if thou think of her, thou dost not err. If she uphold thee, thou dost not fall; if she protect thee, thou hast no cause for fear; if she be thy leader, thou art not fatigued; if she be propitious, thou obtainest (thy requests); and thus thou dost experience in thyself how deservedly it is said, And the name of the Virgin was Mary.' *

["Elsewhere, Bernard terms the Virgin a mediator to the Mediator (Jesus Christ), and adds, that there is none more useful to us than Mary;† to whom we are to have recourse as an advocate with Him,‡ and as the woman who was to bruise the serpent's head.§ This application of Gen. iii. 15 to the woman, rather than to the Seed of the woman, the Lord Jesus Christ, by Bernard, we may incidentally remark, proves how ancient is the corruption, in this passage, of the Latin Vulgate version of the Scriptures, which reads ipsa for ipse. That this rendering of the Romanists is false, is proved by the evidence of the Septuagint version, the Chaldee paraphrase on the Pentateuch, and by the old Syriac version, all of which refer the pronoun 'it' to the seed

["* 'Εν τιμῃ εστω Μαρια· ὁ δε Πατηρ, και Υἱος, και Ἅγιον Πνευμα, προσκυνεισθω· ΤΗΝ ΜΑΡΙΑΝ ΜΗΔΕΙΣ ΠΡΟΣΚΥΝΕΙΤΩ.'—Epiphanius adversus Hæreses, lib. iii., Hær. 79.

["† Mosheim's Eccles. Hist., by Murdock and Soames, vol. ii., p. 299, cent. x., part ii., chap. iv., sect. 3.

["‡ 'Quarto modo inest uni creaturæ, videlicet Mariæ Virgini, identitate, quia idem est quod illa.'—Surius, De probatis Sanctorum Historiis, tom. v., p. 113.

["§ 'Fecit in te magna, qui potens est; et data est TIBI omnis potestas in cælo' (cœlo) 'et in terra.'—Ibid., p. 114.

["* 'Si insurgant venti tentationum, si incurras scopulos tribulationum, respice stellam, voca Mariam. Si jactaris superbiæ undis, si ambitionis, si detractionis, si æmulationis, respice stellam, voca Mariam. Si iracundia, aut avaritia, aut carnis illecebra naviculam concusserit mentis, respice ad Mariam. Si criminum immanitate turbatus, conscientiæ fœditate confusus, judicii horrore perterritus, barathro incipias absorberi tristitiæ, desperationis abysso, cogita Mariam. In periculis, in angustiis, in rebus dubiis, Mariam cogita, Mariam invoca. Non recedat ab ore; non recedat a corde; et, ut impetres ejus orationis suffragium, non deseras conversationis exemplum. Ipsam sequens, non devias; ipsam rogans, non desperas; ipsam cogitans, non erras. Ipsa tenente, non corruis; ipsa protegente, non metuis; ipsa duce, non fatigaris; ipsa propitia, pervenis: et sic in temetipso experiris quam merito dictum sit, Et nomen Virginis Maria.'—Bernardi Opera, à Mabillon, vol. i., col. 743, C. D. Paris, 1690.

["† 'Opus est enim mediatore ad Mediatorem istum; nec alter nobis utilior quam Maria.'—Col. 1006, E.

["‡ 'Advocatum vis habere et ad ipsum' (Jesum Christum)? 'Ad Mariam recurre.'—Col. 1014, F.

["§ 'Quam tibi aliam prædixisse Deus videtur, quando ad serpentem ait, Inimicitias ponam inter te et mulierem? Et, si adhuc dubitas quod de Maria non dixerit, audi quod sequitur, Ipsa conteret caput tuum. Cui hæc servata victoria est, nisi Mariæ? Ipsa procul dubio caput contrivit venenatum, quæ omnimodam maligni suggestionem tam de carnis illecebra, quam de mentis superbia, deduxit ad nihilum.'—Col. 738, A.

of the woman, and not to the woman herself.* The very ancient manuscript of the Latin Vulgate version in the British Museum, which is acknowledged to be one of the copies of Alcuin's recension of that version, and which was written about the middle of the eighth century, has this corrupt reading, which was most probably introduced in order to support the growing superstition of the age in favour of the Virgin Mary. The following 'Prayer of St. Bernard to the blessed Virgin' is extracted from the 'Little Office, Litany, and Mass, of the Sacred Heart of Jesus:'†—

["'Remember, O most pious Virgin! it is a thing unheard of, that thou ever forsakest those who have recourse to thee. Encouraged with this hope and confidence, my most dear mother, I, a most miserable sinner, cast myself at thy sacred feet, humbly begging that thou wilt adopt me as thy son for ever, and take upon thee the care of my eternal salvation. Do not, mother of the Word incarnate, reject my petition, but graciously hear and grant it. Amen.' (Page 35.)

["3. An interpretation of Gen. iii. 15, similar to that just cited from Bernard, was written by the blessed Albert the Great, Bishop of Ratisbon, about the middle of the thirteenth century; who, in his Biblia Marialia, affirms that the Virgin Mary is the 'heaven' and the 'light' which the Almighty created, and the throne of mercy to which the sinner comes for pardon.‡ The limits necessarily assigned to this publication prohibit even the smallest selection of passages from his twelve books in praise of the Virgin Mary, which fill nearly the entire twenty-first volume of the folio edition of his Works, printed at Lyons, in 1651.

["4. St. Bonaventure, Cardinal Bishop of Albano, is accounted one of the most eminent saints of the Romish Church: he lived in the middle and latter part of the thirteenth century. In the fifth lesson of the special service in his honour, appointed for the 14th of July, (on which day he died in 1474,§) we are informed, that 'he wrote many things; in which, combining the greatest learning with ardent piety, he affects the reader while he instructs him.'* Bonaventure wrote many pieces in honour of the Virgin Mary: particularly the 'Mirror of the Blessed Virgin Mary,' (Speculum Beatæ Mariæ Virginis,) the 'Office on the Compassion of the Blessed Virgin Mary,' (De Compassione B. Mariæ Virginis Officium,) the 'Crown of the Blessed Virgin Mary,' (Corona B. Mariæ Virginis,) the 'Praise of the Blessed Virgin Mary,' (Laus B. Mariæ Virginis,) the 'Lesser Psalter of the Blessed Virgin Mary,' (Psalterium Minus B. Mariæ Virginis,) and the 'Psalter of the Blessed Virgin' (Psalterium B. Mariæ Virginis).

["(1.) Of these various treatises the Psalter† is, perhaps, the best known. Taking every one of the hundred and fifty Psalms of David, the Seraphic Doctor, Bonaventure, so changes the commencement of each as to address them, not as the inspired Psalmist did, to the Lord Jehovah, the one only Lord God Almighty, but to the Virgin Mary; inserting much of his own composition, and then adding the Gloria Patri to each. So offensive to Papists are these specimens of direct invocation to the Virgin Mary, that some of them have affirmed, that this Psalter has been put into the Roman Index of Prohibited Books, while others have not hesitated to assert that it never was written by Bonaventure.

["In reply to these false assertions, it is sufficient to state, that a careful examination of all the Indexes of Prohibited Books, issued under the auspices of the Romish Church, has demonstrated, that the Psalter of Bonaventure is not to be found in any one of them.‡ And in ["* Bishop Beveridge's Works, vol. ii., p. 193; and vol. ix., pp. 233, 234. 8vo. edit.

["† 'Praise be to Jesus! the Little Office, and Litany, and Mass of the Sacred Heart of Jesus.'.....Published by 'Ferguson, 108, Patrick-street, Cork, 1836.' 24mo.

["‡ 'Gen. i. 1: In principio creavit Deus cœlum et terram. Cœlum, scilicet, empyreum, per quod intelligitur Domina mundi, Virgo Maria.

["'Ipsa etiam dicitur Lux. Gen. i. Tenebræ erant super faciem abyssi. Tenebræ ignorantiæ et cæcitatis super faciem cordis humani. Dixitque Deus, Fiat Lux; id est, Maria generetur et nascatur.'—Biblia Marialia, p. 1, col. 1, Op. tom. 21. Lugduni, 1651.

["'Job xxiii. 3. Item ipsa est misericordiæ solium, ad quod veniens peccator, absolvitur. Quis mihi tribuat ut veniam ad solium ejus? id est, usque ad Mariam, quæ solium est misericordiæ.'—Ibid., p. 12, col. 2.

["§ The following are the prayers in use in the Romish Church on the 14th of July, the feast of 'St. Bonaventure, Bishop, Confessor, Doctor.' We give them in the translation printed in page 630 of 'The Missal for the Use of the Laity.'.....'Newly arranged, and in great measure translated, by the Rev. F. C. Husenbeth. Third edition, improved, with the approbation of all the Right Revs. the Vicars Apostolic of England.' London: C. Dolman, 61, New Bond-street, 1840. 12mo.

["'SECRET.—We beseech thee, O Lord, that the annual solemnity of holy Bonaventure, thy Confessor and Bishop, may render us acceptable to thy mercy; that, by these offices of pious expiation, while our blessed retribution attends him, he may procure for us the gifts of thy grace: through our Lord,' &c.

["'POSTCOM. Deus fidelium.—'O God, the rewarder of faithful souls, grant that we may obtain pardon by the prayers of blessed Bonaventure, thy Confessor and Bishop, whose venerable festival we celebrate: through our Lord,' &c.

["'* 'Multa scripsit, in quibus summam eruditionem cum pari pietatis ardore conjungens, lectorem docendo movet.'—Breviarium Romanum. Pars Æstiva, p. 495. Edidit F. C. Husenbeth. Norvici, 1830."

["† "Never has effort encountered a more miserable failure than that of Rome, to screen her Church and her seraphic saint from responsibility for the infamously-idolatrous Psalterium B. V. Mariæ. If the saint should escape, which he cannot, the Church must bear the whole burden. In the fifteenth century the work was frequently published as Bonaventure's, both separately and in company with other works of his, called his Opuscula, in four parts. In the first formal and entire collection of his works, published under the patronage of Sixtus V. in 1587, not only was this included, without any expression of doubt, but the prefixed Life by Pet. Galesinius, p. 19, particularly specifies it as his; and the preface to the sixth volume, where the Opuscula begin, by Franc. Lamata, while it discusses the authorship of other writings of Bonaventure, has no objection to notice with regard to the Psalterium. Repetitions of this edition leave the subject precisely in the same state. No voice even repudiating it as belonging to the saint was heard, till long after the commencement of the Reformation. All the more ancient of Papal writers admitted or defended it, as L. Wadding, Canisius, and others. In modern times Romanists have thought it most politic to deny its authenticity, such as Dr. Doyle, in his edition of Alban Butler's Lives of the Saints, under Bonaventure, H. Sbaralea, in his Supplement to Wadding's Bibl. Francisc., and Manning, in his Answer to Leslie's Case stated; all upon grounds too puerile to be mentioned, and the last particularly on the supposition, only to be palliated by extraordinary ignorance, that the Psalterium was inserted in the Index of Prohibited Books. We may add, that repeated editions of this work have been published with authority in modern times in Papal districts: witness the Italian translation by Pinelli at Genoa in 1606, as we learn from Mr. Horne, and another in verse by Nic. Fava in Bologna, 1734, as appears, together with the former, in Paitoni's Bibl. degli Autori Volgarizzati, 1766, tom. i., pp. 194, 195. Parts of the Psalterium are given in the Tributo Quotidiano, &c., alla immaculato Madre di Dio, &c. Roma, 1836. Part of this information may be found in the almost complete work of Robert King, A.B., of Trinity College, Dublin, in 1840, and the highly valuable Mariolatry of the Rev. T. H. Horne, pp. 13—24. Second edition. The notable Glories of Mary, by St. Liguori, is rich enough in Marian idolatry, and the reference in p. 3 seems to be from the Psalter: we speak cautiously, because it may happen to be in some other part of the Seraphic Doctor's aberrations."—Communicated by the Rev. Joseph Mendham.

["‡ King's Psalter of the Blessed Virgin Mary, illustrated by extracts from the works of ecclesiastical writers, (Dublin, 1840,) pp. 83, 84. Rev. H. T. Powell's Roman Fallacies and Catholic Truths. Appendix, pp. 15—17

disproof of its pretended spuriousness we may remark, that its genuineness is proved by the facts, first, that it is included in the body of the Vatican edition of Bonaventure's Works, published at Rome under the auspices of Pope Sixtus V., the Editors of which assure us that they have thrown into the Appendix all the works concerning the genuineness of which there was any doubt;* and, secondly, it is further recommended, in the strongest terms, by the highest individual authority in the Romish Church: for the Bull issued by Sixtus V., and prefixed to the first volume of Bonaventure's Works, has stamped the Psalter of the Blessed Virgin with the highest approbation. No doubt whatever existed at that time in the Romish Church concerning its author:—

["'It was, therefore, one of those works which were to be cited, adduced, and referred to, whenever occasion should require, in seminaries, schools, colleges, academies, lessons, disputings, interpretations, sermons, and all other ecclesiastical exercises. The Psalter thus recommended was very generally read and admired: and if its reputation may be judged of by the number of editions (not fewer than twenty-eight between the year 1476, when it was first published at Venice, and 1823, when it was reprinted at Rouen) through which it has passed, certainly we cannot well conceive how it could have risen much higher.'†

["But what proves beyond doubt the genuineness of Bonaventure's Psalter of the Blessed Virgin, is the fact that it was early paraphrased in the Italian language, as an undoubted production of the Seraphic Doctor, and that a considerable part of it is embodied in the Tributo Quotidiano di Affettuose Preghiere e Lodi per ciascun Giorno della Settimana alla Immacolata Madre di Dio, Madre di Misericordia e Refugio de' Peccatori, Maria SS.....Tratte dalle opere del Seraf. D. S. Bonaventura; or, 'Daily Tribute of Affectionate Prayers and Praises, for every Day in the Week, to the Immaculate Mother of God, the Mother of Mercy, and Refuge of Sinners, the Most Holy Mary;'.....'Drawn from the works of the Seraph(ic) D(octor,) S(aint) Bonaventura.'* Two editions of this manual of devotion are now before us, printed in 64mo, which are sold at Rome for three halfpence per copy. One has the imprint of 'Roma, vendibile nella Libreria Marini, Piazza del Collegio Romano, N. 4, 1836;' which is authorized by the re-imprimatur of 'Fr. Angelus V. Modena, S. P. M. S.,' and of 'A. Piatti Archiep. Trapez. Vicesg.' The other edition has the imprint of 'Roma, 1839,' (on the wrapper, 1840,) 'presso Alessandro Monaldi, Via Sistina, n. 47, Piazza del Gesù, n. 65.' It also has the imprimatur of 'Fr. V. A. Modena, O. P. S. P., Apost. Magister Soc.;' and of 'A. Piatti Patriarch. Antioch. Vicesg.' When it is recollected that so rigid is the censorship over the press at Rome, that not even a hand-bill can be printed without the licence of the Master of the Apostolic Palace and his deputy, our readers will readily conclude that this Tributo Quotidiano, or 'Daily Tribute' to the Virgin Mary, could not have been printed, if the devotions which it contains had not been in strict conformity with the genuine doctrine of the Romish Church.

["We will now give some specimens of entire Psalms from the Psalter of Bonaventure, first in Latin and English, and then in Italian and English, premising only that it is expressly stated, in the Tributo Quotidiano, (p. 15,) that the Psalms are taken from a little work of St. Bonaventure, intituled, 'The Psalter of the Blessed Virgin.' I Salmi si sono desunti dall' opuscolo di S. Bonaventura, intitolato de Psalterio B. V.:—

["PSALMUS I.

["Beatus vir qui diligit nomen tuum, Maria Virgo: gratia tua animum ejus confortabit.

["Tanquam aquarum fontibus irrigatum vber: in eo fructum justitiæ propagabis.

["Benedicta tu inter mulieres: per credulitatem cordis sancti tui.

["Vniversas enim fœminas vincis pulchritudine carnis: superas angelos et archangelos excellentia sanctitatis.

["Misericordia tua et gratia vbique prædicatur: Deus operibus manuum tuarum benedixit. Gloria Patri, &c.‡

["PSALM I.

["Blessed is the man that loveth thy name, (O) Virgin Mary: thy grace shall strengthen his heart.

["As a fertile (spot) moistened by streams of water: thou shalt plant in him the fruit of righteousness.

["Blessed art thou among women: for the believing disposition of thy sacred heart.

["For in the beauty of thy flesh thou surpassest all women: thou excellest angels and archangels in the excellency of holiness.

["Thy mercy and grace are everywhere told forth: and God hath blessed the works of thy hands. Glory be to the Father, &c.

["SALMO I.

["Beato è quell' uomo, che nutre affetto di devozione del vostro nome, O Maria: giacchè il favor vostro porterà conforto al suo spirito.

["E quasi in giardino da fresca fonte inaffiato: propagherete in lui l'eletto frutto di giustizia.

["PSALM I.

["Blessed is the man who cherishes a feeling of devotion for your name, O Mary: since your favour will bring comfort to his spirit.

["And as it were in a garden watered by a fresh fountain: you will increase in him the choice fruit of justice (or righteousness).

["* The Roman or Vatican edition of the Works of Bonaventure was reprinted at Mayence, in Germany, in 1609, and again at Lyons, in France, in 1668, both in seven volumes, folio. The edition from which our quotations are made is that of Mayence. It is intituled, 'Sancti Bonaventuræ ex Ordine Minorum, S. R. E. Episcopi, Card. Albanen., eximii Eccles. Doctoris, Opera, Sixti V., Pont. Max., jvssv diligentissime emendata, libris ejvs mvltis vndique conqvisitis avcta. Quæ omnia, in tomos septem distributa, nunc primum in Germania post correctissimam Roman. Vaticanam editionem prodeunt in lucem. Mogvntiæ, sumptibus Antonii Hierati, bibliopolæ Coloniensis. Permissu Superiorum, anno MDCIX.'

["† King's Psalter of the Blessed Virgin Mary illustrated, pp. 84, 85.

["‡ Bonaventuræ Opera, tom. vi., p. 478, col. 2.

["* 'Salmi di S. Bonaventura in Lode della Vergine, volgarizzati e brieuemente sposti per Giovan Battista Pinello. In Genoua, MDCVI.;' that is, 'The Psalms of St. Bonaventure in Praise of the Virgin, translated and briefly explained by John Baptist Pinello. Genoa, 1606.' It is a quarto volume of 373 pages, exclusive of indexes, and is printed con licenza de' superiori, 'with permission of the superiors.'

[" Benedetta voi siete infra le donne: per la fede, che regna nel vostro cuore.

[" L'amabilità del vostro aspetto supera in verità quella d'ogni terrena creatura; l'altezza della vostra santità quella sorpassa degli angioli e degli arcangeli.

[" La vostra misericordia e grazia, onde siete ricolma, si celebrano per tutto il mondo con somme lodi: ha Iddio benedetto le vostre operazioni.

[" Sia gloria al Padre, ec.*

[" Blessed are you among women, through the faith which reigns in your heart.

[" The loveliness of your countenance exceeds in truth that of every earthly creature; the loftiness of your holiness surpasses that of angels and archangels.

[" Your mercy and grace, with which you abound, let them celebrate through the whole world with supreme praises: God has blessed your works.

[" Glory be to the Father, &c."] *

[A German translation of this Psalter was published at Vienna in 1841, entitled, " Guldener Psalter des Heiligen Bonaventura, Cardinal-Bischofs zu Albano, und Kirchenlehrers. Zu ehren unserer Lieben Frau, in allen Nothen und Anliegen zu bethen. Aus dem Lateinischen uebersetzt von J. P. Gilbert. Zweite Auflage. Wien., 1841. Bei J. H. Wallishausser." That is, " The Golden Psalter of St. Bonaventure, Cardinal-Bishop of Albano, and Doctor of the Church. In honour of our dear Lady, to be used in prayer in all troubles and necessities. Translated from the Latin by J. P. Gilbert. Second edition. Vienna, 1841; (published) by J. H. Wallishausser." 12mo., pp. 180. With a Madonna and Child for frontispiece.

[" PSALM I.

[" Selig der meusch der deinen namen liebt, O heilige Jungfrau Maria! Kraftigen wird deine guade seine seele.

[" Gleich wird sein herz seyn einem wohl-bewässerten-erdreich; reichliche früchte der gerechtigkeit werden darin durch deine milde aufsprossen.

[" Gesegnet bist du unter den wiebern, durch den treuen glauben deiner heiligen herzens!

[" Hoch überglänzt die schöne deines jungfraülichen autlitzes das ganze frauëngeschlect; hoch die erzhabenheit deiner heiligkeit, alle engel send erzengel!

[" Der ganze erdkreis ertöut von deiner barmherzikeit und gnade. Die werke deiner hande hat der Herr gesegnet.

[" Ehre sey dem Fater, &c.†

[" PSALM I.

[" Blessed is the man that loveth thy name, O holy Virgin Mary! Thy grace shall strengthen his soul.

[" His heart will be like to a well-watered ground; abundant fruits of righteousness, through thy goodness, will spring up therein.

[" Blessed art thou among women, through the faithful belief of thy holy heart!

[" The beauty of thy virgin countenance surpasses in brightness the whole of womankind; the elevation of thy holiness far outshines all angels and archangels!

[" The whole earth resounds with thy mercy and grace. The works of thy hands the Lord hath blessed.

[" Glory be to the Father, &c.

[" H. de K."]

[" PSALMUS XXX.

[" In te, Domina, speravi, non confundar in æternum: in gratia tua suscipe me.

[" Tu es fortitudo mea et refugium meum: consolatio mea et protectio mea.

[" Ad te, Domina, clamavi, dum tribularetur cor meum: et exaudisti me de vertice collium æternorum.

[" Educas me de laqueo quem absconderunt mihi: quoniam tu es adiutrix mea.

[" In manus tuas, Domina, commendo spiritum meum: totam vitam meam et ultimum diem meum. Gloria Patri, &c.‡

[" PSALM XXX.

[" In thee, (O) Lady, have I put my trust; let me never be put to confusion: in thy grace uphold me.

[" Thou art my strength and my refuge: my consolation and my protection.

[" Unto thee have I cried, (O) Lady, when my heart was in heaviness: and thou hast heard me from the top of the everlasting hills.

[" Draw me out of the net that they have laid privily for me: for thou art my helper.

[" Into thy hands, (O) Lady, I commend my spirit: my whole life and my last day. Glory be to the Father, &c.

[" SALMO XXX.

[" In voi ho riposta, O Signora, la mia speranza, non resterò in eterno confuso: ricevetemi, ve nè supplico, nella vostra grazia.

[" Piegate benigna l'orecchio vostro a' miei preghi: e nella tristizia mia consolatemi.

[" Voi siete la mia fortezza e il mio sicuro asilo, mia consolazione e mia difesa.

[" A voi nell' afflizion del mio cuore sollevai supplichevole le mie voci; e dagli eterni colli pronta mi esaudiste.

[" Nelle mani vostre affido, Signora, il mio spirito; a voi raccomando la vita mia, ma più l'estremo mio giorno.

[" Sia gloria al Padre, ec.

[" PSALM XXX.

[" In you, O Lady, have I reposed my hope; I shall not eternally be put to confusion: receive me, I pray, into your favour.

[" Bow down your favourable ear to my prayers: and in my sorrow console me.

[" You are my strength and my safe refuge, my consolation and my defence.

[" To you, in the affliction of my heart, I raised my suppliant voice; and from the eternal hills you have favourably heard me.

[" Into your hands, (O) Lady, I commend my spirit; to you I commend my life, but chiefly my last day.

[" Glory be to the Father, &c.

[" * Tributo Quotidiano, pp. 15, 16, of the edition of 1836; and p. 16, of the edition of 1839."]

[" † Guldener Psalter, &c., p. 1.

[" ‡ Bonaventuræ Opera, tom. vi., p. 480, col. 2.

[* Mariolatry, pp. 18, 19. Second edition. London, 1841.]

[" Antif. Nelle vostre mani raccommando, O Signora, il mio spirito, tutta la vita mia, ma più l'estremo mio giorno.

[" Antif. Muovetevi a pietà.*

[" PSALM XXX.

[" Auf dich, O Herrin, habe ich gehofft, nicht zu schanden werde ich werden in ewigkeit; nimm mich auf in deine gnade.

[" Du bist meine kraft und meine zuflucht, du meine trost und meine beschirmung!

[" Zu dir, Herrin, rief ich auf, als mein herg in trubsalen schmachtete, und du erhörtest mich vom gipfel der ewigen hügel!

[" O erledige meine fusse von den schlingen die sie vor mir verbargen; den du bist ja meine helferrin.

[" In deine hände, unsere liebe Frau, empfehle ich meinen geist, mein ganzes leben, und den letzten meiner tage.

[" Ehre sey dem Fater, &c.†

[" Antiphon. Into your hands, O Lady, I commend my spirit, during my whole life, but chiefly on my last day.

[" Antiphon. Be moved to compassion."] *

[" PSALM XXX.

[" In thee, O Lady, have I hoped, I shall never be put to shame; receive me into thy favour.

[" Thou art my strength and my refuge, my consolation and my defence!

[" To thee, O Lady, did I cry, when my heart languished in misery, and thou heardest me from the summit of the everlasting hills.

[" O deliver my feet from the net that they have privily laid for me; for thou art surely my helper.

[" Into thine hands, our dear Lady, do I commend my spirit, my whole life, and the last of my days.

[" Glory be to the Father, &c.

["H. de K."]

[" (5.) We now come to another reputed saint of the Romish Church, Alphonso Liguori, who died in 1787, in the ninetieth year of his age, and was canonized by Gregory XVI., on the 26th of May, 1839. 'The number of prayers and beautiful hymns which he composed in her honour, and numerous works of piety, especially his Glories of Mary, and his Visits to the Holy Virgin, attest his extraordinary devotion to her.'‡ The latter publication we have not met with; but his Glories of Mary are now before us.§ This publication is a paraphrase on the hymn Salve Regina, in twenty-one meditations, which the translator has dedicated 'To Mary, ever Virgin, the most humble and exalted of all pure creatures, the Queen of angels and of men, the Mother of God!' 'The sacred congregation of rites having made the most rigorous examination of the writings of the saint, to the number of a hundred or more, pronounced that there was nothing in them worthy of censure;' and as 'this sentence was approved by Pius VII., in 1803,' we conclude that the sentiments of this reputed saint are actually those of the modern Church of Rome. We can only give a few short extracts from this publication:—

[" 'During the pontificate of Gregory the Great, the people of Rome experienced, in a most striking manner, the protection of the blessed Virgin. A frightful pestilence raged in the city to such an extent, that thousands were carried off, and so suddenly, that they had not time to make the least preparation. It could not be arrested by the vows and prayers which the holy Pope caused to be offered in all quarters, until he resolved on having recourse to the Mother of God. Having commanded the Clergy and people to go in procession to the church of Our Lady, called St. Mary Major, carrying the picture of the Holy Virgin, painted by St. Luke, the miraculous effects of her intercession were soon experienced: in every street, as they passed, the plague ceased; and before the end of the procession an angel in human form was seen on the tower of Adrian, named ever since the Castle of St. Angelo, sheathing a bloody sabre. At the same moment the angels were heard singing the anthem, Regina Cœli, Triumph, O Queen, &c., and Alleluia. The holy Pope added, Ora pro nobis Deum, Pray for, &c. The Church has since used this anthem to salute the blessed Virgin in Easter time.' "†]‡

CHAPTER V.

WORSHIP OF SAINTS—CONCLUDED.

I. ARGUMENTS OF THE ROMANISTS ANSWERED. 1. From the supereminence of the saints: 2. The Church appoints feasts: 3. The Council of Trent has enjoined such worship: 4. Analogy between the saints and the courts of Princes: 5. The honour ascribed to saints ultimately referred to Christ: 6. His greatness and majesty: 7. Jer. xv. 1, considered: 8. The patriarchal worship of angels: 9. The names and merits of Patriarchs used in prayer: 10. Miracles employed in favour of the invocation of saints: 11. The assertion that they only pray to the saints to intercede for them.—II. ARGUMENTS AGAINST IT. 1. The doctrine is not contained in Scripture: 2. It is contrary to the prescribed form of divine worship: 3. And to Scripture: 4. The Church of Rome is idolatrous. Conclusion.

I. WE advert to the arguments which Roman Catholics use in order to sustain their doctrine and practice.

1. Dens argues, "Because the saints possess supernatural excellence, and are the friends of God, it is reasonable to worship them."§ Now, if mere excellence were a sufficient reason for adoration, then every inferior being ought to worship those who are superior to him; and one uniform course of idolatry would be established in heaven and upon earth. Nor would the supernatural character of the excellence change the nature of the evil; for still the worship would be the same in both cases.

2. The same writer affirms, "that the Church has appointed the feasts of the saints; so that their worship ["* Tributo Quotidiano, pp. 25, 26, of the edition of 1836; and pp. 24, 25, of the edition of 1839.

["† Guldener Psalter, &c., p. 37."]

["‡ Kenrick's New Month of Mary, p. 59. 12mo. London, 1841.

["§ The Glories of Mary, Mother of God; translated from the Italian of blessed Alphonso Liguori, and carefully revised by a Catholic Priest: containing a beautiful Paraphrase on the Salve Regina. 18mo. Dublin. Coyne, 1833."

[* Mariolatry, pp. 19, 20. Second edition. London, 1841.]

["† The Glories of Mary, &c., p. 21."]

[‡ Mariolatry, &c., pp. 24—26.]

[§ "Proba, sanctos in cœlo esse colendos et honorandos cultu duliæ.—R. Probatur ex eo, quod habeant excellentiam supernaturalem et sint amici Dei; adeoque ratio ad eos colendos vere subsistit." —Dens Theol., tom. v., No. 24, De Cultu et Invocatione Sanctorum.] may be said to be established by precept."* Here the practice is said to be established on church authority alone. But we deny that she has any such power, to institute a species of worship, which is unsupported by, and contrary to, the word of God.

3. Dens asserts, that the saints are to be invoked, because the Council of Trent has enjoined it.† We must reply, that the Scripture has nowhere authorized it, and this is a sufficient answer.

4. Romanists say, "That it is through the ministers of court that subjects have access to Kings; hence, it is through his saints that men may most effectually have recourse to God." To this argument, however, it is easy to reply. The acts of the Almighty are not to be judged by human proceedings, which are polluted by imbecility and sin. Jehovah declared, "I am God, and not man." (Hosea xi.) "For my thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways, saith the Lord. For as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways, and my thoughts than your thoughts." (Isai. lv. 8, 9.) It is profane, in this respect, to judge the ways of God by those of men. Princes would not listen to their subjects who complained of their negligence, pride, or inability to succour them. By a similar mode of reasoning, the idolatries of the Gentiles were defended.

5. We are informed that "the honour ascribed to the saints is ultimately referred to Christ." This is contrary to the declared will of God, which asserts that he alone is to be worshipped, and that his glory he will not give to another.

6. It is also stated, that "Christ is too exalted to be affected by our miseries; but that we may flee to the saints, who are more ready to hear, because they have been our fellow-sufferers, and are experienced in our sorrows." This argument is contrary to the declaration of Scripture: "For we have not an High Priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin. Let us therefore come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need." (Heb. iv. 15, 16.) "Christ is at the right hand of God, and maketh intercession for us." (Rom. viii. 34.) "Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden," &c. (Matt. xi. 28.) "Whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my name, he will give it you." (John xvi. 23.)

7. Jeremiah xv. 1 is adduced: "Though Moses and Samuel stood before me, yet my mind could not be toward this people." The sense of the expression shows that Moses and Samuel were not then standing before the Lord for the people, proving that intercession for the dead was then unknown. And supposing they stood before the Lord, it does not follow that they should be invoked. Romanists, therefore, cannot consistently say, that Moses and Samuel stood before the Lord; for they teach, that the Patriarchs were in limbo before the passion of Christ, and were not admitted to the vision of God. The meaning of the Prophet is this, that the sin of idolatry was so abominable in the sight of the Most High, that should even devout persons, as Moses and Samuel, pray for the idolatrous Israelites, he would neither heal nor spare the people. In the same manner God declares, in Ezek. xiv. 14, "Though these three men, Noah, Daniel, and Job, were in it, they should deliver but their own souls by their righteousness, saith the Lord."

8. It is stated, that "Abraham, Lot, and Joshua, men celebrated for piety, are represented as having worshipped angels, and as having fallen down before them. (Gen. xviii. 2; xix. 1; Joshua v. 14.) Therefore it is lawful and praiseworthy to give religious adoration to angels and living men noted for piety: consequently it is not less lawful to worship the saints actually reigning with Christ."* We observe:—

First, It is certain that the angel whom Abraham worshipped was God himself, even Christ, who appeared in the form of an angel. He is called Jehovah, (verse 17,) a name never given in Scripture to any created angel: in verse 25, Abraham calls him "the Judge of all the earth," which is an office belonging to Christ. Secondly, It cannot be shown from the text that Lot offered any religious worship to the messengers: he made obeisance, or bowed himself before them, as was the common mode of salutation in the East. So Jacob bowed before his brother Esau. Thirdly, The Angel that appeared to Joshua was Christ himself. Joshua called him Lord, and himself his servant. But angels are not lords over men, who are their fellow-servants. The words here used by this Angel, "Loose thy shoe from off thy foot," &c., are the same which the Angel on Mount Sinai spoke to Moses. (Exod. iii. 5—8.) He was doubtless the same person who appeared in both places; and the phrase here used is one which pertains to God alone. Origen says, "Joshua would not have worshipped him, if he had not known him to be God; for who else is the Prince of the Lord's warfare but the Lord Jesus Christ?" Fourthly, The angels of the Old and New Testaments are all one; but in the New Testament they refuse to be adored; (Rev. xxii. 8, 9;) therefore the angels of the Old Testament did not receive adoration.

9. Romanists plead that in the Old Testament the names and merits of the Patriarchs are urged as reasons why God should have mercy: "O God of my father Abraham, and God of my father Isaac." (Gen. xxxii. 9; Exod. xxxii. 13; Deut. ix. 27. "For thy servant David's sake," &c. (Psalm cxxxii. 10.) The Scripture plainly declares, that by these phrases the ancients referred to the covenant made with their fathers, and which was established by the oath of God. (Exod. xxxii. 13; Deut. xxvi. 16—19.) They allude to the promises made to the fathers, and to the benefit of God's covenant with them, when they say, "Remember Abraham." God indeed promises that, on account of the piety of parents, he would be gracious to their children. But the righteous never allege the merits of their ancestors, but the promise of God: they do not say, "Hear us, because they were meritorious," but "because thou hast promised, covenanted, and sworn."

10. They state, that "in behalf of the invocation of saints, miracles have been wrought, which are testimonies of the truth of doctrine." By miracles alone no doctrine can be proved, as the Scripture declares: "If there arise among you a Prophet, or a dreamer of dreams, and giveth thee a sign or a wonder, and the sign or the wonder come to pass whereof he spake unto thee, saying, Let us go after other gods, which thou hast not known, and let us serve them; thou shalt not hearken unto the words of that Prophet, or that dreamer of dreams: for the Lord your God proveth you, to know whether ye love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul." (Deut. xiii. 1—3.) "For many shall come in my name, saying, I am Christ; and shall deceive many. And many false Prophets shall rise, and shall deceive many." (Matt. xxiv. 5, 11.) "Even him, whose coming is after the working of Satan, with all power, and signs, and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish; because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved." (2 Thess. ii. 9, 10.) God may suffer impostors to try the faith of his people, that their religious experience may be tested. He who enjoys the life and power of godliness cannot be drawn aside by idols.

[* "Idem probatur ex eo, quod Ecclesia instituerit festa sanctorum; adeoque cultus sanctorum potest etiam dici esse in præcepto." —Dens Theol., tom. v., No. 24, De Cultu et Invocatione Sanctorum.]

[† "An sancti sunt a nobis invocandi?—R. Cum Concilio Tridentino, sess. xxv., de Invocatione Sanctorum, 'Bonum atque utile esse suppliciter eos invocare—et ad eorum orationes, opem, auxiliumque confugere: illos vero, qui negant sanctos—invocandos esse, aut qui asserunt, vel illos pro hominibus non orare, vel eorum—invocationem esse idololatriam,—impie sentire.'"—Idem.]

[* "Probatio prima ex Scripturis. Abraham, Loth, et Josue, viri certe pietate insignes, exhibentur angelos coluisse et coram illis procidisse. (Gen. xviii. 2; xix. 1; Josh. v. 14.) Ergo licitum est et laudabile angelos et viros pietate insignes in terris adhuc degentes religiose colere: atqui non minus licitum esse debet sanctis cum Christo regnantibus cultum exhibere, uti evidens est."—Bailly Theol. tom. ii., tractat. De Incarnatione, append. cap. ii., De Cultu Sanctorum, prop. i.]

11. The Church of Rome maintains as a general argument, which in their opinion is sufficient to answer all Protestant cavils, that "as we implore the prayers of the living, there is therefore no reason against seeking the suffrages of the saints in heaven;"* and Bishop Milner says, "In short, they (the saints) do nothing for us poor mortals in heaven, but what they did while they were here on earth, and what all good Christians are bound to do for each other; namely, they help us by their prayers."† To which we reply,—

(1.) When we are told, that they only request the saints to pray for them, as we commonly do good men, they do not say what is true. It is utterly false. Their Breviaries, Litanies, and books of devotion show, that they supplicate the saints to befriend them by their own inherent power; to intercede for them at the throne of God, by virtue of their personal merits, in blasphemous derogation to the all-atoning and incommunicable intercession of the Redeemer.

(2.) The plea is disingenuous; for Romanists know well, that the question is concerning unseen and heavenly mediators, not about men like ourselves. We allow it to be the duty of Christians to pray for each other. But there is great difference between desiring good men to pray for us, in the Gospel sense of that duty; and requesting saints and angels to pray for us, in the meaning of Papal rituals. We solicit prayers only as they shall be offered up in the name, and through the merits, of the great and sole Intercessor; and we look for no benefit from them, but on that condition. The Church of Rome addresses herself to saints and angels as intercessors in their own right, and by virtue of their inherent sanctity. Or, rather, she applies to them directly as to saviours, for proper and immediate help; and expects it from the supposed privilege of their rank or merits, independently of their supplications; or, at least, of the manner in which those prayers shall be presented through the name of Christ. The Litanies and forms of prayer, already quoted, show this to be the meaning.

But they say, that the condition of interceding through the merits of Christ is implied, though not expressed. We answer, that, admitting it to be so, there is, nevertheless, a great difference between beseeching saints and angels to pray for us, though in the Gospel form of intercession, and merely requesting good men to pray for us in this manner. The latter is made in a way remote from all appearance of idolatry, and free even from the suspicion of it. The former is preferred in the place, at the time, with the posture, in the language, in short, with all the circumstances and formalities, of divine worship.

When we solicit the prayers of our fellow-creatures, we know that they hear our addresses. We cannot even suppose as much of saints and angels, without ascribing to them the incommunicable attributes of the Almighty. The Scripture saith, "It is God who searcheth the heart and reins," and that he "only knoweth the hearts of the children of men." (Psalm vii. 9; Rev. ii. passim; Jer. xvii. 10; 2 Chron. vi. 30.) Many of the Fathers doubted, whether the saints are acquainted with what is done on earth. Augustine was of opinion, that "they know no more what we do below, than we know what they do in heaven." For proof of this, he quotes the following words of Isaiah: "Though Abraham be ignorant of us, and Israel acknowledge us not." (Isai. lxiii. 16.) Still, it may be insisted, that prayers, whether offered to God by men, or glorified saints, are intercessions; and therefore Protestants, as well as Papists, are guilty of idolatry. This is the hinge on which the question turns; and to show the difference of the two cases, we observe,—

(3.) That the Gospel, in permitting, or rather in commanding, us to ask the prayers of each other, justifies this kind of intercession, and absolves it from the blame and guilt of idolatry. It gives a sanction to this mode of mediating with God, by means of his saints on earth; and does not regard it as a practice that interferes with the mediatorial office of Christ in heaven.

But the same Gospel does not say a word respecting such addresses being directed, or permitted, to be made to angels or spirits. It condemns everything of the kind, under the opprobrious name of unauthorized will-worship. (Col. ii. 23.) Though we be allowed, in some sense, to have good men for our mediators or intercessors on earth, yet in the tabernacle of heaven we have none but Christ. The intercession by means of saints and angels, is against the spirit and letter of religion. It is a practice which, not being enjoined, is forbidden; which, being disallowed, is reprobated. In a word, it intrenches on the prerogatives of the one Mediator in heaven, at God's right hand, who "ever liveth to make intercession for us." (Heb. vii. 25.) It would establish new mediators, without, and even in opposition to, his will: it is therefore unchristian and idolatrous.

(4.) Soliciting the prayers of the dead leads to idolatry. When we request the intercessory petitions of our living friends, we are in no danger of falling into any undue or superstitious veneration of them; but when we ask the prayers of departed saints, we shall certainly adopt idolatrous habits. This is not chimerical. Experience of the past, and prophetic anticipation of the future, teach that such is the result. The polytheism of the Gentiles consisted in the worship of demon-gods, curiously associated with Sabianism and Materialism, which were none other than the departed spirits of canonized mortals.* Such was the worship into which the idolatrous Israelites declined, when they joined themselves to Baal-Peor. They did not renounce the worship of Jehovah; but they added to it the rites of Thammuz, Adonis, Baal, or Osiris.

[* "Generaliter pro his et aliis objectionibus convinces sectarios, quod hæc omnia non obstent, quominus imploremus preces vivorum; ergo nec obstare possunt, quominus petamus suffragia sanctorum in cœlis."—Dens Theolog., tom. v.; De Incarnatione, No. 25; Solvuntur Objectiones contra Invocationem Sanctorum.]

† Milner's End of Controversy, Letter xxxvi., p. 240. Eighth edition. London.

Such also is the idolatry into which the prophetic record declared corrupt Christians would fall: "The Spirit," says St. Paul, "speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils." (1 Tim. iv. 1.) The primitive believers understood the Apostle as foretelling an apostasy in the church, as we learn from Epiphanius, who flourished in the early part of the fourth century. He says, "Some persons are mad enough to honour the Virgin as a sort of goddess. Certain women have transplanted this vanity from Thrace into Arabia. For they sacrifice a bread-cake in honour of the Virgin; and, in her name, they blasphemously celebrate sacred mysteries. But the whole matter is a tissue of impiety, abhorrent from the teaching of the Holy Spirit: so that we may well call it a diabolical business, and a manifest doctrine of the spirit of impurity. In them is fulfilled this prophecy of St. Paul: 'Certain persons shall apostatize from the faith, attending to fables, and doctrines concerning demon-gods.' For the purport of the Apostle's declaration is this: they shall pay divine worship to the dead, even as men formerly paid such worship in Israel.

"In like manner, also, the glory due unto God has been changed into error, by those who see not the truth. For the natives of Neapolis still sacrifice to a girl, whom I take to have been the daughter of Jephthah: and the Egyptians honoured Thermutis, Pharaoh's daughter, as a goddess: and many such things as these have happened in the world, to the utter ruin of those who are seduced. But we Christians must indecorously honour the saints. Rather ought we to honour Him who is their sovereign Lord. Let, then, the error of seducers cease. The Virgin Mary is no goddess. To the peril, therefore, of his own soul, let no one make oblations in her name." †

The same evil is foretold by St. John, who adds some particulars, by which the apostates may be distinguished: "And the rest of the men which were not killed by these plagues, yet repented not of the works of their hands, that they should not worship devils, and idols of gold, and silver, and brass, and stone, and of wood, which neither can see, nor hear, nor walk." (Rev. ix. 20.)

II. Arguments against saint-worship.

1. The invocation of saints is not contained in the word of God, or in the canonical Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments. This is expressly admitted by many Romanists. No part of the sacred record teaches this kind of adoration; no express command enjoins it. There is no promise that such an invocation is acceptable to God, or useful to men; no example is furnished which shows that the saints who have departed from this life have been worshipped; and there is no threatening or instance of punishment recorded against those who refuse to worship them. The Tridentine Synod does not refer to the inspired volume for proof of this doctrine.

2. It is also contrary to the Scripture truths concerning the worship of God. Our Lord, quoting the ancient commandment, enjoins, "Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve." (Luke iv. 8.) "Now unto the King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God, be honour and glory for ever and ever. Amen." (1 Tim. i. 17.) And the angel especially instructed John to "worship God." (Rev. xix. 10.)

3. The adoration of saints is contrary to the holy Scriptures.

(1.) Romanists invoke the saints as helpers and protectors; but this belongs to God, who "is our refuge and strength; a very present help in trouble." (Psalm xlvi. 1; xviii. 2.) (2.) They fly to the saints for mercy and grace, in opposition to the following, and other passages of holy writ:—"Let us therefore come boldly to the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need." (Heb. iv. 16.) (3.) They seek from the saints, what God alone can give. They address them, as givers of temporal and spiritual gifts, of things present and things to come. They worship, venerate, and invoke them; pray directly to them; worship and serve the creature more than the Creator, who is blessed for ever. (Rom. i. 25.) (4.) The worship of saints is contrary to the mediatorship of Christ: "For there is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus." (1 Tim. ii. 5.) Here observe, (i.) There can be no advocate or mediator, except him who is the propitiation for our sins. (1 John ii. 1.) But the saints have made no propitiation for our sins; therefore they are not mediators. (ii.) St. Paul affirms, that the Mediator must be God and man. (iii.) There is only one Mediator. (iv.) They cannot be such, who need a Mediator themselves, as the Apostle shows: "For such an High Priest became us, who is holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, and made higher than the heavens; who needeth not daily, as those High Priests, to offer up sacrifice, first for his own sins, and then for the people's: for this he did once, when he offered up himself." (Heb. vii. 26, 27.) Saints cannot be our Priests, therefore not our mediators or intercessors. (5.) The Scriptures teach us to worship only one God: "Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve." (Matt. iv. 10.) "Now, unto the King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God, be honour and glory for ever and ever. Amen." (1 Tim. i. 17.) All religious worship is here forbidden to any but God. (6.) The worship of saints is expressly prohibited. When Cornelius fell down at Peter's feet to worship him, he forbade him. (Acts x. 25.) The angel would not suffer John to worship him. (Rev. xxii. 9.) Paul and Barnabas prevented the people from paying them divine homage. (Acts xiv. 13—15.) (7.) The Lord's Prayer teaches us to address God alone, and not saints. It is therefore contrary to the instructions of Christ to pray to such.

4. The Church of Rome is justly and scripturally charged with idolatry in the worship, adoration, and invocation, which she addresses to saints and angels. Idolatry, in the Scripture application of the term, is of two sorts, and consists, (1.) Either in giving the honour due to the one true God, as Maker and Governor of the world, to any subordinate being:—(2.) Or, in giving the honour due to Christ, as the sole Mediator between God and man, to any subordinate mediator. The former is the idolatry forbidden by the Jewish law, and by that of nature. The latter is Christian idolatry, properly so called, and is the abomination condemned in severe terms by the Gospel. This species of idolatry is, without doubt, chargeable on any Christian church that shall adopt, in its religious addresses, another mediator besides Christ Jesus. But the Church of Rome, not merely in the private writings of her Divines, but in the solemn forms of her ritual, publicly professes, and by her canons and Councils authoritatively enjoins, the worship of saints and angels, under the idea of mediators or intercessors: not, indeed, in exclusion of Christ, as the one, or chief, Mediator; but in manifest defiance of his sole mediatorship. This charge is truly and justly brought against her, as she now stands, and hath stood for many ages, and cannot by any subterfuge be evaded. Therefore she must be content to have the imputation of demon-worship, or anti-christian idolatry, still adhering to her.

* The Origin of Pagan Idolatry, ascertained from historical Testimony, and circumstantial Evidence. By George S. Faber, B.D., vol. i., p. 1. 4to. London, 1816.

† Epiph. Adv. Hær., lib. iii., Hær. 78.

[IN CONCLUSION: no system which tends to supersede the necessity, and prevent the existence, of personal piety, can be from above; and, consequently, no community of professing Christians which identifies itself with that system, can pertain to the "church of the living God." The Redeemer of the world declared, "The hour cometh and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth; for the Father seeketh such to worship him. God is a Spirit; and they that worship him, must worship him in spirit and in truth." The whole record of divine revelation inculcates the important fact, that the religion of the heart, which alone the Most High can recognise and hallow, is individual in its application and enjoyment, and that every one is distinctly and separately responsible for himself alone. "So then every one of us must give an account of himself unto God." The tendency of that system which is partially delineated in the preceding pages, counteracts this. The laity are taught, that they can receive no spiritual profit, except through the channel, and by the intervention, of the priesthood, who arrogate to themselves the supreme management and control of the understanding and conscience of the flock, blasphemously asserting, that "he alone is safe who believes as the Church believes." Thus the personality of religion is discarded, and a substitute is provided by the Papal hierarchy, for the awful requirements of the Gospel of God. The holy Scriptures teach, that in order to receive the salvation of the soul, man must be justified and made holy, and that these blessings are enjoyed by all who, with a penitent heart, exercise faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ: but when a sinner seeks forgiveness, instead of directing him to the "Lord," who "justifieth the ungodly," he is deceived with an absolution uttered by a Priest; and for that holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord, he is supplied with consecrated water and unmeaning ceremonies.

[A party in the ancient church of the Jews, whom our Saviour so severely reproved, presents us with a very close resemblance to the Popish Church. The Pharisees, like the Romish Clergy, usurped the seat of ecclesiastical sovereignty; delivered their own opinions as the standard of orthodoxy, which at once made void the Scriptures of truth; trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised others; they bound heavy burdens on the shoulders of the people, which they refused to share. The spirit of both is that of monopoly and exclusion; for each, to enhance their dominion, would compass sea and land to make one proselyte. Thus, as we have seen, the genius of true piety disappears; holy affections and devout attachment to the things which are of Christ can have no residence in the heart, which is ground between the millstones of priestly authority and influence. One part is taught to rest exclusively on forms and ceremonies which they have been instructed sacredly to observe; another becomes infidel and licentious; and a third indulges in puerile fancies and visionary extravagance. Hence it is that the devotional literature of the Papacy is crowded with instances of flagrant superstition and enthusiasm, which are exhibited as marks of exemplary piety and devotion. In these ebullitions of a disordered imagination, we meet with no indications of that calm and settled trust in God through the great Atonement, none of well-principled and habitual devotedness to the service of the Almighty, and none of cheerful and implicit submission to the dispensations of an unerring Providence, which will at all times mark the conduct of that man who is "born from above." In the place of these, we find records of visions and apparitions of the blessed Saviour, of the Virgin Mary, of angels, and departed saints. Christ is sometimes represented as coming to crown them with a garland, or to present some memorial of his love; and at others he is made to appear, in all the formalities of a nuptial ceremony, to espouse, forsooth, some seraphic sister of a Convent. The blessed Virgin appears also with an "infant Jesus" in her arms, as if he were still a child; and then she visits the sick, dresses their wounds, administers medicine, and performs the most mean and disgusting offices,—and such fooleries are termed the ecstasies of piety and love!

[In opposition to this system of darkness and of death, we advert to another which is also at work. Its basis is knowledge, and its operation is threefold: by general education, by the free and universal circulation of the Scriptures, and by the preaching of the Gospel to every creature. The only atmosphere in which Popery can flourish, is composed of uninquiring ignorance, and a passive subjection to human authority. Infuse into this compound any uncongenial element, and its withering influence on the "man of sin" is at once apparent. When the Bible was a sealed book, and the preaching of the Gospel was prohibited, the power of the Paparchy was oppressive, rampant, and extended. When the blessed Martyr Latimer was dragged to the stake in company with his fellow-sufferer Ridley, he exclaimed, "We shall this day light such a candle in England as, by God's grace, shall never be put out." The prediction has until now been verified; and we entertain no fears with regard to its ultimate realization. We have seen a painting which represents the Reformers from Popery sitting round a table, on which is placed a lighted candle, which the Pope and Cardinals with infernal assistants are endeavouring to extinguish, while they cry one to another in accents of despair, "We can't put it out! We can't put it out!" We anticipate a similar result attending the efforts which are being made to render nugatory and of none effect the glorious Protestant Reformation, by the open and secret abettors of Popery in this country. They, too, shall exclaim, "We can't put it out! We can't put it out." "Every plant which our heavenly Father hath not planted, shall be rooted up." That gorgeous and magnificent temple, in which the mother of harlots, the great whore of Babylon, has erected her altar, and where she receives the fulsome adorations of her thousands of besotted worshippers; which is cemented by the blood of martyrs, and which resounds with the groans, and is watered with the tears, of an oppressed and enslaved people; shall be shaken with the hand of a mightier than Samson, the edifice shall fall, and bury in its ruins every thing that offends, every thing that is opposed to the Gospel of Christ, amid the grateful acclamations of an enraptured and emancipated throng! Ignorance, superstition, and violence shall depart; the Heathen shall cast their idols to the moles and bats; Mahometanism shall abjure the great Impostor; the wandering Jew shall with compunction look on Him whom he pierced; and Popery, with every corruption which has disgraced and defiled the name of Christianity, shall be swept from off the face of the earth, and Christ alone be acknowledged and adored as the universal Prophet, Priest, and King.]

INDEX

TO SCRIPTURES WHICH ARE MORE OR LESS ILLUSTRATED.

GENESIS.

Chap.	Verse.	Page.
i		86, 711
	16	702
ii	17	177
	18	723, 725
	21–24	725
	22	426
	22–24	425
	23, 24	423
iii	15	760, 763
	24	259
v	32	260
vi		256
	3	257, 258
	11	29
xii	6–8	503
xvii	7	123
	10	137
	10, 13	138
	23, 24	137
xviii	2	767
xix	1	767
xxviii	18	386
xxxi	30	137
xxxii	9	767
xxxiii	20	503
xxxv	14	386
xli	26	136
xliii	32	144
xlix	10	59, 713

EXODUS.

iii	5–8	767
iv		522
	25	249
viii	26	144
xii	6	177
	11	137, 138
xvi		96
xx	4, 5	34
xxv		95
xxviii	41	386
xxix	7	386
xxx	23–25	386
xxxii	13	767
xxxiv	7	197
xxxvii	29	386
xl	9	125

LEVITICUS.

ii	13	124
iv	13, 14	248
viii	12	386
xiii	2	713
	9	246
xiv	2	246
xvii	11	177
xviii	24	437
xix	12	69, 592
	32	76

NUMBERS.

Chap.	Verse.	Page.
iii	10	713
xii	14	371
xv	30, 31	248
xvi	22	258
xx	24	371
xxx	2	69, 592

DEUTERONOMY.

iv	1, 2	23
	10	23
vi	6, 7	23
vii	25, 26	248
ix	27	767
xiii		524
	1–3	525, 768
xvii	5	714
	8	713
xviii	15	524
xxi	1–10	248
xxiii	23	69, 592
xxvi	16–19	767
xxviii	40	386
xxix	29	12
xxxii	14	137

JOSHUA.

v	14, 17, 25	767
vii		248
xviii	1, 2	504
xxiv	1, 23, 32	549
	25, 26, 32	504

JUDGES.

xvii		713
xviii		713
xix		713
xxi	19	504
	21–23	713

1 SAMUEL.

ii	30	501
x	1	386
xx	41	756
xxi	9	372
xxxi	13	259

2 SAMUEL.

i	12	259
xii	13, 14	371
	18, 23	123
xxii	2	55, 611
	3	55
	32	55, 611

1 KINGS.

ii	35	680
xiii	21–24	371
xviii	20	550
xx	31–33	249

2 KINGS.

ii	9	285
xxii	20	285
xxiii	1, 4	550

1 CHRONICLES.

xxiii		550
xxix	20	756

2 CHRONICLES.

vi	30	768
	37–39	204
xxviii	24	502
xxix	25	550

EZRA.

ix		204

NEHEMIAH.

ix		204

JOB.

iii	17	263
xiv	21	285
xxii	2, 3	239
xxxv	6–8	239

PSALMS.

Psalm.
i		764, 765
ii	8	488, 513
vii	9	768
xv	1	270
	4	69, 592
xvi	10	139, 284
xviii	2	55, 611, 769
xix	12	222
xxii	13	161
	27–31	513
xxvii	2	161
xxx		765, 766
xxxii	1	262
	5	204
xxxviii	4	222
xl	12	222
xlvi	1	769
xlix	6–8	370
	7	231
li	19	111
lxii	2	611
	12	253
lxv	2	286

Psalm.	Verse.	Page.
lxvi	12	254, 256, 259
lxxii	8	513
lxxvi	1, 2	488
xci	4–6	372
xcix		597
cv	15	39
cx	1	249
cxiv	7	270
cxviii	22	55, 611
cxxx	4	197
cxxxii	10	767
cxxxiii	2	386
cxliii	2	336
cxlvii	19	488

PROVERBS.

Chap.
vii	14, 18	360
ix	1	95
	5, 6	147
x	19	206
xiii	8	370
xiv	1	724
	9	370
xxiv	16	205
xxviii	13	198

ECCLESIASTES.

ix	5, 6	285

ISAIAH.

i	18	262
ii	1–6	513
	2–5	547
	20	187
vii	14	28
viii	19, 20	81
ix	18, 19	259
	19	270
xi		513
xxii	14	249
	22	56
xxviii	16	55, 611
xxxiii	24	386
xxxv	8	480, 547
xlii	7	257
xliii	2	254, 256
	25	263
xliv	12–17	187
	22	262
xlv	22	24
xlix	9	257
liii	4	225
	5	225
	5, 11	262
	10	178
liv	5	433
	9, 10	480
	13	547
lv	1	180
	2, 3	147
	8, 9	767
	10, 11	508
lvi	4	717
	11	296
lvii	2	263
lix	20, 21	480
	21	404, 547
lx		547
	4–14	357
	17	618
lxi	1, 2	257
lxii		547
lxiii	16	285, 768
lxvi	16	254

JEREMIAH.

Chap.	Verse.	Page.
i	10	603, 702
	20	262
ii	2	433
iii	14	433
x	8	727
xv	19	197
xvii	9, 10	286
	10	768
xxiii	28, 29	81
xxv	27	385
xxx	7–26	513
xxxi	33	547
	34	225
xxxii	37–43	513

EZEKIEL.

ix	4	125
xiii	22	304
xiv	14	767
	20	353
xvi	8, 32	433
xviii	20	231
	21, 22	225
	22	262
xx	18, 19	503
xxxiii	12	231
xxxiv	23	644
xxxvi	5	254
xliv	12	502

DANIEL.

ii	18, 19, 27–30, 47	429
	18, 30, 47	431
	44	507
iv	9	429
vii	9	76
	9, 10	267
	13, 14	513
	24	136
ix		204
	9	197
	27	527
xi	38	727

HOSEA.

iv	6	26, 502
viii	6	176
xi		767

JOEL.

ii	29, 30	522

AMOS.

iv	11	254, 256

MICAH.

vii	9	259
	18	198
	19	262

ZECHARIAH.

iii	2	254, 256
viii	17	69, 592
ix	11	259
xiii	9	254

MALACHI.

Chap.	Verse.	Page.
iii	3	259
iv	1	254

ECCLESIASTICUS.

xxiv	21	157
xxxix	28	382

BARUCH.

iv	72	144

2 MACCABEES.

xii	32–46	247
xiv	41	249
	42	247

ST. MATTHEW.

iii	2	34
	8	450
	11	123, 124, 225, 266
iv	10	769
	18	609
	19	613
v	2	474
	22	259
	23, 24	199
	25	258
	25, 26	249, 251
	28	434
	32	437
vi	24	647
vii	3–5	205
	6	22
	7	35
	15	491
	16–20	450
	21	84
	22	525
	24, 25	612
	25	480
	26	476
viii	14	726
	17	225
ix	2, 6, 7	386
	6	253
	36	614
x		522
	1	626
	2	614
	6	614
	8	386
	26, 27	429
	41	34
xi	5	524
	28	767
xii	25	453, 456, 647
	26	453
	32	250, 251
	36	206, 242
	48, 50	761
xiii	11	429
	29	34
xiv	33	608
xv	1–10	37
	9	36
	19, 20	205

Chap.	Verse.	Page.
xvi		596
	7–11	149
	15, 16	608
	18	53, 55, 71, 86, 352, 480, 547, 586, 610, 613
	19	97, 195, 312, 313, 317, 613, 622
	26	370
	27	253
viii		251
	1	611
	17	38, 58, 593, 645
	17–20	593
	18	56, 57, 196, 351, 495, 612, 622
	20	55, 553, 593
ix		434
	2–12	716
	4, 5	426
	5, 6	423
	6	425, 426, 435, 705
	9	437
	11	717, 725
	11, 12	719
	12	436, 717, 721
	24	370
xx	8	228
	24	611
xxii	29	24
xxiii	2	508
	8–10	644
	8–12	622
	9	76
	10	110
xxiv	5	502
	5, 11	768
	14	513
	24	491, 536
xxv	8, 9	370
xxvi	11	139
	26–28	135
	27	183, 184
	33, 35	608
xxvii	55	721, 726
xxviii	6	141
	18, 19	290, 404
	19	122, 429, 623
	19, 20	480
	20	58, 59, 547, 586, 623

ST. MARK.

i	16	609
	27	503
	30	726
ii	7	197
iii	16	54
	29	251, 253
iv	11	428, 430
	22	429
v	6	474
vi	13	373, 383, 386, 387
vii	1, et seq.	504
	1–13	37
	5, 9	42
	8–13	318
	9	37
	34	125
ix		22, 474
	34	611
	50	621
x	7	426
	30	251
xiii	22	536
xiv	22	135
	23	183
xvi	15	404, 429, 488, 621, 623
	15, 16	290
	16	94, 127, 263
	17, 18	384, 523

ST. LUKE.

i	1	621
	1–4	544
	2	141
	3, 4	10
	23	720
iii	8–14	450
iv	8	769
v	10	613
	21	197
vi	13	407
	14	54, 609
vii	50	228
viii	1–3	726
	48	474
ix	2	386
	60	474
x	16	38, 547
xi	18	456
	33	474
xii	1	508
	10	251, 253
	13, 14	711
	57	60
	58, 59	249
xiii	28	352
xv	13	474
xvi	9	259
	22	263, 284
	31	284
xviii	29	723
	42	474
xx	2	621
	35	251
xxii	17	183
	19	135
	24	622
	24–26	409, 610
	25, 26	622
	32	586
	36	711
xxiii	42	259
xxiv	44, 45	29
	47	197, 404, 489, 513, 623
	49	621, 623

ST. JOHN.

	1	28
	14	158
	41, 49	608
	42	54
	44	614
ii		425, 434
	1	726
	1–11	761
iii		126
	2	525
	3	160
	5	112, 122, 123, 161
	7	111
	8	131
	16	198
	18	106
	20, 21	630
iii	36	263
iv		149
	14	154
	20	503
	26	474
v	24	150, 264
	25, 26	259
	31, 36	621
	39	24, 50
	40	157
vi		161, 162
	32, 33, 39, 40, 44, 52, 53	157
	33, 35, 50	148
	35, 40, 47, 51	148
	48, 51, 53	149
	51	184
	53	77, 148
	61–63	151
	63	139, 148, 159
	64–66	727
	69	608
vii	37	157
viii	31	453
	33	491
ix	4	264
	32, 33	474
x		710
	11	453
	11, 14, 16	644
	16	125
	25, 37	621
	30	28
xiii	14, 34	621
	37	608
xiv	6	480
	12	523
	15, 16	59
	15, 16, 26	547
	16	586
	16, 17, 26	480
	17	452
	23	157
	26	10, 59
xv		522
	4–9	157
	5	136, 474
	12	621
	16	723
	22, 24	621
	26	44
	26, 27	543
xvi	12	38
	13	38, 59, 480, 586, 623
	13, 14, 26	623
	23	767
xvii	15	745
	17	60
	21	621
xviii	31	714
	34, 36, 37	711
xix	10	714
	26, 27	761
xx	4	615
	19	44
	21	290, 621
	21–23	495, 612
	22	623
	22, 23	95
	23	56, 57, 196, 313
	30, 31	10
	31	29
xxi		351, 598
	15	72, 313
	17	317

THE ACTS.

Chap.	Verse.	Page.
i		405
	2	621
	8	513
	14	726
	15–26	624
	21, 22	626
	25	407
	26	550, 680
ii	4	623
	5–10	496
	14	56
	22–32	139
	24	259
	38	96, 197, 225
	39	522
	42	184
iii	19	197
iv	8, 23	406
v	24	353
vi		400, 403, 405, 406, 420, 549, 680
	2–6	624
	5	632
vii	27	75
	37	524
viii	10	491
	14	624
	17	128, 130, 132
	17, 19	131
	19	420
	20	370
	28	474
	31	474
	37	127
ix	15	625
	39	352
x	25	769
		56, 57
	41	406
	43	178, 197, 474
	44	131
	47	123
xi	2, 3	624
	19	496
	21	474
	24	57
	25, 26	496
	26	431, 635, 640
xiii	1–4	405
	4	625
	12	727
	15	416
	38, 39	305
	39	226
xiv	13–15	769
	22, 23, 26–28	635
	23	405, 406
xv		549, 630
	1–6	550
	2	624
	4, 6	624
	6	409
	7	56
	9	93, 479
	20, 29	44
	21	474, 508
	28	586, 593, 623, 626
	35	635
xvi	6, 9	625
	30, 31	198
xvii	2	81
	11	24, 81
	19	503, 504
	28	17
xviii	2	635
	28	29
xix	6	128
	25	371
	27	491
xx	7	44
	17	551
	17, 28	407, 409
	21	193
	28	551, 614, 622, 678
	29	502
	29, 30	493, 501
xxi	9	726
	18	550
	20	637
xxii	21	625
xxiv	5	504, 615
xxvi	18	197
xxviii		633
	21	633
	28	645

ROMANS.

Chap.	Verse.	Page.
i	1	723
	5	625
	7	24
	8	634
	17	106
	25	769
ii	6	253
	14	476
iii		372
	21–26	229
	24	225
	25, 26	177
	28	94, 106
iv	3	106
	4	263, 351
	25	177
v	1	264, 385
	14	432
vi	7	263
	17	488
	23	177, 228
viii	1	226, 262, 264, 352, 385
	9	452
	14	452
	18	263
	33	202, 264
	34	767
	38, 39	264
ix	3	474
	5	28
	18	474
	20	60
x	10	106
	14	15
	17	93
xi	6	225, 263
	12, 25–33	513
	13	625
	17	727
	21, 22	492
xii	3	386
	4, 5	286
xiii	1	645, 711
	5	711
xiv	12	16
	13	192
xv	4	29
	15	625
	18, 19	625
xvi	3–16	633
	7	408, 634
xvi	17	38
	25, 26	428, 429
	26	29

1 CORINTHIANS.

Chap.	Verse.	Page.
i	1	625
	2	60
	12	624
	17	404
	23	192
ii	4	625
	6	46
	7–10	429
	9	239
	13	48
	15	711
iii	10	622
	10–15	253
	11	56, 610, 612
	12	205
	13	266
	15	266
	16	452
	22	371, 614, 624
iv	1	97, 428, 429, 622
v	1	437
	4, 5	645
	5	524
	5, 12	679
	12	119
	12, 13	645
vi	1	645
	19	452
vii		738
	1	721
	2	717, 725
	4	426
	5	723, 738
	7	717, 725
	9	717, 725
	10	738
	14	123, 716
	15	434
	23	744
	24, 27	738
	26	717
	27	705
	28	426
	28, 32, 34	717
	32	720
	33	723
	35	717, 720
	38	717, 719
viii	5	491
	6	614
ix		738
	1, 2	625
	4, 5	726
	5	35, 614, 721, 726, 738
	5, 6	725
x	1–4	154
	4	56, 136, 612
	5, 6	727
	16	94
	16, 17	138, 184
	31	547
	32	192, 547
xi	2	36, 37
	19	61
	21	143
	23	36, 97, 135
	24	95
	26	96
	26–28	138

Chap.	Verse.	Page.
xi	26, 28, 29	184
	27	184
	28	183
	28, 29	98, 162
	30, 32	386
xii	9	386
	10	197
	12, 13, 25–27	452
	26	285
	28	407, 409, 544, 621, 626, 635, 642, 645
xiii	2	61, 386
	8	286
	11	128, 428
xiv		109
	12	547
	16	474
	19	180
	33	453
	36	409
	40	547, 645
xv	3	36, 37
	10	625
	29	259, 352
	44	142
	45	432
	55	371
xvi	2	44

2 CORINTHIANS.

i	1	60, 625
	21, 22	107, 131
	4, 12	491
	24	645
ii	10	312, 313, 618
	16	679, 714
	17	646
iii	6	625
	15, 16	513
iv	17	239, 263
v	1	264
	1–8	263
	8	264
	10	75
	18	213
	20	618, 622
vi	16	58
vii	10	215
viii	23	407
x	4	126
	8	625
	47	126
xi	2	433
	3	505
	5	625
xii	11	625
	12	622, 625, 626
xiii	10	625

GALATIANS.

i	1	60, 625, 626
	8	34, 390
	16, 17	625
	18	630
ii	1, 2	625
	2	625
	6	625
	6, 7	626
	7	635
	8	635
	9	614, 625
	11–13	635
	11–14	626
iii	1	60
	13	225
iv		254
	5	474
	6	452
	9	11, 110
	22	430
v	1	645
	4–7	474
	7	60
	19–21	450
	22–24	450
vi	4, 5	370
	5	231
	15	111
	16	90

EPHESIANS.

i	1	24, 625
	4	479
	9	93, 429, 431, 433
	9, 10	428
	13	60, 107
	21	251
	22	453, 616
	22, 23	286, 644, 693
ii	8	15, 263
	8, 9	229
	16–19	452
	17	258
	19, 20	60
	19–22	286
	20	76, 492, 495, 611, 622
iii	1–9	428
	3, 5, 6, 9	429
	7	625
	15	286, 492
	17	85
iv		410
	1–3	475
	1–6	452
	5	676
	9	284
	11	403, 404, 407, 616, 621, 622, 626, 635, 678
	11, 12	410, 415, 645
	11–13	547
	12, 13	642
	13	452
	15	616, 644
	15, 16	286
	16	678
	19, 20	716
	30	107
	32	197
v	2	178
	3–7	716
	17	12
	23	453, 644
	25, 26	479
	25, 27	262
	25, 32	423
	31	426
	31, 32	95, 425
	32	425, 426, 427, 430, 431, 432, 711
vi	11	723
	17	372
	18	286
	19	428, 429

PHILIPPIANS.

i	1	24, 409
	21	371
	23	263
	27	452
ii	10	259
	25	408
iv	3	726
	18	407

COLOSSIANS.

i	1	625
	1, 2	633
	6	514
	7	678
	12	286
	14	262
	18	286
	21	226
	21, 22	225
	24	313
	26	428
	26, 27	429
ii	8	37, 42, 263
	14	263
	16	44
	19	286
	20	22
	23	768
iii	13	197
iv	7	678
	11	633

1 THESSALONIANS.

i	1	160
iii	2	407, 678
	5	505
iv	3–7	716
	4	427
	7	716
v	12	678
	14	645
	27	26

2 THESSALONIANS.

i	1	60
	7, 8, 10	266
ii	3	502
	4	493
	7	428, 429
	7–9	5
	8, 9	536
	9, 10	524, 768
	10, 11	15, 193
	10, 12	60
	15	36, 37
iii	6	37

1 TIMOTHY.

i	1	625
	12	625
	17	769
ii	1, 2	647
	4	60
	5	769
	15	433, 716
iii		407, 408, 410, 738
	1, 2, 4, 5	726
	2	717, 721, 726
	2, 4	35
	2, 4, 11, 12	69, 592
	2, 8	409
	5, 11	738
	9	428
	10	680
	11, 12	726
	15	60, 480, 645
	16	93, 428, 431
iv	1	743, 769
	1–3	493, 717, 721, 727, 728

Chap.	Verse.	Page.
iv	3	69
	6	678
	14	403, 420
	15	644
v		717
	6	717
	9	717
	12	437
	14	717, 723
vi	5	60, 646
	20	46, 544

2 TIMOTHY.

i	1	625
	6	95, 405, 420
	6, 7	393
	9–11	625
	13	60
	14	46
	18	265, 280
ii	4	714, 721, 723
	11	263
	15–18	60
	19	372
	24	678
iii	15	10, 24, 71
	15–17	35
	16, 17	10, 49
iv	5	403
	6	633
	16	633
	21	633

TITUS.

i		410, 738
	1	60
	4	452
	5	645
	5, 7	407, 408, 409
	6	35
	6, 7	726
	7	678, 726
	8	722
	12	17
ii	4, 5	716
	13	28
iii	1	711
	5	263

HEBREWS.

i	1, 2	727
	3	178, 263, 264
ii	5	253
iii	1	406, 644
iv	8	428
	14	406, 614
	15, 16	767
	16	769
v	1	132
	4	607
	7	34
	11	12
vi	2	131, 727
	5	251, 253
vii	2, 3	713
	12	639
	25	768
	26, 27	228, 769
	27	639
viii	10	474
ix	7, 25	644
	12	264
	22	179, 372
	24	639
	25	179
	25, 26	264
	28	139
x	1, 2, 14	179
	10	139
	10, 12, 14	264
	14	262
	24, 25	745
	26	353
xi	6	15
	7	257
	21	34
xii	9	258
	10	370
	14	722
	22	252
	23	258, 260
	27, 28	253
xiii	4	69, 592, 716, 721, 722, 725
	17	645
	20	614, 644

JAMES.

i	5	35
	18	720
iv	12	644, 676
v	14	95, 375, 382,
	14, 15	373, 375, 378 383, 385
	15	351
	16	34, 203, 384

1 PETER.

i	1	630, 631
	3, 4	239
	7	254
	11	253
	20	727
ii	5	55, 611
	6	54
	6, 7	611
	9	125, 479
	13–15	711
	24	299
iii	2	716
	18	139, 260
	18–20	256
	20, 21	430
	21	127
iv	8	61
	18	260
v	1	407, 623
	2	614, 622, 645
	3	679
	4	406, 453, 614, 620, 644
	8	381
	13	630, 631

2 PETER.

i	1	452
	3	474
	15	39
	16	722
	16–19	525
ii	1	493
	5	257, 258
	25	644
iii	2	624
	10	266
	16	12
iv	5	258

1 JOHN.

i	1, 2	141
	3	286
	7	352
	7, 9	262, 264, 305
	8	239
i	8, 9	212
	9	197, 204
ii	1	769
	2	177, 299
	20	125
	22	474
	24	157
	27	132
iii	4	177
iv	2	158
	8	474
	13	452
	16, 17	157
v	4, 5	612
	11	11
	16	287

2 JOHN.

i	1	411

JUDE.

	3	36, 452
	6	265
	14	258
	19	452
	23	254, 256

REVELATION.

i	5	264
	10	44
	11, 19	29
	20	136, 428, 430, 431
ii		768
	3	645
	9	491
	20	645
iii	1	491
	7	613
	9	505
	20	171
v	5	70
	9	351, 488
	13	287
vi	10	286
vii	2	125
	9–14	476
	14	264
	17	285
viii	3	286, 287
ix	20	769
xi	3	502
xii	6	502, 508
	7	639
	12	381
xiv	4	83
	4, 5	719
	13	263, 264, 351
xvii	5	428
	5, 7	428
	6	34
	7	430, 431
	8	77
xix	7	432
	10	259, 769
xx	1–7	513
	5, 6	275
	11–15	266
xxi	8	69, 352, 592
	14	495, 611, 622
	27	242, 258
xxii	2, 3	259
	8	259
	8, 9	797
	9	769
	12	253
	17	180
	18	286

A LIST OF THE PRINCIPAL AUTHORITIES

WHICH HAVE BEEN CONSULTED, REFERRED TO, OR QUOTED IN THE PRECEDING WORK.

Æneas, Sylvius, Opera. Fol. Basil., 1551.

Aggregation à la Confrérie des Agonisans. 18mo. Nice, 1844.

Albertus, Magnus, Summa De Officio Missæ. Fol. Colon., 1503.

Alison's History of Europe during the French Revolution. 10 vols. 8vo. London, 1835.

Alliaco, Petrus de, De Reformatione Ecclesiæ. 8vo. Basil., 1551.

Allport, Josiah, the Protestant Journal, or Protest against the Church of Rome. 7 vols. 8vo. London, 1830, et seq.

Amalarii, Fortun., Episc. Treuerens., De Officio Eccles. Fol. Colon., 1618. B. V. P.

Ambrosii Opera, tomi ii. Fol. Paris, 1690. Tomi iii. Fol. Basil., 1516.

Ammianus, Marcellinus, De Rebus Gestibus. Fol. Paris, 1681.

Antonini, Archiep. Florent., Summa Theol., tomi iv. Fol. Lugduni, 1506.

Aquinatis, Thom., Opera, tomi xvii. Fol. Venet., 1595.

Arnobii Disputat. Advers. Gentes. Fol. Romæ, 1562.

Arsdekin, Richardi, Theologia Tripartita Universa, tomi iii. 4to. Antverpiæ, 1686.

Athanasii Opera, tomi ii. Fol. Ed. Bened. Paris, 1698.

Augustini Opera, tomi x. Fol. Basil., 1541. Ed. Bened. Paris, 1679.

Avis Catholiques touchant la veritable Devotion de la Bienheureuse Vierge, &c. Lyon, 1823.

Bailly, Ludov., Theologia Dogmatica et Moralis, tomi viii. 12mo. Lugduni, 1841.

Barclaius, Guil., De Potestate Papæ in Principes Christianos. 12mo. Mussiponti, 1610.

Barnabæ Epistola Catholica. 4to. Paris, 1645.

Baronii, Card., Annales Ecclesiastici, tomi xii. Fol. Antwerp., 1597.

————, Martyrol. Romanum. 4to. Colon., 1603.

Barrow, Isaac, D.D., Theological Works. 8 vols. 8vo. Oxford, 1830.

Basilii Opera, tomi vi. Ed. Bened. Paris., 1730.

Basnagii, Sam., Annales Politico-Eccles., tomi iii. Roterd., 1706.

Baxter, Richard, Key for Catholics, &c. A new edition, by the Rev. J. Allport. 8vo. London, 1839.

Beda, Venerabilis, Opera, tomi iii. Fol. Coloniæ, 1612.

Bellarmini, Card., Dottrina Cristiana Breve. 12mo. In Roma, 1836.

————, Opera, De Controversiis Christianæ Fidei, tomi vii. Fol. Ingolstadt, A.D. 1601. Paris, 1608. Coloniæ, 1620.

Benedicti, Papæ XIV., Bullarium, tomi xiii. 12mo. Mechliniæ, 1826.

————, De Synodo Diœcesana, tomi iv. 12mo. Mechliniæ, 1842.

————, De Festis D. N. Jesu Christi et B. M. Virginis. Patavii, 1766.

Benson, Joseph, Commentary on the Holy Bible. 6 vols. Fifth edit. London, 1840.

Berington, Joseph, and Kirk, John, the Faith of Catholics confirmed by Scripture, and attested by the Fathers, &c. 8vo. London, 1830.

Bernardi Opera, tomi ii. Fol. Lugduni, 1687.

Bertram, the Monk of Corbie, on the Body and Blood of the Lord. 12mo. Oxford, 1838.

Bibliotheca Veterum Patrum Magna, tomi xv. Fol. Colon., 1618.

Bibliotheca Veterum Patrum, tomi xiv. Fol. Venet., 1765.

Bingham, Jos., M. A., Works. 9 vols. 8vo. London, 1840.

Binii Concilia Omnia, General. et Provinc., tomi xxxvii. Fol. Paris, 1644.

Bonaventuræ, Card., Opera, tomi viii. Fol. Romæ, 1588.

Bossuet, J. B., Bishop of Meaux, The History of the Variations of the Protestant Churches. 2 vols. 8vo. Dublin, 1829.

————, Exposition of the Doctrine of the Catholic Church. 4to. London, 1686.

————, Vindication of the Exposition of the Doctrine of the Catholic Church. 4to. London, 1686.

Bourgoing, J. Fr., Modern State of Spain. 4 vols. 8vo. London, 1808.

Bower, Archibald, History of the Popes. 7 vols. 4to. London, 1750. Third edition.

Breckinridge, John, A Discussion on the question, "Is the Roman Catholic Religion inimical to Civil or Religious Liberty?" 8vo. Philadelphia, 1836.

Breviarium Romanum, tomi iv. 18mo. Mechliniæ, 1836.

Brownlee, W. C., D. D., Letters on the Roman Catholic Controversy. 8vo. New-York, 1834.

Bullarium Magnum Romanum, tomi xix. Fol. Luxemb., 1728.

Burnet, Bishop, Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England. 8vo. Oxon., 1831.

————, History of the Reformation. 6 vols. 12mo. London, 1825.

Butler, Charles, Esq., Book of the Roman Catholic Church. 8vo. London, 1825.

————, James, D.D., Catechism for the Kingdom. Cork, 1839.

————, Thomas, D. D., Lectures on the Truths of the Catholic Religion Proved from Scripture alone. Fourth edition. 2 vols. 12mo. London, 1843.

Cabassutii, Johan., Notitia Ecclesiastica Conciliorum. Editio Nona. 4to. Venet., 1792.

Cajetani, De Vio Cardinalis, In Quatuor Evangelia, Acta Apostolorum, et Epist. Pauli, et aliorum Apostolorum. Fol. Paris, 1532.

Calmet, D. Augustin, Religieux Benedictin, Commentaire Litteral sur tous les Livres de l'Ancient et du Nouveau Testament. 9 vols. Fol. Paris, 1724.

Campbell, George, D.D., Lectures on Ecclesiastical History. 2 vols. 8vo. Aberdeen, 1815.

————, Translation of the Gospels, with Dissertations and Notes. 3 vols. 8vo. Edinb., 1821.

Canus, Melchior, De Locis Theologicis. 12mo. Lovanii, 1569. Colon., 1605.

Cassandrus De Articulis Religionis, &c. 12mo. Lugduni, 1608.

Castro, Alphonsus à, Opera. Fol. Paris, 1571. Coloniæ, 1539.

Catéchisme du Diocèse de Nice, publie par ordre de Mons. Dominique Galvano, Evêque du même Diocèse. 12mo. Nice, 1839.

Catechism of the Council of Trent. Donovan's Translation. 8vo. Dublin, 1829.

Catechismus ex Decreto Concilii Tridentini, ad Parochos. Jussu Editus. Romæ, 1566.

Cave, William, D.D., On the Government of the Ancient Church. 12mo. London, 1683.

Cave, William, D. D., Primitive Christianity. 8vo. London, 1682.
Chais, P. T., L'Excellence de la Devotion au St. Scapulaire. Nouvelle edition à Lyons chez Rusand, 1824.
Challoner, Richard, D. D., The Grounds of the Catholic Doctrine, &c. Fifteenth edition. London, 1843.
———, The Catholic Christian instructed. 12mo.
Chemnicii, D. Mart., Examen Conc. Trid. Fol. Genevæ, 1634.
Cherubini Bullarium. Fol. Romæ, 1617.
Christian Doctrine, An Abridgment of the, with Proofs of Scripture for Points controverted; by way of Question and Answer. 18mo. Belfast, 1833.
Christianity, Protestantism, and Popery compared and contrasted. 8vo. London, 1829.
Chrysostomi, Johan. Abp., Constant. Opera omnia, tom. viii. Fol. Savil., 1613. Tom. xiii. Fol. Ed. Bened. Paris, 1718. Tom. xiii. 8vo. Paris, 1836.
Clarke, Adam, LL. D., Chronological Succession of sacred Literature. 2 vols. 8vo. London, 1830.
———, Commentary on the Holy Bible. 7 vols. 4to. London, 1810.
———, Discourses on various Subjects, &c. 3 vols. 8vo. London, 1828.
Claude, Mons., A Defence of the Reformation. Translated into English. 2 vols. 8vo. London, 1815.
Clementis Alexandrini Opera, tomi ii. Fol. Oxon. Edit. Potter, 1715.
Clementis Romani Epistola ad Corinthios. 12mo. Londini, 1687.
Colleti, Petri, Institutionis Theologici Moralis, tomi vii. 12mo. Lugduni, 1768.
Collier, Jeremy, M. A., Ecclesiastical History. 9 vols. 8vo. London, 1841.
Comber, Thomas, D. D., On Roman Forgeries in Councils. 4to. London, 1689.
Concil. Trident. Canon. et Decreta. Fol. Romæ, 1564.
Concilia Magnæ Britanniæ, tomi iv. Fol. edit. Wilkins. London, 1737.
Confessions of a French Catholic Priest. 12mo. New-York, 1837.
Corpus Juris Canonici a Pithœo. tomi ii. Fol. Paris, 1695.
Cosin, John, D. D., Scholastic History of the Canon of Scripture. 4to. London, 1657.
——, History of Popish Transubstantiation. 12mo. London, 1840
Crabbe, Concilia, tomi iii. Fol. Coloniæ, 1551.
Cramp, J. M., A Text-Book of Popery. Second edition. 8vo. London, 1839.
Cranmer, Archbishop, his Remains. Collected and arranged by the Rev. H. Jenkyns, M. A. 4 vols. 8vo. Oxford, 1833.
Crantzii, Alberti, Eccles. Hist., sive Metrop. Fol. Basil, 1568.
Croly, George, D. D., On the divine Origin, Appointment, and Obligation of Marriage. 8vo. London, 1836.
Cusani, Card. Nichol., Opera, De Concord. Cathol. Fol. Basil, 1665.
Cypriani Opera. Fol. Oxon., 1682. 8vo. Paris, 1836.
——— Opera, cum Annotat. N. Rigaltii. Fol. Paris, 1666.
Cyrilli, Alexand., Opera, tomi vii. Fol. Lutet., 1638.
———, Hierosol., Opera. Fol. Paris, 1720.
Cyrillus, Contra Julianum. Fol. Leip., 1696.

Daillè, John, Treatise concerning the right Use of the Fathers, &c. 4to. London, 1675.
———, De Sacramentis Confirmatione et Extrema Unctione. 4to. Genevæ, 1659.
Damasceni, Johannis, Opera, tomi ii. Fol. Basil, 1575.
D'Aubigné, J. H. Merle, History of the great Reformation. 3 vols. 8vo. Second edition. London, 1840.
De la Hogue, Lud. Ægid., Tractatus de Sacramentis in Genere et de Eucharistia. 12mo. Dublinii, 1810.
———, Tractatus de Ecclesia Christi. 12mo. Dublinii, 1809.
———, Tractatus de Religione. 12mo. Dublinii, 1808.
———, Tractatus, de Mysterio SS. Trinitatis, et de Incarnatione, et de Cultu Sanctorum, SS. Reliquiarum, Crucis, et Imaginum. 12mo. Dublinii, 1812.
———, Tractatus de Sacramento Penitentiæ, de Purgatorio, de Indulgentiis, et de Censuris. 12mo. Dublinii, 1825.
Dens, Petri, Theologia Moralis et Dogmatica, tomi viii. 12mo. Dublinii, 1832.
Dixon, W. T., Lectures on the distinguishing Doctrines of the Church of Rome. 12mo. Dublin, 1828.
Doblado's Letters from Spain. Second edition. 8vo. London, 1825.
Douglas, John, D. D., The Criterion: or, Rules by which the true Miracles recorded in the New Testament, are distinguished from the spurious Miracles of Pagans and Papists. 8vo. London, 1816.
Doyle, James, D. D., Essay on the Catholic Claims, &c. 12mo. Dublin, 1826.
Du Moulin, Peter, Anatomy of the Mass. Translated by Shanks. 12mo. Edinb., 1833.
Du Pin, Lewis, De Antiqua Ecclesiæ Disciplina. Fol. Paris, 1686.
Du Pin, A preliminary Dissertation about the Authors of the Bible. Fol. Third edition. London, 1696.
———, History of the Canon and Writers of the Books of the Old and New Testaments. 2 vols. Fol. London, 1699.
———, Ecclesiastical History. 4 vols. Fol. London, 1696.
———, Ecclesiastical History, during the seventeenth Century. Fol. Oxford, 1725.
———, Ecclesiastical History. 3 vols. Fol. Third edition. Dublin, 1723.
Durandus a Portiano, de Sententiis Theologicis, P. Lombard. Comment. Fol. Lugd., 1560.

Edgar, Samuel, The Variations of Popery. Second edition. 8vo. London, 1838.
Elsley, John, M. A., Annotations on the Four Gospels and the Acts. 3 vols. 8vo. London, 1812.
Epiphanius, Adversus Hæres. Fol. Basil. 1544.
Erasmus, Desid., In Nov. Test. Annotationes. Fol. Basil. 1542.
Estius, Gulielmus, Commentarii in Epistolas Apostolicas, tomi iii. Fol. Coloniæ, 1631. Duaci, 1615.
Eusebii, Pamphili, Ecclesiastica Historia. Fol. Edit. Paris, 1678.
———, Ecclesiastica Historia. Fol. (Ed. Reading.) Cantab., 1720.
———, Preparatio Evangelica. Gr. et Lat. Fol. Rothom., 1628.
———, Demonstratio Evangelica. Fol. Paris, 1545.
———, Chronicon, a Jos. Scaligero. Fol. Gr. et Lat. Amst., 1658.
Eustace, J. C., A Classical Tour through Italy. 4 vols. 8vo. London, 1821.
Evagrii, Historia Ecclesiastica. Fol. Cantab., 1720.
Evans, John, M. A., The Statutes of the fourth General Council of Lateran, recognised, &c., by subsequent Councils, down to the Council of Trent. 8vo. London, 1843.
——, On the Worship of the Virgin Mary. (Church-of-England Quarterly Review. Vol. ix., p. 166. London, 1841.)

Faber, George S., D. D., The Origin of Pagan Idolatry, &c. 3 vols. 4to. London, 1816.
——, The Difficulties of Romanism, 8vo. London, 1826.
——, On the Doctrine of Transubstantiation. 8vo. London, 1840.
Fagundez, Stephen, In Præcepta Decalogi, tomi ii. Fol. Lugd. 1640. Ed. Coll. Sion.
Farneworth, Ellis, M. A., Life of Pope Sixtus V. 8vo. Dublin, 1766.

Ferraris, F. Lucii, Encyclopedia Ecclesiastica, sive Prompta Biblioth., tomi viii. 4to. Francof., 1781.

Flagellantium Historia, de recto et perverso Flagrorum usu apud Christianos, ex antiquis Scripturæ, Patrum, Pontificum, Conciliorum, et Scriptorum Profanorum Monumentis cum Cura et Fide expressa. 12mo. Paris, 1700.

Flagellants, The History of the. 4to. London. No date.

Fletcher, Joseph, M.A., Lectures on the Principles, &c., of the Romon Catholic Religion. 8vo. Second edition. London, 1818.

Fleury, L'Abbé, Histoire Ecclesiastique, tom. xxxvii. 4to. Paris, 1750.

Foulis, Henry, B.D., History of Romish Treasons and Usurpations. Fol. London, 1671.

Foxe, John, Ecclesiastical History. 3 vols. Fol. London, 1631.

——, The Acts and Monuments of these latter and perilous Times, &c. 8 vols. 8vo. London, 1839.

Fulke, William, D.D., On the New Testament of Rheims, &c. Fol. London, 1589.

Galvano, Dominique, Evêque de Nice, Principes Fondamentaux de la Doctrine Catholique. 12mo. Nice, 1843.

Gavin, Antonio D., A Master-Key to Popery. 3 vols. 12mo. London, 1725.

Geddis, Michael, D.D., Translation of the Life of Veronica. 8vo. London, 1716.

——, Miscellaneous Tracts. 4 vols. 12mo. London, 1714.

Gerhardi, Johannis, Loci Theologici, tomi ix. Jenæ, 1610.

Gersonii, J., Opera, Partes iv. Fol. Paris, 1521.

Gibbon, Edward, Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. 12 vols. 8vo. London, Milman's edit., 1838.

Gibson, Edmund, Bishop of London, Preservative against Popery. 2 vols. Fol. London, 1738.

Gilly, William S., M.A., Narrative of an Excursion to the Mountains of Piedmont, &c. 4to. London, 1824.

Giovini, A. Bianchi, Biographia di Fra Paolo Sarpi. Zurigo, 1836.

Gobat, Georgii, Operum Moralium tomi ii. Duaci, 1700.

Gother, John, A Papist Misrepresented and Represented. 4to. London, 1685.

Grace, Richard, An Abridgment of the Christian Doctrine. Dublin, 1840.

Graham, Maria, Three Months near Rome. 8vo. London, 1821. Second edition.

Gregorii, Magni, Opera, tomi iv. Fol. Ed. Bened. Paris, 1705.

———, Nazianzeni, Opera. Fol. Antverpiæ, 1612.

Gregorii, Nysseni, Opera, tomi iii. Fol. Paris, 1638.

——— de Valentia, Commentariorum Theologicorum, tomi iii. Lutetiæ. Paris, 1609.

Gretzer, Jacobus, Opera omnia, tomi xi. Defensio Societatis Jesu. Ratisbonæ, 1738.

Grier, Richard, D.D., Epitome of the General Councils of the Church, &c. 8vo. Dublin, 1828.

——, Reply to the End of Religious Controversy, &c. 8vo. London, 1821.

——, A Defence of the Reply to Bishop Milner. 8vo. London, 1825.

——, Answer to Ward's Errata of the Protestant Bible. 4to. London, 1812.

Grimm, Baron de, Correspondence Littéraire, Philosophique, et Critique, &c. 11 vols. 8vo. Paris, 1813.

Grotius, Hugo, Opera Theologica, tomi iv. Fol. London, 1679.

Hales, William, D.D., A new Analysis of Chronology and Geography, History and Prophecy, &c. 4 vols. 8vo. London, 1830.

Hall, W. J., M.A., The Doctrine of Purgatory, and the Practice of Praying for the Dead, examined. 8vo. London, 1843.

Hallam, Henry, View of the State of Europe during the Middle Ages. 3 vols. 8vo. Sixth edition. London, 1834.

Hammond, Henry, D.D., A Paraphrase and Annotations on the New Testament. Fol. London, 1671.

Harding, Thomas, Answer to the Apology of Bishop Jewell. Fol. Antwerp., 1565.

Hawkins, John, Defence of the Principles of the Reformation. 8vo. Worcester, 1788.

Hay, J., D.D., The sincere Christian instructed, &c. 2 vols. 12mo. Twentieth edit. Dublin, 1822.

Henno, Francis, Theologiæ Moralis et Scholasticæ, &c., tomi viii. 12mo. Coloniæ, 1718.

Henriquez, H., Summæ Theologiæ Moralis. Venet., 1600.

Henry, Robert, D.D., History of Great Britain. 12 vols. 8vo. London, 1823.

Hieronymi, Opera, tomi v. Fol. Paris, 1704. Ed. Bened. 1693, et seq. Basil, 1816.

Hilarii Opera. Fol. Paris, 1693.

Hippolyti Opera et Fragmenta, tomi ii. Fol. Edit. Venet., 1776.

Hone, William, Ancient Mysteries described. 8vo. London, 1823.

Hopkins, J. H., D.D., On the Church of Rome in her primitive Purity, compared with the Church of Rome at the present Day, &c. 8vo. London, 1839.

Horne, T. Hartwell, B.D., An Introduction to the critical Study and Knowledge of the holy Scriptures. 4 vols. 8vo. Fifth edition. London, 1825.

Horne, Mariolatry: or, Facts and Evidences demonstrating the Worship of the Virgin. 12mo. Second edition. London, 1841.

Hughes, Travels in Sicily. 2 vols. 4to. London, 1820.

Hume, David, History of England. 13 vols. 12mo. London, 1793.

Husenbeth, F. C., Faberism exposed and refuted, &c. 8vo. Norwich, 1836.

———, Missal for the Use of the Laity. Third edition. 12mo. London, 1840.

Ignatii Epistolæ. 4to. Oxon., 1709.

Index Expurgatorius Belgii. 4to. Antwerp, 1571.

Index Expurgatorius Vaticanus. An exact reprint. Edited by R. Gibbings, B.A. 12mo. Dublin, 1837.

Index of Prohibited Books. By Command of the present Pope Gregory XVI. 12mo. London, 1840.

Indices Librorum Prohibitorum et Expurgandorum Novissimi Hispanicus et Romanus. Fol. Madriti, 1667.

Inglis, Henry D., Spain. 2 vols. Second edition. 8vo. London, 1837.

Ingram, George, B.D., The Popish Doctrine of Transubstantiation refuted, &c. 12mo. London, 1840.

Irenæi Opera. Fol. Genev., 1570.

Isidori, Hispan., Opera omnia. 4to., tom. vii. Romæ, 1803.

———, Pelusiotæ, Opera. Fol. Paris, 1638.

James, Thomas, D.D., A Treatise of the Corruption of Scripture, &c. 4to. London, 1611. 4to. London, 1688. 8vo. Cambridge, 1843.

———, Bellum Papale, sive Concordia discors Sixti Quinti et Clementis Octavi circa Hieronymianam Editionem. 12mo. Londini, 1840.

Jewell's, Bishop, Works. Fol. London, 1611.

Johnson, John, Collection of Ecclesiastical Laws. 2 vols. 12mo. London, 1720.

Josephus, Flavius, Works. 2 vols. 8vo. London, 1825.

Justin Martyris, Opera. Fol. Paris, 1636.

Justiniani Novellæ. 8vo. 1567.

Kett, Henry, M.A., Bampton Lecture, 1790. 8vo. Second edition. London, 1792.

King, R., M.A., Psalter of the B. V. Mary, illustrated by Extracts from the Works of Ecclesiastical Writers. 8vo. Dublin, 1840.

Labbei et Cossartii Concilia Sacrosancta, tomi xvi. in xvii. Folio. Paris, 1671.

La Berthier, The Abominations of the Jesuits exposed. 12mo. London, 1820.

Lactantii Lucii Cæcilii, Opera omnia. 8vo. Vesont., 1838.

Lapide, Cornelius a, Comment. in Daniel Prophetam. Antverpiæ, 1625. (Ed. Coll. Sion.)

Lardner, Nathaniel, D.D., Works. 10 vols. 8vo. London, 1831.

Latimer, Hugh, D.D., Sermons. 2 vols. 8vo. London, 1824.

L'Enfant, James, History of the Council of Constance. 2 vols. 4to. London, 1730.

Le Mois de Marie; ou, le Mois de Mai Consacre à la Gloire de la Mère de Dieu. Avignon, 1834.

Leonis Magni Opera, Epist. Decret. Fol. Paris, 1662.

Le Plat, Judoc, Monumentorum ad Historiam Concilii Tridentini tomi vii. 4to. Lovanii, 1787.

Leslie, Charles, M.A., Short and easy Method with the Deists. 8vo. 1799.

Letters on the Constrained Celibacy of the Church of Rome. 8vo. London, 1816.

Liebermann, Leop. Brun., Institutiones Theologicæ, tom. v. 8vo. Moguntiæ, 1836.

Lightfoot, John, D.D., Horæ Hebraicæ et Talmudicæ. 8vo. 2 vols. (Pitman's edit.) London, 1825.

Ligorio, Alphons. de, Theologia Moralis, tomi vii. 12mo. Paris, 1841.

———, The Glories of Mary, Mother of God. Second edit. 12mo. Dublin, 1835.

Lindani, (Damasi Wilhelm.,) Panoplia Evangelica. Fol. Paris, 1564.

Lingard, John, D.D., A History of England. 13 vols. 12mo. Fourth edition. London, 1837.

———, Remarks on certain Charges, Letters, &c. By Dr. Barrington, Bishop of Durham. 12mo. Dublin, 1822.

Liturgies, the Two, of Edward VI. compared. 8vo. Oxon., 1838.

Lombardi, Petri, Sententiæ. 12mo. Coloniæ Agrippinæ, 1566.

Lutheri, Martini, Opera, tomi vii. Fol. Witebergæ, 1554.

Lynde, Sir Humphrey, Via Tuta, et Via Devia. 12mo. London, 1632.

Lyra, Nicolas de, Postilla. Fol. Romæ, 1471.

M'Crie, Thomas, D.D., Life of John Knox. 8vo. Sixth edition. Edinburgh, 1839.

M'Gavin, William, The Protestant: a Series of Essays on the Controversy with the Church of Rome, &c. 4 vols. 8vo. Tenth edition. Glasgow, 1837.

M'Ghee, R. J., A.M., The Nullity of the Government of Queen Victoria in Ireland; or, The Pope, the virtual Ruler of the Land. 12mo. Second edition. London, 1841.

M'Ghee, Robert, A.B., Romanism as it rules in Ireland. 2 vols. 8vo. London, 1840.

M'Hale, John, D.D., On the Evidences and Doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church. 8vo. London, 1842.

Macknight, James, D.D., Commentary and Notes on the Apostolical Epistles. 4 vols. 8vo. London, 1821.

Maimbourg, Lewis, Traité Historique de l'Etablissement et des Prérogatives de l'Eglise de Rome et de ses Evêques. Fol. Paris, 1685.

Maldonati, Johan., in Quat. Evang. Comment. Fol. Mogunt., 1624.

Marca, Petri de, De Concord. Sacerd. et Imperii. Fol. Paris, 1669.

Martyris, Petri, Opera. Fol. 1564.

———, Loc. Com. Fol. Amst., 1566.

Masères, Baron, Occasional Essays. 8vo. London, 1809.

Matthias, B. W., M.A., A Compendious History of the Council of Trent. 8vo. Dublin, 1832.

Melancthon, Philip, Opera, tomi iv. Fol. Witeberg., 1601.

Mendham, Rev. Joseph, M.A., The Literary Policy of the Church of Rome. 8vo. Second edition. London, 1830.

———, Life and Pontificate of St. Pius V. 8vo. London, 1832.

———, The Spiritual Venality of Rome. 12mo. London, 1836.

———, Memoirs of the Council of Trent. 8vo. London, 1834.

———, The Earl of Shrewsbury, and his miraculous Virgins. (Church-of-England Quarterly Review, April, 1843, pp. 358—369).

Menochii, Commentarii totius Sacræ Scripturæ, tomi iii. Dublin, 1814.

Michaëlis, John David, Introduction to the New Testament. 4 vols in 6. Fourth edition. 8vo. London, 1823.

Middleton, Dr. C., Miscellaneous Works. 4 vols. 4to. 1752.

Milner, John, D.D., Vicar Apostolic, The End of Religious Controversy. 12mo. Eighth edition. London.

———, Inquiry into Certain Opinions, &c. 8vo. London, 1810.

———, Letters to a Prebendary.

———, Vindication of the End of Religious Controversy. 8vo. London, 1822.

Minutii, Felicis, Opera. 8vo. Vesont., 1838.

Missale Romanum. 8vo. Paris, 1637.

Morney, Sir Philip, The Mysterie of Iniquitie. Fol. London, 1612.

Morning Exercise against Popery. 4to. London, 1675.

Morton, Thomas, D.D., A Catholic Appeal for Protestants, &c. Fol. London, 1609.

———, Of the Institution of the Masse. Fol. London, 1631.

Mosheim, J. L., D.D., Ecclesiastical History. 6 vols. 8vo. London, 1825.

Mumford, Joseph, The Catholic Scripturist. 18mo. London, 1686.

Newton, Thomas, D.D., Dissertations on the Prophecies, &c. 2 vols. 8vo. London, 1818.

Nili, Ascetæ, Epistolæ. Fol. Romæ, 1668.

Notes of the Church, Bellarmine's, examined and refuted. 4to. London, 1687.

Officia Sanctorum Patronorum, quæ recitanda sunt in Civitate et Diocesi Neapolitana. Neapoli, 1721.

O'Leary, Life of Dr. By the Rev. Mr. England. 8vo. Cork, 1823.

Optatus, Opera, De Schism. Donat. Fol. Paris, 1679.

Origenis, Opera, tomi ii. Edit. Lat. Basil., Per D. Erasmum, 1545.

———, Opera, tomi iv. Edit. Benedict. Fol. Paris, 1733.

O'Sullivan, M., D.D., Romanism as it rules in Ireland. 2 vols. 8vo. London, 1840.

Ottonis, Frising, Chron. Fol. Basil, 1569.

Ouseley, Gideon, Old Christianity against Papal Novelties. 12mo. Fifth edition. Dublin, 1827.

Pagi, Antonii, Crit. Hist. Chron., tomi iv. Fol. Antv., 1727.

Paleotti, Gab., Acta Concilii Tridentini. (Ed. Joseph. Mendham.) 8vo. London, 1842.

Paley, William, D.D., Works. 5 vols. 8vo. Oxon., 1838.

Pallavicini Historia Concilii Tridentini. Fol. Antverpiæ, 1673.

Panormitani Decret. Epist. Commentaria seu Lectura. Fol. Lugd., 1578.

Pascal, Blaise, Provincial Letters, containing an Exposure of the Reasoning and Morals of the Jesuits. 8vo. London, 1816.

Path to Paradise. 32mo. Belfast, 1837.

Patrick, Simon, D.D., Reflections upon the Devotions of the Roman Church. 12mo. London, 1674.

Pearson, John, D.D., An Exposition of the Creed. Small 4to. London, 1715. 8vo. 2 vols. London, 1821.

Percival, A. P., B.C.L., The Roman Schism illustrated from the Records of the Catholic Church. 8vo. London, 1835.

Philopater, Andrew, Elizabethæ Angliæ Reginæ, Heresim Calvinianam propugnantis, sævissimum in Catholicos sui Regni Edictum, &c. Lugduni, 1593.

Photii, Bibliotheca, Hesych. Hieros. Presb. in Jacobum. Fol. Rothom., 1653.
Pighius, Albertus, De Hierarchia Ecclesia. Fol. Colon., 1538.
Platina, De Vitis Pontif. Rom., cum Annotat. Onuphrii. Fol. Colon., 1568.
Polycarpi Epistolæ. 4to. Oxon., 1709.
Pope, Rev. R. T., A.M., Roman Misquotation, &c. 8vo. London, 1840.
——, Discussion with Maguire. 8vo. Dublin, 1827.
Popery, The History of. 2 vols. 4to. London, 1735.
Possevini Anton., Bibliotheca Select. Fol. Romæ, 1593.
Possini, Petri, Symbol. Græc. Patrum in Matt. collatæ a Balth. Corderio. Fol. Tolosæ, 1646.
Powell, H. T., M.A., Roman Fallacies, and Catholic Truths. 12mo. London, 1841.
———, Thomas, On Apostolical Succession. 8vo. London, 1838.
Pratiche Cristiane ossiano Orazioni Quotidiane per la Messa e per la Confessione e Communione Esercizio, &c. Torino., 1834.
Protestant Guardian, The, conducted by Clergymen of the Church of England. 2 vols. 8vo. London, 1828.

Rabani Opera. Fol. Paris, 1671.
Reginald, Valerius, Praxis Fori Pœnitentialis. Lugduni, 1620. (Coloniæ, 1622.)
Riveti, Andr., Critici Sacri. 12mo. Dordr., 1619.
Rock, Daniel, D.D., Hierurgia: or, the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass, &c. 2 vols. 8vo. London, 1833.
Roffensem, Johannem Episcopum, Assertionis Lutheranæ Confutatio, &c. Fol. Coloniæ, 1524.
Rome in the Nineteenth Century. 3 vols. 12mo. Edinb., 1820.
Romish Horseleech; or, an impartial Account of the intolerable Charge of Popery to this Nation. 12mo. London, 1674.

Sa, Emmanuel, Aphorismi Confessiariorum. Coloniæ, 1599.
Sall, Andrew, D.D., True Catholic and Apostolic Faith maintained in the Church of England. (Edited by Josiah Allport.) 8vo. London, 1840.
Salmeronis, Commentarii in Omnes Epistolas B. Pauli, &c., tomi xvi. Fol. Coloniæ Agrippinæ, 1604.
Salter's Hall Lectures against Popery. 2 vols. London, 1735.
Sarpi, Paolo, History of the Council of Trent. (Translated by Brent.) Fol. London, 1676.
Schelstrate, Eccles. Afric. sub Primat. 4to. Paris, 1679.
Secker, Archbishop, Sermons. 7 vols. 8vo. edit. London, 1769.
Sermons or Homilies, appointed to be read in Churches, in the Time of Queen Elizabeth of famous Memory. 12mo. London, 1839.
Sharpe, Archbishop, Sermons. 7 vols. Fifth edition. 8vo. London, 1754.
Shuttleworth, Philip N., D.D., Not Tradition, but Scripture. 12mo. London, 1839.
Sidonii, Apollin, Opera. Fol. Mediol., 1498.
Soames, Rev. Henry, M.A., History of the Reformation of the Church of England. 8vo. London, 1826. 4 vols.
Socratis Historia Ecclesiastica. Ed. Reading. Fol. Cantab., 1720.
Southey, Robert, Vindicæ Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ. 8vo. London, 1826.
———, Book of the Church. Fourth edition. 8vo. London, 1837; etiam, 1841.
Sozomeni Historia Ecclesiastica. Fol. Ed. Reading. Cantab., 1720.
Spencerus, Johannes, De Legibus Hebræorum, &c., tomi ii. Fol. Tub., 1732.
Stillingfleet, Edward, D.D., Origin. Britan. Fol. London, 1685.
————, Grounds of Protestant Religion. Fol. London, 1665.
Strype, John, Annals of the Reign of Queen Elizabeth. Fol. London, 1709.
———, Life of Parker. 3 vols. 8vo. Edit. 1821.
Suarez, Francisco, Opera, tomi xvi. Fol. Moguntiæ, 1616. (Ed. Coll. Sion.)

Taberna, J. B., Synopsis Theologiæ Practicæ. Coloniæ, 1736.
Taylor, Isaac, Ancient Christianity, and the Doctrine of the Oxford Tracts. 2 vols. 8vo. London, 1839.
———, Jeremy, D.D., Works. 15 vols. Heber's edition. 8vo. London, 1822.
Tertulliani Opera. 2 vols. 12mo. Wirceburgi, 1780.
————, Opera. Fol. Paris, 1580.
————, Opera. Fol. Basil, A. D. 1528.
Theodoreti Opera, tom. v. Fol. Paris, 1642. Histor. Ecclesiastica. Fol. Ed. Reading. Cantab., 1720.
Theophilus, Alexandrinus, Opera. Fol. Bibl. Vet. Pat. Venet., 1770.
Theophylacti Opera, tom. iv. Fol. Paris, 1635.
Tillemont, Lenain de, Mémoires pour servir à l' Histoire Ecclesiastique des six premiers Siècles, tomes xvi. 4to. Paris, 1693.
Tillotson, Archbishop, Works. 3 vols. Fol. Seventh edition. London, 1714.
Toleti, Francisci, S. R. E., Instructio Sacerdotum ac de Septem Peccati Mortalibus. 12mo. Antverpiæ 1603.
Tomline, Bishop, Elements of Christian Theology. 2 vols. 8vo. London, 1823.
Townsend, Rev. G., A.M., Chronological Arrangement of the Old and New Testaments. 4 vols. 8vo. London, 1826.
Tributo Quotidiano alla Immacolato Madre di Dio. 32mo. Romæ, 1840.
Turton, Thomas, D.D., The Roman Catholic Doctrine of the Eucharist considered, &c. 8vo. London, 1837.
Tyler, J. E., B.D., Primitive Christian Worship, &c., concerning the Invocation of Saints and Angels, &c. 8vo. London, 1840.
——, The Worship of the Blessed Virgin Mary in the Church of Rome, contrary to Scripture, &c. 8vo. London, 1844.

Ussher, Archbishop, Works. 8 vols. 8vo. London, 1613.

Vie de la Sainte Vierge Mère de Dieu, par une Prêtre du Diocèse de Genève. 48o. Alais.
Villanueva, Don Joaquin Lorenzo. Vida Literaria. 2 vols. 8vo. London, 1825.
Vincentii, Lirinensis, Commonitorium. Paris, 1562.
Virgilii, Polydori Urbinatis, De Rerum Inventoribus. 12mo. Basil, 1544.

Waddington, Rev. George, A History of the Church from the earliest Ages to the Reformation. 3 vols. 8vo. Second Edition. London, 1835.
Watson, Dr., Bishop of Llandaff, Theological Tracts. 6 vols. 8vo. London, 1791.
———, Richard, Biblical and Theological Dictionary. 8vo. London, 1831.
———, Exposition of the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Mark. 8vo. London, 1833.
———, Works. 12 vols. 8vo. London, 1834.
Wesley, John, M.A., Works. 14 vols. 8vo. Third edition. London, 1831.
Whately, Archbishop, On the Kingdom of Christ. Third edition. 8vo. London, 1842.
———, On the Errors of Romanism having their Origin in human Nature. 8vo. London, 1837.
Whitby, Daniel, D.D., Paraphrase and Commentary on the New Testament. 2 vols. Fol. London, 1703.
———, Discourse concerning the Laws made against Heretics. 4to. London, 1632.
White, Joseph Blanco, M.A., Practical and Internal Evidence against Catholicism. 8vo. Second edition. London, 1826.

White, Poor Man's Preservative against Popery. 12mo. Second edition. London, 1826.

Willet, Andrew, Synopsis Papismi. Fol. London, 1600.

Wiseman, Nicholas, D.D., Lectures on the real Presence of the Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, in the Blessed Eucharist. 8vo. London, 1836.

Wiseman, Lectures on the Doctrines and Practices of the Catholic Church. 2 vols. 12mo. London, 1836.

Wood, Anthony, Athenæ Oxonienses. 2 vols. Fol. London, 1721.

Wright, Thomas, M.A., St. Patrick's Purgatory: an Essay on the Legends, &c., during the Middle Ages. 8vo. London, 1844.

Xaverii, Franc., Epistolæ (a Horatio Tursellino). 8vo. Mogunt., 1600.

Young, John, M.A., Lectures on the chief Points in Controversy, &c. 8vo. London, 1836.

Zonari, Johannes Monachi, Opera. Fol. Paris, 1618.

GENERAL INDEX.

A.

Abbadie, admits the miracle connected with Huneric cruelty, 527
Abortives, baptism of, considered, 117—revolting instructions of Peter Dens concerning the office, alluded to, 118
"Abridgment of Christian doctrine," on extreme unction, 383—on the sacramental character of matrimony, 425
Absolution, priestly, Popish notion of, 193—definition of, by the Council of Trent, 193—of a wicked Priest, valid, 194—illustration of, by the Tridentine Catechism, 194—recognised form of, 194—alleged scripture in favour of the dogma, considered, 195, et seq.—the Apostles were destitute of such power, 197—no human power qualified to exercise such responsibility, 197—the doctrine unknown in the primitive church, 197—Popish plan of forgiveness directly contrary to the Scripture mode, 197, 198—how it ought to be received, 203—reserved cases described, 208—letters of, sold by Tetzel, 327
Absurdity of the dogma of infallibility, 74—transubstantiation, 142
Accidental unity, a peculiar feature of the Romish Church, 456
Accidents of bread and wine, questions concerning, solved, 146—when eaten by a mouse or dog, 146—or vomited, 147
Acholius, Bishop of Thessalonica, the first Vicar of the Pope, his power, 678
Acolyte, the duties of, 398—matter and form of his ordination, 398—history of, 398—Dr. Rock's account of the order, 398—Baronius's description of one, 398—Jerome adverts to this character, 398—Peter Lombard quoted, 416—a domestic attendant on the Bishop, 416—form of degradation, 422
Acosta, the Jesuit, on the miracles of Xavier, 527, et seq.
Act of faith, what termed such, 6—defined by the Douay and American Catholic Catechism, 15
Administrator, of the sacraments, qualifications of, 97—his person, 97—ordinary and extraordinary Ministers described, 97—doctrine of intention noticed, 97—the faith of the, 97—his infidelity no impediment, 97—sanctity of, not a necessary qualification, 97—intention of the, considered, 100—of baptism, 114—of confirmation, 129—eucharist validly consecrated by a wicked Priest, 146
Adoption, said to be imparted in baptism, 123
Adoration of the host, act of, described, 189
Adrian I., lax views of, on the time for repentance, 220—claimed the power of convening Councils, 668
——— IV., excommunicated Frederick, 663
——— VI., a singular indulgence of, 324—acknowledged great defection in the Papal Church, 506—his mistake with regard to Sancta Romana, 705
Adults, baptism of, considered, 115—what are considered proper dispositions, 115
Æneas, his visit to Tartarus, noticed, 282
Aërius, his objection to praying for the dead, 279
Ætna, superstitious notions concerning, early encouraged, 281
Afflictions, said to be satisfying to divine justice, 224—no atonement in them, 227
African Council, made provision for the punishment of unworthy Prelates, 684—rejected all appeals to Rome, 688—their address to Celestine on the subject, 688
Agatho, Pope, on the power of the Pope with regard to law, 676
Agde, Council of, the thirty-second canon corrupted, 585
Agreement in doctrine, a mark of the Church, 515—Bellarmine quoted, 515—the note or mark described, 515—which cannot be applicable to the Papacy, 515—the standard of doctrinal truth, 515
Airault, the Jesuit, on murder, 485
Aistulphus, is compelled to cede to the Papacy much temporal territory, 666
Albe, described, 176
Albert, Archbishop of Magdeburg, retails indulgences in Saxony, 323, 325—his character, 325
Albert the Great, on the adoration of the Virgin, his interpretation of Gen. iii. 15, 763 Albigenses, war against them declared by the third Lateran Council, 558—Dr. Grier's remarks on these decrees, 558—the unfounded charges brought against this people by the Papacy, 560, 564. See Waldenses.
Alcala, University of, on the temporal power of the Pope, 603
Alcuin, on the application of the term "apostolic," 617
Alexander Alensis viewed open transgressors as members of the Church, 449—on raising confirmation into a sacrament, 511
——— Natalis, on the doctrine of purgatory, 242
——— III., his grant of indulgences, 322—his tyranny, 499—convenes the third Lateran Council, 558—encouraged appeals being made to him, 687—attempts to prove his infallibility by Scripture, 702
——— V., elected by the Pisan Synod, and confirms the proceedings of that Council, 570
——— VI., sends a commission of Jubilee into England, 354—his profligate and abandoned life, 483—as Vicar of Christ cedes the West Indies to Spain, 619
——— VII., perplexed with disputes on the immaculate conception, 472—his flagitious and abandoned character, 574
Alexandria, church of, its supposed succession, 496
Alison, Archibald, Esq., on the awful consequences in France from the facility of divorce, 441
All-Souls' Day, purgatorial ceremonies of, described, 298
Allegiance to the Pope, the oath of, importance of, 1—nature of this oath, 3
Alliaco, Petrus de, on transubstantiation unscriptural, 139—held some Protestant ideas of the eucharist, 147
Almain, on the superiority of a Council to a Pope, 696—history of this opposition to the Pope's supremacy, 698
Alms, a work of satisfaction, 235, 237
Alphonso Liguori, his Glories of Mary, quoted, 766
Alphonsus a Castro, on the novelty of purgatory, 265, 517—considered it unknown in the primitive church, 274—on the rise of indulgences, 314—considered them a novelty, 518—on the power of a Council to depose a Pope, 705
Amadeus, his amiable character, 461
Amalarius, on the application of the term "Apostle," 617
Ambrose, on Scripture and tradition, 49—heretical opinions of, 85—on the obligation of an oath, 86—the state of departed spirits, 86—on the nature of the sacraments, 165—testimony against transubstantiation, 166—on the doctrine of satisfaction, 238—the fallacy of the doctrine of purgatory, 250

—quoted on Matt. xii. 32, 252—his testimony against purgatory, 270—on praying for the dead, 276 ignorant of indulgences, 323—on the apostolical succession, 495—against the doctrine of the immaculate conception, 519—on the primacy of Peter, 608—terms Peter and Paul Princes, 616—on the application of the term "Apostle," 617—is silent on the supremacy, 643—recommended celibacy, 743

Ambrosiaster, on the identity between Bishop and Presbyter, 410—account of himself and writings, 510—on the election of Bishops, 680

Ambrosius Catharinus, on the authority of the Fathers, 87

American Catholic Catechism, definition of an act of faith, 15—quoted on the doctrine of transubstantiation, 132

Amice, described, 176

Amolet, Father, on the doctrine of attrition, 217

Amplitude, a mark of the Church, 512—Bellarmine quoted, 512—as a mark, it belongs not to the Papacy, 512—is refuted by Bishop Fowler, 513—the phrase of Vincentius Lirinensis examined, 513

Anacletus, required the whole congregation to communicate, 512

Anastasius Sinaita, on Scripture and tradition, 52—heretical opinions of, 85

"Anchorites," the term defined, 744

"Ancient customs," meaning of the term, 676

Ancyra, Council of, enacted laws concerning marriage, 742

Andrew, the Apostle, a prayer of invocation to, 757

Anecdotes: the scarcity of the Bible in Rome, 23—Omar, Caliph of Alexandria, 52—Theodosius the younger, 126—of a French Physician, 142—of Sanctus and Blandina, 144—of a Protestant lady, 145—of making the wafer, 176—of an Irishman, 176—of Garnet the Jesuit, 222—of Father Aubigny, 222—of Gregory I., 231—of a Cardinal, 281—of a certain saint, 281—on the importance attached to consecrated ground, 294—of Dr. Edward Young, 295—of Tetzel, 327—of a shoemaker, 327—of a Saxon gentleman, 328—of Clement XI., 473—of General Champion, 539—of a robber, 542—of the chair of St. Peter, 636—of Bishop Latimer, 770

Angel of the church, described, 412

Angels, may they administer a sacrament, 97—adoration of, sanctioned by corrupting holy Scripture, 259

———, worship of, unknown in the primitive church, 518—a prayer to our Angel Guardian, 757

Anglican confession, on the Minister of ordination, 419

Anjou, Council of, repudiated second marriages among the Clergy, 743

Anniversary, an, described, 293

Anointing, directions concerning that of extreme unction, 376—anointing with oil an ancient ceremony, 386

Anselm, St., his account of a ludicrous miracle, 542

Anthony, the Abbot, his writings mutilated by the Expurgatorial Index, 85

———, St., of Padua, absurd miracle imputed to him, 541

Antioch, church of, line of its succession involved in difficulty, 496—Peter's supposed residence there as Bishop considered, 635, et seq.—had greater claims than that of Rome, 640

Antioch, Synod of, complains of Julius I. breaking the canons, 676—on the conduct to be pursued toward accused Bishops, 679

Antiquity, a mark of the church, 503—its nature defined, 503—was claimed by the Samaritans against the Jews, 503—argued by the latter against Christ, 504—and by the Pagans against both, 504—folly of making antiquity a test of truth, 504—as a mark, it is not applicable to the church in all ages, 505—Bellarmine's six marks of change, 505

Antoine du Pinet, referred to on the Roman Taxæ, 362

Antoninus, Archbishop of Florence, on the clerical tonsure, 397—the sacred canon, 458—the novelty of indulgences, 517—ascribes absolute power to the Pontiff, 497—his enumeration of the prerogatives of the Pope, 668—his irresponsibility, 692, et seq.—on the nature and extent of Papal power, 708, et seq.—the adoration of the Virgin, 754

Apiarius, his case considered, 688

Apocrypha, meaning of the term, 30—not admitted in the canon of Scripture during the first four centuries, 30—proved not canonical, 31—admission of, among canonical books of modern usage, 31—adopted by a Roman Council, A. D. 418, 31—incorporated by the Council of Trent with the word of God, 31—this a proof of the deficiency of the Romish Rule of Faith, 89—Popish origin of the doctrine of purgatory found there, 247—variation of belief in the Church of Rome with regard to it, 510

Apollinarius, heretical opinions of, 85

Apostles, extensively employed the Scriptures, 29—to whom the term is applicable, 408—what priority existed among them, 409—had no fixed diocesses, 496—Eusebius on the labours of, 496—were ignorant of any supremacy in Peter, 610—on the application of the term, 616—Theodoret and Amalarius quoted, 617—all the Apostles were equal in authority, 622—office of, not transmissible, 626—what constituted an Apostle, 626—they considered the apostolate a different office from that of Pastors and Teachers, 626—in what sense the Fathers termed Bishops, &c., successors of, 627—office of, incompatible with that of Bishop, 635—how far an Apostle could discharge the office of a Bishop, 635—could exercise episcopal functions, 637

Apostles' Creed, every article vitiated by the Papacy, 480

Apostolic, a term assumed by the Pope without authority, 616, 617—given to the Metropolitan, 617—authorities quoted, 617

Apostolic doctrine, a mark of the true Church, 443

Apostolic ministry, a mark of the true Church, 444—how constituted, 444—what implied in a proper call to the ministry, 444

Apostolical canons, the sixth corrupted, 584—Drs. James and Comber quoted, 584

Apostolical Chancery, worked ill in Germany, 325

Apostolical Constitutions, are silent on extreme unction, 388—the supremacy, 643—on the purity of the married state, 716

Apostolical Fathers, who are so termed, 44—their testimony with regard to tradition, 44, et seq.—how far their testimony is to be received, 45—make no mention of extreme unction, 388—how the church was governed during their day, 409—are silent on the doctrine of supremacy, 643

Apostolical sacraments, defined, 444—a mark of the true Church, 444

Apostolical succession, examined, and its absurdity unfolded, 414, et seq., 493, et seq.—the term "succession" investigated, 493—of what nature is that mentioned in Scripture, 493—what the Fathers taught as such, 494—sense in which this doctrine is held by the Romanists, 495—Gerhard referred to, 495—does the succession exist in the Church of Rome, 495—she has no personal and local succession, 496—the succession of the early churches, 496, et seq.—in the early church it is involved in perplexity, 497—Papal succession greatly interrupted, 498—Romish doctrine of intention fatal to this theory, 498—other obstacles enumerated, 498—broken by illegitimate occupancy, 499—Bishops not the true successors of the Apostles, and why, 499—what claims are made by the Church of Rome may be challenged in favour of other churches, 500—Christianity has continued through a holier channel than that of Rome, 500—are Ministers of Protestant Churches successors of the Apostles, 501—succession ordinary or extraordinary defined, 501, 502—Dr. Whately quoted, 502—the line of succession involves great uncertainty, 638

Apostolicity, a mark of the Church, 493—Dens, Bailly, and Liebermann quoted, 493—the question of apostolical succession considered, 493—nature of that mentioned in Scripture, 493
Apparitions, a great support of purgatory, 281—error connected with such appearances, 284
Appeals to Rome, how they have advanced the power of the Papacy, 662—not held by the Fathers, 86. See Receiving Appeals.
Archbishop, form of degrading an, 421
Arethas Cæsariensis, doctrine of purgatory repudiated, 86
Arians, corrupted the Fathers, 76—heresy of the, led to the Council of Nice, 554—where they were rejected, 554—opposed at the second Lateran Council, 558
Arius Montanus, on the canon of Scripture, 458
Arles, Council of, recognised the power of Emperors to enact or abrogate ecclesiastical law, 677—enjoined clerical celibacy, 743
Arnobius, the folly of making antiquity a test of truth, 504—supposed Peter to have been at Rome, 631
Arrowsmith, Priest, cures said to be wrought by his hand, 528
Articles of the Church of England, of works of supererogation, quoted, 228—do not condemn prayer for the dead, 289
——— of faith, in the Romish Church, 1—new, added to the word of God, 89—purgatory not considered such, and when, 265—prayer for the dead not mentioned in the articles of the Reformed Church of England, 289
Athanasius, on Scripture and tradition, 49—heretical opinions of, 86—folly of worshipping objects that may be eaten, 145—on the doctrine of spiritual manducation, 151—is called "Pope," 619—procures a Synod to confirm the decrees of Sardica, 674
Athenagoras, eating human flesh, a charge preferred against Christians, 144—is silent on the doctrine of purgatory, 267—and on extreme unction, 388
Attrition, or imperfect contrition, sufficient for adult baptism, 116—defined by the Council of Trent, 214—unscriptural character of this doctrine, 215—explained by the Tridentine Catechism, 216—a doctrine strongly inculcated by the Jesuits, 216—Dr. Goodman's illustration of this dogma, 216, et seq.—testimony of Divines and casuists, 217—first taught by Melchior Canus, 218—objections against the doctrine stated, 218, et seq.—interferes awfully with the Scripture notions of repentance, 219, et seq.—is founded on erroneous views of the evil of sin, 222—confers a dangerous power upon the priesthood, 222
Aubigny, Father, anecdote of, 222
Ave Maria, described, 756, 757
Averroes, reason of his blasphemy of the Christian faith, 144
Augustine, on the written tradition of the Gospel, 37—Scripture and tradition, 50—on Matt. xvi. 18, 54—the promise of the Spirit to the church, 59—corrupted by Fulbertus, 78—his writings mutilated by the Expurgatorial Index, 85—on the descent of Christ into hell, 86—repudiated appeals to Rome, 86—on the state of departed spirits, 86—the definition of a sacrament, 93—on the doctrine of spiritual manducation, 152—transubstantiation not the mystery of the early church, 162—on the reception of the eucharist, 165—testimony against the doctrine of transubstantiation, 166—opposed to the doctrine of auricular confession, 205—on the doctrine of satisfaction, 238—the fallacy of the doctrine, 250—quoted, on Matt. xii. 32, 252—on the spirits in prison, 257—his evidence against purgatory, 271—notions entertained by, with respect to the dead, 275—his mother referred to, 277—his views of prayer being offered to the dead, 277—on the folly of purgatory, 286—was ignorant of indulgences, 323—how to ascertain the true church, 443—by no means free from error, 477—on the term "catholic" applied to the church, 488, 489—that term does not prove a church to be that of Christ, 491—on the apostolical succession, 495—the successor of Peter, 497—on the folly of making antiquity a test of truth, 504—opposed the multitude of ceremonies, 507—against the dogma of the immaculate conception, 519—on the superiority of a Council to a Pope, 582—the contradictions between Bishops and also Councils, 589—on the primacy of Peter, 609—the confession of Christ, 610—considered the Apostles equal in dignity, 616—term "Princes" applied to Peter and Paul, 616—that of "Apostolic See," 617—is silent on the supremacy, 643—on the independence of Bishops, 649—opposed appeals being made to Rome, 689—speaks strongly in favour of marriage, 717
———, the Monk, visits England, 521—his doctrines, 521—his proud bearing towards the Monks of Bangor Iscoed, 521—miracle connected with his mission alluded to, 527
——— Ac, (or Oak,) noticed, 521
Augustinians, embrace the doctrines of Augustine or Calvin, 468
Augustinus Triumphas, ascribed absolute power to the Pope, 596
Aurelius, is called a "Pope" by Augustine, 619—and by the Council of Carthage, 619
Auricular confession, revolting character of that of Rome, 202—an inquisition of iniquity, 202—method of such confession, 203—how absolution is to be received, 203—is not an institution of Christ, 203—has no precedent in the confessions among the Jews, 204—arguments in its favour refuted, 204—the practice of, unwarrantable presumption on the part of the Papacy, 204—Scripture opposed to it, 204—likewise antiquity, 204, et seq.—enjoined by the Council of Lateran IV., 204, 559—and established by that of Trent, 205—opposed by Augustine and others, 205—perplexing to the conscience, 205—its secrecy, one of its evils, 208—a great encouragement to sin, 210—contrast of confession made to a Priest, and that made to God, 210—is corrupting to the Confessor, 210—its immoral tendency asserted by Gavin, 211—arguments in favour of, examined, 212, et seq.—of recent origin, 212—suits the carnal propensities of man, 213—the assertion that it produces good effects, disproved, 213—acknowledged to be unknown in the primitive church, 238—those who die immediately after absolution escape purgatory, 245—variations in the Papacy with regard to, 512
Austerities, voluntary, benefits of, 235
Authenticity of Scripture, not proved by church authority and tradition, 32—the evidence for, 32
Authority, of the Church, not necessary to certify the genuineness of Scripture, 31—testimony of Clement of Alexandria, 80—does not support the doctrine of Seven Sacraments, 95—Liebermann quoted, 95—strongly defended by the Jesuits, 465—defined, 543—Papal view of the question, 543—conciliar testimony, 543—has no such power as that claimed by the Paparchy, 544—remarks of the Rev. Joseph Fletcher, 544, et seq.—on fixing the canon, 545—Scripture passages which are adduced inapplicable, 546, et seq.—to institute ceremonies, considered, 547—Mr. Young quoted, 547
———, of the Fathers, how held by the Papists, 86
———, of the Pope, limit and extent of his power, greatly contested in the Papacy, 463—four opinions stated by Bellarmine, 463. See Supremacy.
Authors, Romanist, general character of, 6—evasive conduct of Papists towards them, 7

B

Babylon, mentioned by Peter, considered, 630—notion of one spiritual and mystical, refuted by Josephus, 630—cannot signify Rome, 631

Bailly, Ludov., quoted, on the argument from natural analogy, 95—manner in which the sacraments impart grace, 105—definition of character, 106—on sacramental ceremonies, 109—the matter of baptism, 113—on the baptism of monsters, 121—the ceremonies of confirmation, 130—the institution of extreme unction, 374—its subjects, 378—on the sacrament of orders, 393—their division, 396—definition of the episcopate, 401—its prerogatives, 402—functions and grades, 402—the election of Bishops, 402—and consecration, 403—on the opinions entertained concerning the matter and form of orders, 419—on the indelible character of ordination, 421—impediments dissolving marriage, 434—a threefold contract, 437—marriage with heretics considered, 438—on different characters, constituting members of the Church, 449—on the apostolicity of the Church, 493—on the membership of Councils, 552—the President, 553—on the character of a General Council, 580—on the unanimity of Bishops in Council, 585—the supremacy of the Pope, 667—the Pontiff superior to a Council, 695, et seq.—the infallibility of the Pope, 699, 700—in favour of clerical celibacy, 720—on the worship of the saints, 767
Bajulus Dei, an important office in the Papacy, described, 189
Baker, Father, on the Holy Altar and Sacrifice, 174
Bandage, applied to the head of the confirmed, 130
Bandellus, opposes the doctrine of the immaculate conception, 42
Bangor Iscoed, cruel massacre of Monks at, 521
Bannez, the Jesuit, on murder, 485
Baptism, erroneous view of, held by the Papacy, 94—on the scriptural character of its institution, 97—nature of grace conferred in, 104—why said to impress a character, 107—not to be repeated, and why, 108—importance of this sacrament, 111—matter of baptism, proximate and remote, 112—Romanists have added to the former, 112—mode of administration, 113—questions concerning doubtful matter, quantity of water, and the part of the body to come in contact with it, considered, 113—instructions to a midwife concerning, 113—baptism by occisive ablution explained and considered, 114—demoralizing tendency of such discussions, 114—form of baptism, 114—its administrator, 114—its subjects, 115—baptism of adults, 115—on compulsory baptism, 115—accommodating character of Popery with regard to this sacrament, 115—scriptural qualifications for baptism dispensed with in Popery, 116—of insane, mad, and dumb persons, 117—of infants, 117—of abortives, 117—the assumed subjection of all the baptized to the Romish Church considered, 118—why baptism administered by heretics is considered valid, 119—baptism of slaves, captives, infidels, heretics, &c., 120—the necessity of baptism, 121—baptism in fact or desire explained, 123—observations on the unscriptural character of her doctrine on baptism, 123—effects of baptism as taught by the Papacy, 123—fictitious baptism explained, 124—scriptural objection to the effects of baptism as taught by the Romanists, 124—ceremonies of baptism, 124—their antiscriptural character, 126—Rev. R. Watson quoted, 127—the newly baptized escape purgatory, 245—do the unbaptized belong to the Church, 447
Barnabas, knew nothing of extreme unction, 388
Baronius, Cardinal, considered tradition superior to the word of God, 42—on the authority of the Fathers, 87—on the burning light used in baptism, 126—his attempt to destroy the credit of Gelasius, 167—terms the mass an unwritten tradition, 178—recommends the whip as penance, 235—on the depravity of the Popes, 482—propriety of the term "Papist," as applied to the Romanist, 492, 619—on the authority of the Church, 544—ascribed absolute power to the Pope, 597—applauds the tyrannical conduct of Gregory II., 600—adverts to the constitution of Boniface VIII. with regard to the supremacy, 601—on the fitness of the term "Pope," 619—contends for Peter residing at Rome, 630—egregious mistake of, 635—on Peter's bishopric at Antioch and Rome, 635—on the office of St. Peter, 635—the power of the Pontiff to restore Bishops, 686—on the superiority of Popes to Councils, 695
Barrow, Bishop, on prayer for the dead, 287
———, Isaac, D. D., quoted on Matt. xvi. 18, 54—on contradictions between Popes, 67—on the presidency of Councils, 553—on the presidency of the Ephesine Council, 671
Basil, Council of, condemns Eugenius as a heretic, 67—attempts to restore peace to the Church, 461—deposes Eugenius, 461, 573—fiercely contends with the Council of Florence, 460, et seq.—on the authority of the Church, 543—object for which it was convened, 573—proceedings of, 573—the legitimacy of this Council disputed, 573—was transferred to Ferrari, 573—rejected the absolute supremacy of the Pope, 605—on the subject of appeals, 689—considered a Council superior to a Pope, 696
Basil, his fire of purgation, 265—his testimony against that doctrine, 270—his Liturgy spoken of, 277—is silent on the supremacy, 642—on the heresy of the Marcionites, 716
——, Pontius, on the principles of the Jesuits, 233
Basilides, his appeal noticed, 687–691
Basnage, James, on the supposed appeal of Marcion, 691
Bauny, Father, on the morality of the Jesuits, 233
Baxter, Richard, on the moral impossibility of holding a General Council, 575
Bayle, Peter, his account of the Taxæ referred to, 362
Bede, on the fallacy of the doctrine of purgatory, 251—relates the tale of Drithelm, 282—his work, De Remediis Peccatorum, alluded to, 363—his view of anointing the sick, 389
Belgic confession, on the Minister of ordination, 419
Bell, ringing of a, at the elevation of the host, 186
Bellarmine, Cardinal, quoted on the infallibility of the Pope, 5—the origin of heresy, 27—the Gospel having been originally preached by tradition, 39—on the authority of the Fathers, 86—declares sacraments to be more necessary than faith, 94—definition of character, 107—on the charge against the Christians eating their own God, 144—his attempts to destroy the credit of the testimony of Gelasius, 167—on the history of the doctrine of transubstantiation, 171—on the sacrifice of the mass, 178—on the meritorious character of good works, 228—did not consider the Scriptures necessary to salvation, 233—lax sentiments of, with regard to marriage, 234—on the locality of purgatory, 243—charges Origen with error, 243—on the objects of purgatory, 243—its punishments, 244—their severity, 244—duration, 244—souls in purgatory assured of salvation, 245—who escape purgatory, 245—neither merit nor sin in purgatory, 246—for whom purgatory is prepared, 251—on the spirits in prison, 256—on the ideal antiquity of purgatory, 281—says that the existence of purgatory may be proved from visions, 281—relates the tale of Drithelm, 282—on the locality of purgatory, 284—and its punishments, 284—on the benefit of indulgences, 309—his suspicions concerning them, 316—on the application of indulgences to the dead, 350—acknowledges the evil tendency of indulgences, 361—on the effects of extreme unction, 383—his feeble advocacy of extreme unction, 388—on the authority of Bishops, 404—on the Minister of ordination, 419—the sacramental character of matrimony, 427—on the definition of the term "church," 442—her members, 445—on the twofold character of the Church, 447—open transgressors members thereof, 449—his marks of the Church mentioned, 451—on unity, 456—the opinions of the Papacy on the power of the Pope, 463—on his temporal authority, 464—denies the heterodoxy of John XXII., 468—the sanctity of the Church, 479—on the abandoned character of some Popes, 482—treasonable sentiments contained in his writings, 487—fallacy of his six marks of change in the Church, 505—on the perpetuity of the Roman hierarchy, 507—considered service in an unknown tongue a novelty, 511—on amplitude, as a mark of the Church, its fallacy, 512—his feeble efforts in aid of the dogma of the immaculate conception, 519—efficacy of doctrine defined, 520—on the mark of miracles, 522—his account of St. Anthony of Padua, 541—on the authority of the Church, 543—on power to convene a Council, 553—the Council of Constance, 572—on the term conciliariter, 581—on the infallibility of a Council, 581—on the rejection of the Council of Chalcedon, 583—his futile efforts to support conciliar infallibility, 587—on the decree of the Roman Council concerning transubstantiation, 591—adverts to those who ascribe absolute authority to the Pope, 596—he does the same, 598—on the supreme power of the Pontiff, 605—on Peter, as universal Pastor, 627—on his bishopric at Antioch and Rome, 635—to preside in Councils, the prerogative of the Pope, 671—on the power of jurisdiction, 677—the irresponsibility of the Pontiff, 692—censures the French Clergy, 701—on the temporal authority of the Pope, 707—on his indirect power, 707—the notion repudiated by the French Clergy, 708—his argument from Scripture, in favour of temporal authority, noticed, 711—when vows of celibacy may be taken, 718

Benedict Rhemy Noydens, on the doctrine of attrition, 217

Benedict XII., his contentions with Gregory XII., noticed, 569—is deposed by the Council of Pisa, 570

Benedict XIII., his grant of indulgences, 343

Benedict XIV., on the subjection of Protestants to Papal law, 119—on the ceremonies of baptism, 126—his Bull to suppress the system of solicitation, 212—on the superiority of Bishops over Presbyters, 401—adopts the Bull Unigenitus, 473—ascribed absolute power unto the Pope, 598—recognises the decree of Florence on the supremacy, 607—his definition of the term "supremacy," as applied to the Pontiff, 667—to preside in Councils is in the power of the Pope, 671—asserted his prerogative to confirm Councils, 672—sanction or dispense with laws, 675—the jurisdiction of the Pope over his Clergy, 678—his authority over Bishops, 680—on the superiority of Popes to Councils, 695—their temporal authorities, 707

Benefices, bought and sold by the agents of the Pope, 325

Benson, Dr. George, on the disgraceful character of the Taxæ, 365

———, Rev. Joseph, on the grant of the keys, and on the power to bind and loose, 196

Berengarius, a treatise on the Sacraments, falsely attributed to him, 78—his history, 169—opposes the doctrine of transubstantiation, 169—recants, 170—his vacillating conduct, 170—and death, 170—review of his disputes, 517—form of his recantation, 591

Berington, Joseph, P. P., charged with having flagrantly corrupted the Fathers, 80—on the sacrifice of the mass, 175—priestly absolution, 195—on the existence of purgatory, 242

Berinus, St., ridiculous character of his miracles, 524

Bernard, on the locality of purgatory, 242—its doctrine unscriptural, 247—inferred purgatorial fire cleansed gradually, and why, 281—engaged warmly in disputes concerning the immaculate conception, 472—his miracles alluded to, 524—on the evil attending appeals, 689—his argument in favour of the temporal authority of the Pope, noticed, 711—on the licentiousness of the celibates, 732—prayer of, to the Virgin, 758—inculcated the worship of the Virgin, 762

Bernardin, a fanatical self-flagellant, 236

Bertani, supposes that God did not intend tradition to be venerated equally with Scripture, 43

Bertram, Monk of Corbie, his work on the eucharist corrupted by the Papists, 79—mutilated by the Expurgatorial Index, 85—on the doctrine of spiritual manducation, 153—on the real presence, 169—the question of Stercorianism, 169

Bertrand, a fanatical self-flagellant, 236

———, Peter, the Canonist, speaks blasphemously of Christ, to advance the power of the Papacy, 621

Bible Societies, Bull of Pius VII. against, 19—condemned by Leo XII., 21—efforts of, to preserve the purity of the Protestant Scriptures, 33

Bibliotheca Patrum, mutilated by the Expurgatorial Index, 85

Bidding prayers, described, 289

Biel, Gabriel, on transubstantiation unscriptural, 139—taught the doctrine of spiritual manducation, 148—on the adoration of the Virgin, 754

Bigamy, laws with regard to, 739

"Binding and loosing," import of the phrase, 56—Townsend, Lightfoot, and Schoettgen, quoted, 57—Popish application of the passage to priestly absolution, refuted, 195—Protestant interpretation of the passage, 195, et seq.

Bingham, Joseph, M.A., on the use and application of the term "Pope," 619

Bishop of Bishops, a title of distinction, repudiated by the early church, 620

Blaise Pascal, on the controversy between the Jesuits and Jansenists, 469—on the gross immorality of the former, 470—character of Les Lettres Provinciales, 471—on the mode of instruction adopted by the Jesuits, 472

Blandina, anecdote of, 144

Blasphemy, connected with saint-worship, 755

——— against the Holy Ghost, no allusion to purgatory, 251

Bless, to, to consecrate, explained, 94

"Blessed," "most blessed," &c., epithets applied to the Pontiff, considered, 620

Blood, baptized in blood, what, 123—eating blood rendered Christianity execrable to the Heathen and Jew, 144

Blow on the cheek, why given in confirmation, 130

Bohemian Confession, on the Minister of ordination, 419

Boileau, Abbé, on the use of the whip as penance, 235

Bonaventura, Cardinal, had some Protestant views of the eucharist, 147—acknowledges that auricular confession has no scriptural authority, 204—on the punishments of purgatory, 284—the intention of indulgences, 314—the sacramental character of episcopal ordination, 396—his writings in honour of the Virgin, 763—puerile attempts of the Papacy to prove their spurious character, 763—his Psalter of the Virgin, quoted, 764, et seq.

Boniface II., his character of the Fathers, 86

——— III., receives the title of "Universal Bishop," 665—his subsequent conduct, noticed, 665

——— VII., his abandoned character, 483

——— VIII., on subjection to the Pope, 3—institutes a jubilee, and grants a plenary indulgence, 322—his gross immorality, 499—his decree declaring every person subject to the Pope, 601—which he derived from Aquinas, 601—adduces Matt. xvi. 18, to prove that the Emperor is subject to the Pope, 614—on the irresponsibility of the Pope, 692—seeks to prove his infallibility from Scripture, 702—his argument from holy writ in favour of temporal Papal authority, noticed, 711

Boniface IX., his effrontery with regard to indulgences, 324

Book of Common-Prayer, on prayer for the dead, 287

Bossuet, Bishop of Meaux, on the comparative uselessness of the written word of God, 17—contends that John vi. has special reference to the eucharist, 148—his unfair attack upon Luther, noticed, 330—variations of the Romish Church with regard to image-worship, 590—on the adoration of the Virgin, 754

Bourgoing, J. F., on masses for the dead, 302

Bouvier, on the punishment of purgatory, 244

Brazils, scarcity of the Bible there, 22

Bread, an emblem of the body of Christ, defended, 135—eating, a metaphor to express spiritual supplies, 148

Breckenridge, Rev. John, his discussion with Mr. Hughes, P. P., quoted on the hostility of the Papal hierarchy to the Scriptures, 21

Breeks versus Woolfrey, case of, quoted, 289

Breves, of high authority, 1

Breviary, a standard of importance, 1—described, 6—recommends the whip as penance, 236—the influence and value of this document, 537—its history, 537—Rev. J. B. White's remarks upon it, 538—title it gives to Peter noticed, 615

British Church, independence of, stated, 527, 659

British Museum, the collection of Taxæ in that repository, noticed, 364—their history, 364

Brown, Bishop, his prophetic declaration respecting the Jesuits, 485

Browne, J., P. P., blasphemous assertion concerning the word of God, 21

Brownlee, W. C., D. D., on the absurd and puerile miracles of the Papacy, 541

Brunswick, Duke of, blasphemy of Popish Priests with regard to his apostasy to Romanism, 16

Bruti, the, noticed, 274

Bull, Bishop, on Christ the Rock, 56

Bullarium Magnum, of Luxembourg, described, 5

Bullenger, considered purgatory unknown in the primitive church, 274

Bulls, Papal, meaning of the term, 355—of high authority, 1—their general character, 5—no complete collection of, 5—some Bulls have been suppressed, 5—against Bible Societies, 19—against the Solicitants, 212—of indulgence by Leo X., 309—Unigenitus lays the foundation of indulgences, 323—Bull of Indiction for the jubilee of 1825, 355—granted to Henry VIII. to marry his brother's widow, 439—their imperious character, 622—Bulls forged to advance the Papacy, noticed, 664—of Pius II., on the subject of appeals, 687. See Cœna Domini.

Burgess, Thomas, D. D., his tracts on Popery referred to, 56

Burnet, Gilbert, D. D., on the absurdity of indulgences, 324—the licentious character of the Clergy, 733—the dissolute habit of religious houses, 748, et seq.

Burning light, a ceremony used after baptism, 126—Baronius and Dr. Rock quoted, 126

Burns, Justice, on ecclesiastical law, the word "penance," 366

Butler, Alban, D. D., his "Lives of the Saints" abound with monstrous absurdities, 27

———, Charles, Esq., on the immutability of the Papacy, 1—on the character of Pius IV.'s Creed, 2—his translation of that Creed, 2—inconsistency of his statement respecting the immutability of the Church, 120—on masses for the dead, 295—his remarks with regard to the Taxæ Cancellariæ, 367—on the miracles of the Roman Church, 523—on the doctrine of the supremacy, as held by the Transalpine and Cisalpine Divines, 597—declares that the Cisalpine give no temporal power to the Pope, 602—the question, what authority has Mr. Butler to contradict Councils, Popes, and Divines, 604—opinions of the Cisalpines regarding the supremacy, 604—declares the decree of the Council of Florence to be the true doctrine of the Church of Rome on the supremacy, 607

———, Thomas, D. D., on the connexion between praying for the dead and purgatory, 274—charges Luther with encouraging adultery in his sermons, 331—the charge refuted, 332—his childish observations on the Roman Taxæ, 367

———, J., D. D., Catechism on Indulgences, 311—on the sacrament of extreme unction, 383—on the sacramental character of matrimony, 425

C

Cabasutius, Johan., on the doctrine of purgatory, 243—on the successor of Peter, 497

Cæsar, Rasponi, on the nature of indulgences, 324

Cajetan, Cardinal, opposed the fable of the immaculate conception, 42—on the authority of the Fathers, 86—on transubstantiation, unscriptural, 139—on eating the flesh of Christ, 147—admits auricular confession not scriptural, 204—says, that the law of God requires confession only at the point of death, 220—on the punishment of purgatory, 244—the rise of indulgences, 314—and their nature, 323, 333—Luther appears before him, description of the interview, 333, et seq.—his demeanour toward Luther, 333, et seq.—is baffled by the Reformer, 336—probable effect of the dispute upon himself, 337—on the doctrine of extreme unction, 392—objects to the Tridentine decision on the canon of Scripture, 458—on the novelty of indulgences, 511—speaks of indulgences as a novelty, 518—considered the Apostles co-ordinate in power, 623—on the superiority of a Pope to a Council, 696, et seq.—his arguments considered, 696—history of the Cardinal, 698—maintains the Pope's infallibility, 699—on the power of a Council to depose a Pope, 705

Calixtus II., employs indulgences to raise money, 322—his disputes concerning "investiture" referred to, 558—excommunicated Henry III., 663

Calmet, on the spirits in prison, 257

Campbell, George, D. D., remarks of, on the collier's faith, alluded to, 15—on the theological signification of the term "mystery," 428, et seq.

Campeggius, Cardinal, his defective morality, 232—speaks blasphemously of Christ to support the pretensions of the Papacy, 621

Candles, used in the service of the mass, and why, 176

Canon law, ascribes unlimited authority to the Pontiff, 599

Canon of Scripture, ascertained without the authority of the Church, 30—meaning of the term, 30—that held by the Jews, retained by the Reformed Church, 30—Du Pin quoted, 30—various contests respecting, in the Papal Church, 458—authority claimed by the Papacy respecting, considered, 545, et seq.

Canonical unity, in which sense possessed by Protestants, 477

Canonization, regulations concerning, decreed by the third Lateran Council, 558

———— of saints, rules concerning the, 755—recent example in Rome adduced, 756

Canons, conciliar, have been unblushingly corrupted, 519

Canting the corpse, an Irish custom, described, 301

Canus, Mel., Bishop, considered tradition superior to the written word, 42—on the authority of the Fathers, 87—on the doctrine of attrition, 218—considered wicked men members of the Church, 449

—viewed the doctrine of the immaculate conception as a novelty, 516—on the false miracles of the Papacy, 542—rules by which certain Councils are to be distinguished, 581—opposed the doctrine of conciliar infallibility, 587—refers to the Constitution of Boniface VIII. with regard to supremacy, 601—the infallibility of the Pope, 701

Canutus, a fanatical self-flagellant, 236

Capernaum, Christ's discourse at, referred to, 139—amply considered, 148, et seq.

Captives, compulsory baptism of, noticed, 120

Cardinals, many of them notorious in crime, 481—of Paul III., acknowledge great defection in the Church, 506

Carlow, Bible Society discussion, quoted, 62

Carmelites, bill from the, for masses, 303

Carthage, Conc. I., Bishops of, call themselves Peter's successors, 618—repudiates the term "Bishop of Bishops," 620

———, Conc. IV., on the ordination of an Acolyte, 398

———, Conc. V., enjoined clerical celibacy, 743

———, Conc. VI., resists the assumed primacy of the Pope, 507

Casnedi, the Jesuit, on blasphemy, 485

Cassander, opposed the dogma of half-communion, 185—the number of the sacraments, 511

Catalini, quoted on the Papal oath of allegiance, 3

Catechism, American, on transubstantiation, quoted, 132

——— of Trent, authoritative character of the, 1—published by order of the Tridentine Council, 4—description of Mr. Donovan's translation of it, 5—Scripture defined, 8—on the infallibility of the Church, 53—on the consistency of a flagitious life, with infallibility in the faith, 72—definition of a sacrament, 93—assertion, that the Scripture warrants seven sacraments, unsupported, 95—illustration of the argument from natural analogy, 96—a wicked man may validly administer the sacraments, 97—on the ministration of wicked men, 98—on the doctrine of intention, 100—how grace is imparted in sacraments, 105—on the addition of chrism in the sacrament of baptism, 112—the administrator of baptism, 114—on the baptism of adults, 115—penitence, as necessary for adult baptism, 116—on the baptism of insane and dumb persons, 117—of infants, 117—on the necessity of baptism, 121—on the effects of baptism, 123—on the ceremonies of baptism, 124—the nature of confirmation, 128—its institution, 128—sophistry of the Catechism detected, 129—on the matter and form of confirmation, 129—on the subjects and effects of confirmation, 129—on the ceremonies of confirmation, 130—on the doctrine of transubstantiation, 134—absurd and contradictory view of the eucharist, 140—on the sacrifice of the mass, 174—on the practice of half-communion, 185—on priestly absolution, 194—on the Romish doctrine of confession, 200—auricular confession is strangely misrepresented, 210—on the doctrine of contrition, 215—and attrition, 216—on the time of repentance, 220—on the doctrine of satisfaction, 224—considers penance a satisfaction to God, 224—it teaches, that one man may satisfy for another, 231—on the doctrine of purgatory, 241—its nature, 243—its punishments, 244—their severity, 244—on those who are said to escape purgatory, 246—purgatory, an article of faith, 246—on the institution of extreme unction, 375—the anointing, 376—the form, 377—the subjects, 378—on the sacrament of orders, 393, 394—on the power of the priesthood, 395—on the tonsure, 397—the duties of the Porter, 397—the Acolyte, 398—Sub-Deacon, 399—Deacon, 399—the duties of Deacon, 400—on the order of priesthood, 400—on the effects of orders, 420—the sacramental character of matrimony, 425—recognises the keys as given to every Bishop and Priest, 613—on the term "Vicar of Christ," 618—the supremacy of the Pope, 667—the doctrine of celibacy, 715—the true merits of this Catechism, 715—on the worship of saints, 754

Catechetical instruction, anterior to baptism, noticed, 124

Catechumens, do they belong to the Church, considered, 447

Catholic, a note of the Church, 488—meaning of the term, in what sense it is applied to the Church, 488—when first employed, 488—Bishop Pearson's remarks on the term, 488—how the epithet was received in the early church, 489—the term, as used by the Papal Church, improper, 489, et seq.—Dean Freeman quoted, 490—no argument from this word can be adduced, to show that the Church of Rome is the true church of Christ, 491—impiety and absurdity of calling the Papal Church "catholic," 492—import of the term, 662

Catholic Directory, quoted on purgatorian and kindred societies, 301

Cecil, Rev. Richard, M. A., on the celibacy of the Clergy, 729

Celestine III., his lax sentiments with regard to marriage, 234—excommunicates Henry V., 663

Celibacy, in what sense marriage is superior to, 717—virginity considered as connected with celibacy, 717—when celibacy should be preferred to matrimony, 717—abstractedly and in itself, is not good, 717—to whom it should be confined, 717—the Scripture gives no countenance to the doctrine, 717—objections to the Popish vows of celibacy, 718—when they may be taken, 718—in what respect they are contrary to God's word, 718—are opposed to Christian liberty, 718—Scripture adduced to support celibacy, examined, 718, et seq.

Celibacy of the Clergy, doctrine stated, 715—authorities adduced, 715—high encomium on the marriage state, 716, et seq.—evils resulting, 718—arguments in favour of clerical celibacy stated and considered, 720, et seq.—Mumford quoted, 720, et seq.—the benefit of a wife to a Minister of the Gospel noticed, 724—on the cares of a married life interfering with clerical duty, 724—evils of monasticism, 724—arguments against the celibacy of the Clergy stated, 725—is contrary to divine law, 725—Patriarchs and Priests of the Old Testament were married, 725—so were the Apostles, 726—celibacy is the offspring of Heathenism, 727—and heretical, 727—Bishop Newton quoted, 727, et seq.—Rhemish Annotators adduced, 728—celibacy renders the Clergy unfeeling and unsocial, 729—Rev. R. Cecil quoted, 729—celibacy a powerful scheme for the aggrandisement of the Papacy, 729—has produced great licentiousness, 730—examples adduced, 731—modern licentiousness equally great, but more secret, 733—the Rev. Joseph B. White quoted, 733, et seq.—F. B. Morse, A. M., quoted, 734, et seq.—learned and pious Romanists opposed this prohibition of marriage, 737—various questions stated with regard to the marriage of the Clergy, 738—the history of clerical celibacy, 738, et seq.—a vow of celibacy not a condition of ordination during the first three centuries, 740—examples cited, 740—the assertion that all married persons, when ordained, promised to live separate from their wives, is destitute of proof, 741—early Councils show the process by which celibacy was established, 741, et seq.—second marriages repudiated, 742—diversity in the Church as it regards opinion and practice on this point, 743—Scripture opposed to clerical celibacy, 743—strenuous efforts to establish the custom, 743—the monastic orders, 744—tyranny of the Church with regard to them, 745, et seq.—licentiousness of Monks and Nuns, 748, et seq.

Centum Gravamina, as noticed by the Fathers of Constance and Basil, 325—character of these grievances.

325—closely connected with the sale of indulgences, 328
Ceremonies, their importance in the estimation of the Papacy, 108—testimony of theologians in their favour, 109—use and effects of them, 109—of baptism, 124—not to be dispensed with, 126—their antiscriptural character, 126—of confirmation, 130—are ridiculous and idolatrous, 131—at the sacrifice of the mass, 176—connected with the adoration of the host, 189—with the feast of Corpus Christi, 189, et seq.—associated with purgatory, 292, et seq.—interment of the dead, 293, et seq.—on All-Souls'-Day in Spain, 297—at the ordination of the various degrees of orders, 397, et seq., 421—instituted by the authority of the Church, 547
Chair of St. Peter, anecdote concerning, 636
Chalcedon, Council of, where situated, by whom convened, 556, 669—acts of the Council, 556, 669—Dr. Grier quoted on the proceedings, 556—rejected by Leo, but received by Gregory, 582—ascribed no supremacy to Rome, 639—was peremptorily called by Marcian, 670—who presided, 671—and ratified its proceedings, 673—solicited Leo I. to confirm them also, 674—on the subject of appeals, 688
Chaloner, Rich., D. D., his notes on the Romish Bible mentioned, 35—on the sacrifice of the mass, 172, 175—his Catholic Christian instructed quoted, 175—on the use of candles at mass, and why, 176—obscene character of his questions for confession, 202—on the doctrine of purgatory, 241—atoning character of purgatorial punishment, 244—for whom purgatory is prepared, 251—adduces no authority in support of extreme unction, 388—on the holiness of the Church of Rome, 480
Chalons, Council of, on the Romish doctrine of satisfaction, 238—on anointing the sick, 389
Champion, General, and St. Januarius, 539
Character, an effect of a sacrament considered, 106—definition and nature of it, as stated by the Papacy, 106—this Romish doctrine, how proved, by Scripture, tradition, and Councils, 107—which sacraments impress a character, 107, 108—casuistical questions proposed and solved by Romanists on this subject, 108—can character be effaced, 108—objections against this dogma stated, 108—said to be impressed in confirmation, 129
Charlemagne, confirmed his father Pepin's grant to the Pope, and added others, 666
Charles the Bald, his directions to Bertram, with regard to Paschasius, 169
"Chastity," remarks on the term, 716—Romanists assert that it may be distinguished from matrimony, 716—the purest chastity consistent with the married state, 716—that of the Romish priesthood not very sacred, 737
Chasuble, described, 176
Chazza, Bishop of, considered it impious to equalize the authority of Scripture and tradition, 43
Cheek, the, a blow upon, why given in confirmation, 130
Children, the offspring of Roman Catholic and Protestant parents, how commanded to be educated, 438, 439
Chillingworth, William, on Scripture and tradition, 52
Choice, ordination and confirmation of Bishops a prerogative claimed by the Popes, 679—what implied in this claim, 679—authority cited, 680—how Bishops were elected in the early church, 680, et seq.—the assertion that Popes have appointed Bishops noticed, 681—instances adduced and examined, 681—Emperors and Kings have interposed in this office, 682—and also in General Councils, 683—Bishops formerly confirmed the election of Prelates, 683
Chrism, Popish addition to the sacrament of baptism, 112—used after the rite, 125—the matter of confirmation, 129—how made, 129—Fabian quoted on the origin of, 129—applied to the forehead in confirmation, 130—unscriptural character of this part of the ceremony, 132
Christ, in what respect he is styled "the Rock," 56—his descent into hell, an ancient doctrine, 85—instituted the sacraments, 96
Christians, primitive, their rule of faith described, 14
Christianity, how to be propagated, 29
Chrysostom, on Scripture and tradition, 49—on Matt. xvi. 18, 54—mutilated by the Expurgatorial Index, 85—on the obligation of an oath, 86—repudiates purgatory, 87—on sacraments being administered by angels, 97—on receiving the eucharist, 164—testimony of, against transubstantiation, 166—opposed the doctrine of auricular confession, 205—on the fallacy of the doctrine of purgatory, 250—quoted on Matt. xii. 32, 252—his evidence against purgatory, 273—his Liturgy noticed, 277—thought the sufferings of the lost would be alleviated by the prayers for the dead, 279—on the identity between Bishops and Presbyters, 407—on the office of Exorcist, 416—on the successor of Peter, 497—opposed the dogma of the immaculate conception, 519—on the primacy of Peter, 609—the confession of Christ, 610—considered the Apostles equal in dignity, 616—speaks as highly of James as of Peter, 616—on the character of St. Paul, 616—his writings corrupted to support supremacy, 620—viewed the Apostles as co-ordinate in power, 623—appealed to the Pope, but not as Judge, 691—speaks strongly in favour of marriage, 717—on the evils of monasticism, 724—on the licentiousness of the celibates, 731
Church, how governed during the time of the apostolical Fathers, 409, 653—on the formation of the, 413—name and definition of, 442—its special signification, 442—Bellarmine quoted, 442—Richard Watson quoted, 443—scriptural character or marks of, 443—how ascertained, 443—apostolic doctrine, 443—apostolical ministry, 444—apostolical sacraments, 444—evil may be occasionally associated with good, 445—fearful consequences of defect of discipline, 444, 445—members of the Church described, 445, et seq.—Richard Watson, his description of the Church, 446, et seq.—its spirituality, 447—definition of, by Romanists, exceedingly faulty, 447—her three qualifications for membership noticed, 447—do the unbaptized and catechumens belong to the Church, considered, 447—who are schismatics, 448—and excommunicated, 448—the most wicked and abominable considered true members of the Church of Rome, 448—Liebermann quoted, 448—on open transgressors being considered members of the Church, 449—considered as visible and invisible, 449—Protestant view of the visible Church, 449—Romanist description, 449—scriptural view of it, 450—illustrated by the Rules of the Wesleyan societies, 450, et seq.—marks of the Church, 451—her unity considered, 451, et seq.—unity, abstractedly, is not a mark of the Church, 453—unity professed by the Church of Rome noticed, 453, et seq.—is unscriptural, 454—external, 456—internally divided by various sects and divisions, 457—her unity defective in the head of the Papacy, 459, et seq.—absolute and entire unity not essential to salvation, 476—the term "Catholic" considered as a note of the Church, 488, et seq.—apostolicity, in what sense a note of the Church, 493, et seq.—antiquity, 503, et seq.—duration, 507—amplitude considered, 512, et seq.—agreement with the ancient church, 515, et seq.—efficacy of doctrine, 519, et seq.—miracles, 522, et seq.—other notes alluded to, 543—on the authority of the Church, 543, et seq.—original government of, 653—each Church was independent of others, 653—then united, and formed ecclesiastical confederacies, 654—the division was governed by that of the state, 654—division of the Church described, 654—character of the metropolitical administration, 655, et seq.—provincial churches independent of such jurisdiction, 659

Church-door, presentation of candidate for baptism at, 124
Cicero, quoted, on the absurdity of an idolater eating his own god, 138
Circumcision, answers to baptism in the covenant, 138
Cisalpine Divines, opinions on the infallibility of the Pope, 64—defined, 597—views of, concerning the supremacy of the Pope, 598—give no temporal jurisdiction to the Pontiff, 602—opinion respecting his supreme power, 604
Clagett, Dr., on the unscriptural character of extreme unction, 387, et seq.
Clarendon, Council of, prohibited the Clergy leaving the kingdom without permission, 670
Clark, Rev. J. A., anecdote of, illustrative of the scarcity of the Bible in Rome, 23
Clarke, Adam, LL.D., on the persecuting character of Mary's reign, 173—on the dogma of communion in one kind, 185—on the term "repentance," 225—on the imperfection of human merit, 226—no atonement in afflictions, 227—on penal sufferings, 260
Claude, John, quoted on the rule of faith, 17—on the contradictory character of oral tradition, 41
——— D'Espence, on the editions of the Taxæ, 365—the Centum Gravamina, 366—the wickedness of the Roman Chancery, 366—on the office of Ostarius, 416—of Sub-Deacon, 416—on the false miracles of the Papacy, 542
Clement of Alexandria, testimony of, concerning tradition, 47—his writings shamefully corrupted by Berington and Kirk, in the Faith of Catholics, 80—on the value of the sacred writings, 80—his description of heretics, 82—why they abandon Scripture, 83—heretical opinion of, 85—folly of worshipping objects that may be eaten, 145—on the doctrine of spiritual manducation, 150—his testimony against the doctrine of transubstantiation, 165—knew nothing of extreme unction, 388—not free from error, 476—gave no high title to Peter, 616—condemned those who termed matrimony fornication, 716—speaks strongly in favour of marriage, 717 ——— of Rome, on the doctrine of satisfaction, 237—on the folly of praying for the dead, 280—knew nothing of extreme unction, 388—did he or Linus succeed Peter, 497—authorities quoted, 497—speaks as highly of St. James as St. Peter, 616—employs the term summus Sacerdos, 620—speaks of Bishops, as successors of the Apostles, 627—on the election of the Clergy, 680
Clement III., employs indulgences to raise money, 322
——— IV., on the authority of the Pope over Bishops, &c., 680
——— V., convenes the Synod of Vienne, 569—proceedings of that Synod, 569
——— VI., his Bull of indulgence noticed, 309—on indulgences as applicable to the dead, 351—on the power of dispensing them, 362—lays the foundation of indulgences, 323—his tyranny, 499
——— VIII., his edition of the Vulgate differs from that of Sixtus V., 34—his decree for the purgation of authors, noticed, 89—restrained the reading of the Scriptures, 233—his grant of indulgences, 341
——— XI., issues the Bull Unigenitus, 473—was termed a political weathercock, 473
Clementines, defined, 569
Clergy, absolute jurisdiction over, claimed as a prerogative of the Pope, 678—authorities cited, 678—antiscriptural character of this assumption, 679—was unknown in the early church, 679
——— of Rome, how divided, 392
Cochlæus, John, the conciliar historian, quoted, 171—defends the base conduct of Sigismund, with regard to John Huss, 572
Cœna Domini Bulla, does not appear in every Papal collection of Bulls, 5
Cœnobites, the term defined, 744
Colen, Council of, on the unscriptural variety of orders in Rome, 416
Collet, Petrus, on the angelic administration of a sacrament, 97—definition of character, 106, 107—on the baptism of monsters, 121
Collier, Jeremy, on the proceedings of the fourth Council of Lateran, 461, et seq.
Collier's faith, described, 15, 90
Collyridians, the first who presented divine honours to the Virgin 761
Comber, Thomas, D.D., on the immediate successor of St. Peter, 497—on the corruption of apostolical canons and synodical decrees, 584, et seq.
Commission of Henry VIII., to visit religious houses, noticed, 748 Communion in one kind, ingeniously connected with transubstantiation, 182—introduced as an article of faith by Innocent III., 185—variations in the Papacy with regard to it, 511. See Half-Communion.
Compulsory baptism, considered, 115, 118—sentiments of Dens concerning, 118—compulsion intimately associated with the Romish institution, 120
Conception, immaculate, a mere fable, the doctrine of, 86
Conciliariter, the term explained, 581
Confession, not considered necessary to adult baptism, 116—doctrine of, as held by Protestants, 198—by the Papacy, 199—testimony of the Councils of Lateran and Trent, 199—Catechism of Trent, quoted, 200—instructions and devotions for, 200—revolting character of auricular confession, 202—method of confession, 203—imperfect and valid confession, what, 208—difficulties and scruples connected with, stated, 208—secrecy of the confessional, 208—its immoral tendency, both to the Confessor and the confessed, 210—the confiteor described, 211—solicitation, the evils of, 211
——— of adversaries, a mark of the Church, noticed, 543
Confessions of faith, on the Minister of ordination, 419
Confirmation, nature of the grace that is conferred in, 104—why said to impress a character, 107—doctrine of, stated, 128—nature and institution of, 128—how proved by the Romanists to be a sacrament, 128—matter and form of, 129—the administrator, 129—the subjects, 129—the effects of, 129—how far it is considered necessary to salvation, 129—its obligatory character, 130—the ceremonies of, 130—why administered at Pentecost, 130—sacramental character of, confuted, 130—Bellarmine on this ceremony proved to be erroneous, 131—Richard Watson denies its sacramental character, 433 ———, of Bishops. See Choice, &c., of Bishops.
———, of Councils, claimed as a prerogative of the Pope, 672—Emperors exercised that power, 673—the assertion that Synods solicited Pontiffs to confirm their acts, considered, 674—importance attached to the confirmation of the Bishop of Rome, 674—the value attached to the effectual ratification of Councils, 674—the statement, that Councils have been repudiated for want of Papal confirmation, examined, 674—the objection, that Popes have actually rendered void conciliar decrees, stated and considered, 675
Confiteor, the, described, 203, 211, 757
Congregation of the Index, office of this Committee at Rome, 89
Conrad, apparition of a soul in purgatory, 282
Conscience, an examination of, 200—principles on which Papists act in deciding cases of, 232
Consecrated ground, importance attached to, 294
Consecration, of the eucharist, elements unchanged, 138—of the episcopate, 402
Consent of the Fathers, what implied in the phrase, 87

Consequences of the dogma of infallibility, stated, 71
Constance, Council of, demoralized character of the, 68—established the dogma of half-communion, 182, 592—attempts to restore peace to the Church, 461—decrees respecting the authority of the Church, 543—by whom convened, 570—proceedings of, 570—base and treacherous with regard to John Huss, 572—which are defended by several of the Papacy, 572—Dr. Grier quoted, 571, et seq.—awful profligacy of those who attended this Council, 591—decided contrary to the word of God, 592—rejected the absolute supremacy of the Pope, 605—who presided at this Council, 672—considered the Council superior to the Pontiff, 696
Constantine, the Emperor, nature of the prayer offered for him after death, 279—his supposed miraculous cure, 339—his division of the Roman empire, 654—peremptorily summoned the Synod of Tyre, 670—confirmed the proceedings of the Council of Nice, 673—recommended the Synod to seek the approval of the Prelates, 674—instructed Liberius to submit to the judgment of his colleagues, 676—said to have granted the Pope temporal authority, 713
Constantinople, see of, her disputes respecting precedency with Rome, 69—proof of the want of agreement in the Papacy, 516—privileges granted to, by the Council of Chalcedon, 556, 639
————, Liturgy of, recognised praying for the dead, 277
————, Council of, I., Second General Synod, 555—three several assemblies in that city, noticed, 555—distinctive features of each, 555—adverts to the division of diocesses, 657—convened by Theodosius, 669—Patriarchs presided, 671—it was ratified by Theodorus, 673—the Synod solicited Damasus also to confirm these acts, 674—its regulations concerning celibacy, 742 ————, Council of, II., Fifth General, 556—by whom convened, 556, 669—proceedings of, 557—Du Pin quoted, 557—ascribed no supremacy to Rome, 639—Patriarch of Constantinople presided, 672—its acts were confirmed by Leo II., 674—on the decision of controversy, 703
————, Council of, III., opposed the doctrine of transubstantiation, 168—the Sixth General, 557—by whom convened, 557 proceedings of, 557—the Emperor presided by his deputies, 672—was solicited by the Synod to confirm its acts, 673
————, Council of, IV., decrees the removal of images, and abolition of image-worship, 68, 557—its authority not recognised by the Papacy, 557—contradicts the second Council of Nice, 589—was called by Constantine Pogonatus, 669
Constantinople, Council of, V., the Eighth General Council, 557—when and by whom convened, 557—confirmed all the idolatrous enactments of Nice, 558—rejected by the Oriental Churches, 670
Constantinus Turritanus, apparition of, 281
Contract, marriage said by Romanists to be threefold, 437
Contradiction, instances of, among the Popes, 67—and Councils, 68—proof of want of infallibility, 70
Contrition, defined by the Council of Trent, 214—canon respecting, 215—explained by the Catechism of Trent, 215—is destitute of the mark of true repentance, 215—contradicts the Scripture, 215—productive of immorality, 215—Dr. Goodman's illustration of this Popish doctrine, 216, et seq.
Controversies, absurdity of the notion of a living infallible judge of, 73
Controversy, the Popish, evils of misrepresentation, 1
Conversion and transubstantiation, distinct, 164
Converts, how caught by Romish Missionaries, 127
Convocation of Councils, claimed by Pontiffs, 668—no ecclesiastical canons gave to them the power, 669—the first Synods, convened by Emperors, 669—instances adduced, 669—the assertion that Emperors convened not authoritatively but persuasively, considered, 670—Popes applied to Emperors to convene, 670
Corban, explained, 318
Corbie, Monks of, their mission to the Vandals—proceedings adopted, 521
Cork, indulgence on behalf of the chapel there, 344
Cornelius, addresses Rufus as "Your Holiness," 620
Corpus Christi, the feast of, described, 189—history of this festival, 190—ceremonies at Seville connected with it, 191—relics exhibited on that day, 191—authority of the Council of Trent for such procession, 192—festival, confirmed by the Council of Vienne, 569 Corruptions of Councils, Archbishop Ussher's remarks upon, 77—several instances adduced, 584, et seq.—Drs. James and Comber quoted, 584 ———— of Fathers, often perpetrated by the Papists, 585—effected occasionally by heretics, 76—by the insertion, alteration, and erroneous interpretation of passages, 79—a system largely exposed by the Rev. R. T. Pope, 79, et seq.—flagrant examples given, 80, et seq.—reason assigned for such flagrant conduct, 276, 518—annotations of Erasmus, corrupted by the Spanish Inquisitors, 610—an important passage of Cyprian mutilated, 627
Councils, of permanent authority, 1—described, and their obligatory character, 5—questions respecting their infallibility, 5—infallibility of Councils, by whom held, 64—Councils which have rejected the infallibility of the Pope, 65—Council and Pope, united, said to be infallible, this notion examined, 65, et seq.—this opinion held by the French Church, 68—what constitutes a General Council, 68—the number of them, 68—frequently decide contrary to each other, 68—fearful description of these assemblies, 68—heretical proceedings of several, 68, et seq.—the notion that a Council is infallible, if its decrees be approved by the Pope, considered, 69—contradiction of, a proof of destitution of infallibility, 69, et seq.—Archbishop Ussher, on the corruption of, 76—do not prove from Scripture the doctrine of seven sacraments, 95—contend fearfully with each other, 461—Council defined, 549—different kinds of, 549—history of these ecclesiastical assemblies, 549, et seq.—term Œcumenical, General, or Universal, explained, 551—who are members of General Councils, 551—authorities quoted, 551, et seq.—of whom the first was composed, 551—who may convene them, 552, et seq.—the Scripture mode of convention, 553—who may preside in Councils, 553—authorities adduced, 553—the presidency of the Pope not necessary to the existence of a Council, 554—number of General Councils, 554, et seq.—distinction between the Greek and Latin Synods, 558—enumeration of Councils, &c., which recognise the persecuting clauses of the Fourth Council of Lateran, 563, et seq.—period of holding General Councils regulated by the Synod of Constance, 570—difficulty connected with the enumeration of General Synods, 574, et seq.—Richard Baxter quoted, 575—diversity of opinion on General Councils, 580—infallibility of, 580—arguments against this, 581, et seq.—is the Pope above a Council, considered, 582—Councils condemned for error, mentioned, 584—have contradicted each other, 588—have erred and have been deceived, 591—have decided contrary to the word of God, 592—are not of divine, but human origin, 593—do not prevent controversy, 594—nor restore peace, 594—many ascribe no supremacy to the Bishop of Rome, 639—Synods composed solely of the friends of the Pope, to advance his claims, meet, 664—which Councils have been rejected as General, 670—decrees passed in opposition to the will of the Pontiffs, 673—Synods governed the Churches, 677—on the power of a Council to depose a Pope, 705. See General Councils.

Covaruvius, lax sentiments of, with regard to marriage, 233

Cramp, Rev. J. C., on the principle of indulgences, 321—on the deficiency of preaching abilities in Popish prelacy, 403, et seq.

Creed of Constantinople, the marks of the Church, 451 ——— of Pius IV., an authority of Rome, 1—history and adoption of, 2—its obligatory character stated by Romanists, 2—translation of, by Mr. Butler, 2—its true character, 3—fearfully debases the judgment of man, 25—on the testimony of the Fathers, 75—on the sacraments, 91—statement of the doctrine of purgatory, 241—on indulgences, 308—on the authority of the Church, 543—on the authority of Councils, 581—the worship of saints, 753

Cresswell, the Jesuit, on High Treason, 487

Croly, George, D.D., on the arrogance of the Papacy, with regard to marriage, 434

———, Priest, on extreme unction, an instrument of extortion, 392

Crotty, Dr., President of Maynooth, on the persecuting clause of the fourth Lateran Council, 560—his statement before the Committee of Education, adduced, 564

Crucifixion of females, in the Church of Rome, witnessed by Baron De Grimm, 27

Cusanus, Card., held some Protestant notions of the eucharist, 147—the novelty of transubstantiation, 517—the infallibility of General Councils, 580—assigns no peculiar prerogative to Peter, not possessed by other Apostles, 623

Cyprian, on Scripture and tradition, 48—on Matt. xvi. 18, 54—heretical opinion of, 85—on the institution of the sacraments, 97—on the doctrine of spiritual manducation, 150—on receiving the eucharist, 164—testimony of, against the doctrine of transubstantiation, 166—and of purgatory, 269—on the folly of praying for the dead, 280—makes no mention of extreme unction, 388—states that Bishops and Presbyters governed the church, 409—opposed the error of Stephen I. on the subject of baptism, 465—by no means free from error, 476—on the true and essential succession, 500—on learning from Christ, 505—on the primacy of Peter, 609—gave no high title to Peter, 616—considered the Apostles equal in dignity, 616—calls himself Peter's successor, 618—on the title, "Vicar of Christ," 618—is called "Pope," 619—on the office of Pastor, 627—on the foul corruptions which have injured this passage of Cyprian, 627—his observation, said to be favourable to Romish supremacy, explained, 639—on the election of the Bishop of Rome, 641—is silent on supremacy, 643—thought the Church could not be governed by one individual, 646—on the independence of Bishops, 649—deemed it tyrannical for one Pastor to prescribe to another, 676—did not consider the Pope the fountain of jurisdiction, 678—was ignorant of the jurisdiction of the Pope over the Clergy, as now exercised, 679—on the mode of appointing Bishops, 680—he confirmed the ordination of Cornelius, 683—on the case of Marcian, Bishop of Arles, 685—on the restoration of Basilides, 687—opposed appealing to Rome, 689—on the licentiousness of the celibates, 731, 743

Cyril, of Alexandria, on Scripture and tradition, 52—his writings mutilated by the Expurgatorial Index, 85—on the nature of the eucharist, 165—on praying for the dead, 265—Liturgy ascribed to him, 277—presided at the Council of Ephesus, 555, 671—a violent enemy of Nestorius, 555—his character, 555

——, of Jerusalem, on Scripture and tradition, 49—on Christian baptism, 127—on the doctrine of spiritual manducation, 151—transubstantiation not the mystery of the early church, 162—his testimony against that doctrine, 166, 167—on the change wrought on the elements by consecration, 167—on prayer for the dead, 276—on the term "Catholic," applied to the Church, 488, 489—considered the Apostles equal in dignity, 616—unites Peter and Paul as "presidents," 616—views the Apostles as co-ordinate in power, 623—supposed Peter to have been at Rome, 631—is silent on the supremacy, 643—introduced the practice of appeals, 691

Cyrus, Patriarch of Alexandria, terms Sergius "Universal Patriarch," 619

D

Dalmatic, a priestly vestment, described, 399

Damasus, on the unscriptural character of the orders of Rome, 415—he requested the Emperor to call a Synod, 670—was solicited to confirm the second General Council, 674—the first who bestowed the title, "Vicar of the Pope," 678—opposed appealing to Rome, 689

Damianus, his sister doomed to purgatory, and why, 282—the apparition of Severinus, 282

D'Aubignè, J. H. Merle, on the rise and progress of indulgences, 318, et seq.—the flagellants, 320—graphic description of the sale of indulgences in Germany, 326, et seq.

Deacon, one of the greater orders, 399—his duties, and ceremonies of ordination, 399—various opinions respecting the matter of the sacrament, 399, 400—authorities quoted, 399, 490—his office described, 400—form of degradation, 422—how elected in the primitive church, 680

Dead, the Fathers interceded for, 265—not connected with the doctrine of purgatory, 265—commemorative services for, 275—notions entertained by the Fathers with respect to, 275—on the application of indulgences to them, 349. See Praying for the dead.

Death-bed conversions to Popery, an empty boast, 16—case of the Duke of Brunswick, and blasphemy of the Priests with regard to him, 16

Decalogue, mutilated by the Papists, 89—and utterly broken, 481

Decentius, ignorant of extreme unction, 388

Decision of controversy, claimed as the prerogative of the Pope, 694—unknown to the primitive church as such, 694—many opposed the opinions of the Pontiff, 694—disputes generally settled by the Synods, 694—many Popes were unfit to decide, 694

Declaration of Vicars Apostolic, professes to give no civil jurisdiction to the Pontiff, 602

Decrees, of Trent, vaguely expressed, 1

Decretal epistles, oath of Papal allegiance, 3—greatly promoted the Papal supremacy, 664—many of them gross forgeries, 664—ample examinations of them, referred to, 664—spurious character of these documents recognised by Du Pin, 519, 677

Degradation, ceremony of, 417—of Dr. Taylor, Archbishop Cranmer, and Bishop Ridley, 417—various forms of, 421

Delahogue, Lud. Ægid., on the punishment of purgatory, 244—on the benefit of indulgences, 309, 310

Dens, Peter, definition of a sacrament, 93—on the Scripture authority for seven sacraments, 95—on angelic administration of sacraments, 97—on the ministration of wicked men, 98, 99—on the doctrine of intention, 100—grace, an effect of sacraments, 104—manner in which sacraments impart grace, 104, et seq.—on sacramental ceremonies, 109—on the importance of the sacrament of baptism, 111—directions concerning the matter of baptism, 113—and also to midwives, in case of doubtful parturition, 113—on occisive ablution, 114—on valid adult baptism, 115—confession not necessary for adult baptism, 116—his revolting instructions concerning the baptism of abortives, 118—on the subjection of the baptized to the Papacy, 118, 119—the baptism of monsters, 121—on the necessity of baptism, 122—fictitious baptism, 124—on effects of confirmation, 129—transubstantiation, 140—on the consecration of the wine, 146—character of his "Theologia," 147—on the validity of absolution by a wicked Priest, 194—on the form of absolution, 195—his obscenity, when treating on confession, 202—on the distinction between venial and mortal sin, 205—on the sacramental seal, and duty of Confessors, 209—on the difference between contrition and attrition, 216—lax views of, on the time of repentance, 220—on works of satisfaction, 235—on the kind and degrees of penance, 235—his penance for voluntary drunkenness, 237—on the want of discipline in the Church, 238—on the nature of purgatory, 241—on its locality, 243, 284—its punishments, 243, 284—on benefiting souls in purgatory, 285—on the value of masses for the dead, 294—why the rich fare better than the poor, 294—on the nature of indulgences, 308—on the conditions of receiving them, 308—their authority, 317—on canonical inflictions, 318—on the difference between indulgences for the dead and living, 349—explanation of the term, "jubilee," 354—the institution of extreme unction, 374—his singular account of its establishment, 375—on the anointing, 376—the form of this sacrament, 376—the subjects, 377—and the effects of it, 380—on the sepulture of the dead, 381—on the sacrament of orders, 393—the number of orders, 396—the Exorcist, 398—on the office of Deacon and Sub-Deacon, 399—the duties of Deacon, 400—the office of Priest, 400—his functions, 400—the divine right of Bishops, 402—the matter and form of orders, 418—the effects of orders, 420—the indelible character of ordination, 421—the institution of matrimony, 434—marriages of Roman Catholics solemnized by Protestants, 438—marriages with heretics, considered, 438—his unblushing depravity on the subject of marriage with heretics, 439—are the unbaptized and catechumens in the Church, 447—open transgressors members of the Church, 449—his view of the visible church of Christ, 450—recognises and adopts the Bull Unigenitus, 474—on the assumed sanctity of the Church of Rome, 480—the apostolicity, 493—on the infallibility of the Church, 549—on the membership of a General Council, 551—on the power to convene a Council, 553—its President, 553—the first Nicene Council, 554—that of Ephesus, 555—of Chalcedon, 556—of Nice II., 557—of Lateran I., 558—Lateran II., 558—Lateran III., 558—Lateran IV., 558—recognises the persecuting clauses of this Council, 567—Council at Lyons, 568—Lyons II., 569—Vienna, 569—of Constance, 570—of Florence, 574—of Trent, 574—the infallibility of General Councils, 580—on the unanimity of Bishops in Council, 585—opposed conciliar infallibility, 587—his reply to Augustine on the authority of Councils, 590—ascribed absolute power to the Pope, 598—on the confession of Christ, 610—on the gift of the keys, 612—the supremacy of the Pope, 667—the jurisdiction of the Pope over the Clergy, 678—the superiority of Popes to Councils, 695—can the Pope, as a private person, become a heretic, 706—on the worship of the saints, 766

Deposition, censure, or suspension of Bishops, a prerogative claimed by the Pope, 683—authority adduced, 684—was formerly effected by Synods, 684—examples cited, 684—Bishops also exercised this discipline upon their fellows, 684—instances mentioned, 684—people exhorted to forsake their Prelates in case of heresy, 685—examples, 685—in the early church, Pontiffs deposed with the consent of the Synod, 685—if the power were granted to the Pope, others would claim it, 685—instances referred to, 685—examples quoted, in support of this prerogative, not satisfactory, 685

Devotional books of Rome, described, 6—devotions for confession, 200—examination of conscience, 201—"The Path to Paradise," immoral, 211

Difficulties attending the doctrine of infallibility, stated, 71

Digamy, laws with regard to, 739—examples adduced, 739

Diocesan Synod, defined, 550

Diocess, the original formation of a, 413, 657—Council of Nice, quoted, 413, 657

Dionysius, of Corinth, makes no mention of extreme unction, 388—attributes the founding of the church at Rome to Peter and Paul, 636—opposed the law of celibacy, 741

——, the saint, absurd miracle concerning, 541

Dioscorus, censured, deposed, and banished, 556

Dirge, a, described, 293

Discipline, exercise of, a mark of a true church, 445

Disloyalty, not produced by Scripture reading, 29

Dispensations, on account of marriage, 439—granted by the Pontiff to Henry VIII., 439

Disposition, in which sacraments are to be received, as held by Papists, 103

Dissensions in the Church advanced the Papacy, 661

Divinity of Christ, the doctrine of the, received not on the authority of tradition, but of Scripture, 44

Divisions, in Protestantism not attributable to Scripture reading, 28—modes of healing, adopted by the Protestant and Papal Church, 29—are rife in the Church of Rome, 29

Divorce, lax views held by the Jews on this subject, 435, et seq.—disgraceful flippancy of Romish Divines when writing upon it, 440—the first Roman divorce adverted to, 440—their subsequent multiplication, 440—fearful effects of, on states and kingdoms, 440—Dr. Croly quoted, 440—Alison, his "History of Europe" referred to, 441

Doblado, "Letters from Spain," on the feast of Corpus Christi, 189, et seq.—on the ceremonies of All Souls, 298

Doctors of the Church, to whom the phrase is applicable, 359

Dodwell, Henry, admits the miracle connected with the cruelty of Huneric, 527

Dominic, a notorious fanatic, 236

Dominicans, constantly contend with the Franciscans, 457—embrace the doctrines of Augustine or Calvin, 468

Donovan, J., of Maynooth, on the definition of a sacrament, 93—character of his translation of the Tridentine Catechism, 715

Dorotheus, his writings mutilated by the Expurgatorial Index, 86

Douay Bible, the Romish priesthood refuse freely to circulate it, 25—its history, 34—corrupts the words used at the institution of the eucharist, 137

——— Catechism, definition of an act of faith, 15—on the sacrifice of the mass, 173—the sophistical character of its definitions, 174—on the doctrine of purgatory, 242—and the supremacy which is claimed by the Papacy, 598

———, University of, on the temporal power of the Pope, 603

Douglas, Bishop, criteria of a true miracle, 525—on the miracles of Xavier, 528—the story of Madame de la Fosse, 529

Doyle, John, D.D., on the creed of Pius IV., 2—retorts the charge of pecuniary penance on the English Church, 366—attempts to show, that the persecuting clauses of the Fourth Lateran Council are obsolete, 559—his disgraceful sophistry, 560—contradicts Dr. Crotty, the President of Maynooth College, 560—adduces Collier, the historian, to no purpose, 560—his unfounded assertions triumphantly refuted by the Rev. John Evans, M.A., 561, et seq.—his views of the duty which a vassal owes to his Lord, exhibited, 560—denies that "any special reference" was made in the Council of Trent to the Lateran Synod, 561—this assertion exposed, 562, et seq.—his statement before a Committee of the House of Lords, 564—its barefaced duplicity, 565

Drunkenness, penance for, as recommended by Dens, 237
Dulia, defined, 756
Dumb persons, baptism of, considered, 117—authorities adduced, 117
Du Moulin, quoted, on spiritual manducation, 148
Duns Scotus, his derivation, 105—disputes with the Thomists, 105—on the manner in which sacraments impart grace, 106—on transubstantiation, unscriptural, and novel, 139, 517—on the doctrine of the real presence, 169—on that of repentance, 220—invocation of saints, not an article of faith in his day, 511
Dunstan, his efforts to establish clerical celibacy in Engand, 743
Du Pin, Lewis, quoted on the importance of Scripture reading, 27—on the canon of Scripture, 30—on the introduction of the Apocrypha into the canon of Scripture, 31—his account of Anthony Marinarius, 42—on the infallibility of the Church, 53—quoted on the opinion of the Jesuits with regard to infallibility, 62—on the rejection of pontifical infallibility by the French Church, 64, et seq.—on the heresies of the Pope, 67—on the fourth Lateran Council, 171—on the use of the whip as penance, 235—on the penances of the Romish Church, 238—on the fearful contests of the Papacy, 459—on the errors of the early Fathers, 476—on the first Nicæan Council, 554—the Synod of Sardica, 555—the Council of Ephesus, 555—the proceedings of the fourth Council of Lateran, 562—his remarks on the Council of Vienne, 569—on the effect of general Councils, 594—on the supremacy of the Pontiff, 605—the line of succession, 638—on the Nicene canons concerning the Episcopate, 657—the president of the Council of Nice, 671—on the proceedings of the Council of Chalcedon, 673—spurious character of the Decretal Epistles, 677—on the canons of Sardica, concerning appeals to the Pope, 689—the superiority of a Council to a Pope, 696, 698—on the power of a Council to depose a Pope, 705—considers as spurious the grant of Constantine, 714—the protest of Paphnutius, 742—the imposition of celibacy, 743
Durandus, Bishop of Mende, taught the doctrine of spiritual manducation, in John vi., 148
———, a Portiano, definition of character, an effect of sacraments, 106—transubstantiation unscriptural, 139, 517—did not consider fornication a deadly sin, 232—denied the sacramental character of matrimony, 427
Duration, a mark of the Church, 507—an imperfect trait, 507—Bellarmine quoted, 507—the question, "Where was your religion before Luther?" answered, 508—how true religion was preserved during the Papacy, 508—the Church of Rome tested by this mark, 509—with regard to place, persons, worship, and doctrine, 509, 510
Dwight, Timothy, S.T.D., on the apostolical succession, 497

E

Easter, when celebrated, fixed by the Nicene Council, 554—the period of repentance prescribed by the Papacy, 220
Eating God, folly of worshipping objects that may be eaten, 145—the Papist no sooner makes his God, than he eats him, 188—Cicero quoted on the absurdity of such a practice, 188
Eating of blood, prohibited not on the authority of tradition, but of Scripture, 44
Eccius, on the authority of the Church, 544
Ecclesiastical unity, how possessed by the Protestants, 477
Ecgbert, Archbishop of York, his Penitentiale, containing instructions for the redemption of penance, quoted, 363
Edgar, King, attempts to dispossess the married Clergy, 743
———, Samuel, on the difference between extreme unction and the anointings of Scripture, 385
Edinburgh Catechism, on indulgences, 312
Education of children, the offspring of Roman Catholic and Protestant parents, instructions concerning, 438, 439
Edward I., has masses said for his Queen, 293
——— VI., assertion that his Liturgy contains prayer for the dead, investigated, 287 Effects of baptism, as taught by the Church of Rome, 123—scriptural objections thereto, 124 ——— of sacraments, as held by Papists, considered, 103, et seq.—the general effect termed "grace," 103—antiscriptural character of the doctrine, 104—how grace is conferred on those, who receive the sacraments by desire, 103—character, an effect of a sacrament considered, 106—of baptism, 123—of confirmation, 129
Efficacy of doctrine, a mark of the Church, 519—definition of the phrase, 519—Romanist application of this test, 519, 520—Bellarmine's exposition of the note, refuted by Dr. Linford, 520
Egane, Anthony, his "Book of Rates," &c., noticed, and its authenticity established, 368—his exposé of the impositions of Rome, 368—his assertions corroborated by Father O'Leary, 368—John Milner and Anthony Wood attack his personal character, 368—cause of the hatred of the latter, 368
Egypt, the Church of, the Liturgy of, recognised prayer for the dead, 277
Egyptians, durst not eat that which they once worshipped, 188
Elder of the Church, described, 411
Elders, election of, in the early Church, 680
Eleanor, Queen, masses for, 293
Election of officers, in the early Church, how performed, 680—examples cited, 680
Elfric, the grammarian, on the doctrine of spiritual manducation, 154—opposed the dogma of transubstantiation, 170
Elias of Edessa, his writings condemned by the fifth General Council, 557
Elizabeth, Queen, anathematized by Pius V., 342—state of religion during her reign, 342—attempts to effect her dethronement, 343—Sir Thomas Stukeley and indulgences from Rome, 342—machination of the Jesuits against her life, 343, 487
Elpenor, the ghost of, mentioned, 261
Elsley, J., M.A., quoted on Matt. xvi. 18, 54
Elvira, Council of, repudiated the worship of images, 590—the first Synod, that enacted laws against marriage, 741
Emperors, advanced the Papal power, 663—instances adduced, 663—various contests of the Pope, for purposes of aggrandizement, noticed, 664, 665—in early days of the Church, they exercised the power of confirming Councils, 673—for a time they possessed the power of enacting or abrogating ecclesiastical laws, 677—have interposed in the ordination of Bishops, 682—have deposed Bishops, 685—examples adduced, 685
Enactments of Popery, unrepealed and in force, 7
End of Controversy, quoted, on the canonical Scripture, 8—on the sinfulness of Protestants possessing God's word, 16—the value of the written word comparatively trifling, 17—on the interpretation of Scripture, 26—on the rule of faith, 36—oral tradition, 38. See Milner, John, D.D.
England, progress of indulgences, 342—and of the Reformation, 342—anathema of the Popes, 342—indulgences, when introduced into, 354—women of, zealous in taking pilgrimages to Rome, 354—Romish mission to, 521—by whom the Gospel was introduced, 521—the doctrine taught, 521—arrogant conduct of the Monk, Augustine, 521—licentiousness of the Clergy of, referred to, 733

England, Church of, consents only to the first four Synods, as general, 580, 595
English version of the Scripture, testimonies in favour of, 33—calumnies of the Papists with regard to it, noticed, 33—efforts to preserve the purity of, recorded, 33
Enus, explores the secrets of purgatory, 282
Ephesus, Council of, by whom convened and who presided, 555, 669, 671—condemned Nestorius, 555, 669, 671—Monks, by clamour, carried their point, 582—ascribed no supremacy to Rome, 639—was called by Theodosius, 669—was peremptorily summoned by that Emperor, 670—who ratified its proceedings, 673
Ephrem, of Constantinople, his testimony against the doctrine of transubstantiation, 166
————, the Syrian, testimony against purgatory, 270
Epiphanius, his writings mutilated by the Expurgatorial Index, 85—called a heresiarch by Theophilus, 86—on praying for the dead, 265—on the doctrine of purgatory, 270—advocates the doctrine of prayer for the dead, 279—does not appear to have believed in purgatory, 280—makes no mention of extreme unction, 388—on the terms Bishop and Presbyter, 408—declares Presbyters the successors of the Apostles, 410—on the successor of Peter, 497—on the primacy of Peter, 609—is called "Pope," 619—attributes the founding of the Church in Rome to Peter and Paul, 636—on the heresy of Saturnibus, 716—condemned the worship of the Virgin, 761
Episcopate, is it a distinct order, 396—Bailly's definition of, 401—power of order and of jurisdiction, 401—on the superiority of Bishops over Presbyters, 401—divine right of, violently discussed at Trent, 401—prerogatives of, 402—functions and grades, 402—election of Bishops, 402—consecration of, 402—claims of the Romanist, to superior powers in the Episcopate, examined, 403, et seq.—Popish Prelates destitute of preaching qualifications, 404—ordination said by the Papacy to belong exclusively to the Bishops, 405—high claims of the Romanists met and refuted from Scripture and antiquity, 407, et seq.—the difference between Presbyters and Bishops, opinions concerning, noticed, 407, et seq.—Scripture testimony to the identity between Bishops and Presbyters, 407—authority of the Fathers, quoted, 407, et seq., 616—powers assumed by the Popish prelacy contrary to the words of Christ, 409—patristic testimony against it, 409—corruptions connected with offices pertaining to the Episcopacy, 414—how far the Episcopacy agrees with Scripture, 414—how far the Presbytery may be subordinate to the Episcopate, 415—form of degrading a Bishop, 422—many of the Prelates awfully demoralized, 481—are not the true successors of the Apostles, and why, 499—peculiar office of Bishops, 551—the primitive Bishop, defined, 552—office of, incompatible with that of an Apostle, 635—all Bishops were equal in authority, 649—various circumstances which indicated this, 650—Bishops, how elected in the primitive Church, 680—and at the period of the Nicene Council, 681
Erasmus, Desid., how characterized by the Papacy, 6—state of religion during the time of the Fathers, 86—on the conversion of the Jews, 522—the confession of Christ, 610—was corrupted by the Spanish Inquisitors, 610—the tyranny of the Church of Rome toward those who are under religious vows, 745—on the monastic institution, 752
Eremites, the term defined, 744
Errors of Rome, answer to the six points of Bellarmine, 506—their author, 506—origin, 506—time and place, who opposed, and who supported, 507
Escobar, the Jesuit, on the doctrine of attrition, 217
Estius, on the infallibility of Councils, 581
Eucharist, relative excellency of this sacrament as taught by the Papacy, 96—its comparison with manna, 96—on the institution of this sacrament, 97—nature of the grace conferred in the, 104—Popish doctrine of, explained, 134—words of Christ at the institution of, examined, 135—Protestant view of the doctrine, 139—Christ often offered by the Papacy, 139—Council of Trent quoted, 140—Catechism of Trent quoted, 140—the assertion that it is an object of faith, not of sense, considered, 141—of valid and invalid consecration, 145—superstitious ideas concerning the wine, 145—Dens quoted, 145—questions concerning the accidents of bread and wine solved, 146—if eaten by mouse or dog, 146—consecration by a wicked Priest valid, 146—accidents, if vomited, 147—the assertion that John vi. refers to the eucharist considered, 148, et seq.—Dr. Wiseman stated and refuted by Dr. Turton, 154, et seq.—our Saviour's interpretation of his own words, John vi., 161, et seq.—testimony of the Fathers on the nature of the, 165—on the change wrought on the elements after consecration, 167, 168—the controversy of the ninth century, on the doctrine of the real presence, noticed, 167, 168—on the questions concerning it, which agitated the Church, 169—why called a sacrifice by the ancient church, 178
Eugenius III., employs indulgences to raise money, 322
———— IV., condemned as a heretic, 67, 704—on the sacraments, 91—his grant of indulgences, 340
Eusebius, quoted, on written tradition, 37—on Scripture and tradition, 49—testimony against the doctrine of transubstantiation, 166—apparition of Jerome, 281—on the apostolical succession, 494—on the labours of the Apostles, 496—perplexity connected with the doctrine of succession, 497—his episcopal tables noticed, 498—on the opposition raised against the errors of Rome, 507—his view of the primacy of Peter, 608—speaks as highly of James as of Peter, 616—supposed Peter to have been at Rome, 631—says that Peter and Paul transmitted the episcopate of Rome to others, 637—is silent on the supremacy, 642—on the convening of the Council of Nice, 669—the ratification of that Synod, 673—on the election of the Clergy in the primitive church, 680
Eustace, Rev. J. C., on the church of St. John Lateran, 338—on the evil tendency of indulgences, 361
Eutyches, the heresy of, stated, 168—by whom refuted, 168—originated the heresy of transubstantiation, 168—although a Priest, he is called "Pope," 619
Eutychians, corrupted the Fathers, 76—the heresy of, stated, 168—by whom refuted, 168
Evangelists, extensively employed the Scriptures, 29
————, the office of, 411
Evans, Rev. John, M.A., that the canons, &c., of the fourth Lateran, have been recognised and established by subsequent Councils, down to that of Trent, 560, et seq.—the importance of this research, 560—his remarks on the testimony of Matthew Paris, 561—on Du Pin, and Jeremy Collier, 562
Exarchs, office defined, 654—powers annexed, 656
Excommunicated, who are considered such by the Church of Rome, 448
Excommunicating Princes, aided the advance of Papal aggrandizement, 663
Ex opere operantis, the phrase explained, 104
Ex opere operato, theological meaning of the term, 104
Exorcism, a ceremony connected with baptism, 124
Exorcist, one of the minor orders, 398—matter and form of, 398—Dens quoted, 398—variety of opinion respecting the office, 416—form of degradation, 422
Extreme unction, grace conferred in the sacrament of, 104—doctrine stated, 372—authority of Councils, 372—why so called, 374—its institution, 374, 383—sentiments of Romanists concerning, 374—Catechism of Trent quoted, as to its sacramental character, 375, 382—the matter of the sacrament, 375, 382—directions concerning anointing, 376—form of the sacrament, 376—the subjects, 377, 382, 383—presents a gloomy picture of Popish morality, 378—Bailly quoted, 378—Dr. Mac Hale quoted, 378—how administered in the Greek Church, 379—can it be repeated, 379—effects of the sacrament, 380, 382, 383—numerous opinions entertained on this point by the Papacy, 380, 382, 383—instructions concerning sepulture connected with this doctrine, 381—Bishop Hay on the importance of the sacrament, 381—on the grace connected with it, 382—the assumed scriptural authority, 377, 382, 383—disposition necessary to receive it, 382—the administrator, 382—Abridgment of Christian Doctrine, Butler's Catechism, and Mumford the Jesuit, quoted, 383—matter and form of this sacrament shown to be unscriptural, 384—the anointing rescued from the sentiments of the Papacy, 384—difference between this anointing and those recognised in Scripture, 385—the effects attributed are superstitious and absurd, 385—proof that it was not instituted by Christ, 385, et seq.—amazing discrepancy between the doctrine of Rome and that of Scripture, 386—Dr. Clagett quoted on its unscriptural character, 387, et seq.—testimony of antiquity with regard to this doctrine adduced, 388—shown to be a novel custom, 388—no notice of it in the biographies of the first six centuries, 388—unknown to the Apostles and Fathers of antiquity, 388—Councils of Chalons and Worms, 389—history of this innovation, 389, et seq.—injurious tendency of, 390—its folly and inconsistency, 391—opposed to other doctrines of Romanism, 391—an instrument of clerical extortion, 392—Cardinal Cajetan quoted, 392—variation in the Papacy with regard to, 512

F

Faber, John, on the locality of purgatory, 243

———, Rev. George S., quoted on the infallibility of Rome, 62—on the Popish plan of catching and baptizing converts, 127—on the absurdity of the doctrine of transubstantiation, 163—on the change wrought on the elements of the eucharist by consecration, 168—on the contradictions of Councils on the subject of image-worship, 589—his Difficulties of Romanism quoted, 593—refutation of Dr. Wiseman's remarks on Peter's Roman bishopric, 634—his Origin of Pagan Idolatry quoted, 768

Fabian, on the chrism used in confirmation, 129—the dubious character of his testimony, 129—opposed appealing to the Pope, 689

Facundus, his testimony against the doctrine of transubstantiation, 167

Fagnani, Abbot, on the doctrine of attrition, 217

Fagundez, Stephen, the Jesuit, on murder, 485

Faith, act of faith described, 15—Popish substitute for real belief, 15—contrasted with the faith inculcated in Scripture, 15—Romish distinctions on the nature of faith, 15—rule of faith of Protestants and Papists contrasted, 88, et seq.—required in adults for baptism, 115—the assertion, that the eucharist is an object of faith, not of sense, considered, 141

False miracles, a great support of purgatory, 281

Fanaticism, not the result of reading the Bible, 26—abounds in the Church of Rome, 27—Protestants discourage, Papists foster, it, 27

Fasting, a work of satisfaction, 235

"Father of fathers," a term of distinction repudiated by the early church, 620

Fathers, the ancient, how received by the Papacy, 6—Romanists have corrupted them, 6—unanimous consent of, defined, 6—testimony of, on the canon of Scripture, 30—testimony of, with regard to tradition, 44, et seq.—how valued by the Church of Rome, 75—have been fearfully corrupted, 76—Archbishop Ussher on these corruptions, 76, et seq.—corrupted by the intermixture of heresies, 76—by insertion, alteration, and wrong interpretation, 79—the system fully exposed by the Rev. R. T. Pope, 79—conduct of Berington and Kirk, censured, 80—when rules of honourable citation are violated, 80—corrupted and mutilated by the Expurgatorial Indexes of Rome, 85—how the Church of Rome obtains an unanimous consent of the Fathers, 85—many taught false doctrines and heresies, 85—opposed to the Tridentine Divines, 86—held not the doctrine of transubstantiation, 86—reject purgatory, 86—frequently contradict each other, 86—as interpreters of Scripture, 86—the authority of, as held by the Papacy, 86—consent of the, import of the term, 87—use of their testimony, 87—Kett's "Bampton Lectures" quoted, 88—ridicule the Heathen for worshipping objects that may be eaten, 145—testimony of, on spiritual manducation, 149, et seq.—that transubstantiation was no doctrine of the primitive church, 164, et seq.—do not condemn the doctrines of Protestantism, 164—on the nature of the eucharist, 165—testimony of, on satisfaction, 237—quoted on 1 Cor. iii. 10–15, 254—said to be in favour of purgatory, 264—the notion triumphantly refuted, 264—prayed for the dead, 265—their fire of purgation explained, 265—never recognised purgatory as an article of faith, 265—notions of, with respect to the dead, 275—reason assigned for the ancient corruptions of the Fathers, 276—on the object of prayers for the dead, 279—opinion of many, on the condition of the saints between death and the resurrection, 279—opposed the principle on which the doctrine of indulgences was founded, 323—nature of that apostolical succession which they taught, 494—against the dogma of the immaculate conception, 519—titles which they give to Peter, no proof of his supremacy, 615—never claimed supremacy when disputing with heretics, 643—supposed no orders above Bishops and Pastors, 648—authorities cited, 648—the early Fathers never acknowledged themselves Vicars of the Pope, 678—strongly objected to appeals being made to Rome, 689

"Feed my sheep," an argument for the supremacy of the Pope, considered, 614

Felicissimus, his appeal, noticed, 691

Felix II., made no pretensions to Papal supremacy, 599

——— III., on Matt. xvi. 18, 54—advances far toward claiming supremacy, 599

——— the Martyr, invoked, in prayer, according to his merits, 757

Female convents, fearful picture of, 750, et seq.

Fenelon, Francis, panders to the Pope, and impedes the circulation of the Scripture, 536

Ferrara, Council of, convened by Eugenius, 573—who excommunicates the Fathers of Basil, 573—is adjourned to Florence, 573

Ferraris, Lucius, on the manner in which sacraments impart grace, 105—definition of character, 106 why certain sacraments only are said to impress a character, 108—instructions to a midwife, with regard to baptizing, 113—on the baptism of adults, 115—contrition not necessary in the baptism of adults, 116—on all the baptized being subjects of the Church, 118—on the baptism of monsters, 121—on repealed indulgences, 338—indulgences granted to the faithful, 340—their effects, 359—the institution of extreme unction, 375—on membership of a General Council, 551—the power to convene a Council, 553—its President, 553—the infallibility of a General Council, 580—ascribed absolute power to the Pope, 596—claims for the right of convening and dissolving Councils, 673—of sanctioning or abrogating laws,

675—the infallibility of the Pope, 700—can the Pope, as a private person, become a heretic, 706—on the monastic vow of poverty, 744—punishments inflicted on refractory nuns, 746—what saints are to be worshipped, 755

Ferus, of Mentz, held the doctrine of a spiritual manducation, 148

Fictitious baptism, explained, 124

Fiesoli, Bishop of, his independent conduct at the Council of Trent, 404

Figurative language, of the phrase, "This is my body," 136—employed in the Jewish sacraments, 138

Filiutius, on the principles of the Jesuits, 234

Finnianus, St., his ridiculous miracles, 524

Fintanus, St., his nonsensical miracle, 524

Fire, as mentioned 1 Cor. iii. 10, 15, considered, 254, et seq.—fire of purgation alluded to by the Fathers, explained, 265. See Purgatory.

Firmilian, opposed the heresy of Stephen, in conjunction with Cyprian, 466—gave no high title to Peter, 616—calls himself Peter's successor, 618

Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, on transubstantiation unscriptural, 139—purgatory, a novel doctrine, 264, 517—unknown in the primitive Church, 274—on the rise of indulgences, 314, 510—considered purgatory a novel doctrine, 511—novelty of indulgences, 517

Flaccius, Matthew, his description of the unity of the Church of Rome, 456

Flagellants, a popular order of fanatics in the Church of Rome, 27—by whom encouraged, 236—Dr. Middleton's account of a troop of, 236—D'Aubigné's description of, 320

Flagellation, a popular mode of penance, 236—by whom endured, 236—self-flagellants, 236

Flavianus, Bishop of Antioch, his case considered, 686

Flechier, Esprit, his persecuting character, 536

Fletcher, Rev. Jos., D.D., his Lectures on the Roman Catholic Religion, quoted, 52—on the unscriptural and dangerous character of the Popish sacraments, 110, 111—on the tendency of the doctrine of transubstantiation, 171—the authority assumed by the Church of Rome, considered, 544, et seq.

Fleury, Claude, adduces no authority in support of extreme unction, 388—on the tumult at the Ephesian Council, 556

Florence, Council of, on the infallibility of the Church, 53—inculcated purgatory, 86—on the doctrine of the sacraments, 91—on the argument from analogy, in favour of the dogma of seven sacraments, 95—definition of character, 106—of baptism, 111—on the doctrine of purgatory, 243—who have no need of purgatory, 245—recognised the dogma of purgatory, 281—souls, how benefited in purgatory, 285—the sacrament of extreme unction, 372—fiercely contends with the Council of Basil, 460, et seq.—sixteenth General Council, 573—proceedings of, 573—exhibited the true views of the Papacy on the supremacy of the Pope, 606—on the power of the Pontiff to receive appeals, 687

Forms of a sacrament, explained, 94—its import, 94—by altering the form, how far is the sacrament destroyed, 95—form of baptism, 114—of confirmation, 129—of absolution, 194, 195—of extreme unction, 376—of various descriptions of orders, 397, et seq., 418

"Formularies of Faith," Henry VIII. on prayer for the dead, 289

Fornication, sanctioned by the Church of Rome to prevent a greater sin, 591—notorious fornicators admitted to communion, 591

Fortunatus, his appeal, noticed, 691

Fosse, De la, Madame, miraculous interposition in behalf of, noticed, 529

Foulis, Henry, B.D., on the attempts of the Jesuits against the life of Elizabeth, 487

Fountain of jurisdiction, a prerogative claimed by the Pontiff, 677—authorities cited, 677, 678—this notion repudiated in Scripture, and by the early Church, 678

Fowler, Bishop, his refutation of Bellarmine on the note "Amplitude," 513

Fox, Bishop of Winchester, supports the dispensation for marriage to Henry VIII., 439

Francis, St. De Paula, idolatrous worship rendered to him, 760

———, St., the "stigmata" of, their monstrous absurdity, 27—his foolish miracles, 524—rule of, established, 569

Francisca, a fanatical self-flagellant, 236

Franciscans, have constantly contended with the Dominicans, 457

Franciscus, a notorious Popish fanatic, 236

Freeman, Dean, on the term "Catholic," as applied to the Church, 490

Free-will, said to be required in adults to be baptized, 115

French Catechism, quoted on the doctrine of transubstantiation, 137—on the sacrifice of the mass, 174—character of the work, 174—on the doctrine of attrition, 217—on the subject of indulgences, 310

French Church, reject the infallibility of the Pope, 64, et seq.—place infallibility in a General Council, 68—opinion of, with regard to the power of the episcopate, 402—opinion of, with regard to the supreme power of the Pope, 604, 605—the Six Propositions, 606—sentiments of the French Divines, with regard to Pope Zachary's conduct towards Pepin, 666—considered a Council superior to the Pope, 696, 699—the conduct of, censured by the authorities of Rome, 701—denied temporal authority to the Pontiff, 707. See Cisalpine.

French republic, awful consequences resulting from a violation of the marriage vow, 440, et seq.

Fulbertus, Bishop of Chartres, his corruption of Augustine, 77

Fulgentius, on the fallacy of the doctrine of purgatory, 251

G

Gallican confession, on the Minister of ordination, 419

Gandolphy, Rev. Peter, P. P., his singular proposition to the British and Foreign Bible Society, 25

Gangra, Council of, honoured the state of wedlock, 716, 742—anathematized Eustathius, who enjoined clerical celibacy, 742

Garden of the Soul, quoted on the doctrine of confession, 200

Garnet, Henry, Jesuit, anecdote of, 222

Gates of hell, the, meaning of the phrase, 57—the term, as employed by the Papacy, examined, 58

Gavin, Antonio, on the immoral tendency of auricular confession, 211

Gelasius I., his testimony against the doctrine of transubstantiation, 167, 511—attempts of Baronius and Bellarmine to refute it, 167, 511—opposes the heresy of Eutyches, 168—and the dogma of half-communion, 185—made no pretensions to Papal supremacy, 599—on the impropriety of a Pope presiding in Councils, 672—asserted his prerogative of confirming Councils, 672—and restoring Bishops, 686—required all appeals being made to Rome, 687—on the superiority of Popes to Councils, 695

——— II., employs plenary indulgences to obtain assistance against his foes, 322

General Councils, meaning of the term, 551—number of, uncertain, 554—enumeration of them according to Dens, 554—difficulty connected with the enumeration of œcumenical Councils, 574—Richard Baxter quoted, 575—great diversity of opinion on the subject, 580—Bailly quoted, 580—such as have been condemned for error, 584—have erred and been deceived, 590—on the origin and use of General Councils, 593—origin, not divine, but human, 593, 594—Pighius quoted, 594—Gregory Nazianzen quoted, 594—what Councils are rejected as General, 670—were irregular and acephalous bodies, 670—needed not a Pope to convene them, 671—origin of General Councils, 676—have interposed in the ordination of Bishops, 683

Genuineness of Scripture, testimonies in favour of, adduced, 32—external and internal evidence, described, 32
Gerhard, John, S. T. D., quoted, on the doctrine of the sacraments, 94—of intention, 102—on the opinions entertained respecting the marks of the Church, 451—on the corrupt state of the Papacy, 481—the immorality of the Monks, 484—the moral condition of the people equally flagrant with them, 487—the term "Catholic" does not prove any church to be that of Christ, 491—the apostolical succession, as held by the Romanists, 495
Germans, seek to preserve their church from the inroads of the Popedom, 325
Germany, the scene of Leo's sale of indulgences, 325—recent attempts to abrogate the law which enjoins the celibacy of the Clergy, 737
Gerson, John, considered tradition inferior to Scripture, 42—recommends the whip as penance, 235
Gertrude, the virgin, invoked according to her merits, 757
Giles, de Bridport, on masses for the dead, 296
Girdle, described, 176
Gnostics, character of this sect, 81
Gobat, George, the Jesuit, on murder, 485
God-parents, required by the Church of Rome, in baptism and confirmation, 130
"Good intention," no plea available in proving gross and fetid idolatry innocent, 189
Goodman, Dr., his exposition of the doctrines of contrition and attrition, 219, et seq.—on those who are said to escape purgatory, 245
Good works, on the meritorious character of, 228—opposed to Scripture, 228—which the Papists term "works of satisfaction," 235
Gother, John, on the exercise of private judgment on the Scriptures, 25—on the nature of purgatory, 243—on masses for the dead, 295—on the authority of the Church, 544—on saint-worship, 755
Grace, what sacraments confer it, 104—how it is conferred by sacraments, 104—said to be imparted in confirmation, 129
Gratian, on the power of the Pope to sanction or abrogate laws, 676
Greater orders, described, 396
Greek Church, opinions of the, on purgatory, 274—apology of, to the Council of Basil, 274—recognise but few Councils as General, 580—refused to admit the mandates of Rome, 677
Greek and Latin Churches, union of, recommended by the second Council of Lyons, 569
Greek Testament, no copy issued from the Vatican press, 35—scheme of Pius V. with regard to, abortive, 35
Gregoire, Abbé, on the evils arising from the facility of divorce, 441
Gregory I., surnamed the Great, quoted on Matt. xvi. 18, 54—repudiated the title "Universal Bishop," 66, 665—on the nature of purgatory, 243—quoted on Matt. xii. 32, 252—the first who gave authority to the dogma of purgatory, 281—on the locality of purgatory, 284—on Scripture and tradition, 510—forbade the use of images, 511—states the custom to receive communion in both kinds, 511—forbade the Priest to celebrate the eucharist alone, 512—reproves Eulogius for giving to him flattering titles, 619, 644
——— II., excommunicates the Emperor Leo, and why, 600
——— IV., on the power of the Pope with regard to laws, 676
——— VII., opposes Berenger, 170—oppressive character of the Church in his day, 324—his ungodly career, 483—his tyranny, 499—on the authority of the Church, 544—deposes and excommunicates Henry IV., 600, 663—claims to himself exclusively the cognomen "Pope," 619—his arrogant assumption of authority, 622—his foolish argument in favour of supremacy, 642—on the power of the Pontiff with regard to law, 676—gave absolute temporal authority to him, 707—enforced celibacy on the Clergy, 743
——— IX., on the Scriptures in an unknown tongue, 510—deposed and excommunicated Frederick II., upon whom he laid an interdict, 600, 663
——— XI., issues a Bull against Wickliffe's translation of the Bible, 25
——— XII., his contentions with Benedict XII., noticed, 569—deposed by the Pisan Synod, 570
——— XIII., a singular indulgence of, 324—his grant of them, noticed, 341—confirms the Bull of Pius V. against Elizabeth, 602
——— XV., his Bull to suppress the accursed practice of solicitation, 212—perplexed with disputes about the immaculate conception, 472
——— XVI., his advocacy of Mariolatry, 754—his Encyclical Epistle quoted, 754, et seq.
——— Nazianz., testimony of, against transubstantiation, 166—and purgatory, 270—the Liturgy ascribed to him, 277—on ascertaining the true church, 443—on the true and essential succession, 501
——— Nyssen, on Scripture and tradition, 49—on the change wrought on the elements of the eucharist by consecration, 167—speaks strongly in favour of marriage, 717
Gregory Thaumat, on the folly of praying for the dead, 280
——— de Valentia, on the novelty of transubstantiation, 517—the intention of indulgences, 514—adverts to them as pious frauds, 518
Gresen, Archbishop and Primate of Poland, Bull against Bible Societies addressed to him by Pius VII., 19
Grier, Richard, D.D., on the Roman Taxæ, 368—on Bishop Milner's advocacy of the modern miracles of Popery, 526—examines several Popish assertions with regard to miraculous operation, 528, et seq.—on the heresy of Nestorius, 555—a description of the Council of Chalcedon, 556—its proceedings, 556—and those of the fifth General Council, 557—the Quinisext Synod, 557—on the acts of the third Lateran Council, 558—of the Synod of Pisa, 570—and of Constance, 571, et seq.—on the flagrant character of Alexander VII., 574
Grotius, Hugo, on the Jewish law of divorce, 435
Guildford, Sir Henry, on the avarice of the priesthood, 296

H

Hair, becoming grey through fear, 528
Hales, William, D.D., on the origin and supposed authority of indulgences, 318 Half-communion, principle on which it is founded, 182—the doctrine stated, 182—mutilates the institution of Christ, 182—established by the Council of Constance, 182—ratified by that of Trent, 183—is directly contrary to the word of God, 183—Popish arguments in favour of this dogma refuted, 183, et seq.—the nature of the institution demands distribution of both, 184—reasons why the cup specially ought to be given, 184—Dr. A. Clarke quoted, 185—the sacrament of the Lord's supper not administered in the Church of Rome, 185—utterly unknown in the primitive church, 185—by whom it was opposed in the Papal hierarchy, 185—Papal arguments for the practice noticed, 185—evil connected with the practice, 186—opposing this innovation, John Huss was martyred, 571. See Communion in one kind.
Hall, Bishop, quoted on Matt. xvi. 18, 56
——, Rev. William J., his excellent work on the Doctrine of Purgatory, mentioned, 242—remarks on those who are said to escape purgatory, 246—on the Roman definition of purgatory, 246—on the origin of the doctrine, 247—on the opposition of Scripture to the doctrine of purgatory, 262—on the authority of the Fathers, 266—his remarks on Tertullian's testimony with regard to purgatory, 267—and on that of Origen, 268—of Cyprian, 269—of Augustine, 271—on praying for the dead, 274—his remarks on Tertullian, 276—on the doctrine of praying for the dead, 280—on the absurdity of seeking to benefit souls in purgatory, 285, et seq.—on the rapacity of the Romish priesthood, 296

Harding, Thomas, on the connexion between praying for the dead and purgatory, 274

Harris, William, D.D., his discourse on transubstantiation quoted, 182—on the wickedness connected with the worship of the host, 192

Hay, Bishop, his Sincere Christian instructed, quoted on tradition, 36—on the procession of the Holy Ghost, a doctrine of Scripture, 44—on the infallibility of the Pope, 64, 699, 700—on the necessity of baptism, 122—contends that John vi. has special reference to the eucharist, 148—on the form of absolution, 195—examined in support of auricular confession, 212—on the distinction between contrition and attrition, 216—on the difference between mortal and venial sin, 229—considers theft only a venial transgression, 229—efficacy of the mass for souls in purgatory, 244—ground on which he supports the doctrine of purgatory, 260—on the importance of the sacrament of extreme unction, 381—his absurd views concerning its value, exposed, 390—on the sacramental character of matrimony, 425—gives but a guarded view of the Pope's supremacy, 602—his arguments in favour of clerical celibacy, considered, 722, et seq.

Head of the confirmed, bound with a linen bandage, 130 —— of the Church, the title taken by the Pope without license, 616—which greatly advanced the assumption of absolute authority, 664

Heathen, how caught by Popish Missionaries, 127, 128—origin of praying for the dead, 275—writers among them never advert to the dogma of supremacy, 643

Heaven, said to be opened in baptism, 123

Hebrew Bible, no copy issued from the Vatican press, 35

Hedwig, a notorious fanatic, 236

Hell, descent of Christ into, an ancient doctrine, 85

Helvetic confession, on the Minister of ordination, 419

Henderson, Rev. John, quoted on the rule of faith, 90

Henni, Mr., P.P., blasphemous assertions respecting the holy Scriptures, 22

Henry VIII., Formularies of Faith on prayer for the dead, 289—prepares the way for the Reformation, 342—is anathematized by the Pontiff, 342

Heraclius, his plan of converting the Jews, 522

Heresy, not produced by Scripture reading, 27—where it generally originates, 27—how Popery endeavours to expel, 27—chargeable on many of the Popes, 67—among the Pontiffs fatal to the theory of apostolical succession, 498—in case of heresy people exhorted to forsake the Bishop, 685—examples cited, 685—examples of Popes who have taught heresy, 704—charge of, evasively answered by the Romanist, 705

Heretics, several of the Popes have been, 67—corrupted the writings of the Fathers, 76—described by Clement of Alexandria, 82—why they abandon Scripture, 83—on baptism administered by, 114—why such baptism is considered valid, 119—all heretics are bound by the laws of the Church, 119—the question of marriage with heretics considered, 438—such conduct deprecated by the Church of Rome, 438—the Fourth Council of Lateran decreed their extermination, 559—the question, "Is faith to be kept with heretics?" considered, 572—stringent enactments against, by the Synod of Sienne, 573—murder of, sanctioned by Urban II. and others, 704—can the Pope become a heretic, considered, 705, et seq.

Heribald, on the doctrine of the real presence, 169

Hermas, knew nothing of extreme unction, 388

Herodian unity, distinguishing feature of the Papal Church, 456

Hesselius, taught the doctrine of a spiritual manducation, 148

Hesychius, speaks as highly of James as of Peter, 616—and of Andrew, 616

Hierarchites, the heresy of, mentioned, 123

High mass, explained, 172

High-Priest of the Jews, said to be figurative of the Pope, 638

High treason, advocated by numerous writers among the Jesuits, 487

Hilary, quoted on Scripture and tradition, 49—heretical sentiment of, 85—on the obligation of an oath, 86—on the state of departed spirits, 86—on the fallacy of the doctrine of purgatory, 250—quoted, on Matt. xii. 32, 252—his fire of purgation, 265—ignorant of indulgences, 323—by no means free from error, 476—on the primacy of Peter, 609—the confession of Christ, 610

Hincmar, Archbishop of Rheims, strongly opposed appealing to Rome, 691

Hippolytus, quoted on Scripture and tradition, 48

Hohenlohe, Prince, his attempt to get up miracles alluded to, 533

"Holiness," a term applied to the Bishop of Rome, 620

Holy clay, used at the interment of the dead, 293

Holy Ghost, the procession of the, a doctrine not received on the authority of tradition, 44—the Church of Rome not governed by, a proof of the want of infallibility, 70

Holy Land, relief of, discussed in the Second Council of Lyons, 569—at that of Vienne, 569

Homer, the idea of a purgatory in his writings, 261

Homilies, reject the doctrine of prayer for the dead, 289

Homily on Whit-Sunday, illustrative of Pontifical immorality, 498

Honorius I., Pope, condemned as a heretic, 67, 466, 704—commanded the worship of the host, 186—the unscriptural character of Romish orders, 416

———— III., excommunicated Frederick II., 663

Hopkins, John Henry, D.D., on the supremacy as claimed by the Papacy, 598

Hormisdas, made no pretensions to the Papal supremacy, 599—his illustration of the term "rock" a applied to Christ, 612

Horne, Rev. T. Hartwell, B.D., on the authenticity, &c., of Scripture, 33—on the character of the Vulgate, 34—of the Douay Bible and Rhemish Testament, 34—communication from, acknowledged, 756—his "Mariolatry" noticed, 758

Hosius, Bishop of Corduba, supposed to have presided at the Council of Nice, 671—and Sardica, 671

———, Cardinal, thought it would have been better for the Church had no Scriptures been written, 233

Host, the, of valid and invalid consecration, 145—questions concerning, solved, 146—described, 175—absurdity connected with the manufactory of, 176—the blasphemy of terming the host "the Lord Christ," 178—idolatrous service rendered to it, 182—worship of the, 186, et seq.—ringing a bell at the elevation of, 186—the host more an idol than any pagan deity, 187—a Papist no sooner makes his god than he eats him, 188—military honours rendered to it, 190—ludicrous scene at a theatre on the passing of the host, 190—abominable wickedness of the worship of, 192. See Worship of the Host, &c.

Howel, Lawrence, M.A., on the immediate successors of Peter, 498

Hughes, Rev. John, P.P., his charge, that Scripture reading produces heresy, considered, 27—on the importance of teaching, as opposed to reading the Scripture, 29—his flippant attack upon the Protestant

Scriptures, 33—at variance with Augustine on the command, that the Gospel should be written, 37
Human flesh, ancient Christians stigmatized with eating, 144 ——— satisfaction, doctrine of, no authority in Scripture, 225—fallacy of the idea, that human merit can satisfy divine justice, illustrated, 225, et seq.—absurdity of the notion, 228—opposed to the doctrine of Scripture, 228
Humbert, Cardinal, draws up a recantation for Berenger, 170
Hume, David, his attack upon Luther, condemned, 330—on the policy of enjoining celibacy upon the Clergy, 729
Huneric, on the supposed miracle connected with his cruelty, 527
Hungarian confession, on the infallibility of the Pope, 64
Huss, John, falls a sacrifice to the treachery of Sigismund, 69—charges preferred against him at the Synod of Constance, 571—his martyrdom, 571—base conduct of the Synod with regard to the safe-conduct, 571
Hyperdulia, defined, 756

I

Idacius, his appeal to Gratian, noticed, 691
Idolatry, idolatrous services performed at mass, 182—the worship of the host proved to be gross idolatry, 186—in what idolatry consists, 187—every mark of idolatry proved to exist in the service of the mass, 187—Minutius Felix quoted, 187—the plea of the Papist against the charge of idolatry, considered, 188—if transubstantiation be true, the Papist is not certain that he is not guilty of gross idolatry, 188—if that be false, he is blasphemously such, 189—of saint-worship, 755
Ignatius, his testimony with regard to tradition, 45—against the doctrine of transubstantiation, 165—on the doctrine of purgatory, 266—is silent on extreme unction, 388—the supposed miracle attending his martyrdom, noticed, 527—did not consider the Pope the fountain of jurisdiction, 678
Ignorance of the time, greatly aided Papal assumption, 663
Ignorant unity, characteristic of the Church of Rome, 456
Images, worship of, variations in the Papacy with regard to, 511—unknown in the primitive church, 518—introduced by the second Council of Nice, 68, 542—and supported by the fable of a Monk, 542—contradiction of Councils with regard to, 589—progress of this kind of idolatry, 590
Immaculate conception, the dogma of the, an instance of the uncertainty which attends the doctrine of tradition in the Church of Rome, 41—opposed by Cajetan and Bandellus, 42—source of dispute in the Church, between the Dominicans and Franciscans, 472—a proof of want of agreement in the Papacy, 516—a variety of authorities adduced on the subject, 516—antiquity corrupted, to support the notion, 519—various authorities cited, 519
Immolation, none in the service of the mass, 177
Immorality of Popes, awful instances of, 67, et seq., 481, et seq.—is fatal to the theory of apostolical succession, 498—Homily on Whitsunday, quoted, 499
Immutability, a futile boast of the Papacy, 1—falsity of this claim exhibited in the Romish administration of baptism, 120 Impediments, dissolving marriage, considered, 434, et seq.
Imposition of the hands, of the Priesthood, recognised in the early church, 405—if essential to the sacrament of orders, 419
Impossibility, attending the doctrine of transubstantiation, 142, et seq.—the argument in favour of transubstantiation, that "God can do all things," considered, 164
Index Expurgatorum, et Prohibitorum, described, decreed by the Council of Trent, carried into execution by Pius IV., 5—restrictions of, on reading the Scripture, 8, 19—corrupted and mutilated the writings of the Fathers, 85—commanded to be concealed by the King of Spain, 85—iniquitous character of, 518—a proof of the want of agreement in the Papacy, 518
Indians, Romish Mission to the, cruelties inflicted, 522
Indiscriminate reading of the Scripture, forbidden by the Papacy, and why, 24
Indissolubility of the marriage vow, stated, 436
Indulgences, principle on which the doctrine is founded, 224, 309, 320, 323—statement of the doctrine, 308—various kinds of, 308—who can dispense, 308—conditions for receiving, 308—Bull of Leo X. respecting them, 308—decree of the Council of Trent concerning, 310—contradictory opinions among Divines, notorious, 311—Butler's Catechism quoted, 311—the Edinburgh Catechism, 311—the Jesuit Mumford, 312, et seq.—Bishop Stillingfleet, 313—unknown in the early church, 314—their fraudulent character, 314—their authority, 317—Scripture adduced, 317—a gross innovation on ecclesiastical discipline, 318—D'Aubigné on their rise and progress, 318, et seq.—Dr. Wiseman quoted, 319—origin of plenary indulgences, 321—the earliest, noticed, 321—speedily employed by Pontiffs to raise money, 322—inferior Bishops employ them for money, 322—restrictions upon them, 322—explanation of the different kinds of indulgence, 322—Mosheim on their lucrative character, 322—foundation of them laid by Clement VI., 323—time in which they were adopted, 323—object of, 323—employed by Urban II. when engaged against the Saracens, 323—opposed by the Fathers, 323—Dr. Robertson quoted, 323—the sale of, advances the Reformation, 323—their glaring imposition, 324—circumstances with which frequently connected, 324—Bishop Burnet on their absurdity, 324—immense quantity sent into Germany, 325—Tetzel, 325—means adopted to sell them, 325, et seq.—graphic description of their sale, 326, et seq.—prices at which they were sold by Tetzel, 327—illustrative anecdotes, 327—evil effects of this traffic, 328—on their immoral tendency, 328—are warmly opposed by Luther, 329—Luther appears before the Pope's Legate, 333, et seq.—indulgences annulled and repealed, 334—those granted to certain orders, 338—to the churches of Rome, 338—to those who visit the Holy Land, 339—to the order of the Scapulary, 339—indulgences granted to the faithful in general, 340, et seq.—of recent date, noticed, 344—to the Bishop of Cork, 344—to the house of Kilravack, 345—to a society at Lyons, 347—their demoralizing influence in Spain, 348, et seq.—how applicable to the dead, 349, et seq.—a jubilee explained, 354—points of distinction connected with, numerous, 354—evil consequences of, 358—their uncertain and deceptive character, 358—operate as a commission to sin, 359, 360—nature of, as taught by the Papacy, 360—unscriptural, 360—illustration of the assertion, that indulgences give licence to sin, 360, 361—employed in the Church of Rome to obtain money, 370—the hypocritical language of the Council of Trent, on what they term "wicked gains," exposed, 370—opposed to the Gospel of Christ, 370—masses and indulgences set against each other, 370—on the absurd and unscriptural character of the whole scheme, 370, et seq.—variation of sentiment in the hierarchy, concerning, 510—sanctioned by the first Lateran Council, 558
Infallibility of Councils, by whom advocated, 64—Creed of Pius IV., quoted, 580—other authorities adduced, 580—arguments against such authority, 581—discordant sentiments among Romanists as to what constitutes infallibility, 582—violence and craft of Councils, argue against their infallibility, 582—discordant sentiments concerning the confirmation of a Council by the Pontiff, 582—the Pope has confirmed decrees which were heretical, 583—Councils which have been condemned for error, 584—some have been corrupted, 584, et seq.—manner in which consent of Bishops in Council is given, no mark of infallibility, 585—the representative character of a Council, fatal to its infallibility, 586—Scripture adduced by the Romanist, inapplicable, 586—that claimed by the Papacy implies divine inspiration as enjoyed by the Apostles, 587—Councils have contradicted Councils, 588—examples adduced, 588—have decided contrary to the word of God, 592—instances brought forward, 592

Infallibility of the Church of Rome, defined, 53—the boast of the Papacy, 53—arguments in favour of it examined, 53, et seq.—Matt. xvi. 18, 54, et seq.—"If he neglect to hear the Church," considered, 58—"Lo, I am with you alway," examined, 58—"He will guide you into all truth," 59—promise of, made to the Apostles, to be confined to their own time, 59—1 Tim. iii. 15, explained, 60—on the necessity of a judge in controversy, 60, et seq.—the argument of prescription, examined, 61—the argument, "Whatever is first, is true," considered, 61—the seat and extent of infallibility, 62, et seq.—opinions of Jesuits and others quoted, 62—the Italian system described, 62—Hungarian Confession quoted, 64—absurdity of the assumption of infallibility, 70—difficulty and consequences of the dogma, considered, 71—how proved by Dr. Milner, 72—on the alleged consistency of infallibility in the faith, and profligacy of life, 72—its utter inefficiency, 72—and absurdity, 74—opposed to all reformation in the Church, 75—a condensed view of this dogma, 548

——— of the Pope, opinions respecting, 5—the Italian system described, 62—by whom this doctrine was chiefly supported, 63—Hungarian confession quoted, 64—Bishop Hay, 64—rejected by the French Church, 64, et seq., 699—Papal authorities who have also rejected the dogma, 65—and Councils, 65—the Pope and Council united, said to be infallible, 65—this notion examined, 65—four systems of infallibility held among the Romanists, 66—Pontifical infallibility examined, 66, et seq.—Popes have contradicted Popes, 66, 703—many have been heretics, 67—ignorance of divinity, 67—Popes have excommunicated one another, 67—awful instances of the immorality of the Pope, 67, et seq.—the distinction that the Pope is infallible in matters of faith, and not of fact, considered, 68—rejected by the French Divines, 68—the idea of the necessity of a living infallible judge, examined, 73—was strenuously maintained by the Jesuits, 465—a prerogative claimed by the Pontiff, 698—distinctions recognised by Divines, noticed, 698, 700—opinion entertained at the present day on this subject, 700—Ferraris, Bailly, Liebermann, and Hay, quoted, 700—modern disputes adverted to, 701—doctrine unsupported by Scripture, 702—many General Councils are at variance with the dogma, 702—the early Christians did not depend on the Pope's infallibility to decide controversy, 702—they have made impious decrees, 703—examples cited, 703, et seq.—Popes have decided contrary to Scripture, 704—instances given, 704—some have taught heresy, numerous instances recorded, 704—others to serve their own purposes, others sophistically, and some to form a new Creed, 705—some against Councils, 705—in what sense the Pope may be a heretic, 705, et seq.—authorities cited, 706

Infant baptism, how far received by Protestants on the authority of tradition, 43—view of, entertained by Protestant and Papist, 117—doctrine of, as taught by the Papacy, 117—great importance attached in the Church of Rome to this rite, 117—case of infants who die with the parent in parturition, stated, 117—revolting nature of the instructions given to Priests and others on this subject, 117—doctrine of Rome, that unbaptized infants perish, 122—observations upon, 123—when performed in the primitive church, 123

Infidelity, harmonizes with Popery, 30—cause of its prevalence in the Church of Rome, 90

Infidels, compulsory baptism of, 120

Inglis, Mr. Henry D., his statement concerning the rapacity of the Popish priesthood, 302

Innocent I. taught the lawfulness of all Christians anointing, 385, 388—vague sentiments with regard to extreme unction, 388—requested Arcadius to call a Synod to restore Chrysostom, 670—how far he claimed the right of appeal, 690—declared it to be impious to decry wedlock, 716

——— II. convenes the second Lateran Council, 558

——— III. held Protestant views of the eucharist as found in John vi., 147, 148—his conduct at the fourth Lateran Council, 171—introduced the dogma of half-communion, 185—object of prayer for the dead, 179—restricts the sale of indulgences, 322—convenes the fourth Lateran Council, and why, 558—manner in which he carried his projects, 559—claims supreme authority and power, 600—adduces Matt. xvi. 18, to show the Emperor to be subject to the Pope, 614—excommunicated Otho, 663—on the power of the Pope to abrogate or dispense with laws, 676—to depose Bishops, 684—attempts to prove his infallibility by Scripture, 702—declared the Mosaic law to be binding on Christians, 705—speaks of the gross licentiousness of the celibates, 732

Innocent IV., his grant of indulgences, 340—convenes a Council at Lyons, 568—disputes with the Emperor Frederick, whom he deposes, &c., 568—and declares to be his vassal, 601—his sentence of deprivation, 601—in which he employs the term "Vicar of Christ," 618

——— XI., his grant of indulgences, 343

Inquisition, introduced into Goa by Xavier, 535—approved by the Council of Vienne, 569

Insane, baptism of, considered, 117

Inspiration of Scripture, proved independently of the Church of Rome, 33—internal and external evidence of the, 33—historical evidence of tradition in favour of, 33

Instructions, for confessions, given, 200

Intention, doctrine of, source of endless uncertainty, 89—the dogma considered, 100, et seq.—the false and ridiculous character of the doctrine, 101—what intention is necessary to render valid the reception of a sacrament, 103—fatal to the theory of apostolical succession, 498

Intermediate theology, its rise and character, 457

Interment of the dead, ceremonies connected with, 293, et seq.—difference between the poor and the rich, 294—importance attached to consecrated ground, 294—an illustrative anecdote, 294

Interpreters of Scripture, the Fathers considered as such, 86

Investiture, the right of, discussed in Lateran Council I., 558

Invocation of saints, variations in the Papacy with regard to, 511

Irenæus, quoted, on written tradition, 37—on the Gospel having been preached by tradition, 39—on the period during which Christ taught, 40—credited the doctrine of the millennium, 41—his testimony with regard to tradition, 45—on the promise of the Spirit to the Church, 59—heretical opinions of, 85—rejected purgatory, 86—on the charge of eating human flesh preferred against Christians, 144—testimony of, against the doctrine of transubstantiation, 165—and of purgatory, 267—makes no allusion to extreme unction, 388—not free from error, 476—uses not the term "Catholic," 488—on the apostolical succession, 494—on the successor of Peter,

497—on the true and essential succession, 500—opposed Victor, 507—opposed the invocation of angels, 511—gives no high title to Peter, 616—supposed Peter to have been at Rome, 631—contradicts the assertion, that Peter founded the Church at Rome, 633—attributes it to Peter and Paul, 636—on the decision of controversy, 702

Irene, her profligate character, 557—convenes the seventh General Council, 557—establishes image-worship, and that of the cross, 557

Irish Churches, when independent of the See of Rome, 659

Irish Priests, embrace the views of Leo XII., and require their people to surrender what Bibles they had received, 21—peculiarly hostile to the word of God, 21

Irish schools, Scriptures forbidden to be circulated in them, by Pius VII., 20

Irresponsibility of the Pope, a prerogative claimed by the Pontiff, 692—authority cited, 692—the primitive church is silent on this privilege, 692—examples of Popes being called to account, and deposed, 692—formerly they gave an account of their faith, 693—various opinions with regard to this prerogative, 693—and perplexity, 693—decision of the canon law, 693—the question, "Can the Pope be deposed for any crime?" considered, 693—Antoninus quoted, 693

Iscariotic unity, descriptive of the Papal Church, 456

Isidore, of Seville, on the doctrine of satisfaction, 238—on the office of an Acolyte, 398—an Exorcist, 416—on the term "Catholic," applied to the Church, 489—on the equality of the Apostles, 623

Italian system of Romish infallibility, described, 62

Iteration of baptism, not allowed, and why, 108

Ivo, on the object of prayer for the dead, 279

J

James, the Apostle, was he Bishop of Jerusalem, considered, 637

———, Thomas, D.D., on the corruptions of the Councils, 584, et seq.—and of Cyprian, 627

Jansenists, referred to, 21—opinion of the, on Romish infallibility, 63—opposed the Romish doctrines of contrition and attrition, 216—embrace the doctrines of Augustine or Calvin, 468—disputes with the Jesuits, fierce and long, 468, et seq.—dispute with Jesuits on sacramental administration, 472—encouraged by Quesnel's Testament, 473

Jansenius, Bishop of Ghent, held the doctrine of a spiritual manducation, 148—admits auricular confession, non-scriptural, 204

Januarius, St., history of, 538—liquefaction of his blood, 538—ceremonies connected with his festival, 538—grossness of the trick, 539—testimonies of travellers, 539

Jerome, his writings corrupted by the Papacy, 6—his translation of the Scriptures, noticed, 34—on Scripture and tradition, 50—on Matt. xvi. 18, 54—on the obligation of an oath, 86—on the contradictions of the Fathers, 86—on the Israelites' drinking the pulverized calf, 145—on the doctrine of spiritual manducation, 151—transubstantiation not the mystery of the early church, 162—his testimony against that doctrine, 166—on the doctrine of satisfaction, 237, 238—on the fallacy of the doctrine of purgatory, 250—quoted on Matt. xii. 32, 252—on the spirits in prison, 257—his evidence against purgatory, 271—on the folly of praying for the dead, 280—his apparition to Eusebius, noticed, 281—ignorant of indulgences, 323—alludes to the office of the Acolyte, 398—on the identity between Bishops and Presbyters, 407, 410—attempts of the Papacy to evade the force of Jerome's testimony, noticed, 410—on the worship of the sanctuary, 412—not free from error, 476—on the apostolical succession, 494—on the successor of Peter, 497—on the canonical Scriptures, 510—on the primacy of Peter, 609—considered the Apostles equal in dignity, 616—on the term "successor of Peter," 618—the titles Principes Ecclesiæ, 618—terms Theophilus, Bishop of Alexandria, "Pope," 619—calls Epiphanius, "Blessed Pope," 620—uses the term Summus Sacerdos, and why, 620—considered the church as settled equally on the Apostles, 623—is silent on the supremacy, 642—recommended celibacy, 743

———, of Prague, his martyrdom, and the cause, 571

Jerusalem Church, had greater claims than that of Rome, 640 ———, Council of, furnishes positive proof against the supremacy of Peter, 625

Jesuitical theology, its rise and character, 457

Jesuits, opinions of, on the infallibility of the Church, 62—doctrines of, rejected by the French Church, 64—strongly inculcated the doctrines of attrition and contrition, 216—have caused great laxity of morals in the Church of Rome, 232, 234, et seq.—their machinations against the life of Elizabeth, 343—have been the cause of constant disputes in the Church, 457—strenuously maintained the infallibility of the Pope, 465—the Arminians of the day in opposition to the Jansenists, &c., 468—disputes between them fierce and long, 468, et seq.—their gross immorality, a source of repeated contest in the Paparchy, 470—Jesuitical maxims adduced, 470—dispute with Jansenists on sacramental administration, 472—on the mode of instruction they adopt, 472—the Bull Unigenitus, 473—alarmed at Quesnel's New Testament, 473—Ignatius Loyola, noticed, 484—the character of the, 485—authorities adduced, 485—their unblushing licentiousness, 486—numerous writers of this character adduced, 486—countries from whence they have been expelled, 486—a selection of Jesuitical authors advocating treason, 487—great efforts of, to celebrate the supposed miracles of Xavier, 533

Jewel, John, D.D., on the sacrifice of the mass, 173—on the true, essential succession, 501

Jewish traditions, defined, 37—parallel between them and those of Rome, 37

Jews, children of, may be baptized without consent of parents, 119—sacraments of the, how they answer to the Christian, 138—Romish Mission to, aided by faggot and sword, 522

Joan, Pope, immorality of, 499—history of, 499—attempts to invalidate the account fruitless, 499

John of Damascus, on Scripture and tradition, 52—heretical opinion of, 85—on praying for the dead, 274

—— II., singular indulgence of, 324

—— VIII., on Matt. xvi. 18, 54

—— X., his gross immorality, 482

—— XII., his abandoned and wicked life, 482

—— XIV., his wretched end, 483

—— XXII., his grant of indulgences, 341—tax-tables originated with him, 364—was distinguished for patronizing heresy, 467

—— XXIII., convenes the Synod of Constance, 570—by which he is deposed, 571—denied the immortality of the soul, 704

Johnson, Samuel, LL.D., on praying for the dead, 287

Jonathan, Targumist, on the charge of eating human flesh, 144

Josephus, his heartless conduct with regard to his wife, 435—notion of a mystical Babylon refuted, 630

Jubilee, instituted by Boniface VIII., 322, 354—that of 1825 noticed, 348, 355—explanation of the term, 353—as adopted by the Romanists, 354—chronological record of such, 354—when recognised in England, 354—bull of indiction, 355—directions concerning, by the Vicar Apostolic of the London district, 358

Judas Maccabeus, his connexion with the origin of purgatory, considered, 247

Judge, necessity of one in controversy, considered, 60, et seq., 73

Julian, Apostate, testimony against the doctrine of transubstantiation,

162—deterred from rebuilding the temple, the fact noticed, 527
Julius I. taught to yield to the judgment of his colleagues, 676—recognised his accountability to the laws of the Church, 676
——— II. confers indulgences on the contributors to St. Peter's, 323—his profligate career, 484—his warlike and sanguinary character, 574—convenes the fifth Lateran Council, 574
Justification, said to be imparted in baptism, 123—Romanist objections to the doctrine of justification by faith, considered, 360
Justin Martyr, embraced the notion of the millennium, 41—heretical opinion of, 85—denied purgatory, 86—on the charge of eating human flesh, preferred against Christians, 144—testimony of, against the doctrine of transubstantiation, 165, 167—and purgatory, 267—makes no allusion to extreme unction, 388—on the identity between Bishops and Presbyters, 409—was not free from error, 476—the term "Catholic," merely, does not prove a Church to be of Christ, 491
Justinian I. convenes the fifth General Council, 556—obtains his point with regard to the condemnation of several writers, 557 confirms the proceedings of the Synod, 673—on the importance of effectual ratification of Councils, 674—exercised the power of enacting or abrogating ecclesiastical law, 677—on the subject of appeals, 688
——— II. draws up canons of discipline, 557

K

Kennicott, Benjamin, D.D., his biblical researches, noticed, 32
Kett, Henry, M.A., quoted on the importance of patristical authority, 88
Keys, the, signification of the term, 56—Lightfoot quoted, on the use of the phrase among the Jews, 56—Townsend quoted, 57—Popish notion of priestly absolution, not supported by this grant, 195—Protestant interpretation of the passage, 195, et seq.—Dens quoted, 612—his statement refuted, 195—were given to others as well as Peter, 612—so the Fathers declare, 613—authentic offices of Rome state the same, 613—in what respect Christ exercises the power of the keys, 613, et seq.—inconsistent and absurd views of the Papacy on Matt. xvi. 18, 613
Kilianus, Romish Missionary to Franconia, 521—history of, 521
Killesandra, the absurd report of a miracle at, 259
Kilravack, bull of indulgence granted to the house of, 345—its infamous character, 345
Kiss of peace in confirmation, why given, 130

L

Lactantius, heretical opinions of, 85—on the state of departed spirits, 86
Laiman, on the principles of the Jesuits, 234
Lamb, Joseph, a fanatic, the subject of a miracle, defended by Dr. Milner, 528
Lamps, beneficial to souls in purgatory, 293
L'Amy, Père, on the immorality of the Jesuits, 470
Laodicea, Council of, corruption of the thirty-fifth canon noticed, 584
Lardner, Nathaniel, D.D., on the canon of the New Testament, 545
Lateran I., Council of, ninth General Synod, 558—proceedings of, 558
——— II., Council of, tenth General Council, 558—by whom, and for what purpose convened, 558—enjoins the celibacy of the Clergy, 592—and their residence in their parishes, 636
——— III., Council of, eleventh General Council, 558—by whom convened, proceedings adverted to, 558—it regulated the election of Popes, and the canonization of individuals, declared war against the Albigenses, 558—Dr. Grier quoted, 558—trifled with the sacred character of an oath, 592—enjoined the residence of the Clergy in their parish, 636—speaks of the licentiousness of the Clergy, 732
——— IV., Council of, on the doctrine of confession, 199—enjoined the practice of auricular confession, 204, 559—secrecy in the confessional, 209—obliges all to repent once a year, 220—by whom and why it was convened, 558—persecuting clauses enacted, 559—remarks of Dr. Grier on them, 559, et seq.—absurd attempts of the Papacy to prove their innocuous character, 559, et seq.—these attempts refuted by Dr. Grier and the Rev. Mr. Evans, 559, et seq.—an enumeration of Councils, Synods, &c., which recognise the canons, &c., of this Council, 563, et seq.—examinations before Committees of Parliament respecting the persecuting canon of this Synod, referred to, 564—held absolute Papal supremacy, 603—defined the dogma of the supremacy, 642
——— V., Council of, the seventeenth General Council, 574—by whom convened, its proceedings, 574—renews the constitution of Boniface VIII., claiming supremacy, 601—held the notion of absolute Papal authority, 603—recognises the supremacy of the Pontiff, 607—and superiority over a Council, 695
Latimer, Hugh, Bishop, his opinion of purgatory, 305—on indulgences as applicable to the dead, 353—anecdote of, 770
Latin, devotional books, being in this language, a source of endless uncertainty, 88—use of, in the administration of the sacraments, unscriptural, 109—an Irishman's reason, why used in the service of the mass, 176—ridiculous and absurd, 180
Latria, defined, 186, 756
Laurentius, Pucci, a servile creature of Leo X., 325
Law, to sanction, abrogate, or dispense, claimed as a prerogative of the Pope, 675—authorities adduced, 675
Law-suits, instituted to reclaim property unjustly held by the priesthood, 302
Lay baptism, not openly condemned by the English Church, and why, 289
Legates, succeeded the Vicars, 678—had greater powers, 678—were exceedingly obnoxious to the people, 678
Legenda Aurea, defined, 541
Leo I., his unjustifiable and extravagant language applied to Peter, 615—his writings corrupted to support the dogma of supremacy, 621—often requested the Emperor to call Synods, 670—his approval of the acts of the Council of Chalcedon, 673—was solicited by the Synod to confirm them, 674—sought to invalidate parts of its decisions, his behaviour on that occasion, noticed, 675—appointed and confirmed Bishops, 681—opposed appealing to Rome, 689—on the superiority of a Council to a Pope, 695
—— II. confirmed the acts of the fifth General Council, 674
—— IX. claimed the power of convening Councils, 552, 669—enforced celibacy on the Clergy, 743
—— X. condemns Luther in translating the Scriptures, 25—his Bull of indulgences, 309—his early history and character, 325—his extravagant schemes, 325—deluges Germany with indulgences, 325—his grant to the Brothers Minor, 340—his irreligious character, 484—on convening a Council, 552—of which he claimed the right, 669
—— XII., his circular epistle against Bible Societies, 21—on the use of indulgences, 309—recommends the institution at Lyons, 348—his Bull of indulgence for the jubilee of 1825, 348—and Bull of indiction for that festival, 355
Lessius, quoted, his opinion of the sacred Scriptures, 21
Liberius, excommunicated Athanasius, and signed the Arian confession, 466—requested Constantine to call a Synod, 670—on the confirmation of the Council of Nicc,

674—taught to yield to the judgment of his colleagues, 676—opposed appeals to the Pope, 689—subscribed to the Arians, 64, 704
Liebermann, Leop. Brun., on the authority of the Church, 95—on Christ, the Author of the sacraments, 96—on the angelic administration of sacraments, 97—no connexion between the sanctity of religion and the administration of the sacraments, 103—on the number of orders, 396—on the order of priesthood, 400—his extravagant description of the members of the Papal Church, 448—his strange views of the sanctity of his Church, 448—on her apostolicity, 493—on the infallibility of the Pope, 700—censures the French Clergy, 701
Lightfoot, John, D.D., on the power of the keys, 56—on the phrase "to bind and to loose," 57—Corban explained, 318
Lights, beneficial to souls in purgatory, 293—why used at the interment of the dead, 293
Ligorio, De, on the baptism of monsters, 121
Limbus Infantum, described, 284
Limbus Patrum, described, 284
Lindanus, considered tradition superior to the written word, 42—held the doctrine of a spiritual manducation, 148
Linden, Dr., on the virtue of St. Winifred's spring, at Holywell, 529
Lindwood, on masses for the dead, 296
Linford, Dr., his refutation of the note of Bellarmine, Efficacy of Doctrine, 520
Lingard, John, D.D., on the nature of indulgences, 322—his unfair attack upon Luther noticed, 330—his observations on the Roman Chancery referred to, 367
Litany of the Mass, an idolatrous manual of devotion, 190
Liturgical books of Rome, described, 6
Liturgies, argument in favour of transubstantiation from the ancient language of, noticed, 163—several of the ancient, contain prayers for the dead, 277—extracts from several, 278—that of Edward VI., said to contain prayers for the dead, examined, 287
L'Œuvre de la Propagation de la Foi, indulgences granted in favour of, 347 Lombardic theology, its rise and character described, 456—"Book of the Sentences," noticed, 457. See Peter Lombard.
Lorraine, Cardinal, on the supreme power of the Pontiff, 605
Louvain, University of, on the temporal power of the Pope, 603
Loyola, Ignatius, account of, 484—founds the order of Jesuits, 485—his vow of submission, 485
Ludi Gladiatorii, noticed, 274
Lunel, Vincent, supposed that both tradition and Scripture derived their authority from the Church, 42
Luther, Martin, his translation of the Scriptures condemned, 25—when was Protestantism anterior to, 261—his rise and character, 329—his serious impressions, 329—finds a Bible, 329—opposes Tetzel, 329—how he was led to this, 329—published his inquiries under ninety-five heads, 329—his treatment, 330—defence of, against the charges of the Papacy, 330—his discourse on matrimony, examined, 333—account of his appearance before Cardinal Cajetan, 333, et seq.—attacks indulgences and defends the doctrine of justification by faith, 334, et seq.—motives of the Romanists in attacking his moral character, 737
Lyons I., Council of, thirteenth General Synod, 568—by whom convened, 568—circumstances connected with its assembling, 568—a packed political meeting, 569
——— II., Council of, fourteenth General Assembly, 569—object for which it was convened, 569—proceedings of, 569
Lyra, De Nicholas, considered tradition inferior to Scripture, 42—on the sacred canon, 458

M

Macarius, his testimony against the doctrine of transubstantiation, 166
Maccabees, book of, why rejected from the canon, 247, 248—authorities for so doing, 247, 248
M'Crie, Thomas, D.D., Life of John Knox, quoted, 733 M'Gavin, William, author of "The Glasgow Protestant," on Papal Bulls against Bible Societies, 19, 20—on the unscriptural character of auricular confession, 213
M'Ghee, Robert J., M.A., quoted on the iniquity of auricular confession, 202—the Bull Unigenitus, 474—his letter to Dr. Murray, charging him with hypocrisy, &c., when before a Parliamentary Committee, 566, et seq.
Macguire, Thomas, P.P., his blasphemous assertion concerning the Scriptures, 21—his discussion with the Rev. R. T. Pope, on the infallibility of Rome, 62
Mac Hale, Dr., on the sacrament of extreme unction, 378—his sophistry, 379—administration of this sacrament in the early Church, 379—in the Greek Church, 379—when administered, quotes Oswald, refers to ancient rituals, and on its repetition, 379—the importance of the sacrament, 379
M'Keon, P.P., blasphemy of, on the word of God, 21
Macknight, Dr., on the theological signification of the term "mystery," 432, et seq.
Mad persons, baptism of, considered, 117—authorities adduced, 117
Magdalena, a sister of Leo X., to whom the profits of indulgences sold in Saxony were assigned, 325
Magistrate, civil, power over the, a prerogative claimed by the Pope, 706—Romanists divided on the point, 707—authorities adduced, 707, et seq.—variety of opinions entertained, 707—on the indirect power, 707—this, said to be of divine right, 708—Antoninus quoted on the nature and extent of Papal power, 708—arguments by which the doctrine is supported, 711—those by which the opinion is opposed, considered, 711, et seq.—on the power claimed by the Pope, over the life of his subjects, 714—who has made war with opposing authorities, 714
Mahometans, charge the Christian with eating his own God, 144
Maldonatus, on the authority of the Fathers, 86—on the fallacy of the doctrine of purgatory, 251—the unscriptural character of that of extreme unction, 387
Manducation, spiritual, the doctrine of, considered, 148—our Saviour's interpretation of John vi., 161, et seq.
Manichæan heresy, opposed by the Lateran Council II., 558
Manicheans, abominated the wine in the eucharist, 185
Maniple, described, 176
Manna, eucharist compared to, by the Douay Divines, 96
Mans, Richard Du, on the authority of the Fathers, 87
Manuscripts of the Scripture, have tended to maintain their purity, 33
Marcellinus sacrificed to idols, 704
Marcellus, the Martyr, invoked according to his merits, 757
———, Pope, condemned as a heretic, 557
Marcian, Bishop of Arles, his case, considered, 685
———, the Emperor, peremptorily summoned the Council of Chalcedon, 670—and ratified its proceedings, 673
Marcion, the heretic, why re-admission into the Church was refused, 677—his supposed appeal considered, 691—Basnage quoted, 691—his followers abominated marriage, 716
Marcionites, their heresy noticed, 141
Margaret, a notorious fanatic, 236
Marinier, Anthony, considered tradition to be inferior to the written word, 42—is opposed by Cardinal Pole, 43
Mariolatry, positively enjoined by the present Pontiff, Gregory XVI., 754, 759—the Jesuitical sophistry of Bossuet exposed, 754, 759—Gabriel Biel quoted, 754, 759—Antoninus of Florence cited, 754, et seq.—examples of the idolatrous practice, 756—Ave-Maria, 756—the Confiteor, 757—direct petitions presented to the Virgin, 757—Salve Regina, 757—a commemoration of the Virgin, 757—a prayer to the Virgin, 758, 759—of St. Bernard, 758—litany of the Virgin, 758—litany of the sacred heart of Mary, 758—ascriptions of praise presented to the Virgin, 759—divine attributes given, 759—devotions of the Scapular adduced, 759—the little testament of the Holy Virgin quoted, 760—Mariolatry among the Portuguese, 760—Rev. Thomas H. Horne quoted, 761—Mariolatry opposed to the Scriptures, 761—when and by whom introduced, 761—various manuals of her worship referred to, 762—ancient writers in favour of this idolatry, 762

Mark, the hermit, his writings mutilated by the Expurgatorial Index, 85

Marks of the Church, how to be ascertained, 443—apostolic doctrine, 443—unity of the Church considered, 451—did much to advance the growth of Papal authority, 664

—— of the Romish Church, various in number, 451—Gerhard quoted, 451—Bellarmine adduced, 451—the statement in the Constantinopolitan Creed, considered, 450

Marriage, laxity of Popish principles with regard to, 69. See Matrimony.

Martin V., his grant of indulgences, 340—was elected during the sitting of the Council of Constance, 571—rejects every attempt to effect a reformation, 571—summons a Council, and dies, 573

Martinus de Magistris, his defective morality, 233

Martyrs, escape purgatory, 245—opinion of, concerning the superfluous orders of the Church of Rome, 416

Mary, Queen of England, persecuting character of her reign, 173

Mass, ordinary of, quoted, on its administration, 137—doctrine of the, stated, 172—high-mass, explained, 172—derivation of the term, 172—persecution on account of it, 172—Bishop Chaloner, A. Clarke, Bishop Jewel, quoted, 173—Prebendary Payne cited, 173—source of great wealth to the Church, 173—Douay Catechism quoted, 173—Tridentine and French Catechism referred to, 174—Baker, Chaloner, Milner, and Berrington, quoted, 175—celebration of the mass described, 175—vestments employed at mass, 176—ceremonies of, noticed, 176—a blasphemous theatrical representation, 176—antiscriptural character of the service, 177—absurdity in calling the mass a sacrifice, 177, 178—spoken of by Bellarmine and others, as an unwritten tradition, 178—folly of adducing Melchisedek in proof of the sacrifice of the mass, 179—opposed to the word of God, 179—the daily sacrifice of the mass contradictory and absurd, 179—an unbloody offering, the folly of such, as propitiatory, 179—Scripture testimonies which repudiate the doctrine of the mass, 179, 180—deprives Christ's atonement of its dignity and value, 180—the service of the mass, barbarous and inhuman, 180—not administered without due payment, 180—on the defects which occur in the mass, 180, et seq.—the service is flagrantly idolatrous, 181—worship of the host, 186, et seq.—the Litany of the Mass, an idolatrous manual of devotion, 190—efficacy of, for souls in purgatory, 244—"masses satisfactory," described, 293—instances of a number being said, 293—their great value, 294, et seq.—object of Purgatorian Societies, 299—masses obtained for malefactors, 301—law-suits occasioned by, 302—H.D. Inglis's account of, 302—and Bourgoing's, 302—singular bill for masses, 303—bought at a reasonable rate in Rome, 349—variations in the Papacy with regard to solitary masses, 512. See Eucharist, Transubstantiation, Host, Accidents.

Massilians, habitually dissolved the matrimonial bond, 716

"Master of the Sentences," described, 456

Matrimony, grace conferred in the sacrament of, 104—statement of the doctrine concerning, 423—Council of Trent adduced, 423—its sacramental character, 425—Catechisms cited, 425—the Jesuit Mumford quoted, 426—Romish authorities at variance on this point, 427—a refutation of them, 428—explanation of the term "mystery," 428—Dr. Campbell quoted, 428, et seq.—Dr. Macknight quoted, 432—the Rev. Richard Watson on its sacramental character, 433—singular Scripture passages urged by the Romanists in favour of this topic, 433—marriage proved to be no sacrament of the Gospel, 433, et seq.—impediments dissolving marriage, 434—lax notions of, entertained by the ancient Jews, 435, et seq.—severely reprimanded by the Saviour, 435—Dr. Croly on the lax views entertained by the Jews concerning matrimony, 434—the indissolubility of the marriage vow, 436—numerous obstacles thrown in the way of matrimony by the Romanists, 437—wealth accruing to the Church of Rome in granting dispensations, 437—what is said to justify a separation from bed and board, 437—entering orders, a dissolution of marriage, 437—these notions refuted, 437—on its validity or invalidity, 437, et seq.—viewed by the Romanists as a threefold contract, 437—marriage with heretics considered, 438—on marriages of Roman Catholics, solemnized by Protestants, 438—on the education of the children, the offspring of such marriages, 438, et seq.—dispensation of the Pope to Henry VIII. noticed, 439—disgraceful flippancy of Romish writers on the subject of divorce, 440—variation in the Papacy with regard to the marriage of the Clergy, 512—to disparage wedlock, a mark of damnable heresy, 716

Matter, of a sacrament, explained, 94—by altering the matter, how far is the sacrament destroyed, 95—sacrament of penance, destitute of a material form, 95—of baptism, proximate and remote, 112—Romanists have added to the former, 112—on the employment of doubtful matter, 113—of confirmation, 129—of extreme unction, 375—of orders, 418—various opinions concerning the latter, 418

Matthias, his election, noticed, 680

——, Aquarius, lax sentiments of, with regard to marriage, 234

Maynooth, College of, sentiments inculcated respecting the infallibility of the Pope, 64—Priests trained in perjury and falsehood, 209

Medina, on the doctrine of repentance, 220

Melancthon, Philip, on the true and essential succession, 501

Melchisedek, said to be figurative of the Pope in his office, 713—adduced by the Papist, as an argument in favour of the mass, 179

Melito, St., his writings mutilated by the Expurgatorial Index, 85

Members of the true church, defined, 445

Mendham, Rev. Joseph, M.A., referred to, on the Roman Taxæ, 362—his description of that iniquity, 362—with a history of their rise and progress, 362—on the power assumed to commute penance for money, 363—refers to the collection of Taxæ in the British Museum, 364—his Spiritual Venality of Rome, noticed, 364—his Literary Policy of the Church of Rome, referred to, 365—on Dr. Doyle's charge against the English Church of pecuniary penance, 366—personal good character cannot palliate the propagation of error, 535—his notice of Xavier, Fenelon, Pascal, and Flechier, 536—on the true merits of the Catechism of Trent, 715—his observations on the attempts of the Papacy, to prove spurious some of the writings of Bonaventura, 673

Mendicant Friars, their privileges adjusted, 569

Menochius, on Matt. xvi. 18, examined, 53, 54

Merit, variation of sentiment with regard to, in the Papacy, 510

Metallic tractors, singular effects of, 528
Metropolitans, institution of, 413, 654—their powers and offices defined, 656, 676
Michael, the archangel, his character and office adduced in proof of the Pope's supremacy, 639
Middleton, his account of a troop of flagellants, 236
Midwife, instructions to a, concerning the baptism of infants, 113—revolting nature of the direction given to Priests and others on this subject, 117
Milan, Clergy of, resisted the imposition of celibacy, 743
Miletian schism, condemned at the Nicene Council, 554
Milevis, Council of, on the subject of appeals, 688—circumstances connected with this Council adverted to, 688
Millenarians, of ancient days, 85
Millennium, associated with the doctrine of praying for the dead, 275
Milner, John, D.D., the character of the Creed of Pius IV., 2—opposed to Dr. Wiseman on the subject of private judgment, 15—his remarks upon the uncertainty and insecurity of the Protestant, examined and refuted, 16—asserts that Protestants ought not to possess the word of God, 16—his short and easy way with Protestants, 16—that the written word of God is of little value, 17—on the question, which is the true church, 25—on the interpretation of Scripture, 26—the Gospel, how to be propagated, 29—his puerile quibble that Christ taught his disciples the alphabet, 30—on the Romish rule of faith, 36—at variance with Augustine on the command of Christ, that the Scriptures should be written, 37—arguments in favour of oral tradition considered, 38—on the doctrine of Christ's Divinity, that of tradition, 44—on the infallibility of the Church, 65—his ludicrous mode of proving that doctrine, 72—on the figurative language of Scripture, refuted, 137—contends that John vi. has special reference to the eucharist, 148—on the sacrifice of the mass, 175—on priestly absolution, 195—on the locality of purgatory, 242—on praying for the dead, 274—his reference to Monica on this subject, 277—his unfair attack upon Luther, refuted, 330—mutilates a quotation from Luther in order to substantiate a charge against him, 332—falsehoods of, with regard to the Taxæ, 366—never alludes to the penitentiary, but only to the chancery, 366—his contemptible attack on the character of Anthony Egane, 367, et seq.—on the miracles of the Romish Church, 522—is refuted by Dr. Grier, 526, et seq.—defends those of Xavier, 527, et seq.—his sophistry and falsehood exposed, 530—defends the doctrine of miraculous powers in the Church of the present day, 543—ascribes to the Pope no temporal jurisdiction, 602—on the nature of the intercession of the saints, 768—his false position exhibited, 768
Minor orders, described, 397
Minorites, crusade against, determined, 569
Minucius, on eating human flesh, a charge preferred against the Christians, 144—folly of worshipping objects that may be eaten, 145—his sarcastic language with regard to the idolatry of the Heathen, 187—was by no means free from error, 476
Miracles, miraculous character of transubstantiation exploded, 141—three wonders connected with that doctrine, 164—a mark of the Church, 522—Bellarmine quoted, 522—miracles adduced by Popish writers in favour of Romanism, 522—those of Rome and of holy writ, contrasted, 523, et seq.—Scripture miracles described, 524—wonder-working no sign of a true church, 525—Dr. Douglas's criteria of a true miracle, 525, et seq.—Milner's advocacy of Popish miracles refuted by Dr. Grier, 526, et seq.—various modern pretensions to miracles examined and exposed, 528, et seq.—miracles of Xavier considered, 530, et seq.—ludicrous account of John B. Porta, 531—numerous attempts to get up miracles stated, 533—a personal good character cannot justify or palliate the dissemination of error, 535—Dr. Southey on the miracles of the Papacy, 536—many are false and lying, 537—absurd and puerile, 541—worked to support idolatry and superstition, 542—true miracles occasionally wrought, 542—why the missions of Protestants have not the attestation of miracles, 542—many recognised false by Popish writers, 542—on the continuance of miraculous powers, 543
Missal, of high authority, 1—described, [redacted] ———, Roman, quoted on the service of the mass, 137—on the consecration of the eucharist, 145—on the defects which occur in the mass, 180—ceremonies connected with the adoration of the host, 189—noticed, 537
Missionaries, Protestant, principle on which they administer baptism, 127 ————, Romish, how they catch and baptize converts, 127—defended by Dr. Wiseman, 127
Missions, Romish, adduced in proof of the efficacy of doctrine, a mark of the Church, 521—to England, 521—that of Kilianus, 521—of Vinofrid, that to the Vandals, 521—Indians and Jews, 522
Mochua, St., silly miracle of, 524
Monastic theology, its rise and character, 457
Monasticism, evils of, adverted to, 724—vows of, 744—its seclusion injurious to piety, 745—tyranny of Rome exhibited, 745, et seq.—on the state of monasticism in Spain, 746, et seq.—in England, 748—evil of monastic institutions, 750—Isaac Taylor quoted, 752
Monica, referred to on the subject of praying for the dead, 277
Monkish orders, many of them founded in the maniacal ravings of Papists, 27
Monks, Gerhard's testimony to their immorality, 484—the term defined, 744—their vows of poverty and obedience, noticed, 744—gross licentiousness of, 748
Monothelites, condemned, 557
Monsters, the baptism of, 120—Dens and other authorities adduced, 121
Moore, Dr., on societies in Italy to obtain masses for malefactors, 301
———, Sir Thomas, and souls in purgatory, 292
———, Thomas, Esq., his shameless attack upon the Norrisian Professor, 258—his ridiculous defence of picture-worship, 258
Morinus, P., on the doctrine of attrition, 218—on the character of indulgences, 322
Mornay, Sir Philip, on the infamous character of the Roman Taxæ, 364 Morning Exercise, quoted, on the absurd and unscriptural character of indulgences, 370, et seq.
Morse, Samuel F. A., M.A., his Confessions of a French Catholic Priest, 734, et seq.
Mortal sin, described, 205—Aquinas and Dens quoted, 205—what sins are mortal, and why, 206—viewed in connexion with the Romish notion of satisfaction, 229—immoral tendency of such distinction, 229—opposed to Scripture, 229
Mortmain, Statute of, great occasion for its enactment, 173—origin of, 296
Mosheim, his remarks on the introduction of the doctrine of purgatory, 281—on the lucrative character of indulgences, 322—on the Lombardic theology, 457—the internal dissensions of the Papal Church, 457—on the infallibility of the Pope, defended by the Jesuits, 465—on the disputes between the Jansenists and Jesuits, 469—on the gross immorality of the latter, 472—on the character of the Jesuits, 485—on the miracle connected with the cruelty of Huneric, 527—on the authority assumed by the Church with regard to the canon of Scripture, 545—on the transactions of the Ephesian Council, 556—the disputes between Innocent IV. and Frederick, 568

Moylan, Bishop of Cork, indulgence granted to, by Pius VII., 344—his pastoral letter to his diocess, 345
Mumford, the Jesuit, on the doctrine of indulgences, 312—his exposition of the sacrament of extreme unction, 383—and attempts to refute the objections of the Protestants, 384—adduces no authority in support of extreme unction, 388—on the sacramental character of matrimony, 426—his arguments in favour of clerical celibacy, 720, et seq.
Muratori, on redemption of penances by pecuniary mulcts, 364
Murder of heretics, sanctioned by Urban II. and others, 704
Murray, Dr., his examination before a Parliamentary Committee, on the third canon of the fourth Council of Lateran, 564—its barefaced duplicity, 565—this hypocrisy and deceit exposed in a letter to this Prelate by the Rev. R. M'Ghee, 566, et seq.—recognises the persecuting clauses in his directions to his Clergy, 567—his exposition of the safe-conduct given to Huss before a Parliamentary Committee, 572—shown to be at variance with the acts of the Synod of Constance, 572—and with the opinion of Pius II., 572
Mystery, assertion that transubstantiation, as such, was concealed from catechumens, refuted, 162—what were considered mysteries in the early church, 162—that of the Trinity and transubstantiation compared, 163—absurdity of such comparison, 164—transubstantiation no mystery, 164
"———," signification of the term, 428—Dr. Campbell quoted, 428, et seq.—and Dr. Macknight, 432

N

Name, giving of a, following the ceremony of baptism, 126—sometimes changed in confirmation, 130
Natalitia, explained, 276
National Council, defined, 551
Natural analogy, argument from, in favour of the doctrine of seven sacraments, 95—illustration of it, 96
Neo-Cæsarea, Synod of, forbade the Clergy to marry after ordination, 742
Nestorians, the heresy of, described, 555—Dr. Grier quoted, 555—recognise only two General Councils, 580
Nestorius, condemned by the Council of Ephesus, 555—excites the jealousy of Cyril, 555—his heretical sentiments, 555—was judged without being heard, 555—sent into exile, 555—tumultuous scene in the Synod, 555, 556
Newman, Rev. John, on the Popish doctrine of satisfaction, opposed to reason, 238, et seq.
New Testament, its genuineness established, 32—how preserved uncorrupted, 33
Newton, Thomas, D.D., on the celibacy of the Clergy, a mark of apostasy, 727, et seq.
Nice I., Council of, Du Pin's description of it, 554—why called, disputes excited, 554—is silent on the subject of supremacy, 639—it enacted canons for the government of the Church of great importance, 657—convened by Constantine, 669—testimony of Eusebius and Socrates, 669—the Pope did not preside, 671—the Synod was confirmed by the Emperor, 673—was recommended to seek the approval of the Prelates, 674—enacted canons for the removal of unworthy Prelates, 684—against the modern practice of appeals, 687—proceedings of, concerning marriage, 742
—— II., Council of, convened by Irene, 557—established the worship of images, 68, 557—and of the cross, 68, 557—the seventh General Council, 68, 557—by whom this new idolatry was received and rejected, 68, 557—recognised the doctrine of the real presence, 168—gross fraud exercised during this Synod, 582—contradicts the Council of Constantinople, 589, 590—introduced the fable of a Monk to countenance image-worship, 542
Nicholas, St., Bishop of Myra, absurd miracle imputed to him, 541—is invoked in supplication, 757
——— I. asserted his prerogative of confirming Councils, 672—required all appeals being made to Rome, 687—allowed baptism only in the name of Christ, 705
——— II. opposes the doctrine of Berenger, 170
Nicolas de Clemangis, on the licentiousness of the Clergy, 732
Nidhart, on purgatorial purification, 283
Nilus, Archbishop, a quotation from, corrupted by Thomas Moore, 258
Nolan, Mr., P.P., his discussion at Carlow quoted, on the infallibility of Rome, 62
Non-residence of Prelates, laws against, would have been violated had Peter been a Bishop, 636
Novatians, denied the power of absolution, 193—troubles of, settled at the Nicene Council, 554
Nunhez, Melchior, on the miracles of Xavier, 533
Nuns, close confinement of, enjoined, 745—punishments to be inflicted, 746—gross licentiousness of, 748

O

Oath of allegiance to the Pope, its feudal character, 3—when first imposed, 3—the oath, and its translation, 4—contains a fair specimen of the Papacy, 4—greatly extended the Pope's authority, 664—early examples adduced, 664
Oaths, fearful laxity with regard to, 69—on the obligation of, 86—the third Council of Lateran trifled with the sacred character of, 592
Obit, an, described, 293
Occam, transubstantiation unscriptural, 139
Occisive ablution, baptism by, explained, 114
Odillo, St., professes to verify the existence of purgatory, 282
Œcumenius, on the identity between Bishops and Presbyters, 407 Oil of catechumens, a ceremony accompanying baptism, 125
— of chrism, used after baptism, 125
— of olives, remote matter in sacrament of extreme unction, 375—its external application of great antiquity, 386—extreme unction proved to be unscriptural, 386, et seq.
O'Leary, Father, corroborates the assertions of Anthony Egane, 368
Old Testament, canon of, defined, 30—its authenticity, 32—its preservation, and uncorrupted condition, 32—translations of the, prove its integrity, 32
Omar, Caliph of Alexandria, anecdote of, 52
Omnipotence of God, pleaded in favour of transubstantiation, 142, 164—Cicero quoted, 164
Onkelos, on the charge of eating human flesh, 144
Onuphrius, on the character of indulgences, 324—on Peter's bishopric at Antioch and Rome, 635
Optatus, testifies against the tonsure, 421—by no means free from error, 476—on the term "Catholic," as applied to the Church, 489—on the primacy of Peter, 609—the title, Principes Ecclesiæ, 618—quoted by Romanists, in favour of supremacy, but unfairly, 640
Oral tradition, defined, 38—Scriptures examined, supposed to authorize it, 38—Dr. Milner's argument in its favour, from the lex non scripta of England, considered, 38—that from the fact, that the faithful only had tradition to guide them from the time of Adam to Moses, examined, 39—that the Gospel was first preached by tradition, noticed, 39—the authority of, opposed by the sacred Scriptures, 39—its uncertain and changeable character, 39—Archbishop Secker quoted, 39, 40—was corrupted by passing through vicious men, 40—Rome uncertain in her manner of expounding them, 40—not preserved incorrupt, 40—some are false and apocryphal, 40—many are contradictory to each other, and Scripture, 41—Mons. Claude quoted, 41—pernicious effects of oral tradition, 42

Orders, erroneous view of, held by the Papacy, 94—grace conferred in the sacrament of, 104—why said to impress a character, 107—Romish Clergy, how divided, 392—various kinds of orders, 393—why this term is employed, 393—and called a sacrament, 393—Romish authorities adduced, 393—signs of this sacrament, 395—when instituted, 395—on the power of the priesthood, 395—number of orders, 395—the question, is the episcopate a distinct order, considered, 396—division of orders, 396—are all sacraments, 396—greater and lesser orders described, 396, et seq.—on the superiority of Bishops over Presbyters, 401—claims of the Romanists to superior powers in the episcopate, examined, 403, et seq.—the scriptural character of ordination, considered, 404, et seq.—the identity between Bishops and Presbyters, 405, et seq.—on the term "Apostles," 408—various offices of the Romish priesthood idolatrous, 415—the ceremony of deprivation, noticed, 415—numerous offices of the priesthood, have fearfully deteriorated, 415—antiquity opposed to such variety of orders, 415, 416—deprivation of orders, of Dr. Taylor, Bishop Ridley, and Archbishop Cranmer, 417—orders proved to be no sacrament, 417, et seq.—matter and form of orders, 418—various opinions concerning these points, 418—is the imposition of hands essential to this sacrament, 419—the Minister of ordination, 419—sentiments of various Confessions of Faith, 419, 420—right of every Church to ordain its Ministers, 420—the effects of orders, 420—Romanist view of the sacramental grace of orders, 420—these notions refuted, 420, et seq.—its indelible character refuted, 421—ceremonies of, 421—forms of degradation, 421—Richard Watson denied the sacramental character of orders, 433—the notion that orders dissolve marriage, refuted, 437

Ordination, said to belong, by the Papacy, exclusively to the Bishops, 405—in what scriptural ordination consists, 405—Richard Watson quoted, 406—arguments of the Romanists examined, 405, et seq.—Minister of, defined, 419—sentiments of various Churches, 419, 420—right of, vested in the Church, 420—scriptural ordination defined, 444. See Orders.

Ordination of Bishops. See Choice of Bishops, Ordination.

Origen, on the Scriptures, and tradition, 48—on Matt. xvi. 18, 54—heretical opinion of, 85—denied purgatory, 86—on the comparison of the eucharist with manna, 96—on the doctrine of spiritual manducation, 151—transubstantiation not the mystery of the early Church, 162—testimony of, against that doctrine, 165—on the duration of purgatory, 243—his fire of purgation, 265—his testimony, with regard to purgatory, 268—on the office of exorcist, 416—by no means free from error, 476—on Peter's visit to Rome, 497—some of his works condemned, 557—on the confession of Christ, 610—gave no high title to Peter, 616

Ossory, Bishop of, on masses for the dead, 296

Oswald, Bishop of York, his directions, with regard to extreme unction, 379

Otho, Frising, doctrine of a purgatory, unscriptural, 247—and novel, 281—rejected the dogma of Papal supremacy, 599

Oxford, University of, memorial of the, to the Council of Constance, on clerical abuses, 733

P

Pacianus, on the term "Catholic," applied to the Church, 488, 489

Pagan celibacy, when it infected the Church, 743

Paine, Thomas, not a greater enemy to Scripture than Popery, 30

Paley, Archdeacon, his remark upon the woman caught in adultery, 435

Palinurus, the ghost of, mentioned, 261

Pallium, source of great wealth to the Papacy, 325—Bishop of York, mentioned, 664—Gregory I., his enactment in regard to it, 664

Papacy, the, restrictions imposed upon the Scriptures, 9—character of these restrictions, 24—its resemblance to Socinianism, 28—charges of, against the correctness of the Protestant Scriptures, 33—antiscriptural character of the Papacy, 770

Paphnutius, strenuously opposed the celibacy of the Clergy, 716, 731—his protest in the Synod of Nice, 742

Papias, quoted, on oral tradition, 40—inculcated the doctrine of the millennium, 41—heretical notions of, 85—supposed Peter to have been at Rome, 632—his writings worthy of small credence, and why, 632—is the chief evidence the Papacy has in favour of Peter's residence in Rome, 632

Papist, his rule of faith described, 13—his substitute for real faith, 15—his curious distinctions concerning the nature of faith, 15—the boasted certainty of, exploded, 15—has no certain rule of faith, 17—various opinions among them on the subject of reading the Scriptures, 21—is chargeable with opposition to the word of God, 25—assertion, that the reading of the Bible leads to destruction, fanaticism, and heresy, considered, 26, 27—sophistical mode of treating an argument, 173—shown to be an idolator as much as the Heathen, 187—no sooner makes his god, than he eats him, 188—his plea against the charge of idolatry, noticed, 188—the excuse of "good intention," proved to be absurd, 189—the most fit term to denote a Romanist, 493—Baronius quoted, 493

Pardon of sin, Scripture doctrine of, opposed to that of Rome, 228, et seq.

Paris, Matthew, relates the tale of Enus, 282—and of Thurcal, 282—on the proceedings of the fourth Lateran Council, 562—his account of the price of a pallium, 664

Parishes, on the formation of, 413

Pascal, Blaise, his exposure of the principles of the Jesuits, 233, et seq.—his intolerance toward Protestants, 536

Paschal II. deprived Henry IV., and excited his enemies against him, 600

Paschasius, on the doctrine of the real presence, noticed, 169—the question of Stercorianism, 169

Passover, the, answers to the Lord's supper in the new covenant, 138

Pastor, the office of, 411—a Popish Bishop is no Pastor, and why, 551—Pastors, the only proper representative of a church in a Council, 551—office of, 627—in what sense are successors of the Apostles, 627

Path to Paradise, a Popish book of devotion, its immoral tendency, 211

Patriarchs, institution of, 413—division of the Church into, 639—authority of each equal, 639—power and office, 656—presided over the second General Council, 671

Patrick, Bishop Simon, on the folly of making antiquity a test of truth, 504

———, St., is invoked according to his merits, 757

Paul III. sanctions the order of Jesuits, 484—excommunicates Henry VIII. of England, 601, 663—seeks to prove his infallibility from Scripture, 702

—— IV. declared his temporal authority to be of divine right, 708

—— V. perplexed with the disputes concerning the immaculate conception, 472

——, the Apostle, on the institution of the sacrament, 97—language more eulogistic of him, among the Fathers, than of Peter, 616—is often united with the latter, 616—his behaviour towards Peter argues no subjection, 625—is silent on the subject of Peter being at Rome, 632—more reasons why he should have been Bishop of Rome in preference to Peter, 636

Payne, Prebendary, on the sacrifice of the mass, 173

Pazzueto, said to be a highway to purgatory, 281

Peace, kiss of, why given in confirmation, 130
Pearson, Bishop, application of the term "Catholic," 488—on the successor of Peter, 497
Peckham, Archbishop of Canterbury, duration of purgatorial punishment, 244
Pelagius II., who may convene a Council, 552—asserted his prerogative of confirming Councils, 672—required all appeals being made to Rome, 687
Penal sufferings, unscriptural views of the Papacy, concerning, 260 Penance, the grace conferred in the sacrament of, 104—remarks upon this Romish sacrament, 193, 225—canon of the Tridentine Council, 193, 225—four branches of this sacrament, 193, et seq.—absolution considered, 193—penance said to be satisfying to God, 224—meaning of the term, 224—kinds and degrees of, 235—cruel character of Romish penance, 237—for voluntary drunkenness, 237—Du Pin quoted, 238—public penance rarely practised, and why, 238. See Absolution.
Penitence, required in an adult for baptism, 116
Pentecost, why confirmation administered at, 130
Pepin, his history, 665—sends Ambassadors to Zachary, the Pope, 665—the answer returned, 665—deposes Childerick, 666—usurps his throne, 666—his conduct confirmed by Stephen II., 666—comes to the help of Stephen II., defeats his enemy, whom he compels to cede to the Papacy, cities, &c., 666 Perpetua, has a view of purgatory, 282, et seq.
Persecution, spirit of, in the Church of Rome, seen in her schemes to convert mankind, 120
Persecutors, unhappy end of, a mark of the true Church, noticed, 543
Peter, St., prerogatives of, do not descend to his successors, 495—fabulous accounts of his residence at Rome, 497—Origen and Tertullian referred to, 497—great uncertainty connected with his successor, 497—possessed no primacy over the rest of the Apostles, 608—why some precedence might be granted to him, 609—the keys given to others as well as to him, 612—his priority in the enumeration of the Apostles, noticed, 614—prerogatives of Peter, referred to, 615—possessed no prerogatives which other Apostles had not, 623—no intimation of superior power in the Epistles of Peter, 623—Paul's behaviour to him argues no subjection, 625—what primacy he possessed, it was not transmissible, 626—his primacy grounded on personal qualities, 626—apostleship not successive, 626—the question, "Was Peter ever at Rome?" considered, 630, et seq.—can only be ascertained by tradition, 631—St. Paul is silent on the subject of Peter having been at Rome, 632, et seq.—the traditionary accounts on this subject are contrary to Scripture, and inconsistent, 633—was Peter Bishop of Rome, considered, 633—his supposed continuance there cannot be ascertained, 632, 634—his asserted residence at Antioch as Bishop, 633, et seq.—office of an Apostle incompatible with that of Bishop, 635—by whom was he made Bishop of Rome, 636—if he were, certain ecclesiastical rules were violated, 636—the authority which made Peter, would also have made Paul, a Bishop, 636—stronger reasons in favour of Paul being Bishop of Rome than Peter, 636—did Peter continue Bishop, 637—statements of ecclesiastical writers, 637—is invoked in prayer according to his merits, 757
Peter, Abbot of Clugny, on the false miracles of the Papacy, 542
—— Damian, Bishop of Ostea, taught the worship of the Virgin, 762
—— à Joseph, on the doctrine of attrition, 217
—— Lombard, transubstantiation little understood in his day, 170—on the office of Reader, 416—of Acolyte, 416—denied the sacramental character of matrimony, 427—invocation of saints, not an article of faith in his day, 511
—— Martyr, on the true, essential succession, 501 —— Possinus, corrupted Chrysostom's writings to support the dogma of the supremacy, 620
Petrarch, on the fraudulent character of indulgences, 314
Petrus Cluniac, on the folly of worshipping that which may be eaten, 145
——— de Marca, on the application of the term "apostolic," 617—detects corruption in the epistles of Leo I. to support the dogma of supremacy, 621—did not consider Peter superior to the other Apostles, 623
Philopater, Andrew, a name assumed by the Jesuit Cresswell, 487
Philosophy, Heathen, doctrines of, called traditions, 37
Phocas, ratifies the title of "Universal Bishop" to Boniface III., 665—the abandoned character of that Prince, 665
Picart, Bernard, on the Jewish law of divorce, 436
Picture-worship, its ridiculous support from the poet Thomas Moore, 258
Pighius, Albert, his "De Hierarchia" quoted on the character of the word of God, 21—on the infallibility of Rome, 62—his low views of morality, 232—on the authority of the Church, 544—on the infallibility of the Pope, opposed to that of a Council, 586—on the origin of Councils, 594—speaks blasphemously of Christ, to support the pretensions of the Papacy, 621—on the superiority of Popes to Councils, 695—on the infallibility of the Pope, 700
Pinytus, Bishop of Gnossus, advocated the law of celibacy, 741
Pious frauds, the fit character of indulgences, 315
Pisa, Council of, deeply interested in the great western schism of the Church, 459—was convened by Cardinals, 570, 671—deposed the contending Pontiffs, 570—proceedings of the Synod acknowledged by some, and rejected by others, 570—Dr. Grier quoted, 570—rejected the absolute supremacy of the Pope, 605
Pius II. had Protestant views of the eucharist, 147—on convening a Council, 552—asserted the right of convening Synods, 669—recognises in the Pope the fountain of jurisdiction, 678—condemned appeals being made to any but himself, 687—considered the Pope superior to a Council, 696—opposed the celibacy of the priesthood, 737
—— IV., his Creed, so called, 2—frames an Index Expurgatorius, 5
—— V., his scheme with regard to the Greek Testament, abortive, 35—indulgences which he repealed, 338—excommunicates Elizabeth, Queen of England, 601, 663, 702—attempts to prove his infallibility from Scripture, 702—declared his temporal authority to be divine in its origin, 708
—— VII., his Bull against Bible Societies, 19—against the circulation of the Scriptures in the Irish schools, 20—his grant of indulgences in favour of a Popish chapel at Cork, 344
Placebo, a, described, 293
Placidia aided the assumption of Papal authority, 663
Platina, on purgatory in the eleventh century, 283—the fraudulent character of indulgences, 315—on the immediate successor of Peter, 498
Plato, recognition of purgatory in his Philosophy, 261
Pœnitentiale Romanum, quoted, 363
Pole, Cardinal, opposed Anthony Marinarus in the Council of Trent on the subject of tradition, 42
Political unity, descriptive of the Church of Rome, 456
Polycarp, on the doctrine of purgatory, 167—knew nothing of extreme unction, 388
Polydore Virgil, on the novelty of purgatory, 264—viewed it as unknown in the primitive church, 274—on the rise of indulgences, 314, 510—ascribes the origin of tax-tables to John XXII., 364
Pontifex Maximus, a title assumed by the Pope, noticed, 620—by whom employed, 620

Pontifical, the, of high authority, 1—described, 6

Pope, the, remarks on his infallibility, 5—instances in which Popes have contradicted Popes, 67—many have been heretics, 67—guilty of simony, 67—unskilled in divinity, 67—Popes have excommunicated one another, 67—awful immorality of, 67, et seq.—adulation of, a proof of the want of infallibility, 70—ludicrous character of, as infallible Judge, 39—grants a dispensation for marriage to Henry VIII, 439—many of them abandoned characters, 481—remarks of the succession of, 496, et seq.—St. Peter's chair often vacant, 498—schisms among Pontiffs fatal to the theory of apostolical succession, 498—likewise heresy and immorality, 498—election of, regulated by the third Lateran Council, 558—is he above a Council, considered, 582—titles imposed upon him, 615—said to be Peter's successor, examined, 618—the term "Pope" considered, its history, &c., 619—Baronius and Bingham quoted, 619—appropriated exclusively by Hildebrand, 619—arrogant claims of, 622—if some prerogatives of Peter pertained to the Pontiff, why not all? 626—cannot be a successor of Peter, and why, 627—terms Peter and Paul his predecessors, 638—if Peter had the supremacy, this no reason that the Pope should possess it, 640—election of, by the whole Church inconsistent with the idea of supremacy, 641—his jurisdiction during the time of Constantine, 656—reasons why a Pope ought not to preside at a Council, 672—in early days he yielded to the judgment of his colleagues, 676—and considered subject to the laws of the Church, 676—his mandates not universally admitted, 677—if he assumed more than the canons allowed, it was usurpation, 685—examples cited, 685—cases in which a Pope may be deposed, 697—have contradicted each other, 702—Popes have made wicked and impious decrees, 703—have decided contrary to Scripture, 704—have taught heresy, 704—have given foolish and ignorant decisions, 704—in what sense the Pope may be a heretic, 705. See Prerogatives.

Pope, Rev. R. T., his discussion with Maguire, on the infallibility of the Church, quoted, 62—exposes numerous corruptions and misquotations of the Fathers, 79—on difficulties attending the study of those authorities, 79

Porta, John Baptist, ludicrous account of his "divine powders," 531

Porter, the, of the minor orders of priesthood, 397—matter and form of the order, his duties, 397—Catechism of Trent quoted, 398—D'Espence on this office, 416—form of degradation, 422

Poverty, vow of, taken by Monks, hypocritical and false, 744—regulations concerning it, 744

Power, natural tendency of, 661

———, of priesthood, stated, 395

Poynter, Dr., gives evidence, that no notes on the Scriptures have received the approval of the Vatican, 35

Præmunire, statute of, why enacted, 691

Pragmatic sanction, referred to, 402

Prayer, a work of satisfaction, 235, 236

Praying for the dead, considered in connexion with purgatory, 274—by whom taught, 274—the often-quoted passage in Maccabees noticed, 274—origin of the custom, 274—subject of the prayer, 275—Monica referred to, 277—was early practised in the Church, 277—recognised in several Liturgies, 277—the ground on which prayer was offered, 278—extracts from Liturgies, 278—object of such prayers, 279—prayer for the dead had no reference to souls in purgatory, 279—nature of those offered for Constantine, 279—uselessness of the dogma, 280—is utterly independent of purgatory, 210—the charge of the Papacy, that Protestants recognise praying for the dead, examined, 287, et seq.—nature of such petitions, 287—not openly condemned by the English Church, and why, 289—Romanist arguments in favour of, 290—refuted, 291—how and when employed in the ancient church, 518

Preaching, Popish Prelates destitute of qualifications, 404—the Rhemish Annotators quoted, 404—violent debates on this subject at the Synod of Trent, 404, et seq.

Precedency, nature of that which obtained in the early Church, 652

Prerogatives of the Pope, enumerated by Antoninus, 668—the following are defined, convocation of Councils, 668, et seq.—presiding over Councils, 671, et seq.—confirming Councils, 672, et seq.—sanctioning, abrogating, or dispensing with law, 675, et seq.—the fountain of jurisdiction, 677, et seq.—absolute jurisdiction over the Clergy, 678, et seq.—the choice, ordination, and confirmation of Bishops, 679, et seq.—the deposition, &c., of Bishops, 683, et seq.—the restoration of Bishops, 686, et seq.—receiving appeals, 687, et seq.—irresponsibility of the Pope, 692, et seq.—decision of controversy, 694—superior to Councils, 694—Papal infallibility, 698, et seq.—power over the civil Magistrate, &c., 706, et seq.—a temporal Prince in his own dominions, 713, et seq.

Prescription, the argument of, considered, 61, 407—in favour of the doctrine of seven sacraments, 95

President, described, 413

———, of Councils, claimed as a prerogative of the Pontiff, 671—authorities adduced, 671—no authority for this in Scripture, 671—or in the first General Councils, 671—import of the term "presidency," 672—reasons why a Pope ought not to preside, 672—authorities quoted, 353—Popes did not preside in the early Synods, 353—Dr. Isaac Barrow quoted, 353—claims of the Papacy, destitute of foundation, 554

Prideaux, Dean, on the immediate successors of Peter, 498

Prierius, on the authority of the Church, 544

Priest, the, one of the greater orders, 400 — term comprehensive, 400 — different degrees of, 400—ceremonies observed at his ordination, 400—his functions, 400—opinions concerning the matter and form of the Presbyterate, 401—form of degrading, 422—attended Councils in the early Church, 551. See Episcopate.

Priesthood, Roman, hostility to the circulation of the word of God, 21, 22—refuse to circulate the Douay Bible, 25—by the confessional, the heart of a Priest, the receptacle of all the filth of his parish, 210. See Priest.

Priests, Romish, their blasphemy with regard to the Duke of Brunswick, 16—a few approve of the circulation of the Scriptures, 22—exceedingly corrupt previous to the Reformation, 40

Primacy, different kinds of, 608—personal worth and external reputation, 608, 609—and of order, 609

Primate, institution of, 654

Primates, established, 413

Prince, the Pope a temporal, 713—said to have Scripture authority and warrant, 713—rejected as such by the early Church, 620

Princeps Apostolorum, a term how far applicable to Peter, 614

Principes Ecclesiæ, title assumed by the Bishops of Rome, 618—authorities cited, 618

Private judgment, doctrine of, stated and defended, 14—how to be employed, 14—abuse of it specified and guarded against, 14—objections to its exercise answered, 14, 15—Papists compelled to resort to it, 14—its exercise recommended by Dr. Wiseman, 14—remarks on his important admission, 15—Dr. Wiseman and Dr. Milner at variance on this point, 15—the right, prostrated by the Papacy, on the subject of Scripture reading, 25—beneficial effects of, when used with caution, 74—the Rev. J. Young quoted, on the inalienable right of, 75

Procession of the Holy Ghost, discussed at the second Council of Lyons, 569

Processional, the Roman, attribute the giving of the keys to other than Peter, 613
Proconsul, defined, 413
Profession of faith, a ceremony accompanying baptism, 125
Prophetic light, a mark of the Church, noticed, 543
Prophets, office of, 411
Propitiatory, a term not found in the Douay Catechism, 173
Propositions, the six, of the French Church, noticed, 606
Prosper, Marchand, referred to, on the Roman Taxæ, 362
————, terms Augustine, "most blessed Pope," 620
Prostitutes, large number at Constance, during the sittings of the Council, 591
Protestant, the, view of the sacred Scriptures, 9—his rule of faith described, 12–14—the boasted doubt and uncertainty of, exploded, 15—and Romish rule of faith, compared, 91—meaning of the term sacrament, 94—view of the doctrine of the eucharist, 138—charged by the Papist with sanctioning prayers for the dead, 287—Protestant Church did not openly condemn the practice of praying for the dead, and why, 289—on marriages of Roman Catholics solemnized by Protestants, 438—the general concord existing among them, 475—possess the unity of the Spirit, 477—Protestant unity defined, 477
Protestantism, not productive of Socinianism, 27—divisions among, not attributable to Scripture reading, 28—mode of healing divisions, 29—not indebted to Rome for the preservation of the Scripture, 33—her rule of faith, 36—receives some doctrines on the authority of tradition, why not others, 43—sentiments of, not condemned by the Fathers, 164—missions of, have not the attestation of miracles, 542,—influence of, on the morals of the Romish priesthood, 737
Provincial Synod, defined, 550
Provisors, why instituted, 691
Prudentius, on the state of departed spirits, 86—on the folly of making antiquity a test of truth, 504
Psalter of the Virgin, quoted, 764, et seq.
Pullus, Cardinal, recommends the whip as penance, 235
Punishment, of sin, said to be remitted in baptism, 123—of purgatory, 244
Purcell, Dr., Bishop of Cincinnati, advocates the universal distribution of the Scriptures, 22
Purgatorian Societies, of Ireland, described, 299—rules pertaining to, 299, 300—on, in London, noticed, 330—their swindling character described by M'Gavin, 300, et seq.—numerous kindred institutions designated, 301
Purgatory, not held by the Fathers, 86—and by what Councils, 86—principle of the doctrine, 234—the doctrine stated, 240—reason said to be in its favour, 242—various authorities quoted, 242—description of, loose and indefinite 242—punishments of purgatory, 244—efficacy of masses for souls detained in, 244—a channel for conveying grace, 245—souls in, assured of salvation, 245—who have no need of purgatory, 245—souls confined, neither merit nor sin, 246—an article of faith, 246—character of those detained, 246—doctrine of, unscriptural, 246—authorities adduced, 247—reputed origin of the doctrine examined, 247—connexion of, with the history of Judas Maccabeus, examined, 247, et seq.—Scripture testimonies favourable to, considered, 249, et seq.—Matt. v. 25, 26 explained, 248, et seq.—for whom is purgatory prepared, 251—Matt. xii. 32 considered, 251—1 Cor. iii. 10—15 adduced, 253—its utter inapplicability to purgatory, 254, et seq.—1 Peter iii. 18—20 noticed, 256—has no reference to purgatory, 257—Rev. xxi. 27 examined, 258—few passages of Scripture in favour of the dogma, and why, 259—the ground on which Bishop Hay supports it, 260—that on which the Papacy defends it is disputable and dubious, 260, et seq.—recognised in the philosophy of Plato, 261—its heathen origin, 262—the Scripture decidedly against the doctrine, 262, 266—dishonourable to God, 264—Papists urge the testimony of the Fathers, 264—notion triumphantly refuted, 264—on the novelty of the doctrine, 264—Fathers prayed not for deliverance out of purgatory, 265—not connected with the doctrine of praying for the dead, 265—not considered by the Fathers an article of faith, 265—testimony of the Fathers against the doctrine, 266—considered by many Roman Catholics a doctrine unknown in the primitive church, 274, 517—opinions of the Greek Church on, 274—praying for the dead considered in connexion with purgatory, 274—on the state of the soul between death and the resurrection, 279—views of Epiphanius on the subject, 280—the origin, progress, and establishment of purgatory considered, 281, et seq.—unknown in the Apostles' day, 281—way to purgatory said to be discovered, 281—remarks of Mosheim, 281—a source of gain to the Priests, 281—its absurdities and evil consequences, 281—said to be proved by the apparition of Jerome, 281—visionary punishments of, 283—site of purgatory considered, 284—nature of its inflictions, 284—its duration, 284—souls, how assisted in, 285—absurdity of this, 285—superstitious observances connected with, 292, et seq.—has ministered to the rapacity and avarice of the priesthood, 294, et seq.—miserable condition of the poor, 296—tricks of the Papacy to maintain the doctrine, 297—ceremonies of All-Souls' Day with regard to, 297—encourages the merchandise of souls, 302—several instances adduced, 302—is awfully deluding the people, 304—a grievous falsehood, and pernicious to souls, 304—connects itself with all the corruptions of Popery, 304—opinion of Bishop Latimer, 305—is opposed to Scripture and the attributes of the Deity, 305, et seq.—variations in the Church of Rome concerning, 511, 517
Pyx, or tabernacle, described, 134

Q

Quarterly Review, the, on a Purgatorian Society in London, 300
Quesnel, Paschasius, his views of the Scripture condemned, 21, 474—character of his New Testament, 473—which is repudiated in a series of propositions, 474
Quinisext Council, why so termed, 557—object contemplated, 557—Dr. Grier quoted, 557—not one of the novelties of Popery can be discovered in their proceedings, 557—separated persons lawfully married, on charge of heresy, 591—condemned the compulsory celibacy of the Clergy, 705
Quito, Bishop of, his inveterate hostility to the Bible, 23

R

Rabanus, Archbishop of Mentz, his writings corrupted by Steuartius, 78—on the doctrine of spiritual manducation, 153—on the doctrine of the real presence, 169
Reader, the, among the minor orders, duties of, 398—Peter Lombard opposed to this, as a distinct office, 416—form of degradation, 422
Real presence, a phrase, adopted to aid the Papacy out of difficulty, explained, 138—doctrine of, introduced at the second Council of Nice, 168—the controversy of the ninth century noticed, 168—unsettled state of the Church respecting, 170
Reason, shows that Christ must be the Author of the sacraments, 97—transubstantiation contradictory to, 139, 142—opposed to the Popish doctrine of human satisfaction, 238, et seq.—said to be in favour of purgatory, 242
Rebellion, not the offspring of Scripture reading, 29
Receiving appeals, a prerogative claimed by the Pope, 687—authority cited, 687—primitive church against it, and ancient customs and canons oppose it, 687, et seq.

—the final resort was to Synods and Primates, 683—cases referred to, 688—the Popes were opposed in this claim, 688—examples adduced, 688—early Fathers strenuously objected, 689—the canons of Sardica considered, 689, et seq.—ground on which the right was formerly claimed, destroys its validity, 690—the case of Zosimus, 690—this prerogative claimed as a divine right, 690—appeals not always made to the Pope, 690—instances enumerated, 690—states have enacted laws against this power, 691—anciently there were no appeals, 691—those of recent date do not establish the right, 691—others adduced which do not establish the practice, 691. See Appeals.

Recognitions, Clementine, speak as highly of James as of Peter, 616

Reformation, the, expedited by the sale of indulgences, 323—oppressive state of the Church anterior to, 324—rise and character of Luther, 329—history of its commencement, 329, et seq.—advanced by the Pope granting a dispensation permitting Henry VIII. to marry his brother's widow, 440—licentious character of the monasteries at that period, 748

————, of the Clergy, recommended by the second Council of Lyons, 569—that of Vienne, 569—for this purpose the Synod of Constance sat, but nothing was effected, 571—proceedings of the Tridentine Synod inoperative and useless, 579

Regalia, Petri, defined, 607

Reginaldus, on the doctrine of repentance, 220

Regulatus, a fanatical self-flagellant, 236

Relics, exhibited at Seville on the day of Corpus Christi, 191—how they are to be honoured, 753

Religious orders, instituted, and for what purpose, 558

Rembert, St., Archbishop of Hamburg, an instance of the sacrament of extreme unction being repeated, 379

Remission, of the sin and punishment, taught as an effect of baptism, 123—not in any way connected with the doctrine of extreme unction, 385

Renunciation, a ceremony accompanying baptism, 125

Repentance, erroneous notions of, taught by the Papacy, 219, et seq.—when it should take place, 220—Cajetan and others say at the hour of death, 220—various opinions stated, 220—immoral tendency of the Romish doctrine of repentance, 221—meaning of the term, 225

Requiem, a, described, 293

Resbury, Dr., examination of the miracles of the Roman Church, 523, et seq.

Reserved cases, defined, 208

Restoration of Bishops, a prerogative claimed by the Pope, 686—authority adduced, 686—it was not conceded by any canon or Synod of the early church, 686—apostolical canons forbade communion with the condemned, 687—Popes opposed for receiving such, 687—examples cited, 687

Rhemish Testament, quoted on 2 Tim. iii. 16, 8—the history of this translation, 34—contains shameful mistranslations of plain passages of Scripture, 34—admits the comparative novelty of the doctrine of extreme unction, 388—on the sacramental character of matrimony, 427—on the expression, "Forbidding to marry," 723

Ribadineira, great doubts rest on his narrative, 601

Ricci, De, Bishop of Pistoia, history of, 749

Richardson, Rev. James, on miraculous pictures of the Virgin, 540

Ritual, the, of high authority, 1—described, 6—early, contained prayer for the dead, 277—the form of extreme unction, 376—manner of its administration, 379—on the sepulture of the dead, 381

Robertson, William, D.D., on the origin of the Reformation, 323—the sale of benefices by the agents of the Pope, 325

Rock, various significations of the word, 54, et seq.—how far applicable to Christ, 56, 612—an ample examination of this term, 610, et seq.—illustration of the expression, 611—Dr. Hopkins quoted, 611, 612

——, Daniel, D.D., quoted on the burning light used in baptism, 126—purgatory a channel for conveying grace, 245—description of the Acolyte, 398

Roman Council, under Nicholas II., confirms the doctrine of transubstantiation, 591—Bellarmine quoted, 591—enjoins the celibacy of the Clergy, 705

Rome, scarcity of the Bible in, 23—superstitious object of pilgrimages to, 354—"Rome in the nineteenth Century," quoted on the evil tendency of indulgences, 361—remarks on the first planting of Christianity there, 496—fables concerning Peter, and his residence in that city, 497—was Peter ever at Rome, considered, 630, et seq.—was he Bishop there, 630—did he found the Church in this city, 630—was James Bishop of Rome, considered, 637

——, the Church of, objects to all discussion on religious subjects, 15—doctrine of, on the promiscuous reading of the holy Scriptures, 19—restrictions imposed on their perusal, 24—refuses to allow the right of her people to exercise their own judgment on the Scriptures, 25—not able to root out heresy, 27—is productive of Socinianism, and how, 27—mode of healing divisions, 29—numerous divisions of, 29—harmonizes with infidelity, 30—did not preserve the Scriptures, 33—restricts the reading of the Scripture to those copies which contain notes approved by her communion, 34—no notes have been formally approved, 34—difficulty in ascertaining the truth according to the Popish plan, 35—exceedingly corrupt previous to the Reformation, 40—uncertainty in her mode of explaining oral tradition, 40—has not been preserved from controversy by the doctrine of tradition, 41—seriously divided on the subject of infallibility, 66—as demoralized as her Councils, 69—the errors of, a proof of want of infallibility, 70—how far she values the Fathers, 75—reason why she has corrupted them, 85—guilty of altering the sacraments, 95—tolerates the ministration of wicked men, 97–99, 103—her doctrine of intention stated, 100, et seq.—assumed subjection of all the baptized to the Church of Rome, considered, 118—her schemes for converting mankind, 120—teaches the damnation of all unbaptized children, 122—unscriptural character of her doctrine on baptism, 123—contradictory views of the necessity of confirmation, 129—her doctrine of transubstantiation, refuted by Scripture, 135, et seq.—her interpretation of the words used in the institution of the eucharist absurd and contradictory, 135—her doctrine of priestly absolution examined and confuted, 193–198—revolting doctrines taught and practised at the confessional, 209—erroneous notions of repentance taught by, 219—miserable state of the poor who cannot pay for masses to extricate from purgatory, 296—its oppressive character anterior to the Reformation, 324—her objection to the doctrine of justification by faith, considered, 360—arrogancy of, with regard to marriage, 434—her wealth in granting dispensations for marriage, 437—has no just views of the church of Christ, 448—her professed unity considered, 453—fearful animosities have disturbed her, 459, et seq.—the Western schism, 459—her doctrines necessarily lead to schism, 475—vitiates every article of the Apostles' Creed, 480—her morality favourable to the committal of sin, 481—the Decalogue systematically broken, 481—awfully corrupt, both in the head and members, 481–487—impious and absurd to call her Catholic, 492—reasons to show that she has no claim to the title, 492—the nature of that apostolical succession which she demands, 493—her claims satisfactorily refuted, 495, et seq.—has none of the prerogatives of Peter, 495—

defective in apostolic character, 496 — is destitute of personal and local succession, 496—line of succession in the Church of Rome involved in obscurity, 496—remarks on the first planting of Christianity there, 496—her succession greatly interrupted, 498—vacancies in the Popedom enumerated, 498—what she claims may be challenged in behalf of other churches, 500—acknowledges deviations from purity, 505—progress of corruption in the Church, 506—marks of Bellarmine shown in the errors of Rome, 506—the Papal hierarchy tried by the test of duration, 508, et seq.—what she hath held, and doth now hold, 510–512—amplitude a mark of the Church, considered, 512—number of Romanists comparatively few, 512—is destitute of the mark, agreement in doctrine, 515, et seq.—efficacy of doctrine, 519, et seq.—Romish Missions adduced, 521—miracles, a mark of the Church, 522, et seq.—those of the Church of Rome contrasted with those of Scripture, 523, et seq.—wonder-working no sign of a true church, 525—other notes adverted to, 543—recognises eighteen General Councils, 580—speaks blasphemously of Christ to support her own pretensions, 621—Peter did not found the Church in Rome, 633—reason for this assertion, 633, et seq.—appropriated various titles of distinction to herself, 635—vacancies in the Popedom prove that the church may exist without a Pope, 641—the Church of Rome is idolatrous, 769—her antiscriptural character, 770—the antidote to her evils, 770

Romish traditions, parallel between, and those of the Jews, 37—their character, 38. See Tradition.

Ruadanus, St., his absurd miracles, 524

Ruffinus, on the successor of Peter, 497—terms Chromatius, Pontifex Maximus, 620—is silent on the supremacy, 643

Rule of faith, Papist, diversity of opinion where an infallible oracle rests, 88—Romish rule of faith, a source of uncertainty, 88—and why, 88—impracticable in its application, 89—proved deficient by the liberties which are taken with the word of God, 89—means employed to maintain this rule, a mark of defectiveness, 89—opposed to Scripture, and to the Spirit of Christianity, 89—subversive of faith and religion, and productive of infidelity, 89—ever varying and fluctuating, 90—requires all men to be infallible, 90—never established by Christ, 90—compared with the Protestant rule, 90—Rev. John Henderson quoted, 90—contests in the Papacy concerning, 457—leads to schism, 475

Rule of faith, Protestant, what constitutes that of the Papist, 13, 73 — compared with the Romish, 13, 73—and that of the primitive Christians, 14—Romanist objections to the Bible as the only rule of faith, answered, 16—he has no certain rule of faith, 17—how the Scriptures are a rule of faith, 17, 18—as held by the Papacy, and by the Protestants, 36—of Papists and Protestants compared, 88, et seq.—Rev. John Henderson quoted, 90

S

Sa, Emmanuel, the Jesuit, encouraged fornication, 233, 234—his sentiments with regard to high treason, 287

Sabbath, Christian, how far received by Protestants on the authority of tradition, 44

Sacramental seal, described, 209

Sacraments, Creed of Pius IV. quoted, 91—Council of Florence, 91—canons and decrees of Trent, 92—glaring deficiency of the latter, 92—name, nature, and definition of a sacrament, 93—Roman Catholic meaning of the term, 93, 94—Protestant meaning of the term, 94—that held by the Socinian, 94—where Protestants and Romanists differ on this question, 94—Gerhard quoted on the doctrine of, 94—necessity of the institution of, 94—erroneous views of their necessity as held by the Papists, 94—matter and form of a sacrament, 94—question whether an alteration in the matter and form destroys the sacrament, 95—number and order of, 95—argument of prescription, 95—Popish view of the relative excellency of the sacraments, 96, 104—three leading properties of a sacrament described, 96—their author, 96—the administrator, 97—the person, faith, and sanctity of the Minister, 97—on the ministration of wicked men, 98, 99—intention of the administrator considered, 100—who may receive sacraments, 102—the disposition necessary to the validity of a sacrament, 103—effects of sacraments considered, 103, et seq.—what graces sacraments confer, 104—such notions opposed to Scripture, 106—character and effect of, considered, 106, et seq.—why some cannot be reiterated, 108—Romish doctrine of the sacraments anti-scriptural and dangerous, 109–111—how Romanists prove confirmation to be a sacrament, 128—signification of the term sacramentum, 430—Rev. Richard Watson on the character of the Romish sacraments, 433—apostolic sacraments defined, 444—mode of administration source of strife between the Jesuits and Jansenists, 472—variations in the Papacy with regard to, 511

Sacred heart of Mary, litany of the, 758

Sacrifice, the wicked absurdity of terming the mass a sacrifice, 176 et seq.—why the ancient church termed the eucharist a sacrifice, 178—the daily offering of Christ, in the mass, contradictory and absurd, 179—the folly of an unbloody offering, 179

Safe-conduct, granted by Sigismund to Huss, 571—Dr. Murray's account of it shown to be at variance with the acts of the Synod of Constance, 572—nature of the document examined, 572

Saints, state of, between death and the resurrection, 279—meaning of the term, 444

——, worship of, unknown in the primitive church, 518—the doctrine stated, with authorities, 753—honour that is due only to God is given to them, 754—awful blasphemy connected with this idolatry, 755—declaration of the Vicars Apostolic quoted, 755—what saints are to be worshipped, 755—Ferraris adduced, 755—the kind of worship presented, 756—various degrees noticed, 756—examples of this species of idolatry, 756, et seq.—examples of saints being invoked according to their merits, 757—litany of the saints, 758—ascriptions of praise presented to the saints, 759—as it exists in Rome, 761—arguments of the Romanists in favour of this idolatry, examined and refuted, 766, et seq.—the false position of Bishop Milner exposed, 768—the practice leads to gross idolatry, 768—arguments against it stated, 769—is opposed to the word of God, 769—the moral impossibility of the saints successfully interceding, 769—and why, 769

Salamanca, University of, on the temporal power of the Pope, 603

Salmeron, the Jesuit, on the sacrifice of the mass, 178—defends the practice of half-communion, 185—on the immaculate conception, 516

Salt, used in Romish baptism, and why, 124

Sanchez, on the principles of the Jesuits, 233

Sanctity, a mark of the Church, defined, 479—peculiar to the Christian community, 479—Bellarmine cited, 479—Dr. Scott quoted, 479—Dr. Chaloner on the holiness of the Church of Rome, 480—the Papacy has vitiated every article of the Apostles' Creed, 480—her morality leads to iniquity, 481—tramples upon the Decalogue, 481—morals of this Church awfully depraved, 481—testimony of Gerhard to this state, 481—people fearfully corrupt, 487—Gerhard quoted, 487

Sanctus, anecdote of, 144

Saracens, wars against them, how supported, 323
Sardica, Synod of, convened on account of the heresy of Arius, 554—Du Pin quoted, 555—Hosius supposed to have presided, 671—sought the confirmation of absent Prelates, 674—canons of, which are supposed to favour appeals to the Pope, considered, 689, et seq.
Sarpi, Paolo, in danger of assassination, 704—on the policy of enacting the compulsory celibacy of the Clergy, 729
Satanic unity, peculiar to the Church of Rome, 456
Satisfaction, theological meaning of the term, 223—how held by the Papacy, 223—Council of Trent quoted, 223—Tridentine Catechism, 224—how proposed to be made by the Papacy, 224—Romish doctrine of, absurd, and without foundation in Scripture, 225—that of human satisfaction unscriptural, 225—human merit unable to satisfy divine justice, 225—on the supposed value of good works, 228—doctrine of mortal and venial sin viewed in connexion with that of satisfaction, 229—Popery teaches that one man may satisfy for another, 230—fallacy thereof, 230—satisfactions imposed by Popery present no check to sin, 235—works of, described, 235—voluntary austerities, 235—testimony of the Fathers on, 237, et seq.—doctrine of human satisfaction opposed to reason, 238, et seq.—the Rev. John Newman quoted, 238
Saturnilus, termed matrimony a doctrine of the devil, 716
Saturninus, the martyr, invoked, 757
Scapulary, indulgence granted to the members of the Order of, 339
Schism, among Pontiffs fatal to the theory of apostolical succession, 498—between Gregory XII. and Benedict XII., 569, et seq.—its devastating consequences, 569, et seq.
Schismatics, who are considered such by the Church of Rome, 448
Schoettgen, on the phrase "to bind and to loose," 57
Scholastic theology, its rise and character, 457—leading Divines of this school mentioned, 457
Scholastica, a saint, is invoked according to her merits, 757
Scotists, origin of the party, 105—disputes with the Thomists, 105, 457
Scotland, Romish Clergy of, fearful licentiousness of the, 733 Scott, Rev. A., P. P., professed to advocate the universal distribution of the Scriptures, 22
——, Dr., his observations on the mark of sanctity quoted, 479
Scottish confession, on the Minister of ordination, 419
Scriptures, sacred, in what manner received by the Papacy, 6—what the Romanist means by the term, 8—defined by the Catechism, 8—decree of the Council of Trent upon the, 8—view of, as entertained by the Protestant, 9—a full and sufficient rule of faith and morals, 10—furnish a plain and clear account of subjects contained in them, 11—how to be read and understood, 14—Romanist objections to the Bible, as the only rule of faith, answered, 16—of little value in the estimation of Bishops Bossuet and Milner, 17—how they are a rule of faith, 17, 18—doctrine of the Church of Rome on their being promiscuously read, 19—Pius VII. forbids them to be circulated in the Irish schools, 20—various opinions of the Papacy on the subject of reading them, 21—scarcity of, in the Brazils, 22—and in Rome, 23—are commanded to be read by all, 23, et seq.—arguments of the Papacy against this considered, 24—the objection, that the Scriptures have been wrested by some to their destruction, considered, 26—and also to fanaticism, 27—the charge, that Scripture reading is productive of heresy, considered, 27—and divisions, 28—insubordination, disloyalty, and rebellion, 29—the instrument in the propagation of the Gospel, 29—are not merely for the edification of the faithful, but the conversion of the Heathen, 30—genuineness and authenticity of, 31—how they have been handed down to posterity, 33—character of the English version defended, 33—not received on the authority of Popish tradition, 43—testimony of the Fathers on the importance of, 44, et seq.—passages in favour of the infallibility of the Church examined, 53, et seq.—their value described by Clement of Alexandria, 80, et seq.—liberties taken with them by the Papacy, 89—plans adopted to restrict the circulation of, 89—professed by Papists in favour of seven sacraments, 95—Christ the author of the sacraments, 96—variation of belief in the Church of Rome with regard to it, 510—reception of, a proof of want of agreement in the Papacy, 515. See Canon.
Secker, Archbishop, on the uncertain and changeable character of oral tradition, 39, 40
Seclusion of Monks, injurious to piety, 745
Secrecy of confession, one of its greatest evils, 208—inculcated by the Councils of Trent and Lateran, 209—the fruitful source of falsehood and perjury, 209
Sects, Christian, have tended to preserve the purity of the Scripture text, 32
Sedes Apostolica, a term not confined to Rome in the early church, 617
Selden, John, on the lax notions entertained by the Jews concerning marriage, 435
Senon, Council of, on the blow upon the cheek in confirmation, 130
Sens, Council of, recognises the canons of the fourth Council of Lateran, 565
Senses, testimony of the, infallible, 140—important in the interpretation of Scripture, 141—if rejected, the evidence of Christianity would be overthrown, 141
Sepulture, instructions concerning, connected with the doctrine of extreme unction, 381—superstitious observances and opinions, 381—to whom the rite should be denied, 381
Serenus, Bishop of Marseilles, his destruction of images noticed, 590
Sergius, Patriarch of Constantinople, is called "Pope" by Sophronius, 619
Sergius III., his gross immorality, 482
Seripand, General of the Augustinians, on the want of preaching qualifications in the prelacy, 405
Seville, ceremonies at, connected with the feast of Corpus Christi, 191
Sharp, Archbishop, referred to, on Matt. xii. 32, 252
Sicily, a highway to purgatory, from, 281
Sidonius, Apollonarius, on the term "Apostolic See," 617
Sienne, Council of, object of, to promote union and extirpate heretics, 573—adjourned to Basil, 573
Sigismund, requests the Synod of Constance to be convened, 570—his treachery has been defended by the Papacy, 572—character of the document which he gave to John Huss, 572—a statement of the case, 573—his treachery exhibited, 69
Sign of the cross, used in baptism, and why, 125—in confirmation, 130—catechism quoted, 130
Simanca, defends the Synod of Constance with regard to Huss, 572—declares that faith is not to be kept with heretics, 572—modern Papists have denied his existence, 572
Simony, Popes fearfully guilty of, 67—simoniacal practices fatal to the theory of apostolical succession, 498
Sin, said to be remitted in baptism, 123—distinction between mortal and venial, stated, 205—immorality of such distinction, 205, 229—Bishop Hay quoted, 229—such distinction opposed both to reason and Scripture, 229—a habit of sin said by the Papacy to be no sin, 231
Siricius, on the term "Apostolic See," 617—enlarged the power of the Vicars of the Pope, 678
Sixtus IV., singular indulgence of, 324—his grant of them, 340—his abandoned character, 483

Sixtus V., his edition of the Vulgate, the errors of, discovered by Clement, 34—claimed the direct temporal power, 464—confirms the Bulls of his predecessors against Elizabeth, 602—and excommunicates Henry of Navarre, and the Prince of Condé, 602
Slaves, compulsory baptism of, noticed, 120
Slevin, Dr., denied the existence of Simanca, Bishop of Badajos, and then doubted it, 572—his Jesuitical exposition of Simanca's principle, that no faith is to be kept with heretics, 572
Socinianism, not the product of Protestantism, 27—its resemblance to Popery exhibited, 28—meaning of the term "sacrament," as held by, 94
Socrates, the historian, on the summoning of the Council of Nice, 669—on the exercise of prelatical power over the Clergy, 679—on the licentiousness of the celibates, 731 — on the protest of Paphnutius, 742—the case of Eustathius, 742
Sodor, Statutes of, on masses for the dead, 296
Solicitants, their infamous character, 211—an evil of the confessional, 211—the Spanish Clergy, deeply involved in the crime, 211—common throughout the Popish hierarchy, 211—repudiated by a German Synod, 211—attempts made to suppress the practice, 212
Sorbonne, University of the, on the temporal power of the Pope, 603
Soto, Petrus a, on the doctrine of repentance, 220—on the purgatorial fire, 256—on the rise of indulgences, 314—considered wicked men members of the Church, 449
Souls, how benefited in purgatory, 285
Southcote, Joanna, her ravings, not the result of Bible reading, 27
Southey, Robert, LL.D., on the miracles of the Papal Church, 536
Sozomen, historian, on the presidency of the second General Council, 671—its ratification, 673—on the licentiousness of the celibates, 731 —on the protest of Paphnutius, 742
Spain, demoralizing influence of indulgences in, 348, et seq.—distracted by disputes concerning the immaculate conception, 472—the state of monasticism in this country, 746, et seq.
Spaulding, Rev. J., on the scarcity of the Bible in the Brazils, 22
Speculative error, absurdity and danger of considering transubstantiation such, 164
Speculum Exemplorum, quoted, 281
Spencer, John, on the Jewish law of divorce, 436
Spirits in prison, phrase explained, 256—has no reference to purgatory, 256
Spittle, how used in baptism, 125
Spondanus, recommends the whip as penance, 235—defends the conduct of Sigismund, with regard to John Huss, 572
Standards, of Romish faith, how constituted and known, 1—doctrines vaguely exhibited, 1—general remarks upon them, 7—often evaded by the Papacy, 7
Staupitz, a warm friend of Luther, 329
Stephen, Bishop, August., first employed the word "transubstantiation," 171
Stephen I. fell into error on the subject of baptism, and was opposed by Cyprian, 465
——— II. flies for aid to Pepin, who defeats his foe, and compels him to cede to the Papacy certain cities, castles, &c., 666
Stercorianism, the question agitated, 169
Steuartius, his corruption of Rabanus, 78
Stillingfleet, Edward, D.D., on the doctrine of indulgences, 313—the various kinds of, explained, 322—on the worship of the primitive Church, 413
St. John Lateran, the high character of this church, 338
St. Peter's, at Rome, erected by the sale of indulgences, 323
Stole, the, described, 176
Stratford, Archbishop, on masses for the dead, 296
Strype, John, on attempts of Romanists to dethrone Elizabeth, 342, 343
Stukeley, Sir Thomas, his attempts in Ireland in favour of the Pope, 342—crucifixes sent to him from Rome with indulgences, 343
Suarez, the Jesuit, on the immaculate conception, 516
Sub-Deacon, one of the greater orders, 399—his duties, 399—ceremonies of consecration, 399—variety of, concerning the matter of the sacrament, 399—letter-carrier to the Bishop, 416—form of degradation, 422
Subjects, of baptism, points on which Protestants and Romanists differ, 115 ———, of confirmation, who they are, 129 — how placed in the Church during the ceremony, 130
———, of the Church, embrace all the baptized, 118
Successor of Peter, a term claimed exclusively by the Papacy, without warrant, 618—authority cited, 618
Summus Sacerdos, title given to all Bishops, 620
Supererogation, work of, inefficiency of, 228
Superior to Councils, claimed as a prerogative of the Pope, 694—Romanists divided on the point, 695 — was debated with great vigour, 696—arguments in favour of the right considered, 696, et seq.—cases in which a Pope may be deposed, 697—progress of this assumption, 698
Supremacy of the Pope, contradictory opinions entertained by Councils, 69—monstrous system inculcated in the Italian school, 464—by whom supported, 464—variation of belief, concerning, 510—difficult to ascertain the real sentiments of the Papacy on the point, 595—some ascribe absolute and universal power, 595—authorities adduced, 596—Dr. Hopkins, on this claim of the Papacy, 598, et seq.—universal and absolute power has been claimed by the Pontiffs, 599, et seq.—was not asserted by the early Bishops, 599—they deposed Kings, &c., 600, et seq.—some Romanists ascribe to the Pope but limited powers, 602, et seq.—opinions of the five Universities cited, 603—the notion of absolute supremacy has been held by all Pontiffs, from Gregory II. to the present, 603—all Romanists hold it, 603—Pontiffs and controvertists have declared it, 603—Gregory XVI. in his encyclical letter, asserts it, 604—those who deny this power, are considered heretics, 604—diversity of opinion on the Papacy, respecting the supreme power, 604, et seq.—general sentiments of the Romish communion stated, 605 — Pontiffs have changed their claims and opinions on this subject often—instances adduced, 606—true sentiments of the Papacy, found in her Creeds and Catechisms, 606—is avowed by every Priest, 607—that all power in spiritual affairs pertains to the Pope, is the doctrine of the Papacy, 607, et seq.—to him belong the regalia Petri, 607—Peter possessed no primacy over the rest of the Apostles, 608, et seq.—different kinds of precedence to be noticed, 608—arguments adduced in proof of this supremacy insufficient, 609—exposition of the Confession of Christ, 611, et seq.—the gift of the keys, &c., 612, et seq.—the phrase, "Feed my sheep," &c., considered, 614 — the priority given to Peter, in the enumeration of the Apostles, said to be in favour of his supremacy, 614, et seq.—is inferred from certain prerogatives granted to Peter, 615—from titles given by the Fathers to Peter, 615, et seq.—but which afford no ground for supremacy, 615—and apply equally to others, 616—titles gave rise to a worldly spirit, 618—the dogma has been supported by corruption, false translation, &c., 620—arguments against the supremacy, 621, et seq.—no mention of the dogma in Scripture, 621—of Peter's institution, 621—no office superior to an Apostle in the early Church, 621—our Lord declared against such assumption, 622—all the Apostles were equal in authority, 622—so considered by the Fathers, 623—no intimation of superior power in the Epistles of Peter, 623—or in the Acts and Apostolic Epistles, 624—in ancient controversies no appeal is made to Peter, 624—the proceedings of the Apostles show no special jurisdiction in Peter, 625—Paul's behaviour to him argues no subjection, 625—whatever primacy Peter possessed, it was not transmissible, and why, 626—no supremacy enjoyed by the Bishops of Rome, 638, et seq.—not by the occupancy of Peter's chair, 638—Romanists assert that the Fathers have confirmed the supremacy of Rome, this refuted, 639, 640—not necessary for the purity of faith and discipline, 640—the assertion that it is held by divine right, unfounded, 640—Romish claims to the supremacy uncertain and false, 640—is destitute of Scripture warrant, 641—not supported by tradition or history, 642, et seq.—it is contrary to the word of God, 644—it turns the Church into a worldly institution, 645—destroys equality between the Clergy, which was established by Christ, 645—infringes on the rights of the people, 645—is injurious to religion, 645—the Church too unwieldy to be governed by one man, 645, 650—the doctrine of supremacy would reduce the Church to bondage, and corrupt doctrine, 646—it impedes reformation, depraves manners, debases the Pope, and disturbs the foundation of government, 647—as a doctrine it is useless, 648—it is at variance with the character of Bishops in the primitive church, 648—is overthrown by arguments with which Romanists sought to establish it, 652—this illustrated, 652, et seq.—origin and establishment of metropolitical, primatical, and patriarchal jurisdiction, 653, et seq.—steps by which Rome arrived at supremacy, 659, et seq.—its foundation and progress, 661, et seq.—formal establishment of the supremacy stated, 665—fallacy of the assertion, that no time can be assigned when supremacy was introduced, 666—various branches of the supremacy considered, 667—prerogatives of the Pope, enumerated, 668—convocation of Councils, 668, et seq.

Sylvester, St., on the privileged Churches in Rome, 338

Symbolic unity, how possessed by the Protestants, 477

Symmachus, on the folly of making antiquity a test of truth, 504—he made no pretensions to Papal supremacy, 599

Synagogue of the Jews, described, 411

——— of Satan, defined, 445

T

Tables of succession, drawn up by Eusebius, noticed, 498

Tatian, eating human flesh, a charge preferred against Christians, 144—knew nothing of the doctrine of extreme unction, 388

Taylor, Isaac, Esq., on the evils of monasticism, 724, 752

———, Jeremy, Bishop, D.D., quoted on the rule of faith, 14—on the immaculate conception, 42—on the revolting practices of the Romish confessional, 209—on repentance, as taught by the Papacy, 220—on the assertion that a habit of sin is no sin, 231, et seq.—on the uncertainty connected with the apostolical succession, 497—on the persecuting clauses of the Fourth Lateran Council, 562—on the confirmation of a Council by the Pope, 583

———, Rowland, D.D., on the superfluous orders of the Romish Church, 416—ceremony of his deprivation, 417

Taxæ, their iniquitous character, 362—sophistry of Charles Butler, Esq., 362—observations of the Rev. Joseph Mendham, 362—distinction of, to be noticed, 362—authorities quoted, 362—history of their rise and progress, 362—the tax-tables, an improvement upon the simple indulgence, 364—their origin, 364—collection of them in the British Museum, referred to, 364—the infamous character of these documents, 364—Philip Mornay, Knight, quoted, 364—publication of, never suppressed by the Church of Rome, 365—Claude D'Espence quoted, 366—Dr. Doyle on the subject of penance, 366—amusing dilemma of the Romanists on this topic, 367—childish observations of Dr. Butler, 367—selections from the table of taxæ, 369

Taxæ Cancellariæ Apostolicæ, described, 362—Milner alludes constantly to the Chancery, but never to the Penitentiary, 366—remarks of Charles Butler, Esq., 367—of Dr. Lingard, 367

Taxæ Sacræ Pœnitentiariæ Apostolicæ, various editions of the, noticed, 364

Teacher, the office of, 411

Teaching, the Popish notion of, as opposed to reading the truth, 29

Telemachus, his visit to Tartarus, noticed, 282

Templars, charges against, examined at the Council of Vienne, 569

Temporal power, the assumption of, followed that of spiritual, 665—the grants of Pepin and Charlemagne, considered, 665, et seq.

Temporal prosperity, a mark of the Church, noticed, 543

Ten Commandments, an examination of the conscience in, 200

Teresia, a notorious fanatic, 236

Tertullian, his testimony, with regard to tradition, 46—heretical notions of, 85—on the state of departed spirits, 86—on the charge of eating human flesh preferred against Christians, 144—on the doctrine of spiritual manducation, 149—on the reception of the eucharist, 165—testimony against the doctrine of transubstantiation, 165—and of purgatory, 267—views of, with regard to the dead, 275—makes no allusion to the doctrine of extreme unction, 388—on ascertaining the true Church, 443—records the heresy of Victor I., 465—was far from being free from error, 476—did not use the term "Catholic," 488—on the apostolical succession, 494—on Peter's visit to Rome, 497—on the succession of Peter, 497—on preferring truth to antiquity, 505—on the primacy of Peter, 613—gave no high title to Peter, 616—on the term "Apostolic See," 618—employs the term Pontifex Maximus, 620—says Peter ordained Clement, 637—but nothing of supremacy, 642—does not assume, when disputing with heretics, 643—was ignorant of such jurisdiction as now exercised by the Pope over the Clergy, 679—on the election of Bishops in his day, 680—the decision of controversy, 702—on the licentiousness of the celibates, 731—recommended celibacy, 743

Testimony of the senses, infallible, 140

Tetzel, a vender of indulgences, 323—his notorious character, 326—unblushing effrontery and sin, 326, et seq.—and his letter of absolution, 327—scale of prices, 327—illustrative anecdotes, 327—is warmly opposed by Luther, 329

Thaddea, an attendant on Veronica, 540

Tharsicius, an Acolyte, martyred, 399

Theobald, Bishop, his apparition of a soul in purgatory, 282

Theodore, of Mopsuesta, his writings condemned by the Council of Constantinople, 557

Theodoret, on Scripture and tradition, 52—repudiates purgatory, 86—on the monstrous doctrine of eating the object of divine worship, 144—on the folly of worshipping that which may be eaten, 145—his testimony against the doctrine of transubstantiation, 167—refutes the heresy of Eutyches, 168—on the identity between Bishops and Presbyters, 407, 616—his writings condemned by the Council of Constantinople, 557—on the confession of Christ, 610—on the application of the term "Apostle," 616—who convened the second General Council, 669—Baronius quoted, on the small influence of the Pope at its sittings, 669—the consequence of the Pope refusing to ratify Councils, 674—on the heresy of Saturnilus, 716

Theodorus introduced penitentiary canons from the east into the west, 363
Theodosius the younger, his baptism mentioned, 126—convened the Council of Ephesus, 555—and dismissed it in the midst of tumult, 556—peremptorily summoned the Synod, 670—and ratified its proceedings, 673—exercised the power of enacting or abrogating ecclesiastical law, 877
Theophilus, Alexand., on Scripture and tradition, 50—termed Epiphanius a heresiarch, 86—on the charge of eating human flesh, preferred against Christians, 144—recognised the canons of Nice with regard to appeals, 688
Theophylact, on the obligation of an oath, 86—the fallacy of the doctrine of purgatory, 250—the identity between Bishops and Presbyters, 407—the primacy of Peter, 609—speaks strongly in favour of marriage, 717
Theresa, St., visions of, monstrous absurdity of, 27
"This is my body," the phrase explained, 135, et seq.—the Popish gloss supposes that which is impossible and contradictory, 135—Protestant interpretation natural, easy, and consistent, 136—its figurative sense considered, 136
Thomas, the Apostle, invoked according to his merits, 757
——— Aquinas, on argument from analogy in favour of seven sacraments, 95—how grace is imparted in sacraments, 105—on the effect of the sacramental wine on the Corinthians, 143—on the doctrine of spiritual manducation, 148—opposed the dogma of half-communion, 185—acknowledges the unscriptural character of auricular confession, 204—on the distinction between peccatum and vitium, 205—openly taught dishonesty, 234—on the doctrine of purgatory, 243—its punishments, 244—purgatory an article of faith, 246—on the spirits in prison, 257—the locality of purgatory, 284—its punishments, 284—the character of indulgences, 314—considered open transgressors members of the Church, 449—his treatment of heretics, 572—ascribed absolute power to the Pope, 596—considered it necessary for salvation, for all to be subject to the Pontiff, 601—the supremacy of the Pope, 667—opposed the forced celibacy of the priesthood, 737
Thomists, origin of the party, 105—disputes with the Scotists, 105, 457—eminent men on that side, 105
Thorndike, Rev. Herb., on prayer for the dead, 287
Thurcal, explores the secrets of purgatory, 282
Tillotson, Archbishop, on the unscriptural character of the dogma of transubstantiation, 139—on the cruel and bloody circumstances attending it, 143—on the spirits in prison, 256
Tindale, William, his translation of the New Testament, condemned, 25
Titles applied to Peter, will not bear a literal interpretation, 615—were unknown in the apostolic age, 615—are ambiguous, and given to others, 616—Paul is often associated with Peter, 616—an enumeration of these titles, 616, et seq.—their origin, 620—that of "Universal Bishop" considered, 665
Toledo I., Council of, its immoral decrees noticed, 590—is sanctioned by Leo I., 590
——— III., Council of, repudiates the practice of praying for the dead, 280
——— IV., Council of, enactment concerning Monks, 745
Tolet, Francis, the Jesuit, on theft and compensation, 486—his wretched views of morality, 234
Tonsure, described, 397, 421—authorities for, and signification of, 397—a heathen custom, 421—Optatus testified against it, 421—degradatio a prima tonsura, 423
Townsend, Rev. George, his "Chronological Arrangement" quoted on Matt. xvi. 18, 54, et seq.—on the power of the keys, 56—on the phrase "to bind and to loose," 57—the gates of hell, 57—on the immoral tendency of indulgences, 328
Tradition, how received by the Papacy, 6—defined by the Catechism, 8—meaning of the term, 31, 36—historical evidence of, in favour of the inspiration of Scripture, considered, 33—doctrine of, defined by the Council of Trent, 35—Bishop Hay quoted, 36—scriptural employment of the term, 36—character of the traditions to which reference is made in Scripture, 36—on oral tradition, 36–39—difficulties which are presented by tradition, 41—has not preserved the Church of Rome from controversy, 41—Romanists not agreed on the testimony which should prove tradition apostolical, 41—discordant opinions concerning, an argument against them, 42—Council of Trent supposed ecclesiastical and apostolical traditions equal in authority with the word of God, 42—some Romanists consider them inferior, 42—and others superior, 42—the assertion, that Protestants receive some doctrines on the authority of tradition, why not others, 43—testimony of the Fathers with regard to it, 44, et seq.—does not support the doctrine of seven sacraments, 95—Christ the author of the sacraments, 97—the sacrifice of the mass termed an unwritten tradition, 178—variation of sentiment in the hierarchy concerning it, 510
Transalpine Divines, defined, 597—views of, respecting the supremacy of the Pope, 598
Translations of the Bible, have tended to preserve its purity, 32
Transubstantiation, proof of the destitution of infallibility in the Church, 70—not held by the Fathers, 86—doctrine of, stated, 132—a grievous corruption of Christian truth, 135—refuted by Scripture, 135—Romish sense of the phrase "This is my body" absurd, 135—French Catechism quoted, 136—elements unchanged after consecration, 138—the phrase "real presence" examined, 139—had no foundation in, and is opposed to, Scripture, 139—Tillotson quoted, 139—it contradicts our senses, 139—and therefore false, 139—Peter Dens quoted, 140—testimony of the senses infallible, 140—if true, the humanity of Christ could not be proved, 141—its assumed miraculous character exploded, 141—futility of Popish arguments in favour of, 141—the doctrine contradictory to reason and absurd, 142—argument in its favour from divine omnipotency noticed, 142—moral impossibilities attending it, 142, et seq.—bloody circumstances following the holding of it, 143—shown to be blasphemous and impious, 144—was the source of endless accusations against Christianity, 144—folly of worshipping objects that may be eaten, 145—arguments in favour of the doctrine answered, 147—Romanist authorities who inculcated Protestant views of the doctrine, 147, 148—the doctrine of spiritual manducation considered, 148, et seq.—Dr. Wiseman stated and refuted by Dr. Turton, 154, et seq.—the assertion, that this doctrine was a mystery kept secret from the catechumens of the early church, refuted, 162—unknown during the first five centuries of the Church, 162—testimony of Julian the Apostate against it, 162—the assertion, that this doctrine is not more mysterious than that of the Trinity, &c., considered, 163—absurdity of such comparison, 164—strictly speaking, transubstantiation no mystery, 164—argument in favour of it, that "God can do all things," considered, 164—that it is merely a speculative error, examined, 164—obligatory character of the doctrine, 164—testimony of the Fathers, that it was not a doctrine of the primitive church, 165—distinct from conversion, 164—three wonders connected with, 164—the rise, progress, and establishment of the doctrine, 167—originated in the heresy of Eutyches, 168—Berenger opposes the dogma, 169—tardy progress of this notion in England, 170—little understood in the time of Peter Lombard, 170—decree of Lateran concerning, 171—history of the term, 171—awful tendency of the doctrine, 171—ingeniously connected with half-communion, 182—uncertainty connected with the process of transubstantiation, 188—if the doctrine be true, the Papist is doubtful whether he be not a gross idolator, 188—if the dogma be false, he is blasphemously such, 189—variations in the Papacy with regard to, 511—a proof of want of agreement in the Romish hierarchy, 517—established by the fourth Lateran Council, 559. See Half-Communion.

Trent, Council of, decrees of the, vaguely expressed, 1—the Catechism of, 4—the Index Expurgatorius, 5—decree of, on the canonical Scripture, 8—incorporate the Apocrypha with the word of God, 31—doctrine held by the, on tradition, 35—its ambiguity, 36—taught that ecclesiastical and apostolical traditions were equal in authority with the word of God, 42—opinions of the members on the subject of tradition various and contradictory, 42—decreed many things opposed to the Fathers, 86—inculcated the doctrine of purgatory, 86—diversity of opinion on the authority of the Fathers, 87—on the sacraments in general, 92—arguments of, in favour of seven sacraments, 95—on the intention of the Minister of a sacrament, 97—on the validity of the ministration of wicked men, 98—on the doctrine of intention, 100—on the relative value of sacraments, 104—on grace conferred, on those who receive the sacraments in divers ways, 104—what grace do sacraments impart, 104—how conferred, 104, et seq.—definition of character, 106—ceremonies of sacraments, 108—definition of baptism, 111—canons concerning, 112—on baptism administered by heretics, 114, 119—attrition sufficient for adult baptism, 116—on the necessity of baptism, 121—on the sacrament of confirmation, 128—on the doctrine of transubstantiation, 132—and of the eucharist, 140—perplexed on the doctrine of spiritual manducation, 148—established the doctrine of transubstantiation, 171—canons of, on the sacrifice of the mass, 172—ratifies the dogma of half-communion, 182—canons and decrees of, on that subject, 183—reason of, in favour of it, 185—on the worship of the host, 186—authorizes such processions as those on Corpus Christi, 192—on the sacrament of penance, 193—definition of the dogma of priestly absolution, 193—on the validity of absolution by a wicked Priest, 194—on the doctrine of confession, 199—established auricular confession, 205—on the secrecy of the confessional, 208—definition of contrition and attrition, 214—on the dogma of satisfaction, 223—on the doctrine of purgatory, 241—its object, 243—efficacy of mass for souls in purgatory, 244—purgatory an article of faith, 246—on benefiting souls in purgatory, 285—on masses for the dead, 295—on indulgences, 308—decree on that subject, 310—on the sacrament of extreme unction, 373—the effects of the sacrament, 380—that of orders, 393, et seq.—division of orders, 396—on the order of priesthood, 400—on the superiority of Bishops over Presbyters, 401—divine right of Bishops violently discussed at Trent, 401—ultimate decision of, 401—the election of the episcopate, 402—on the sacramental grace of orders, 420—on the doctrine entertained with regard to matrimony, 423—impediments dissolving marriage, 434—recognised wicked men as members of the Church, 449—decisions of, concerning the rule of faith disputed, 458—acknowledge deviations from purity in the Church, 505—on the authority of the Church, 543—confirmed the persecuting clauses of the third Lateran Council, 558—by whom convened, 574—its proceedings overruled, 576—character of the Synod, 576—nature of the Reformation demanded, 576—place of meeting, inconvenient for a General Synod, 577—members of it, highly objectionable, and why, 577—were sworn vassals of the Pope, 557—serious objections to the proceedings of the Council, 578—its closing act stated, 579—the Synod was not free, 579—its decisions only partially adopted, 579—decrees concerning, inoperative and useless, 579—its confirmation, a ludicrous exhibition of conciliar infallibility, 580—abominable intrigue notorious, 582—sanctions the worship of God in an unknown tongue, 592—gives the supreme power in the Church to the Pope, 607—exposition of the confession of Christ, 610—represent the keys as given to every Priest and Vicar, 613—gives the Pope power to depose, &c., Bishops, 684—the doctrine of celibacy, 715—distinguishes chastity from wedlock, 716—anathematizes those who prefer marriage to celibacy, 717—its laws concerning monastic orders, 745—on the worship of saints, 753

Trental, a, described, 293

Trinity, the doctrine of the, compared with that of transubstantiation, 163—absurdity of such comparison, 164

Troy, Dr., his notes on the Romish Bible alluded to, 35

Trullo, Synod in, lax sentiments of, with regard to marriage, 234—enactments of, concerning clerical celibacy, 743

Trypho, the Jew, on the charge of eating flesh, preferred against the Christians, 144

Turrianus, quoted, on the sacred Scriptures, 21

Turton, Dean, his triumphant refutation of Dr. Wiseman on the eucharist exhibited, 154, et seq.

Tyrannical unity, characteristic of the Papal community, 456

Tyranny of Rome, towards those bound by religious vows, 745—extent of it but little known, 748

U

Udalric, Bishop of Augusta, on the licentiousness of the celibates, 732—the genuineness of this testimony examined, 732—apparition of a soul in purgatory to, 282

Ultramontane opinions on the infallibility of the Pope noticed, 64

Ulysses, his visit to the lower regions noticed, 282

Unbloody sacrifice, the folly of such an offering as propitiatory, 179

Uncertainty connected with the Romish rule of faith, 90

Unction of the forehead in confirmation, 130—Bailly quoted, and the Catechism, 130

Uniformity, how maintained in the Papacy, 89

Unigenitus, the Bull, its object referred to, 21—laid the foundation of indulgences, 323—issued to bring people to Rome at the second jubilee, 323—account of its history, 473—Mosheim quoted, 323—cause of great dissension in France, 323—its persecuting character, 323—is adopted by Benedict XIV. and Peter Dens, 323—condemns the New Testament of Quesnel, 474

Union with Christ, said to be imparted in baptism, 123

Unity, not found in the Church of Rome, 29—a mark of the Church, 451—character of the unity taught in Scripture, 451, et seq.—inferences drawn from this description, 452—means of preserving it, 452—reasons for, and the importance of, it, 453—in what sense unity is not a mark of the true church, 453—that professed by the Church of Rome, considered, 453—instances in which several who were separated from the Pope continued members of the Church, 454—proof that adherence to the Pope is no mark of union with Christ, 453, 454—decisions of the Popes often opposed to each other and the word of God, 455—the unity of which Romanists boast is not that of truth, 455, et seq.—merely external, 456—a description of this union, 456—numerous alterations have taken place in the divinity of the Papal Church, 456—she is divided by various contests and dissensions, 457—Mosheim quoted, 457—disputes concerning the rule of faith, 457—this unity defective in the head of the Roman Church, 459—exhibited also in disputes respecting the limit and extent of the Pope's jurisdiction, 463—the Church is divided on various doctrines, 465—the Jesuits and Jansenists, 468, et seq.—the dispute fierce and long continued, 468, et seq.—Mosheim quoted, 469—these controversies destroyed the unity of the Church, 470—as also the dispute respecting morals, 470—the mode of administering the sacraments, 472—on the proper method of instructing Christians, 472—it was further injured by the doctrine of the immaculate conception, 472—the Bull Unigenitus, 473—absolute and entire unity not necessary to salvation, 476—nature of that unity which exists among Protestants, 476, et seq.—Protestant unity preferable to Romish, and why, 477—the objection of the Romanist with regard to a religious inquirer, refuted, 478—remarks on ecclesiastical unity, 478, et seq.

Universal Bishop, a title repudiated by Gregory I., 66

Universal Pope, &c., rejected by Gregory I., 619, 665—but afterward adopted, 619, 665—the assumption of this title ratified the supremacy, 665—Phocas confirmed it to Boniface III., 665—Baronius and Bellarmine, attempts of, to mitigate the language of Gregory, 665—full signification of the phrase, 665—why Gregory condemned the title, 665

Unknown tongue, prayer in, unknown in the primitive church, 518

Urban II. issues indulgences when engaged against the Saracens, 323—inculcates the deposition of Emperors, 600—acknowledged the lawfulness of murdering the excommunicated, 703—remarks upon this, 703, 704

——— IV. instituted the feast of Corpus Christi, 190—his grant of indulgences, 340

Ussher, Archbishop, on the corruptions of the Fathers, 76, 277

V

Vacancies in the Popedom, several enumerated, 498, 641—a proof that the Church may exist without a Pope, 641

Valdenses held the doctrine of spiritual manducation, 148. See Albigenses, Waldenses.

Valence, Council of, repudiated second marriages in the Clergy, 742

Valentinians, their heresy noticed, 141

Valerius, Reginald, the Jesuit, on murder, 485—on theft and compensation, 486

Vandals, history of the Mission to the, 521

Variations of the Romish Church, with regard to image-worship, 590

Vasquez, the Jesuit, sanctioned the practice of idolatry, 234

Venial sin described, 205—Aquinas and Dens quoted, 205—what sins are venial, and why, 206—viewed in connexion with the Popish doctrine of satisfaction, 229—immoral tendency of such distinction, 229—opposed to Scripture, 229—the definition is absurd, uncertain, and dangerous, 230. See Sin, Mortal sin.

Veron, his shameless mistranslations of Scripture, 18

Veronica, St., absurd and blasphemous statements concerning her, 540

Vestments, used in the service of the mass, 176

Vesuvius, supposed place of torment, 281

Vicarius described, 413

Vicars Apostolic, declaration of the, on saint-worship, 755—intended for circulation in a Protestant country, 755

——— of Christ, to whom the term is applicable, 618

——— of the Pope, a title, the product of Papal ambition, 678—was never recognised by the early Fathers, 678—when and by whom first employed, 678—succeeded by the Legates 678

Victor I. approved of and patronized Montanus, 465, 704—according to Tertullian, recanted, 465, 704

——— III., in danger of death from a poisoned wafer, 143

Victorinus, heretical opinions of, 85

Vienne, Council of, fifteenth General Synod, 569—by whom convened, 569—its objects, 569

Vigilius, P., heretical, 67—and a great changeling, 466—denied two natures in Christ, 704

Vincentius Lirinensis, his favourite maxim examined, 513

Vinofrid, Missionary to Germany, plans pursued to convert the Pagans, 521

Virgil, the idea of a purgatory in his writings, 261

Virgin Mary, doctrine of immaculate conception, a fable, 86—prayer for her offered in the early Church, 278—pictures of, made to open and shut the eyes, 533—a great number of these in Rome, 539—account of one in Messina, 540—an invocation of, 756. See Mariolatry.

Virginity, considered as connected with celibacy, 717. See Celibacy.

Visions, to prove the existence of purgatory, noticed, 281

Vow, of celibacy, when it may be taken, 717—of poverty, false and hypocritical, 744

Voluntary assent, a ceremony accompanying baptism, 125

——— suffering, said to be satisfying to divine justice, 224

Vulgate, Latin, the Scriptures of the Papist, 8—considered to be authentic, to the disparagement of the original Scriptures, 34—the Papists' book of reference, 34—highly commended by the Tridentine Synod, 34—the Sixtine and Clementine editions of the, noticed, 34—its literary character, 34—corrupted the word of God, in the language used at the institution of the eucharist, 137

W

Waddington, Rev. George, on the rise of indulgences, 321

Wafer, the consecrated, described, 175—absurdity connected with its manufacture, 176—idolatrous honours rendered to it, 186—gross folly and blasphemy connected with the wafer-god of the Papist, 188. See Worship of the host, &c.

Waldenses opposed the celibacy of the priesthood, 737

Warham, Archbishop, opposes a dispensation for marriage to Henry VIII., 439

Water, the proximate matter of baptism, 112—is blessed water requisite, 112—quantity and quality of, to be employed, 113—baptismal water, how made, 124

Watson, Rev. Richard, quoted on Matt. xvi. 18, 54—on Christian baptism, 127—on the grant of the keys, and the power to bind and loose, 195, et seq.—on the assumed divine right of the Episcopacy, 403—the scriptural character of ordination, 406—on the term "Apostle," 408, 411—his enumeration of the primitive offices of the Church, 411, et seq.—the identity of Bishops and Presbyters, 411, et seq.—on the constitution of the primitive Churches, 412—the Jewish synagogue, 412—on the character of the Romish sacraments, 433—signification of the term "Church," 443—his description of the true Church, 446, et seq.

Wealth, of the Papacy, aided largely towards the accumulation of power, 664—means of obtaining wealth, noticed, 664

Weedall, Dr., professed to believe in the miracles of Januarius, 539

"Week's mind," this and similar phrases, explained, 294

Wesley, Rev. John, on the release of souls in purgatory, 285—on the true essential succession, 501

Wesleyan society, rules of, illustrative of the visible church of Christ, 450

Wesselus, on the fraudulent character of indulgences, 315, et seq.

Western schism, noticed, 459

Whately, Archbishop, on the apostolical succession, 502, et seq.

Whip, use of, in penance, 235—by whom recommended, 235

Whitby, History of, quoted, on masses for the dead, 304

Whitby, Daniel, D.D., on the gift o

the Holy Spirit to the Church, 59—on the folly of worshipping that which may be eaten, 145—on the apostolical succession, 497

White garment, used after the rite of baptism, 125

White, Rev. J. Blanco, on the feast of Corpus Christi, 189, et seq.—on the ceremony of All-Souls', 298—on the demoralizing influence of indulgences in Spain, 348—the evil of forced clerical celibacy, 734—the state of monasticism in Spain, 746, et seq.—fearful picture of female convents, 750, et seq.

——, Winifred, a fanatic, obtains a miracle, defended by Bishop Milner, 528—this pretended miracle investigated, 529

Wicked Priests, why administration of sacraments by, is tolerated in the Church of Rome, 98, 103—does a wicked man, being in orders, sin if he administers, 98—what should he do, if he be about to administer, and conscious of mortal sin, 98—whether he who sins mortally ought to preach, 99—is it lawful to receive sacraments from wicked Ministers, 99—whether the faithful may receive sacraments from wicked Ministers, 99—absolution by, valid, 194

Willet, Andrew, on the application of indulgences to the dead, 350—his reply to Bellarmine on the distinction between Bishop and Presbyter, 408—on the Minister of ordination, 420

Williams, Bishop, the Church of Rome tested by the mark duration, 509

Wine, an emblem of the blood of Christ, 135—illustrated by authorities both sacred and profane, 137

Winifred, St., her well in Flintshire, noticed, 529

Wiseman, N., D.D., unintentionally an advocate for the exercise of private judgment, 14—remarks on this important admission, 15—opposed to Dr. Milner on this point, 15—defends the Popish Missionaries in their scheme of catching and baptizing converts, 127—his arguments to show that John vi. specially refers to the eucharist, stated and refuted, 155, et seq.—his sophistry on the doctrine of transubstantiation, 171—on the connexion between praying for the dead and purgatory, 274—on the character of indulgences, 319—his remarks on the testimony of Irenæus with regard to Peter's Roman bishopric, examined, 634

Wood, Mary, a fanatic, obtains a miracle, defended by Bishop Milner, 528

Worms, Council of, on the custom of anointing the sick, 389

Worship, various degrees of, noticed, 756

——— of the host, the practice of the Church of Rome, 186—the doctrine stated, 186—Council of Trent quoted, 186—a novelty, unknown in the primitive church, 186—commanded by Honorius, 186—antiquity is utterly silent respecting this practice, 186—furnished to the Pagan a fit subject of reproach to the Christian, 187—the doctrine is marked with gross and aggravated idolatry, 187—the host more an idol than any pagan deity, 187—the Papist no sooner makes his god, than he eats him, 188—a good intention, the Popish plea against idolatry, considered, 189—ceremonies connected with the, 189—the act of adoration described, 189—feast of Corpus Christi described, 189, et seq.—military and civic honours rendered, 189—ludicrous scene at a theatre at the passing of the host, 190—wickedness of, 192. See Idolatry, Host.

Writers, paid to advocate the claims of the Papacy, 664

———, Romanist, general character of, 6—evasive conduct of Papists towards them, 7

Wycliffe, John, his translation of the Scriptures condemned, 25—opposed the celibacy of the priesthood, 737

X

Xavier, St. Francis, his mode of converting and baptizing the Heathen, 128—a self-flagellant, 236—miracles of, considered, 527—history of this saint, 530—remarks of Bishop Douglas, 530—the sophistry and falsehood of Milner exposed, 530—his miracles made known after his death which none knew during his life, 533—his true character portrayed by Mr. Mendham, 535, 536

Y

Young, Edward, LL.D., a subject of Popish intolerance, 295

"Your Majesty," an idolatrous epithet applied to the host, 189

Z

Zachary, Pope, his conduct towards Pepin considered, 666

Zanchius, doubted whether Peter ever were at Rome, 497

Zephyrinus, approved of Montanus, 705

Zosimus, countenanced Pelagianism, 466

THE END.

SUPPLEMENT

TO THE

DELINEATION OF ROMAN CATHOLICISM

BY THE

REV. CHARLES ELLIOTT, D.D.:

BEING CHIEFLY AN EXPOSITION OF

CERTAIN CHANGES WHICH THE PAPACY HAS UNDERGONE DURING THE PONTIFICATE OF PIUS IX.

BY WILLIAM HARRIS RULE, D.D.

LONDON:
WESLEYAN CONFERENCE OFFICE,
2, CASTLE STREET, CITY ROAD;
SOLD AT 66, PATERNOSTER ROW.
1877.

CONTENTS.

THE PONTIFICATE OF PIUS IX.

	Page
Appointment of Bishops in England	ii
Bishops' Oaths at Consecration	iii
Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary	v
Divine Tradition	xi
Canonizations in 1862	xii
Encyclical and Syllabus of 1864	xiii
Declaration of Bishops in 1867	xvi
Useless Invitations—Enforced Silence	xvii
Impending Schism	xix
The Council of the Vatican	xxi
The Question of the Pope's Infallibility before and at the Council	xxi, b
The Council was not free	xxiii, b
Power of the Papal Commissions	xxiv, a
Power of the Papal Majority	xxv, b
Composition of the Majority	xxvi, a
Personal Intervention of the Pope	xxvii, a
Infallibility:
Constitutions and Canons	xxix, a
Apostolic Primacy	xxx, a
Perpetuity of Primacy	xxx, b
Power and Nature of Primacy	xxxi, a
Infallible Mastery of the Roman Pontiff	xxxii, b
Regular Orders	xxxiv
Concerning Regulars	xxxiv, b
Scheme of a Constitution on the Vow of Obedience	xxxv, a
Concerning the Common Life	xxxv, b
Concerning the Clausure	xxxvii, b
Jesuits	xxxviii
Spiritual Exercises	xl
First Principles	xl, a
First Lessons	xli, b
First Exercise	xliii, b
Second Exercise	xliv, b
Third Exercise	xliv, b
Fourth Exercise	xlv, a
Fifth Exercise	xlv, a
Heretics and Inquisition	xlv
The Congregation of the Sacred Inquisition, or Holy Office	xlvi, a
The Commissary, Assessor, Consultors, Qualificators, Fiscal, and other Ministers of the Holy Inquisition	xlvi, b
The Congregation and Secretary of the Index	xlvii, a
Indexes:
Prohibitory and Expurgatory	xlvii, b
The Roman Inquisition in 1851	xlix

SUPPLEMENT.

THE PONTIFICATE OF PIUS IX.

SOME account of the change in external relations, which the Papacy has undergone since the year 1844, is necessary to complete the Delineation of Romanism. For, although no new element has been introduced into the system, some "pious opinions," as they were at first called, are now declared to be essential articles of Faith. That which was once distinguished as the ruling principle of the Papal Court at Rome, and called Ultramontanism, but repudiated in France, disowned in England and Ireland, resisted in Venice, and practically ignored in many parts of Popedom, is now imposed on members of the Papal Church everywhere. The once acknowledged difference between ultramontane and cismontane, represented as the two parties were by separate schools of ecclesiastical doctrine, can exist no longer within the Church over which a Pope presides. All cismontanes, or liberals, are now incapable of remaining in communion with him, unless they conceal their principles; but must separate, as the Old Catholics of Germany have done.

This change has been brought about during the Pontificate of Pius IX., a reign more notable in history than that of any Pope before him. None ever wore the triple crown so long. Adrian I. was Pope during twenty three years, ten months, and eighteen days; surpassing all the others. To St. Peter twenty-four years, with some months and days, have been allotted; but the Apostle was never Pope, and even his alleged residence in Rome at any time until his martyrdom is not proved in history. The present Pope, who was elected on June 16th, 1846, has continued nearly thirty years, as these lines are in the press. Never was a Pope's career so long, nor so disastrous to his Church; and perhaps no period of equal length was ever more eventful to the world. We mark the change, not pretending even to summarise the history, but noting the results as recorded in authentic documents.

His first Encyclical is dated a few months after his election; and, although it contains much that might be considered customary in first writing to the whole company of his Bishops, exhibits what were afterwards found to be his leading thoughts. It is addressed to the Patriarchs, Primates, Archbishops, and Bishops, together with whom he had laboured until exalted, as he says, to the sublime Chair of the Prince of the Apostles, until he received "from the eternal Prince of Shepherds Himself" the weighty charge of "feeding and ruling, not only the lambs, which are the universal Christian people, but also the sheep,—that is to say, their chiefs," * including, as would seem, all chiefs, both spiritual and temporal.

After pronouncing an indiscriminate censure of all civil society, as if all were utterly lost in unbelief and crime, he proceeds to give utterance to his grand idea of personal infallibility: "And hence so plainly appears in how great error they are wandering, who, by an abuse of reason, regard the words of God as if they were a human work, and rashly dare to explain and interpret them at their own discretion, while God Himself has constituted a living authority which may teach the true and legitimate sense of His own heavenly revelation, confirm the same, and put an end to all controversies in matters of faith and morals by an infallible judgment, that men may not be carried about with every wind of doctrine, and entangled in the sins and errors of men. Which living and infallible authority exists in that Church only which is built by Christ our Lord upon Peter, Head, Prince, and Shepherd of the whole Church, whose faith He promised should never fail; which always has its lawful Popes, deriving their origin without intermission from Peter himself, in whose chair they are seated, and are inheritors and vindicators of his doctrine, dignity, honour, and power. And because where Peter is, there is the Church, and Peter speaks by the Roman Pontiff, and always lives in his successors, and exercises judgment, and bestows the truth of Faith on them that seek it; therefore the words of God (divina eloquia) must be taken in the sense in which they are held in the See of St. Peter at Rome, which is the Mother and Mistress of all Churches, always preserves entire and inviolate the Faith delivered by Christ the Lord, teaches it to the faithful, and shows the way of salvation to all, and the doctrine of truth incorrupted." †

At the time when his predecessor, Gregory XVI., warned his Bishops against the proceedings of heretics, the efforts of a Wesleyan minister in Spain caused great alarm in Rome, and were now described by him very evidently. "Of this kind are the clandestine sects that have emerged from darkness to lay waste and to destroy every thing sacred and public, and were condemned with repeated curse by the Roman Pontiffs, our predecessors, in their Apostolic Letters, which we, in the plenitude of our Apostolic power, confirm, and command to be diligently observed. This is what those most crafty Bible Societies want, who, renewing the ancient art of heretics, cease not to obtrude books of Holy Scriptures, etc."* As for Princes, he exhorts the Bishops to honour them, but to "remind them that the royal power has been conferred on them not only for the government of the world, but chiefly for the protection of the Church; and We, while they favour the cause of the Church, so act for the salvation of their kingdom, that they may enjoy the quiet possession of their provinces."† "But that the most clement Lord may more readily incline His ear to our prayers, and yield to our requests, let us always have for our Deprecatrix with Him the Most Holy Immaculate Virgin Mary, who gave birth to God, who is the sweetest Mother of us all, mediatrix, advocate, and most abiding Hope, and greatest Trust, than whose patronage there is nothing more valid with God, nothing more present."‡ All the features that will hereafter characterise the Pontificate of Pius IX., as an epoch in the history of his Church, are indicated in these brief extracts from his first Letter to his Bishops.

*...."pascendi ac regendi non solum agnos, universum scilicet Christianum populum, verum etiam oves, hoc est Antistites." —Encyc. Qui pluribus.

† Ibid.

It remains with some future historian to narrate his early and unsuccessful efforts to simulate loyalty;§ his vain endeavours to retain the allegiance of Spain; ‖ his appeal to Foreign States for force to crush the revolt he had provoked against himself in Rome;¶ his quarrel with Italy, and with Spanish America,†† which may be partially traced in the published collection of Allocutions, Encyclicals, and other Apostolic Letters. We must now confine ourselves to matters more properly belonging to the work in hand.

APPOINTMENT OF BISHOPS IN ENGLAND.

THERE is little to be said here of the appointment of Bishops in England and Wales. The Letters Apostolic dividing England into dioceses contain nothing of importance beyond the direct assertion of such authority as had never been assumed by a Pope in the affairs of England since the Reformation. This singular document begins very abruptly, not being addressed to any person in particular, and is worded only as an utterance of supreme authority.

"The power of ruling the universal Church committed to the Roman Pontiff in the person of Saint Peter, Prince of the Apostles, has preserved in the Apostolic See through every age that glorious solicitude by which it should consult for the good of the Catholic Religion in every part of the world, and studiously provide for its increase." After the historical summary, usual on such occasions, it states that "with the assistance of Ferdinand, Archbishop of Amaria, Apostolic Nuncio in England," Pope Innocent XI., in 1688, divided England into four districts, "each of which a Vicar Apostolic began to govern, furnished with all suitable faculties, and with the powers proper to a local Ordinary." Under Gregory XVI., the number of Vicars was doubled in 1840. For himself, Pius IX. affirms that he had "purposed, from the very first commencement of his Pontificate, to prosecute the work so well commenced," and now, encouraged by various considerations, feels "that it is not any longer necessary for the Catholics of England to be governed by Vicars Apostolic, but that such a change of circumstances has taken place as to demand the form of Ordinary Episcopal government." "Therefore, the whole matter having been carefully and deliberately weighed, by his own proper motion, and in the plenitude of his Apostolical power, he constitutes and decrees that in the kingdom of England, according to the common rules of the Church, the Hierarchy of Ordinary Bishops shall flourish again, who shall be named from Sees which he constitutes by these Letters in all the Districts of Apostolical Vicariates." He appoints one Archbishop, or Metropolitan, over all England, "reserving to himself and his successors, the Pontiffs of Rome, the power of again dividing the said Province into more than one, and increasing the number of Dioceses as occasion may require, etc." And as if this unceremonious occupation of England, and its partition into Districts for Bishops of a foreign Church, were not sufficiently presumptuous, he proceeds to say, "But in the sacred government of the Clergy and of the People, and in other things which pertain to the pastoral office, the Archbishop and Bishops of England shall henceforward enjoy all the rights and faculties which other Catholic Archbishops and Bishops of other nations use and can use by the common ordination of the Sacred Canons and Apostolical Constitutions; and shall be equally bound by those obligations which bind other Archbishops and Bishops by the same common discipline of the Catholic Church." Much more follows in equal contempt of the laws of England, and also of international right; and then, if possible, to strengthen the whole, and wind up the Brief with most emphatic daring,—"Moreover we decree that if, in any other manner, any attempt should happen to be made by any person, with whatever authority, knowingly or ignorantly, to set aside these enactments, such attempt shall be null and void."*

* Encyc. Qui pluribus.

† Ibid.

‡ "Ut autem clementissimus Dominus facilius inclinet aurem suam in preces nostras, et nostris annuat votis, deprecatricem apud Ipsum semper adhibeamus sanctissimam Dei Genitricem Immaculatam Virginem Mariam, quæ nostrum omnium dulcissima mater, mediatrix, advocata, et spes fidissima ac maxima fiducia est, cujus patrocinio nihil apud Deum validius, nihil præsentius."—Ibid.

§ Quisque vestrum, October 4th, 1847.

‖ Ubi primum, December 17th, 1848; and Quibus luctuosissimis, September 15th, 1851.

¶ Quibus quantisque, April 20th, 1849; and Nostis et Nobiscum, December 8th, 1849.

 Si semper autem, May 20th, 1850; In consistoriali, November 1st, 1850; Ad Apostolicæ Sedis, August 22nd, 1851; and a Letter to Victor Emmanuel in the Recueil des Allocutions, etc. Paris, 1865.

†† Multiplices inter, June 10th, 1851; and Acerbissimum, September 27th, 1852.

* "Verum in sacro Cleri Populique regimine, atque in ceteris quæ ad pastorale officium pertinent, Archiepiscopus et Episcopi Angliæ jam nunc omnibus fruentur juribus et facultatibus,

The entire document is examined, and its character exhibited, in a masterly treatise, by Dr. Travers Twiss, who demonstrates its utter incompatibility with the Law of England in particular, and with international Law in general.* But from the time of the so-called emancipation of the Romanists in England until now, there has been a constant sense of insecurity as to the possibility of perfect loyalty in a British subject sworn to render obedience to a foreign prelate, in the event of any conflict of duty to that prelate and loyal obedience to the Sovereign. The character of the oath made to the Pope by Bishops at their consecration, and by others appointed to certain offices in the Papal Church in these dominions, could not be forgotten when a Bill for the so-called emancipation of Roman Catholics was under discussion in the British Parliament, in the year 1829; and it was remembered in 1851. Again in 1875, Mr. Gladstone, at the time ex-Premier, felt it necessary to point out the incompatibility of a belief in the doctrine of Infallibility and Supremacy in the Pope with civil allegiance to the temporal Sovereign of any country. His writings on the subject drew attention again to the oath taken by Bishops at their consecration. One of the English Bishops declared that he had sworn allegiance to the Sovereign at his consecration, and courteously favoured the present writer by assisting him to ascertain how this could be done at the same time that he took the oath prescribed in the Roman Pontifical. The subject is of great importance, and must therefore be distinctly treated.

BISHOPS' OATHS AT CONSECRATION.

WITH reference to the note on page 4 of the Delineation, concerning an addition for England to the Episcopal Oath of Allegiance to the Pope, a more full account is now necessary. We have to compare four documents:

1. The original oath, as it is there given.

2. The oath as it was slightly altered for use in England.

3. An oath for use in the British Dominions, as prescribed in the Roman Catholic Relief Act of 1829.

4. Another oath substituted in 1867.

a. The original oath, except at the consecration of Bishops within Her Majesty's Dominions, remains unchanged, so far as the present writer is informed.

b. When a Bishop is consecrated for a See within these realms, the following changes are made:—

The sentence, "Heretics, etc., I will, to my power, persecute and oppose," is omitted. "Four years," instead of three, is inserted as the term for visiting the thresholds of the Apostles. But this change is of very slight importance, as the obligation to go thither when required by the Pope, to obey his commands in every other respect, and to attend a Council when summoned, unless canonically hindered, remains as strong as ever.

Instead of the words "Congregation of the Sacred Council,"—which Congregation was appointed to regulate the administration of the decrees of the Council of Trent in the manner most consistent, as might be deemed, with the spirit of the Council and the interests of the Church at the time being,—the words "Sacred Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith" are substituted. This change shows that these Bishops are a body distinct from other Bishops in so far as they are under the control of the Jesuits in Rome, in whose hands the Society De Propaganda Fide has for many years been placed. This renders the position of a Bishop in England yet more objectionable than it was before.

There is a larger alteration at the conclusion of the oath. The words "without consulting the Roman Pontiff," etc., inconsulto Romano Pontifice, and on to the end, are all struck out, and instead of them we find the following:—"Hæc omnia et singula eo inviolabilius observabo, quo certior sum nihil in illis contineri, quod Juramento Fidelitatis meæ erga serenissimum N. Regem, ejusque ad thronum successores debitæ adversari possit." "All and every of these things I will so much the more inviolably observe, as I am the more certain that nothing is contained in them which could be opposed to the Oath of my Fealty which is owing to the most serene King N., and his successors to the throne." This was conceded by Pope Pius VII., in view, probably, of the Irish Bishops, on his return to Rome, after his detention in France by Napoleon Bonaparte. At that conjuncture, when he was anxious to conciliate the support of England, Austria, Germany, and Russia, in negotiating with France for the recovery of all the Papal States, which had been taken from him,* he granted a certain profession of political respect, which, like all matters of concordat, was no more than temporary and local. However satisfactory this adaptation of the oath may seem at first sight, it could never have satisfied any one who gave it thoughtful consideration.

The Bishop under consecration is certain (certior sum) that nothing in his oath of unreserved fealty and absolute obedience to the Pope—not a word of which has been abated—"could" (possit) in any future contingency be opposed to this oath of fealty to the King; which is certainly like pre-determining a question which, however grave, the party sworn may not think to be of importance enough to stand in his way when his fealty to the earthly superior may happen to be tested by counter-claims from his spiritual superior in Rome. In such an event, his quibus alii aliarum gentium Catholici Archiepiscopi et Episcopi ex communi Sacrorum Canonum et Apostolicarum Constitutionum ordinatione utuntur et uti possunt, atque obstringentur pariter iis obligationibus quæ alios Archiepiscopos et Episcopos ex eadem communi Catholicæ Ecclesiæ disciplina obstringunt."

"Irritum quoque, et inane decernimus si secus super his a quoquam quavis auctoritate scienter vel ignoranter contigerit attentari."—Universalis Ecclesiæ regendæ, September 29th, 1850.

* The Letters Apostolic of Pope Pius IX. considered with Reference to the Law of England and the Law of Europe. By Travers Twiss, D.C.L., of Doctors' Commons, etc. Longmans. 1851.

* Histoire de Pape Pie VII., par M. Le Chevalier Artaud. Paris. 1839. Tome 3me., page 247.

present certainty may utterly forsake him, and he may think it his duty to openly rebel.

c. The oath referred to as Juramentum Fidelitatis meæ debitæ ad Regem turns out to be of but narrow application. After a declaration of allegiance to George IV. and his successors, with exclusion of pretenders to the Crown, comes the following :—

"I do further declare, that it is not an article of my faith, and that I do renounce, reject, and abjure the opinion that Princes excommunicated or deprived by the Pope, or any other authority of the See of Rome, may be deposed or murdered by their subjects, or by any person whatsoever." But while the person sworn declares against the opinion,—a dogmatic definition had not yet made it an article of faith,—that Princes may be deposed or murdered by order of Popes, he is now bound to believe that they may be both excommunicated and deprived ; for a new article of faith compels them. Yet he has sworn as follows :—

"I do declare that I do not believe that the Pope of Rome, or any other foreign Prince, prelate, person, state, or potentate, hath or ought to have any temporal or civil jurisdiction, power, superiority, or pre-eminence, directly or indirectly, within this realm." But his having declared that he did not believe left it nevertheless quite possible that he might be any day commanded to believe it all. And although the Pope may not be able to assume the style of a temporal or civil potentate in England, he may exercise a spiritual and ecclesiastical sovereignty over our civil governors, and over particular congregations, utterly subversive of the laws and institutions of this country.

"I do swear that I will defend to the utmost of my power the settlement of property within this realm, as established by the laws." Yet the very men who entered Parliament with this oath upon their lips have not ceased from striving to the utmost of their power to repeal the laws of mortmain and superstitious uses ; these being laws which certainly militate against the "regalities of St. Peter," and the "rights, privileges, and authority of the Holy Roman Church," which their Bishops were elsewhere sworn to defend.

"I do hereby disclaim, disavow, and solemnly abjure any intention to subvert the present Church establishment, as settled by law within this realm." In spite of this solemn abjuration, they have actually done the very thing in respect to Ireland, and will not shrink from doing it for England.

"I do solemnly swear that I never will exercise any privilege to which I am, or may become entitled, to disturb or weaken the Protestant religion or Protestant Government in the United Kingdom." But this was swearing beyond their powers. The Propaganda, which sends them hither, and rules over them now that they are here, employs them to labour hard for accomplishing the disturbance, weakening, and eventual destruction of the Protestant religion ; and they do not conceal that it is so. If the religion could be destroyed, a Protestant Government would not be any longer possible.

Such were the sworn engagements of the Roman Catholic Bishops, solemnly prescribed by Act of Parliament on the 13th of April, 1829 ; but that Act, in course of a few years, became a dead letter. The security, if any, is lost.

d. By the Act 13 and 14 George III., c. 35, all Students, Professors, Tutors, Trustees, etc., of the College of Maynooth, were bound to take an oath of allegiance to the Sovereign, including an abjuration of Papal authority, and of the doctrine that Popes have power to depose Kings, or to absolve subjects from their allegiance. But another Act, 30 and 31 Victoria, c. 75, A.D. 1867, enacts that an Oath therein named shall be substituted, in all cases, for the Oaths of Allegiance, Supremacy, and Abjuration. This new Oath reads as follows :—"I, A. B., do swear that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Victoria, and I do faithfully promise to maintain and support the succession to the Crown, as the same stands limited and settled by virtue of the Act passed in the reign of King William the Third, intituled 'An Act for the further limitation of the Crown, and better securing the rights and liberties of the subject, and of the subsequent Acts of Union with Scotland and Ireland.'"

But the Oath of 1867 leaves those who take it free to adopt the doctrine or opinion previously abjured, and to accept, and therefore act upon, the belief now imposed upon them that the Pope has a power superior to the power of Kings, and presents a very insufficient barrier to the force of the Episcopal Oath as it stands in the Pontifical, even with the slight alteration noted above. How insufficient is the Oath of 1867, or the slightly altered Consecration Oath, will at once appear, when we take into account the additional oath which is administered after the first before the ceremony of consecration is complete. It stands thus in the Roman Pontifical :—

"Question. Wilt thou to Blessed Peter the Apostle, to whom God hath given the power of binding and loosing, and to his Vicar our Lord, the Lord N., Pope N., and his successors the Roman Pontiffs, Faith, Subjection, and Obedience, according to canonical authority, in all things render?

"Answer. I WILL."*

Faith, which is more than civil allegiance ; Subjection, which is exclusive of it in its very nature, for "no man can serve two masters ;" and canonical Obedience in all things, which leaves nothing beyond the circle that is closely drawn around the person sworn, making it impossible for any man who in conscience holds himself to be bound by the oath he has taken to swear himself away to any other Lord than the Lord he names, which is now Pope Pius IX., who is declared to be not only infallible, but universally supreme. Such oaths are utterly contrary to the plain Word of God, where it is written :—"Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake : whether it be to the king, as supreme ; or unto governors." (1 Peter ii. 13, 14.) "Put them in mind

* "Interrogatio. Vis beato Petro Apostolo, cui a Deo data est potestas ligandi ac solvendi, ejusque Vicario Domino nostro, Domino N., Papæ N., suisque successoribus, Romanis Pontificibus, fidem, subjectionem, et obedientiam, secundum canonicam auctoritatem, per omnia exhibere?

"Respondet. Volo."

—Pontificale Romanum. De Consecratione Electi in Episcopum.

to be subject to principalities and powers, to obey magistrates." (Titus iii. 1.) "Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power but of God: the powers that be are ordained of God. Whosoever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God: and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation. For rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil." (Romans xiii. 1–3.)

Returning for a moment to the subject of this section, it seems necessary to observe that these modified oaths, slight as they are, become utterly worthless when they who have taken them are reminded that they are but as clauses in Concordats, temporary, and adapted to circumstances of the moment.. To borrow the appropriate phrase of Father Schrader, a recognised advocate of the Syllabus and all belonging to it, "Political Oaths of Bishops" rank far below the solemn Oath of Ceremony. He gives two of them in a work * bearing a certificate of the Pope's approval. One is in a Concordat with some American Republics :—"I swear and promise on God's Holy Gospels obedience and fidelity to the Government by the Constitution appointed to the Republic....., and I also promise that I will not take part with any proposal, or person, or counsel, which would be injurious to the independence of the nation, or to public tranquillity."

The other was for Austria while the Concordat lasted :—"I swear and promise on God's Holy Gospels, as becomes a Bishop, obedience and fidelity to the Imperial Royal Apostolic Majesty and to his successors. I also swear and promise that I will have no communication, and will be present with no counsel which would injure public tranquillity, and I will continue in no suspected union within nor without the limits of the Empire, and if I have knowledge of any public danger imminent, I will leave nothing undone to avert it." * The terms of this oath show that they who took it were not men above suspicion. It is not worth while to preserve the original Latin, which has no special significance ; and recent events, on both the North and South portions of the American continent, show clearly how useless such oaths have been.

Not only do Bishops and others appointed to offices of trust take the oath quoted from the Pontifical, but Cardinals take an oath when they receive the Red Hat. This oath is said to be in the Roman Ceremonial, which is not now accessible. Whatever it may be, his obedience binds the Cardinal to act up to the command laid on him when he received his hat. A good authority gives the Pope's words thus :—"To the praise of Almighty God and the ornament of the Holy Apostolic See, take the Red Hat, the special badge of the dignity of the Cardinalate, by which is signified that even unto death, and the shedding of blood therewith, for the exaltation of the Holy Faith, the peace and quiet of the Christian people, the increase and state of the most Holy Roman Church, thou shouldest show thyself intrepid." * As much as to say,—Cost what it may, death and bloodshed included, show thyself intrepid.

* Pius IX. als Papst und als König, s. 83, Politischer Eid der Bischöfe.

IMMACULATE CONCEPTION OF THE VIRGIN MARY.

WHEN the Pope was in refuge at Gaeta, after his flight from the insurgents in Rome, he addressed an Encyclical to the Patriarchs and others of the whole Catholic world, under date of "Purification of Mary, February 2nd, 1849," in hope of preparing the way for the adoption of a new article of doctrine. In that letter he declares that from his most tender years he loved nothing more dearly than the most blessed Virgin Mary, whom it was his delight to worship (colere) with singular piety and devotion, and the deepest emotion of his heart, and to perform such things as appeared most likely to procure her greater glory and praise, and be conducive to the promotion of her worship. Therefore, in the very beginning of his Pontificate, he seriously turned his thoughts and care to that momentous business, and never failed to offer humble and fervent prayers to Almighty God, that by the heavenly light of His grace He would enlighten his mind, and let him know what should be done. He declares himself very strongly encouraged to trust in the most Blessed Virgin, who is full of graces, as he believes, to bestow on Christian people in the heaviest calamities ; who has ever delivered them from the snares of all their enemies, and has avenged them of every assailant and destroyer. He asserts that she pities our most sad and grievous vicissitudes, and bitterest sorrows, and in this pity, with the most ample affection of her maternal mind, which is always intimately present, and by her most mighty protection before God she is willing to avert the scourges of Divine wrath, which afflict us because of our sins; and he assures them all that she is able and willing to calm the most raging storms of evil which, to the unspeakable anguish of their souls, afflict men for their sins. For her sins, the Church is everywhere tossed ; but the Virgin can dissipate our grief, and turn it into gladness.

Further on he expresses his most earnest desire that the persons whom he addresses would, with the greatest possible speed, be pleased to signify to him with what devotion their Clergy and faithful people are animated towards the Conception of the Immaculate Virgin, and with what desire they burn that the matter of the same be declared by the Apostolic See: and he longs especially to know what his venerable brethren themselves think in their excellent wisdom, and what they desire.*

* "Ad laudem Omnipotentis Dei, et Sanctæ Sedis Apostolicæ ornamentum, accipe Galerum rubrum, insigne singulare dignitatis Cardinalatus, per quod designatur, quod usque ad mortem, et sanguinis effusionem inclusive, pro exaltatione Sanctæ Fidei, pace et quiete populi Christiani, augmento et statu Sacrosanctæ Romanæ Ecclesiæ, te intrepidum exhibere debeas. In nomine Patris et Filii, etc."—Patricius Piccolominius. Sacrarum Cæremoniarum Sæ Romanæ Ecclesiæ, etc. Romæ, 1750.

He did not conceal his own desire; but, by so passionately giving it utterance, influenced their will, to say the least; and by speaking of her as possessed of the peculiar attributes of Godhead, he lets it be clearly understood that he does not propose to beatify the Virgin, or to canonise her as a Saint, but to incorporate her with the Holy Trinity, as being, in stainless perfection, nothing less than God.

Thus was the project launched; and we shall see how it succeeded. Meanwhile, we briefly note the origin and progress of the idea that the Virgin Mother of our Lord was not conceived and born in sin, as others are. Even those who profess to have accepted the fable ought to acknowledge that there is no ground for it in Holy Scripture. All that we can understand is, that what had been once counted a pious opinion, was at length taken as if it were a truth revealed. It is quite possible that when the Pope was a very little child, he was pleased with Virgin-worship, not knowing what immaculate conception meant. It was then natur a enough that in very unripe manhood the fascination would be continuous,—that it would cling to him, and he to it,—and that in distress and terror, during his Roman troubles, he would fancy that the importation of a new observance might be expedient, to divert the public from other thoughts.

"Pious opinion," let it be explained, is the name given to an opinion concerning doctrine or fact, before the doctrine is accepted as an Article of Faith, or the reality of the fact acknowledged as a subject of belief. Such was once the bodily presence of Christ in the Eucharist. Such was the transfer of the five wounds received by our Lord at the crucifixion to the body of St. Francis. These were mere pious opinions before Transubstantiation was made an Article of Faith, and while the Order of Franciscan monks was not yet created, but only in course of organisation by its intending Founder. In the year 1849, the Pope and his favourites, the Jesuits, were enthusiastically bent on changing the opinion of the Virgin's immaculacy into an authorised dogma, to be received under peril of the usual penalties of unbelief. Preceding Popes had moved the question, and many writers hastened to advocate the change: one, Cardinal Lambruschini, had written an elaborate dissertation. But the chief expounder of the matter was John Perrone, a member of the Society of Jesus, and Professor in the Roman College, whom this Pope afterwards created Cardinal in reward for a "Theological Disquisition on the question whether the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary ought to be defined in a Dogmatical Decree." The question, as Perrone puts it, was "whether or not it could be proved that the Blessed Virgin, in what they call her passive conception, or when her soul was created by God to take possession of her body, contracted the original defilement of sin, like all others of Adam's race. Or else, (if it be so preferred, since the nature of original sin, according to the opinion of theologians in general, following Anselm and Aquinas, consists in the privation of sanctifying grace, or original righteousness,) the question was whether it is proved that the soul of the Blessed Virgid was supplied with sanctifying grace, or the contrary." *

He traces the progress of the opinion from the time of St. Bernard, when the Canons of the Church of Lyon desired the appointment of a feast in honour of "her who had given birth to God." Bernard severely rebuked them for attempting a foolish novelty, and expressed his wonder that they should think of proceeding, without consulting the Roman Church, to set up a fe tival which was unknown to the Church, and should so act without the sanction of reason or of ancient tradition. "The singular prerogative of holy conception, and even that prerogative of immunity from all taint of sin which belongs to Christ alone, who was indeed conceived of the Holy Ghost. But to all other holy persons, as to the Deipara herself, (the giver of birth to God,) Bernard applied that sentence of David, 'I was shapen in iniquity; and in sin did my mother conceive me.' Yet," Perrone says, "Bernard freely allowed that some saints, and much more than any, the Holy Virgin, were adorned with holiness before their birth. Although there are not wanting authors of highest authority who maintain that the Abbot of Clairvaux was not speaking of the passive conception of the Virgin, but of the active."† It is needless to state again what the reader will find in the volume before him ‡ concerning the incessant controversy which was carried on between two contesting parties during seven hundred years; the Popes and their most devoted partisans always endeavouring to add this glory to the Virgin, and gain another festival of the first class for the Church.

Acts of authority, opportunely repeated, gradually broke the strength of controversy. The stubborn repetition of a false idea, of an opinion far from pious, made a vague impression on the popular mind that it might not be far from truth. Not only Popes, but minorities in councils sometimes interposed for silencing dispute, and enforcing a new belief. By command of Pope Nicholas III., or, as others think, Clement V., masses were said in Rome, in honour of the Immaculate Conception, before the assembled College of Cardinals. Other Churches followed the high example of innovation, and some communities, namely, the Benedictines, the Cistercians, and Celestines, with Carmelites, Trinitarians, and Redemptionists. These brought the fancy into fashion, and the influential bodies of Franciscans and Augustinians soon gave all their strength to make such celebrations a general

* Pius IX. als Papst und als König. Wien, Gran, und Pest, 1870, s. 13.

* De Immaculato B. V. Mariæ Conceptu, etc. J. Perrone. Monast. Guestph., 1848, pp. 7, 8. Perrone hailed the rising sun. His book was written in 1847, and must have been in course of preparation soon after the accession of Pius IX. He dedicated it to him in August, 1847. In October, 1847, he was honoured with a Papal Brief of impassioned commendation. A second edition in 1848 contains the Brief. The Pope and this Jesuit Professor were active fellow-labourers in forcing the new plant into existence.

† Ibid., p. 10.

‡ Pp. 472, 516, 519, supra.

and established custom. Yet those efforts provoked much earnest opposition, and the contest waxed more fierce. A voluminous literature rapidly accumulated on a subject too trifling, and too provocative of irreverence, to merit the favourable attention of men possessing common sense or piety.

The theologians of the Council of Basil took the controversy into consideration ; and, after it had been debated for more than two years, in the year 1439 the Fathers passed a decree of which the object was twofold :—First, to define that the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin was pious, and ought to be held by all Catholics, and that it was consistent with ecclesiastical worship and Catholic faith; and silence was enjoined on those who held the contrary. Then, the Feast was confirmed which had been held until that time under the name of Feast of the Conception, and was to be held for the future under the same name by all Churches.*

But this decree took no effect, the Council of Basil being repudiated by the legitimate Pope, Eugenius IV., when new tumults arose from the same controversy, and continued until Sixtus IV., 1476 or 1477, issued a Constitution granting many indulgences for ever to those who should recite a Canonical Office, or be present at a mass of the Immaculate Conception. This, however, did not suffice to establish the consummation of Mariolatry ; neither did a second Constitution in 1482, which condemned the opposite party, put the dissentients to silence. Neither did a threat of excommunication, in 1483, still the clamour which the preceding Constitutions had provoked.

The pious opinion, as it was profanely called, now became a furious party-cry, rather than a question of religious doctrine to be calmly submitted to the test of Divine revelation ; and so it continued until the Council of Trent, when the following remarkable decision marks the last effort that was made by the Italian managers of that Council to hush the quarrel, and betrays their failure to obtain votes enough to make the pious opinion an acknowledged Article of Faith :—"But this same sacred Synod declares that it is not its intention to comprehend in this Decree, where it treats of original sin, the blessed and immaculate Virgin Mary, mother of God ; but that the Constitutions of Pope Sixtus IV., of happy memory, which it now renews, are to be observed, etc."†

* J. Perrone, pp. 21, 22.

† "Declarat tamen hæc ipsa sancta Synodus non esse suæ intentionis comprehendere in hoc decreto, ubi de peccato originali agitur, beatam et Immaculatam Virginem Mariam, Dei genitricem ; sed observandas esse Constitutiones felicis recordationis Xysti Papæ IV., sub pœnis in eis Constitutionibus contentis, quas innovat."—Conc. Trid., Sess. v. Dec. de Peccato originali. In the Plantinian edition of the Acts of this Council, Antwerp, 1789, there is a note that this Declaration is wanting in the Antwerp and Paris edition of 1546, the Venetian of 1552, and in the Conciliorum Summa of Carranza, who was present at Trent, as is proved by the editions of Paris, 1559, and Antwerp, 1556 and 1600. It is wanting in the edition of Cologne, 1551 ; yet it is found in the Acts published by Melancthon, 1546, and in Calvin's Antidote, 1547. The first Roman Catholic edition that contains it is that of Milan, in 1547. The Roman of 1564, and others following, contain it. This diversity quite answers to the discord on the point which prevailed in the Council.

Such was the last utterance of the Papal Church on the subject, when Pius IX. ascended the throne in 1846. To raise an assertion of the sinless nature of her who, as they blasphemously say, gave birth to God—genitricem Dei—above all contradiction within the circles of Bishops and Clerks at least, was one of the cherished objects of his ambition : but that the reader may judge how far it is from being believed, and how dishonestly it has been presented to the world as an article of Catholic, or universal, faith, a few facts must be adduced. When the time for decisive action without the encumbrance of a deliberative Council seemed to have arrived, the Pope determined to call on all his Bishops severally, not collectively in Council, but asking each one to tell him in writing "with what devotion his Clergy and faithful people were animated towards the Conception of the Immaculate Virgin." By this measure there was not hazarded any public debate, or open expression of collective dissent. The spectacle of a divided Council was sagaciously avoided. The letters in reply were collected and printed at length in three volumes, under the title of "Opinions of the Catholic Episcopate on the dogmatic Definition of the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary."* These volumes were examined by the Rev. Dr. Pusey, well known as a profound and, we may be permitted to say, too friendly a student of Romanism in its most authentic sources. His account † of this important collection is too valuable to be overlooked. It cannot be much abbreviated, and no part of it must be omitted.

"In the individual collecting of opinions by letter, minorities had no voice. They had no collective existence. Each Archbishop or Bishop was but an unit, which could scarcely put forth itself, and which certainly could not assert itself in presence of infallibility. Pius IX. in his Constitution ignored the minority as if it had never existed. 'We were touched with no slight consolation when the responses of those venerable brethren came to us. For, writing back to us with an incredible happiness, joy, and eagerness, they not only asserted anew their own singular piety and mind, and that of the Clergy and people of each, towards the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin, but also asked of us, as it were, with a common vote, that the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin herself should be defined by our supreme judgment and authority.'"

How utterly this intimation of a common vote is inconsistent with truth, the following analysis by Dr. Pusey may show.

"The wishes expressed by the Italian, Spanish, and Portuguese Bishops were nearly unanimous ; and these formed nearly three-fifths of those who sent answers. Yet even from Italy came a distinct, well-worded objection from the Bishop of Mondovi, who 'could not dare,' even after the prayers of his diocese,

* Pareri dell' Episcopato Cattolico sulla Definizione dogmatica dell' Immacolato Concepimento della B. V. Maria. Not published, but printed for use at Rome.

† An Eirenicon. By E. B. Pusey, D.D. London, Oxford, and Cambridge, 1865, p. 126, seq.

to decide that there was evidence enough to erect the 'pious opinion' into a matter of faith, or that then was the best time to define it. Doubts were also expressed by the Cardinal Bishop of Viterbo and Toscanella, the Cardinal Archbishop of Urbino, 'with some of the most pious and learned of his Clergy,' 'fearing loss of souls.' The Cardinal Bishop of Ancona and Umana, the Bishops of Cervia and Otranto, and the Archbishop of Perugia, wished the decree to be tempered, and made indirect. The Bishop of Majorca felt the difficulties and dissuaded. The Archbishop of Milan, and five Bishops in the North of Italy, left the decision 'in these most difficult times, to the Holy See, to which is promised the special assistance of the Holy Spirit.' In Spain, the Bishop of Lugo wished the decree to be made indirect, if it should be given at all, his own mind being against it. The Bishop of Zamora wished that no note should be set on those who maintained the contrary, before or after the Council of Trent. Two very remarkable answers came from the Bishops of Jaca, in Portugal, and of Chiapo, in Mexico. The Bishop of Jaca much desired that the definition should be delayed until two learned works of divines of Salamanca, written in disproof of the testimonies of the Fathers alleged by Maracci, could be examined; the Bishop of Chiapo was constrained, though with much regret, to oppose the decision, as being unsupported by any clear testimony from Scripture or from tradition. Yet more striking, perhaps, is the answer of the Bishop of Ventimiglia, from Italy itself, resting his doubt on the probable intention of God the Holy Ghost, as evinced by His silence in Scripture. 'For that not without a purpose the origin of the most holy Mother is passed over by the Evangelist; her nativity is not described, nor is it recorded how she was conceived, (as the holy Bishop of Valence observes,) and the whole praise of her is touched upon in the very few words in which her Divine Maternity is declared, forces on me grave fear, lest the Holy Ghost, in the inscrutable counsel of His Wisdom, willed that her holy origin should remain hidden; so that the only cause of her singular honour revealed should be the glory of the Immaculate Conception of Him, the Holy and Immaculate High Priest, who was to bring cleansing to all besides.'

"The Irish Roman Catholic Bishops agreed: (although the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin reports the remarkable dissent of 'the Jesuit Fathers at Dublin, and almost all the Professors of Maynooth:') so did the five Vicars Apostolic in Scotland, (who reported that the cultus of the Blessed Virgin was the dearer to their people, because they alone in Scotland had it,) and the one Vicar Apostolic of Norway and Sweden with his five priests.

"Of the Archbishops and Bishops of France, no answer came from one fourth. The Archbishops of Paris and Rouen wrote earnestly to deprecate any decision, as did the Bishops of Coutances and Evreux. Chartres was anxious. Annecy, Meaux, Carcassonne, doubted. The Archbishop of Rheims, with the Bishops of Soissons, Amiens, Beauvais, Blois, wished the decree to be softened so as to leave those who disbelieved it free from the note of heresy (which would, I suppose, have left things much as they were before). Of those who had asked Gregory XVI. to define the doctrine, after nine years the Archbishop of Bourges feared that 'more evil than good would come from it.' The Bishop of Versailles hesitated, lest it should be an additional hindrance to the return of the Protestants, whom it was difficult to make believe what was already of faith in regard to her. The Bishop of Périgueux, much as he wished it, yet, 'in these most difficult times in which we live,' left the matter to the Pope, as did the Bishop of Angoulême. The Bishop of Angers expressed his doubts, stating that 'the same thoughts and fears were shared by some, at least, of his colleagues in the Episcopate, and by priests not less distinguished by learning than by piety towards the Blessed Virgin.' The statement is the more remarkable, on account of his strong opposite bias. 'We fully trust that she will bestow on the holy Church of God and the whole world new and unheard-of benefits, when, a decree supervening from the Holy See, so many men and women, so loved by God and His Son Jesus Christ, shall with one mouth, firm faith, exulting minds, confess that Mary was immaculate in her conception, etc.' [Yet this Mary-worshipper has not enough trust in his belief to confess it openly.] The Bishops, then, who requested the definition were but a bare majority of the Bishops of France (forty-one out of eighty). In a Gallican Council, it can hardly be doubted, that the earnest pleadings of the Archbishops of Paris and Rouen, and of the Bishop of Evreux, would have prevailed, and the question would have remained undecided.

"In Germany, the Apostolic Nuncio at Vienna wrote to Cardinal Antonelli that he had tried to elicit a favourable opinion from the Archbishops, and had failed. He said:—'I have written anew confidentially to the Archbishops of this monarchy to excite them to express their own opinion, and that of their Suffragans, on the important subject of the Immaculate Conception of the Madonna. Their silence hitherto, as I have had the honour to point out to your Eminence, can only be an argument that they are not inclined to a determination directed to declare the pious belief of the Immaculate Conception as a dogma.' The Archbishops and Bishops of the Austrian Empire are counted at one hundred and twenty-one, exclusive of those in the Austrian possessions in Italy, and of those in Carinthia, Carniola, Transylvania, whose numbers I do not know. Three out of nine of the Dalmatian Bishops wrote, expressing their assent; but these, also, are Italian. Of the one hundred and twenty-one Archbishops and Bishops, (any how, of the Bishops of the rest of the Austrian Empire out of Italy,) only four (out of twenty-one) Hungarian Bishops expressed agreement. From Moravia, the Archbishop of Olmütz and the Bishop of Brünn wrote earnestly, 'after mature deliberation, and fervidly imploring light from above,' expressing their wish that the decree should be delayed on account of the peril of souls among their people. The four Bohemian Bishops expressed the same desire on the same ground. The Archbishop of Gorizia and Gradisca, the Cardinal Archbishop of Salzburg, and the Bishop of Trieste, (which three alone wrote from Austria proper,) wrote, with different degrees of strength, requesting that things should remain as the Council of Trent had left them.

"From the Prussian territory the Archbishop of Breslau wrote against it with a respectful but touching solemnity, 'Dixi, et salvavi animam meam.'* Doubts were expressed by the Bishop of Munster. The Bishop of Paderborn expressed his wish that any decision should be delayed. The Bishop of Warmia mentioned the opinion of many (among others his Chapter) in favour of delay; gave no opinion, but declared that whatever the Pope might decree would be received as a Divine oracle. The Bishop of Trèves had doubted for a time on account of the un-Catholics, but decided that the decree would be advantageous, 'since it was the Blessed Virgin alone who destroyed all the heresies in the whole world.'

"In Hanover, the Bishop of Hildesheim reported that the greater part of his clergy thought that, at least in those parts, a dogmatic decree was neither necessary nor desirable. He himself left it to the Pope's 'wiser judgment.'

"In Hesse, 'Clergy, distinguished for knowledge, full of piety towards Mother Church,' dissuaded it. The Bishop of Fulda, like the Bishop of Trèves, held that, 'the greater the number of adversaries, the more the Church, who had to strive against the powers of darkness, ought to pray for her help and aid who bruised the serpent's head, the more extol and venerate by prayer her who, praying her Son, alone destroyed all heresies in the whole world.'

"In Nassau, the Apostolic Administrator of Limburg gave strong reasons against the decision, but acquiesced, because, the question having been raised, things could not remain as they were.

"The Cardinal Archbishop of Malines stated, that 'in these parts, and especially in the neighbouring kingdoms of France and Holland, ecclesiastics, conspicuous for piety, knowledge, and prudence, feared lest heretics and unbelievers should take fresh occasion to calumniate the Catholic Church, as though she invented new dogmas, and paid undue worship to the most holy Mother of God, whence many, who were inclined to embrace the faith, might turn back.'

"In Bavaria, the Archbishop of Munich 'could not decide about the expediency of defining, in the present circumstances of the Church, for fear of occasioning fresh dissensions where Catholics were mixed with heretics.' The Bishop of Bamberg held that the evidence was not strong enough. 'To the body of the more erudite and learned in our Germany the matter does not seem so clear, that (whatever the very learned and illustrious Tramontanes have recently written) they can think that this opinion, which has hitherto been cherished as pious, should be inserted among dogmas which no one may doubt.' He begged that the decision might be left to a General Council at some future time.

* "I have spoken, and have delivered my own soul."

"In Switzerland and Savoy, the Bishop of St. Gall, with his counsellors, thought that the dogmatic definition would not increase the devotion towards the Immaculate Conception, and that it was superfluous at that time, and ill-advised. The Archbishop of Chambéry held that the 'tradition was not sufficiently clear to make it an Article of Faith and a true dogma, to be believed by all under pain of mortal sin,' and so thought it best to 'follow the prudent line of the Council of Trent, by either abstaining from defining, or at least defining the question only indirectly and broadly, by asserting that the cultus of the Catholic Church towards the conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary was pious and holy.'

"Even the Patriarch of the Melchites in the Patriarchates of Antioch, Alexandria, and Jerusalem reported, 'Some of my Bishops think best, on account of the very many heretics abounding here in the Levant, not, without great necessity, to multiply Articles of Faith, in order to give them no motive to speak, however unjustly, against the Apostolic See.'

"The Vicar Apostolic of Constantinople dissuaded the definition on theological grounds: 'Notwithstanding the weight of the recent theological dissertations on this point, the reserve of the Scriptures in regard to this privilege, the hesitation of the Holy Fathers to treat the said question, the delays of the Church itself to decide it, united to the dispositions of spirits in various countries, amid Catholics, too, in this century, in which reason, priding itself, burns to wage war with faith, make me judge before God that the question ought to remain undecided; and even should the Church support the instruction that Mary was conceived immaculate, that it should not impose the obligation to believe this as a doctrine of faith.'

"A remarkable response, objecting to the decree with much solidity and clearness, came from the Vicar Apostolic of Mysore, and another from Coimbatoor. The Vicar Apostolic of Patna (a German) sent his adhesion, with the remarkable addition, 'If the tradition be established by recent authors.' The Coadjutor Bishop at Calcutta falls in with 'the greater number of Bishops.' The Vicar Apostolic of Central Tonkin said that he could neither affirm nor deny that the pious opinion should be placed among the Articles of Faith, having no means to examine duly; and that, for himself, he trusted the infallibility of the Apostolic See.

"A remarkable hiatus occurs in the United States. In 1849 there were twenty-eight Roman Catholic Bishops in those States. One only answer came from Oregon, containing the assent of the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Oregon city, the Bishops of Vancouver and Walla Valla."

Independently of its value in relation to the history of this new dogma, the summary now before us is valuable as exhibiting the absence of consent from half the Papal Church to the formal imposition of the Pope's pleasure on the whole body of its ministers and members. It also demonstrates the lack of truthfulness in the Pontiff who claims the honour of infallibility, but who published the dogmatic decision in full knowledge of the disapproval of so large a proportion of his Bishops, and yet pretended that he had nearly, if not absolutely, their unanimous consent. After five years' time for pondering their answers, and for deliberating on the course proper to be taken by one who professed to be the oracle of wisdom and the channel of all truth from God to men, he assembled a vast concourse of ecclesiastics at Rome, and with the utmost pomp of ceremony Pope Pius IX., on the eighth day of December, 1854, in the Church of St. Peter, read with a loud voice the Dogmatic Decree so long promised, containing the following "definition:"—

"Since We have never ceased, in humility and fasting, to offer Our private prayers, and the public prayers of the Church, to God the Father, through His Son, that by the virtue of the Holy Spirit He would deign to direct and confirm Our mind, the help of the universal Court of heaven having been implored, and the Spirit the Paraclete having been called upon with groans, and He thus at the same time breathing his approval, for the honour of the Holy and undivided Trinity, for the beauty and adorning of the God-bearing Virgin, for the exaltation of the Catholic Faith, and the increase of the Christian Religion, by the authority of Our Lord Jesus Christ, of the blessed Apostles Peter and Paul, and by Our own (authority), We declare, pronounce, and define that the doctrine which holds that the Blessed Virgin Mary, at the first instant of her conception, by a singular privilege and grace of the Omnipotent God, in view of the merits of Jesus Christ, the Saviour of mankind, was preserved immaculate from all stain of original sin, has been revealed by God, and therefore should firmly and constantly be believed by all the Faithful. Wherefore if any shall dare—which God avert—to think otherwise than as it has been defined by Us, let them be told, as indeed they know, that they are condemned by their own judgment, that they have suffered shipwreck of the faith, and have revolted from the unity of the Church; and besides, by their own act they subject themselves to the penalties justly established, if what they think they should dare to signify by word, writing, or any other outward means." *

On the first day of August, 1854, the Pope summoned his faithful to a jubilee in Rome, to begin on the eighth day of December, the day thenceforth to be consecrated to the Virgin in honour of her immaculate conception. He made this appointment of the day in a Secret Consistory of the Cardinals, to whom he brought the glad tidings of great joy. "Now, Venerable Brothers," said he exultingly, "now you see near at hand that most to be desired and most gladsome day when the Immaculate Conception of the most holy Virgin Mary, the Giver of Birth to God, will be decreed BY OUR SUPREME AUTHORITY." *

The day came. The festivity, if we may attach any credit to the florid descriptions of the scene in St. Peter's from the pens of Jesuits, was very grand. Probably, as there has not been another such since that day, there will not be another such again, and it is worthy of observation that there was no provision made for the celebration of the intended great annual festival. It was not until 1863, after nine years' waste by death had thinned the ranks of episcopal objectors who in 1854 had more or less decidedly objected to the Pope's proposal, and, under Jesuit management, friendly Mariolaters had been put into their places, that this necessary work was done. Then Pius issued a Bull prescribing to the whole Church a new office, and a new Mass for the High Feast of the Immaculate Conception. "Forasmuch as we know it to be necessary that the law of praying should agree with the law of believing, We have therefore been careful to give Our attention to the preparation of an Office with a new Mass, as well on the Eve, when it is granted, as on the Feast of the Immaculate Conception. And now when a work of this kind may be brought to its desired accomplishment, the Office aforesaid, and a Mass corresponding, We consider should be approved by Our Apostolic authority, and by the same authority We command that this Office and Mass only be used by every one of the secular and regular Clergy, not excepting the Nuns, (by whatsoever title they are bound,) for their devotions in Canonical Hours. By Our Apostolical authority, we abolish and proscribe whatever other Office and whatever other Mass for the Immaculate Conception, even if the rites are different from the Roman, and although the offices have been conceded by any particular privilege, even to any regular Order." † So absolute and universal an imposition could not have been effected earlier, nor could it be attempted then without stirring great dissatisfaction in some quarters.

* "Postquam nunquam intermisimus in humilitate et jejunio privatas Nostras et publicas Ecclesiæ preces Deo Patri per Filium ejus offerre, ut Spiritus Sancti virtute mentem Nostram dirigere et confirmare dignaretur, implorato universæ cœlestis Curiæ præsidio, et advocato cum gemitibus Paracleto Spiritu, eoque sic adspirante, ad honorem Sanctæ et Individuæ Trinitatis, ad decus et ornamentum Virginis Deiparæ, ad exaltationem Fidei Catholicæ et Christianæ Religionis augmentum, auctoritate Domini Nostri Jesu Christi, beatorum Apostolorum Petri et Pauli, ac Nostra, Declaramus, pronunciamus et definimus, doctrinam quæ tenet beatissimam Virginem Mariam in primo instanti suæ conceptionis fuisse singulari omnipotentis Dei gratia et privilegio, intuitu meritorum Christi Jesu Salvatoris humani generis, ab omni originalis culpæ labe præservatam immunem, esse a Deo revelatam, atque idcirco ab omnibus fidelibus firmiter constanterque credendam. Quapropter si qui secus ac a Nobis definitum est, quod Deus avertat, præsumpserint corde sentire, ii noverint, ac porro sciant, se proprio judicio condemnatos, naufragium circa fidem passos esse, et ab unitate Ecclesiæ defecisse, ac præterea facto ipso suo semet pœnis a jure statutis subjicere si quod corde sentiunt, verbo aut scripto, vel alio quovis externo modo significare ausi fuerint."—Letters Apostolic of Pius IX., Ineffabilis Deus, December, 1854.

* "Jam enim prope esse videtur, Venerabiles Fratres, optatissimus ille æque ac jucundissimus dies, quo Immaculatus sanctissimæ Dei Genitricis Virginis Mariæ Conceptus suprema Nostra auctoritate decernatur."—Pius IX. als Papst und als König, s. 15.

† "Quoniam necessarium esse novimus, ut cum lege credendi lex conveniat supplicandi, idcirco eo curas Nostras convertimus ut novum conderetur Officium cum nova Missa tam in Vigilia, ubi concessa est, quam in festo Immaculatæ Conceptionis. Jam vero quum hujusmodi opus ad optatum exitum perductum sit, memoratum Officium, Missamque respondentem.. auctoritate Nostra Apostolica approbandum existimavimus..eademque auc-

This assumption of independent power to define a dogma, and enforce belief in defiance of all human opposition, and in contempt of Divine revelation, the only real rule of faith, is unspeakably exorbitant, and equally offensive: yet the way was made for it by a distinction with which few persons can be familiar. The distinction is devised between three kinds of tradition, the Apostolic, the Ecclesiastical, and the Divine, which shall be now explained.

But there is yet another kind which the Jesuits profess to abominate, but have nevertheless accepted from ancient heretics. This tale of the conception comes from what is called the Apocrypha of the New Testament. The Gospel of St. James the Less* is the classic writing on the subject in the second century, and it is repeated elsewhere. According to the unknown author, Anna, wife of Joachim, and mother of the Virgin Mary, was barren like Sara of old, and like Elisabeth. "And behold, the angel of the Lord stood by her, saying, Anna! Anna! The Lord God hath given ear to thy prayer. Thou shalt conceive and bring forth, and thy seed shall be celebrated in all the world. And Anna said, The Lord my God liveth: whether I bring forth male or female, I will present it a gift to the Lord my God, and it shall be to minister to Him all the days of its life."† Joachim, too, receives an annunciation from another angel, and is immediately cleansed from sin. After that he returns to his house justified. In due course Anna conceives, bears a female child, and calls her name Mary.‡ In her early infancy she gave signs of sanctity;§ having completed her third year, her parents took her to the temple, laid her on the third step of the altar, and left her there, where she danced for joy, and showed no desire to see her home again.‖ Pure as a dove, she grew up in the house of the Lord, and received her food from the hands of an angel.¶ After this, the New Testament narrative of the birth of Jesus is parodied. Sixteen or seventeen centuries later, the Pope has embraced the profane fable, and declared it to be an Article of Faith, but without owning his original authority.

DIVINE TRADITION.

TOTALLY distinct from the idea of a truth made known to the Apostles, but not recorded by them, and transmitted orally from generation to generation, like the tradition of an oral law entertained by the Talmudists, is the theory of Divine tradition in the Church of Rome, that it is no less than Revelation directly received from God. In addition to what has been already said in the Chapter on Tradition, we have now to show the state of doctrine with regard to the highest kind of tradition, as taught by the Pope himself, when speaking ex cathedrâ, and therefore, as he pretends, infallible. Beyond the common meaning of the word, Peter Dens very clearly describes the doctrine of his Church; and a few sentences from his System of Theology will serve as key to the full meaning of the present Pope in some of his most formal utterances. Dens writes thus:—

"Q. How is Tradition divided?

"A. 1. By reason of origin, or of its author, it is divided into Divine, Apostolic, and Ecclesiastical Tradition.

"2. By reason of matter, into Dogmatic, Ritual, and Moral Tradition.

"3. By reason of duration, into perpetual and temporary.

"4. By reason of place, into universal and particular.

"Q. What Tradition is called Divine?

"A. It is the unwritten Word of God, or it is truth divinely revealed to the Church, and by our elders transfused to their posterity without writing of canonical authority. Examples of Divine Tradition are,—That there are seven sacraments, neither more nor fewer; That there are four Gospels; That the God-bearer remained ever Virgin; That infants are to be baptized; and various things relating to the matters and the forms of sacraments."

On these examples of Divine Tradition enough has been already said. Dens resumes:—

"Q. What authority has Divine Tradition?

"A. Divine Tradition has equal authority with Holy Scripture, for both are truly the Word of God. This only is the difference,—that the sentence of the Church (propositio ecclesiæ) may be more clearly manifested to us, it fixed the catalogue of canonical books, and approved the (Latin) Vulgate to be authentic: but the Church has not made a catalogue of Divine Traditions, but on occasion puts forth one now, and then another.

"Apostolic Tradition has the same authority as decrees of Apostolic institution.

"Ecclesiastical Tradition is of the same authority as laws and constitutions ecclesiastical; consequently the Pontiff can change both.

"Q. Then what Tradition is a Rule of Faith?

"A. A merely Apostolic or Ecclesiastical Tradition is not a Rule of Faith, because neither the one nor the other is divinely revealed; but a Divine Tradition is truly a Rule of Faith, for it is a Word of God, no less than Holy Scripture. This Tradition, since heretics impugn it to their utmost, we shall establish."*

In consistence with this doctrine Pope Pius IX. has both spoken and acted. In his Letters Apostolic conveying the dogmatic "definition of the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mother of God," he discourses of the Church as having received the doctrine directly from above. "Which original innotoritate præcepimus, ut hoc unice Officium et Missam quicumque de Clero sæculari et regulari, non exclusis Monialibus, ad Horas Canonicas persolvendas, quocumque titulo teneantur, adsumere debeant. Auctoritate Nostra Apostolica abolemus et proscribimus quodcumque aliud Officium et quamcumque aliam Missam de immaculata conceptione, etiam si sint ritus a Romano diversi, ac licet singulari privilegio concessa fuerint, etiam cuicumque Ordini regulari."—Quod jam pridem, September 25th, 1863.

* Codex Apocryphus Novi Testamenti, Op. et Stud. J. C. Thilo. Lipsiæ, 1832. Protevangelium Jacobi Minoris.

† Id., cap. iv. ‡ Cap. v. § Cap. vi. ‖ Cap. vii. ¶ Cap. viii.

* Peter Dens. Tractatus de Virtutibus, No. 66.

cence of the august Virgin agreeing completely with her admirable holiness, and with the most excellent dignity of the Mother of God, the Catholic Church, which ever taught by the Holy Spirit, is the pillar and ground of the truth, as possessing a doctrine divinely accepted, and comprehended in the deposit of heavenly revelation, has constantly laid down in various forms, cherishing and illustrating it from day to day more and more without ceasing, by splendid facts."*

Not content with claiming the honour of receiving Divine revelation directly from heaven for the Church, he presumes to declare himself the channel of such revelation. Moses, after being on the Mountain alone with God, could not have spoken more confidently of having received a Divine communication to be openly delivered, than Pius IX. spoke when introducing his dogmatic definition. He not only professes to believe in such inspiration for the Church at large, imparting that direction and confirmation of the mind for which we ought to pray continually, but pretends to have sought and obtained a direct communication from the Holy Ghost of the dogma, which, contrary to much earnest expostulation, without the shadow of proof from Holy Scripture, to the disgust of some, and to the grief of others, he published, and commanded all to believe, under peril of the indignation of Almighty God. The mass of Tradition may, by such means as this, be indefinitely increased.

CANONIZATIONS IN 1862.

When Naples and Sicily, Tuscany, Venice, Lombardy, and the Duchy of Parma, with Romagna and the other Papal States north of Urbino, were united to the kingdom of Sardinia under Victor Emmanuel, now King of Italy, and the disaffection of all the States of the Church threatened the Pope with loss of temporal power, Pius IX. entered fully into that course of action which will, no doubt, prove to have hastened the annihilation of the Papacy.

The pageant of 1854, in connection with the publication of the new dogma of the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary, had produced no perceptible effect on the condition of the Church, except betraying its want of unanimity. Successive revolutions, followed by fruitless yet distracting reactions, with the social misery ever attendant on such a state of things, kept the Court of Rome in perpetual agitation, while the populations of the dependent States became more and more desirous of annexation to the new Italian kingdom, and ever more weary of the oppression of the Papal Government. For the last eight or nine years the Pope had been driven to look to France and Spain for protection against the Romans: but help from such sources could only be temporary, and he seemed driven to trust only to such resources as could be found within the Church, and might be rallied by help of the Priests, evoking, through them, the sympathy of the people, as a power to be set in antagonism to the Governments of Europe.

Or if a reason of religion must be sought rather than one of policy, it is to be found in an Allocution delivered to a Secret Consistory, held on the 23rd of December, 1861, where he says to the Cardinals, "Since in these most turbulent and troublous times, to the incredible pain of Our mind, this Apostolic See is vexed with so many injuries, the Church is lacerated with so many wounds, especially in Italy, and in various parts of America and elsewhere, where the liberty, the rites, and the doctrine of the Church itself are miserably violated and attacked, and civil society is afflicted with so many evils, We are therefore exceedingly desirous to have new patrons in the presence of God, who, in such a perilous state of affairs, may, by their most availing prayers, obtain that the so horrible tempest of evils may be dispelled, and the Catholic Church and civil society may gain the peace which is so much desired."*

Whatever, then, was the motive, the doctrine taught is that the intercession of the only Mediator between God and men is insufficient; that the Virgin and all the saints, in addition to Christ, are also unequal to the task of moving God to protect the Church and civil society; and that therefore a new band of heavenly patrons must be found to meet the great emergency. The same cry is piteously repeated, and at length, on the 8th of July, 1862, he issues three Bulls for the canonization of twenty-three Franciscan Friars martyred in Japan, three Japanese Jesuits also martyred in Japan, and one Trinitarian Priest—twenty-seven in all. In order that the canonization of these persons might be performed with due pomp, there had been a numerous assemblage of Bishops in Rome in June, 1862, and, on the day after the ceremony, he addressed the Cardinals of the Roman Church, with the Patriarchs and Primates, the Archbishops and Bishops assembled in Rome on that occasion, and the Bishops of Italy and beyond that were not able to attend in consequence of the state of affairs at that time. The Bishops, on their part, presented to the Pope a very remarkable Declaration, bearing two hundred and sixty-five signatures.

They recited to their "Most Blessed Father" the claims which, like his predecessors, he continually

* "Quam originalem augustæ Virginis innocentiam cum admirabili ejusdem sanctitate, præcelsaque Dei Matris dignitate omnino cohærentem Catholica Ecclesia, quæ a Sancto semper edocta Spiritu columna est ac firmamentum veritatis, tamquam doctrinam possidens divinitus acceptam, et cœlestis revelationis deposito comprehensam multiplici continenter ratione, splendidisque factis magis in dies explicare, proponere ac fovere nunquam destitit."

* "Cum turbulentissimis hisce et asperrimis temporibus incredibili animi Nostri dolore hæc Apostolica Sedes tot divexetur injuriis, Ecclesia tot laceretur vulneribus, in Italia præsertim, et in variis Americæ aliisque regionibus, ubi ipsius Ecclesiæ libertas, jura, ac doctrina miserandum in modum violantur, oppugnantur, ac civilis societas tot affligatur malis, idcirco summopere optamus novos apud Deum habere patronos, qui in tanto rerum discrimine validissimis suis precibus impetrent, ut, tam horribili discussa malorum procella, optatissimam Catholica Ecclesia et civilis societas assequatur pacem."—Als Papst und als König, s. 21.

makes to be the Vicar of Christ, successor of St. Peter, and recipient of the Holy Spirit of inspiration. The language is highly wrought, and far superior in style to the vituperative Bulls and Briefs of Pius himself. The old Egyptian priests never attributed godhead to the proudest of the Pharaohs in language of more absolute and servile adoration, as if he were himself the Father of the gods. A few lines will confirm this view of their famous Declaration, where they speak as if standing in the presence of God :—

"A new ardour inflames our hearts. The light of faith more vividly enlightens our mind. A holier love enraptures our soul. We feel our tongues vibrate with flames of that sacred fire which kindled the most gentle heart of Mary, when the Apostles were sitting round her, with a more ardent desire for the salvation of mankind, and impelled the Apostles themselves to proclaim the mighty works of God.

"Therefore we render abundant thanks to Thy Blessedness that thou permittest us to approach the Pontifical throne in these times most difficult, to comfort thee afflicted, and lay open to thee our own feelings, and the feelings of the clergy and the people committed to our care. To thee with one mouth and one mind we acclaim, praying for thee all that is joyful, all that is good. Live long, O Holy Father, and be strong to govern the Catholic Church! Go on, as thou doest, to protect her with thy strength, to direct her with thy prudence, to adorn her with thy virtues. Go before us as a good Father, with thy example; feed the sheep and the lambs with heavenly food; refresh them with the waters of heavenly wisdom. For to us Thou art the Master of sound doctrine; Thou art the centre of unity; Thou art the unfailing light of the people, prepared by Divine wisdom. Thou art the rock, and the foundation of the Church itself, against which the gates of hell never shall prevail. When Thou speakest, we hear Peter. When Thou decidest, we obey Christ. We behold Thee amidst so great troubles and so many tempests, with serene countenance and undisturbed mind, performing the functions of thy sacred office, unconquered and erect." *

* "Corda nostra novus inflammat ardor, vividior fidei lux mentem illuminat, sanctior animam corripit amor. Linguas nostras flammis illius sacri ignis vibrantes sentimus quæ Mariæ, cui assidebant Apostoli, mitissimum cor ardentiori pro hominum salute desiderio incendebant, ipsos vero Apostolos ad magnalia Dei prædicanda impellebant.

"Plurimas igitur agentes Beatitudini tuæ gratias, quæ nos ad Pontificium solium difficillimis hisce temporibus accurrere, te afflictum solari, nostrosque tibi cleri item ac populi nostræ curæ commissorum animi sensus aperire permiseris, tibi uno ore unaque mente acclamamus, omnia fausta, cuncta bona adprecantes. Vive diu, Sancte Pater, valeque ad Catholicam regendam Ecclesiam. Perge, ut facis, eam tuo robore tueri, tua prudentia dirigere, tuis exornare virtutibus. Præi nobis, ut bonus Pastor, exemplo, oves et agnos cœlesti pabulo pasce, aquis Sapientiæ cœlestis refice. Nam tu sanæ doctrinæ nobis Magister, tu unitatis centrum, tu populi lumen indeficiens a divina Sapientia præparatum. Tu petra es, et ipsius Ecclesiæ fundamentum, contra quod inferorum portæ nunquam prævalebunt. Te loquente, Petrum audimus; te decernente, Christo obtemperamus. Te miramur inter tantas molestias totque procellas fronte serena et imperturbato animo sacri muneris partibus fungentem, invictum et erectum."—Recueil des Allocutions, etc. Declaratio Episcoporum in Appendice, p. 520.

Supposing this to have expressed the mind of the entire episcopate of the Papal Church, it would have been a very effective introduction to the Council of the Vatican; but we shall soon show that there was no such unanimity. It is but an example of the clever, yet reckless, contrivance of the leaders of that Council. It was the voice of Rome and the suburban region; not even of Italy; certainly not of the world.

When a Pope delivers his judgment or his pleasure by word of mouth, it is said that the oracle has spoken. The Oracle spoke on this occasion, giving hearty and entire approval to all the adoration of the select company of Bishops :—"The sentiments which you have thus far expressed to us, Venerable brothers and Beloved sons, have given us the highest gladness; for they are a pledge of your love towards this Holy See." A few glowing words of satisfaction, and the Apostolic Blessing, made their words his own.

ENCYCLICAL AND SYLLABUS OF 1864.

On the 8th of December, 1864, on the completion of the tenth year "after the Dogmatical definition of the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary, Mother of God," Pope Pius IX. dated an Encyclical Letter to Patriarchs, Prelates, Archbishops, and Bishops. It is not worth translation or analysis, being nothing more than insipid declamation. But the "Syllabus of Errors" is very important, being a collection of propositions condemned as erroneous. It is not necessary to the object of the present Supplement to transcribe the entire Syllabus; and therefore, passing over the notes of errors which every believer in Divine Revelation must condemn, and such as it does not concern us now to treat, we will copy so much only as relates to the Council for which the document was designed to be preparatory.

I. Absolute Pantheism, Naturalism, and Rationalism. 1–7.
II. Moderate Rationalism. 8–14.
III. Indifferentism and Latitudinarianism. 15–18. The Pope may deal as he pleases with all these, and with Protestantism (18) also, which is best commended by Popish condemnation.
IV. Socialism, Communism, Clandestine Societies, Bible Societies, and Clerico-liberal Societies.

All these may be left to the mercy of the Encyclical, except the Bible Societies, with which all Christendom and the world is concerned. The condemnation of Bible Societies is found in the Brief Qui pluribus, (November 9th, 1846,) where they are described as intended for the overthrow of the Church of Rome, which is indeed the certain ultimate effect of the publication of the Word of God; but the operation of Bible Societies is world-wide; and it is only ignorance or malevolence which can describe them as merely anti-Popish institutions. The only assertion worthy of contradiction is that of the Encyclical Nostis et nobiscum, (December 8th, 1849,) which represents the Bibles we circulate as corruptly translated and wilfully perverted. The translations speak for themselves; and, although the translators would probably be the first, in every case, to welcome faithful revision, the work of exact translation being confessedly difficult, the answer to this trite calumny cannot be better given than in the words of a former Bishop of Astorga to the Congregation of the Index, as related by himself to the present writer forty years ago. At their request he had examined all or most of the versions into modern European languages, circulated by the British and Foreign Bible Society; and had not found in any of them one of the passages quoted in controversy with Protestants to be rendered incorrectly, or so as to indicate any controversial bias. He advised their Eminences not to calumniate the Protestants. He, Don Felix Torres Amat, had spent thirty years in elaborating a Spanish version of the whole Bible, and was in every respect a trustworthy witness on such a question, being himself one of the most eminent Spanish Bishops.

V. Errors concerning the Church and its rights. 19–38. This section teems with error.

19. "The Church is not a true and perfect society altogether free, nor does it possess power by its own proper and constant rights conferred on it by its Divine Founder; but it belongs to the civil power to define what are the rights of the Church, and the limits within which it is entitled to exercise the said rights."*

This question of the boundary which separates the two jurisdictions, the civil and the ecclesiastical, will occur further on. Where it lies cannot be decided by either power independently of the other; nor can it be safely determined without absolute submission by both to the teaching of Holy Scripture, of which both must judge.

20. "The ecclesiastical power should not exercise its authority without the permission and assent of the civil government."†

This raises questions which cannot be treated successfully until the previous question has been decided.

21. "The Church has no power of defining dogmatically that the religion of the Catholic Church is the only true religion."‡

Every Church must decide questions of doctrine for itself as best it can; but no Church may override the private judgment of its members, each of whom must answer for himself to God; yet no private judgment should be formed in haste or self-conceit.

22. "The obligation by which Catholic masters and writers are altogether restricted, is binding in those things only which are proposed by the infallible judgment of the Church to be believed by all as dogmas of faith."§

With this alleged error we are not concerned. It can only befall members of a Church whose Ministers pretend to be infallible.

23. "Roman Pontiffs and Œcumenical Councils have gone beyond the limits of their power; have usurped the rights of Princes, and have even erred in defining matters of faith and morals."*

Far from being an error, this is a cardinal historic truth.

24. "The Church has no power to employ force, nor any temporal power, direct or indirect."†

To the apprehension of Popes and Cardinals this is a grievous error; but to every man who loves his country, honours his Sovereign, obeys the laws, and understands the Bible, it is an indisputable truth. But if the Church has the power of employing force, it may have its Inquisition, may dethrone Kings, may lay interdicts on nations, may stir up subjects to revolt, may make war; and, if open force is impracticable, such a Church may employ secret force. The Church of the Popes has done both; and, in self-defence against it, every wise man will act up to the spirit of the twenty-fourth "error" of the Syllabus of Pius IX. It expresses a fundamental principle of the British Constitution.

25. "Besides the power inherent in the Episcopate, another attribute is the temporal power, either expressly or tacitly conceded by the civil government, and which may therefore be revoked by the civil government, if so it please."‡

Wherever the civil government has conceded temporal power to ecclesiastical persons, as such, the only remedy such a government can have is the withdrawal of such power. Prince-bishop or Pope-king is an incongruity which, sooner or later, must be ended.

26. "The Church has no native and legitimate right to acquire and possess property."§

Experience has proved that the right of acquiring and possessing real property cannot be allowed to corporate bodies without oversight and restriction of the law. Under such oversight, and with due precaution against such abuses as have occurred in every country, ecclesiastical bodies in the British Empire both acquire and possess.

27. "The Sacred Ministers of the Church and the Roman Pontiff are to be utterly excluded from all charge and dominion over temporal things."‖

This is much nearer truth than error.

28. "It is not lawful for Bishops, without permission of the Government, to promulgate even Letters Apostolic."¶

* "Ecclesia non est vera perfectaque societas plane libera, nec pollet suis propriis et constantibus juribus sibi a divino suo fundatore collatis; sed civilis potestatis est definire, quæ sint Ecclesiæ jura ac limites, intra quos eadem jura exercere queat."

† "Ecclesiastica potestas suam auctoritatem exercere non debet absque civilis gubernii venia et assensu."

‡ "Ecclesia non habet potestatem dogmatice definiendi religionem Catholicæ Ecclesiæ esse unice veram religionem."

§ "Obligatio, qua Catholici magistri et scriptores omnino adstringuntur, coarctatur in iis tantum, quæ ab infallibili Ecclesiæ judicio dogmata ab omnibus credenda proponuntur."

* "Romani Pontifices et Concilia œcumenica a limitibus suæ potestatis recesserunt, jura principum usurparunt, atque etiam in rebus fidei et morum definiendis errarunt."

† "Ecclesia vis inferendæ potestatem non habet, neque potestatem ullam temporalem directam vel indirectam."

‡ "Præter potestatem episcopatui inhærentem, alia est attributa temporalis potestas a civili imperio vel expresse vel tacite concessa, revocanda propterea, cum libuerit, a civili imperio."

§ "Ecclesia non habet nativum ac legitimum jus acquirendi ac possidendi."

‖ "Sacri Ecclesiæ ministri Romanusque Pontifex ab omni rerum temporalium cura ac dominio sunt omnino excludendi."

¶ "Episcopis, sine Gubernii venia, fas non est vel ipsas apostolicas litteras promulgare."

The Government that suffers publications of the kind is either very weak, or needs to be very strong, but cannot, in either case, be very wise.

29. "Graces conceded by the Roman Pontiff should be considered of no effect unless they have been implored by the Government."*

To implore such graces would now be a ridiculous mistake; and for a Pope to pretend to grant them would be but a harmless impertinence.

30. "The immunity of the Church and of ecclesiastical persons took its rise from the civil right." †

Of this there can be little doubt; but the proposition is too general.

31. "[The privilege of an] ecclesiastical court for temporal causes of Clergymen, whether civil or criminal, ought to be altogether abrogated, even without consulting the Apostolic See, or heeding its reclamations." ‡

It is the conviction of every enlightened legislature that all subjects should be under the same law, and amenable to the same court for temporal offences.

32. "Without any violation of natural right and equity, the personal immunity may be abrogated, by which Clergymen are exempted from service in the army; but civil progress requires this abrogation, especially in society constituted under a more liberal form of government."§

This is an error, but it demands the single note that in a Church where the Clergy excite sedition and take up arms against the State, when so it pleases them, they ought to be deprived of an immunity due to the sanctity of a profession of which they prove themselves unworthy, and which they practically abandon.

33. "It does not pertain only to an ecclesiastical power of jurisdiction to direct, by a peculiar and native right, theological instruction."‖

This might well enough pass for an error, if the theological teaching were not such as we have now before us in the present Syllabus,—the false and destructive teaching of the Vatican.

34. "The doctrine of those who compare the Roman Pope to a free Prince, and so acting in the universal Church, is the doctrine which prevailed in the middle age."¶

This is no error, but an historic truth.

35. "Nothing forbids the Supreme Pontificate being transferred by the sentence of a General Council, or by the act of all nations, from the Bishop and city of Rome to another Bishop and another city."*

But what if the Supreme Pontificate itself has vanished away?

36. "The definition of a National Council admits of no dispute; and a civil administration can bring the matter to this conclusion."†

The Pope affirms the converse of this proposition, which means that he disputes the validity of any national decision, and would, if possible, prevent the civil administration of Italy, for example, from insisting on his removal to another city, or to another country.

37. "National Churches can be instituted apart from the authority of the Roman Pontiff, and entirely separated from him."‡

This problem is in process of solution.

38. "The excessive wilfulness of Roman Pontiffs contributed to the division of the Church into Eastern and Western," is a statement which it may not be easy to substantiate; nor is it sufficiently important for us to discuss.

VI. Errors concerning Civil Society, both as regarded in itself, and as in its relations to the Church. 39–55.

Two sentences in this part of the Syllabus should be noted.

42. "In a conflict of laws of the two powers, the Civil Right prevails."§

Pius IX. contends, on the contrary, that in such cases the decision lies with the Priest, not with the Magistrate; with the Pope, not with the King. On this forty-second "error," the reader is referred to his Brief in condemnation of a work by Professor Nuytz, of Turin, on Ecclesiastical Law,‖ at the commencement of the quarrel with the King of Sardinia in 1851, when began the present schism between the Papacy and the Governments of nearly all the old "Catholic States." In that document he quotes in his own justification John XXII., Benedict XIV., Pius VI., and Gregory XVI., and might have quoted very many more. For Councils, he adduces Lateran IV., Florence, and Trent. But this proposition, also, is too general. The object of the conflict must be known, before it can be understood to whom, if to either, the right of decision belongs.

49. "The civil authority can prevent both Clergy and people from holding free and mutual correspondence with the Roman Pontiff."¶

* "Gratiæ a Romano Pontifice concessæ existimari debent tamquam irritæ, nisi per Gubernium fuerint imploratæ."

† "Ecclesiæ et personarum ecclesiasticarum immunitas a jure civili ortum habuit."

‡ "Ecclesiasticum forum pro temporalibus clericorum causis, sive civilibus sive criminalibus, omnino de medio tollendum est, etiam inconsulta et reclamante Apostolica Sede."

§ "Absque ulla naturalis juris et æquitatis violatione potest abrogari personalis immunitas, qua clerici ab onere subeundæ exercendæque militiæ eximuntur; hanc vero abrogationem postulat civilis progressus maxime in societate ad formam liberioris regiminis constituta."

‖ "Non pertinet unice ad ecclesiasticam jurisdictionis potestatem proprio ac nativo jure dirigere theologicarum rerum doctrinam."

¶ "Doctrina comparantium Romanum Pontificem Principi libero et agenti in universa Ecclesia doctrina est quæ medio ævo prævaluit."

* "Nihil vetat, alicujus Concilii Generalis sententia aut universorum populorum facto, summum Pontificatum ab Romano Episcopo atque Urbe ad alium Episcopum aliamque civitatem transferri."

† "Nationalis Concilii definitio nullam aliam admittit disputationem, civilisque administratio rem ad hosce terminos exigere potest."

‡ "Institui possunt nationales Ecclesiæ ab auctoritate Romani Pontificis subductæ planeque divisæ."

§ "In conflictu legum utriusque potestatis jus civile prævalet."

‖ Ad Apostolicæ, August 22nd, 1851.

¶ "Civilis auctoritas potest impedire quominus sacrorum Antistites et fideles populi cum Romano Pontifice libere ac mutuo communicent."

Of course, the Pope insists that the civil authority cannot lawfully prevent him from engaging Priests and people in treasonous correspondence with himself. He contends that he has the right of objecting to the enactments of any legislature, the decisions of any Court, or the acts of any Sovereign with whom he has a quarrel. The civil right must give way, and the civil authority succumb to him, or he will not be content.

VII. Errors in natural and Christian Ethics. 56–64.

VIII. Errors concerning Christian matrimony. 65–74.

IX. Errors concerning the Civil principate of the Roman Pontiff. 75, 76.

75. "Concerning the compatibility of the temporal kingdom with the spiritual the sons of the Christian and Catholic Church dispute between themselves." *

Not the sons of the Christian and Catholic Church, who need not concern themselves in a question which is no longer agitated, because the Papacy has no more the "temporal kingdom." The dispute lasted for many ages within the Popish Church, and could not be classed with errors, real or imaginary, now prevailing. The event settles it.

76. "The abrogation of the civil empire, which the Apostolic See possesses, would greatly conduce to the liberty and happiness of the Church." †

The abrogation having actually taken place, an entire change in the internal state and external relations will probably follow.

X. Errors which relate to the Liberalism of the present day. 77–80.

The reader has now before him, word for word, those portions of the Syllabus which most nearly relate to the Vatican Council of 1870, and were intended to prepare the way for it. That it prepared the way there can be no doubt; but it also gave the world outside a view of the anti-social character of Popery which it had scarcely caught before; gave an importance to what are here called errors, which it was not thought they had attained; and raised the great controversy with the Papacy to the position which was requisite for hastening its conclusion.

DECLARATION OF BISHOPS IN 1867.

ANOTHER occasion was found for inviting a multitude of Bishops to congregate in Rome, and give their apparent adhesion to a scheme but partially disclosed, and to an ultimate object which was, as yet, entirely concealed. Pius sent out a general invitation to Bishops to appear at Rome on the eighteenth Centenary of the martyrdom of St. Peter and St. Paul, to do honour to the memory of those saints.* A few days later, in a secret Consistory,† he announced his intention or, at least, his strong desire to have a General Council in Rome. A number of questions were sent to the Bishops with his Brief of invitation to this Centenary festival in memory of the martyred Apostles, with a request to make known their opinions on several matters of discipline, and thereby encouraged the expectation that the judgment of the Bishops, freely and directly given, would be sought and accepted in the projected Council. Flattered by these overtures, the Bishops, in June, 1867, in greater numbers than before, answered to the invitation in 1862, and, with the Cardinals, and many Patriarchs and Archbishops, presented a second address ‡ in language as adulatory and servile as ever; again approaching him as if he were a god, rather than a man. To this address were appended about five hundred signatures, beginning with Cardinal Mattei, Dean of the Sacred College, and ending with Guillelmus De Cesare, a Sicilian Abbot. It is a prolonged censing of adoration to the pretended Vicar of Christ, as representative of His Divine person, and reputed participator of His Godhead. It seems to have been written by the same pen as the former composition, and therefore no extract is needed to exemplify the style; but two sentences are enough to show its exact adaptation to the object contemplated by the Pope himself in the proposed Council.

"For Thy mouth has never been silent; Thou hast seen good to announce eternal Truths, etc., etc. For which excellent care we render to Thy Holiness the greatest thanks, and shall be eternally thankful. Believing that Peter has spoken by the mouth of Pius things which are to be kept as a deposit, and are now spoken, confirmed, and uttered forth by Thee, we also say, confirm, and announce. With one mouth and mind we reject all that which Thou Thyself hast judged to be reprobated and rejected as adverse to Divine faith, the salvation of souls, and the good of human society. For that is firm in our mind, and deeply fixed there, which the Florentine Fathers, in the decree of Union, unanimously defined,—that the Roman Pontiff is the Vicar of Christ, head of the whole Church, and Father and Teacher of all Christians; and that full power of feeding, ruling, and governing the universal Church has been delivered unto him in Blessed Peter by our Lord Jesus Christ." §

* "De temporalis regni cum spirituali compatibilitate disputant inter se Christianæ et Catholicæ Ecclesiæ filii."

† "Abrogatio civilis imperii, quo Apostolica Sedes potitur, ad Ecclesiæ libertatem felicitatemque maxime conduceret."

* Acta et Decreta Sacrosancti et Œcumenici Concilii Vaticani Die 8 Decembris, 1869, a ss. D. Pio IX. inchoati. Friburgi, 1871, p. 22.

† Ibid., p. 26. ‡ Ibid., p. 31.

§ "Non enim unquam obticuit os Tuum; Tu æternas veritates annunciare.....Pro qua eximia cura maximas Sanctitate Tuæ gratias agimus, habituri sumus sempiternas; Petrumque per os Pii locutum fuisse credentes, quæ ad custodiendum depositum, a Te dicta, confirmata, prolata sunt, nos quoque dicimus, confirmamus, annuntiamus. Unoque ore atque animo rejicimus omnia, quæ divinæ fidei, saluti animarum, ipsi societatis humanæ bono adversa, Tu ipse reprobanda ac rejicienda judicasti. Firmum enim menti nostræ est, alteque defixum, quod Patres Florentini in decreto Unionis unanimi definiverunt. Romanum Pontificem Christi Vicarium, totiusque Ecclesiæ caput et omnium Christianorum Patrem et Doctorem existere,

This is as good as a pledge that they will any day swear beforehand to anything the Pope may say. The other sentence to be quoted indicates the time when they may do it.

"Therefore our mind was filled with extreme joy when from Thy Sacred Mouth we understood that it was Thy intention, amidst the conflicts of this present time, as said Thy famous Predecessor Paul III., to convoke an Œcumenical Council, as the greatest remedy amidst the greatest perils of Christendom." *

The five hundred signataries of this address could not all be ignorant of the worthlessness of the Synod of Florence. The history of that Synod, or Council, was written by a member of the same, Sylvester Sgyropulus, Cross-bearer and Counsellor of the Greek Patriarch, head of the Greek Church, and presents a most humiliating picture of the Greeks who were on that occasion in Italy, dependent on the Latins for daily food, and compelled, by hunger and abandonment, to submit to any conditions for the sake of escaping from a sort of captivity in Florence. †

The Decree, as they call it, or, as we find it in the Acts of that Council, the Letters of Union, a compact with the Greeks that was never carried into effect, after stating the forced concessions of doctrine then only made, and never continued, by the unhappy Greeks, closes thus:—

"We also define that the holy Apostolic See and Roman Pontiff have the primacy in all the world, and that the Roman Pontiff is successor of blessed Peter, Prince of the Apostles, and true Vicar of Christ, and head of the whole Church, and father and doctor of all Christians; and to him in blessed Peter, etc., etc." ".....that the Patriarch of Constantinople be second after the most holy Roman Pontiff; the third, the Patriarch of Alexandria; the fourth, of Antioch; the fifth, of Jerusalem: saving, that is to say, all their privileges and rights." These letters were dated at Florence, July 6th, 1439. They were signed by thirty Greeks, and one hundred and twelve Romans. After affixing these signatures to the Letters of Union, questions of ritual and discipline arose. The Pope summoned the Greeks into his presence, demanding that the Eucharist should be administered in one kind, and without the ceremonies accustomed in the Greek Church; that the Greek Clergy should dismiss their wives, and the Popes should appoint the Patriarch of Constantinople. These questions could not then be settled. The Greeks returned to Constantinople; the union of which the Latins boasted for the moment never took effect; and how far apart the Greek and Latin Churches now are, the whole world knows. The boast of the five hundred on the Centenary of St. Peter and St. Paul was, therefore, in substance and effect, dishonest and untrue; although apparently supported by the letter of a union which was belied a week after its conclusion; for it was signed on the sixth day of July, and on the fourteenth day of the same month the Pope made his demands, which they rejected.* The document, invalid as it already proved, was copied, sealed, translated, multiplied in five copies; and the Greek Patriarch, heedless of the Pope, soon made terms with Mohammed II., and left to Rome the empty sound of a supremacy that did not last out the month in which it was attempted.

USELESS INVITATIONS—ENFORCED SILENCE.

THE Pope did not send out a Bull of Indiction, as had been the custom in former times, to convoke a General Council, and place the same under the protection of "Catholic Princes," invite their assistance, and intimate his readiness to receive such persons as they might accredit to represent the interests of their various countries. If a statement of one of the most devoted servants of the Papacy in this country may be accepted, such an invitation was not given because there were no Catholic States left, no State being really "Catholic" where liberty of worship is allowed; and the adoption of Religious Liberty having become general, no European Sovereign was any longer entitled to such recognition as the usual mention in a Bull of Indiction would imply.† Pius IX. therefore sent no more than a Brief (Litteræ Apostolicæ), calling the Patriarchs, Archbishops, Bishops, and other Prelates to come to his presence in pursuance of the obligation laid on each of them, at his consecration, to visit the thresholds of the Apostles at the times prescribed, or whenever it might please the Pope to call them thither. By this method all royal influence was rejected as impertinent in these calamitous times, when Kings permit heretics to wor-et ipsi in beato Petro pascendi, regendi ac gubernandi universalem Ecclesiam a Domino Nostro Jesu Christo plenam potestatem traditam esse."

"Summo igitur gaudio repletus est animus noster, dum e sacrato ore Tuo intelleximus, tot inter præsentis temporis discrimina eo Te esse consilio, ut maximum, prout ajebat inclytus Tuus prædecessor Paulus III., in maximis rei Christianæ periculis remedium Concilium œcumenicum convoces."

+ Vera Historia Unionis non verè inter Græcos et Latinos, etc. Græce Scripta per Sylvestrum Sguropulum. Hagæ-Comitis. 1660.

* Acta generalis octavæ Synodi sub Eugenio quarto Ferrariæ inceptæ: Florentiæ vero peractæ. Impressum Romæ apud Antonium Bladum de Asula. Anno Dni. MD.XXVI. Die xxiii. mensis Maii. Foll. cix.—cxiii.

† Paul III., in his Bull of Indiction to the Council of Trent, after summoning from all places all his venerable brethren, Patriarchs, Archbishops, and Bishops, and his beloved sons, the Abbots, and others who were by right or privilege entitled to sit and vote in Councils, and commanding them to be present by virtue of their Oath of Obedience, added:—"And besides the aforesaid, the Emperor, and the most Christian King, as well as other Kings, Dukes, Princes," whose presence would be beneficial to the interests of Christianity, whom he entreated to be present at the celebration of the Council; and if they could not come in person, which he would regret, he begged them to send grave men as authorised Legates, who might personally represent their Princes, and with prudence and dignity represent them in the Council. Nor was this all: he invited the Prelates and Princes of Germany, who had desired the assemblage of a General Council, to be present, and to unite in consultations. This invitation, however, was given in cool and doubtful terms, and was not accepted.

ship God without being imprisoned, or fined, or banished, or burnt alive.

But seeing that all persons, not Romanists, presuming to bear the name of Christian are claimed by the Romish Church in their quality of heretics or schismatics, just as a General claims the deserters from the ranks of his army, wherever they may be, to receive the punishment due on account of their desertion; or as an offended father would magnanimously receive the prodigal into his forsaken home; Pius went a little beyond his predecessors in asking Protestants to present themselves in Rome, not to be argued with, but merely to be welcomed back into the bosom of the Church. In this manner he turned also towards the schismatics of East and West.

To all Bishops of Churches of the Oriental Rite, not having communion with the Apostolic See, he wrote to declare himself under the pressure of a heavy obligation to extend his care to all persons, in whatever part of the round world they might be found, who bore the Christian name. Under peril of his own salvation he was bound to clasp them in the embrace of paternal charity, and was impelled by most vehement affection to watch with all his vigilance over all whom the Saviour had redeemed with His own blood, and received into His flock by the water of holy baptism. "Therefore," said he, "while it behoves us to give without ceasing all our studies and all our thoughts to procuring the salvation of all who acknowledge and adore Christ Jesus, we turn our eyes and our paternal soul to those Churches which of old were closely attached in the bond of unity to this Apostolic See; flourished amidst so great praise of sanctity and heavenly doctrine, and bore abundant fruit of Divine glory and salvation of souls; but now, by the nefarious arts and machinations of him who excited the first schism in heaven, are, to our extreme sorrow, severed and divided from the communion of the Holy Roman Church, which is spread abroad throughout the whole world." Moved by this powerful affection, he repeats an overture he had made twenty years earlier; and as Gregory X. had convened their ancestors to the second Council of Lyon, and Eugenius IV. to the Council of Florence, so he would fain convene them to the Council of the Vatican. This was dated from St. Peter at Rome, on the 8th of September, 1868.* But those Orientals could not see that their acknowledging and adoring Christ Jesus was not infinitely more and better than being entangled with the Papacy, and were therefore deaf to the soft words of charity, and could scarcely have forgotten the bitter humiliation inflicted on the Greeks at Ferrara and Florence more than four hundred years before.

His Apostolic Letter "to all Protestants and others that are not Catholics"† was not in the least loving—not even courteous. The very first words were repulsive:—"Now you all must know that We, although unworthy, are exalted into this Chair of Peter, and therefore are invested with the supreme government of the universal Catholic Church."* But for his political notoriety, not one English Protestant out of a thousand would have known anything about the affairs of Mastai Ferretti, and less than ever did any one of them believe that his pretended gift of power over the universal Church was a thing that could have come to him, or to any other man, from heaven. He told them that he had called into his presence all the Bishops of the whole world,—an assertion which was in the first place untrue: no Evangelic Bishop in either the east or west hemisphere would be there; and it was also insolent, as it was a denial that any of them were Bishops at all. After all the horrors of dragonnades, autos de fé, and every conceivable variety of persecution, he presumes to talk to them of charity! He even ventures to imagine that in the coming Council he may address all of them with his Apostolic and fatherly words, (Apostolicis ac paternis Nostris verbis,) who, although they acknowledge Christ Jesus as Redeemer, and glory in the name of Christian, "do not profess the true faith of Christ, nor follow the communion of the Catholic Church."

Then, after discoursing at length on the religion for which we find no better name than Popery, he makes his proposal:—"Wherefore, let all them who have not the unity and faith of the Catholic Church embrace the occasion of this Council, in which the Catholic Church, to which their forefathers belonged, exhibits a new argument of intimate unity, and of its inexpugnable and living strength; and, answering to the necessities of their hearts, let them study to escape from that state in which they cannot be sure of their own salvation. Let them not cease from offering most fervent prayers to the Lord of mercies, that He would cast down the wall of division, dispel the thick darkness of errors, and lead them back to the bosom of Holy Mother Church, in which their fathers had healthful pastures, and where only the entire doctrine of Christ Jesus is preserved and taught, and the mysteries of heavenly grace dispensed." This singular communication was dated on the 13th of September, 1868.

We can only remember one response that was elicited by this haughty letter, and it was very different from what the Pope desired. His answer to it seems more like an effusion of Pius himself than the cool composition of a Latin Clerk. It is worth preserving.

"To the Venerable Brother Henry Edward, Archbishop of Westminster, Pius Pope IX. Venerable Brother, health and benediction. By the daily papers we learn that Dr. Cumming, a Scot, has asked you whether, in the future Council, dissentients will be allowed to produce the arguments which they may think to favour their opinions, and that you have answered that that must be determined by us, and that you have written to us on the subject. But if the inquirer knows what is the faith of Catholics

* Acta et Decreta, p. 54.

† "Ad omnes Protestantes aliosque acatholicos."—Acta, etc., p. 50.

* "Jam vos omnes noveritis, Nos licet immerentes ad hanc Petri Cathedram evectos, et idcirco supremo universæ Catholicæ Ecclesiæ regimini et curæ ab ipso Christo Domino," etc.—Ibid.

concerning the power of teaching committed by our Divine Saviour to His Church, and concerning the infallibility of this (Church) in defining questions of dogma and morals, he cannot be able to doubt that the Church herself ought not to suffer the errors which she has sedulously examined, judged, and condemned, to be brought under debate again. Neither can our Letter induce a different persuasion. For when We said that no man can dispute and doubt that Jesus Christ Himself, that He might apply the fruits of His redemption to all generations of mankind, built up here in the world on Peter, His only Church, that is to say, the one holy, catholic, apostolic (Church), and conferred on it all necessary power, that there might be kept an entire and inviolate deposit of the faith, and that the same faith might be handed down to all peoples, races, and nations; by saying this We said that, without chance of dispute, a primacy was constituted, not only of honour, but also of jurisdiction confided by the Founder of the Church to Peter and his successors.

"And on this point, indeed, hangs the whole question between Catholics and all dissentients whatever, and from this dissent, as their fountain, spring all the errors of non-Catholics. 'For while societies of this kind lack that living authority constituted by God which teaches men especially the discipline of faith and manners, and directs and governs them in all those things which pertain to eternal salvation, those societies themselves have constantly varied in their doctrines, and the mobility and instability in those societies never cease.' Whether, therefore, he who asked you the question considered the sentence which the Church holds concerning the infallibility of her judgment of matters relating to faith and morals, or what We have written concerning the not calling into question the primacy and mastery of Peter, he will understand that there can be no place in the Council for giving encouragement to errors that are condemned; nor could We have invited non-Catholics to debate, but only that 'they might embrace the occasion of this Council, in which the Catholic Church, to which their forefathers belonged, exhibits a new proof of intimate unity and of its inexpugnable and vital strength; and that they, answering to the needs of their own heart, might study to escape from that state in which they cannot be sure of their own salvation.' If they, Divine grace breathing on them, perceive their own danger, if they seek God with all their heart, they will easily cast away any preconceived opinion, however adverse, and, laying aside all itch for disputation, will return to their Father, from whom they unhappily departed. And we will gladly come to meet them, we will rejoice to embrace them with paternal charity, the universal Church will rejoice with us that our children who were dead are alive again, and that they who were lost are found. Certainly, We will earnestly ask that of God; and do you, Venerable Brother, join your prayers with ours. But, meanwhile, we very lovingly impart to you and to all your diocese an auspice of Divine favou r and pledge of our best benevolence,—the Apostolic benediction.

"Dated at St. Peter's, Rome, 4th September, 1869, 24th year of our reign."

Dr. Cumming could scarcely have expected a seat and a voice in a Council in the Vatican, nor in any Church of which he was not a member: but his question drew forth a confirmation of the fact, that in that Council no discussion was allowed. This entire suppression of debate, however it might not have been expected, was rigidly enforced, as we shall presently see, at the very opening of the assembly. The first public Session, indeed, on the 8th of December, was only formal. No business was done, and the only record is a decree in five words, voted by acclamation: "The Œcumenical Vatican Council is opened;" and another, "The next Session will be on the 6th of January, 1870, on the feast of the Lord's Epiphany." On that day the whole Council met again, and there was nothing more done than to hear the Profession of Faith made at the Council of Trent read, as the basis of an oath. The last Article is, "I acknowledge the Holy Catholic and Apostolic Roman Church to be the mother and mistress of all Churches, and to the Roman Pontiff, successor of blessed Peter, Prince of the Apostles, and Vicar of Jesus Christ, I promise and swear true obedience." A supplementary paragraph follows, binding each member of the present Council to abide by every thing defined and received from the Sacred Canons and Œcumenical Councils, all abjurations and all anathemas included. This twofold oath sufficed to seal the lips of every member of the Council, except when a new dogma was introduced; and then, as we shall see, a new Regulation was provided to the same effect, leaving the Pope, through his Legates and trusty adherents, to speak, and entirely control the rest. The manner of swearing in the Council was very simple. The Tridentine Confession was read aloud. The Pope, kneeling, pronounced the words, "I promise and swear." He then sat with the written oath in his hand, and in their turn the Cardinals knelt before him and swore. After them the other members of the Council came according to rank or precedence, and swore in the same way. The ceremony was long, and with it the second sitting was fully occupied. From that moment there was not one free man in the Council; for the slightest expression of private opinion, or proposal to make the most trifling change in the language of confession, or in custom or ceremony, would have been silenced as an undoubted violation of the oath.

IMPENDING SCHISM.

When the newly crowned Pope was playing the part of a political Liberal, in the years 1846, 1847, and part of 1848, while religious intolerance had gained ground again in European States where all efforts for the establishment of religious liberty had failed, and the ancient horror of Popery in England seemed to have died away, a long-cherished delusion that the Papal Church was undivided gained new strength. Protestants should have learned the contrary, but, overlooking the present, they brought their illustrations of the divisions of the Church of Rome only from the histories of past ages; from the great schisms before the Council of Constance, which deposed the Antipopes, and gave the triple crown to a man of their own choice; or, on turning only to the more familiar story of the Gallican Church of the seventeenth century, with the deceptive distinction between Ultramontane and Cismontane, which began then, but is now lost, sought to persuade themselves that the two classes of Clergy sustained different relations to the Court of Rome, and undervalued the strong uniting bond of a discipline that really held together all Popedom. Or, in haste to demonstrate some apparent incoherence in a Church whose Clergy were, after all, a carefully marshalled army under one Sovereign, they pointed to the great variety of religious orders, and to the two divisions of secular and regular Clergy, not considering that the external distinctions and the little family quarrels of Popery effectually checked any rising mutiny against the Roman Chief, who maintained his own central power the more easily by encouraging the superficial dissensions,—dividing those whom he had conquered. But it remained for this Pope to snap his bond of unity by straining it too tight, to alienate from the Papacy the so-called Catholic Princes, to unite the Sovereigns against himself, to unite his Church against the Powers of this world, to involve all orders of his Clergy in the fatal quarrel, and having raised against himself the spirit of nationality, of which a large number of his Clergy could not but partake, to force away that portion from the rest. Meanwhile he ceased to be the King of Central Italy, as his predecessors had been for nearly seven centuries, and when he sought to rally the whole body of his Clergy round him on the occasions specified in these pages, found that the long-boasted unity was broken at many places in his wide dominion, and that his fretful haste to remodel his Church after the mediæval fashion did little more than precipitate the crisis that was no longer to be avoided.

He had not gained the assent of a real majority of his Bishops to the so-called dogma of the miraculous conception of the Virgin Mary, and the dissentients on that point could not forget the dishonesty with which he ignored their votes. Bishops largely partaking in the persuasion that they—and he Bishop of Rome, only for his own Roman diocese—were the true shepherds, manifested on many occasions their determination to dispute his claims, and to discountenance his enterprises.

Even in presence of the first assemblage of the Archbishops and Bishops whom he had summoned to the Council, and before they could forget the weariness and cost of former journeyings, he received solemn intimations of dissatisfaction.

Such an intimation came to him from fourteen French Bishops and one Austrian, Strossmayer, appealing against his arbitrary regulations for the Council of the Vatican, in the Constitution Multiplices inter of November 27th, 1869. They reminded him that the eyes of the whole world were on the Council he had summoned; that men looked on with very different feelings,—with hope, with doubt, with derision, with malignant incredulity. They gave him credit for wishing that the oracles to issue thence should be such as to conciliate veneration and deference to conciliar authority. He had decreed elaborate drafts of questions to be eventually issued as Articles of Faith, having received not his own approbation, (nulla tamen Vestra approbatione,) but that of the Council, to whom they should be all and entirely submitted. (Integra integre.) He had led the whole world to expect that the Bishops, the Fathers, assembled in the Vatican, would exercise a full and perfect liberty in discussing and defining doctrine, and establishing rules of discipline. He had emphatically promised them the same in their first ceremonial assemblage; or, if he had not so intended, his words were such as led them so to expect. "Certainly," they say, "in these times, when the minds of men without number, men, too, who preside in the administration of governments, or who excel in secular knowledge, and who possess great power, drawing multitudes after them, are so affected, and unless it shines clearer than the sun, and if there be not maturity of examination, and most perfect liberty of discussion, it is to be feared that heavenly truth will be held in contempt by many, and the war already waged against the Church will press heavier and heavier. It appears, therefore, absolutely necessary that liberty of the Fathers should strike vividly the eyes of all."

Even His Holiness, whose words they quote, had promised that it should be so. Yet they find that all the propositions to which approbation is expected will be first of all laid before a special Congregation, which will either approve them, or send them back to him again, subject to his judgment, whose mind is already made up; and that they, not these remonstrant Bishops and their brethren summoned to give their approval, but they alone shall have power to speak their mind in public. Now they suggest that some of their own class, the foreign Bishops, shall be elected by the Council to join the Congregation which the Pope has chosen and appointed. They observe that there are four other Congregations, of twenty-four Fathers each, for preparing matters to be brought before the Council; but they suggest again that learned men from various nations, and better qualified, should be added to these Italian Congregations, that all the Fathers from every land may have free access to these preliminary Congregations, and that, for the majesty of the Council, the Pope himself shall preside over it, and not his Legates. The remonstrants find that the law of secrecy is imposed on all the members of the Council, for the sake of avoiding "false reports;" but they remind him that publicity best guards against false reports, while secrecy provokes suspicion, and that secrecy in the Church must be the more suspicious when the gravest affairs of nations are discussed in public and openly reported to the world. They argue well, in measured and respectful language, and subscribe their names; but they plead in vain.*

Soon after, a considerably larger party of Archbishops and Bishops urge the same request, briefly, most respectfully, and with impassioned energy; but they have spoken to the winds.†

After these a party of forty Archbishops and Bishops, with Cardinal Schwartzenberg at their head, send up a long and elaborate expostulation against the entire policy of constraint, secrecy, and silence; but, with characteristic obstinacy, the Supreme Pontiff expresses no other feeling than anger and contempt.‡ The event has shown that these faithful expostulations were the premonitions of a schism different from any that had hitherto divided the Romish Church. We shall now see how the discontent deepened, and in what spirit the pretended Vicar of Christ pulled down the divided house upon his head.

THE COUNCIL OF THE VATICAN.

If there be any point at which our Delineation may most fitly conclude, it is to be found in the Council of the Vatican; for, although the system we have called Romanism may continue to exist for generations or centuries to come, it underwent so great a change in this Council, that, ere it comes to an end, it may even take another name. Perhaps not Romanism; for, scarcely had the Council closed, when it lost Rome. Perhaps not even Vaticanism, which it sometimes bears; for it may not keep the Vatican. Perhaps Popery to the last, so long as there exists a Pope.

The present writer cannot pretend to give a full account of the Council in a few pages, nor does our plan require it. The utmost that can here be done will be to show that the attempt to establish as an Article of Faith that the Pope is infallible and Supreme was a failure; and that the pretence that the Clergy and people bearing the common name of Roman Catholic have generally received such a dogma is an untruth. One of their own number has so clearly and compendiously described the Council, that we will follow his description, almost literally translating it, with such omissions as will not break the continuity of his review, and such documentary additions as may be found necessary here and there,§ to render it complete.

Question of Pope's Infallibility before and at the Council.

Whatever may have been anticipated by Mgr. Deschamps, Archbishop of Malines, who, many years ago, wrote that a dogmatic definition of the Pope's infallibility was necessary, if it had been said, in 1867, that such a definition would be the great affair of an Œcumenical Council, it would have startled the Bishops assembled in Rome at the festivities of the Centenary, and the whole world besides.

Neither in the two allocutions to the Bishops announcing to them the Council, nor in the Bull of Indiction which traced the programme of the future assembly, did the Pope make the most distant allusion to it. Such, at least, was the official attitude of the Pope. Some months after the return of the Bishops from Rome in 1867, a grand Catholic Congress was held at Malines, where, both in the general assemblies and sectional meetings, subjects of all kinds were treated: of this definition, the great necessity of the times, according to the Archbishop of Malines, not a word was said by him, or any one else. No one thought of it. Nearly all the Bishops in France in their pastorals of the Lent following spoke of the Council; but, as for the definition, it entered not into the thoughts of any of them.

Great, therefore, was the amazement in Rome itself when, on the 6th of February, 1869, a manifesto appeared in the Civiltà Cattolica, a Review printed in Rome under the eye of the Holy Father, not in the Gesù, not in the Roman College, but in a private house, where the Pope lodged his editors with a press of their own, at the very gate of the Vatican. This manifesto traced out a programme for the Council, of which neither the Pope nor the Bishops had yet spoken a word publicly, announcing that it would define two new dogmas,—the Infallibility of the Pope, and the Assumption of the Holy Virgin,—so unveiling, apart from the avowed object of the Council, a hitherto secret and mysterious plan.

The manifesto of the Civiltà was immediately repeated by the Univers and all the journals of the party. A violent agitation was commenced with the object of creating, as was said, currents of opinion in the sense of Infallibility. Very soon, two Archbishops, Manning in England, and Deschamps in Belgium, published special writings to accelerate the movement. Appeals were addressed to "the faithful," from day to day; the question was made one of enthusiasm and piety; the popularity of Pius IX. was turned to the same account: with public manœuvres were united secret schemes; but these indeed had been made use of previously; for no sooner was a Council announced than a vow of believing in Infallibility was declared to be the most meritorious action towards the Holy Father that could be offered. The Roman journals recommended this vow, and thousands of fly-sheets printed in Rome were sent out for distribution in all directions. The state of secret devotion which this vow affected at first in France and other Roman Catholic countries augmented the ardour of the devotees, who waited for opportunity to display their zeal: the injurious subscription-lists which overflowed us were, for a great number, the favourable occasion.

* Documenta ad illustrandum Concilium Vaticanum anni 1870, ii., p. 380.

† Ibid., p. 383. ‡ Ibid., p. 385.

§ Dr. John Friedrich, Professor of Theology in Munich, attended Cardinal Hohenlohe as Secretary in Rome during the sitting of the Council, and published a very interesting Diary (Tagebuch) of occurrences from the beginning until nearly the end. (Nördlingen, 1873. Second Edition.) He also made a collection of Documents of the greatest importance, and among them is a writing "of one of the first ecclesiastical dignitaries of France." It is headed, La Liberté du Concile et Infallibilité, and begins at page 131 of Documenta ad illustrandum Concilium Vaticanum anni 1870. Gesammelt und herausgegeben von Dr. Johann Friedrich, Professor der Theologie in München. Nördlingen, 1871. I. Abtheilung.

The question was thus cast abroad into the streets, as the Bishop of Orleans said; the unreflecting enthusiasm of some provoked the alarm of others. Protestations began in Germany; and the German Bishops assembled at Fulda, endeavouring to calm the agitation, issued the famous letter which will remain as a model of episcopal wisdom and eloquence. Some time afterwards, in France, to the writing of the Abbé Bouix and other champions of infallibility, Mgr. Maret opposed a book which, ere it could well be published, was attacked with extreme violence through the Ultramontane press, by five French Bishops. Then it was that Mgr. Dupanloup, to relieve the Council from the exciting question which could not but interrupt its labours, published his Observations, to show that the definition would not be opportune: but these only increased the agitation, and in Rome caused profound irritation in all the party.

Such was the state of the question of Papal Infallibility at the opening of the Council. The passion which had prepared every thing to ensure its triumph in that assembly at once made it the chief business. Some explanation is here necessary to unmask a plot which, even after the opening of the assembly, continued to be carried on in darkness. At first, and for a long time, they spoke of an acclamation (intending to raise a cry in a full meeting of the Council, and so, taking dissentients by surprise, to carry it). Then postulata after postulata were made, to bring the question into light. At length, on the 20th of February, 1870, it came out all at once that it was going to be introduced as a schema additional to the schema of the Church, of which the Fathers had already prepared six chapters. This was but the first part of the campaign, for the introduction of a schema is one thing, and to discuss is quite another. Nevertheless, this success encouraged the ardent ones, and, counting on the high protection which they never found wanting, they undertook, in contempt of all logical order, and of the regular course of deliberations, to precipitate the Council into the adoption of the additional schema. The Univers, instigator of all violent and extreme measures, hastened to announce that some postulata were presented by a number of Bishops, that the question of Infallibility might be discussed and voted as one of urgency, before all others wherein the Council was engaged already. The Unità Cattolica, in its mystic way, went so far as to declare that the new dogma ought to be proclaimed on the festival of the great Patriarch St. Joseph,* the 19th of March. The energy of the Bishops opposed to the definition warded off the peril for the moment. They protested. Four Archbishops and Bishops of America, among others, declared in their protestation that if the Council were taken up in so irregular and violent a manner with the question, they would quit Rome, retire to their own country, and denounce such conduct to the Catholics of the United States. At the same time, a great number of the Bishops of the majority, some Cardinals even, refused to be associated by their signatures in demands prompted by passion. The order of deliberations was not then broken, and under a new regulation that was distributed to the Fathers, the General Congregation of the Council recommenced, and discussions were opened, not on the infallibility, but on the first four chapters of the schema of the Faith, revised and reshaped by a Papal Commission.

But this was no more than an apparent truce; for from this moment the mysterious force which so sovereignly directed the deliberations of the Commissions, made its action sufficiently manifest, although its workings were secret. The discussion of the Chapters on the Faith was suddenly cut short. One of the five Cardinals appointed by the Pope to preside at all deliberations of the Commissions in his stead had the rare courage to call on him, and remonstrate seriously against the unseasonable and violent introduction of the question of his own infallibility. The Bishops, now divided on this question, sent their delegates to urge the Pope in one direction and in the other: but he gave them little satisfaction, until five French Bishops, infallibilists, presented themselves to him, on behalf, as they said, of three hundred brother Bishops, and prayed him to use his absolute power, in spite of every objection, to finish the matter at once. The Pope was very amiable, and gave them a short but significant reply, "You shall be content with me." And so they were.

What necessity can there be, asked the dissentient Bishops, for throwing the whole business of the Council into confusion by abruptly stopping the deliberations on every other subject for the sake of discussing, with urgency, the question of the Pope's infallibility, a question which has lain at rest for eighteen centuries; and if ever it is defined, it must be after prolonged and calm deliberation? But an advocate on the other side is reported to have said to Pius, "What! Holy Father! We shall miss the definition this time if you do not carry it by a conciliar coup d'état; if you do not now at once turn over the whole proceedings of the Council." It was feared that the majority they had at the moment was so far factitious, that if lost at that time it never would be found again.

As yet, however, nothing had been directly notified to the members of the Council, and it was still possible for the Pope to take the benefit of prudent counsels; but he would not give himself a moment for reflection. Nine Archbishops and Bishops, men of the highest consideration of the minority, had sent him a request for an audience, just on the eve of the day when a Congregation was to sit on the schema for a lesser Catechism for universal use, but he received the request in silence. Next day the Commission met, and proceeded to the discussion, but was suddenly interrupted by one of the Presidents of Council, who read a monition to apprise the Fathers that all the schemata, both disciplinary and dogmatical, that were prepared for their examination were set aside, and that the assembly must immediately take in hand the question of infallibility. This was not the additional schema on the Church on which they had already been at work, but an entirely new one in four chapters, elaborated by some theologians, and not even printed. The Commission had not seen it before. That mattered not. Neither had the Pope waited to hear what the nine Archbishops and Bishops had to say to him. They had received no answer to their application, and now, of course, gave up the idea of an audience.

* Guardian Saint of the Society of Jesus.

The worst part of this coup d'état was not the unexampled disturbance of the labours of the Council which it caused, but the existence of an absolute and arbitrary will of which it was the evidence; a will resolved to ride over every thing to gain an end resolved on in anticipation, but long dissembled. The circumstances now to be related will make this clear even to the least discerning, and not less convincing is the mere recital of the business of the Council violently set aside, and of the discussions entirely spoiled by sudden interruption to carry through by main force the new schema of infallibility.

The following schemata had been made the subject of preparatory discussion, and of long study :—

1. Five chapters, which completed the first Constitution de Fide, in which were treated the great matters of Trinity, Jesus Christ, Incarnation, Redemption, and Grace [which a Church boasting of a true and unchanging faith should not have needed to discuss].

2. Seven chapters of a draft Constitution on Bishops, General Councils, Provincial Councils, Diocesan Synods, and Vicars General.

3. A special schema on the vacation of Episcopal Sees.

4. A schema on the life and morals of the Clergy.

5. Another on titles for ordinations.

6. Another on payments for masses.

7. Three schemata on Religious Orders, the Vow of Obedience, and the Duties of Common Life.

8. Besides all this, the Fathers had sent up their written observations on the first twelve chapters of a schema on the Church, treating on most delicate and difficult matters, and had there added their remarks on infallibility, which had been inserted in the second of the chapters on the Church.

All this mass of work was set aside to arrive in one bound at the Pope and infallibility; and if that portion of it which treats of the Church alone was quite enough to occupy the attention of the Council, it must be admitted that its various parts are so linked together that their order could not be broken without inducing confusion, and only Fathers happily exempt from care could leap through the dark confusion all at once to Primacy and Infallibility. Such an event seemed impossible, and yet it came to pass! And, since it so came to pass, now that the advisers of the Pope successfully assumed so great authority, placing the whole Episcopate into the alternative of entering into a conflict with him, or submitting to this act of violence, the question irresistibly arose, What would become in the future of that assembly of the Vatican? There was an assembly of Bishops œcumenically convoked and œcumenically met together; but was that the celebration? Could that be the issue of a Council that sustained its œcumenicity? Had the assemblage at the Vatican, in respect to the question of infallibility, an œcumenical celebration, or an œcumenical issue? Surely the very Bishops who submitted in silence to that violence, no less than they who protested against it, must have had grave misgivings on the subject!

The Council was not free.

Under what conditions did this Council deliberate? What incidents marked the second period of its deliberations? The Bishops themselves can answer, and the facts will tell.

After a brief interruption, the Congregations of the Council resumed their accustomed deliberations, but under a new Regulation. Under the Regulation with which the Council began, it came to nothing; for it could not proceed when interrupted on the 20th of February by a Decree of the five Presidents, by order of the Pope "appointing a new rule for the General Congregations."* Under the new Regulation it could proceed, and that very quickly, but at the cost of liberty for the Bishops, and of sincerity and truth in the deliberations. The Decree, consisting of a long preamble and fourteen clauses, is too long for literal translation, and is singularly repressive. More than a hundred Bishops of all nations protested against it, declaring that it deprived them of the necessary liberty, and German and Italian journals published their protest.

Every schema, or proposition, was to be drawn up by the Presidents, or sent from them to the Bishops ("Fathers"). Any who wished to suggest a change of words or paragraphs were to send the proposed alteration in writing to the Secretary of the Council. The Secretary would send those notes to a "deputation" (sub-committee) appointed for the purpose, where the original draft might be revised, and so revised would be distributed to the Fathers. The appointed Presidents would then call a General Congregation, before whom it would be laid. A discussion would there take place. Any who wished to speak were to signify their wish in writing to the Presidents, specifying exactly on what part of the schema they wished to speak. Orators were to be kept to the points previously specified. Any Bishop who wished to answer a speaker might ask leave of the Presidents to do so. If any speaker wandered from the point, the Presidents might call him to the question. If the discussion was continued too long, the Presidents, at the request of any ten Fathers, might close it. The suffrages were to be given in writing, but no final decision taken. All that should follow lay beyond the Regulations, and was to be subsequently managed by the Presidents, and committed to the absolute decision of the Pope.

* "Decretum novum Normam pro Congregationibus Generalibus statuens." (Acta et Decreta, p. 163.)

Under the control of this Regulation, and the unlimited power of the Presidents, the Council was an assembly without movement or life; without any possible initiation of debate; without any possible means for making a reflection heard, or a resistance felt. Not even could a protestation be made against breach of regulation. There was no possibility left for any one in the General Congregations to express an opinion or a wish concerning the order of the day, or the hours of sitting, or the interruptions of the sittings, which were vexatiously frequent. There were no reports of proceedings read, on which one might make an appeal or offer a correction No motion to order. Not even a word of personal explanation. All such things were absolutely interdicted. "What sort of assembly was this? What was its liberty? What dignity had it? Where in Europe, or America, or wherever the nature of a deliberative assembly is understood, is there any thing like this? Could any one man be found to regard the deliberations of such an assembly as serious, and its decisions as the expressions of a free and enlightened opinion? Nay, more. Could a man be found that would consent to make part of even a committee of consultation under such restrictions? And the need of liberty is infinitely more necessary in a Council than in any assembly in the world, when you consider the eternal interests which have to be decided there, and if you take into account that this liberty can never be in danger with the character of the members who compose the Conciliar assemblies, and the assistance of God which is promised to them."

Such are the words of our authority; and considering that he is himself a Bishop, if not more, we must allow him his high opinion of what a Council of his own Church may be.

Power of the Commissions.

There were five Commissions.* The Pope appointed the first. The other four were left to the nomination of the Council. The Fathers had no right of initiative. The Pope's Commission alone determined what questions should be introduced into the Council, or what excluded. No proposition emanated from the Fathers; absolutely none. The Pope's Commission made no report to the Council, but to the Pope only. The author of a proposition was not permitted to advocate the same or even to explain it in that Commission; and the Pope's Commission judged of it in the last resort, before it could be introduced into the Council, so that both the initiative and the definitive of any proposition whatever was entirely subject to that Commission, and the pleasure of the Pope. The Pope composed his own Commission of Cardinals and Bishops, mostly Italians, and all of them well known as declared partisans of the projects of the Roman Court. Here, then, at the very entrance into business, the liberty of the Council vanished, œcumenical though it were, and all hope of liberty was but an illusion. Already Pius IX., like the Hindoo pantheist, believed himself a god!

The four Commissions of the Council were open to objection, (1,) on account of their excessive power, (2,) the manner of their election, and (3,) the majority which elected them. The Commissions on Discipline, Dogma, Religious Orders, and Oriental Churches, had nothing in common with the Congregations of the Council of Trent.* The Council of

* These were appointed by the Brief Multiplices inter, November 27th, 1869. The first consisted of Cardinals only, each Cardinal having a consultor. A Cardinal Bishop, De Reisach, was President. The second was presided over by a Cardinal Priest, De Luca, and the Presidents of the three following were of the same rank. Bizzarri presided over the third; over the fourth, Bilio; and over the fifth, Capalti. (Acta de Decreta, p. 71.)

But these Commissions, or Congregations, must not be confounded with others appointed by the Pope immediately after issuing the Bull of Indiction, (Æterni Patris, 29th of June, 1868,) to make preparations for the Council. They were as follows, with the respective Presidents:—

1. Congregation of Cardinals for direction of the rest,—Patrizi.
2. Ceremonies,—Patrizi.
3. Ecclesiastical policy,—De Reisach.
4. Churches and Missions in the East,—Barnabò.
5. Regulars,—Bizzarri.
6. Dogmatic Theology,—Bilio.
7. Ecclesiastical Discipline,—Caterini. (Acta et Decreta, p. 71.)

After the meeting of the Council, besides the five Commissions of management, there were appointed, at various times, the following "Special Deputations," etc., for despatch of business:—

1. A peculiar Congregation of twelve Cardinals, two Patriarchs, ten Archbishops, and two Bishops, for receiving and disposing of the propositions of the Fathers.
2. Judges of Excuses of Bishops who had been summoned, but were not present,—five Archbishops.
3. Judges of Complaints and Controversies,—one Archbishop and four Bishops.
4. Deputation of matters pertaining to the Faith,—twenty-four Archbishops and Bishops.
5. Deputation for Ecclesiastical Discipline,—twenty-four Archbishops and Bishops.
6. Deputation for Regular Orders,—twenty-four Archbishops and Bishops.
7. Deputation for Oriental Churches,—twenty-four Archbishops and Bishops. (Acta et Decreta, p. 154.)

When these four Deputations were first appointed, the Cardinals Bilio, Caterini, Bizzarri, Barnabò, were respectively the Presidents; but the presidency varied, from time to time, as convenience required. Here, however, we have the entire body of actors in the Council; the remaining mass of nearly eight hundred Fathers were but passive, serving to sign their names, and make up the crowd that just four times only surrounded the Papal throne, and pronounce their placet, dissidents and absentees excepted.

* The Council of Trent was divided into three sections, called "Peculiar Congregations," for the quicker despatch of business, and also to prevent the inconvenient union of the whole mass beyond the power of a Pope or his delegates to manage. (Pallavicini, Hist. Conc. Trid., vi., viii., 4, 5.) Sometimes the whole met in one General Congregation. For special purposes smaller Congregations were formed. Notwithstanding the vast influence of Italian majorities, that Council had nothing analogous to the Congregations of the Vatican Council.

the Vatican consisted of about eight hundred Fathers of all ranks. The four Congregations, having twenty-four Bishops in each, employed ninety-six in all, leaving seven hundred altogether excluded from the most important operations of the Council. They were elected by the Bishops, it is true; but the Bishops recently arrived at Rome were, for the most part, strangers to each other, and knew not the men whom they elected to do the work instead of themselves. Lists, however, had been prepared in Rome, to guard against the indiscriminate choice of strangers; and therefore the members of the four subordinate Commissions were nearly as much nominees of the Pope as the members of the first.

Some Bishops had earnestly asked the Pope to divide the whole number of the Fathers into sections, either by lot, or otherwise; at least for the purpose of an unprejudiced election of suitable persons for the chief offices; but they received no answer to their application. A division by nationality or language had been suggested, but with no effect. It is incontestable that the nomination-lists for these capital elections of the four Congregations were made out in the interest of a party, and that the Roman Court, by the exclusiveness of its choice, prepared the way for the eventual dogmatic definition of Papal Infallibility.

Those Commissions, therefore, were no less sovereign than their Presidents; and the new Regulation wrought a change unheard of in the history of Councils, substituting for the oral discussion of the schema written notes to be forwarded to the Secretary of the Council. According to the first Regulation, there would have been two oral discussions, or rather two rounds of speeches. The new Regulation suppressed the first, and substituted writing for speaking, which destroyed the very nature of a Council. A Council is a common work done by a comparison of counsels, (collatis vere consiliis,) when men enlighten one another by a free communication of their thoughts; but in this sending away memorials to a Commission, according to regulation, there is no such work in common. No one can tell what his colleagues have written. Each one of them is given over to the judgment and criticism of a Commission from whom he does not get a spark of light. This is more than an innovation; it destroys the very essence of a Council. Then the Commission judges the written memorials with sovereign silence, and hears no contradiction; whereas, even in his class, the school-boy is permitted to say a few words when he brings in his lesson: but here is not a word! And what is yet more remarkable, here the masters are invisible. There are more memorials than there would have been speeches. Five Bishops were appointed to examine them all; but the five Bishops, affrighted at the mass, refused! The papers were then all sent to some theologians, but none could tell who those theologians were. The Council knew them not. Perhaps the unknown examiners were members of some one Order, and these Monks, Friars, Fathers—what they were who knows? These were judges of the Bishops! Add to this absurdity a further injustice; that the members of the Commissions have always the right to attack, but no one, however attacked, has any power of defence. So Cardinal Cullen, speaking for the Commission of which he was a member, severely criticised, and, it is said, falsely interpreted, the opinions expressed by Cardinal Schwartzenberg, Archbishop of Prague, by Mgr. Kenrick, Archbishop of St. Louis, in the United States, and by Doctor Héfélé, Bishop of Rottenburg. Schwartzenberg did not choose to ask for a permission to answer, which he knew would be refused. St. Louis thought it right to ask leave to reply, but was not permitted, except when his turn might come to speak again, which was not until a month had passed, when he could not get a hearing. Héfélé, not having patience to wait so long, smarting under an extremely false interpretation, sent his reply to be printed at Naples for the information of the public. Such was the absolute and oppressive power of the Commissions.

Power of the Majority.

According to the Hundred remonstrant Bishops, a third resistless power strangely repressed the freedom of the Council: the power conferred by regulation on the majority, contrary to all the principles of ecclesiastical right, and to the custom of all Councils. In this Council of the Vatican, the majority and the minority, although very unequal in number, were each of them compact and solid; and if regarded from other points of view, the less numerous would at least weigh equal with the greater, as became evident as soon as the question of infallibility, which dominated over all, and envenomed all, came under discussion. Among the many proofs of this fact, our present authority relates the violence done to the Archbishop of Colocza, Mgr. Haynald. He had been attacked very bitterly in the Council by a Belgian Bishop, on account of an opinion to which he had given utterance in his discourse. Immediately he asked permission to answer for himself; and in order to observe the Regulation closely, he went to the office of the Presidents, and begged permission to defend himself on some personal facts, and some very false interpretations given to his discourse. Even in these circumstances, permission to speak was refused him; but the Presidents gave him to understand that he might take occasion to explain himself when he got permission to speak in another debate. He consented to the delay; waited many weeks for an opportunity, and even then, before speaking, was careful to remind the Presidents that he intended, after his discourse, to answer the attacks which he had suffered. He was authorised, but in vain. Scarcely had he begun, with great moderation, to make his personal defence, than the majority interrupted him with violent clamours. The Presidents, far from respecting the dignity of the Council, and the right of its members, took part with the majority, and one of them cried out to the orator, "They won't hear you." (Nolunt audire te.) And when Mgr. Haynald observed that he had been authorised to defend himself, Cardinal Capalti raised his voice, although not first President, and shouted, "Be silent, and go down." (Taceas et descendas.) This was iniquitous, but the Regulation gave even ten members in a General Congregation, not to say in an assemblage of hundreds, power to silence a debate and to break up a session of Congregation or of Council at any moment.

Composition of the Majority.

While the sentiment of a majority in any well constituted assembly should be regarded with the utmost possible deference, it is nevertheless desirable to know how an assembly in the Council of the Vatican was constituted. The votes may be classified as follows:—

1. Titular Bishops who govern their dioceses with the authority of order and jurisdiction.

2. Bishops of the seal, honoured with the Episcopal character, but having no jurisdiction nor any flock, nor any employment out of the Court of Rome.

3. Bishops in partibus, or Vicars Apostolic in Mission countries, immediately dependent on Rome, removable at the Pope's pleasure.

4. Cardinals, who, as such, are not Bishops at all; some of them not even Priests, and who do not represent any Church.

5. Abbots and Generals of Orders.

Now, of these five classes of voters, the first only have any certain right to define the Faith in a Council, (that is to say, granting that any man possesses such a right, as that is understood in the Papal Church to be a right). Yet, in this Council, all the votes were counted as of equal value. Let us suppose that in fact all these Abbots and Generals of Orders; all these Vicars Apostolic, dependent and revocable; all these Bishops without charge of souls, without See and without jurisdiction in the Church, whose right of suffrage has an origin so different from that of true pastors, of Bishops having at once character and jurisdiction;—let us suppose that they are found in a Council in number preponderant: would there not be something in this circumstance altogether abnormal, of a nature to alter seriously the character of an Œcumenical Council, which is that of true, not fictitious, representation of the Church?

Now this hypothesis is the actual reality. It was precisely so in the Council of the Vatican. Those Cardinals not Bishops, or Bishops without Sees (23); those Bishops in partibus, without fixed and permanent Sees (120); those Abbots nullius (6); those mitred Abbots (18); those Generals of Orders (27); and add one Prelate, bringing to the Council the enormous number of one hundred and ninety-five votes. It is almost certain that wherever these vote they carry a majority. That is to say that the decision of the true judges of the Faith (according to our author's view) can be entirely changed by the enormous adjunction of judges that are only such by favour; and this grave reality was without precedent in any Council.

Moreover, as concerns the titular Bishops themselves, their distribution over the surface of the Christian world is so unequal, and presents such singular differences, that one single nation, Italy, as the vote is managed by regulation, becomes absolute mistress of the Council. In effect, Italy alone weighs more in the voting than France, Germany, England, and Spain: in one word, outweighs all Europe. It has almost as much weight as all the rest of the (Roman) Catholic Episcopate; for the Italian Prelates are nearly equal in number to their brethren throughout the world. According to the Roman document,* Italy was represented in the Council by two hundred and seventy-six Prelates, where all the countries in Europe besides had no more than two hundred and sixty-five. Again: the number of titular Bishops from the whole world, outside Italy, was only three hundred and twenty-three; leaving the number of votes of Bishops having titles in Italy almost equal to those of their brethren in the whole world. Here was a Council with an enormous and unjustifiable preponderance of Italy and the Roman Court over the rest of the (Roman Catholic) Church. Then what becomes of the theological position, that an Œcumenical Council is a representation of the universal Church? Is it a truth or a fiction? Where would be a French Parliament if Paris were to send about as many members as all the rest of France?

Besides all this, more than half the Fathers assembled in the Vatican were lodged, fed, and entertained by the Pope, together with their suite, who must have found it very difficult to give a free vote and keep a clear conscience. So then, Italy having at the Council more voices than all Europe; the Italian titular Bishops making a majority over the titular Bishops of the Christian world, and this majority fortified and rendered invincible by Cardinals not Bishops, Bishops not titular, Bishops in partibus, and Vicars Apostolic, with Abbots, and Generals of Orders, all judges by favour, accessory and doubtful, made equal to judges by undoubted right; one hundred and ninety-five votes added to two hundred and seventy-six, creating a total of nearly five hundred votes. Such was the situation! It cannot therefore be expected that the Council of the Vatican will ever be received by Romanists in general as a legitimate Council, or its acts considered valid. All that followed was no more than was inevitable. The protestation of a hundred Bishops against the factitious majority; the pressure exerted within the Council by the Pope's Legates, or Presidents, and his partisans; and the pressure without by the systematic use of an Ultramontane press and Ultramontane preachers, were mere incidents in a history that is nothing less than scandalous: but there is yet one main feature which must be noted, and now we shall translate without abridgment.

* Catalogo alfabetico dei Patri presenti al Concilio Io œcumenico Vaticano.

Personal Intervention of the Pope.

"But it must be told, painful as it is to tell it, that all these manifestations were encouraged in Rome itself. We say nothing of the incredible insults launched with impunity against the Fathers of the minority of the Council from the Roman pulpits. We will especially be silent about the Bishop who denounced, alas! in language as vulgar as it was violent, the conduct of one of his colleagues in the Council; and so attacked, as Mgr. the Bishop of Montpellier well said, the liberty of all, by outraging the liberty of one.

"But how can we cover with respectful silence other facts which all the world heard of? Can we conceal, or can we apprehend, what followed from the immense moral pressure laid on the Bishops by the personal intervention of the Holy Father in this affair, before, and even after, the question was introduced into the Council?

"Bellarmin, in a curious letter recently made public, once, with a noble freedom, advised Clement VIII. not to let his personal opinion weigh upon the theologians of the famous Congregations de auxiliis, not to grant all his favours to persons who thought as he did, and to leave all during those grave discussions, at perfect liberty. Certainly the Holy Father, in the affair of Infallibility, must have been under the influence of very different advice. A Bellarmin was certainly wanted in the Council of the Vatican!

"It was astonishing! The official attitude of the Holy Father, as regarded the question afterwards raised in the press, did appear to be that of neutrality. The Civiltà Cattolica itself had announced that FROM A FEELING OF AUGUST RESERVE, Pius IX. would by no means take the initiative here; and yet, on the other hand, as we have seen, a vast plan was organized and executed; an immense labour was carried on at Rome and in the Church to agitate the spirits and to prepare the definition.

"The personal intervention of Pius IX. in this labour—since the truth of things compels us to speak of it—then what was it?

"To keep the friends of Rome in order (contenir), wrote the Univers itself, severity is not necessary; at any time a single word suffices.* This single word, which would long ago have calmed a deplorable agitation, and permitted the Fathers to study with the calmness necessary the various reasons of opportuneness or inopportuneness of definition, away from the clamour and chimerical necessity of which we now hear so much, this single word has not been spoken. In the very presence of the Holy Father all the journals of Rome have preconised the famous suffrage demanded by persons who knew nothing about the question. The League of Infallibility received its encouragements, and was propagated openly or clandestinely in all the dioceses of the Church (la catholicité); the articles of the Civiltà, which caused such universal surprise, have not been disclaimed. The journals which propagated the agitation some time before a single writing made its appearance against the definition, or against the doctrine, had his felicitations.

"But verbal intervention, where do we see it? In this astonishing quantity of Briefs issued from the Secretariate of Latin Letters, and intended to quicken and precipitate the movement. These Briefs, already so numerous in the two years before the Council, and yet more multiplied since the Fathers have been occupied with the question, at the time when respect for their liberty required more than ever the real neutrality of the Chief of the Church, who himself had remitted the question, integra integre, according to the words of his Constitution Multiplices inter, to their decision. The editors of those Pontifical Letters made them veritable weapons of war against the Bishops that were opposed to the definition.

"Long before the Council, the Belgian Bishop who, first of all the Bishops, wrote on the question, and sustained the necessity of a definition, was felicitated in a Brief of overflowing goodness. The Abbé Bouix, the Father Weninger, authors each of a book on the Infallibility, and the Abbé Belet also, received flattering Briefs.

"Then, the Council being assembled, while all favours fell on the Infallibilists, the Pope, who could not directly strike the Bishops while they sat in the Council, struck them indirectly by addressing pompous eulogies to those who rose against them in their dioceses. So did Pius IX. solemnly prejudge the question submitted to the Council. A young Priest, of Nîmes, received a letter from the Secretariate of Latin Letters. Some Collegians and young Seminarists were honoured with the same favours; two Briefs were addressed successively to Father Ramiere; one Brief to Dom Guéranger; the Univers, after this Brief, addressing the Bishops of the minority, exclaimed, 'Now, we await your retractations:' a Brief to Father Jules-Jacques, a Redemptorist; a Brief to Mgr. de Ségur, etc., etc.

"We have spoken of irregular and tumultuous manifestations of the Clergy. The Pope responds to them immediately. Hence a new set of Briefs: a Brief for the Address of Avignon; a Brief for the Address of Grenoble; a Brief for the Address of Montpellier. Moved by these responses, immediately published in the dioceses, Addresses and Briefs multiplied. Can we not here perceive a serious tampering, not only with the Hierarchy at large, but with the Council and the Bishops? To understand this fully we should have all those Briefs before us. The Holy Father who signed, but did not draw them up, had evidently abandoned himself to the hottest partisans; for not only is the question professedly submitted by himself to the Council integra integre, and on which the deliberation was actually in progress, decided by himself in those Briefs, but in such terms that we must cite them to justify our words."

Omitting four of these citations, we take the fifth and last:—

L'Univers, 10 Mai, 1870.

"But all is found condensed in the Brief to Dom Guéranger: the men whom he combats are declared to be 'the men who, boasting of the name of Catholic, show themselves completely imbued with corrupt principles, and who no longer know how to submit their understanding to the Holy See when it is against them.....Their madness rises to this excess that they undertake to reconstruct the Divine Constitution of the Church, in order more easily to abase the authority of the Supreme Chief, whom Christ has set over it, and whose prerogatives they dread.' He speaks of their audacity, and their senselessness (déraison) equal to their audacity. Their end, he says, is to agitate the spirits and to excite the people of their faction, and the ignorant vulgar, against the sentiment commonly professed.....The spirit of hatred, violence, and artifice, reigns in their writings. They sift over again with impudence doctrines over and over again refuted, etc.

"Such is the august reserve which the Pope determined to maintain, and of which spoke the Civiltà."

"And while the Pope intervened by Briefs, which were multiplied and repeated by all the echoes of the Press, in private interviews immediately made known to every one, he held the same language in his public Allocutions, immediately reproduced by the Univers and other journals. So, in an Allocution pronounced in the Vatican, on the 9th of January, before a large number of Bishops, Priests, and laics, the Pope raised his voice against 'those pretended sages who wanted certain questions to be dealt with; but these are,' said he, 'leaders of the blind.'

"On the 29th of the same month, in the American College, before a great concourse of Bishops, at the moment when some of the members of the Council desired conciliatory formulas, he declared that there 'never should be suffered any diminution of the truth, nor the least concessions or compromises.'

"On the 13th of March, before more than three hundred persons in the Vatican, when announcing the death of M. de Montalembert, of which he had just heard, he treated that eminent champion of the Church as 'a Catholic Liberal, a half-Catholic.'

"At last, on the 24th of March, the Pope, in a distribution of ornaments to the Vicars Apostolic, and other Orientals dependent on the Propaganda, pronounced a long discourse more significant than all the others, where he said, among other things, 'You must defend the truth with the Vicar of Christ, and have no fear. My children,' said he, 'do not abandon me.' The truth he referred to was the infallibility; and Mgr. Hassun responded, 'We have full confidence that the grand question on which we are now busy will soon be unanimously defined for the greater glory of the Holy See, and of your sacred person.' The scene was complete; and the success answered to it. On the next day, ten of those poor Oriental Bishops, on whom there had been so great a pressure since the opening of the Council, that many had been obliged to flee from Rome, were seen to write to Mgr. the Bishop of Strasburg a letter of adhesion to the condemnation of Father Gratry, who had never troubled their dioceses; and some days after forty-three Vicars Apostolic adhered to the letter written by Mgr. Bonjean to Mgr. the Bishop of Orleans, to demonstrate that the definition of infallibility was the surest means for converting the Hindoos, Buddhists, and Protestants of India."*

This is certainly enough to convince any reasonable person that the Council of the Vatican was not free; that its Acts and Decrees are utterly invalid; and that while the Council of Trent certainly tended to consolidate the discipline of the Romish Church, and invest its conclusions with a semblance of authority, this assemblage served for nothing better than the infliction of a shock on the same Church, from which it is not likely to recover.

But not content with influence, powerful and even resistless as it was, the Pope and his Court employed force also. Dr. Friedrich, who was compelled to leave Rome for having corresponded with the Allgemeine Zeitung of Berlin, speaks much of the activity of the Roman Police and their domiciliary visits; and not of the Police only, but also the Inquisition,† whose action was vigorous and incessant so long as Pius remained in occupation of the city.

This pretended Council, by which it was intended to consolidate the Papal Church and Kingdom, served only to precipitate the ruin of both. It was immediately followed by the fall of Rome and the consummation of Italian unity; all the States of Italy, from the Alps to Cape Passaro, were thenceforth one Kingdom: depriving the Popes of temporal sovereignty, and their place among the Sovereigns of Europe. Subsequent events led to the creation of a new German Empire, with a Protestant Emperor, and placed at the head of all the States one in which the Christianity of the Reformation is predominant. On occasion of a debate in the Lower House of the Prussian Diet, on the first and second readings of a Bill for the modification of the Prussian Constitution, which became necessary for the defence of Germany against the seditious action of Bishops and Clergy under the instruction of the Pope, Prince Bismarck, Chancellor of the Empire, uttered a few sentences which may well follow our account of the Vatican Council. He said:—

"If the present condition of things had arisen in 1851, we should hardly have embodied such provisions in the Constitution. At that time we thought we possessed guarantees that the Catholic citizens and Catholic Bishops would never forget their obedience to the State and their duties as subjects. This state of things has changed since the Vatican Council. Since that Council, the Pope is the Catholic Church. He stands at the head of a compact party; has a well organized semi-official press and an army of obedient Priests, and has overspun us with a net of Congregations. In short, no one possesses so great an influence as this Italian Prelate. Even if he were a native, this power would be serious; but in this case it is a foreign Monarch who possesses it, who, if he had the power to carry out in Prussia the programme he has solemnly proclaimed, would have to begin by destroying the majority of Prussians. The latter would either have to forswear their faith at once, or would risk losing all they possessed. We cannot concede to one who wields such forces the power that has hitherto been afforded him by the Constitution: we must limit it. We cannot ask for peace [which a party in the Diet wanted] before we have clearly defined the position to those, to whom, in moments of ill-advised and badly-rewarded confidence, we have granted only too many rights. This confidence has caused breaches in the strong bulwark of the State."*

* Documenta ad illustrandum, etc., Abt. i., s. 181-186.

† Tagebuch während des Vaticanischen Concils geführt von Dr. J. Friedrich. Nördlingen, 1873, s. 181.

INFALLIBILITY.

Constitutions and Canons.

HAVING shown that the Council of the Vatican, where an entire revolution has been wrought in the internal condition of the Papal Church, and in its relation to the States which had hitherto been designated Catholic, is unworthy to be regarded valid, even by members of that Church, it now remains to exhibit the very letter of the acts which are nevertheless accepted by the majority of the Prelates and Clergy of that Church, even including most of those who remonstrated against it at the beginning. The first document is a Monition concerning the Infallibility of the Roman Pontiff.

"Many Bishops having prayed our most holy Lord that a proposition concerning the Infallibility of the Roman Pontiff might be laid before the Council, and our most holy Lord himself, with the advice of the peculiar Congregation for receiving and disposing of the propositions of the Fathers, having deigned to consent to the petition aforesaid; the formula of a new chapter treating of this matter is therefore distributed to the most reverend Fathers of the Council for examination: which formula will have to be inserted in the schema of the Dogmatic Constitution concerning the Church of Christ after the eleventh chapter. At the same time the most reverend Fathers are also instructed that they who may consider that any observation should be made on the said eleventh chapter, and on the above-mentioned formula, as well as on the Canons 14, 15, 16, must deliver their animadversions in writing to the Secretary of the Council within ten days; that is to say, from the 8th to the 17th day of March inclusive, according to the Decree of the 20th of February last past. From the Secretary's office of the Vatican Council, on the 6th day of March, 1870.

JOSEPH, BP. ST. HIPPOLITE,
Sec. Counc. Vatican.

* Reuter's Telegram, Berlin, April 16th, 1875.

"The time for delivering animadversions was afterwards prolonged by the Secretary of the Council to the 25th of March." *

The first, second, and third Sessions of this Council produced nothing worthy of record. Preceding Councils had published Decrees and Canons enough, and more than enough, to tell Priests and people what they were to believe; but in the fourth Session, on the 18th of July, 1870, the Fathers, or such of them as remained in Rome, by choice or by compulsion, gave their assent to a Dogmatic Constitution concerning the Church of Christ which will, doubtless, be preserved in history as a way-mark of the Church of Rome to the verge of an irremediable ruin †

"Pius Bishop, Servant of the Servants of God, the Sacred Council approving, for perpetual memory of the thing.‡

"The eternal Shepherd and Bishop of our souls,

* "Monitum de Infallibilitate Romani Pontificis.

"Cum plurimi Episcopi petierint a Ssmo. Domino nostro, ut Concilio proponatur thema de Infallibilitate Romani Pontificis, idemque Ssmus. Dominus noster, de consilio peculiaris Congregationis pro recipiendis et expendendis Patrum propositionibus deputatæ, memoratæ petitioni annuere dignatus sit; idcirco Rmis. Concilii Patribus examinanda distribuitur formula novi capitis ea de re agentis: quæ formula schemati Constitutionis Dogmaticæ de Ecclesia Christi inserenda erit post caput undecimum. Simul autem Rmi. PP. monentur, ut ii, quibus super eodem capite undecimo et super prædicta formula, nec non super Canonibus 14, 15, 16, aliquid observandum videbitur, animadversiones suas scripto tradant Secretario Concilii intra decem dies, nempe a die octava usque ad diem decimam septimam Martii inclusive, juxta Decretum 20 Februarii proxime elapsi. Ex Secretaria Concilii Vaticani, die 6 Martii, 1870.

JOSEPHUS, EP. S. HIPPOLYTI, Secretar. Concilii Vatic.

"Tempus pro tradendis animadversionibus postea ab eodem Secretario Concilii ad diem 25 Martii prorogatum est."

† Acta et Decreta Sacrosancti et Œcumenici Concilii Vaticani Die 8 Decembris, 1869, a ss. D. N. P. IX. inchoati. Cum permissione Superiorum. Friburgi Brisgoviæ, 1871, pp. 180-187.

‡ "Pius Episcopus, servus servorum Dei, sacro approbante Concilio, ad perpetuam rei memoriam.

"Pastor æternus et Episcopus animarum nostrarum, ut salutiferum redemptionis opus perenne redderet, sanctam ædificare Ecclesiam decrevit, in qua veluti in Domo Dei viventis fideles omnes unius fidei et charitatis vinculo continerentur. Quapropter, priusquam clarificaretur, rogavit Patrem non pro Apostolis tantum, sed et pro eis, qui crediturі erant per verbum eorum in ipsum, ut omnes unum essent, sicut ipse Filius et Pater unum sunt. Quemadmodum igitur Apostolos, quos sibi de mundo elegerat, misit, sicut ipse missus erat a Patre: ita in Ecclesia sua Pastores et Doctores usque ad consummationem sæculi esse voluit. Ut vero episcopatus ipse unus et indivisus esset, et per cohærentes sibi invicem sacerdotes credentium multitudo universa in fidei et communionis unitate conservaretur, beatum Petrum cæteris Apostolis præponens in ipso instituit perpetuum utriusque unitatis principium ac visibile fundamentum, super cujus fortitudinem æternum extrueretur templum, et Ecclesiæ cœlo inferenda sublimitas in hujus fidei firmitate consurgeret. Et quoniam portæ inferi ad evertendam, si fieri posset, Ecclesiam, contra ejus fundamentum divinitus positum majori in dies odio undique insurgunt; Nos ad catholici gregis custodiam, incolumitatem, augmentum, necessarium esse judicamus, sacro approbante concilio, doctrinam de institutione, perpetuitate, ac natura sacri Apostolici primatus, in quo totius ecclesiæ vis ac soliditas consistit, cunctis fidelibus credendam et tenendam, secundum antiquam atque constantem universalis Ecclesiæ fidem, proponere, atque contrarios, dominico gregi adeo perniciosos, errores proscribere et condemnare."

that He might make the healthful work of redemption everlasting, decreed to build a Holy Church, in which, as in the House of the living God, all the faithful might be contained in the bond of one faith and charity. Wherefore, before He was glorified, He prayed the Father not only for the Apostles, but for those who should believe in Him through their word, that all might be one, as He, the Son, and the Father are one. Therefore, as He sent the Apostles whom He had chosen for Himself out of the world, even as He was sent of the Father, so in His Church He willed that there should be Shepherds and Teachers even to the end of time. But that the Episcopate itself might be one and undivided, and that the universal multitude of believers might be preserved in unity of faith and communion by means of Priests mutually cleaving to one another, He set the blessed Peter before the other Apostles, and in him instituted a perpetual principle and foundation of unity between both, on the strength of which to build up an eternal temple, and that sublimity might accrue hereafter to the Church in heaven by the firmness of this faith. And because the gates of hell arise on all sides every day with greater hatred to overturn the Church—if that were possible—that is built on this divinely laid foundation, We judge it to be necessary for the protection, the safety, and the increase of the Catholic flock, the Sacred Council approving, to set forth the doctrine concerning the institution, the perpetuity and the nature of the Sacred Apostolic primacy, in which the strength and solidity of the whole Church consists, and which is to be believed, and held by all believers, according to the ancient and constant faith of the universal Church, and to proscribe and condemn the contrary errors which are so pernicious to all the Lord's flock."

" CHAPTER I.*

"Concerning the Institution of the Apostolic Primacy in blessed Peter.

"Therefore we teach and declare, according to the testimonies of the Gospel, a primacy of jurisdiction in the universal Church of God to have been immediately and directly promised and conferred by Christ the Lord to blessed Peter the Apostle. For to Simon alone, to whom first He had said, Thou shalt be called Cephas,—after he had uttered his confession, saying, Thou art Christ, the Son of the living God,—the Lord spake in these solemn words: Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-Jona, because flesh and blood hath not revealed it to thee, but My Father which is in heaven: and I say unto thee that thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build My Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it: and I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven. And unto one, Simon Peter, Jesus, after His resurrection, gave the jurisdiction of supreme shepherd and ruler over all His fold, saying, Feed My lambs: Feed My sheep. To this doctrine of the sacred Scripture, clear as it is, as it is always understood by the Catholic Church, are openly opposed the depraved opinions of those who, perverting the form of government established in His Church by Christ the Lord, deny that Peter alone above the other Apostles, whether taken singly or all together, was appointed by Christ to a true and proper primacy of jurisdiction; or who affirm that the same primacy was not bestowed immediately and directly upon blessed Peter himself, but upon the Church, and through the Church on him as Minister of the Church itself.

"Therefore, if any one shall say that blessed Peter the Apostle was not constituted by Christ the Lord Prince of all the Apostles, and visible head of the whole Church militant; or that the same (Peter) received a primacy of honour only, but not of true and proper jurisdiction immediately and directly from our Lord Jesus Christ; let him be anathema."

" CHAPTER II.*

"Concerning the Perpetuity of the Primacy of blessed Peter in the Roman Pontiffs.

"That which also the Lord Christ Jesus, Prince of Shepherds and great Shepherd of the sheep, instituted in the blessed Apostle Peter for the perpetual salvation and everlasting good of the Church,—that, by the

* "CAPUT I.

" De Apostolici Primatus in beato Petro Institutione.

"Docemus itaque et declaramus, juxta Evangelii testimonia primatum jurisdictionis in universam Dei Ecclesiam immediate et directe beato Petro Apostolo promissum atque collatum a Christo Domino fuisse. Unum enim Simonem, cui jam pridem dixerat: Tu vocaberis Cephas, postquam ille suam edidit confessionem, inquiens: Tu es Christus, Filius Dei vivi, solemnibus his verbis allocutus est Dominus: Beatus es, Simon Bar-Jona, quia caro et sanguis non revelavit tibi, sed Pater meus, qui in cœlis est: et ego dico tibi, quia tu es Petrus, et super hanc Petram ædificabo Ecclesiam meam, et portæ inferni non prævalebunt adversus eam: et tibi dabo claves regni cœlorum: et quodcunque ligaveris super terram, erit ligatum et in cœlis: et quodcumque solveris super terram, erit solutum et in cœlis. Atque uni, Simoni Petro, contulit Jesus post suam resurrectionem summi pastoris et rectoris jurisdictionem in totum suum ovile dicens: Pasce agnos meos: Pasce oves meas. Huic tam manifestæ sacrarum Scripturarum doctrinæ, ut ab Ecclesia Catholica semper intellecta est, aperte opponuntur pravæ eorum sententiæ, qui, constitutam a Christo Domino in sua Ecclesia regiminis formam pervertentes, negant, solum Petrum præ cæteris Apostolis, sive seorsum singulis sive omnibus simul, vero proprioque jurisdictionis primatu fuisse a Christo instructum: aut qui affirmant, eundem primatum non immediate directeque ipsi beato Petro, sed Ecclesiæ, et per hanc illi ut ipsius Ecclesiæ ministro delatum fuisse.

"Si quis igitur dixerit, beatum Petrum Apostolum non esse a Christo Domino constitutum Apostolorum omnium principem et totius Ecclesiæ militantis visibile caput; vel eundem honoris tantum, non autem veræ proprieque jurisdictionis primatum ab eodem Domino nostro Jesu Christo directe et immediate accepisse; anathema sit."

* "CAPUT II.

" De Perpetuitate Primatus beati Petri in Romanis Pontificibus.

"Quod autem in beato Apostolo Petro princeps pastorum et pastor magnus ovium Dominus Christus Jesus in perpetuam salutem ac perenne bonum Ecclesiæ instituit, id eodem auctore in Ecclesia, quæ fundata super petram ad finem sæculorum same author, must necessarily endure continually in the Church which, founded on the rock, will stand firm to the end of time. None can reasonably doubt, for it has been known in all ages, that the holy and most blessed Peter, Prince and Chief of the Apostles, and pillar of the Faith, and foundation of the Catholic Church, received the keys of the kingdom from our Lord Jesus Christ, Saviour and Redeemer of the human race, who unto this present time and always in his successors, the Bishops of the Holy Roman See, founded by himself and consecrated by his blood, lives, and presides, and exercises judgment. Hence, whoever succeeds to Peter in this Chair, he, according to the institution of Christ Himself, obtains the primacy of Peter over the universal Church. Thus abides the ordinance of truth; and blessed Peter, persevering in that strength of a rock which he received, does not let go the helm of the Church of which he took the charge. From this cause it always of necessity pertained to the Church of Rome, on account of its more powerful principality, to convene the whole Church; that is to say, those faithful ones who are in every place, that in that See from which all the rights of this venerable communion flow to all, as members united in the head, they might be knit together in one frame of an entire body.

"Therefore, if any one shall say that it is not of the institution of the Lord Christ Himself, or of Divine right, that blessed Peter should have perpetual successors in his primacy over the universal Church; or that the Roman Pontiff is not successor of blessed Peter in the same primacy; let him be anathema."

"CHAPTER III.*

"Of the Power and Nature of the Primacy of the Roman Pontiff.

"For this reason, relying on the plain testimonies of the sacred Writings, and in pursuance of express and clear Decrees as well of Our Predecessors the Roman Pontiffs, as of General Councils, we renew the definition of the Œcumenical Council of Florence, by which it must be believed by all Christ's faithful that the Holy Apostolic See and the Roman Pontiff have the primacy over the whole world; and that the Roman Pontiff himself is successor of blessed Peter, Prince of the Apostles, and true Vicar of Christ, and head of the whole Church, and father and teacher of all Christians; and that to him in blessed Peter has been handed down from our Lord Jesus Christ full power to feed, rule and govern the universal Church, even as also is contained in the Acts and Sacred Canons of Œcumenical Councils.

"Hence we teach and declare that the Roman Church, by the Lord's ordinance, obtains the chief administrative power over all others; and that this power of jurisdiction of the Roman Pontiff, which is truly episcopal, is immediate: in relation to which, pastors, and the faithful of whatever rite and dignity, as well each as all together, are bound to render obedience of hierarchical and true subordination, not only in things pertaining to faith and manners, but also in those things which pertain to the discipline and government of the Church dispersed throughout the whole world; so that, unity being preserved with the Roman Pontiff as well in communion as in profession of the same faith, there may be one flock under one supreme Shepherd of the Church of Christ. This is the doctrine of Catholic truth, from which no one can deviate without losing faith and salvation.

"This only is wanting, that this power of the supreme Pontiff should have effect in that ordinary and immediate power of Episcopal jurisdiction which the Bishops, appointed by the Holy Spirit, have succeeded to the place of the Apostles as true pastors who feed and rule over the flocks assigned to them, each over his own; that the same be asserted, confirmed, and vindicated by the supreme and universal Pastor, according to that sentence of St. Gregory the Great: My usque firma stabit, jugiter durare necesse est. Nulli sane dubium, imo sæculis omnibus notum est, quod sanctus beatissimusque Petrus, Apostolorum princeps et caput fideique columna, et Ecclesiæ Catholicæ fundamentum, a Domino nostro Jesu Christo, Salvatore humani generis ac Redemptore, claves regni accepit: qui ad hoc usque tempus et semper in suis successoribus, episcopis sanctæ Romanæ Sedis, ab ipso fundatæ, ejusque consecratæ sanguine, vivit et præsidet et judicium exercet. Unde quicumque in hac Cathedra Petro succedit, is secundum Christi ipsius institutionem primatum Petri in universam Ecclesiam obtinet. Manet ergo dispositio veritatis, et beatus Petrus, in accepta fortitudine petræ perseverans, suscepta Ecclesiæ gubernacula non reliquit. Hac de causa ad Romanam Ecclesiam propter potentiorem principalitatem necesse semper fuit omnem convenire Ecclesiam, hoc est, eos, qui sunt undique fideles, ut in ea sede, e qua venerandæ communionis jura in omnes dimanant, tamquam membra in capite consociata, in unam corporis compagem coalescerent.

"Si quis ergo dixerit, non esse ex ipsius Christi Domini institutione, seu jure Divino, ut beatus Petrus in primatu super universam Ecclesiam habeat perpetuos successores; aut Romanum Pontificem non esse beati Petri in eodem primatu successorem; anathema sit."

* "CAPUT III.

"De vi et ratione Primatus Romani Pontificis.

"Quapropter apertis innixi sacrarum litterarum testimoniis, et inhærentes tum Prædecessorum Nostrorum, Romanorum Pontificum, tum Conciliorum generalium disertis perspicuisque decretis, innovamus Œcumenici Concilii Florentini definitionem, qua credendum ab omnibus Christi fidelibus est, sanctam Apostolicam sedem, et Romanum Pontificem in universum orbem tenere primatum, et ipsum Pontificem Romanum successorem esse beati Petri principis Apostolorum, et verum Christi Vicarium, totiusque Ecclesiæ caput, et omnium Christianorum patrem ac doctorem existere; et ipsi in beato Petro pascendi, regendi ac gubernandi universalem Ecclesiam a Domino nostro Jesu Christo plenam potestatem traditam esse; quemadmodum etiam in gestis Œcumenicorum Conciliorum et sacris canonibus continetur.

"Docemus proinde et declaramus, Ecclesiam Romanam, disponente Domino, super omnes alias ordinariæ potestatis obtinere principatum, et hanc Romani Pontificis jurisdictionis potestatem, quæ vere episcopalis est, immediatam esse: erga quam cujuscumque ritus et dignitatis pastores atque fideles, tam seorsum singuli quam simul omnes, officio hierarchicæ subordinationis veræque obedientiam obstringuntur, non solum in rebus, quæ ad fidem et mores, sed etiam in iis quæ disciplinam et regimen Ecclesiæ per totum orbem diffusæ pertinent; ita ut, custodita cum Romano Pontifice tam communionis, quam ejusdem fidei professionis unitate, Ecclesiæ Christi sit unus grex sub uno summo pastore. Hæc est Catholicæ veritatis doctrina, a qua deviare salva fide atque salute nemo potest.

honour is the honour of the universal Church. My honour is the united strength of my brethren. Then I am indeed honoured, when due honour is not denied to each of them.

"Then from that supreme power of the Roman Pontiff to govern the universal Church, it follows that he enjoys the right, in the exercise of this his power, to communicate freely with the shepherds and flocks of the whole Church, that they may be taught and governed by him in the way of salvation. Wherefore, we condemn and reprobate the opinions of some who say that this communication of the supreme head with shepherds and flocks can be lawfully impeded, or who render the same obnoxious to the secular power, by contending that what is constituted by the Apostolic See, or by its authority, has no force nor value unless it be confirmed by the placet of the secular power.

"And forasmuch as by Divine right of Apostolic primacy the Roman Pontiff presides over the universal Church, we also teach and declare him to be the supreme judge of the faithful; and in all causes requiring ecclesiastical examination recourse may be had to him for judgment. But the judgment of the Apostolic See, above whose authority there is none, cannot be set aside by any man; nor is it lawful for any man to judge concerning its judgment. Wherefore, they wander from the right path of truth who affirm that it is lawful to appeal from the judgments of Roman Pontiffs to an Œcumenical Council, as if it were an authority superior to the Roman Pontiff.

"Therefore, if any one shall say that the Roman Pontiff has only an office of inspection or direction, and not full and supreme power of jurisdiction over the universal Church, not only in matters relating to faith and morals, but also in those which pertain to the discipline and government of the Church throughout the whole world; or that he has only the greater part, but not the entire plenitude of this supreme power; or that this power is not ordinary and immediate, or in all Churches and every Church, or in all pastors and their people, and in every one of them; let him be anathema."

"CHAPTER IV.*

"Concerning the infallible Mastery of the Roman Pontiff.

"And, in that very Apostolic primacy which the Roman Pontiff, as successor of Peter, Prince of the Apostles, obtains in relation to the universal Church, this holy See has always held that the supreme power of mastery is also comprehended. The perpetual usage of the Church proves it, and the Œcumenical Councils themselves, especially those in which East and West agreed in the union of charity, declared. For the Fathers of the fourth Council of Constantinople, following in the steps of those who were before them, made this solemn profession: It is the first (means of) salvation to keep the rule of right faith. And because the sentence of our Lord Jesus Christ cannot be overlooked, where He says, Thou art Peter, and on this rock will I build My Church, these things which were said are proved by their effects, for in the Apostolic See the Catholic religion is always preserved immaculate, and a holy doctrine is professed. Therefore, by no means wishing to be separated from the faith and doctrine which the Apostolic See preaches, we hope to be found worthy to remain in "Tantum autem abest, ut hæc Summi Pontificis potestas efficiat ordinariæ ac immediatæ illi episcopalis jurisdictionis potestati, qua Episcopi, qui positi a Spiritu Sancto in Apostolorum locum successerunt, tamquam veri pastores assignatos sibi greges, singuli singulos, pascunt et regunt, ut eadem a supremo et universali Pastore asseratur, roboretur ac vindicetur, secundum illud sancti Gregorii Magni: Meus honor est honor universalis Ecclesiæ. Meus honor est fratrum meorum solidus vigor. Tum ego vere honoratus sum, cum singulis quibusque honor debitus non negetur.

"Porro ex suprema illa Romani Pontificis potestate gubernandi universam Ecclesiam jus eidem esse consequitur, in hujus sui muneris exercitio libere communicandi cum pastoribus et gregibus totius Ecclesiæ, ut iidem ab ipso in via salutis doceri ac regi possint. Quare damnamus ac reprobamus illorum sententias, qui hanc supremi capitis cum pastoribus et gregibus communicationem licite impediri posse dicunt, aut eandem reddunt sæculari potestati obnoxiam, ita ut contendant, quæ ab Apostolica Sede vel ejus auctoritate ad regimen Ecclesiæ constituuntur, vim ac valorem non habere, nisi potestatis sæcularis placito confirmentur.

"Et quoniam Divino Apostolici primatus jure Romanus Pontifex universæ Ecclesiæ præest, docemus etiam et declaramus, eum esse judicem supremum fidelium, et in omnibus causis ad examen ecclesiasticum spectantibus ad ipsius posse judicium recurri; Sedis vero Apostolicæ, cujus auctoritate major non est, judicium a nemine fore retractandum, neque cuiquam de ejus licere judicare judicio. Quare a recto veritatis tramite aberrant, qui affirmant, licere ab judiciis Romanorum Pontificum ad Œcumenicum Concilium tamquam ad auctoritatem Romano Pontifice superiorem appellare.

"Si quis itaque dixerit Romanum Pontificem habere tantummodo officium inspectionis vel directionis, non autem plenam et supremam potestatem jurisdictionis in universam Ecclesiam, non solum in rebus quæ ad fidem et mores, sed etiam in iis quæ ad disciplinam et regimen Ecclesiæ per totum orbem diffusæ pertinent; aut eum habere tantum potiores partes, non vero totam plenitudinem hujus supremæ potestatis; aut hanc ejus potestatem non esse ordinariam et immediatam sive in omnes ac singulas ecclesias, sive in omnes et singulos pastores et fideles; anathema sit."

* "CAPUT IV.

"De Romani Pontificis infallibili Magisterio.

"Ipso autem Apostolico primatu, quem Romanus Pontifex, tamquam Petri Principis Apostolorum successor, in universam Ecclesiam obtinet, supremam quoque magisterii potestatem comprehendi, hæc sancta Sedes semper tenuit, perpetuus Ecclesiæ usus comprobat, ipsaque Œcumenica Concilia, ea imprimis, in quibus Oriens cum Occidente in fidei charitatisque unionem conveniebat, declaraverunt. Patres enim Concilii Constantinopolitani quarti, majorum vestigiis inhærentes, hanc solemnem ediderunt professionem: Prima salus est, rectæ fidei regulam custodire. Et quia non potest Domini nostri Jesu Christi prætermitti sententia dicentis: Tu es Petrus, et super hanc petram ædificabo Ecclesiam meam, hæc quæ dicta sunt, rerum probantur effectibus, quia in Sede Apostolica immaculata est semper Catholica reservata religio, et sancta celebrata doctrina. Ab hujus ergo fide et doctrina quam Sedes Apostolica prædicat, separari minime cupientes, speramus, ut in una communione esse mereamur, in qua est integra et vera Christianæ religionis soliditas. Approbante vero Lugdunensi Concilio secundo, Græci professi sunt: Sanctam Romanam Ecclesiam summum the communion where there is an entire and true unity of the Christian religion. Indeed, with the approval of the second Council of Lyon, the Greeks professed that the Holy Roman Church obtains the supreme and full primacy and principality over the universal Catholic Church, which from the Lord Himself in blessed Peter, Prince or Chief of the Apostles, of whom the Roman Pontiff is the successor, (she) truly and humbly acknowledges herself to have received; and as beyond others he is held to defend the true faith, so also, if any questions of faith shall arise, they must be defined by his judgment. Then again, the Florentine Council defined: that the Roman Pontiff is true Vicar of Christ, head of the whole Church, and father and teacher of all Christians; and that full power was delivered to him by our Lord Jesus Christ, in blessed Peter, to feed, rule and govern the universal Church.

"That they might fulfil this pastoral office, Our Predecessors always laboured without wearying, that the salutary doctrine of Christ might be propagated in all nations of the earth, and watched with equal care that where it was received it should be preserved sincere and pure. On this account the Prelates of all the world, both singly and congregated in Synods, following the long custom of Churches, and the form of ancient rule, referred to this Apostolic See those perils especially which arose in matters of faith, that whatever injury the faith suffered might there be most effectually repaired, where faith can suffer no defect. And the Roman Pontiffs, so far as the condition of times and things required, now in Œcumenical Councils convoked, or by the ascertained opinion of the Church dispersed through the whole world, sometimes by particular Synods, or again by other means which Divine Providence afforded, defined those tenets which, God helping, they knew to be consistent with sacred Scriptures and Apostolical traditions. For not even to the successors of Peter was the Holy Spirit promised, that, by His revelation, they might discover new doctrine; but that, by His assistance, they might sacredly keep, and faithfully expound, the revelation or deposit of the faith delivered through the Apostles. Whose Apostolic doctrine indeed all the venerable Fathers embraced, and the holy orthodox Doctors venerated and followed, most fully knowing that the holy See of Peter remained always untouched with error, according to the Divine promise of the Lord our Saviour, made to the Prince of His disciples: I have prayed for thee that thy faith fail not; and do thou, when converted, confirm thy brethren.

"Therefore this grace of never-failing truth and faith was divinely imparted to Peter and his successors in this Chair, that they might discharge their exalted office for the salvation of all; that the universal flock of Christ, being turned away from the poisonous bait of error, might be nourished with the food of heavenly doctrine; that, occasion of schism being put out of the way, the whole Church might be preserved in one, and that, resting on its own foundation, it might stand firm against the gates of hell.

"But since in the present age, when the healthful efficacy of the Apostolic Office is so greatly needed, not a few are found who speak evil of this authority, we think it most necessary to solemnly assert the prerogative which the only-begotten Son of God has deigned to unite with the functions of the supreme pastor.

"Therefore We, faithfully keeping to the tradition received from the very beginning of the Christian faith, to the glory of God our Saviour, the exaltation of the Catholic religion, and the salvation of Christian peoples, with the approbation of the sacred Council, teach, and define it to be a doctrine divinely revealed: That the Roman Pontiff, when he speaks ex cathedra, that is to say, when, discharging the office of pastor and teacher of all Christians, by his supreme Apostolic authority, he defines a doctrine concerning faith or morals to be held by the universal Church, with the Divine assistance promised to himself in blessed Peter, is in possession of that infallibility with which the Divine Redeemer willed His Church to be furnished when defining a doctrine of faith or manners; and therefore such definitions of the et plenum primatum et principatum super universam Ecclesiam Catholicam obtinere, quem se ab ipso Domino in beato Petro Apostolorum principe sive vertice, cujus Romanus Pontifex est successor, cum potestatis plenitudine recepisse veraciter et humiliter recognoscit; et sicut præ cæteris tenetur fidei veritatem defendere, sic et, si quæ de fide subortæ fuerint quæstiones, suo debent judicio definiri. Florentinum denique Concilium definivit: Pontificem Romanum, verum Christi Vicarium, totiusque Ecclesiæ caput et omnium Christianorum patrem ac doctorem existere; et ipsi in beato Petro pascendi, regendi ac gubernandi universalem Ecclesiam a Domino nostro Jesu Christo plenam potestatem traditam esse.

"Huic pastorali muneri ut satisfacerent, Prædecessores Nostri indefessam semper operam dederunt, ut salutaris Christi doctrina apud omnes terræ populos propagaretur, pariqué cura vigilarunt, ut, ubi recepta esset, sincera et pura conservaretur. Quocirca totius orbis Antistites, nunc singuli, nunc in Synodis congregati, longam ecclesiarum consuetudinem et antiquæ regulæ formam sequentes, ea præsertim pericula, quæ in negotiis fidei emergebant, ad hanc Sedem Apostolicam retulerunt, ut ibi potissimum rescarcirentur damna fidei, ubi fides non potest sentire defectum. Romani autem Pontifices, prout temporum et rerum conditio suadebat, nunc convocatis Œcumenicis Conciliis, aut explorata Ecclesiæ per orbem dispersæ sententia, nunc per Synodos particulares, nunc aliis, quæ divina suppeditabat providentia, adhibitis auxiliis, ea tenenda definiverunt, quæ sacris Scripturis et Apostolicis Traditionibus consentanea, Deo adjutore, cognoverant. Neque enim Petri successoribus Spiritus Sanctus promissus est, ut eo revelante novam doctrinam patefacerent, sed ut, eo assistente, traditam per Apostolos revelationem, seu fidei depositum, sancte custodirent et fideliter exponerent. Quorum quidem Apostolicam doctrinam omnes venerabiles Patres amplexi et sancti Doctores orthodoxi venerati atque secuti sunt; plenissime scientes, hanc Sancti Petri Sedem ab omni semper errore illibatam permanere, secundum Domini Salvatoris nostri Divinam pollicitationem discipulorum suorum principi factam: Ego rogavi pro te, ut non deficiat fides tua, et tu aliquando conversus confirma fratres tuos.

"Hoc igitur veritatis et fidei nunquam deficientis charisma Petro ejusque in hac Cathedra successoribus divinitus collatum est, ut excelso suo munere in omnium salutem fungerentur, ut universus Christi grex per eos ab erroris venenosa esca aversus, cœlestis doctrinæ pabulo nutriretur, ut, sublata schismatis occasione, Ecclesia tota una conservaretur, atque suo fundamento innixa, firma adversus inferi portas consisteret.

"At vero cum hac ipsa ætate, qua salutifera Apostolici muneris efficacia vel maxime requiritur, non pauci inveniantur qui illius auctoritate obtrectant; necessarium omnino esse cen-

Roman Pontiff because given by himself, and not from the consent of the Church, are not to be reformed.

"And if any one presumes to contradict this definition of ours, which may God forbid, let him be accursed.

"Dated at Rome, in public session in the Vatican Basilic solemnly celebrated, in the year of our Lord's incarnation 1870, on the 18th of July. In the 25th year of our Pontificate."

So in this final definition of the dogma of the Pope's infallible mastery, the Pope declared that his definitions were given by himself, came not from the consent of the Church, and were not to be reformed; and pronounced a curse on whomsoever should presume to contradict him. But, before the day for decision came, on the 18th of July, 1870, the majority of that part of the Council that were not his own personal retainers had departed.

On the 20th of September following, the King of Italy entered Rome, and added Rome and the Papal States to his united Kingdom, the Council not having met again; so, after all, the dogma of infallibility forced upon his Church by the Pope ex sese has not had the solemn confirmation of a Council, and for that reason alone, if there were no other, it may be disputed, and, in fact, is utterly ignored by many.

On the 20th of October, the Council having been inevitably dispersed, Pius IX., by the Letters Apostolic Postquam Dei munere, dismissed the dispersed, and suspended the extinct Council.*

REGULAR ORDERS.

MUCH general information on this subject is contained in the present volume; but so great changes have monastic institutions undergone, and so deeply interested are we in desiring the visitation of convents, so long as they are permitted to exist in England, that it is necessary to possess certain knowledge of the principle on which they are established and governed. Such knowledge can be obtained in the draft of Constitutions concerning Religious Orders, which was framed in the Vatican, passed a Congregation, and would no doubt have pro forma passed the shadow of a Council in the next session, had not that shadow passed away on the capture of Rome by the Italian army. Had these Constitutions become a Decree of Council, they would only have differed from the chapters concerning Monks, Friars, and Nuns (de Regularibus et Monialibus) of the Council of Trent, in a certain adaptation to the present time, without the least relaxation, but rather an increase of severity.

"Concerning Regulars.

"It is greatly to be lamented that the wickedness of certain bad men has gone so far, that they have rashly renounced Religious Orders as worn-out and obsolete institutions by no means adapted to our own time, but rather hurtful; just as if the evangelic counsels delivered by Christ our Lord for attaining to perfection became obsolete whenever they were rejected by society: and what is worse, these men never cease to excite and foster contempt of those Orders by any wicked arts which may help them more easily to compass their destruction. Hence, with the approbation of the Sacred Council, We earnestly exhort all the Lord's faithful, reprobating false and malicious insinuations, and arts of this kind, not only to avoid and not to suffer such doctrines and examples, but also to exhibit constant marks of esteem, devotion, and love towards the religious families which deserve so much from the Church, and from civil society.

"Furthermore, treading in the steps of Our predecessors, we enjoin on all the Prelates of Churches, that they regard those religious families with affectionate benevolence, treat them with paternal kindness; help, cherish, and protect them in all ways (possible); and with the utmost care promote true concord and agreement between the secular and regular Clergy;* so that, being united to each other in the closest bond of mutual charity, with their united powers they may be able to cultivate the Lord's field, fight the battles of Christ, and rout the enemies of the Church, who, with all their might, labour, if it were possible, to destroy her.

"And also we gravely admonish all Superiors and Regulars of Orders that they conduct themselves towards the Bishops with due reverence, obsequiousness, and honour, and detract nothing from their rights, but rather gladly render them active assistance in the discharge of the duties of their sacred ministry, according to their own institute, that they may faithfully keep the vows which they have made to God in their profession; sedulously keeping to their own semus, prærogativam, quam unigenitus Dei Filius cum summo pastorali officio conjungere dignatus est, solemniter asserere.

"Itaque Nos traditioni a fidei Christianæ exordio perceptæ fideliter inhærendo, ad Dei Salvatoris nostri gloriam, religionis Catholicæ exaltationem et Christianorum populorum salutem, sacro approbante Concilio, docemus et divinitus revelatum dogma esse definimus, Romanum Pontificem, cum ex Cathedra loquitur, id est, cum omnium Christianorum Pastoris et Doctoris munere fungens pro suprema sua Apostolica auctoritate doctrinam de fide vel moribus ab universa Ecclesia tenendam definit, per assistentiam Divinam, ipsi in beato Petro promissam, ea infallibilitate pollere, qua Divinus Redemptor Ecclesiam suam in definienda doctrina de fide vel moribus instructam esse voluit; ideoque ejusmodi Romani Pontificis definitiones ex sese, non autem ex consensu Ecclesiæ, irreformabiles esse.

"Si quis autem huic Nostræ definitioni contradicere, quod Deus avertat, præsumpserit; anathema sit.

"Datum Romæ, in publica Sessione in Vaticani Basilica solemniter celebrata, anno Incarnationis Dominicæ millesimo octingentesimo septuagesimo, die decima octava Julii. Pontificatus Nostri anno vigesimo quinto.

"Ita est. JOSEPHUS, EPISCOPUS S. HIPPOLYTI, Secretarius Concilii Vaticani."

* Acta et Decreta, p. 190.

* The secular Clergy, under the government of Bishops, are Priests and Deacons, (with perhaps the minor orders,) who live in the world. The regular Clergy are the men and women who live in Monastic Establishments, under their respective rules. The Superioress of a Nunnery is a Reverend Mother.

regular discipline, and showing themselves to be Religious, not only in habit, but in virtue, and in the spirit with which their Founders were animated, that they may be able to attain their own sanctification, for the service of the Church, and the edification of the people."

If Monasticism were of Divine appointment, and if the intention of whatever is Divinely appointed were answered in the government and conduct of these Orders, the preamble now translated might be considered worthy of admiration. It is given to the reader for the sake of presenting the entire document. Leaving the original Latin as of less importance, since it is not yet confirmed, we proceed to translate what follows :—

"Scheme of a Constitution on the Vow of Obedience, proposed for the Examination of the Fathers.

"So great is the virtue of religious perfection, that they who embrace the state of Regulars, besides the renunciation of temporal goods, and the profession of chastity, are bound to deny themselves, and offer a perpetual holocaust of their own will to God. Therefore nothing is more conducive to the restoration and preservation of the discipline of Regulars than an exact and faithful observance of religious obedience, inasmuch as that inserts other virtues into the mind, and when they are there, guards them. Poverty, indeed, is great ; but integrity is greater; and yet greater than both is obedience, if it be kept entire. For the first has dominion over one's property; and the second, over his flesh; but the third, over his mind and spirit. Hence, if the vow of obedience is neglected, the hearts of the Religious dry up and harden like earth without water: there is no more delight in humility, prayer, and meditation ; and the most intimate bond of a religious family is broken.

"Wherefore, abiding by the Decrees of the most holy Tridentine Synod, by which the more easily and securely the Regular discipline may be restored where it has collapsed, and may be carried out more constantly where it has been preserved, we command, with approbation of the Sacred Council, all Regulars, both men and women, of whatever Religion, Society, or Institute they may be, that they order and adapt their life to the prescribed order of the rule which they have professed, and observe the precepts and the vows; that with a willing mind they subject themselves to perfect obedience, looking upon Christ our crucified Lord, who, being made obedient even unto death, not only gave us a precept of this virtue, but also left us in Himself a great example which we might imitate. And because all power is of God, let all Regulars acknowledge God Himself in their Superiors; and let them remember, not only that they who resist the power resist the ordinance of God, but that they are also themselves bound with peculiar obligation by force of the vow which they made in their religious profession unto God. Therefore let them regard all their Superiors with due reverence and love; and what they enjoin, according to the rule, let them entirely, promptly, and humbly perform without any excuse.

"We further exhort them to strive with all their heart to attain the perfection of this most excellent virtue, which is in a certain sense the parent and guardian of all virtues ; and at the same time to beware of, and everywhere be on their guard against, that wicked Spirit, enemy of the cross of Christ, and of all authority and subjection.

"Nevertheless, wishing to meet the tergiversation of those who suggest causes for casting off the yoke of obedience, we declare and determine that the appeals of religious persons which are used to be made to legitimate authority against a precept of obedience given by Superiors, by no means suspend the obligation of obeying ; nor should they be readily entertained, unless the religious who reclaim have first submitted to the commands of their Superiors. And if any one attempts to have recourse to a lay authority, or other authority that is not competent to interpose, against the mandates of Superiors, *we desire him to be admonished that he will gravely (offend) against the vow of obedience.

"Concerning the Common Life.

"Regular observance is known to have declined ; most certainly from the reason that the perfect common life, an edifice which the holy Founders of Religious Orders desired to establish upon the discipline of the ancient Church, and commanded to be preserved by their successors, has gone into desuetude with many Religious Orders. For where there happens to be any deflection from the path of perfection laid down by holy men, by little and little, there has been a severance from their true spirit, and from the primæval institute, with a great wreck of discipline. Hence, although, in order to remove the very grave evils which proceed from such a failure of the Common Life, the Council of Trent, Clement VIII., Innocent XI., Innocent XII., and other Pontiffs, Our predecessors, endeavoured with all their powers to restore it, evidently it is not everywhere preserved. Therefore, We being certain that in reality nothing will tend more to promote the reformation of Regulars than that in this most holy Œcumenical Council the obligation of a perfect Common Life be declared in the most weighty words, and defended with solemn sanction, the sacred Council approving, We strictly determine, resolve, and command "—

* "Tergiversationi nihilominus eorum, qui causas ad obedientiæ jugum excutiendum interserunt, occurrere volentes, declaramus atque statuimus, religiosorum recursus, qui fieri solent ad legitimam auctoritatem adversus obedientiæ præceptum a Superioribus datum, haudquaquam obediendi obligationem suspendere ; nec facile illorum habendam esse rationem, nisi prius religiosi, qui reclamaverint, Superiorum mandatis parucrint. Si quis autem ad intercipienda Superiorum mandata confugere ad laicam, vel aliam quæ competens non sit potestatem attentet admonitum eum volumus, se graviter contra obedientiæ votum facturum."

"CHAPTER I.

"For the future no new house shall be erected, nor shall even that which is de jure or de facto suppressed be restored, without an express condition and law of perpetually keeping a perfectly Common Life; otherwise any erection or restoration shall be altogether of no effect.

"Whosoever in future shall make profession, must be bound by the precept of observing a perfect life; and therefore to him who desires to be admitted to profess in any regular Order, Congregation, Society, or Institute, before he is received into the house, or puts on the religious habit, the said precept must be clearly made known; so that if he refuses to submit to it, he may not by any means be admitted. So that every novice, both in the act of professing the simple vows which precede the solemn, and the solemn vows themselves, may promise the observance of a perfectly Common Life: and therefore in the acts of admission and profession, a separate mention be made of the observance of the things aforesaid, besides all those with which the conscience of the Superiors may remain gravely charged; and if the said Superiors omit to require the performance, without any further notice, let them be deprived of active and passive voice.

"Moreover, within a year after the closing of the Council, let perfectly Common Life be established in the houses of novitiate, of professoriate, and of studies, so far as it has not been yet introduced into them, or, if introduced, has not been observed: let the same be done in houses where Superiors General or Provincials reside. But if the Provincials have not a house for their own residence, let them choose one in which a perfectly Common Life is kept; or at least a Convent of Novitiate. Also Definers or Assistants, or Councillors General or Provincials, ought to dwell in Convents of perfect Common Life. All religious, also, before profession, who dwell in the aforesaid houses, are absolutely required to observe it. Therefore let no one of the Religious be capable of appointment to the office of Superior General, or to any other office, or to any of the greater dignities of his Order now mentioned, unless he professes the same perfectly Common Life. And they who are now elected to the said offices or dignities, unless they embrace it, by the very fact must be understood to have renounced them. Which things will also be observed in respect to local Superiors and other officials in all other convents where a perfectly Common Life shall be established.

"Also Superiors Regular, in all patience and doctrine, whether by exhortation or persuasion, should in all ways with all their might endeavour that all the religious, even they that are already professed, should profess a perfect Common Life as soon as possible: but they who refuse must be placed in separate convents; but let these be subject to the law of a deposit in a common chest, and let them not have any power to use money, except for their own necessary and honest uses, having on all occasions the previous license of their Superiors: besides this, let them not have any passive voice in elections and provincial chapters; but let them be allowed to exercise, so far as they now enjoy it, an active voice in the capitular and provincial elections; but not in those which relate to regular observance and discipline.

"Moreover, when their training is finished, let not the newly professed be transferred to any other house that is not reformed, where there does not flourish a perfect Common Life: but if there is no other such reformed house, let them remain in the same house of novitiate; and if this house, on account of the number of its occupants, is not large enough to receive more, let it be considered as interdicted from receiving any more novices, until occasion be found for enabling the newly professed to be conveniently transferred to another house where the law of perfect Common Life is well observed; and so the house for novices may be rendered sufficient for the accommodation of new comers.

"Finally, since the perfection of living in common consists in that whatever goods, rents, emoluments, and all other resources by whatever title come to the religious, are fully applied to the use of the religious family, and they receive food itself, clothing, and other necessaries, from the Convent in common; the Superiors deny to the religious nothing that is necessary, and the religious expect nothing superfluous; and thus charity and carefulness are commended to the Superiors, but religious moderation is earnestly commended to those that are under them."

"CHAPTER II.

"In order to establish the profession of perfect Common Life in Monasteries of Nuns, besides what has been alleged in the former chapter for religious men, there is also a reason which may be considered peculiar, namely, that of removing the danger of accumulations and distractions which is greater in them than in the others.

"In future, no new Monastery for Nuns shall be erected, nor even shall any that has been de jure or de facto suppressed be restored, without the express condition and law of preserving for ever a perfect Common Life, otherwise the erection or restoration shall be altogether void. Nuns in the aforesaid Monasteries who make vows, are absolutely bound by the precept of observing the said Common Life. To postulants, who desire to enter the Monasteries aforesaid for the purpose of professing, the precept of that life shall be presented; and this must be done again before they put on the monastic habit. But Novices, before profession, if they make their vows in a Monastery where the perfect Common Life is in force, must expressly promise to observe it: but if in a Monastery in which it is not yet introduced, they must promise themselves to be ready to embrace the same as soon as ever it pleases their Superiors to introduce it.

"In Monasteries for Nuns already existing, in which perfect Common Life is not yet in force, Bishops, or other Superiors to whom the Monasteries are subject, must conduct themselves prudently in prescribing it, lest otherwise greater inconveniences arise. Let them ponder the peculiar circumstances which exist; and if those circumstances indicate that it should be introduced into the Lord's Vineyard, let them not employ comminations, but endeavour by paternal exhortations, and spiritual exercises, to lead the Nuns to the desired restoration of discipline. Let them first hear all and each of them, and closely explore their mind, that it may be certainly ascertained who freely acquiesce in a reformation of this kind, who, on the contrary, are reluctant, and in what number they are to be counted who, on account of age and authority, are of greater importance. If the majority show themselves ready for reformation, the Bishop, or other Superior, unless for peculiar reasons he thinks otherwise, may introduce the perfect Common Life, allowing, however, those who refuse it to remain in their former state; but, so that they be bound to put money into the common chest: nor may they use money, except for necessary and honest purposes, first obtaining from their Superioress license on every occasion. On the contrary, if the greater number of the Nuns are opposed to reformation, the matter shall be deferred until a more opportune time; or, at least, until the time when the Nuns who, in their profession, shall have promised submission to the perfect Common Life, constitute the majority of the Community.

"When, in this manner, the perfect Common Life is introduced into any Monastery, if it happens that any objectors yet remain in it, they must not in any case be chosen for the office of Superioress, Vicaress, Mistress of Novices, or Stewardess; and if any are found already elected, they must be considered by that fact to have resigned the said offices, for the reason that none could be elected to them unless they observed the perfect Common Life. But it is to be hoped that with a willing mind the Nuns will embrace the more perfect life; that, refusing the looser way of living, they who belong to the heavenly Spouse will seek Him only.

"These things, as regards Religious men and Nuns, we will and command, and therefore we gravely direct all Moderators, Generals, Provincials, Commissaries, Abbots, Priors, Rectors and Guardians, of whatever Order, Society, Congregation, or Institute they be, and others who may be concerned, that they carry into full effect that which is decreed in this our Constitution, notwithstanding the privileges of all and each, and indulgences under whatever forms of words conceived, even if included in the Corpus Juris, (Body of Canon Law,) or in Constitutions, Statutes, or even in sworn regulations, and confirmed by Apostolic authority, or in customs from time immemorial, and whatsoever else to the contrary."

"Concerning the Clausure."*

"For the safe keeping of cloister life, which is most highly necessary to regular observance, by Canons, Sanctions, and Constitutions of Supreme Pontiffs, not only the law of clausure is enjoined on all religious houses of Regulars of both sexes, but also other things most wisely appointed which, as much as possible, tend to the good and the conservation of the clausure itself. For care is taken lest the Religious, by too much frequenting at the cloisters of men, should be distracted from the quiet of solitude, with great loss of time, with admiration of others, and with peril of transgressing the rule: also it is forbidden them to go out of their convents without permission of their Superior, and without a companion. Care is taken of the Nuns, that by the frequent visits of strangers at the gratings they do not rashly throw themselves into occasions of departing from the right way of perfection; for it is to be feared lest from familiar conversations with persons of this kind they would be covered over with the world's dust. Therefore, while those things which are appointed for the healthful keeping of the elect part of the Lord's flock are to be observed, as is just, everywhere and by all, all abuses ought to be removed out of the way, the Sacred Council approving; We determine and command:—

"CHAPTER I.

"In all Houses, Monasteries, and Convents of Regulars (men) let clausure be preserved, according to Sacred Canons and Apostolic Constitutions and Sanctions, so that within the walls of the said Houses, Convents, and Monasteries, and the Sacred Cloisters, women of whatever kind or condition may not on any account enter, or be in any way received, not even though they be only of the age of infants, under the censures and penalties inflicted on those who violate the clausure; and that all danger in this matter be put away, if under any pretext of privileges, or without any such pretext, an entrance should occur; and notwithstanding any privilege, or any contrary custom, even if long continued. Wherefore we strictly command Generals, Provincials, Abbots, Visitors, and others whom it concerns, that wherever the clausure exists it be diligently preserved; and where it is found to be either obliterated or neglected, it be perfectly restored.

"CHAPTER II.

"Let no one dare to go out of the Convent except for a just cause, and with a license obtained by application on every occasion, together with a benediction received from the Superior: also with a companion, —excepting, as to the obligation of going out with a companion, in a case of necessity proved in the judgment of the local Superior. But the Superior must not grant leave to go out, except a just cause has first been proved to himself ; and he must not omit causing a companion to accompany him that is to go out. General licenses for going out shall no more be granted to any one ; and persons contravening any of the prescribed regulations must suffer condign punishment. Let every one return to the Convent before evening, and then let him go to the Superior to receive his blessing. Let the Superiors also provide that the Religious do not insinuate themselves into the acquaintance of people of the world ; and that both in the cloisters and without they so conduct themselves in conversation, gesture, habit, and address, that they who are unfriendly may be respectful, not having any thing evil to say of them, and that faithful Christians may everywhere receive edification from them. Wherefore let not seculars be permitted to frequent religious houses without just cause, lest the tranquillity and silence of the regular family be disturbed, and the spirit of observance by which the junior members (alumni) of regular Orders ought to be animated should grow cool, and be gradually extinguished. By which things the conscience of Superiors, above all others, and of the Religious themselves, becomes burdened.

* Clausura—Shutting up.

"CHAPTER III.

"The directions contained in the second chapter we extend also to the establishments for men where the simple vows only are made, and desire them to be observed therein. With regard to the clausure, too, although Institutions of this kind, by common right, are not subject to it, yet in some it has been usefully introduced. We therefore command, as to these Institutions for men, that where the clausure is in force, whether by special order of the Holy See, or by virtue of Constitutions, or by custom, it be sedulously preserved. For others, however, where it is not yet found established, we impart power to the General Moderators, whether by themselves or by other Superiors to be deputed by them, for appointing the clausure in houses of the Institution approved by the Holy See. And they should make use of this authority, except where any grave reason leads them to do otherwise ; in which case let them provide by other effectual means, that perils and scandals may not arise from the access of women.

"CHAPTER IV.

"Pursuing the Constitution of Boniface VIII., the Decree of the Council of Trent, and the sanctions of the Supreme Pontiffs our predecessors, We gravely command Bishops, that, in all subject to themselves, under ordinary authority, but in others, by authority of the Apostolic See, the clausure of Nuns be diligently restored where it has been violated ; and where it remains inviolate they shall use their utmost endeavour for its conservation, so that not only Nuns be prevented from going out of their Monasteries, but also that no one of any kind, condition, or sex, go into them, and that not even any persons under age, however young, be admitted, under peril of the censures and penalties denounced against those who break the clausure, notwithstanding any custom of long continuance ; excepting, however, cases by right permitted, in which all that is to be observed by law must be observed, and saving the indulgences obtained from the Apostolic See, especially as relating to schools of girls who come from without.

"CHAPTER V.

"Let the Bishops, and other Superiors to whom it belongs, provide that an end be made of abuses, if any persons have crept into Monasteries, by ways of access to doors and grates, and by conversations with strange persons, by which the fervour of the Nuns themselves is weakened, their minds imbued with worldly thoughts, and the study of discipline and regular observance diminished, not without danger of losing the spirit of their holy vocation. But let them proceed to that first by exhortations and admonitions, and then, if it be necessary, let them apply the coercion of punishments. But as to conversations of Religious men with Nuns, let those directions be observed which are found prescribed by the Supreme Pontiffs our predecessors.

"CHAPTER VI.

"Although those Institutions in which the Sisters only make simple vows are not subject by common right to the law of clausure, we inculcate on local governors that if the females under their charge (alumnæ) have no duties out of doors, they find means of imposing Episcopal clausure in the houses of the Institutes of their Diocese, well considering the peculiar circumstances : and that the houses of those Institutes whose chief object is the exercise of some business out of doors, should be equally subject to the Episcopal clausure, all circumstances being considered ; not to hinder the egress of the Sisters, but only the ingress of strangers from without, as they shall judge to be expedient in the Lord. And also let them advise the Sisters that when they go out, they have always a companion, and employ due cautions not to expose themselves to the dangers of the world, nor attract the admiration of the people.

"These we will and command ; old customs, and other things to the contrary, notwithstanding." *

JESUITS.

THE history of Jesuitism must be sought elsewhere. It is a vast study ; and not even the most condensed summary can be attempted here : but a few characteristic notes are necessary. The Society or Company of Jesus was founded, as every one knows, by a Spaniard, Ignatius of Loyola, for the express purpose of counteracting the Reformation of the sixteenth century. It is not a monastic Order. Its members are not bound by monastic rules. They have a most exact organic discipline ; yet they have provisions for wide license. The end they profess to follow sanctifies the means,—means being good or evil in appearance only, but always good if they promote the end, that end being what they call the greater glory of God ; and as it is taken for granted that the visible head of the Church, the Pope of Rome, is the Vicar of Christ, and representative of God in the world, whatever furthers the interests of the Papacy is most excellent, because it is for the greater glory of God, "ad majorem gloriam Dei." To say of any thing that it is A. M. G. D., is to set on it the mark of their approval, be it what it may. In the peculiar style of the Papal Church, the Society or Company of Jesus is a Religious Order, not, as we have said, monastic, nor strictly sacerdotal, but rather political. There are in it three degrees : the First, of Professed ; the Second, of Coadjutors ; and the Third, of Novices ; if indeed that may be called a degree which consists of persons not yet admitted, but only on probation.

* Documenta, ii., 361. Schemata circa ordines regulares.

The Professed, or perfect Jesuits, are of two classes; the one having taken the four vows, of Chastity, Poverty, Obedience, and Unreserved Obedience to the Pope in the service of Missions. The less honourable class have not hazarded the perils and self-sacrifice which are inseparable from some Missions. The Coadjutors make the same vows as the Professed of three vows. The Professed of the first class occupy the highest places in the Society, and discharge the most important and confidential services. They must be of superior education, above twenty-five years of age, and in Priest's orders. They should be learned in Philosophy, Theology, and Canon Law, or, if not so, possess other gifts sufficient to compensate for deficiency in these. They ought to pass through severe probation in begging, serving in hospitals, and prolonged "spiritual exercises." Only the General of the Order can admit Candidates to the degree of Professed, on whom will devolve the most arduous, difficult, and honourable services. There should not be many Professed of three vows, and these ought to be tested by a lay probation of four years, and well proficient in the study of Liberal Arts and Philosophy, with Theology ; having established character for zeal, diligence, sound judgment, and skill in argument. The Coadjutors are not destined to such high or select service as the Professed, but equal care is taken to test them well, and not admit any who are likely to be unsteady or discontented. They are of two classes, Spiritual and Temporal. The Spiritual Coadjutor must be competently instructed in letters, of character for steadiness, and in Priest's orders. He has to assist the Professed in the discharge of their duties. He may be the Rector of a College, a Lecturer, or a Proctor. He can confer as much grace in the help of souls as if he were Professed! He should never think of changing his state. The Temporal Coadjutors may be persons of meaner attainment ; be apt for domestic services in the houses of the Professed, be very humble, content with Martha's lot, and of healthy constitution, capable of hard work. They need not know Latin, nor was it at one time indispensably necessary that they should be able to read ; but we must suppose that in these days that elementary accomplishment is considered necessary. It is said that the Novices, or persons on trial for admission into the Society, have everything necessary to try their humility and patience. It is certain, however, that the Superiors of Jesuit houses exercise no little discretion in their treatment of the persons who present themselves for the Novitiate.

The General of the Order lived in Rome as long as that was practicable, and appointed Provincials for the several Countries or Provinces where the Society had Houses and Colleges ; and those Provincials would appoint Superiors and Rectors. But there were many professed "Fathers" who lived apart, who prosecuted special services without the garb or name of Jesuit ; some of them were Bishops, some even Cardinals, by exemption from an original rule that no member of the Company should have any ecclesiastical benefice or dignity outside the Order. As to ecclesiastical laws, they may be considerably relaxed "for the greater glory of God ;" and as for the Divine laws of morality, truth, and justice, and any human laws whatever,—the will of the Supreme Pontiff, the mandate of the General, and the subordination of authorities being skilfully preserved,—all gave way to the supreme pleasure of the chief, for the greater glory of the Church. The universal testimony of history confirms this statement ; and the brief sketch of Jesuit organization now given is derived from the one sure authority, the Constitutions of the Society.* No doubt many changes of detail have taken place. One Pope suppressed the Society for its crimes ; another Pope restored it for its merits in service of the Church. There is not a country in the world that it has ever entered from which, at some time, it has not been banished ; or where it is not at this moment under some measure of disgrace, even if readmitted.

It might not be necessary to say more about Jesuitism, if it had not been for many years past the ruling power in the Papacy, and if the influence of Jesuits had not extended beyond their own Church. They are the chosen and trusted advisers of the Pope, whom they appear to have completely in their power. They were, avowedly, the champions of the Papal See from the very first. When the Pope was in France a captive, they were in Russia, refugees. When Pius VII. returned to Rome, they gained fresh footing in Europe, and especially in England. Now they are at the height of exaltation in the Vatican, but have failed to conciliate confidence elsewhere. A few words having been said of the constitution of their Society, something more will be said of their spiritual discipline, which takes its entire character from the Spiritual Exercises, and these Exercises have many admirers among those whom we have been accustomed to call Romanisers and Ritualists. Therefore it behoves us all to know what is the spirit of this devotion, whereunto it leads, and in what respects it differs from vital Christianity.

* Constitutiones Societatis Jesu, cum earum Declarationibus. Romæ, in Collegio ejusdem Societatis cum Facultate Superiorum. A.D. MDLXXXIII.

SPIRITUAL EXERCISES.

We often hear of the saint-like piety of many "Catholics," and are suspected of intolerance in condemning the Church which they adorn. As for that Church, we do condemn it without hesitation; but every one of its members must answer for himself to God, and we presume not to acquit or to condemn him any further than personal knowledge may sometimes compel us to believe that his conduct may be worthy of approval or of disapproval. For final judgment he will stand with ourselves before the Judge of all. But as an appeal is made on the plea of Catholic piety, it is desirable to understand what is the accepted standard of devotion in their Church. There are many books of devotion written by private persons, and their merit is very various; but one which ranks above all others bears the seal of official sanction impressed on it by successive Popes, and by some is even said to be inspired. The original author was Ignatius Loyola, founder of "the Society of Jesus." It has passed through various editions; has been published with explanatory notes; is accompanied with an authorised directory; is made the standard of devout meditation obligatory on every Jesuit; has been adopted by other religious communities, and is much admired by a numerous class of imitators outside the Church which boasts of it. The original title was, "Certain Spiritual Exercises, by which a man is directed how he may conquer himself, and establish a rule for his life, his determination being free from hurtful affections." The edition here made use of is noted at the foot of the page.* Let us describe some portions of it.

I. First Principles.

The Principium sive Fundamentum, or Fundamental Principle, is laid down in one short paragraph, which reads well at first sight. The words are these:—"Man is created to this end, that he may praise and reverence the Lord his God, and by serving God may at length be saved. But other things in the world are created for man himself, that they may help him to pursue the end of his creation. Hence it follows that he is to use them or abstain from them just so far as they promote or hinder the prosecution of that end. For this reason we ought to live in a state of indifference to all created things, so far as they are left to our free choice, and not forbidden to us. Therefore, so far as in us lies, we may not seek for health rather than sickness, nor prefer wealth to poverty, honour to contempt, or length of life to early death. But it is allowable to choose out of all things, and wish for those which lead to that end."

On a more critical perusal of this Canon, we miss a primary truth of Christianity, and detect some very questionable points; but are gratified in finding that Jesuit authorities themselves furnish a sufficiently clear exposition to make it unnecessary to attempt an analysis which might seem to have been conducted under the influence of "Protestant prejudice." The omission, however, could not be noticed by those expositors without raising an objection to the whole scheme of Jesuit devotion. We must therefore point it out in our own way.

That man was created to the end that he might praise and reverence the Lord his God is indisputably true; but it is not all the truth. The words following, indeed, might recall the whole truth to those who have already learned it; but they fail to express what they may be taken to imply. Eique serviens tandem salvus fiet, "And that, serving Him, he might at length be saved," implies that he is lost, which is altogether true, and asserts that by serving God he can be saved, which is only remotely true, because acceptable service cannot be rendered without faith, and salvation cannot be gained without the Saviour. Here, then, is a fatal break in the chain of truths. The Fall of Man, Inbred Sin, Redemption, Faith in Christ,—these are the essential truths of Christianity, which the founder of Jesuitism does not appear to have thought of. He did but hint of them unawares, as it seems, and, without meaning so much, makes but a tacit and involuntary admission of the original offence. If Luther or Melancthon were then alive, he might have bidden Loyola revise his fundamental principle; but effectually to revise the sentence, "and by serving Him may at length be saved," would have necessitated so thorough a revisal of all the Exercitia as to blot out the whole, and make a full surrender of the entire system. The words on the first title-page, which tell a man that he can conquer himself, reform his life, and extricate his soul from condemnation by going through a course of spiritual exercises, betray the πρῶτον ψεῦδος, the fundamental fraud.

Now to the witnesses whose testimony will help us to point out the erroneous propositions. According to the Directory, which expresses the mind of the General Congregation of the Society, the Principium or Fundamentum may be divided into three or four points.

"First, concerning the end of Man. Second, the means tending to this end. Third, the indifference of the mind as to those means. Fourth, the choice of the means. The whole mass of the Exercises rests on these four Points, as on their Foundation.

"In the first Point each word has great weight.

* Exercitia Spiritualia S. P. Ignatii Loyolæ, cum Sensu eorundem explanato, et Directorium, additis tribus Appendicibus, Auctore P. Ignatio Diertino, S. J. Augustæ Taurinorum. 1838.

If you think on God, you acknowledge how honourable it is to praise Him. The Lord thy God suggests that by supreme right He is the Lord of the Creation, reigning with sovereign equity and justice. If you consider the nature of Man, there you find the highest reason, faculty, and suitability. If the nature of his end, supreme necessity. If your own salvation, conjointly with that end, you will find supreme utility and pleasure.

"With Praise we celebrate the excellence of God, and promote it wherever we are able. With Reverence honour is done to Him as being present. To serve is to depend on His pleasure and His command, and to live according to His commandments."

All which is unobjectionable and commonplace, and serves to introduce a very practical, but immoral and inconsequent, conclusion.

"In the second Point, 'Other things in the world, etc.,' it is chiefly to be considered that those things are only means and instruments which a man should use for the sake of gaining the end for which he was appointed. Hence we arrive at the conclusion that as an artificer cares only for the use of his instruments, not for their material, even so, taking no account of the material of created things, he is to use them or abstain from them just so far as they promote or hinder the prosecution of that end.

"In the third Point the mind is to be placed in a certain equilibrium. That is to say, as an artificer, looking round his workshop, surveys all his implements with an equal mind, not so much regarding the material out of which they are made as the use to which they are applied, so it becomes us to have a mind no more disposed for one created thing than for another,"—a rule which would be all very good if the subject of discourse were no more than a piece of mechanical work to be done by means of tools in a workshop.

"But the four kinds of things enumerated in this third Point, namely, Health or Sickness, Wealth or Poverty, Honour or Contempt, Long Life or Short, should always be present in view of him who meditates. For the great danger is lest, on their account, the mind losing its balance should incline towards the wrong side. Almost all things else may be reduced to these four.

"As to the fourth Point, that which is concluded concerning the use of means manifestly follows from what has been already said, as will be apparent on consideration. Therefore in all this argument one thing is to be carefully noted: In means, regarded as means simply, there is no goodness, except the goodness of the end. Since, then, they are not made use of under any other condition than that they help us to an end, it necessarily follows that there is not in them any reason of goodness except the goodness of the end. If there appears any other kind of goodness, it is vain, fallacious, or pretended."

So meant Ignatius Loyola. So says Diertins. So say the other authorities of the Society. So, in effect, said the Ordinary of Antwerp, Anthony Hoeflach, Censor of Books, and responsible Agent of the Roman Congregation of the Index, when he gave his official sanction. Such was the established doctrine of the Court of Rome about two hundred years ago, as witnessed by the date before us. The Society of Jesus, at this moment the most sagacious and most stubborn custodian of Romish faith, holds by the same conclusion, which is, that all means, seemingly good or seemingly bad, are equally indifferent in themselves, but become really good if the end to be attained is good.

This doctrine, that the end sanctifies the means, was the foundation laid. On this foundation the devout novice builds when he is exercising himself unto the peculiar kind of godliness which has been prescribed for him. In this kind of spiritual exercise he persuades himself that all things are equally indifferent, however lovely and virtuous, or however hateful they may for the moment seem to be. This indifference to good and evil is openly avowed in the "golden, admirable, divine book" here before us, in haughty contempt of the Apostolic sentence, that they are justly condemned who say, "Let us do evil that good may come."

And what is the end towards which the devotee is instructed to aspire? We shall discover that it is but contingently and remotely, if at all, the praise and glory of God. Proximately and in plain reality it is the will of the Superior, the mandate of the Pope, the peculiar interest of the Society. That will is continually set before every member; and in reference to the will of the Superior, be that what it may, every subordinate member is bound by the authoritative maxim that there is not in any thing any reason of goodness, except the goodness of the end, a goodness temporal, visible, and material; an axiom which no Jesuit is permitted to dispute. Once persuaded of this fundamental maxim of indifference, obedience is made easy, so far as conscience is concerned. Flesh and blood might shrink from a painful penance, but conscience may be soothed into consent to any crime.

II. First Lessons.

The pupil who seeks to learn the way of holiness in the Jesuit School, receives a first Lesson in the art of self-examination. The Bible is not put into his hands, and for aught that we can see to the contrary, the Bible is rejected as unsuitable for the occasion. He is not dealt with as a sinner born, but as one subject to sin as he might be subject to headache, and with the essential difference that the soul which is diseased can be cured more easily than the head that aches. The sinner has only to make up his mind to get rid of sin by the short and easy method now to be described. If a sort of private examination is repeated daily for a week, the work is done.* Here is the description:—

Three times a day, morning, afternoon, and evening, the learner must bethink himself. When he awakes in the morning, he must fix on some sin that besets him, and determine to be on his guard against it all the day through, and so to overcome it gradually. He is not yet instructed to pray to God for help, but is expressly required to follow the instructions of his spiritual director. This doing, he may pick out the weeds of sin one by one, as it were with his own hand. When afternoon comes, he is directed to ask God for grace to remember how often he has fallen into that particular sin, and to avoid it for the future. Having taxed his memory well, he is to note down the number of times by strokes made on the first line of a figure like the following, and, having set down the marks, will put restraint on himself for the remainder of the day.

* "Examen particulare et quotidianum."

1. _____
2. _____
3. _____
4. _____
5. _____
6. _____
7. _____

These lines are ruled for seven days. He may begin on any day of the week. One day is as good as another. The ancient Sabbath, and the continuance of the Sabbatic institution on the Lord's Day, is not acknowledged as of Divine obligation in the Church of Rome ; but as Sunday is the first day of the week, Sunday will do very well for beginnings ; and so the novice may take Sunday first. He will then in the afternoon cross the first of the two lines on the top with a mark of the pen for each time that he committed the special sin from time of rising in the morning until mid-day. In the evening, before going to bed, he will mark each repetition of the same sin since noon. On Monday he will proceed in the same manner between the first and second lines of the second pair. It may be expected that the marks will be less numerous, and the lines of self-accusation shorter and shorter until Saturday, when there ought to be few or none. By this time, the sinner himself being witness, due improvement, or entire reformation, will be certified. The same process may be continued with all his sins so long as necessary ; but what is meant by sin, and what sins there may be lurking deep within him out of sight and sense, is a question not mooted in the book.

Four directions are laid down as "useful for the more easy and quicker extirpation of any sin or vice." First. As often as a man commits that kind of sin or crime, let him lay his hand upon his breast, and be sorry for the lapse. This may be done even if other persons are present, but without their observation. Second. At night, after he has counted and compared the marks on the lines,—on the top line for the first examination, on the bottom line for the second,—let him consider whether any amendment intervened between the first and second examinations. Third. Let him compare the examinations of the second day with those of the first, and see if there be any improvement. Fourth. Having in like manner compared the examinations of two weeks, let him take account of any change for the better or for the worse.

In this way it may almost be literally true that a man sets his own sins before his face ; but unless all our observation deceives us, the futility of such contrivances for eradicating evil from the heart, and thereby attaining to newness of life, has been abundantly demonstrated.

Next follow some brief instructions for "a general examination of conscience,* very useful for purification of the soul and confession of sins." Ignatius took for granted that man has three kinds of thought : one spontaneously springing up within himself ; another suggested by the Good Spirit ; a third injected by the Evil Spirit. In the last case, it would follow that thought is but another name for temptation to sin, but can be accounted no more than an incitement from the Enemy that is without to the soul that is within, which, as yet unsinning, hears, perhaps listens to, the voice. Thus he presupposes innocence in the soul, and thinks that the evil thought may become an occasion of merit, even in a matter of mortal sin. The learner is therefore instructed how manifold may be the merit in the evil thought which is to be repelled.†

The merit of an evil thought may be elicited in two ways : either when the suggestion to commit a deadly sin is instantly repelled, or when by repeated resistance it is gradually weakened, and at last utterly driven away ; in which latter case, the victory is more signal, and the merit greater. So, to listen and linger listening to an evil thought,—to take some pleasure in it for a while, if after all it is dismissed, is but a venial sin,—the sin of negligence. Mortal sin, at last, is twofold ; namely, the sin of assent, without actual commission ; and the graver sin of act, which presupposes aggravations of time, degree, and scandal.

This dismal casuistry entangles the soul, but it serves the Confessor by opening a door for him to carry on a profitable account with his penitent. Sins of word are treated with frivolous and false distinctions, which tend to corrupt the conscience, and shall not be repeated here.

Concerning sins of deed, the teaching of the Exercitia is very characteristic of Popery in general, of which system Jesuitism in particular has been truly described as the quintessence. In order to a due examination concerning sins of this class, the young beginner is taught that he must set before himself the "Ten Commandments of God, with the precepts of the Church,"—which make sixteen or nineteen commandments at least, as the ecclesiastical precepts may be variously counted,—and the commands of Elders and Superiors, and he must consider that whatever is done against any one of them is a sin; a lighter sin, it may be, or a sin more weighty, according to the diversities of manner in sinning, or the peculiarities of habit in the sinner. Under the head of Superior Commands come the diplomas or indulgences of Popes for making war upon Infidels, or peace with Christians. "He sins not lightly who dares to transgress or to slight such pious exhortations and sanctions of rulers of the Church." These particular and general examinations are said by the Founder of the Society to relate to conscience; but what we call conscience is made so light of in the text of the Exercitia, that I must digress for a moment to explain what the Romish Doctors mean by the word.

* "Examen conscientiæ generale."

† "Quotuplex meritum in repellenda mala cogitatione."

It cannot be denied that they acknowledge the existence of the moral sense or faculty so named by ourselves, but they call it by another name. They say syndéresis, apparently equivalent with a Greek word συνδιαίρεσις. Under whatever name, it is that Heaven-given power of the soul which wakens up to the voice of truth, or, to speak more correctly, answers to the influence of God's Holy Spirit, distinguishing between right and wrong, good and evil. As the Spirit of God συμμαρτυρεῖ, witnesses together with the spirit of His child, so the same Spirit συνδιαιρεῖ, distinguishes together with the spirit of man between the same. This is conscience. But the recognised expositors of Romish doctrine say that conscience is something less. "Syndéresis," to quote from Dens, "is indeed an internal rule, but more remote, and proposes the law in general. Conscience, though dependent on syndéresis, is a proximate rule, and immediate, because it applies the law in particular. Syndéresis is an infallible rule, because it relates to principles by themselves known; but conscience is liable to error, because it may become, and often does become, that which badly applies good principles. Conscience is the dictate of practical reason, affirming or denying any thing in particular to be lawful or unlawful, and as such to be embraced or to be avoided."* In short, when Dens says syndéresis, you must understand him to mean Conscience. When he says conscientia, he means Opinion.

Such is the technical conscience of Romanism in the Book of Spiritual Exercises; and therefore the popular notion of conscience must be very confused indeed. It cannot be rectified at the confessionals, where the confessors are entirely governed by a depraved casuistry. Bearing this in mind, we will conclude our survey of the first lessons of a Jesuit novitiate, by noting the Manner of a General Examination,† containing five Parts or Points, namely:—

1. That we should thank God for all His benefits.
2. That we should ask His grace, that we may know our sins and cast them out.
3. That we should take account of our souls for things allowed during each day, from hour to hour, in thought, word, and deed; as instructed in the "Particular Examination."
4. That we should ask pardon for all our offences.
5. That we should purpose amendment by the grace of God. Last of all, we should say the Lord's Prayer.

Beyond these hints, and the mechanical registration of sins or crimes, with the usual impositions of penance, there are no means prescribed for a radical cure of the moral disease which is the prolific source of all offences. Abundant instruction may be found in the Holy Scriptures, but reference to that supreme and sure authority is not encouraged in the Church of Rome. The doctrinal teaching of the Gospels is not made the basis of meditation,—only the scenes.

A WEEK OF EXERCISES.

First Exercise.

After the preparatory Lessons comes the First Exercise in the First Week: "An Exercise in Meditation, concerning Sin, which, according to the Three Powers of the Soul, is threefold." The arithmetical formality of this title is effectually sustained in the formality of the Exercise.*

Before proceeding to execute his meditation, the Novice should make a preparatory prayer for grace to direct all his powers and operations to the glory and honour of God.

The Spiritual Director is referred to his instructions for teaching such persons how to pray. There are said to be three ways of praying. The first requires most examination. The second, most meditation. The third and simplest, less of both. To learn these three, they say, is to master the whole art of prayer. This art of prayer, however, does not equal that which Holy Scripture calls "the spirit of grace and of supplications."

Before any one prays in the first manner of the three, he should sit or walk about in silence for a little, to get his mind quiet, and think what may happen to him, and what he has to do. He should pray for grace that he may know how to keep the Ten Commandments. Having considered each Commandment in order, remembering how far he has kept or broken it, and asked pardon for every breach he can remember, he must repeat the Lord's Prayer once. "Let him take about so much time in thinking over each Commandment, as it would cost him to repeat that prayer thrice." After the examination he will pray for grace to keep the Commandments better. He must then examine himself on each of the seven mortal sins,—Pride, Covetousness, Lasciviousness, Anger, Gluttony, Envy, and Sloth, the three powers of the soul, and the five senses of the body. If he wishes to imitate Christ in the use of his senses, he must commend himself to God. If he wishes to imitate the Virgin Mary, he must commend himself to her. The commendation to God must be followed with a Paternoster; the commendation to the Virgin enforced with a Hail Mary. The second way of prayer is to kneel or sit down, shut the eyes, or fix them on one object, recite the Lord's Prayer, and meditate on every word of it in succession. The third way is to select a prayer, pausing on every word and paraphrasing the whole. Or the Hail Mary or the Creed may be so treated. All this is wretchedly mechanical at best, and if the Novice is in earnest to know what is right, it must be perplexingly wearisome: if not in earnest, it must be formal and childish.

* Tractatus de Conscientia, No. 175.

† "Examinis Generalis Modus."

* "Primum Exercitium Meditandi secundum tres animæ potentias circa peccatum triplex."

Then there are two Preludes. The first Prelude is a Compositio Loci, or Composition of the Place. This is explained by observing that in any meditation or contemplation concerning a corporeal thing, —Christ for example,—we should figure to ourselves a place, the Temple perhaps, where we may find Him, or the Mount. Or it may be the Virgin Mary, or some other person. "Or if we are meditating on an incorporeal thing, such, for example, as the sins now to be thought of, we may imagine our soul to be imprisoned in a corruptible body—man himself in this vale of misery, a companion of brute beasts." Compositio Loci might therefore be translated into "Scene of the Drama," or "Picture for the Lesson."

The second Prelude will be to ask the Lord for what is desired, according to the subject of contemplation. For example: if in a meditation on the resurrection of Christ, joyfulness; to rejoice with Christ rejoicing. Or, if meditating on His passion, to desire tears, pains and pangs; to sympathise with Christ suffering. In the present meditation on sins, shame and confusion should be desired, considering how many men were damned for one mortal sin, and how I deserve damnation on account of many.

One or two prayers should precede every meditation, but always two Preludes, varied according to the subject.

In the present meditation there are three Points. (1.) The first sin of the angels. (2.) The sin of our first parents. (3.) The sin of the person under exercise.

On each of these three Points must be exercised the three Powers of the Soul, namely, Memory, Reason, Will. On the first Point, for example, Memory, to recall the first sin of the angels. Reason and Will, to compare my sin and theirs, my many sins being more than their one. On the second Point, the three Powers are to be exercised on the sins of our first parents. It should be remembered how Adam was made out of clay on the plain of Damascus; but how the creation of man is known to have taken place on the plain of Damascus, the Jesuit cannot tell us. If not known, then how remembered? It should be remembered how Adam was placed in the earthly Paradise, and Eve formed from one of his ribs; how they ate the forbidden fruit, were driven out of Paradise, clothed in skins, and deprived of righteousness, which the Jesuit forgets he had already lost! and how he spent the rest of his life in doing penance! On this medley of fact and fable the devotee must meditate, and get his affections roused, as before. The third Point is to exercise himself by meditating on a mortal sin of his own, aggravating his guilt, which is greater than that of the angels, or of Adam and Eve.

After the two Preludes and the threefold Meditation should come a Colloquy.

"This is done by imagining Christ to be present before me, and nailed to the cross. Therefore I must seek within myself for a reason why the Infinite Creator deigned to become a creature, and came from eternal life to temporal death for my sins. I must further argue with myself, inquiring what I have done as yet for Christ worthy to be remembered, and what I shall now do, or ought to do. And looking on Him as He is fixed to the cross, I must address Him, and say what my mind and affection may suggest. Here note that it is proper that a Colloquy be made as the speech of one friend to another, or of a servant to his master; now asking some favour, again accusing himself of some fault; at another time communicating on some private matter, and asking advice and help concerning it, Last of all, let us say a Pater Noster."

Second Exercise.

The Second Exercise is a resumption of the First, after the same preparatory prayer, and the two Preludes slightly varied. Five Points of meditation in the same vein; a Colloquy to follow, and at the end a Paternoster.

Third Exercise.

The Third Exercise is a repetition of the First and Second. "Then, if a spiritual motion occurs to us, let us come to the three following Colloquies." These are very characteristic:—

"The First Colloquy is addressed to Our Lady the Mother of Christ, imploring her intercession with her Son, and entreating for the grace that is thrice needful for us. First, that we may feel an inward sense and detestation of our crimes. Second, that acknowledging and abhorring the perverse course of our works, and this being corrected, we may order ourselves aright, according to the will of God. Third, that having seen and condemned the depravity of the world, we may depart from worldly and vain things. This Colloquy being ended, recite once an Ave Maria."

"The Second Colloquy is addressed in like manner to Christ our Lord and Mediator, that He may pray the Eternal Father for the same things for us. Let the prayer beginning with Anima Christi be added at the end. It is as follows:—

"Soul of Christ, sanctify me.
Body of Christ, save me.
Blood of Christ, inebriate me.

Water from the side of Christ, wash me.
Passion of Christ, comfort me.
O good Jesus, give ear to me.
Within Thy wounds hide me.
Let me not be separated from Thee.
From the malignant enemy defend me.
In the hour of my death, call me.
And command me to come to Thee.
That with Thy saints I may praise Thee
For ever and ever. Amen.

"The Third Colloquy is to be made in the same order to God the Father, that He may grant us that threefold grace, and at the last recite one Paternoster."

Fourth Exercise.

A recapitulation of the three preceding, to fix them in the memory. It has a recitation of the Three Colloquies, with Paternoster.

Fifth Exercise.

This chiefly consists of a very notable contemplation concerning Hell. After the preparatory prayer come two Preludes, five Points, and one Colloquy.

"First Prelude for composition of the place, having the length, breadth, and depth of Hell present to the imagination.

"Second Prelude seeks for an intimate apprehension of the penalties the damned will pay; so that when I begin to forget Divine love, I may be at once restrained from sin by fear of punishment.

"The First Point is to behold, in imagination, the vast burnings of Hell, and the souls shut up in fiery bodies, as in prison-cells.

"The Second Point is to hear, or seem to hear, the plaints, the howlings, the shrieks, and the blasphemies against Christ and His saints, that break forth thence.

"The Third Point is to smell, or think you smell, the smoke and sulphur, and to perceive the deadly stench of a sink filled with sewage and rottenness.

"The Fourth Point is to taste, in like manner, things most bitter, such as tears, rancour, and the remorseful worm of conscience.

"The Fifth Point is to feel those flames at whose touch the souls themselves are burning.

"In Colloquy with Christ, the souls of those who are damned in Hell will be brought to memory. They are damned because they would not believe in the advent of Christ; for, if they had believed that, they would have led a life conformed to His precepts. This they would have done, whether they lived before Christ came, or in the time of His living in the world, or after that time. Then I must give the greatest possible thanks to Christ that He did not suffer me to fall into the like destruction, but has preserved me to this day with supreme power and mercy. This Meditation closes with a Paternoster."

The man who can work up his imagination, and even excite his senses to such a pitch that he can seem to see, hear, smell, taste, and feel the horrors of hell, may well aspire to be a Jesuit preacher. But the power of accomplishing such Exercises under the direction of a Superior can only be gained after an absolute submission of the will, with long-continued and habitual effort. The imagery made familiar to the exercitant must return to the captive mind after this man becomes a preacher. His habit of composing a place will enter into the preparation of every sermon; and the histrionic style which, after the adoption of these Exercises, prevailed in Popish countries, must have contributed to perpetuate the mediæval method of picture-teaching, which dealt with men as if they were children, and left the mind uncultivated and the conscience dormant. Hence we may account for the continuance of conflicting unbelief and superstition which were prevalent before the rise of Jesuitism, whose boasted educational power has had such slight effect. The spurious pietism of these artificial meditations has left no appreciable trace of moralizing influence, and the sprinkling of a few fine sentiments and sentences of indisputable truth over the surface of a vast fallacy, with an utter negation of honesty in the Principium sive Fundamentum of the whole fabric of the Papacy, makes it only the more hurtful to the Church and to the world.

If our object were to present a complete picture of Jesuitism, with an exact account of its principles and spirit, nothing could so well answer the purpose as an exact translation of the Spiritual Exercises and authorised Directory, with the necessary comment.

HERETICS AND INQUISITION.

It is not enough to say that the Church of Rome is guilty of persecution, and to give instances of Popes and Councils here and there whose acts prove it. To persecute and kill heretics is an acknowledged function of the priesthood. In the ancient Oath taken by Bishops at their consecration, and which remains unaltered to the present day, excepting a slight change politically made in England, and sometimes, by Concordat or forced concession, in other countries, the Bishop elect swears, as his predecessors have sworn for ages, Hæreticos, Schismaticos, et rebelles eidem Domino nostro vel successoribus prædictis pro posse persequar et impugnabo: "Heretics, schismatics, and rebels to the said Our Lord, or to His successors as aforesaid, with my might I will persecute and attack." From Innocent III. to Pius IX. there is scarcely a Pope who has reigned long enough to leave a vestige of his existence in the Bullarium or in Baronius, that has not taken the lead in the horrid work which the Church of Rome alone amongst all Churches bearing the Christian name has made one of her chief duties, and has had for its due performance an Institution at once praised and execrated as the Supreme and Universal Roman Inquisition. It cannot be adequately described here, and its odious notoriety makes description almost needless. Yet if any reader of this volume has allowed himself to give credit for a moment to an industriously circulated misconception that the Inquisition is not a part of the Church, but only an incidental contrivance of zealots, a thing existing outside the Church, never general, and not known in modern times, we will translate a few sentences from a modern authority, and leave him, if so disposed, to read its history elsewhere.*

"Concerning the Congregation of the Sacred Inquisition, or Holy Office.

"Heresies infesting religion having sprung up, and abominably increased, there was nothing more necessary than the provision of new arms and new armies to put them to rout and ruin. It was, therefore, needful that the Church should bestir herself, and add to the Bishops (who are bound to keep watch against heretics, and are therefore called Inquisitors born) other religious companions, that always and everywhere they might fight, and fight with greater strength.

"Therefore, Innocent III. sent out several Monks of Cistello, (Pietro Monaco, in his History of the Albigenses, says there were twelve; Robert of Auxerre and William of Nangis say thirteen or fourteen,) with a Brief dated 29th May, 1204, against the Albigenses. Pietro of Castelnuovo was head of the expedition, who, together with Radolfo, was also Legate of the Pope, and for the faith's sake was put to death by Raimund, Count of Toulouse, a great defender of those heretics. In which time, God, having raised up the Order of Preaching Fathers to root out from the Gospel field the bad-born tares of error, Innocent III. made the holy founder of so eminent an Order (Dominic) first Inquisitor of the Faith in Toulouse. Gregory IX., in the year 1231, by a letter addressed to the Prior of the Order of St. Dominic in Lombardy, committed the office of Inquisitor to the Single Order of Dominicans. This was confirmed by Boniface IX., (See Bzovius, 1403, num. 4,) a fact which the anonymous Certosino, who wrote in the fifteenth century on the origin of Religions,† neatly relates, to the honour and glory of this Order. Innocent IV. in 1251 published his Constitution Ad extirpandas, addressed to the Magistrates of Lombardy, Romagna, and Marca Trevigiana, in which he laid down the heads of inquisition to be observed by the Tribunals against the heretics and their abettors; and here began the establishment of the Tribunal of the Inquisition in other provinces also. Sixtus IV. founded one in Spain in the year 1483. In 1531 and 1532 another was established in Portugal by Clement VII. And finally Paul III. founded in Rome the principal Tribunal of the Sacred Inquisition, granting it the power of creating Inquisitors, and exercising supreme authority over the Universal Church. (See the Constitution, Licet, etc., 3, and others confirmed by Sixtus V., Const. 74.)

"And the abovesaid Congregation having been erected in the form of a Tribunal, the same Pontiff, Paul III., set over it the fixed number of six Cardinals, who were to form it. Pius IV. added two others. Sixtus V. was pleased to raise the number to twelve, which was not to be exceeded without approval of the Pope. It is also provided with several special officers.

"This Congregation takes cognizance of all causes which have any relation to those crimes in which there appears any suspicion of false belief, as well as heresies, heretical blasphemies, sortilege, abuse of sacraments, and such other foul and wicked maxims, and of persons who maintain false doctrines, and put forth wicked instructions and bad writings, whom it usually takes into custody, and puts under examination. It proscribes bad books and their authors; although this rather belongs to the Sacred Congregation of the Index, which we shall see in its proper place. It also deals with matrimonial dispensations, and treats of all those matters which in any way can have relation to the Faith, according to the very many Pontifical Constitutions cited by the Advocate Danielli. And therefore, because frequent and infinite are the affairs which this Congregation has to agitate, it has met thrice in the week. First on Monday in the Palace of the Holy Office, when the Consultors, the Assessor, and the Commissary are present, the processes are read, and the letters from Inquisitors in partibus (i. e., in countries not 'Catholic,') and suitable measures are taken. On Wednesday the Second Congregation is held in the Convent of Sta. Maria, commonly called 'of the Minerva,' when the Cardinals attend, to whom are referred the Resolutions come to on Monday by the Consultors. Finally, the third Congregation meets on the Thursday in the Apostolic Palace, where the Supreme Pontiff, as Head, presides over the Cardinals; and if there is nothing to the contrary, he confirms and approves the decrees taken by the two preceding Congregations, and there is always a decision on some particular case.

"Concerning the Commissary, Assessor, Consultors, Qualificators, Fiscal, and other Ministers of the Holy Inquisition.—Besides the Cardinals which compose this Congregation, there are other ordinary Ministers who direct this Tribunal, exercising actual jurisdiction, forming and examining the processes of the criminals. There is the Inquisitor, called Commissary of the Holy Office; he is of the Order of St. Dominic, and acts as ordinary Judge of the Congregation.

"The Assessor is an eminent Prelate of this Court, and is its Counsellor, and renders the same service as the Commissary; just as many cases are submitted to the judgment of the Assessor as the civil controversies that arise respecting this Tribunal, and at one time the civil and criminal cases regarding the persons that were furnished with the letters patent of the said Congregation. It is his duty to signify to the Pontiff the Resolutions of the Congregation. Several theo-

* History of the Inquisition from its Establishment in the Twelfth Century to its Extinction in the Nineteenth. By William Harris Rule, D.D. In Two Volumes. London: Wesleyan Conference Office. 1874.

† "Religion. Monastic life. A monastery. A monastic order. A confraternity or sisterhood, bound under vow."—Ducange, s.v., "RELIGIO."

logians and learned canonists, and secular clerks also, called Consultors of the Holy Office, elected by the Pontiff, take part in the affairs of this Congregation.

"Among the Consultors, the General of the Dominicans, the Master of the Sacred Palace, who is also of the same Order, and a professed member of the Order of Minor Conventuals of St. Francis, have their place ex officio. Sometimes this Congregation also commits affairs, books, writings, to be examined by a theologian who happens not to be of the number of Consultors, nor has any place in the Congregation, except when he has to present an account of the matters confided to him. Such a person has the title of Qualifier. (Van Espen. Jus Can. Univers., part i., tit. 22.)

"There is also the Depositary, who has charge of the revenues of this Tribunal; the Advocate, who defends the causes of the criminals; the Fiscal Prosecutor, who takes the place of accuser; and the Notary. There was also another subaltern, commonly called the Captain, counted among the servants of the Tribunal.

"The Congregation and Secretary of the Index.—The business which has to be transacted by the Holy Office being very great and of the highest importance, St. Pius V. created the Congregation of the Index as its auxiliary, for the discharge of a special office, as part of the jurisdiction of the Holy Office, namely, the examination and prohibition of infamous works and books. From the first ages of the Church* it was a wisely ordered custom of the Popes to interdict those scandalous books which might pervert the manners and the pious belief of the faithful, and at last the Council of Trent (Sess. xviii.) committed to some chosen Fathers the care of forming an Index of all those books and authors which were considered hurtful and prejudicial to religion; which Index, having been examined by Pius IV., and by some very learned Prelates of his appointment, was afterwards approved by himself. (Const. Dominici Gregis, 24 Mart., 1564.) Certain Rules of the Fathers were prefixed to this Index, and are called 'Rules of the Index,' containing many things to be observed by Bishops, Inquisitors, and Printers, concerning the reading, revision, printing, and sale of books.

"This Congregation is composed of the Cardinal Prefect and other Cardinals; many Consultors, with whom the Master of the Sacred Palace is perpetual Assistant; and the Secretary, who is of the Order of St. Dominic. This Congregation is convened, as often as is necessary, by the Secretary, and meets on the day appointed, in the Apostolic Palace. The books being examined by the Consultors and Theologians, and the heads of accusation being exhibited by the Secretary, and the Reports of the Examiners, the votes of the Cardinals are taken, and laid before His Holiness by the Secretary to obtain his approval, and to form the Decree for the prohibition of each impious book, which is at once annexed to the Index. Sixtus V. and Clement VIII. enlarged the authority of this Congregation, so that it can grant a license to any person to read and to keep prohibited books; which licenses may also be granted by the Secretary himself for three years, to be then renewable for three years more. He is accustomed to dispense them on Saturdays, subscribing them with his own name, and sealing them with the seal of the Cardinal Prefect of the Congregation. Further information may be found in a treatise by Catalano on the Secret Congregation of the Index, and the Constitution of Benedict XIV. prefixed to the Index of 1755."*

This is a very bold and very customary generality. There were no Popes in "the first ages of the Church."

INDEXES,

Prohibitory and Expurgatory.

THE books generally bearing the title of Prohibitory and Expurgatory Indexes are catalogues of authors and works, either entirely condemned, or censured and corrected, chiefly by expunction; published by the chief authorities of the Papal Church, represented in the Congregation of the Roman Inquisition, or, to speak more correctly, by a branch of that body, known as the Congregation of the Index. A Prohibitory Index specifies and prohibits entire books, or works, whether of known or unknown authors. An Expurgatory Index contains a particular examination of the works occurring in it, and specifies the passages to be expunged or altered. There has been a multitude of these books, which it would be tedious to specify, even so far as they are known; but they were not intended for the public eye, but only to be used by Inquisitors, Priests, and Booksellers. They were printed in the various languages of Europe, so far at least as Popery prevailed.† Sometimes the Index is altogether prohibitory; at other times it contains separate lists of books to be prohibited, and of others to be expurgated. At first, Pius IV. appointed persons to prepare a list of books to be prohibited, and to draw up a set of rules for the guidance of those who should be thenceforth engaged in the same work, and sanctioned their Index with a Bull, dated 24th of March, 1564. From one published by command of Sixtus V., 7th ides of March, 1589, and containing twenty-two Rules, I extract the following Rules relating to the Holy Scriptures.

"Rule VI.—Versions of the Bible edited in any language by Heresiarchs, or even by Heretics, are condemned and interdicted; and versions of books of the Holy Fathers, or versions of ecclesiastical writers made by the same, if others have been issued before them from the Apostolic Press in the Vatican, must neither be published, nor sold, nor kept. But

* Relazione della Corte di Roma. Da Fr. Antonio Zaccaria. Roma. 1824. Parte ii.

† The chief English authority for a critical account of these Indexes is, "The Literary History of the Church of Rome exhibited in an Account of her Damnatory Catalogues or Indexes; both Prohibitory and Expurgatory. By the Rev. Joseph Mendham. M.A." London. 1830.

versions of Heathen Books, if the names of their authors be deleted, are permitted ; unless they wrest anything in opposition to Catholic discipline ; for then they must be altogether put out of the way, until they shall be purged, and so issued from the same Apostolic press.

"Rule VII.—The Holy Bible, or any part of it, translated into a living language, even by a Catholic, is never permitted without a new and special license from the Apostolic See ; but vulgar paraphrases are altogether interdicted."

With regard to Liberty of the Press, or rather Bondage of the Press, the following Rule of the same Index is worth preserving :—

"Rule XX.—Libraries and printing-offices, wherever they are, must be visited ; if in Rome, by the Master of the Sacred Palace ; but in other places by the Bishops, or other superior Clergy, and by the Inquisitors, or at least by such persons as they depute. Packages, also, belonging to persons who expose books for sale in streets or neighbourhoods in cities, or who carry them about to sell in villages, towns, or other places, must be searched.

"But let no books be offered for sale, unless a list of them is made out and signed by the authorities abovesaid ; nor may any other books than those marked in the list be offered for sale, under such penalties as those authorities may please to fix.

"From the public place, too, which is established for collecting customs and importing goods, the officers of the place shall not suffer books to be taken, unless they who imported them, or the booksellers, produce a list certified by those to whom it pertains to examine books, and then obtain a license.

"But the heirs and executors of last wills must not use the books left by the deceased, nor give them to others to be used, nor let them go out of their hands on any account whatever, before they have had a list made by persons authorised, and have obtained a license from the same.

"As for a book prohibited, let all men know that it is not lawful for any one to tear it or burn it by his own authority, but it must be delivered to the Master of the Sacred Palace at Rome, or, in other places to the chief Clergyman and the Inquisitor, whose duty it will be to make diligent inquiry of the person who delivers it. But where an Office of the Holy Inquisition is not established, and there is a University, the Bishop with the Dean must do all this.

"And whatever books or writings are interdicted from the use of the faithful, neither Jews nor Infidels, nor other such people, dwelling or being in Christian provinces or places, may have them, read them, buy them, sell them, or carry them away. And, whoever shall offend in this matter shall be punished by the aforesaid according to the gravity of his offence. And, moreover, prohibited books in any language are also prohibited into whatsoever language they may be translated."*

* Index Librorum Prohibitorum à Sixto V. Papa. Edente Josepho Mendham, M.A. 1835.

The Seventh Rule of the above Index, which afterwards changed its place, and was differently numbered, could not long remain in force, and could never have been executed in any country without the very active assistance of the Holy Office. But even the Holy Office was forced to retreat before the torrents of indignation which its atrocities provoked. This will be seen by the following Rule in the Spanish Index of 1790, which was universally adopted so long as the Inquisition could act at all. It was in force in Spain when the present writer was in that country, and its rules were carried into execution in his own library, out of which some books were taken as prohibited.

"Rule V.—The contents of the Fifth Rule of the Old Expurgatory Index having been made the subject of much meditation and reflection, by which Rule, for very just reasons which existed at the time when it was made, the printing and reading of Versions of the Sacred Books into a vulgar tongue was prohibited, to a greater extent than is contemplated in the Fourth Rule of the Index of the Council, (which reasons have now ceased from change of times,) and considering, on the other hand, the usefulness which may follow to the Faithful from the instruction which many works and Versions of the Sacred Text offer, works which have hitherto been regarded as falling under the said Fifth Rule : it is declared that it must be reduced to the precise terms of the Fourth Rule of the Index of the Council, with the Declaration of it given by the Sacred Congregation on the 13th of June, 1757, approved by his Holiness Benedict XIV. of happy memory, and practically authorised by our Holy Father Pius VI. in the eulogy and recommendation which, in the Brief of the 17th of March, 1778, he makes of the translation into Italian by the learned author Antonio Martini. And, accordingly, Versions of the Bible into vulgar languages are permitted, provided they be approved by the Apostolic See, or published by Catholic authors with annotations from the Holy Fathers of the Church, or Catholic Doctors, which remove all danger of misunderstanding. But it must not be understood that the prohibition has been withdrawn in respect to those translations, if those circumstances are wanting."*

Not knowing that the original rule was relaxed, some anti-Popish controversialists have been misled into the quotation of a law of absolute prohibition which no longer can exist. But notwithstanding the relaxation of the rule in regard to Vernacular Versions, and the partial permission to read the Bible, which was extorted by necessity from the Congregation of the Index, the utmost care was taken to enforce the original restrictions by all means possible, of which an example may be given.

In a Supplement to the Spanish Index of 1790, issued in 1805, the Inquisitor General of that time republished the following order of his predecessor Bertran, dated 7th of May, 1782 :—"We declare and command that in order to use licenses granted in any manner for retaining and reading prohibited books, those who have obtained them must annually consult with their Confessors, whom we strictly charge to forbid such licenses to be made use of whenever the penitents have caused or suffered any scandal by their use; and this not only by way of remedial penance, but also in our name, and by virtue of the faculty which from this time we grant them: by imposing precept and obligation, in virtue of holy obedience, on all Confessors, secular and regular, and principally on those who have charge of souls, that to the persons who confess with them, especially during Lent, fulfilling the precepts of the Church, they put the question, and examine, whether they have any prohibited book or books, or any books commanded by the Expurgatory and later Edicts to be expurgated; and those who have them, and appear to have incurred the censures in such cases pronounced, they must counsel and admonish to clear themselves, giving them to know that absolution from the censures they have incurred, (unless they comply with the obligation they are under on this account,) is reserved to the Inquisitor General of these kingdoms, by special Briefs of His Holiness Paul V., of 27th January, 1612, and of Urban VIII., of 17th August, 1627. That for no one in these kingdoms will avail in conscience or in the Church any licenses which he has obtained or may hereafter obtain from the general Congregations of Rome, whose action must be restricted to their own district: and that the licenses which proceed from His Holiness himself are laid before Us, or before the Counsel of the Holy General Inquisition (of Spain), that the prayers (on which the license was granted) may be examined; and, if it is not found convenient to allow the person to use it, that they (the prayers) may be registered in the respective tribunals of the Holy Office, to serve them for information and guidance, in case of any delation, for drawing up cases of this kind, in which we command all the Inquisitors of these kingdoms to proceed with all severity, that personal and pecuniary punishment may refresh their almost extinguished fear of the ecclesiastical censures with which not only the readers, retainers, buyers, sellers, and exchangers of such books are miserably bound, but also those who do not delate to the Holy Office any of the transgressors of these Edicts, precepts, and mandates." Then follows, at great length, a renewal of the substance of the twentieth Rule of the Index of Sixtus V. quoted above:—

* Indice Ultimo de los Libros Prohibidos y mandados expurgar. Madrid. 1790.

"Also, because experience has taught us that through carelessness, ignorance, or imperfect knowledge of books prohibited or expurgated, there have been, and still are, many such in old libraries, and have passed from hand to hand of many owners, we order and command, that all booksellers, or whoever else make lists and descriptions of such libraries to value them or sell them, or in any other way alienate or dispose of them, be obliged to present under their own signature such lists and descriptions of libraries and books to the person or persons appointed by the Holy Office to examine and register them, under penalty of the abovesaid censures, and of fifty ducats for the costs of the Holy Office for the first offence, and double for the second."

It will be remembered that although the Inquisition is extinct, and the Congregation of the Index, even if it be, in form and shadow, preserved for a while in the chambers of the Vatican, has no life, no action left, the spirit of Popery is as vigorous as ever; and the hatred of the Bible, natural to the Papacy and to the Society of Jesuits, is manifest in the Encyclical and Syllabus of 1864, where Pius IX. counts Bible Societies among the institutions which he considers to be hostile to Christianity.

THE ROMAN INQUISITION IN 1851.

WE have only to look back a few years into the records of this Pontificate, to find memorable instances of Inquisitorial effort through the Congregation of the Index for the suppression of truths which could not be told without peril to the Roman See.

In the year of Revolutions, 1848, while the Pope was playing with Liberalism in Rome, promising the Romans a Constitution for the States of the Church, like that which Queen Christina had reluctantly conceded to the Spaniards for a little in 1835, and they were singing hymns to him in Rome, the Spaniards of South America were awakening to a sense of Papal tyranny. The spirit which he was fostering in Italy in the deceitful hope of turning it to his own advantage and to the exaltation of his Church and kingdom, was too powerful to be mocked, and no sooner was his treachery discovered than the disappointed Romans turned suddenly against him, demanded an instant fulfilment of his promise, and so sorely frighted him that he disguised himself as a servant and fled into Naples. Thus disappointed he assumed a new position, and boldly dared a general revolt against him. In that same eventful year an elaborate work in six volumes issued from the press in Lima, bearing this portentous title, "Defence of the Authority of the Governments and of the Bishops against the Pretensions of the Roman Court. By Francisco de Paula G. Vigil." In Piedmont, too, the history of past ages was brought to enlighten the darkness of the present, by another acute lawyer, Joannes Nepomucenus Nuytz, a Professor in the Athenæum of Turin, who had made a profound impression by the production of two works: "Institutions of Ecclesiastical Law," and "Treatises on universal Canon Right."

Having regained his throne in Rome by help of foreign arms, and finding himself protected against his own people by a French garrison, the Pope hastened to ponder the offensive volumes, and to press forward the despotic reaction which for a brief interval stilled the fury of rebellion, but left the rebels a sufficient space for rallying their scattered forces. In the first half of the year 1851 the Qualifiers of the Inquisition finished their examination of the books, and Briefs of condemnation were prepared. The Briefs lie before us. Concerning Vigil he writes bitterly, even charging him with sentences which are not to be found in his volumes, and proceeds thus:—"He attributes to a lay Government the right of deposing Bishops from the exercise of their pastoral ministry, —(Bishops) whom the Holy Spirit set to govern the Church of God. He endeavours to persuade those who sit at the helm of public affairs that they should not obey the Roman Pontiff in matters that relate to the institution of Bishoprics and Bishops. He withdraws Kings and other Princes who by Baptism are made members of the Church from the jurisdiction of the Church, just as if they were Pagan Kings, or as if Christian Princes in spiritual and ecclesiastical affairs were not sons and subjects of the Church." Here we cannot refrain from pointing out the extent of this assertion; for as the theologians of the Vatican acknowledge the validity of Baptism, even though administered by a layman, a woman, a child, a schismatic, or a heretic, and Pius IX., with his Cardinals and Inquisitors, maintains that all Kings and other Princes who are made members of the Church by Baptism are therefore, in relation to all ecclesiastical affairs, sons and servants of the Church, the Pope's sworn Priests in England are instructed to regard our most gracious Queen as his servant, and as lying under his jurisdiction in things ecclesiastical; on which theory how far the alleged jurisdiction may not eventually extend, none can foretell. But to proceed:—

"Although any one may easily perceive how many and how grave chapters of error are contained in this work, We, following in the steps of our predecessors, commanded the aforesaid work to be examined in Our Congregation of the Universal Inquisition, and the judgment of that Congregation to be afterwards referred to Us. Then Our Venerable Brethren, the Cardinals Inquisitors General, having made a previous censure of the work, and perpended the suffrages of the Consultors, reported that it contains doctrines and propositions respectively scandalous, reckless, false, schismatical, injurious to the Roman Pontiffs and Œcumenical Councils, subversive of the power, liberty, and jurisdiction of the Church, erroneous, impious, and heretical, and that it should be condemned and prohibited."

In pursuance of the Inquisitors' censure he proceeded,—"In the plenitude of Apostolic power We condemn and reprobate the work aforesaid, in which the doctrines and propositions above noted are contained; everywhere and in whatever other language, or edition, or version it is hitherto printed or may hereafter be printed, which may it not be! and forbid it to be read or retained; and We altogether interdict the impression, retention, description, reading, and use of it to all and every one of Christ's faithful, under peril of excommunication as transgressors by the very fact, to be incurred without any other declaration, from which none can be by any one released, except by Us, or the Roman Pontiff for the time being, unless it be in the article of death."* As a denunciation, this is absurdly insignificant; but it stands in an unbroken series of acts sustained to this very moment with a fixedness of purpose which compels the active resistance of the wisest statesmen in the world.

The works of Professor Nuytz were subjected to the same treatment, and we have only to mark the wider sweep of the Inquisitorial sentence, as it directly bears on the one great object of this Pope's life, namely, the coercion of the civil power into submission to the ecclesiastical the whole world over,—were it but possible. The propositions detailed as errors in the censure of the Vatican Inquisitors are all of them transferred, verbally, to the Syllabus of 1864, where the reader will find them on another page. The guilt of the Italian Professor is, as Pius IX. words it, that "with supreme wrong he asserts the Church to be so subjected to the civil government that he directly or indirectly confers on the civil power whatever in relation to the government of the Church, to sacred persons and sacred things, and to the administration of judicial authority in the Church, is sanctioned by divine institution or by ecclesiastical laws. By so doing, he renews the impious system of Protestants by which the society of the faithful is reduced into servitude under the civil government."†

* Multiplices inter June 10th, 1851.

† ...."Denique sic Ecclesiam eidem civili imperio subditam esse per summum nefas asserit, ut ad potestatem civilem directe vel indirecte conferat quidquid de Ecclesiæ regimine, de personis, rebusque sacris, de judiciali Ecclesiæ foro divina est institutio e vel ecclesiasticis legibus sancitum, atque adeo impium renovat Protestantium systema, quo fidelium societas in servitutem redigitur civilis imperii."—Ad Apostolicæ, August 22nd, 1851.

INDEX TO SUPPLEMENT.

A.

Acts of Parliament: 13, 14 George III., iv, b—Roman Catholic Relief, 10 George IV., iv, a—30, 31 Victoria, iv, b

Addresses to Pius IX.: Address and Declaration of two hundred and sixty-five Bishops, etc., in 1862, xii, b, xiii, a—adulatory, of five hundred Cardinals and Bishops in 1867, xvi, b—remonstrant, of fifteen Bishops in 1869, xx, b—dissuasive, of a large number in same year, xxi, a—expostulatory, of Cardinals, Archbishops, etc., in same year, ibid.

Allocution of December, 1861, xii, b

A. M. G. D., explained, xxxix, a

Anima Christi, xliv, b

Appeals to lay authority forbidden, xxxv, b

Astorga, Bishop of, defends Protestant translators of the Bible, xiv, a

B.

Bernard reproves those who advocate the doctrine of Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary, vi, b

Bible Societies denounced, ii, a, xiii, b

Bishops send up reports on Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary, vii, b, viii, ix—their servile adulation of Pius IX., xii, b, xiii, a—poor ones paid and fed at the Vatican Council, xxvi. b—appointed in England, ii, a—the oath required by English law at their consecration, iii, a—that oath superseded by a weaker one, iv, b—their position incompatible with civil allegiance, iii, a Books. See Indexes.

Brief (not Bull) for calling Bishops and others to the Vatican Council, xvii, b

C.

Canonization of twenty-seven persons at once, xii, b

Canon Law overruled by Pope, xxxvii, a

Cardinal Cullen browbeats members of the Vatican Council, xxv, b—Cardinal Capalti insults them, xxvi, a

Cardinals, charge given to them with the Red Hat, v, a Civil Right is as nothing to Papal Authority, xvi, a

Clausure, means close confinement, xxxvii, b—breach of it to be condignly punished, ibid.—cloister-life is life under clausure, ibid.

Clergy, Secular and Regular, xxxiv, b

Common monastic life, xxxv, b, xxxvi, a, b, xxxvii, a

Congregation of the Holy Office, xlvi, a

Cumming, Doctor, asks a question, and is answered, xviii, b

Curse at the close of the Vatican Council, xxxiv, a

D.

Disaffection within the Papal Church, xx, a Discussion not allowed at the Vatican, xix, b

Divine Tradition, xi, b

Dogmatical Decree of Immaculate Conception, x, a

E.

Encyclicals, first of Pius IX. in 1846, i, a, b—on Immaculate Conception in 1849, v, b—with Syllabus of Errors in 1864, xiii, b

F.

Florence, Council of, xvii, a

G.

General of the Society of Jesus, xxxix, b

H.

Haynald, Archbishop, outrageously treated in the Vatican Council, xxv, b, xxvi, a

"Heretics" contemptuously invited to submit, xviii, a

I.

Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary, v, b

Index, Congregation and officers of, xlvii, a, b

Index, rules of, xlvii, b, xlviii

Indexes, Prohibitory and Expurgatory, xlvii, b

Indiction not made for Vatican Council, xvii, b

Infallibility of Pope secretly treated by the Pope and his adherents, xxi, b—in Rome, England, Belgium, xxi, b—conflict raised all over Europe and America between opposing parties, xxii, a—the Council divided, xxii, b—Pius is angered and unyielding, xxii, b—Pius stops all other business in the Council and enforces "Infallibility" alone, xxiii, a—all deliberation silenced, xxiii, b—none might speak without permission previously applied for and obtained, xxiii, b—Pope's delegates silenced speakers at their pleasure, xxiv, a—Commissions manage the mockery of a Council, xxiv, a, b—written papers privately read and examined instead of speeches, xxv, a—one hundred Bishops protest against the Pope's management, xxvi. b

Inquisition, the Pope its President, xlv, b—congregation of, xlvi, a, b—officers and servants of, xlvi, b—Roman, in 1851, xlix, l

Institutes other than Monasteries may be put under clausure, xxxviii, b

Italians predominate in Vatican Council, xxvi, b

Italy weary of Papal government, xii, a

J.

Jesuit Devotions. See Spiritual Exercises.

Jesuit Society, not monastic, xxxix, a—its three degrees, ibid.—Generals and Provincials, ibid.—great license under close discipline, ibid.—suppressed for crimes, and revived for services, xxxix, b
Jesuitism, its original design, xxxix, a

K.

King Victor Emanuel takes Rome, xxxiv, a Kings and Princes all kept aloof from the Vatican Council, xvii, b

L.

Lambruschini, Cardinal, on Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary, vi, a Letters Apostolic appointing Bishops in England, ii, a, b, iii, a

M.

Monasteries, all entrance of strangers absolutely forbidden, except in case of girls to the schools kept in them, xxxviii, b—monastic discipline has declined, xxxv, b—monastic vows, xxxv, a
Money, at any rate, xxxvii, a

N.

Novices must promise perfect observance of the Common Life, xxxvi, b Nuns rigidly bound to the Common Life, xxxvi, b—to seek only the Heavenly Spouse, xxxvii, a

O.

Oaths of Allegiance evasive, iii, b. iv. a,
Oaths political are ceremonious and temporary, v, a
Oath taken by Bishops at Consecration, iv, b
Oath taken by Cardinals. v, a
Obedience to Superiors, absolute. xxxv, a, b
Œcumenical Council, so called, xvii, a Oracle speaks, xiii, b
Oriental Bishops reject invitation to Council, xviii, a

P.

Perrone, Cardinal, on Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary, vi, a Persecution a duty of Bishops, xlv, b
"Pious opinion" explained, vi, a
Pius IX., untruthful, ix, b, xlix, b—seeks new patrons from among the dead, xii, b—receives divine adoration, xiii, a, xvi, b—invites his Bishops to Rome, xvi, a—snaps the bond of unity in his own Church. xxii, a—scandalously dishonest and violent, xxvii, a. b, xxviii, a—employs policemen and Inquisitors, xxviii, b
Pope, the Sovereign of Kings, xv, b
Primacy, of the Pope, absolute, xxiii, b—Apostolic, xxx, a—perpetual, xxx, b—its power and nature, xxxi, a—it is an infallible mastery, xxxii, b
Princes, protectors of the Church, ii, a Propaganda Society controls Bishops in England, iii, b
Property absolutely surrendered to monasteries by the inmates, xxxvi, b Protestants insolently summoned into the bosom of the Papal Church, xviii, a Protesting Archbishops and Bishops, xx, xxi, a

Q.

Question of the Papal claims hotly debated by both Priests and the laity, xxi, b, and throughout.

R.

Red Hat, the obligation it brings to the wearer, v, a Reign, prolonged, of Pius IX., i, a "Religion" = a monastic body, xlvi, a, note
Religious Liberty, disqualifies a State from being Catholic, xvii, b
Religious men may converse with nuns, xxxviii, b
Religious Orders, proposed schema for them, xxxv, a—to be encouraged by Bishops, xxxiv, b
Romanism, where is it ? xxi, a
Rome united under King of Italy, xxxiv. a

S.

Saints, twenty-seven newly made, xii, b
Schismatics, asked to make submission, xviii, a Schwartzenberg, Cardinal, heads a strong party of remonstrants xxi, a Spiritual Exercises, xl, a—unscriptural fundamental principle, xl. xli—mechanical method of self-conquest, xlii, a—three kinds of thought, xlii, b—merit of an evil thought, xlii, b—sins of word and deed, xlii, b—conscience, xliii, a—general examination, xliii—Week of Exercises, xliii, xliv, xlv Syllabus of Errors, xiii, b, xiv, xv, xvi, a Syndéresis, xliii, a

T.

Temporal Kingdom of the Popes lost, xvi, a Tradition, Divine, Apostolic, Ecclesiastical, how distinguished, xi, b—equal with Holy Scripture, xi, b Tradition, Roman, different from Jewish, xi, a

U.

Ultramontane and Cismontane, an obsolete distinction, i, a

V.

Vatican Council of 1870, xvi, a, b, xvii, a—first meeting, xix, b—members sworn in, ibid—interrupted, xxiii, a—silenced, xxiii, b—superseded, xxiv, a—managed by the Pope's Commissioners, ibid.—packed, xxv, b, xxvi, a—Constitutions and Canons, xxix—monition, etc., xxix, a—half deserted, it closes, xxxiv, a Virgin Mary, called Mother of God, ii, a—herself divine, vi, a

W.

Wesleyan Mission in Spain, i, b
Women, girls, and female infants not to enter Monasteries of men, xxxvii, b—the admission of them perilous and scandalous, xxxviii, a

THEOLOGY LIBRARY
CLAREMONT, CALIF.
A4425

LONDON:
PRINTED BY WILLIAM NICHOLS,
46, HOXTON SQUARE.

BX
1765
E4
1877?

Elliott, Charles, 1792-1869.
Delineation of Roman Catholicism, drawn from the authentic and acknowledged standards of the Church of Rome: namely, her creeds, catechisms, decisions of councils, papal bulls, Roman Catholic writers, the records of history, etc., in which the peculiar doctrines, morals, government, and usages of the Church of Rome are stated, treated at large, and confuted. Collected and revised throughout, with numerous important additions. 5th ed., with a recommendatory preface by the Rev. John Hannah. London, Wesleyan Conference Office [1877?] xvi, 822p. 27cm.

(817)

(Continued on next card)